Even as a little kid who enjoyed little kid things like action figures, I used Star Wars and its middle school mythos as a sort of unconscious personal litmus test to decide whether or not a person was lame, banal, and/or otherwise annoying. Although I had yet to see any of the films as a young kid because I was absolutely repelled by what little I did know about them and did not want to endure a movie with a retard-sounding hairy dog-man and a green midget alien with big ears that resembled a cross between an elderly shtetl bum and a giant booger, I became painfully aware at an early age that the bigger the Star Wars fan, the more likely person was completely insufferable and/or autistic. When I finally got around to seeing Lucas' first film in the franchise after being forced to watch it in a high school film class (!), I was somewhat shocked that it was not nearly as horrendous as I expected it to be, though I was equally surprised that such a decidedly derivative, hokey, and somewhat sloppy piece of seemingly asexual pseudo-spiritual celluloid had become so absurdly popular, at least until I realized that it owed a good portion of its fame to strategic merchandising, which Lucas would indubitably become the grand Dark Lord of the Sith of as a man that sired a virtual consumer religion with its own gods and pseudo-biblical tales and parables, thereupon turning an entire generation of American youth into materialistic zombies that worshiped Luke Skywalker as their Christ and could use Darth Vader as an excuse to hate their more masculine fathers (not surprisingly, as detailed in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998) by Peter Biskind, Lucas loathed his father, who once described his son as a "scrawny little devil"). The intentional sellout picture of a failed avant-garde filmmaker who once gleefully stated, "Emotionally involving the audience is easy. Anybody can do it blindfolded, get a little kitten and have some guy wring its neck," Star Wars is cinema as a calculated consumer good and a work that, aside from Steven Spielberg's Jaws (1975), has done more than any other film to destroy American cinema and turn it into an industry that produces feature-length commercials for a seemingly endless array of autism-inducing consumer products ranging from children's underwear to Band-Aids to diapers. Indeed, as Paul Schrader—a true auteur filmmaker that is one of the very filmmakers of his generation to never completely sellout and give up on making personal films—once stated regarding the film and its decidedly deleterious effect on the auteur oriented New Hollywood movement, "STAR WARS was the film that ate the heart and the soul of Hollywood. It created the big budget comic book mentality." Undoubtedly, there are many reasons to hate the film, including its black-and-white cardboard morality, idiotically idealistic and delusional emphasis on the perennial triumph of good over evil, conspicuously castrated view of love and sexuality, beta-boy father complex themes, and cinematically sacrilegious fan-boy jerk-off nods to much superior works ranging from Fritz Lang's Metropolis (1927) to Akira Kurosawa's The Hidden Fortress (1958), but arguably the most heinous and unforgivable thing about Star Wars is that it peddles feel-good lies to children and sets them up for psychological defeat and/or disappoint once they realize that life is not nearly as simple or magical as the film(s) so shamelessly depicts.

Of course, the franchise only got all the more phony and irredeemable when it was Judaized after being sold to Disney, with Hebraic hack J.J. Abrams' Star Wars Episode VII: The Force Awakens (2015) being the most radically retarded and anti-reality one yet as a soulless and sapless social justice warrior orgy where a singularly vapid all-competent-ingénue is the most immaculate and powerful person in the entire universe despite having nil training or personal experience and a burly black brother with a bad case of prognathism is naturally said all-competent-ingénue's right-hand negro man (interestingly, Lucas has gone on to describe to bash the new film and its creators and describe kosher culture-distorters Bob Iger and Abrams as "white slavers," thereupon potentially alluding to Jewry's long tradition of slave-trading, including in contemporary Israel where Eastern Europe girls are a great unkosher delicacy). Of course, when I recently happened upon a sort of low-budget arthouse-ish anti-Star Wars, I naturally found myself completely embracing it, even if it is French. Indeed, the French dystopian sci-fi short Star Suburb: La banlieue des étoiles (1983) directed by one-time auteur Stéphane Drouot tells the sad yet sardonic and socially scathing tale of a teenage girl that lives in a French orbital suburb in outer-space who, after flipping through an American magazine, fantasizes that she is a glamorous Princess Leia-like figure, only for her to suffer a catastrophic mental meltdown after her dreams are squashed when reality sets in. Notably, I discovered the film by accident after doing some research on Gaspar Noé and reading that it was one of his favorite films. In fact, Noé and his wife, arthouse filmmaker Lucile Hadžihalilović (La Bouche de Jean-Pierre, Innocence), were good friends with Drouot until his death in early 2012. Needless to say, as the same man that also introduced me to the criminally underrated Austrian serial killer flick Angst (1983) directed by Gerald Kargl and who regards Stanley Kubrick's magnum opus 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) as his all-time favorite film, I knew I could trust Noé's opinion on the film. Described by a Cahiers du cinéma writer as being like "ERASERHEAD and STAR WARS," Star Suburb was amazingly shot entirely in Drouot's apartment, with the auteur's then-girlfriend Sophie Herr (who also acted as a set designer) acting as a driving force of the production (the fact that Drouot only completely one film hints that she should have probably stayed with her). Despite his girlfriend's imperative influence, the film is indubitably a true auteur piece as a work that was written, directed, art directed, set decorated, and shot by Monsieur Drouot. Directed by a tragic momma's boy who never knew his father and strange social recluse who spent a good portion of his sad and pathetic life getting drunk and high in his apartment, Star Suburb not surprisingly depicts a fairly forlorn looking and highly introverted teenage girl that suffers from insomnia who ultimately breaks down in a fairly tragic way when her dreams are irrevocably shattered.

A film that earned its auteur a coveted César Award—the French equivalent to an Oscar—for “Best Short Film – Fiction” (Meilleur court-métrage de fiction) in 1984 and various other awards, Star Suburb unequivocally demonstrated that Drouot was a talented young filmmaker with a distinct vision who had the capacity to bring a darker and more socially perceptive layer to the then-quite-vogue Cinéma du look movement. Notably, the filmmakers associated with the movement, including Jean-Jacques Beineix, Luc Besson and Leos Carax, were heavily aesthetically influenced by late era New Hollywood works, especially Francis Ford Coppola’s super glossy and technically ambitious style-over-substance pieces One from the Heart (1982) and Rumble Fish (1983), so it is only fitting that Drouot would choose Star Wars—a work that was more or less responsible for destroying the integrity of the American New Wave—as a film to ruthlessly deconstruct and smash to pieces. Indeed, Star Suburb is a somewhat covertly iconoclastic work that uses Star Wars imagery and motifs to savagely attack the sinister nature of Lucas-esque advertising and merchandising. In short, not only does Drouot’s short demystify the fantasy and pageantry of the Lucasian celluloid universe, but it also reveals in a rather extreme way that Hollywood style advertising and merchandising instills highly deleterious dreams and expectations in young people that can only lead to them eventually encountering abject disappointment, or worse. A simultaneously cynical and pessimistic yet warm and empathetic work, Drouot’s film is a short but sweet 27-minute coming-of-age sci-fi piece where the future looks like a fairly gloomy place, even for cutesy teenage girls.

Opening with a shoot of a desolate moon-like planet and then panning to a decidedly dystopian vision of a series of large cold and clinical looking neo-suburban housing blocks that are numbered and divided by nationality, the film then zooms in on the French quarters where a light is flickering in an almost throbbing fashion from one of the building’s windows. From there, the viewer enters inside the window where a little frog girl named Mireille (Caroline Appéré, who is probably best known for her small role as a cashier in George Sluizer’s Spoorloos (1988) aka The Vanishing) is rudely awakened by her growling pet mutant cat, which looks like the progeny of a rabid gremlin raping a kitty. While the protagonist lives in what is supposed to be a sort of futuristic suburb as indicated by the film’s title, it seems more like a sterile hole-in-the-wall space-ghetto, as Mireille shares a conspicuously cramped room with multiple brothers (at least one of whom has large elf ears, thus hinting that humans have bred with extraterrestrials) that seems even smaller than a train car. When a light blinking all of the colors of the rainbow begins beaming into her room, Mireille stares at it while in a seemingly hypnotized state and then proceeds to exit her room and investigate. As indicated by the large black circles under her eyes, Mireille is an insomniac and she has a very tragic and melancholic essence about her that makes you immediately feel for her, as it is almost a tragic sight to see a cute girl that is so young and pure yet so sullen and wounded. After exiting her room, a large book flips open as if begging to be read, but Mireille does not take the hint and instead shuts it and sticks it back on a bookshelf. As the somewhat pretty yet pedomorphic teenage protagonist will soon demonstrate, she is only interested in reading magazine advertisements, as it provides her with a much needed source of escapism from a life that she seems to completely loathe. Indeed, after examining the water and pressure gauges of her suburban spacecraft, Mireille heads to the kitchen where she grabs a can of Coca-Cola style soda and a grotesque looking Oreo-cookie-colored burger that is wrapped in McDonalds-like packaging. Naturally, as a fast food addict, Mireille is also a loyal fan of trashy magazines that are full of sleazy suggestive advertising. While she lives in outerspace in a spaceship, Mireille's mind dwells in the idiotic imaginary fantasy realm of yellow press magazines, thus demonstrating that there is truly no escape from the pernicious influence of Hebraic mind-raper Edward Bernays.

While mindlessly chowing down on her less than organic looking burger, Mireille looks like she is in complete ecstasy as she carefully flips through a glamour magazine that features the headline: "Lydia's Wedding with Prince Xan." As is quite clear to anyone watching the film, Countess Lydia is a Princess Leia clone and Prince Xan is a sort of boyishly blond Luke Skywalker man-boy figure, albeit somewhat more aristocratic and unquestioning less obnoxious looking. Acting as if she has never seen any advertisements before, Mireille stares in fawning admiration at generic fast food, cigarette and lipstick ads. Undoubtedly, Mireille seems most impressed with an advertisement featuring Countess Lydia promoting futuristic IKEA-esque furniture that somewhat looks like the kaleidoscopic furnishings that were typical of 1970s French fuck flicks like Paul Vecchiali's erotic thriller Change Pas de Main (1975) aka Don't Change Hands and to a lesser extent Didier Philippe-Gérard's The Kinky Ladies of Bourbon Street (1976) aka Mes nuits avec... Alice, Pénélope, Arnold, Maud et Richard. Notably, a makeup ad for a company called "Royal" advertises its red lipstick as the, "Greatest Creation For Women." Rather pathetically, Mireille seems to completely believe the hype of the puffery-plagued advertising.

When a bunch of colorful lights begin beaming into the spaceship, Mireille becomes so petrified that she turns off the lights in the kitchen and briefly hides under a table. Upon investigating by looking out of a window, Mireille spots a dark red spaceship with "RK2" written on it and then proceeds to refer to her magazine, thereupon confirming her suspicions that it is a popular radio station that describes itself as the, "best radio in the galaxy." Naturally, Mireille then decides to turn on a radio to listen to RK2 where an English-language DJ with an American accent named Toby reveals they are holding a "lightning window game” for “5,000 tokens.” Indeed, the only thing that Mireille has to do to win the prize is turn on her light while the RK2 spaceship is hovering outside of her home. Naturally completely convinced that she will win the prize, Mireille then begins falling into a deep daydream that is indubitably the centerpiece of the film where she imagines that she is Countess Lydia and that she is literally inside the phony worlds featured in the advertisements that she admired in the magazine. Towards the end of the exceedingly ethereal and solacing yet nonetheless tacky dream-sequence, Mireille joins Prince Xan on his throne where he proceeds to gracefully put a wedding ring on her finger while members of the paparazzi snaps photographs of them. When the Prince Xan has a hard time placing the ring on Mireille’s finger, the film then abruptly cuts back to reality and the female protagonist then proceeds to attempt to claim her prize. While Mireille manages to flash her lights in front of the RK2 spacecraft, she must also contact Toby via telephone before she can officially win the prize, which ultimately proves to be an impossible task. Indeed, it seems that no one in Mireille’s neo-lumpenprole family paid the phone bill.

Unfortunately, when Mireille attempts to phone RK2, she is quite distressed to discover that her phone line is down. Extremely upset that she might lose the prize, Mireille runs to her elderly overweight godmother’s room and hysterically screams to her about how she won a radio contest, but cannot claim her prize because the phone line is down. Rather annoyed at being so rudely awakened at such a late hour, Mireille’s godmother does not even pay attention to what the emotionally intemperate teen has to say and instead simply tries to fall back to sleep. Needless to say, Mireille completely breaks down when Toby eventually announces that a woman named Mrs. Gloz from the Spanish building is the winner of the prize, thus completely destroying the protagonist’s rather preposterous dreams about becoming an opulent and glamorous space princess. After announcing that Mrs. Gloz is the winner of the prize, Toby quite fittingly plays a song entitled “The Chance of My Life” while Mireille sobs hysterically and then proceeds to hatefully scream the winner’s name. In the end, Mireille pours a bowl of milk for her pet mutant kitty cat and then assumedly kills herself via electrocuting herself by putting an electric object that resembles a tiny lightsaber into a pot of water. Notably, in keeping in tune with the film’s fairly potent light motif, the light flickers and then goes out after Mireille makes her seemingly successful attempt at self-slaughter. In a cute and lighthearted yet nonetheless vaguely haunting twist before Mireille’s fairly melodramatic final act, the protagonist’s godmother’s husband is revealed to be a grotesque space alien that somewhat resembles the asexual extraterrestrial humanoid portrayed by Academy Award-winning negro Louis Gossett, Jr. in Wolfgang Petersen’s Enemy Mine (1985). Unlike the lame crypto-commie message of inter-species harmony in Petersen’s film, it is quite obvious while watching Star Suburb that Drouot saw America as a completely negative influence on France.

While winning a César Award and apparently beginning production on various more ambitious film projects, Stéphane Drouot never completed a single other film after Star Suburb and instead lead a considerably sad and pathetic life of perpetual stagnation that ended on January 22, 2012 when he died of complications relating to AIDS. Indeed, instead of pursuing a notable filmmaking career, Drouot contracted gay cancer and apparently spent much of his life battling alcoholism and drug addiction, among other problems. The sad thing is that, not unlike the female protagonist of Star Suburb, Drouot apparently began living in a fantasy world as a recluse with big dreams (including various failed projects, like an unfinished film entitled Johanna B.) but no means or drive to realize them. As a born bastard that never knew his father, Drouot also suffered from extreme Oedipal issues and apparently completely deteriorated after he mother died. If it were not for his young fan Gaspar Noé, who gave him cameo roles and 'honorary' credits in virtually all of his early films, Drouot would literally have no other film credits after his debut short. Aside from providing him with a 'film adviser' credit for his featurette Carne (1991) and a 'special thanks' credit for his first feature Seul contre tous (1998) aka I Stand Alone, Noé also provided Drouot with a cameo role at the beginning of Irréversible (2002) where Philippe 'The Butcher' Nahon has a drunken pseudo-philosophical conversation with him about incest. Admittedly, before even knowing anything about him, I assumed Drouot was some sort of real-life AIDS-ridden doper when I first saw this scene and I would have never suspected that he was ever an obscure cult filmmaker, but that just goes to show how bad a man can degenerate if he succumbs to defeat and drifts through life like a forsaken ghost. Of course, knowing this makes Star Suburb seem all the more haunting and prophetic, especially in regard to Drouot's atrocious fate.

Undoubtedly, if you need unequivocal proof that Drouot was not very sound of mind, Noé's minimalistic documentary short Intoxication (2002) is a must-see. Arguably the most seemingly pointless and uneventful film in Noé's entire oeuvre as a glaringly hastily assembled piece of painfully candid celluloid that would surely only interest fans of Star Suburb, the doc is nothing more than a single 5-minute master shot of Drouot, who resembles a deranged yet harmless and completely incapacitated junky hobo and whose apartment is cluttered with trash, staring at the ground while mumbling and taking AIDS medication. Intoxication is more or less a somewhat incoherent and longwinded stream-of-consciousness rant where Drouot attempts to explain why he has never made any other of films, stating, "...I'm taking this medication, a product that allows me to live with being HIV-positive, or with similar types of things [...] 12 years ago, I directed a film thanks to an unbelievable producer, who, I was going to say 'also', died of AIDS, something that affected the completion of a complex production that lasted three years, a relationship that I wasn't able to establish with other producers, who were too quick to let me know that, since I had only directed two actors in that film, two actresses, I couldn't be responsible for a group of 40 characters and therefore couldn't make the films I was assigned to work on." Arguably the most bizarre thing Drouot states, especially considering his previous sci-fi short, is how he thinks he would be good at directing films with, "the obsessive vision of a woman who's 50 or 60 years old, or in the style of Chantal Akerman or of a few other directors, or women directors." Of course, then again, there is a sort of feminine essence to Star Suburb and I would not be surprised if the female protagonist—a seemingly melancholic dame with insomnia who literally loses all hope in life in a matter of mere minutes—was a sort of transexualized stand-in for the auteur. It is also interesting that Drouot mentions Akerman, as they both had extremely close yet troubled relationships with their mothers to the point where they more or less lost the will to live after their progenitor died.

Somewhat not surprisingly, upon doing research on Star Suburb, I could not find a single English language article or review on the film. Additionally, French-language writings on the film are also fairly scarce. Notably, one of the French comments about the filmmaker that stuck up in my mind loosely translates as follows, "Stephane Drouot is one of the geniuses of France, like Rimbaud, Artaud, Baudelaire. The great poets, visionaries, artists are doomed to death today more than ever. He understood very quickly. His film is morally and politically an act of war against the annihilation of individuality by a totalitarian society already well established." Indeed, while I somewhat doubt that Drouot was an artistic heir of Rimbaud, a certain poetic sadness and hopelessness does permeate throughout Star Suburb that is quite fitting when one considers how the filmmaker lived the rest of his fairly lamentable life. Of course, to attack Star Wars in a retarded age where people look at the film franchise as a religion that is not to be questioned, Drouot also proved to be quite the iconoclast. Indeed, thankfully Star Suburb makes Mel Brooks' Spaceballs (1987) seem like a mindlessly masturbatory homage to Star Wars by comparison. Brought up in Americanized post-WWII France when ancient frog poets like Rimbaud and Baudelaire certainly could not compete with the frighteningly fraudulent fantasies of George Lucas, Drouot meticulously and obsessively assembled a film that feels like a haunting cry of desperation and disillusionment from an artist trapped in an absurdly artless age of cultural deracination, American cultural hegemony, and mass infantilization. Surely, the great irony of Drouot's films is that, were it not for its cynical references to Star Wars, probably no one would remember it today. Another great irony of the film is that Caroline Appéré makes for a much sexier Princess Leia than Carrie Fisher did, but I guess it would be unfair to compare American mischlings to French femmes. With its venomously bittersweet combination of pop chic aesthetics with a decidedly dejecting tone and patently pessimistic themes, Star Suburb is ultimately like the cinematic equivalent of a cyanide capsule wrapped in a Godiva chocolate bar wrapper. While Lucas' failed debut feature THX 1138 (1971) depicts a dystopian future where sex is illegal and everyone wears the same exact mundane uniform, little did he realize that he would help give birth to a very real nightmare involving masses of virginal middle-aged men that live in their parents' basement who wear t-shirts and collect toys based on a film that he made specifically for kids. Of course, Star Suburb depicts an even darker side to Lucas' legacy and, for that reason alone, I find it considerably more intriguing than any of the frog sci-fi flicks that were ever directed by punk avant-gardist F.J. Ossang or multicultural-friendly wimp Luc Besson. While it might be going too far to say that Drouot died for the sins of George Lucas, the failed French auteur ultimately did something more interesting by poetically exposing the cultural and cinematic sins of Star Wars, which is like the AIDS of world cinema, albeit more deceptive and less treatable.

MIRA CORPORA

Stéphane Marti (2004)

Although the virtual 'king' (or some may say 'queen') of Super 8 mm film, French auteur filmmaker and cinematographer Stéphane Marti (Diasparagmos, Purple Kiss) is all but totally unknown, even among cinephiles and his countrymen, which is rather unfortunate considering he is responsible for directing an insanely idiosyncratic and aesthetically iconoclastic Super 8 remake of sorts of German master auteur F.W. Murnau's Gothic horror masterpiece Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922) aka Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror. Indeed, a keenly kaleidoscopic and debauched Dionysian 45-minute meta-queer take on Nosferatu that rather blatantly uses vampirism as a metaphor for (homo)sexual desire, Mira corpora (2004) is easily the most esoterically homoerotic blood-sucker flick I have ever seen, but more importantly, it is a work of pure and unadulterated cine-magic of the totally transcendental yet rather impenetrable sort. Directed by a film professor and arguably the world's foremost proponent of Super 8 film who has used the dying film format for nearly four decades (despite spanning over four different decades, virtually all of Marti's films look like they were made around the same period), Mira corpora is a rare piece of celluloid Baroque beauty in the pre-apocalyptic age of social and cultural day that takes a rather romantic look at the celluloid past. Featuring less than inconspicuous references to not only Murnau's Nosferatu, but also Kenneth Anger's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954), including iconic images of 'Scarlet Woman' Marjorie Cameron, Mira corpora is ultimately the sub-underground progeny of queer cinema's greatest masters of celluloid semiotics and allegorical tableaux. Not unlike Eric De Kuyper's Pink Ulysses (1990), Mira corpora not only utilizes clips from silent masterpieces from gay filmmakers of the past, but also 'vampirically' deconstructs cinema history as a whole (namely, vampire films in this context), exposing the sodomite subtexts that may (or may not) have been hidden in works created by fag filmmakers like Nosferatu and Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (actually, it is quite apparent that Anger's Crowleyite film is most homoerotic). Featuring a big gay bald Mediterranean dude wearing a dress without any underwear, an avant-garde ballet dancer frolicking around gaily, a neon-redheaded Scarlet Women performing lovelorn destruction rituals against an ex-lover that looks like Satan himself, and a curiously queer leather-adorned Nosferatu who dwells in the catacombs of piss-drenched Paris, Mira corpora is classical European beauty meets deathrock and dark romantic Delphic homo horror. Arguably auteur filmmaker Marti's celluloid magnum opus, Mira corpora is like the vampire flick Derek Jarman never directed as edited by a gay and slightly less spastic Guy Maddin.

As somberly narrated by the Thomas Hutter/Jonathan Harker character (played by actor/auteur Samuel Ganes) at the beginning of Mira corpora after he walks through a post-industrial garbage dump in the spirit of Jarman's The Last of England (1988), "Then there came over the crest of the hill a man tall and thin. I could see so much in the distance. When he drew near the horses, they began to jump and kick about then to scream with terror... They bolted down the road. I watched them out of sight, then looked for the stranger, but I found that he, too, was gone." Indeed, it seems that in only a vague instance, Hutter has fallen under the Svengali-like homoerotic spells of Nosferatu, who dwells in a catacomb where he screens movies on bare human bodies for his own seemingly petty parasitic enthrallment. To make matters worse for the reluctantly entranced Hutter, it is Walpurgis Night, a terrifying time when the devil is abroad and when the graves open and the dead come forth and walk. Indeed, various strange high-camp beings inhabit the spiritually lascivious Luciferian realm of Mira corpora, including witches, quasi-cross-dressing vampires (or frog fags with fangs), half-naked ballet dancers crossing forbidden seaside paths in a most merry way, and young twink boys lurking in the dark catacombs as if prophesying their own fantastic deaths via hermit homo bloodsucker. A celluloid rituals of sorts, Mira corpora opens with an anti-social punkette 'Priestess' (Sarah Darmon) introducing the viewer to the macabre yet mystifying world of Marti and closes with another 'Priestess' (Elodie Jane) destructively closing the cinematic ceremony. The queer Nosferatu (belated actor/auteur Marcel Mazé, who somewhat fittingly died on Valentine's Day in 2012) of Mira corpora has nil interest in Ellen Hutter/Lucy Harker, who is nowhere to be found, as he is a subterranean sodomite cinophile of sorts who rather enjoys projecting images of Murnau's Nosferatu on young androgynous boys and swarthy brown bears inside his lecherous lair and hardly has the time to waste on draining the vital fluids of virginal Victorian beauties in their bedrooms. In the end, the sky turns blood red and homo Hutter/Harker, who looks like a cheap gypsy hustler, dances on top of a canal bridge while wearing a vampire cape in solidarity with gay Nosferatu, gay Nosferatu successfully screens horror films on young naked male flesh and basks in the bawdy beauty, and a young Priestess symbolically smashes a glass heart-shaped ornament into pieces against a portrait of gay Nosferatu as if blaming the rat-like undead fag fiend for stealing her emo boy toy.

A Poetic and lyrical but ultimately anti-literary celluloid work, Mira corpora is first and foremost a trying yet tasty 'tribute' to Murnau's Nosferatu that totally deconstructs and destroys the themes and conventions of Bram Stoker's classic novel Dracula (1897) to achieve something more visceral, arcane, and otherworldly in character in what ultimately amounts to a metaphysical micro-movie drained from the blood of a cinematic poet. Featuring an original score by Marti collaborator Berndt Deprez, as well as compositions by Igor Stravinsky and Gustav Mahler, and excerpts from/references to Murnau's Nosferatu and Anger's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome, Mira corpora is indubitably a piece of pomo homo pretentiousness, yet it still manages to work perfectly as if crafted by the world's most lonely unsung master auteur. During his nearly four decade long career as a filmmaker, auteur Stéphane Marti has only managed to direct one feature-length film, La cité des neuf portes (1977), among countless shorts, but I can say without hesitation that Mira corpora is easily his most accomplished, ambitious, and aesthetically pleasing work to date as an incredibly kaleidoscopic yet phantasmagoric celluloid piece that manages to reconcile the seemingly absent homoeroticism of F.W. Murnau's films with the flagrant yet partly hermetic homo celluloid hypnotics of Kenneth Anger. In other words, Mira corpora is not only mandatory viewing for patrons of Murnau, Anger, Jean Cocteau, Jean Genet, Federico Fellini, Steven Arnold, Carmelo Bene, Lionel Soukaz, Luther Price, James Bidgood, and Derek Jarman, but also fans of the Super 8 sinema of perverse heteros like Jörg Buttgerit and Guy Maddin. As someone with a deep and undying love for the aesthetic of Super 8, I was naturally instantly addicted to the films of Stéphane Marti upon first discovering them about a year ago or so, but Mira corpora is the only film of his that did not repel me at some point with some swarthy Mediterranean man's hairy bare ass, which are featured quite prominently in a number of his other cinematic works. An old film-within-a-film dripping with bloodsucker cliches (but no blood!) and Dionysian decadence, Mira corpora is not only a film about the vampiric power of sex, but also a wonderfully wicked work about the vampiric power of cinema, thus making it a sort of more queenish yet classical celluloid stepbrother to Spanish Iván Zulueta's masterpiece Rapture (1980) aka Arrebato, which not only features some Super 8 footage (Zulueta also made a number of shorts in this medium), but also a sinister Super 8 camera that allegorically drains a young filmmaker of his body and soul. As someone who has on more than one occasion wrecked my life in circumstances revolving around my unhealthy obsession with cinema, Mira corpora, despite its innately cryptic symbolism and nightmarish nonlinear storyline, felt a tad bit too close to home for me, thus making it a horror film in the truest sense of the word! If you ever felt that Werner Herzog's Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979) aka Nosferatu: Phantom der Nacht was too literal of a remake of Murnau's 1922 masterpiece, I guarantee that Marti's Mira corpora will inspire you to never look at Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens the same way again.

KILLER KLOWNS FROM OUTER SPACE

Stephen Chiodo (1988) Killer Klowns From Outer Space is one of the most memorable films from my early childhood (before elementary school). I have never been afraid of clowns. I have always just thought of them as conspiring killers and murderers with a slight silent charm. Killer Klowns From Outer Space may have warped my mind at a young, but also introduced me to the weird world of carnival horror. I was always more terrified by musicals like The Sound of Music.

Turning people into gigantic cocoons of cotton candy was great idea by the Chiodo brothers (who acted as the writers, producers, and directors of KKFOS). I still haven't decided whether or not I would consider the Killer Klowns vampires. Drinking blood through a child's straw isn't quite Gothic enough. Many people I know can't even watch Killer Klowns From Outer Space due to their clown phobia. I don't see what is so scary about killer popcorn. It excites me.

Killer Klowns From Outer Space features a score by overrated punk band The Dickies. The theme song that they provide for the films is by far their greatest effort. It adds another angle to the films cartoonish and fun filled horror. One of my favorite scenes is when a clown plays a police officer like a ventriloquist dummy. This scene has a weird and perverse sexual element. Finally the "asshole" cop seems to have entered (or someone else's hand has) a happy place. This scene was one of the most terrifying to me as a young child. Killer Klowns from Outer Space also pays tribute to Alfred Hitchcock's tranny Oedipal Rex masterpiece Psycho. Instead of the shower scene, we experience that wrath of a toilet. Alfred Hitchcock had a phobia of eggs. I doubt he would have wanted to lay one in the toilet featured in Killer Klowns from Outer Space.

DYN AMO
DYN AMO

Stephen Dwoskin (1972)

Plagued with and ultimately crippled by polio at the mere age of 9, which forced him to become enslaved to an iron lung, having brutal muscle transplants and never really ever recovering, even being confined to crutches and later a wheelchair for most of his life, American avant-garde auteur/documentarian Stephen Dwoskin (Central Bazaar, Trying to Kiss the Moon) was a man that knew all too well what it meant to suffer and his strikingly somber yet exceedingly ethereal cinematic works, especially Dyn Amo (1973) aka Dynamo—an ominously oniric off-arthouse work voyeuristically depicting the physical and metaphysical degradation of four somnambulist-like strippers in a superlatively seedy yet strangely dreamy titty bar that would be the director's first feature-length film—certainly demonstrate this in a marvelously macabre manner. Based on the stage play of the same name written by Chris Wilkinson and even featuring the same actors that appeared in the live performances of the play, Dyn Amo is a minimalistic yet mesmerizing piece of celestial celluloid misery and master-slave relationships that depicts the self-imposed misery of women who sell their bodies, soul, and dignity for money and the sort of patently pathetic, perverse, and sometimes pernicious men that pay money for a peek at these lost ladies' lecherous souls. Like an all-nighter at a Gothic strip joint co-owned by Werner Schroeter and David Lynch where only the most swarthy untermensch degenerates in town are invited, Dyn Amo is an absolutely aesthetically dynamite, if not daunting and dreary, depiction of human sexuality, primitive sexual politics, and loneliness in its most pathetically capitalist form where not only clothes are stripped, but also the soul of not just the performers, but the viewer as well in a pseudo-salacious cinematic work that acts as the closest thing to avant-garde anti-pornography. Featuring an immaculate synth-driven ethereal soundtrack by eclectic English composer Gavin Bryars that eerily complements every single second of the film, Dyn Amo is a cinematic work that is not big on plot (it has none!), but instead wallows in atmosphere of reckless pseudo-wantoness where god's most lonely and desperate women make a miserable living by fulfilling the dubious fantasies of erratic erotomaniacs who nonsensically think that their money buys them genuine love and adoration, thereupon inevitably acting upon such ill illusions in a most shuddersome yet strangely and innately intimate manner that screams perturbing psychology pathology. A rare cinematic work that forces the viewer to be an active participant as opposed to a mere spectator due to its literally in-your-face depiction of female agony and despondency, Dyn Amo reminds the viewer of the power of cinema as an unparalleled, nuanced language without words that can express universal truths through mere physical gestures.

Not knowing what I was jumping into (I previously viewed director Stephen Dwoskin's documentary Pain Is... (1997), but it could not have prepared me for this film), I turned on Dyn Amo while in a somewhat sleepy mood and was instantly magnetized to the screen as I viewed a statuesque Nordic stripper dancing in a rather robotic manner while jerking-off a chain as if bored by the routine of her 'job' but also as if she had blocked out any potential for emotion between herself and other human beings, which is probably one of the most imperative tricks of the trade for strippers, hookers, porn stars, and other so-called 'sex workers.' For the first hour or so of Dyn Amo (the film clocks in at just under two hours), one mostly just sees a number of close-ups of the blatantly sad and objectified strippers who, as demonstrated by their blank stares and curiously mundane gestures, seem to be experiencing a sort of self-imposed out-of-body experience so as to get through their jaded 'night job' without going completely insane. Every once in a while, the viewer gets a glance of the more than demanding audience at the strip joint, which is mostly comprised of sleazebag types with greasy black hair who sport dark sunglasses, assumedly to hide their sickening stares as they swoon and fawn over women that would never give them the time of day in real life, thus the club offers them a contrived forbidden pleasure so as to temporarily appease their discernibly fierce fetishism. Of course, as Dyn Amo progresses, the sunglasses-adorned spectators, in their deluded erotomania, begin to take a more aggressive role as 'active' audience members, eventually joining the strippers back stage and then tying them up in bondage and completely humiliating and degrading them, with tears and terror eventually becoming quite apparent on one of the woman's faces in an overwhelming scene without cuts (Dyn Amo has few noticeable cuts, giving it the semblance that it was shot in real-time with one mere take) that tests the filmgoer's ability to live vicariously through the misery of a nameless woman who never speaks a word, but wears her perturbing pangs of pain on her unclad sleeve. One of the sadistic spectators even goes so far as blaming the stripper for his perversions and guilt for having said perversions, hostilely yelling at her, "You stupid bitch...virgin murderer...whore...hussy..." as if it is his god given right as a pathetic patron of perversity. After being bound for displeasure, one of the strippers is featured in an extended face close-up, sobbing with a most melancholy facial expression and moving her mouth without saying a single word, as if pleading to be put out of her misery. In the end, one of the unclad strippers is striking a heretical allegorical pose as if crucified like Jesus Christ while her patron/persecutors stand around her as if they are her executioners.

Featuring a song by The Rolling Stones set to a cowgirl-style stripper towards the beginning of the film, Dyn Amo is certainly a film of its time in terms of its uniquely unadulterated aesthetic and avant-garde experimental style, yet its overall message regarding the degradation of woman has only become all the more relevant since its release, especially considering we live in a sad, sexually dysfunctional society that includes sexual innuendos in children's films and expects grown women to have to shave their naughty bits in order to resemble prepubescent girls. Somewhat kitschy and campy in aesthetic but anything but humorous, Dyn Amos—with its meta-voyeuristic camera angles and decidedly decadent yet dreamy sets—is a film that features socially conscious scopophilia and static dead time reminiscent of Paul Morrissey and the tasty and aesthetically titillating operatic high-camp tableaux of Germanic auteur filmmakers like Werner Schroeter, Daniel Schmid and Hans-Jürgen Syberberg. A singular celluloid work that will paradoxically appeal to both morbid male sadists and pissed feminists but also chivalrous empathetic men and debauched female masochists, Dyn Amo is a rare avant-garde experiment of its time that has aged quite gracefully, which in part has to do with its universal theme of female debasement and the males that love to debase them, but also due to its intensely idiosyncratic style that reminds the viewer of the seeming limitlessness of cinema as a means of artistic expression. In a review from 1972 written by female film critic Ros Spain (who later worked as a location manager on Dwoskin's work Central Bazaar (1976)) for Cinema Rising regarding Dyn Amo and its effect on her personally as a woman, "The film, especially towards the end, is very harrowing. The camera persistently strips each girl both physically and emotionally, and in sometimes violent ways; as a woman, I found the implication of my sex's frailty and the film's denial of female will and sex-drive disturbing," thus demonstrating the absurdity of feminism on a real and practical level where the shackles of social-engineering are 'stripped' and humans revert back to their innate instincts. Despite being Dwoskin's first feature-length work, Dyn Amo is also easily the greatest film the disabled director ever made as a work that is every bit as fetishistic and preternatural in its form and direction as the curious characters featured in it. If you're looking for a post-silent era flick that is big on atmosphere to the point of being fiercely foreboding like the great films of German expressionism, but set in the sort of sinister cinematic women-in-trouble realm typical of David Lynch, you will never find a film quite like Dyn Amo, an odious yet otherworldly celluloid ode to the warped women who are willing to sell themselves to survive and the meager men that are more than willing to exploit these lost ladies' rather undesirable and unfortunate circumstances.

BILL / & TED'S EXCELLENT ADVENTURE

Stephen Herek (1989)

"History is about to be rewritten by two guys who can't spell" is an appropriate tagline to American sci-fi fiction comedy Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure. I believe this because contemporary history that is taught at even the graduate level is absurd (i.e. recycled trash pseudo history books about the evils of honkies). Whether it be the liberal fantasy that the Civil War was fought to free the slaves (over 40,000 Blacks fought in the Confederate armed forces and some blacks owned black slaves of their own) or that the Soviet Union liberated Eastern Europe in the second world war, history is now seen through the lenses of irrational neo-Bolsheviks bent on focusing on out of context emotionally sensitive issues rather than logic and reason. Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure completely exploits a variety of historical figures (many horrible individuals) as subversive heroes.

Many of the historical figures found in Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure are notorious for their rebellious behavior and destruction of western European "constructs." The big trend in academia nowadays (and since the degenerate late 1960s) is to bash anything that came out of Western Civilization. All things in the past (and now) considered failed, persecuted, disenfranchised, disadvantaged, and a variety of other things associated with weakness are now considered virtuous. Novelist and philosopher Ayn Rand calls this irrational trend promoted and funded by international bankers, "The Age of Envy." So how do Bill & Ted fit into this equation? These two young slackers carry the torch of pathetic white (despite their obvious Asiatic features) liberalism and altruism. Individuals that believe that good music and good drugs will bring forth the ideal Utopia. For Bill & Ted, working and thinking are quite bogus activities (as they are for most white slackers). Instead of actually studying for their oral presentation, it is easier just to travel back in time and pick-up historical figures. Bill & Ted's band the Wyld Stallyns are said to hold the key to world peace and ultimate truth. When the two impotent young men travel to the future, they realize the truth of their great contribution to the world. But the reality is, the sex and drugs peace movement of the late 1960's (and there after) contributed most to the hedonistic degeneracy we take for granted today. Of course, I would be a liar if I didn't admit that I partake in such activities. Pacifism, tolerance, Kantian anti-reason, drug use, and "Rock N Roll" are in fact weaknesses. No great society has ever been built upon weakness. Hence, the chaos and trash so commonly accepted in today's society. "Humanistic" idealism is easy to follow when it only requires chanting stuff like "peace" while stoned on your favorite herb. Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure is the ultimate Sci-Fi flick because it portrays weak, lazy, stoned, and dumbfounded whites as the liberators of humanity. Obviously I can't blame the filmmakers for their daft message. On the contrary, Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure provides comedic escapism from the true consequences of "Sex, Drugs, and Rock N Rock." The sight of revolutionary and mass murderer Napoleon Bonaparte having fun at a water park with young children will without a doubt bring a smile to anyone's face. Not to mention the cute sexual perversion of Sigmund Freud and his obsession with psychoanalyzing young women. Figures like these are considered the greatest heroes of history. Individuals that subverted and destroyed the old institution only to bring sorrow to mankind. The message of Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure is clear; promote bullshit anti-Western civilization idealism and you will be a success. Unfortunately, most of the real Bill and Ted's in the world most likely end up sleeping on a mattress in their best friends trailer. Hollywood has released a lot of propaganda period pieces that have the stench of Bolshevik (the real Bolsheviks attempted to destroy all of Russian history) lies all over them. At least Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure lets the viewer know it is historical fantasy.

TUBE

Stephen Hopkins (1999) First off, I'd like to debunk any speculation as to this film's roots lying deep in the action hall-of-famer's such as Die Hard or Speed. In fact, Tube is a blatant rip-off of Bullet Train (predates Speed) with Jason Statham infused action scenes such as insane train hopping and riding motorbikes where they need not be. What kind of title is Tube anyways? Tube starts off like any Asian action movie; a gun fight between cops and crooks. Our lead Cop, name of Jay, shoots a terrorist's woman and he becomes very pissed. Due to some triple twist implanted in the film later, the terrorist sieges a subway and has bombs on each individual car with some nefarious plan to scowl and blow up hundreds of people unless the Prime Minister sacrifices his life. With Jay and Kay and some other weird characters that fit rhyme schemes, it's up to them to stop the train and save everyone's life. I'll start the review section off by stating my vast love for all cinema Korean wise. I have been presented with the golden treasures such as Friend, The Host, Save the Green Planet!, and Oldboy. As I went into this film a die-hard Korean film fan boy, I came out slightly unnerved with my recent memories of Tube. Like the title, I found Tube to be lacking any form of substance that would make it stand out and a bland exercise in a police thriller. When Tube's credits rolled, I found myself on the verge of tears. The ending is a pretty depressing one. It really doesn't fit in with the other parts of the film at all. Tube is an intricate little action film with little tidbits of raw emotions scattered around. The result is alarming and always surprising. While I didn't love Tube, I was entertained and found it to be an above-average outing in Korean cinema.

CAFÉ FLESH

Stephen Sayadian (1982)

After re-watching the avant-garde cult art-porn flick Nightdreams (1981), I felt it was about time that I watch another film created by Austrian-born American auteur Stephen Sayadian aka "Rinse Dream" (Dr. Caligari, Party Doll A Go-Go!) and the obvious choice was his delightfully decadent and deranged directorial debut Café Flesh (1982); a dystopian fuck flick of the darkly dippy and fiercely farcical sort set in a post-apocalyptic hellhole of hyper-horniness where most people are sexually impotent (aka "Sex Negatives" aka "Erotic Casualties") and thus seek the erotic entertainment of the sexually virile ("Sex Positives"). Indeed, while Café Flesh is a more narrative-driven work that has developed a larger cult following, I must admit that I still prefer Nightdreams and its truly eclectic collection of erotic and anti-erotic petite vignettes and terrifying yet titillating tableaux. That being said, I still regard Café Flesh as a merrily misanthropic and culturally pessimistic masterpiece of quasi-arthouse pornography. The first fuck flick to fully crossover as a Midnight Movie as a hardcore porn work that played at repertory movie theaters in the United States and Europe throughout the 1980s, Café Flesh follows in the aberrant aesthetic footsteps of Georges Bataille in transcending the typically fine line between pornography and art. A sort of more lurid and loony Liquid Sky (1982) meets Vicious Lips (1986) and Total Recall (1990) for those filmgoers that do not mind a cum shot here or girl-on-girl cunnilingus there in their cinema, Café Flesh is a fucked fetish-fueled fantasy for the pre-apocalyptic age that makes a potential upcoming Armageddon scenario seem like a slightly less perturbing prospect. Like Nightdreams, Café Flesh is a rare porn flick that was shot on 35mm film (auteur Sayadian recently claimed only two prints were made of the film, with the only surviving print being located at the Kinsey Institute at the University of Indiana) and even managed to replace cult masterpieces like John Waters' Pink Flamingos (1972) and David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977) in Midnight Movie theaters across the country. A curious celluloid combination of German expressionism, old school film noir, 1950s b-movie sci-fi, and vaudevillian-esque satire of the quasi-Spenglerian sort, Café Flesh is pornographic celluloid chaos at its most ridiculously risqué yet wrongfully refined. A wonderfully wantonly wayward work made at the inevitable end of The Golden Age of Porn, Café Flesh was a failure as a porn flick but a startling success as an aberrant art flick and rightfully so. Indeed, Café Flesh is nothing if not an exceedingly anti-erotic piece of sardonic sexual sadism of the superlatively surreal and even spectral sort that could probably only arouse the nefarious naughty bits of a sadomasochistic sexual psychopath who masturbates to footage of atomic bombs and concentration camp footage. Featuring rat-like humanoids licking ladies' lilies as if it were cheddar cheese, voyeuristic man-baby werewolves with human-bone rattles, and human-pencils that know how penetrate a bored and frigid secretary, Café Flesh is a socially scathing celluloid treasure trove of high-class art-porn-trash as if directed by a bawdy and bodacious Beelzebub with a brutal sense of humor and an unwavering and unhinged hatred of humanity, thus making it mandatory viewing for any serious (and semi-sick) cinephile.

As narrated at the very beginning of Café Flesh by a seemingly aroused but ultimately impotent lady narrator, "Able to exist, to sense...to feel everything—but pleasure. In a world destroyed, a mutant universe, survivors break down to those who can and those who can't" and "99% are Sex Negatives. Call them erotic casualties. They want to make love, but the mere touch of another makes them violently ill. The rest, the lucky one percent, are Sex Positives, those whose libidos escaped unscathed." Indeed, it is 5 years after World War III and a coitus-castrating Nuclear Holocaust, and with the majority of the human population dying to get their degenerated genitals wet, they all gravitate to sex clubs, or as the fecund-free female narrator states, "After the Nuclear Kiss, the Positives remain to love, to perform...And the others, well, we Negatives can only watch...can only come...to...CAFÉ FLESH..." but, of course, none of them can cum as perennial voyeurs who can do nothing but watch in resentful admiration. Indeed, as one would assume by its rather blatant title, the majority of Café Flesh takes place at the eponymous Café Flesh, a patently and perturbingly yet playfully perverse playpen of pleasure where one can witness a "tableau of desire in decline" and see real live libertines of the superlatively sexually virile post-apocalyptic sort unload their loads in a lunatically lecherous fashion of exquisite anti-erotic excess that would even tickle the toes of the Marquis de Sade.

The quasi-heroes of Café Flesh are Sexual Negative couple Nick (Paul McGiboney) and Lana (Pia Snow aka Scream Queen Michelle Bauer), who used to share a hot and steamy sexual romance before the cock-nuking apocalypse and are now rather reluctant regulars at the futuristic fuck club. Nick is Brando-esque 'tough guy' with a sensitive side who cannot get his manhood up for his little lady Lana, so he gets all moody and broody whilst watching Sex Positive superstars perform at the café. The Master of Ceremonies at the Café is a charismatic yet hyper-cynical smart-mouthed jerk-off who cannot jerk-off named Max Melodramatic (Andy Nichols, who played the male doctor in Nightdreams). While mad Max misanthropically verbally reams any individual who has the decided dishonor of catching his warped gaze, he is kept in check and casually cuckolded by the café's matriarch owner Moms (Tantala Ray, who has starred in such classic porn flicks as The Rocky Porno Video Show), who forces the mischievous MC to get on his knees and recite the following line in a most humiliating manner in front of patrons: "I'm little Maxie...The star of the show, but under my boxers nothing will grow. There's pozzies and neggies, but I'm in between cause I lost my weapon in World War III." Meanwhile, a young and beautiful debutante named Angel (Marie Sharp) arrives from the devastated nuclear South to become a regular at Café Flesh, but she is a virginal Sex Positive fugitive and is eventually arrested by a prick with no prick named 'The Enforcer' (Dennis Edwards) and is ultimately forced into sexual slavery, but she ends up enjoying it in the end after having her truly priceless cherry popped. When a Sex Positive superstar named Johnny Rico (Kevin James, who ironically died of testicular cancer in 1990) shows up to perform at Café Flesh, Nick and Lana's sexless relationship is tested by the newcomer's legendary testicular prowess. Unbeknownst to Nick, Lana is a closeted Sexual Positive and Johnny Rico gets her all hot and bothered. In the end, Lana gives in and gets prestigiously publicly pounded by Mr. Rico, but not before getting her little lily licked by a lesbo 'cunning linguist,' and naturally Nick leaves the Café Flesh forever in abject embarrassment.

Followed up by two worthless shot-on-video/direct-to-video sequels—Café Flesh 2 (1997) and Café Flesh (2003)—that auteur Stephen Sayadian had nil involvement with, Café Flesh would ultimately go on to win "Best Art Direction – Film" at the 1984 AVN Awards and would later be inducted into the XRCO Hall of Fame, yet the idiosyncratic fuck flick really demands more attention than the small and ultimately worthless speckle bestowed upon it by the artless void that is the ghettoized porn world. After all, if the Criterion Collection can release aesthetically/thematically/historically worthless works featuring unsimulated sex like I Am Curious (Yellow) (1967) and I Am Curious (Blue) (1968), they should have the gall as good little progressive leftists to release Café Flesh; the 'virtual Casablanca (1942) of pornography' (actually, I think Café Flesh has more artistic merit and wit than that absurdly overrated anti-German Humphrey Bogart flick). As director Sayadian, who somewhat recently developed a rare terminal strain of hepatitis C and thought he would die of cirrhosis of the liver in less than a year, revealed in a 2013 interview with twitchfilm.com, "In 2008 I finally got a liver transplant. I took about a year to bounce back, and once I did I went and adapted Café Flesh as a stage musical." According to Sayadian, he also recently got the go-ahead to direct a new film, which he stated of, "We just finished the script and getting it ready to shoot. I think it's something dying to be released. Not because I'm doing it, but because nobody else is." Indeed, with the world of avant-garde art-porn being all but totally dead, I am certainly looking forward to Sayadian's newest cinematic effort, even if it will probably not hold up to the perverse cynicism of Nightdreams, Café Flesh, and Dr. Caligari (1989). Co-written by Bad Boys II (2003) writer Jerry Stahl (Sayadian purportedly stated to friend, "I forgive you for writing Bad Boys II, but you'll never be forgiven for using your real name!"), immaculately accented by a standout synthesizer-driven new wave-ish musical score by prolific mainstream musician/recorder producer Mitchell Froom (Meet the Parents, Toy Story 3), and featuring Judaic actor/stand-up comedian Richard Belzer (Homicide: Life on the Street, Law & Order: Special Victims Unit) in an undignified small role as café audience member, Café Flesh is ultimately a downright bizarre piece of celluloid story made at a time when some Americans actually preferred audacious aesthetics and comical cultural pessimism over mere gigantic tits and dicks, thus indicating that we are probably closer to doomsday scenario than we really think.

DR. CALIGARI

Stephen Sayadian (1989)

Not surprisingly, Robert Wiene's cinematically revolutionary German expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) aka Das Cabinet des Dr. Caligari has spawned countless cinematic remakes and tributes including the horrendous British non-remake The Cabinet of Caligari (1962) penned by Psycho writer Robert Bloch, the self-reflexive midwestern-inspired postmodern work Caligari's Curse (1983) directed by documentarian Tom Palazzolo, the modernist dystopian silent musical-horror-spoof The Cabinet of Dr. Ramirez (1991) directed by American theater director Peter Sellars, and the quasi-plagiaristic 2005 American remake The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari directed by David Lee Fisher (who shot the entire film in front of a green screen, with scenes from the original 1920 film being superimposed in the background), but undoubtedly the greatest and most insanely idiosyncratic of these films is the quasi-sequel Dr. Caligari (1989) aka Dr. Caligari 3000 directed and co-written by Austrian-born auteur-pornographer Stephen Sayadian aka 'Rinse Dreams' (Nightdreams trilogy, Café Flesh) and co-penned by Jerry Stahl (Twin Peaks, Bad Boys II). Indeed, not only is Dr. Caligari a somewhat worthy, if not more wayward and only semi-serious sequel to Wiene's silent masterpiece as well as director Sayadian's first (and last) non-pornographic work, but also a sister film of sorts to the filmmaker's first major work Nightdreams (1981), as it features the reappearance of the mentally perturbed and severely sexually repressed housewife character Mrs. Van Houten. Sort of like Richard Elfman's Forbidden Zone (1982) albeit keenly kaleidoscopic and with a more Euripid as opposed to Judaic sense of humor, as seemingly directed by the sinisterly sardonic bastard love child of David Lynch and Carmelo Bene, Dr. Caligari is a rude and raunchy nightmare of the psychosexual, psychodramatic sort that thankfully pays tribute to The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari more in name and reference as opposed to simply mimicking the aesthetics of its German expressionist namesake. A rare and somewhat artistically successful example of a pornographer leaving the aesthetically unmerited ghetto that is the porn world to create a quasi-arthouse work, Dr. Caligari proves that it was no fluke that Sayadian's apocalyptic porn flicks Nightdreams and Café Flesh (1982) managed to achieve cult status and be played at Midnight Movie screenings. Like both The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari and Nightdreams, Dr. Caligari is set in a surrealist loony bin where the distinction between the doctors and patients begins to blur, but unlike the two other films it features such succulently unsavory things as Cronenberg-esque birthday cakes with animated guts, chicks with mutant prick arms who see it fit to anally rape their hubby, banal doctors who turn into trannies with a taste for cunnilingus after being injected with granular brain fluids, and one of the most exquisitely dressed and sexually sinister villainesses of cinema history. Directed by an Austrian-born auteur who once stated regarding old school Teutonic cinema, “That period between 1919-1938, it’s in my brain. It’s so much a part of who I am and what I do and how I look at things,” Dr. Caligari is a singular work that manages to reconcile German expressionism with a quasi-punky New Romanticist aesthetic straight out of Slava Tsukerman’s equally culturally pessimistic sci-fi cult classic Liquid Sky (1982). The late great eponymous character of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari might be dead, but his shockingly sexy femme fatale great-granddaughter of the same name (Madeleine Reynal, whose only other film role was in the Mystery Science Theater 3000-approved sci-fi romance Space Mutiny (1988)) has the same demented DNA and when it comes to mental patients she likes to play quite perniciously in a fiercely fetishistic fashion that puts the deranged divas of Nazploitation and women-in-prison films to complete and utter shame.

Debauched diva Dr. Caligari is the queen psychotherapist of a pandemonium of a mental institution named the Caligari Insane Asylum (C.I.A.) with the motto ‘Better Living Thru Chemistry’ and she is in for quite the treat when a seemingly impotent husband named Les Van Houten (Gene Zerna) decides to have his wanton wifey committed to the surreal sanitarium for two weeks due to her unnerving nymphomaniac-like proclivities. Dr. Caligari has grand plans for Mrs. Van Houten, but two robot-like busybody rivals docs, Ramona Lodger (Jennifer Balgobin of 1980s cult classics like Alex Cox’s Repo Man (1984) and John Hughes’ Weird Science (1985)) and her hubby, Dr. Lodger (David Parry), prove to be a thorn in her side. Luckily for Dr. Caligari, the head doctor, Ramona’s somewhat stern but fair father Dr. Avol (Fox Harris, who is probably best known for playing J. Frank Parnell in Repo Man), is not wise to her wayward ways of mental medicine. Ultimately, Dr. Caligari—a mad megalomaniac madam who proudly brags, “I’m the most celebrated psychotherapist in the country. Dr. Wilhelm Reich, Dr. C.G. Jung, Doctor....Caligari”—decides to ‘cure’ her patients by balancing out the particular mental illness of one patient with the particular opposing mental illness of another via hypothalamus injections, with Mrs. Van Houten swapping her psychosis with the equally opposing psychosis of a shock-therapy-loving lunatic of a cannibal named Gus Pratt (John Durbin, who got his big break in film playing ‘Zombie Corpse #1’ in The Return of the Living Dead (1985)). Dr. Caligari also decides to mess with pussy psychotherapist Avol’s mind after he tries to confront her, thus turning him into a carpet-munching tranny and the literal lily-licking lapdog of the good doctor after injecting him with the exceedingly erotic and feminine Mrs. Van Houten’s nympho psyche. Since she has made the unwitting mistake of preserving her great-grandpa’s brain of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari fame, Dr. Caligari is in for quite a surprise when Mrs. Van Houten decides to inject herself with a bit of the Caligari genius. In the end, Van Houten manages to not only take on the psyche of Caligari, but also injects Dr. Caligari with her own horndog psychosis via a hypothalamus shot. In a psychodramatic twist, the lunatics take over the

As with most of auteur Stephen Sayadian's porn films, Dr. Caligari is an innately grotesque absurdist work of the culturally pessimistic persuasion that is more anti-erotic than erotic, which the director himself seemed to recognize when he stated of his work in a recent interview with twitchfilm.com, "But I think the art world was always too turned off by the porn, and the porn world too turned off by the art. Which if you think about it, is the perfect formula for failure." Additionally, Dr. Caligari is far too patently perverted, scatological, and tastelessly tongue-in-cheek to speak to the souls of certain humorless arthouse fans, thereupon making it a work with a rather marginal, if not loyal, audience. Shot in the studio of Sayadian's friend Ray Manzarek, the keyboardist of The Doors, on a meager budget of $175,000 over a six week period utilizing a misleadingly static camera (as the director confessed, "I figured, instead of losing time with fancy camera moves, we could just put the actors on platforms and the sets on wheels. There are lots of shots that look like dollies or cranes but are just static."), Dr. Caligari is a striking example of what a creative filmmaker can do with rather limited resources. Indeed, that being said, I do not think it is a stretch to say that Sayadian is one of the few filmmakers in cinema history whose experience working in porn with small budgets and limited studio sets gave him an advantage when it came to making a serious feature film for virtually pennies. Rather unfortunately, while Dr. Caligari received mostly rave reviews from mainstream press sources like Entertainment Weekly and NY Post, Sayadian would never make another non-pornographic work and was forced to create cheap shot-on-video works like Party Doll A Go-Go! (1991) and Untamed Cowgirls of the Wild West Part 1: The Pillowbiters (1993) before giving up filmmaking entirely.

While I cannot say that I think all, or even half, of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari fans will enjoy the film, Dr. Caligari is certainly a work that will leave no one feeling like they endured a complete Jean-Luc Godard retrospective nor Ron Jeremy marathon. In other words, its relation to Wiene's silent film is not much more than a nice little novelty for obsessive cinephiles, as a work that stands quite well on its own and never bores with pedantic intellectualism nor contrived eroticism. Compulsively convoluted in the best sort of way and more aesthetically subversive and immaculate than anything directed by the pretentious humdrum hacks of so-called 'Cinema of Transgression' like Richard Kern and Nick Zedd, Dr. Caligari is like a vulgarian neo-vaudeville show set in anti-Reaganite hell that is occupied by David Cronenberg, Hans Bellmer's autistic son, a bunch of 'psycho-chic' chicks that look like Sean Young's character from Blade Runner (1982), a couple swarthy closet queens that look like they could be related to Conrad Veidt, and Kenneth Anger's irreligious heterosexual brother. An un-hinged depiction of "unending torment" (or at least that is how lead Mrs. Van Houten describes her life) where an odious oriental bitch in a neon pink strait-jacket describes how her supposedly German grandmother “made all the potato salad for Himmler’s picnics...Goebbels too” and where the authentic melancholy and despair of German expressionism is reduced to the level of a naughty neo-surrealist scat show, albeit with a sometimes foreboding atmosphere comparable to Lynch’s Eraserhead (1977), Dr. Caligari personifies true cult cinema like no other yet it has yet to develop true cult status, which is a shame that the American filmgoing public must bear. As auteur Sayadian recently revealed in the same twitchfilm.com interview, “Since I stopped I don’t think anybody picked up the mantle. I mean, Lars von Trier, he’s superimposing heads [in his upcoming Nymphomaniac], why would you do that?...Just about a year ago I got the go-ahead for a new film. We just finished the script and are getting it ready to shoot. I think it’s something dying to be released. Not because I’m doing it, but because nobody else is...So I really can’t wait.” With that acknowledged, one can only hope that Sayadian is still the sort of man that enjoys archaic kraut cinema and has a fetish for murderous man-sized baby dolls.

DEEP RISING

Stephen Sommers (1998)

One thing that was always consistent is my infatuation with high seas terror. Included in the past several decades are many of the quintessential selections of these low-brow nautical creature-features. With a catalog spanning such titles as Deepstar Six, Leviathan, The Beast, and Deep Rising, my love for the genre is timeless and dates back to the first horror obsession I ever had, Jaws/Orca. Having the chance to revisit Deep Rising was a dose of nostalgia that was fluttering and had begun rekindling many fond memories of the excellent creature design. I recall the release of Deep Rising faintly. The praise was irregular but the excitement was unanimous. To add to the suspense, I caught wind of a still featuring one of many of the invading tentacles and my interests were beyond aroused. One might be able to link my fascination with unnatural marine life to a deep-rooted sexual anonymity that is present in the abyss. Not to call phallic on tentacles but within the deep, dark mystery of the world's blinded oceans exists something that we cannot imagine. What I'm referring to can not be simply labeled a "monster", rather, worthy of life and instincts just as we are. This conception of bizarre and terrible life is what makes these films so animated and grotesquely plausible. It's as if unfortunate marine life is a fail safe for horror films, something one cannot debunk as easily.

What Stephen Sommers set out to do with Deep Rising was to finally put to tape an action/horror film that is worthy to the legacy of Aliens. In that regard, Sommers failed miserably. Deep Rising channels none of the atmosphere, claustrophobia, or extraterrestrial nihilism of James Cameron's sequel. With Deep Rising, he abandoned the dream of fleshy beasts and created a creature entirely out of digital animation. Dated now, Deep Rising was actually a marvel and a bit of a breakthrough for its time, plastering the magazine pages of Fangoria and Cinefantastique. For whatever it is worth, Deep Rising is not a bad film in any way. In regards to the quality, once must keep in mind the aged, immature characters and the inferior visual effects are glaring. But, as it is, Deep Rising might also pack the most punch of any of the bio-horror realms within the oceans. It doesn't contain the suspense or gall of the crew aboard the Orca in Jaws but Deep Rising features a wonderful force of opposition and the comical deaths of many nuisances.

In case you've never heard of or seen Deep Rising, a short synopsis is in order. Treat Williams stars as Finnigan, the captain of a dodgy transport vessel who just so happens to be employed by a group of hijackers armed with torpedoes planning to plunder the Argonautica, the greatest luxury ship of its time. Once aboard the ship, the villains notice immediately that there is no sign of life on this once bustling ship. Ring of Koontz's Phantoms, anyone? Using this opportunity to hurry the process of looting the valuables, several confined survivors are discovered and begin to blabber nonsense about an infestation of killer "...things." With Famke Janssen and Kevin J. O'Connor, Deep Rising only begins roll call with the recognizable cast of Djimon Hounsou and Cliff Curtis, not to mention Wes Studi's scarred visage illuminating a scene in which his last bullet in the chamber is wasted towards spite instead of ending the misery of his own. Deep Rising isn't perfect, though. Through the affable corridors of the sinking cruise liner are many flaws and obstacles known for impeding the joy of this oceanic carnage. For one, Treat Williams' archetype has been stamped vigorously for an element of "cool", leaving his character without a word of wisdom but with an unsuited ego that spells out popcorn suicide.

Yet another strong aspect of Deep Rising is the general ambiguity of the creature. But with further research, this cloud of mystery can be fanned away. The ship's creator mentions in the film that it is "some kind of strange offshoot of the Archaea Ottoia family." When you juxtapose this information with a snippet taken from an interview with Sommers, "I shot a whole opening sequence about underwater nuclear testing that's created something beneath the ocean.", the answer and origins are given. It's a shame this scene wasn't detailed in the final print but seeing as how Deep Rising already suffered so much at the hands of the merciless box office, this could-of is easily shrugged off. One can hope that the day Deep Rising does get a proper video release comes. Perhaps Sommers will have warmed to his masterpiece enough to complete his vision. Late 90s horror films don't get much better than Deep Rising. Committed to shocking and severing many-a-victim, the tentacles in Deep Rising represent a high point in monstrous creativity. If you could not muster the characters quirks and oafish lines, perhaps watching them be digested would serve an excellent experiment in catharsis.

WATCH OUT
WATCH OUT

Steve Balderson° (2008)

From the bowels of cult independent cinema comes the shining Polaris at last. Critically acclaimed director Steve Balderson has crafted an instant classic from the foundation of a controversial novel from Joseph Suglia baring the same title. Ranging from extreme narcissism to blatant and well thought out monologues preaching an insane misanthropy, Watch Out is a surefire hit in every way.

With the flick of a switch, Watch Out propels you deeply into the mindset of an auto-erotic (fascination and arousal by ones self) preteen named Jonathan Barrows who, from a young age, shows an extreme disinterest in any sex. As his parents force him to acquire a girlfriend and lose his virginity, he becomes increasingly more distant from any plane of social interaction. He is god to himself and through two acts, we come to learn his cause and his mission. The film presents itself with a stream of non-stop narration through Barrows' often sexual interactions. His philosophies are very un-PC and solid to a point. To him, people are flesh and he is the closest thing to a god. Only he can satisfy his deepest lust; a bizarre craving for his own flesh. This urges him to tape an image of his gorgeous face on a blow up doll whom he fondles and caresses while forgetting how desirable he is to the undesirable. Before I even had a chance to call it, Watch Out mocks the Fight Club generation, laying author created improvised speeches on Marxist ideals. We really do act like insects, don't we? Scurrying about our boring average lives. This film not only changed the way I viewed things; It rocked me to the core. Part demented philosophies, part American Psycho; Watch Out is a sensation that any gender can enjoy. I don't think I've ever seen sexual surrealism used to such a medium as Watch Out does. What really sells the madcap mood is music created by keyboard aficionado Rob Kleiner, who is know for his work in such bands as Tub Ring and Super 8-Bit Brothers. If you've heard any of his work, you can come to expect an eerie pulsing of sideshow inspiration that is almost as frenetic and paced as their live performances. This is the ultimate compliment to Riddlehoover's jaw dropping performance as our anti-hero. Riddlehoover braved a lot of ground playing our astoundingly flamboyant denizen of his own fantastical fantasies. This role required an absurd amount of male nudity and extreme sexual situations. I myself wouldn't have enough balls to do what Matt did. Watch Out is one of the best films to have been released this year. It sets new ground in the genre of psycho-sexuals and their exploits. A masterful artifact of directing led by bizarre visions chronicling the death of the average good Samaritan. In other words, a must see.

PAUL BLART: MALL COP
PAUL BLART: MALL COP

Steve Carr (2009)

Why do I even bother? Why am I reviewing this damn film? I asked these questions pending my safe return home after screening this film. Sure, the trailers spared no justice at all and made Kevin James (a funny guy) look a damn fool starring in a children's film released during the wintry season. After Black Friday no less (the events took place during that day). His, at the time, pretentious comment calling his film "comic version of Die Hard" had passed through one ear out the other. I scoffed aloud. Nothing could capture the magic of the Bruce Willis titans. Paul Blart: Mall Cop follows an obese and disgusting pig of a man who cracks a few jokes here and there in some disgusting self-loathing experiment to make you laugh with him at quips relating to incidents in which "peanut butter fills the cracks of his heart...go away pain". We may "blart" out an unwelcome chuckle occasionally but this is never remedied with a true hearty moment of serene comedy. For the most part, this film is a slug casually admiring the scenery until the heist conflict occurs. Everything until this part can be easily discarded for lighter weight. This film as a product would have been more successful on websites like FunnyOrDie. With the situation of modern comedy either being overkill or child's play, Paul Blart: Mall Cop is an offender in a uncelebrated instance of neutrality. In many instances, you will see him getting incredible drunk and thanks to his hypoglycemia, passing out or having the effects of alcohol being "super effective!". The real magic of Paul Blart: Mall Cop doesn't come until maybe with a scarce 30 minutes remaining. In true lesser-than-average Joe manner, Paul Blart "hilariously" (Not in any way shape or form) manages to shock into submission all of the mall terrorists akin to Die Hard. Bruce Willis is a much for "fit" hero for the excursion of action. Within the final 10 minutes of actual film time, Paul Blart: Mall Cop simply escalates into a ridiculous Die Hard 2 montage of Adam Sandler produced parodies. From the betrayal to the plane fight and the search for Holly, the film's only golden moments are when you realize that the purpose of this film is to parody the greatest action film of all time, eventually. Every other regard can be monotonously tossed out the window. If you're as big of a Die Hard fan as me, you owe it to yourself to see this film...eventually. As in, illegally downloading it and not spending any form of currency on it. Not even trading furs would make this a worthy buy.

MIRACLE MILE

Steve De Jarnatt (1988)

Miracle Mile is many things: a comedy, a romance, a tragedy. But what it is mostly is a testimonial of the stupid things we men do for women. This very similar approach to looming catastrophe was utilized in the neo-Kaiju film, Cloverfield. Following the same schematics, Miracle Mile/Cloverfield is about the discovery of impending disaster, whether synthetic or organic, and a twerp who vows to himself to venture into ground zero in hopes of reuniting and escaping with a woman they love. In Cloverfield's case, the woman in question is the erotic, exotic Odette Yustman. In Miracle Mile's, we get . . . Mare Wingham sporting a mullet. Both films are starkly similar and both feature a helicopter crash near the same fraction of run time. Miracle Mile unravels like an 80s-controlled game of Perfection, meaning that regardless of what happens, shit's gonna pop. With such a drastic turnabout in tone, Anthony Edwards portrays quirky, obsessive Harry, a suit and nothing more. At least, until he answers an idly ringing phone outside of a diner. The frantic voice on the other end at first mistakes the number for his father's. Realizing his error, he issues a warning of a missile launch and then gunshots echo through the telephone lines. Harry then decides that he must retrieve a woman that he recently fell in love with . . . after their first date.

Opening on a cheery narrative is what creates the jolting effect of Miracle Mile. L.A.'s peaches-and-cream, regardless of current crime rate. When the phone is answered and fate rears its ugly head, the tone of Miracle Mile turns tar-black and characters are introduced only to do atrocious things, like burn two cops alive after their near-discovery of stolen car stereos. This character's name is Wilson. Wilson's trade is a street vendor, that jive-talking Negro who breaks into cars and rips out head units for quick cash. After being hijacked by a frantic and bleeding Harry (oh, how the tables have turned), Wilson demands to pick up his sister before the supposed Armageddon. Returning later in the urban response to the legacies of Bonnie & Clyde, Wilson departs as a hilarious and researched African archetype - a deadly stupid creature. This attempt to humanize the "cop-killer" was an effort too late. As previously mentioned, the film is essentially a countdown, alike to the previously reviewed Proto-nuke film, Ladybug, Ladybug.

Approaching from every possible angle, Miracle Mile is a strange oddity of action. Opening with an ugly romance between suit and beast, the fangs are eventually bared. Upon traveling to the woman's apartment, he discovers her drugged in her own bed, victim to her own Valium. Wasting no time, he picks up the grotesque ginger and places her in a shopping cart, scurrying them both out of the apartment plaza. It's at this awkward stage of cinematic puberty that Miracle Mile suffers the most grievous of wounds. What once was an interesting take on the bourgeois and the effects of mass hysteria is eventually transformed into a romantics crisis control babble. To further spread the leak of quality, the race against time turns into an aggravating escort mission. Say what you will but this couple's fates are sealed due to the insolence of Julie. Against his panicked orders to stay still until Harry finds a helicopter pilot, Julie is later seen wandering the streets, hassling passer-byers. This amongst other incursions is the death of Miracle Mile. As if an end of the world situation isn't stressful enough, we have to deal with the ignorance of a tramp.

Don't misconstrue my negativity as shrugging Miracle Mile off. There is much to enjoy about Miracle Mile, whether it be the slap to the face - the facade of felicity stripped as the news of impending disaster creeps, or the excellent musical composition by Tangerine Dream. Only in the later scenes does the exciting effect of hysteria become a problem for Harry. With cocktails and weapons, the citizenry attacks bistros and electronic stores, looting and creating visual anarchy for our greedy cinematographer. Time being a luxury they don't have, these civilians of L.A., particularly those on Miracle Mile, begin to revolt and riot, which creates the last glimmer of cinematic marvels found in Miracle Mile. I don't dare dispute the effect of the climax on those cinema goers in the early autumn of '88. However, to today's standards of bleak and nihilistic film fascination, Miracle Mile stands to me as a cheery time capsule of squandered proportions.

12 YEARS A SLAVE

Steve McQueen (2013)

In terms of black auteur filmmakers, I cannot think of one more so seemingly deracinated, racially unconscious, and 'Europeanized' than black Grenadian Brit Steve McQueen (Hunger, Shame), so naturally I was quite intrigued, if not hesitatingly so, when I discovered he decided to tackle the subject of American slavery with the film 12 Years a Slave (2013). Indeed, during his days as an unknown video artist, McQueen briefly touched on the subject of post-colonialism with his short Western Deep (2002)—an experimental Herzog-esque work depicting the virtually slave-like conditions of mostly black coalminers in a South African goldmine—but the director, who has emphasized that race has never been a priority of his work, always manages to take a detached yet paradoxically visceral approach to the subject, as if he is a chameleon that is able to cinematically walk in anyone's shoes, including hunger-striking IRA men in Hunger (2008) and a successful advertising executive who moonlights as an unsavory sex addict in Shame (2011). Unlike black filmmakers like, say, tiny spade agitator Spike Lee (Do the Right Thing, Summer of Sam), McQueen, who is married to a white woman and has a mulatto daughter, seems to be reasonably color blind, at least relatively speaking, especially considering we live in an absurdly xenophilic age plagued by political correctness where the smartest thing a nonwhite artist can do to further their career is to create something to make Caucasian racial cuckolds cum with ethno-masochistic delight. Indeed, while I believe 12 Years a Slave will prove to be a nice masturbation aid for some university cultural anthropology professor and features enough evil white slave masters to keep both sub-literate race hustler Jesse Jackson and pseudo-white anti-white agitator Tim Wise happy, it certainly does not feature the sort of virile anti-white hatred typical of a work like Amistad (1997) directed by Steven Spielberg, which professes to be historical yet shamelessly wallows in Hebraic fiction. While 12 Years a Slave is also largely a work of fiction pretending to be stylized nonfiction in motion, it at least has some, if not rather dubious, artistic merit. Indeed, a sort of 'Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom of American slavery movies,' 12 Years a Slave is like Euro-artsploitation meets mainstream Hollywood as a work dripping with ultra-violence, but also with aesthetically solacing scenes of Southern fields and deleterious caterpillars crawling on rotten cotton. Produced by dubious individuals ranging from Shabbos goy boy toy Brad Pitt to arrogant Israeli spy Arnon Milchan, 12 Years a Slave is indeed an epic piece of agitprop but unlike most works of its kosher produced kind it manages to slightly rise above the level of slavery-fetishizing leftist swill and offers a more ambient S&M-driven side to slavery.

It is the year 1841 and Solomon Northup (Chiwitel Ejiofor) is a cultivated bourgeois-like free negro man who makes a decent living as a carpenter and violinist and lives reasonably comfortably with his wife and two children in Saratoga Springs, New York. On a rather unfortunate day, Northup is approached by two effortlessly effete Wilde-like white men, Mr. Brown (Scoot McNairy) and Mr. Hamilton (Taran Killam), to perform in their traveling circus as a fiddler for a rather lucrative sum, which ultimately takes him to Washington D.C. for a brief period. After a hedonistic night drinking with his two new seemingly gay white friends, Northup awakes to find himself a chained and enslaved man and before he knows it he is on a slave ship to New Orleans. Rather ridiculously, Northup witnesses a slave played by Michael K. Williams (The Wire, Boardwalk Empire) being stabbed to death by a lowly white sailor while attempting to intervene during the suspected rape of a black female slave, as if poor whites had the god given right to kill expensive property (i.e. black slaves) owned by wealthy whites whenever they felt like it. Ultimately, Northup is forced by a Svengali-like slave trader named Theophilus Freeman (Paul Giamatti) to take the name "Platt," which is the name of a runaway slave from Georgia. Indeed, while it rather sucks that he is now a slave who has lost all his freedom and is forced to do manual labor, Northup manages to become the personal property of a uncommonly benign plantation owner named William Ford (Benedict Cumberbatch), whose only personal flaw seems to be his cowardice. Unfortunately, Ford has employed a cracker carpenter named John Tibeats (Paul Dano) who does not take kindly to the fact that negro Northup has a larger vocabulary than he does. Eventually, Tibeats and Northup have a softcore showdown and the former nearly lynches the latter with the help of two equally lowly white lumpenprole friends. To save him from the white wrath of Tibeats, master Ford decides to sell Northup to a religiously devout fellow named Edwin Epps (played by McKraut Michael Fassbender, who in real-life has an affinity for dark meat). Unfortunately for Northup, master Epps believes slavery is biblically sanctioned and that there is no sin in treating property (i.e. slaves) like trash. On top of everything else, Epps is in love with one of his pieces of property, a young negress slave named Patsey (Lupita Nyong'o), which naturally does not sit well with his vindictive sexually repressed wife (Sarah Paulson). Indeed, when not raped by master Epps, Patsey is physically abused by jealous Mary. At one point, Patsey attempts to persuade Northup to assist her in killing herself but the ex-freeman is devoutly religious and refuses to damn himself to hell. Later, Patsey leaves the plantation to get a bar of soap and Epps, who blames his 'forced lover' and the rest of the slaves for his recent misfortunes (an outbreak of cotton worm has destroyed his crops), decides to take his anger and jealous out on her. Egged on by his pathologically jealous and sexually frustrated wife, Epps forces Northup to brutally whip Patsey, who is tied to a pole naked, but ultimately decides to finish the job himself, which almost leads to the brutalized black girl's death. Luckily, Northup's life changes forever when a cocky Canadian laborer named Bass (Brad Pitt) comes to the Epps plantation to work on a pavilion. After going on a feel-good anti-slavery spiel that pisses off Epps, Bass eventually convinces Northup to tell his personal story. Ultimately, Northup begs Bass to write his friend in the north about procuring his freeman documents and the Canadian abides. In the end, Northup gets his freedom after a dozen years as a slave and is rather happy to learn he is a grandfather.

As can be expected from such a work, 12 Years a Slave is riddled with horrendous historical inaccuracies that transcend mere artistic license, ridiculous 'evil redneck' caricatures that could have only been dreamed up by an individual who is too afraid to leave the city, and even a tad bit of superlatively superficial and vomit-worthy Spielberg-esque sentimentalism, yet compared to Lee Daniels' The Butler (2013) and turd Tarantino's cheap cuckold epic Django Unchained (2012), McQueen's movie is a semi-tolerable piece of Hollywood pseudo-arthouse cinema. Of course, compared to McQueen's two previous features, Hunger and Shame, 12 Years a Slave seems like a 'for-hire' sell-out flick where the auteur was only able to shine as a filmmaker as much as his slave-master producers would allow him to, yet he manages to shine nonetheless. Of course, in its revoltingly flattering depiction of white northerners as saintly nephrofiles who would gladly lick the boots of a black man to prove their godlike capacity for racial tolerance, 12 Years a Slave is meant to appeal to the slave-morality-driven sensibilities of moronic white liberal dupes who falsely believe that human history is the story of 'progress' against racism and adversity. Apparently, as indicated by his own ghostwritten 1853 memoir, the real-life Northup was nowhere near the respectable black bourgeois gentleman that he is portrayed as in 12 Years a Slave, but a perennially unemployed black bum with a knack for fiddling around with his fiddle. Although never mentioned in 12 Years a Slave, when the real Northup disappeared, his family did not even bother to report him missing as they expected him to do something so superlatively shady as to abandon his family. In fact, as revealed in the demystifying book Solomon Northup: The Complete Story of the Author of Twelve Years a Slave (2013) written by David A. Fiske, it is believed that Northup hooked up with some white criminal cronies and made a scam of selling himself into slavery à la Skin Game (1971)—a comedy where a white man routinely sells his free black friend into slavery at the highest bidding and then springs him loose at night time. As revealed in Fiske's Solomon Northup, Northup's hometown newspaper The Saratoga Press concluded that the free black man's enslavement was the result of a skin game scam gone awry as indicated in the following excerpt: "...it is more than suspected that Northup was an accomplice in the sale, calculating to slip away and share the spoils, but that the purchaser was too sharp for him, and instead of getting the cash, he got something else." Of course, like any Hollywood spade slave period piece, 12 Years a Slave portrays the protagonist as a morally pristine hero of outstanding stoicism and immaculate character whose only flaw is he had the grand misfortune of encountering devils in melanin-deprived flesh.

12 YEARS A SLAVE

Of course, as 12 Years a Slave even reveals, no one knows what happened to Northup during his remaining years or where/how he died, but it is assumed he perished disgracefully (in his wife's obituary, it is stated that Northup became a "worthless vagabond"). Indeed, it seems that if Northup was a slave to anything, it was his own moral degeneracy and lack of work ethic.

Of course, Guido auteur heroes Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi's Goodbye Uncle Tom (1971) aka Addio zio Tom is and will most likely always be the only truly honest, uncompromising, and eclectically iconoclastic depiction of the pre-Civil War South and why getting involved with the African slave trades was one of the biggest mistakes Whitey ever made. Ultimately, 12 Years a Slave manages to work as a minor artsploitation work on steroids, but only Hollywood-lobotomized philistines, ethno-masochistic white leftists, and black folks could find the film to be anything more than an artistic con meant to prey on man's more base emotions. A sort of The Passion of the Christ (2004) for culturally cuckolded liberal humanists featuring insipid anti-white caricatures and agitprop-style violence typical of Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), 12 Years a Slave was even not surprisingly promoted by postmodern minstrel entertainers like Kanye West and Sean Combs. One can enjoy 12 Years a Slave for its scenic depiction of the Southern sun and rural lands, but take heed that McQueen's film, which was written by Hollywood Afro-hack and neo-bolshevik agitator John Ridley (Undercover Brother, Red Tails), comes from the Howard Zinn and Jesse Jackson cultural marxist school of filmmaking. Maybe it is about time Steve McQueen uses his talents elsewhere to make the ultimate negro-directed arthouse-splatter flick, but with the commercial and critical success of 12 Years a Slave, it might already be too late as he played Uncle Tom and sold his soul to the Hebraic Hollywood devil.

DAY OF THE DEAD

Steve Miner (2008)

Steve Miner is a name some of us has heard before. He directed several Friday the 13th sequels as well as Lake Placid and Warlock. As the list shows, these films should not be taken seriously. So what happens when a shitty director takes a serious remake. Well, we wind up with Nick Cannon fighting zombies along with a bunch of teenagers. We all know the plot, a group of survivors hold down a military bunker in hopes for the zombie outbreak to stop. As per usual remake fares, we have tons of over-editing and useless grain in the shots. To be honest, Ving Rhames is nothing without his mustache. That was a horrible move for the director. The reason I would even want to bother with this film is for the Ving kicking ass like he did in Dawn of the Dead. Mena Suvari might be a good actress, but not in this film. Her acting was some of the most flawed I have seen. Of course, I blame the director, for making such a weak script. For thickness on the characters behalf, they enlist such traits as "afraid to fire their weapon" to try and get some depth to them. Of course, we have the cutout characters, such as the punk kid with spiked hair. Of course the characters are stupid. Loaded with inane dialogue, this film breaks so many borders on how to make a horrible film. Not being a fan of Romero in the first place, I still couldn't see this film failing so hard. Barely entertaining, the film only has key highlight moments. FUN FACT: Dead People can apparently stand up. When you finally see the first glimpse of a zombie, it makes a similar noise as the Sand People in Star Wars create. Talk about a genre killer. This has so many bullshit scenes that it is impossible to take this film seriously. I didn't know Molotov cocktails melt your skin instantaneously. From the way this film looks, it appears that Miner invested most of the budget in shitty special effects and CGI gore. That was not a wise move, if anything, he should have invested in a CGI story. The only way I could ever recommend this film is by promoting the neat decapitations. It's hard to recommend a film only on gore value. That is truly how you know horror is on the rocks. Much of the gore is digital but we are treated to lots of exploding heads and melted flesh. Many little nods are thrown around, referencing Return of the Living Dead and even Snyder's update on Dawn of the Dead. The zombies in this film are premiered by a glimpse inside the blood cell as this totally hypothetical transformation gene is created. They now can drive cars, leap & climb ceilings like Spider-Man, and their flesh mutates instantly. There is also a vegetarian zombie in this film who bears a similarity to the national mascot for all Romero films. See; Bub. This is worse than your average low budget fare, no wonder it was given to straight-to-video release. I never thought I would say this, but the only thing that actually made this film any better, was Nick Cannon. Day of the Dead without Nick Cannon's racist remarks would be like a zombie movie that didn't make sense. Wait...

GUYVER: DARK HERO

Steve Wang (1994)

The Guyver is an instant cult icon in any category that you wish to throw at it; horrible melodrama, quirky action, even arterial slashings. The fact that Kaiju, Sentai, and American kung-fu films can all be meshed in an explosive Venn diagram only adds to the enormous entertainment that Guyver: Dark Hero adds. The perfect fusion of Western settings and Japanese art has been created with this sequel. Guyver: Dark Hero has been hailed as "Mighty Morphin' Power Rangers" but with an R rating. This is a highly correct assumption that we have no choice but to agree with as soon as the film opens with the slaying of an innocent security guard and the New Guyver slashing the culprit's throat with his BAD ASS arm blades - reminiscent to the monstrosity that was Baraka (Mortal Kombat II). The sequel to The Guyver follows the manga/anime much closer thus dissolving a proximity issue. This is almost spoiled when the horrible acting dawns upon the viewer, but it is highly forgivable. By the end of this film, it will even be cherished. A horrible sub-love plot involving an archaeologist bogs down most of the script which serves as a pleasant entrée to fans of cryptozoology, like myself. The theory of werewolves and other entities being Zoanoids is a welcome addition to the psyche of a skeptic or conspiracy theorist. It adds this realism to an already outrageous adventure of discovery and soap opera love. The tortured character of the Guyver is portrayed by David Hayter. His performance is so cleverly disguised as amateur work that it pleases all senses, both mapped and unknown. There lies a deep satisfaction behind this film and the zany action and horrible production sets. Here's a fun fact. The actor that you criticize? David Hayter? Well he's actually the writer for the Zack Snyder directed Watchmen feature film. This is one I'm heavily anticipating seeing as how the novel is one of the greatest pieces of literature ever crafted by an elitist Brit. Guyver: Dark Hero is a spotlight for incredible monster action mixed with often-violent outcomes. For any fan of science fiction, this is a must-see of the genre. I'm torn between hating David Hayter for his predicted destruction of Watchmen. Seeing as how he wrote The Scorpion King, the chances aren't looking too bright. Guyver: Dark Hero is basically essential viewing for any organic life form. That's the only real way to put it.

LUMINOUS PROCURESS

Steven Arnold (1971)

Admittedly, the very sight of an image of the commie hippie drag queen troupe, The Cockettes (led by Hibiscus and his would-be merry man-ladies) is to me the height of radical repugnancy, aggravating aesthetic and biological disharmony, and well beyond redeemable human depravity, so naturally I was quite reluctant to watch the rarely-seen lecherous experimental in arthouse excess Luminous Procuress (1971) starring Pandora and the terribly torturous tranny team, and directed by multi-media artist Steven F. Arnold (The Liberation of the Manique Mechanique, Gomorrah Borealis); a rather queenish yet refined fellow who had the distinction of being voted "Best Dressed" one year by the L.A. Weekly. Upon first seeing the film none other than famed surrealist Salvador Dalí described Luminous Procuress as "a work of genius" and took on auteur Arnold as his young protégé (who he referred to as his "prince"), thereupon resulting in the young artist's involvement with the painting and opening of the Dalí Theatre and Museum in Figueres, Spain. Despite Dalí, as well as Andy Warhol delighting in the visual luxuriance of Luminous Procuress, the revolutionary work is scantily referenced in the documentary The Cockettes (2002) directed by Bill Weber and David Weissman, which is quite telling as the film owes more to the avant-garde auteur behind it than the exceedingly effete faux queens that rock-out with their cocks-out in the spiritually salacious and sinful cinematic work. Indeed, Luminous Procuress does feature aesthetically displeasing men that look like creepy caricatures of Courtney Love and Amy Winehouse, as well as hedonistic hippie degeneracy and lecherousness love-in lunacy, but this rather experimental celluloid art piece is also comparable to Kenneth Anger's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954), Werner Schroeter's Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972), and Ulrike Ottinger's Madame X: An Absolute Ruler (1978) due to its keen kaleidoscopic imagery, hermetic homoeroticism, and overall unwavering intimate idiosyncrasy. Essentially beginning where Jack Smith left off with Flaming Creatures (1963) with a reasonably healthy serving of Milliganesque low-camp eroticism, except to a more heightened degree (the film features unsimulated sex of the somewhat serious stripe), Luminous Procuress – a film that dared to portray phantasmagorical cunnilingus and intensely iconoclastic imagery (including a Satanic pope bugging a bent over nun) – is a vehemently vagarious and heteromorphic work of celluloid carnality of the absolutely assiduous abberosexual sort.

Although I cannot say I agree with his political persuasion nor hermaphroditic fashion sense, I undoubtedly believe that Steven Arnold was practicing what he preached, at least in terms of aesthetic authenticity, when he stated, "art is revolution or it's nothing," as Luminous Procuress is indubitably the sort of cinematic work where the auteur fought tooth and (broken) nail to bring his uniquely unruly and ruthlessly risqué images to life as if he was engaged in a cinematic crusade for the reevaluation and reinvention of the artistic medium of film. Unfortunately, due to the influence of certain financial backers of the film who wanted the cinematic work released asap, Arnold was apparently removed from the production of Luminous Procuress not long after the film's principal photography was finished, or so says Warner Jepson, the man who was responsible for assembling the haunting, hypnotic, and hallucinatory synthesizer score for the work. On top of composing the music for the film, Jepson and Victor Barberi were responsible for editing it together, which probably explains why Luminous Procuress is even more nonlinear in structure than the works of Jack Smith. With the dialogue recorded for the film being deemed useless due to the noise of trolley buses and voices interfering with the recording of sound at the studio in which it was originally mixed, Jepson and Barberi opted for dumping the original dialogue and replacing it with foreign (a sort of mishmash of pig French and Slavic languages) and mostly indecipherable voices, henceforth further adding to the otherworldly esotericism of Luminous Procuress. Despite Arnold's lack of involvement in the post-production aspects of Luminous Procuress, the film is undoubtedly his auteur-piece as made apparent by the unmistakable aesthetic essence of his previous black-and-white quasi-psychedelic surrealist shorts like The Liberation of Mannique Mechanique (1967), Messages, Messages (1968), and Various Incarnations of a Tibetan Seamstress (1969), with the subsequent film starring The Cockettes – the only work he shot in color with the exception of the impossible-to-find work Gomorrah Borealis (1984) – being his cinematic opus magnum. Far too murky, menacing, meditative, mystical, and lacking in mock-heroic humor and musical numbers to be a mere cheeky Cockettes cinematic concerto piece, the members of the fag drag gang purely act as peculiar yet surely potent props for Luminous Procuress. Influenced by historically revolutionary artists ranging from pioneering French illusionist filmmaker Georges Méliès (A Trip to the Moon, The Impossible Voyage) to Italian Renaissance artist Michelangelo, Steven Arnold was certainly an artist with a grandeur artistic vision, certainly more so than a group of campy commune communists of the superficially sardonic and mostly senseless sort.

As an assuredly ambitious artist who sought to “save the world” and create a “new mythology” through his audacious artistic creations, it is beyond question that Steven Arnold's Luminous Procuress is a work of metaphysical, if soundly self-indulgent and sensual, cinema. In the brief 10-minute ‘video portrait’ Steven Arnold's Heavenly Bodies directed by Stephanie Farago, Arnold proclaims that his great and grandiose goal with his art was: “creating things for people to look up to...young people...and giving them miracles, giving them hope, giving them shrines and giving them hope, giving them new forms of religion and new ways to believe and believing in all things.” As a sort of perverse quasi-Jungian prophet of the notably homophile persuasion, Luminous

Procuress is Arnold's virtual cinematic holy writ and certainly a singular and strikingly stylized work in the history of American film that deserves greater recognition as being – not unlike the works of James Sibley Watson (The Fall of the House of Usher, Lot in Sodom), Kenneth Anger (Scorpio Rising, Lucifer Rising), and Paul Morrissey (Trash, Women in Revolt) – a rare example of cultural mongrels creating authentic and seemingly organic art in a most mercenary and materialistic nation with next to nil kultur nor history. Seemingly too ominous for fans of The Cockettes as a sort of "bad trip" and "post-hippie nightmare," Luminous Procuress is conspicuously the sort of work that cinematic dreams are made of, hence the film's virtual consignment to the celluloid garbage heap of history; a realm of no return better suited for the likes of high-priest hippie Hibiscus and his horrid flock of serenading and springing fashion victim faggots.

LEPRECHAUN: BACK 2 THA HOOD

Steven Ayromlooi (2003)

Leprechaun: Back 2 tha Hood is the fifth sequel to the original cult classic that first featured Jennifer Aniston in a leading role. To reprise the terror he already inflicted on the ghetto's of America, the leprechaun goes "back 2 da hood" aimed with the sole challenge of inwardly killing more of the lower class black society. For an urban horror film, this one doesn't hit the spot as opposed to its direct predecessor with such stars as Ice T and Coolio, which in turn makes it a true to life urban horror film and not one that just exploits black unknowns they may have picked up off "tha street". Despite turning the Leprechaun into a mere shadow of the running gag that he was, the film maintains its own eccentric humor throughout the running time and manages to provide ample entertainment for such a disgusting film. Whether the Leprechaun is hitting on them bootylicious black babes or smoking some of that fine ganja, his adventure will always be wanted time and time again, In fact - I couldn't seem to grow weary of these miscellaneous sequels. It's very profitable towards the film industry machine to create these sequels that surprisingly have a remnant of a replay value. Warwick Davis returns in his titular role of a smaller stature aimed with protecting "his preciouses". Throughout this film, you will be host to a cruel experiment designed with degrading blacks worse than any previous installment of cinema might have (I still haven't watched Hood Angelz). In Back 2 Tha Hood, even the protagonists are whiny little shits that don't care about education, economy (In a falsified scene, they pretend, but as quick as that subplot was there, it's gone), or the benefit of mankind. If the white race ever intended to create a propaganda video glorifying the master race, this would surely work its charm, and that's all the film really has. The film has worked its Irish magic well as it has turned the black society into the laughing stock of the internet. In Mobile, Alabama in 2006, many "urban thugz" claimed to have seen a Leprechaun in a tree alerting news vehicles to find a circus of sorts. The only problem is that if you gaze in the Leprechaun's direction, it vanishes. What a double negative. After this video hit the video sharing sites, it exploded into one of the more popular meme's around, creating shirts, buttons, and many Cafepress stores where you can get the iconic idiot's face plastered on any daily product.

And I quote an iMDB forum post. "wtf the reason they end up bad is because a caucasian production team takes over and cn't actually capture the OUR culture how it shud be !!! so dn't get it twisted! and all the slang is just a stereotype on all US caribbean/african heritage's" Sure, the easy way out of the hole they dug was to market Leprechaun 6 as a "black comedy". While I'll give it the benefit of a doubt, there are surprisingly several funny scenes. The problem is that I can count them on my fingers. Leprechaun: Back 2 tha Hood is another cash cow for the DTV industry. It was cleverly marketed towards people who cannot define an exquisite taste of horror films or cinema in general. Some brainless horror fan might try to spark a debate by screaming how this film is "so bad it's good" but my best advice is to coldly ignore said person/s. This is nothing but a degenerative piece on black culture. Or lack there of, seeing as how director Steven Ayromlooi thinks so little of them.

AUTOMATON TRANSFUSION

Steven C. Miller (2008)

With a name like Automaton Transfusion you might brainstorm a young director with a head full of brilliant ideas to reinvent the horror genre. Or you could think of a numskull with a large budget making cinematic shit even more violating than Pasolini's Salo: 120 days of Sodom. For a pseudo-intellectual title that circles round to translate simply into "Zombie", this film only unleashes bland characters, annoying neck bitings which brings to question why zombies always go for that body part, and the most annoying cinematography ever committed to an idea. Automaton Transfusion was reportedly made for 30 grand which doesn't show. Much of the budget must have been spent on coke parties with the cast and crew. The frame rate of the film making is at such a low speed that the film is constantly jumping everywhere and not in the shaky-cam way but in the "OH GOD! Is my brand new DVD skipping?" To close this argument, if you bought this DVD you're a damn fool. Just because the "messianic" Bloody-Disgusting hailed this as a masterpiece and claimed it to be the Independent horror dream come true, doesn't mean everyone else will feel this way. In fact, I don't think anyone else will feel this way about the film. This is an entirely unlikable exercise in publicizing zombies even further. As if conformity didn't exist. The main symptom of viewing this film. A black mingler with brass knuckles, a faux hawk sporting pothead, and a whiny slimy sniveling "geek" all group up together in the most embarrassing friend circle during an unknown zombie onslaught. The only highlight of this film is when the Negro star isn't being disgustingly told what to do in each scene. When the black guy utilizes his ignorance, the screen shines with honesty. It's something that isn't seen that much. As much of a cultured citizen as I am, I can tell that "urban" audiences will feel right at home. I can't say much more about this film because I want the invading thoughts to flee in agony expressed physically when I pissed acid on this DVD (In my mind). Don't believe any of the hype. Bloody-Disgusting only adds to the list of film review sites that get bribed into reviewing a "good" film. I don't appreciate lies and slander as much as I don't appreciate an absolutely horrible film that steals "innovative death scenes" from every other zombie classic. Do stay away from this garbage. Don't even look at the case.

TRAILER PARK OF TERROR

Steven Goldmann* (2008)

Slasher films have always been known for their iconic deconstruction of many racial or social class propaganda. A popular example that is always revisited is the "hillbilly" class. Rural working class America has never been so terrifying. In vein of Herschell Gordon Lewis and John Waters, this campy splatterpiece is born, devoid of all morals and offers a heart-breaking back story. The film launches an exuberant campaign with its tongue-in-cheek humor and the classic "You have sex, you die" get-up. This only fits in these pro-American trashy movies. A foul redneck rampage has never been so messy, up until now. The film leans mostly towards the Yankee's but features a trivial confederate flag in a scene, just to spice up the scenery. The film itself, is actually based on a comic book pressed by Imperium Comics. The glamorous southern bell Nichole Hiltz plays the deep fried Dixie dominator Norma, who starts off as a vengeful bombshell who later turns up with her undead friends to prey on young teenagers, similar to Two Thousand Maniacs, or even the recent 2001 Maniacs. Film starts off easy, echoing hints of vengeance and nihilism, then switches into a sex-comedy, then to a barbaric slaughter fest involving skinning teens and deep frying them; all to add to this cannibalistic redneck illusion. Norma is the perfect female; one who is intelligent and beautiful, but also knows when to not take any shit. The perfect monster has been created, along with her ragtag group of cannibalistic, guitar-playing scouts. Trace Adkins also makes an appearance as a Sam Elliot-esque mysterious man who is always there to drive the story. Director Steve Goldman came a long way from his turf as seen in Broken Bridges. Hopefully, he adopts into the horror genre in order to churn out more prime beef. Hard Rock Zombies seems to be the case here, mixed with a heavy dose of the bloody mess that is From Dusk Till Dawn. Trailer Park of Terror is the perfect horror hybrid, brimming with sadistic masseuses, beef jerky, and a rocking soundtrack.

THE PARK IS MINE

Steven Hilliard Stern (1985)

The Park is Mine is an early Made-for-TV HBO production casting a pre-fame Tommy Lee Jones in his precipitated approach to act as a tortured and disgruntled Vietnam vet. His sagging features and rough voice only aid the appearance of a perturbed individual securing both hostility in his visage and the hereditary ability to look 30 years older than he presently is, at any time. Tommy Lee Jones doesn't aggravate me as much as I'd intend to express in this film and this surprised me to my very core. I've grown to loathe the man after appearing in some A-list Hollywood trife over his spanning career that grows from Cobb to Lonesome Dove then settles out with No Country for Old Men. To trade in his roles from such trashy cinema like Volcano would be a godsend to a high degree and I would gladly take the retardedly underrated The Hunted over shit like Men In Black any day.

In a post-First Blood veteran sympathy plea, action is churned simply like butter offering emotional demons and firefights with intentions of never harming a soul. For this reason, the action in The Park is Mine is simple, effective, and pure of heart. Now, this might dishearten the "die hard" action fan as, let's face it, we love watching people getting riddled with bullets, but with the empathy directed towards television viewers and sticking it to the man, The Park is Mine is largely entertaining film that was made with nary a sore spot. Just examine First Blood closer and notice the large budget of 15 million US dollars. This is by no means large by today's economical standards but for a film featuring no killing, few explosions, and a natural set, First Blood's budget seems to be roughly inflated perhaps even to pay off the star power of Stallone and Deneuve. But to be fair to both The Park is Mine and the comparable First Blood, First Blood offers much more depth into madness and chaotic order (is their any other kind?) of the Vietnam veteran and The Park is Mine follows more intently on corrupt office officials and the adverse effects of media. Both of these films have simplistic appliance of rough style and aesthetic that grants a loose leash for a reimagining based off some other novel. The Park is Mine bee-lines a sympathetic TV-MA venture into a disgruntled vet and his second-hand decision to hold Central Park hostage using a series of already-set explosive devices rigged around the perimeter. What could have been a hostile takeover of this disgusting place occupied by degenerate killers and rapists is turned into something you'd expect from your local TNT station. The body count is so incredibly low but features 2 more killings than First Blood. The Park is Mine has one suicide and two cases of self-defense but First Blood had Sly running afoot in a forest crippling and incapacitating crooked police officers but do not fear, The Park is Mine depicts a fashion of low-cost productions that concern themselves on pristine quality - one of the greatest television movies that comes to mind, in fact. Conceitedly so, The Park is Mine centers itself around well-positioned vantages covering both aspects within the park, outside the park, and the public opinion of this vigilante who is working towards something of a meaningful cause. The persona's begin piling up only before exploiting the pigeonholed "corrupt politician" ploy that eventually begins to unravel to the duration of the film leaving a very, very frustrated Tommy Lee Jones with an assault rifle and a fistful of spiteful hand grenades. But remember, he doesn't want to hurt anyone! For some time now, I've been becoming increasingly tired with the preprocessed programming inciting "social commentary." I could just muster enough air for a sigh of relief, thanks the powers that be to see there wasn't a "Racially charged beating of an honest Negro," cause let's face it, there's never an honest one in situations such as these. This is no Die hard, people. A cute and clever Argyle is never something to expect in hazardous situations such as these. Fantastical elements of co-existing cultures don't appear like they do on film and that contributes to the phrase "movie magic." Only in film can you watch the world burn and life prosper in a 4 hour block double billing of Roland Emmerich disaster "classics." To the unkeen eyes, The Park is Mine is a passable production that will entertain occasionally but to someone with a knowledge of antiquities in cinema, you'll find much to appreciate and reflect on as this film abruptly ends leaving that amazing score from Tangerine Dream softly echoing in your skull. This remains one of Tommy Lee Jones' best roles following with The Hunted and Small Soldiers. It's in his vocal ability to both intimidate and inspire. His voice remains one of the greatest in Hollywood and gave much to the title villain in Small Soldiers. Included in this review is the YouTube presentation of this hard-to-find classic of cable productions. It's within your best interest to watch and absorb this film if you favor the sort of First Blood filmmaking that this embraces. Bare in mind, this is no Rambo but The Park is Mine is an important film and should be a lesson to all making a TV movie.

THE PARK IS MINE

THE HORSEMAN

Ah, the fear every father adopts with the arrival of a newborn daughter - that his little angel will turn into an indifferent slut. Steven Kastrissios, a 26 year old first-time director, expresses and sketches similar fears in his ultraviolent "revenge" thriller, The Horseman. Constructed from the opening shot of the explosion of a degenerates home, The Horseman took flight once a short film of the matter was received well in film festivals. Acquiring budget and a further enraged vision, Kastrissios began to slowly stoke the fires under The Horseman, leading to a nice composition of heightening suspense and brutality. The Horseman is also quite a polarizing film, leaving many of the fence with its cruel depictions of humanity. Critics and audience members seem to either laud or loathe the sheer savage nature of this father's massacre as well as his intentions. Obviously titled from the idea of a harbinger of death and destruction but of mortal coil, Christian Forteski only sought solace from the mysterious circumstances of his only daughter's death. But when an anonymous source mails him a pornographic film entitled Young City Sluts and he witnesses his princess, obviously drugged, getting taken advantage of, Christian takes it upon himself to pursue and destroy the indirect attackers of his pride.

First off, you'll instantly notice a strong point of The Horseman is its seamy aesthetic of dimly colored grayscale. The Horseman's color palette mainly consists of shades of gray, complimenting the ashes of his daughter to which he seeks to spread somewhere on this barren and merciless rock. This decision to leave the colors dry and the lighting strong and natural makes for sickening detail to pores, sweat and other bodily fluids. The blood featured in The Horseman isn't bright red gush, rather, inky dark substance, quick to congeal and scab. A strange aspect of Christian's quest is what he seems to be killing towards; his confused motive. One would generally suggest to avenge the death of his daughter, but it doesn't seem to be the case with select scenes playing evidence to a hidden picture. Christian isn't killing for the sake of his deceased daughter - in fact, the only real memories he carries as baggage are flashbacks to her in her purest concentrate - toddler. He doesn't ponder thoughts of the rebellious years as a teenager or even preteen. Christian's wake of bodies is to cover the shame left by this creation of addiction. In desperate times, he even purchases every last copy of the film starring his lovely whore directly from the distributor for the sole purpose of destroying every last copy. Christian seeks out every last phallus that tasted the flesh of his bloodline to eradicate the trace of this smear on his good name. The presentation of the in-film film Young City Sluts is dramatic and dripping with enough fetish to warrant the suffering of the father - no lobotomized precursor to heroin fueled fucking. The Horseman is a very au-thetic experience in depravity, but at the same time, there seems to be no sense in mourning. Jessie is just another case of the father unable to control the wild lusts of his fledgling harlot. Along the way, a female mulatto hitchhiker is given a lift who reminds him of his daughter, though leagues ahead with this thing not common in women called "self-respect". Little does she know that her first-class accommodation is on a vessel that will inevitably lead her into the darkest crevices of desire and murder.

Quite evident of showmanship, The Horseman, like many other films, stutters near the final act with sensationalistic tendencies. What were once murders, individual, powerful, and unsettling, became something of a body count tally as Christian weaves through a compound leaving numerous corpses in his wake. If there could be one inspiration to cite it would assuredly be Joel Schumacher's 8mm - a tale of an investigator tracking down the source of a purported snuff film, though without the premeditation of murder at the hands of a grieving father. The action scenes tend to foster giggles as well, being shot in a very hyperactive fashion as to obscure impact leaving space for the lack of choreography to deceive. When Christian isn't tackling husky men to the ground and miraculously gaining the upper hand on them, he's committing various acts of genital torture. Such household instruments as fishhooks and tire pumps create harrowing expressions of pure agony. The Horseman is raw bodily nihilism with its perverse tortures and savage seduction. To continue the trend of dissecting the few flaws The Horseman carries would be to challenge the inclusion of the hitchhiker, who arguably only stands to be a crutch to cutting, an act of self-mutilation attributed mainly to teenage girls, which leaves Christian with some explaining to do. Ending on a note of helplessness and violation, the act that preceded the final images was above average at best but includes a scene of bone breakage that would leave any grown man wincing. I can't help but to still look up to The Horseman with stars twinkling in my eyes. Regardless of the faults, no blame can be directed as the feature is a debut work and inspired by anger so furiously, that I claw at the arm of my chair in anticipation of conflict.

MUM /& DAD

Steven Sheil (2008)

Using most all of my collective willpower, I had struggled to avoid this British horror film with dread of its contents. Everything about the film rubbed me the wrong way; the teaser poster artwork, the seemingly juvenile minimalism in torture, and even the paunchy lead of 'Dad' - all these played a part in recalculating my course. That is, until, what I had quaked from, happened - Mum & Dad was recommended to me from a source less than trusted but succinct all together. The narrative of Mum & Dad is quite simple; a polish immigrant named Lena works at an airport cleaning with a bubbly and insecure Birdie. This very night, Lena misses her bus ride home (from what we don't realize, an excellent diversion) and is offered a ride home from Birdie, promising that if she accompanies her home, her father can give her a lift home. As obvious as horror can be, once Lena enters the home sweet.. abode and basks in the solitude of silence, no sooner is she hit over the head and fades into obscurity. When awoken, to her horror, Lena discovers the sadistic secret behinds Birdies scars and her brother Elbie's muteness - a pair of possible victims of postpartum depression trapped in a holy communion that kidnaps teenagers and submits them through extreme rehabilitation. When Mum & Dad eventually reaches its peak, and it will, it turns into trite British run-off. The only positive trait the film has that isn't on a superficial level of horror filmmaking (e.g. blood, torture, etc.) is the pair of Mum and Dad; stripped of their flesh - they represent two very different forms of psychosis which really makes for interesting connections.

As far as the torture featured in Mum & Dad goes, endurable entertainment, but if you happened upon this film in hopes for a feather of storytelling, it will not be found in this film. It doesn't appear to be first-time director Steven Sheil's fault. The film of which he striven to break out into the market is so singularly one-dimensional that the 'ingenuity' behind the title is the high point of imagination. Rubbing against the grain of Stockholm syndrome, Mum & Dad boils down into a teenage race for affection from oppressive, aggressive murderous parents. The ambiguity behind the parents and their purported children is something that can be smiled on in the end. Just know that Mum & Dad's weaknesses lie in the hands of both short-sightedness and ultimately weak filmmaking. One of the most enraging aspects of Mum & Dad is the shoddy symbolism embellished by Sheil. The director decided to blend their airport employment ruse with the visual metaphor of freedom by transitioned almost every single scene with a brief clip of an airplane landing whilst creating a sound vacuum. If your television happens to be very fickle with audio presentation, you'll find that the chatter is presented at a low volume, thus you turn up the dial only to have an airplane clip within 5 minutes near blow your ears. Someone really should create a drinking game out of this aspect of Mum & Dad but I fear it would either lead directly to alcoholism or to the morgue - either of which would be a great method of escaping the tyrannical immature clutches of Mum and Dad.

To put it simply, Mum & Dad cannot find it within itself to look past humiliation and scenes of torture followed by words of comfort. Perhaps in some alternate reality this would be enough to appease my sanctioned taste but not this life, not this world. All this is slapped on top of a wholly unsatisfying presentation. Granted, there are highlights of the film which includes things of which my mind has purged in light of the plane tangent. Nevertheless, what occurs within Mum & Dad isn't something you would need to search out in order to personally critique. It represents that blind horror filmmaking that allows you to select any recent film with torture in the tags and keywords just to wind up at the very same conclusion. Mum & Dad has a somewhat of a happy ending, lord only knows the scars inflicted upon poor Lena will never heal and with her emotional baggage in tow, I doubt she will feel trust in women any time in the near future. Then again, who cares? That happens to be the beauty of shallow fiction - as soon as it is absorbed it can be expunged. I don't hate Mum & Dad. I simply just dislike it. If you ever happen to be in the mood for torture lacking fetishistic qualities then I might offer a very slight nod towards its morose presence on a shelf but other than that, I'd suggest looking elsewhere for quality torture and/or storytelling involving the macabre.

THE GOOD GERMAN

I have always found Steven Soderbergh to be an overrated director. He is one of those Hollywood directors that slightly sticks out from the rest of the whorish bunch so he gets massive amounts of artistic credibility. I had yet to see a film from Soderbergh that was thought provoking and warranted serious respect for him as a director until I saw The Good German. I would be lying if I didn't admit that he is a technically competent director who makes well crafted films. Soderbergh's recent film The Good German is a minor Hollywood masterpiece of sorts. The Good German centers around a German Jewish woman who also happens to be the wife of a SS man. Due to the postwar destruction of Germany, she has to sell her enticing goods to U.S. troops to survive. A variety of men become obsessed with her and quickly decide they will do anything for her including putting their lives on the line. George Clooney (who I have always hated) stars as an American journalist who does anything to save the woman. The Good German was filmed in aesthetically pleasing black and white with various real postwar footage scattered throughout. Steven Soderbergh almost perfectly captures the essence and power of Film Noir cinema of past generations. The Good German is more of a tribute to early film noir than it is a Neo Noir. The film's poster art also takes cues from that of Casablanca (which is much more a romance film than film noir). The end of the film is also blatant tribute to the Hollywood centerpiece. The Good German was also inspired by Nazi SS scientist Wernher Von Braun. The actual "good" German in the film is an associate of a SS scientist responsible for inventing special rockets. He's also the husband of the German Jewish prostitute that has caught George Clooney's fancy. Nazi SS scientist Wernher von Braun was primarily responsible for the U.S. landing on the moon. He also was known for employing slave labor during his Nazi years. The Good German is a slick, thrilling, and engulfing film from the most interesting part of history during the last century. It is also a worthy tribute to the original film noir era. I honestly had low expectations for the film originally and now I am considering revisiting Soderbergh's lexicon. I just hope that Soderbergh believes that there's more than one "good" German.

Steven Spielberg* (1981)

Short films have been a recent commodity in my hectic schedule. There is nothing like sitting down for minutes at a time absorbing such potent and ever present emotions that you can't always salvage out of an hour-and-a-half train wreck of a film. Café FX's very own Grzegorz Jonkajtys has used his knowledge of his structured craft to manipulate pixels and textures to create a personal animated barrage of rapid-fire emotions and an apocalyptic tale very dear to my heart.

In a time of an unknown virus which has devastated the human population (Centuries of inter-racial breeding has given us green pigment and Neanderthal facial structures), the last of the human race have piled on an ark which sails the sea's looking for uninhabited land for a new colonization. These foreign chaps always shift the odds of creating a good film out of a tired genre against our land. Many things happen in this film which I would rather not illustrate. The effect of the film is it's own bold statement. Any one else delivering the feel of this film would be a forgery of all that is grand about cinema. 8 minutes is the checkpoint in this shorter-than-short short. Rather than being its own film, he should have gotten it released through Pixar - they've already hit the critical line in their maturity with Geri's Game. Unnerving with a realist's viewpoint, Ark (Arka) is a bold step for a first time director. Stunning animation mixed with cleverly articulated backgrounds super-imposed over-top a magnificent story arc. This is as every bit as epic as one would be led to believe. A highly recommended piece of sensitive, yet corrosive adult animation.

THE COLOR PURPLE

Steven Spielberg* (1985)

The following was something I did for a Feminist film theory class. It should be a good laugh to all:

Black males viewers have denounced the The Color Purple as stereotypical representations of black males. They have stated that it is the most racist film since Birth of a Nation. This has caused a feud between black feminist critics and black male viewers also. Even most left-wing publications have denounced the film. They have stated that the film is misleading in its representations of blacks of that time period. Gay rights groups have also objected to how director Steven Spielberg dealt with Lesbianism in the film.

The wide acceptance of a cultural myth and how it functions as a cultural belief system characterizes as the myth of the exotic primitive. With that, all types of convictions have some sort of mythology working with it. The myth associated with black people are they are naturally childlike, oversexed, and are savages taken from a culture relativity low on the scale of human civilization.

The "subject" differs from the individual in that the individual is a biological being produced by nature. The subject, however, is a social theoretical construction that is used to label individuals in regard to their significance in a political or theoretical sense. The subject is more based on assumption whereas the subject is based on a much more complex view.

The principle of articulation is used to explain how individuals within a particular society at a specific historical moment battle dominate forces in a culture and attain authority over their lives for themselves and for others within their social group. In The Color Purple, the protagonist is constantly fighting such things and finally becomes in complete resistance to her expected position as a black female. The whole story is a battle against a black female's role as a black female. This is why the color purples in a excellent example of the prince of articulation.

The Color Purple can have both a positive and negative oppositional response because its relative to what individual is watching the film. The black female can be proud of the film for its representation of a black woman's strength and courage. A black male can look at it as stereotype black males as dictating and oversexed wife beaters. With that, the white viewer can see it as a myth that works on their own myths. The film is relative to whatever background you come from.

Hook

Steven Spielberg* (1991)

What if Peter Pan grew old? Steven Spielberg invites you into a wonderful world in which this can actually happen. I'm not partial to Spielberg's filmography at all. I've enjoyed a few films here and there. Hook is without a doubt, one of the greatest live-action children's films ever made. Many may hail other films as being more entertaining or more appealing to this generation, but none will ever capture the emotional intensity of Hook. Robin Williams plays Peter Banning, a lawyer who cannot donate much of his time to his eager family. After Captain Hook (A wonderful Dustin Hoffman) kidnaps his children, Banning must go back to Never Never Land and learn how to crow again with his rowdy group of Lost Boys if he wants to see his family again. I'm not too prepossessed on the myth and facts of pirates. I find it to be an annoying Y2K fad which consists of the Internet youth group drooling over Ninja's vs. Pirates. Dante Basco is the star at hand here. He plays the skunk-haired misfit named Rufio. In this loose adaption of the classic tale, they created many new and wondrous things about it that are as engaging as can be. The key phrase "BANGARANG" or the powers of blue custard and the imagination. Many adventures are had as this desk jockey gets trained by fly, fight, crow, and make jokes. An adventure featuring seductive mermaids and a rascal pack of kids (Neanderthal Lord of the Flies) highlighted by the joyful, obese black kid whose pivotal role is rolling down a ramp, creating a classic punchline for fat people all around the world. The pirates are all book-stereotypes of "ARGH"-ing all the time and being drunk and belligerent. The "Boo Box" scene actually horrified me when I was a child. The swordplay in the film is disappointingly sub-par. Much of the film features amazing visual effects but is occasionally bogged down by the slow motion melon flying at his head. Hook could be treated as a sequel to a story, which would go down as the greatest sequel in history. Death lingers in this story, and so does mischief. I doubt your kids would watch this and not have any conniving ideas to torture you with tricks and games. This is no Cutthroat Island - a film that had one of the biggest reported budgets ever which also created the biggest box office flop in history. Despite the director or the star, Hook is a marvel. I enjoy the occasional film directed by a hack. It just happens that way. One example could be me enjoying Michael Bay's Transformers. Hook is the greatest Fairy Tale story ever put to film. Dear god, please bring Rufio back.

WAR OF THE WORLDS

Steven Spielberg* (2005) If there is two things that are over-played, It's disaster films and remakes. I lost count long ago how many times I've seen Earth destroyed. It's a boring fashion for Hollywood directors to squeeze their itchy CGI finger. Armageddon, The Core, The Day After Tomorrow, Cloverfield, Independence Day, etc, etc. I could fill a novel with the title's and a brief synopsis of every disaster film. Finally, yet crudely, a film takes the worst of both film spectrum's, and brought forth a beautiful piece from an ugly cocoon. I never though I'd say this during the millenia, but Bravo Mr. Spielberg. Based on a myriad of various related works (I.E: Novel, Shorts, Radio Plays, Television Shows), Spielberg has crafted the bastard child of the series but somehow stands above the rest. His apocalyptic vision has even succeeded into making me fear the unknown and that is most likely what he was aiming for. Tom Cruise is an All-American construction worker who loves Baseball cause he is American. Don't worry, his cliché's don't stick long. Soon he's stuck with his two kids as he attempts to fit in and play the father figure. His "punk rebel" kid steals his car while moping and listening to his mp3 player. I hate this generation's youth, eve more, I hate this generation's youth captured on film. These senile directors love to exaggerate their every action and making them seem like scum who eventually breaks into a polished, disciplined gentleman. His daughter is a screaming girl who has to have a handicap to slow down their adventure; as if trying to stay alive in the midst of an alien invasion wasn't enough of an obstacle. Many reasons why this version of War of the Worlds is looked down upon is the family drama. I admit, I hate Dakota Fanning and I hate these kids and all the bullshit morals. In fact, I wanted Tom Cruise to punch his Ex-Wife in the face on several occasions. I can see him roundhouse kicking his daughter in the face, this being a prelude to that wonderful scene in The Wicker Man. (Remake) More remakes need extreme misogyny. One thing that sticks out of this film is the actual chaos depicted. When the streets crack, people are curious. When things get worse, people go ballistic. People push and shove their way home. All the meanwhile, a menacing tripod unearths itself from the earth to create violence and a whole new "Red" planet to harvest their vegetation. It's easy to see the social commentary implanted within the film as it illustrates various Cannibal Holocaust quotes within the 21st Century. Moral of the Story: Men become monsters when pushed to the edge. No film is complete without the subtlety of a nice suburb, and of course, it's only right to show man's safest zone being completely under attack and ravaged. A crashed plane? C'mon Spielberg. That's a bit much. With any post-9/11 disaster film, you're going to hear the word "terrorists" once, and oh boy, will you groan. These scenes of worldwide destruction are simply breathtaking. Spielberg exploits the death of billions of humans and man made creations for the "ooh's and ah's" of his viewers. What a fine specimen of humanity! Although, I'm not complaining. The fine detail that went into the actual sets, such as the rubble, is flawless. Each individual rock, pebble, piece of metal, or debris seems as if that is where it fits or blasted to. This film is patriotic horror at it's finest. While the attacks are happening else where, we really don't care. When we see our flags burning and our beer being blown up, it pulls a tear duct into a rage fit. Rural citizen Tim Robbins accepts Tom Cruise into his home for shelter, only to be murdered by the city fellow for trying to dig a hole. While insanity is never a good thing, I still see Cruise as being an unjustified midget. I guess anarchy brings out the best in citizens. The aliens of the film come in two forms. The fleshy version and the tripod vehicular husk that lurches all around with its powder beam. The fleshy creatures are curious individuals who resemble the ID4 aliens and enjoy participate in the cliché "Hiding behind an object only to have the enemy lean really close to it, smelling." (For an example on this, recall The Fellowship of the Rings, in which the Ring Wraiths did the exact same move.) The tripods are a wonderful invention of Spielberg's staff's part. These are menacing titans of unstoppable power. The acting from Cruise's side is frankly amazing. His role as an alien-killing American is very contradictory to his Scientologist beliefs. I wonder if Xenu is frowning from space right now. You really can't doubt the Scientology-forced views considering the role of Ray was written for Cruise. Much of his insanity can be clearly foreshadowed in the blissful insanity erupting from his eyes during his heartfelt reunion with his douche son. This film marks many things in modern cinema. For one, the beginning of Spielberg's rise to the top and ironically, also his downfall. Spielberg doesn't cross my radar anymore. Jaws was a triumph and with a few exceptions, everything else is horrible. This is a powerful and almost traumatizing view at a ravaged United States of America narrated by none other than Morgan Freeman. This comes highly recommended for any fan of science-fiction or horror.

TAMMY AND THE T-REX

Stewart Raffill (1994)

Once in a blue moon, modern cinema will purge all normalities and excrete on the idea of a mercy rule to what films should be green lit. Out of this chaos erupts what is known as a "sleeper hit" and with this holy grail of cinema does film academia find itself a barren oasis. Film making techniques can no longer benefit society. The only thing left is a flourishing vat of knowledge called Tammy and the T-Rex. From this experience, you will gain gusto and marvel at subversive techniques at creating homosexual tension and race discrimination once more. It's once again cool to laugh at the queers as you watch a black, gay, only child get mocked by his father's deputies warning each other not to drop anything. Think Carnosaur with a touch of sexually charged Howard the Duck moments. This divine interaction of both man and machine warrants a strict emotional hard hat zone. From the mental concept of Tammy and the T-Rex, the words "Hallmark" and "ABC Family" spring immediately to mind. Furthermore, you'd be a damn fool to expect a family friendly environment from this film. Soon into the film's precious running time, you're treated to excessive homophobia and a mock Kwanzaa enthusiast. Before you have time to catch your breath from the colorful, yet subversive hate speech you are soon catapulted into a "testicular standoff" with a young Paul Walker wearing a crop-top and a virtually unknown George Pilgrim. After seeing this scene, we begin to make conjectures as to why Mr. Pilgrim had such a short acting career. The answer? He couldn't handle the immense popularity he no doubt received from starring in this dinosaur arthouse experiment. Who's awesome? You're awesome! Seen here, Paul Walker was an early example of motion capture technology. As you see Walker-Rex awkwardly waddle down a green screened street, it's easy to imagine Paul Walker making these same awkward movements especially if you've seen his long jump in the new Fast & the Furious trailer pre-Soulja Boy version. If any of this were the truth, Paul Walker would had to of had his shins bludgeoned with a nail bat in order to recreate the painful movements created by the animatronic crew. Mechanical puppeteers have never before been witnessed to create accidental art other than in the case of Tammy and the T-Rex. Before I get carried away on the royal excellence of many subjects advocated in this trash piece, allow me first to alleviate confusion that I've caused with this review of a grandiose opera. Paul Walker is the rebound bitch to a young Denise Richards. Her ex-boyfriend doesn't like this very much so one night he kidnaps Paul Walker and leaves him in a wild animal reserve to be mauled by a lion. Enter mad scientist Dr. Wachenstein who hatches a plan to burgle Paul Walker's brain to transplant it into a mechanical T-Rex. After awaking to find himself in the body of a Tyrannosaurus Rex, Walker-Rex decides to get his girlfriend to help him find his body. Also, Dinosaurs dialing pay phones. Knowing what you know about the contents within this explosive package, do you find yourself brave enough to have your expectations blown out of the water? I didn't, in fact, I walked into this film with no knowledge of the synopsis other than an image of Denise Richards straddling a Mesozoic creature with her infamous grin that shocked fanboys alike with her performance in Starship Troopers. In case you haven't seen Starship Troopers, Denise Richards plays the "piteous bitch" who broke Johnny Rico's heart. While Tammy and the T-Rex unfolded, I found the many thematic twists and turns to be utterly shocking. So many scenes with differing emotional weights do nothing but leave you in a constant state of sensitized whiplash. With my final words approaching, the viable labels for placing this film in a specific genre could be range from anything. For instance, Tammy and the T-Rex could be the greatest and only contemporary film noir with dinosaurs. Tammy and the T-Rex reminds us exactly why the moving image was created and crafted into the largest form of entertainment today. This is a film that will throw some light romance at you, mix in some gang violence, pop out some premature urban humor, and then ravage the light-hearted mood with a botched castration via T-Rex foot. Some people beg to reveal to thyself the meaning of life. I, however, find myself asking what the meaning of cinema is. Well, my friends, the meaning of cinema is Tammy and the T-Rex. This is dutifully illustrated by the scene following a fight in which Denise Richards lets out a guttural wail that sounds as if a Yeti throat fucked her upon birth. I have long awaited the eventual reinvention and postmodern prototype of the directorial process and this is it, no strings attached...cause it's animatronic. Get it?

A very special thanks goes out to Nachtraaf for uploading this beauty.

Stuart Gordon (1985)

Probably no writer's work has been more raped, defiled, bastardized, and stolen from (indeed, who knows how many budding horror hacks have adapted his work without attribution) than that of Anglo-American master of horror H.P. Lovecraft, who would also be rolling in his grave if he knew that his work was so reluctantly liked by deep-voiced trannies, morbidly obese cosplay pansies, and pathologically pierced ethno-masochistic communist hipsters and also so thoroughly emulated, albeit very poorly, by emotionally crippled multiculturalist dork writers that have been 'influenced' by the monstrous literary universe known as the Cthulhu Mythos. While this might sound like some sort of sick exaggeration, the unintentionally dejecting doc Lovecraft: Fear of the Unknown (2008) directed by Frank H. Woodward makes it quite clear that the majority of Lovecraft's would-be literary disciples are loathsome losers that violently reject many of the Cthulhu Mythos maestro's defining qualities. Indeed, despite the fact that Lovecraft was a mostly humorless and seemingly sexless racist that was heavily inspired by the writing of Teutonic prophet and philosopher of Occidental decline, Oswald Spengler, and was also inspired to write some of his greatest stories after temporarily living in the wretched multicultural east coast hellhole, Red Hook, New York City, wherein he was left totally disgusted by all the swarthy untermenschen and racially dubious mystery meat that inhabited the area, various horror hacks have decided to add goofy, irreverent humor, less than sexy gratuitous sex and nudity, curiously cliché anti-puritan messages, and cheap gore when cinematically adapting his stories while completely excising them of any seriousness and truly Lovecraftian themes like cultural pessimism and the complete collapse of civilizations as a direct result of multiculturalism and miscegenation. A perfect example of this pathetic phenomenon is Re-Animator (1985) directed and co-written by Stuart Gordon (The Pit and the Pendulum, King of the Ants) and produced by fellow horror hack/Lovecraft-defiler Brian Yuzna (Society, Return of the Living Dead III), which is loosely based on Lovecraft's short Frankenstein parody Herbert West—Reanimator (1922), albeit with an updated setting, and which is (in)famous for a scene of the undead decapitated head of a puritanical WASP doctor briefly performing cunnilingus on a nubile young blonde while said nubile young blonde's zombie father watches on. Of course, as a zombie-comedy, horror homage, and extra loose Frankenstein reworking, Gordon's film is quite fun and certainly one of the best films of its kind, but it has about as much to do with the spirit of Lovecraft as Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), Saving Private Ryan (1998), and Lincoln (2012) have to do with historical fact.

Gordon's ultimately auspicious directorial debut, Re-Animator, was originally intended as a somewhat serious gritty 16mm semi-avant-garde work to be shot on stage at the director and his wife's Organic Theater company (indeed, somewhat surprisingly, Gordon started out founding and managing a series of theaters, including the counter-culture-themed Screw Theater where he directed a degenerate hippie reworking of Peter Pan featuring nudity and acid trips that got him arrested, as well as a somewhat serious Chicago-based theater that was responsible for premiering David Mamet's Off-Off-Broadway play Sexual Permissivity in Chicago), but the serious theater actors there were having none of that, so the filmmaker had to rethink the project and after meeting budding producer Brian Yuzna, he was convinced to make the film in Hollywood. Using much of the crew of James Cameron's The Terminator (1984) and using no less than 25 gallons of fake blood, Gordon, much like a mad scientist, assembled an unhinged and out-of-control monster of a movie that attempted to outdo George A. Romero, Wes Craven, and Abel Ferrara's Driller Killer (1979), while also paying homage to Alfred Hitchcock (indeed, Full Moon Features Führer Charles Band's brother Richard's opening score 'borrows' heavily from Bernard Herrmann's iconic score from Hitchcock's 1960 masterpiece Psycho) and, to a lesser extent, Stanley Kubrick. Arguably the greatest slapstick splatter-fest since Sam Raimi's The Evil Dead (1981), Re-Animator is proof that you can take the Yid out of vaudeville but not the vaudeville out of the Yid.

At University of Zurich Institute of Medicine in Switzerland, a young medical student named Herbert West (played by Jeffrey Combs, who would go on to star in virtually all of Gordon's other films)—an uptight and obnoxiously obsessive megalomaniac that might suffer from Asperger syndrome and seems to be a parody of H.P. Lovecraft (incidentally, Combs would later play the Weird Tales master in the 1993 horror omnibus film H.P. Lovecraft's: Necronomicon, which was co-produced and co-directed by producer Brian Yuzna)—successfully reanimates his dead teacher, Dr. Gruber (Al Berry), with a neon green corpse-reanimating serum, but since the undead professor was given too large of a dose, his eyes start popping out and he dies a second horrible death only seconds later (or as one doctor states with a pseudo-Germanic accent, "er ist tot"). All of this is witnessed by the staff of the institute, with one doctor accusing West of murdering Gruber, to which the novice mad scientist definitely replies, "No, I did not. I gave him life." Ironically, West got a lot of his ideas from Dr. Gruber, but he must leave the more sophisticated and experimental schools of the German-speaking world for backwards Miskatonic University in New England due to the whole disastrous botched corpse-reanimating incident in Zurich. Upon relocating to New England, West rents a room in the home of his virtual opposite, fellow medical student Dan Cain (Bruce Abbott of Bad Dreams (1998) and Bride of Re-Animator (1990)), who is a kind and caring young man on a medical scholarship who plans to marry his beautiful blonde fiancée Meg Halsey (scream queen Barbara Crampton) once he gets his MD. Meg is the daughter of the dean of the medical school, Alan Halsey (Robert Sampson), who his daughter describes as “the world’s last living Puritan” and who has a grudge against Dan since he is banging his daughter. Dean Halsey is a comrade of hack professor Dr. Carl Hill (British screen villain David Gale) and on the first day of class, Herbert West accuses his theories of being derivative of Dr. Gruber’s theories from the 1970s, adding, “in fact, it’s so derivative that it would be considered plagiarism in Europe.” Dr. Hill lets West know that it will be a pleasure failing him. Little do both men know that they will later be involved in a deadly zombie game involving corpse-based cunt-chomping, killer intestines, and headless servants.

A rather normal young lady who enjoys sneaking over to her boyfriend’s house to have passionate orgasms with a film poster for the experimental Talking Heads documentary Stop Making Sense (1984) directed by Jonathan Demme hanging over her beau’s bed and who dreams of living a simple life in suburbia with her boyfriend involving a white picket fence and 2.5 kids, Meg rightfully immediately becomes unnerved by Herbert West’s presence and when her cute little black kitty cat goes missing, she immediately suspects the glaringly strange medical student. Upon investigation, Meg finds Rufus’ corpse in a refrigerator in the basement of the house, which West has turned into a makeshift lab. Of course, West walks in on Meg’s discovery and threatens to tell Dean Halsey about Dan’s carnal excursions with his daughter. That night, Dan wakes from a nightmare and after hearing some noise in the basement, heads down there with a baseball bat to investigate, only to find West being attacked by a zombie cat in a superlatively schlocky slapstick scene. After they kill the killer kitty, West once again reanimates its completely crippled corpse to prove to Dan that his neon green serum has the power to reanimate the dead. Finally convinced of West’s seemingly unbelievable claims, Dan goes to Dean Halsey with the discovery, which is promptly rewarded with his scholarship being rescinded, potential criminal charges, and the demand that he write a formal letter of apology. As for West, he is expelled from the school. Of course, Dean Halsey’s actions are clouded by his anger regarding the fact that Dan is ostensibly defiling his daughter. Unable to continue school without his scholarship, Dan becomes determined to prove the soundness of his wackjob roommate’s wild theories, so he sneaks West into the university morgue and they foolishly decide to reanimate the largest and most muscular corpse there. Of course, Halsey goes to stop them and is killed when the corpse, ‘Melvin the Re-Animated’ (played by Arnold Schwarzenegger’s personal stuntman, stand-in, and friend Peter Kent), goes berserk, knocks down a door, grabs the Dean, bites off some of his fingers, and slams him around until he is dead. Trapped in a precarious situation that can result in murder charges, West naturally comes up with the idea to reanimate Dean Halsey’s corpse, which immediately attacks him and Dan just as Meg walks in. West accuses Halsey, who is now in a terribly confused retarded zombie state, of going insane and attacking them, so the undead dickhead dean is put in a padded cell and observed by his ostensible friend Dr. Hill, who has him lobotomized and eventually comes to the conclusion that he is dead, thus causing him to realize that his much hated ex-student has found a way to reanimate the dead.

When Dr. Hill, who is ultimately the real villain of Re-Animator (and not Herr West as the viewer suspects during the first half of the film), goes by Herbert West's basement lab to blackmail him for his reanimating serum and research, stating, "I'll have you locked up as a mad man...or a murderer," things get a bit complicated between the old fraud and the young genius. Needless to say, West would never allow for his extensive research on his favorite subject to be stolen by an arrogant old fart that does not have a single original idea of his own, so he hits Dr. Hill over the head with a shovel and subsequently decapitates him with it. Of course, West decides to reanimate Dr. Hill's decapitated head, but also makes the mistake of reanimating the corpse, which the prick professor manages to be able to control when he is reanimated. Using his own body as his evil henchman, Dr. Hill has it sneak up behind West while he is taking notes and knock him unconscious. After stealing West's serum and research, Dr. Hill has his body carry his head back to his office where he studies the groundbreaking theories of reanimation. Using mind control techniques, Dr. Hill also turns undead Dean Halsey into his own personal slave and has him kidnap his own daughter Meg and bring her back to the university morgue where he has created a heinous yet rather retarded lobotomized zombie army using an eclectic collection of morgue corpses, including an ashy negro and a grotesque obese bitch (who, unfortunately, is not the only unclad lard ass lady featured in the film). When zombie Halsey comes back with Meg, Dr. Hill has her stripped completely naked, put on an operating table, and, in the most infamous part of the movie, the "head giving head" scene (which Gordon has dubiously described as the "world's first visual pun"), the debauched decapitated head performs cunnilingus on her for a split second while her undead daddy mindlessly watches on. While Dr. Hill is in the middle of giving head, West storms in and Dan soon frees his girlfriend while the animated head is distracted. From there, Dr. Hill reveals his brigade of brazen lobotomized corpses, who he uses mind control to attack his enemies. Luckily, lobotomized zombie Dean Halsey has enough human memory to hear his daughter Meg's pleas and responds by fighting off the multicultural zombie gang and by crushing Dr. Hill's head, which thwarts his mind control powers. West also gets the bright idea to inject Dr. Hill's body with an overdose of the reanimating serum, though his plan backfires and the headless corpse's intestines wrap around him and begin to kill the young mad scientist, who pleads to Dan to save his research. Dan does what West tells him to do, which ultimately seems to be quite auspicious as Meg is soon strangled to death by a burnt zombie, so it gives the grieving boyfriend an opportunity to revive his girlfriend. When Dan and his fellow doctors fail to resuscitate Meg the normal way, the shattered beau uses West's green juice, thus causing the undead dame to wake up screaming. Needless to say, Dan is not the sort of the guy to partake in necrophilia.

As you can expect from any successful (and oftentimes less than successful) horror flick, Re-Animator was followed by two watchable yet innately inferior sequels, Bride of Re-Animator (1990) and Beyond Re-Animator (2003), both of which were directed by producer Brian Yuzna and once again starring Jeffrey Combs as Herbert West. Director Stuart Gordon has also, not unlike Yuzna, practically created a career out of directing super schlocky and uniquely unfaithful Lovecraft adaptations, which include the films From Beyond (1986), Castle Freak (1995), and Dagon (2001), as well as the Masters of Horror episode Dreams in the Witch-House (2005) and a musical version of Re-Animator entitled Re-Animator: The Musical (2011) that he produced, co-wrote, and directed on Broadway. Unquestionably, I am somewhat of a reluctant fan of Re-Animator and, as a fan of punk/deathrock music and unclad punk-goth girls dancing on tombstones, I considered The Return of the Living Dead (1985) directed by Alien (1979) writer Dan O'Bannon (who, incidentally, also directed The Resurrected (1991) aka Scatterbrain, which is a surprisingly faithful adaptation of the Lovecraft story The Case of Charles Dexter Ward) infinitely superior and much more re-watchable. Personally, I can never forgive Gordon for sanitizing Lovecraft's work and making it absurdly silly and ridden with spastic scatological slapstick routines and incredibly unsexy gratuitous nudity and moronic gore. As a Hebraic ex-hippie, it should also be no surprise that when he directed Stuck (2007)—a film based on a repugnant real-life incident where a nasty meta-negligent negro named Chante Mallard hit a homeless white man, Greg Biggs, with her car while high on marijuana, ecstasy and alcohol, thus leaving his body lodged halfway through her windshield and parked inside her garage before the poor forsaken man bled to death and his corpse was disposed of in a park by the cunty culprit and her bastard beau—Gordon opted for changing the race of the rather revolting villain from black to white, with a wiggerized and miscegenation-practicing Mena Suvari absurdly playing the role modeled after a bloated butch negress.

In Re-Animator, Gordon—a racially conscious man not unlike his Zionist comrade David Mamet (whose politically incorrect 1982 one-act play Edmond Gordon cinematically adapted in 2005) who proudly received a belated Bar Mitzvah in 1997 and who staged Howard Schwartz's Hebraic horror anthology Kabalah: Scary Jewish Stories in 1999 in an attempt to get in touch with his Jewish roots—makes it blatantly clear what he thinks of WASPs (aka the American majority), as they are all almost unanimously depicted as outmoded puritans, scheming psychopaths, and hyper hypercritical crypto-perverts (notably, in the audio commentary for the Anchor Bay DVD release of the film, Gordon describes actor Robert Sampson as resembling a Republican spokesman for Ronald Reagan). After all, how else can one explain why Jewess Pauline Kael—an intolerably pretentious film critic who was largely responsible for promoting anti-establishment films that undermined both the mores and morale of American's white Christian majority—would give the film puffery-plagued praise, even absurdly describing it as “pop Buñuel” in her review. Notably, Gordon also revealed that he originally intended to hire what he described a “blond Aryan type” to play the role of Herbert West but was so impressed with Jeffrey Combs' that he decided otherwise. Unquestionably, National Socialist era auteur Frank Wisbar (who directed the Nazi era classic expressionist horror flick Fährmann Maria (1936) starring tragic Teutonic diva Sybille Schmitz) would have made a more fitting adaptor of Lovecraft's work. Like his kosher comrade Walter Kaufmann has done with Friedrich Nietzsche, Gordon has virtually devoted his entire career to warping and Judaizing the work of an Aryan master (or as the late great Jonathan Bowden described him, an “Aryan mystic”). Aside from Gordon, it seems that all so-called ‘Cthulhu Mythos’ writers (aka Lovecraft wannabes) and various other novelists and filmmakers inspired by Lovecraft spend most of their time complaining about how much of a racist he was as demonstrated by shitty documentaries like Lovecraft: Fear of the Unknown (2008) where a bunch of these slave-morality-ridden hacks complain about the perfectly logical, albeit now unfashionable and unpopular thoughts of the great Aryan master of horror and fantasy. What none of these hopeless morons seem to get is that racialism and anti-miscegenation sentiments are an innate and imperative attribute of Lovecraft's work and—as fellow anti-leftist Michel Houellebecq noticed in his excellent text H. P. Lovecraft: Against the World, Against Life (1991)—the true source for the “poetic trance” quality of his greatest stories.

More recently, a group of rather resentful and mostly nonwhite untermenschen commie fantasy and sci-fi novelists lead by people like Brooklyn-based mestizo would-be-writer Daniel José Older (who no one ever heard of until he started the pathetic petition), English neo-Trotskyite hipster dork China Miéville (who Modern Library Classics absurdly got to write the introduction for their 2005 edition of Lovecraft's Spenglerian novella At the Mountains of Madness: The Definitive Edition just so he could complain about how much of a big racist meanie the writer was) and Nigerian-American Nnedi Okorafor (who dubiously won the award in 2011 in what one might describe as a case of crypto-affirmative-action) have attempted to gain unwarranted attention for themselves to the point of actually somehow receiving support from the mainstream media by demanding that the World Fantasy Awards award for ‘Lifetime Achievement,’ a goofy caricature bust of H. P. Lovecraft, be replaced with the unsightly mug of no-talent hack Octavia E. Butler—an Afrocentric negress that is best known for her postmodern Afrofuturist racial polemics (which only have superficial sci-fi trappings and hardly feature a distinct and revolutionary literary universe like Lovecraft's work) who is not even worthy of smelling the Aryan alpha-horror writer's postmortem farts and whose less than beauteous appearance would have certainly inspired one of the beasts from the Providence-based wordsmith's Cthulhu Mythos (not to mention the fact that most sci-fi and fantasy fans could care less about Butler's work and she would already be totally forgotten by now were it not for the fact that she was a race-hustling far-leftist who is adored by soulless establishment academic types). With that being said, it would certainly be poetic justice if someone reanimated Lovecraft Re-Animator-style so he can seek good old fashion Anglo-Saxon revenge against his hordes of thankless ex-colonial defilers. If anything is for sure, it is that, while Older, Miéville, Okorafor, and Butler will be forgotten in a couple decades (not that any of them is really that famous now), Lovecraft, whose writings have influenced everything from psychedelic rock bands to left-hand path based religions to some of the best horror films ever made, will still be looked at centuries from now as one of the greatest and most revolutionary writers that the horror genre has ever produced.

Above: Stuart 'The Poor Man's John Landis' Gordon curiously sporting an Adolf Hitler 'European Tour' t-shirt. As for Gordon's Re-Animator, while I think that it is an abject disgrace to the Lovecraftian Weltanschauung and everything Lovecraft stood for during his all-too-brief and all-too-human life, it still makes for a great, if not majorly misleading, philistine introduction to the Weird Tales maestro's singular oeuvre. Indeed, I, for one, owe credit to Gordon's film for introducing me to the wonderful of H.P. Lovecraft, so I will always have a slight soft-spot for it. When it comes down to it, Re-Animator is probably best described as an absurdly ludicrous Lovecraftsploitation flick as directed by a man who probably has more of an interest in reading from the works of Norman Mailer and Philip Roth and the Talmud than from the Necronomicon. After all, Gordon has done a hell of a job getting blonde Shiksas to disrobe for him for his schlocky cinematic works, with Re-Animator probably being the most notable example of this. Certainly, one can never forget a uniquely unhinged zombie flick where an undead head gives head to a blonde Nordic beauty.

Stuart Gordon (1987)

Dolls is a very peculiar antique from horror maestro Stuart Gordon. This film saturates the screen with horror "no-no's" and comes out on top victorious and blood-soaked. There was a boom in the 80's consisting of rental dominator's. This little genre was Toy horror. Not limited to: Puppets, Dolls, Toys, Dummies, and many many more. Dolls is a film that I have always meant to see, but time was of a factor when I was in high school. I finally devoted an hour and 17 minutes to watching this film and I was pleasantly surprised. I went in expecting a moronic debut of drivel wrapped tight around a story that drives people (like me) giddy in ecstasy. I wasn't kidding when I said I loved killer toy films. There's this essence lurking amongst the idea that a child's vice could have "killer" psychological side-effects. Dolls follows the same formulaic response to weary travelers that most of the genre seem to encompass. Picture this; A couple with a child is broke down outside an old house, they go in to find creepy old people that are immensely hospitable. Soon, the party van arrives with more victi-err..., more guests for the fun night that never seems to end, which is a recurring line in this film. "The longest night" Dolls has certainly created a kind eye towards horror. Dolls went as far to inspire Sprackling's cult horror-comedy Funny Man (or at least I assume.) The main doll of Dolls is named Mr. Punch (A jester doll) and is later called a "Funny Man" which, 2+1 = obvious. The cast is quite alarming when you're first introduced. You have Ralph, the hero man-child. Judy, the heart-warming child in distress, and our very favorite Guy Rolfe aka Andre Toulon. Dolls is an effective horror film that features a fairy tale like environment that eventually culminates into that creepy house where endless deaths occur. The shining light here isn't the actors, creepy casio themes, or the setting, but rather the amazing special effects consisting of masterful stop-motion animation. I can imagine the crew spending endless hours capturing every detail flawlessly to create that fluid movement that was only evident in the first Puppet Master. The ending of Dolls, to me, is the happiest ending I've ever seen. Every one of the vicious parasites was exterminated and added to a mausoleum of horror while the two survivors hint towards a possible future and family together. This wasn't the happy scene, the real show-stealer was the fact that the "villains" happened to harbor a beautiful philosophy and managed to seem so nice. Truly a pair of more memorable movie maniacs. This films scare factor hasn't aged so well. Only Isabel's death managed to unnerve me a bit. That "Dollman" scene from Child's Play 2 still manages to freak the fuck out of me. Dolls is a very surprising find for me. It's a killer doll film that has some artistic integrity hiding behind the script. This film's a keeper. From now on, I'll be glad to sleep in a room full of "antiki" dolls.

Stuart Gordon (2005)

Don't judge a film by its DVD artwork cover. Edmond is easily the most inventive and best film directed by Stuart Gordon since Re-Animator. I must say, however, that more credit probably goes to the writer of the film David Mamet. One cannot also forget that the casting for the film was quite appropriate. Mena Suvari as a whore and Julia Stiles as a stupid cunt make for great small roles. The character of Edmond is also played by the very annoying William H. Macy. He is the right man to play a character whose night only gets worse and worse as it progresses. David Mamet thankfully forgot about political correctness when writing Edmond. The character of Edmond encounters a variety of slick talkin' Negro swindlers, less than savory whores, and the anti-human atmosphere of the urban jungle. Edmond is fed up with his boring life and not so pleasing wife. Early in the film, Edmond leaves his wife for good and finds out that his life really can get worse. Edmond encounters a man that looks to be Sicilian-American in a bar and they agree that black men have it good because they have no responsibility. By the end of Edmond, the title character finds out what it truly means to have a "simple" life. Julia Stiles hasn't been getting very good roles since Save The Last Dance for obvious reasons. Her role in Edmond couldn't have been better and her final scene in the movie finally made a "man" of William H. Macy. Edmond proves that he can do more damage to a girl with his WW1 knife than he can with his own member. He has sort of an accident with the knife that will cost him his freedom and force him to share a room with a domineering Negro. Edmond proves that Charles Manson is NOT the only prison philosopher! Edmond is the perfect film to watch during the night. The film transports the viewer to a place of degeneracy without bodily injury and loss of possessions. Seeing how someone like Edmond fairs in the more shady areas of the city offers an unpredictable journey that does not get boring upon re-watching of the film. For once, in a film featuring William H. Macy, I didn't hope for his character to somehow spontaneously combust.

Stuart Gordon (2007)

Stuart Gordon is the maestro of murder behind Fortress, Re-Animator, Edmond, and Dolls. His short resume can be summed up into quality horror and suspense films. Edmond was a penetrating view into a man whose mental state plummeted in an array of stylized violence and madness. He takes a bit of those personal emotions evident in Edmond and sticks them into Stuck - the story of something almost normal happening and escalating into the insane. Stuck is primarily based off a true story with some fictitious elements thrown in the mix. A nurse (Mena Suvari) specializing in senior citizen care gets offered a promotion to NA Captain. A parallel plot line is introduced by a man named Tom. After his company downsized, he was left without a job and eventually became homeless. After a horrible day when luck shined the other way, these characters meet when drug-induced Partying up one night, Brandi takes a hit of ecstasy and drinks alcohol. On the drive home, she hits poor Tom, sticking him right in the windshield, and drives home. She doesn't tell anyone that a man is stuck in her windshield and tells no one. As you can imagine, still being alive, survive is the only thing on Tom's mind and he will at all costs. Stuck takes the best attributes of all horror films and stirs them together. We have cringe-inducing scenes of small glass fragments stuck in Academy Award winner Stephen Rea's sides and we have nerve-wracking suspense as he struggles to get attention while once normal Brandi is struggling against a frequent downfall as her relationship to thug Rashid, her job, and her friendships are challenged. Many objects of Stuck can be considered racial "fattening" of the film. When we later meet Rashid, he climbs out of his SUV while blaring rap music. As the camera pans away from the vehicle, the scene shifts only to focus on the Cadillac symbol. Unintentional? I beg to differ. We then have the little Mexican kid who finds the man in the garage wriggling free. When he tells his parents, they refuse to call the police for fear of being deported. Humorous? Yes. Racial driven? Of course. Along the way, Stuart Gordon belittles blacks, Mexicans, and homosexuals. Truth be told, I wouldn't have it any other way. Stuck is a marvelous little film that had a limited theatrical run courtesy by Image Entertainment and THINKfilm. After this stint, no doubt it will recede into rental chains only to sadly be passed up. Rather than spend too much time predicting the fate of this gem, I'd recommend this film if you fancy macabre films in which people burn for their sins. Films like Stuck make me glad we have the self-defense clause. It's like a license to kill, but more satisfying.

PRISONER OF PARADISE

Stuart Sender (2003)

Various trashy films have been made about evil sadistic Nazis on exotic deserted islands ranging from Ken Wiederhorn's somewhat inordinate Nazi zombie flick Shock Waves (1977) to the unintentionally wacky kraut WiP flick Die Insel der blutigen Plantage (1983) aka The Island of the Bloody Plantation directed by Fassbinder superstar Kurt Raab and starring various other Fassbinder superstars like Barbara Valentin and Peter Kern as evil neo-Nazi prison guards who torture and molest poor nubile Filipino girls for sport, but probably none of these films is as patently ridiculous and horribly 'Hollywood-esque' as the relatively big budget hardcore porn flick Prisoner of Paradise (1980) aka Nazi Love Island aka Nassau starring porn chic era legends John C. Holmes aka 'Johnny Wadd' and platinum blonde gutter diva Seka (Dracula Sucks, Ultra Flesh). Ostensibly co-directed by supposed female pornographer Gail Palmer and Chinese-American Bob Chinn (who was responsible for directing the 'Johnny Wadd' series that made Holmes famous), the film was actually co-directed by the latter and a singularly scummy fellow by the name of Harry Mahoney, who is probably best known as the founder of the company Déjà Vu which owns and operates 132 different strip clubs around the United States. Indeed, it was later revealed by various credible sources (including playwright Peter Sagal, who was contracted to ghost-write a still unpublished book for her) that Palmer, who was originally a Playboy playmate, never actually directed any of the films she was credited and that she was merely a front for her mob-backed porn distributor/producer boyfriend Mahoney, who ghost-directed the flicks for her (in fact, in 1984 Palmer sued him for not giving her any of the profits for the films). The first fuck flick that Palmer was credited for was the blaxploitation-hardcore hybrid Hot Summer in the City (1976), which is about a white god-fearing virgin Christian girl who is gang-raped and turned into a sex slave by a group of honky-hating militant black nationalist types. Naturally, considering its subject matter in regard to bestial mandingos raping a little white girl, it should be no surprise that Palmer's first credited feature was apparently once described by enthusiastic ethno-masochist, perennial cuckold, and shameless negrophile Quentin Tarantino as, "The Greatest Porno Ever." Of course, Prisoner of Paradise also features the timeless porn gimmick of miscegenation, albeit of the 'yellow fever' oriented sort, with Mr. Holmes plowing tight pink Oriental orifices with his semi-erect 13-inch liver-lifter when he is not being ruthlessly ravaged by some carpet-munching Hitlerite sluts who like cunt more than cock.

Admittedly, I got the moronic idea to watch Prisoner of Paradise after seeing a somewhat provocative screenshot from the film featuring a Nazi girl holding a Luger next to her pussy, but after getting around to actually watching the not-quite-classic hardcore flick I can safely say that the film had virtually nothing else to offer aside from the fairly brief gun-gash segment. A sort of horrendous abortive mix between the considerably crappy concentration camp sitcom Hogan's Heroes and the insufferably sappy Marlon Brando vehicle Sayonara (1957), Prisoner of Paradise is a totally tedious combination of outmoded vaudeville-esque Teutophobia, unsexy and considerably sanitized sleaze, classic Hollywood style phoniness, and retarded token pro-American sentiment that was typical of WWII era Hollywood war films. As an embarrassing piece of pseudo-melodramatic hardcore kitsch, the film makes the exploitation flick that obviously heavily influenced it, Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS (1975), seem like Pier Paolo Pasolini's swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) by comparison. Indeed, no other film makes pussies and totenkopfs seem as cheesy yet hopelessly banal as Prisoner of Paradise. The plodding tale of a lovelorn Jap-loving American sailor who ends up stranded on a remote South Pacific island near the Philippines (though the film was actually apparently shot in Hawaii) after his Navy battleship is bombed and who eventually finds himself the sex slave of a boorish kraut SS commander and his two lethally lurid lily-licking blonde beastesses, the film is ultimately less erotic than Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia (1938). In fact, I would argue that Prisoner of Paradise is less arousing than the majority of cheap Nazisploitation films like Lee Frost's Love Camp 7 (1969) because at least they have some minor S&M/BDSM appeal. In short, probably the only notable aspect of the film is that it somehow manages to not mention Jews or the holocaust a single time, but that probably has to do with the fact that it is a rare all-goyim porn production.

Prisoner of Paradise begins unimpressively enough with protagonist Joe Murry (John Holmes) washing up onto a remote island with nothing but a raft and the torn sailor's outfit that he is wearing. As revealed in flashback scenes that were swiped from the Pearl Harbor flick Tora! Tora! Tora! (1970) directed by Richard Fleischer (with additional co-directing done by Japanese filmmakers Toshio Masuda and Kinji Fukasaku), Joe's ship was bombed by the Japs. Despite being at war with the dreaded harbor-bombers, Joe is in love with a Japanese prostitute named Sue Lee (Mai Lin) who he planned to marry, but she was tragically killed in an Allied bombing raid. As can be expected from a fuck flick, there are various flashback scenes in the film where Joe recalls fucking Lee before her ill-fated demise. As depicted in the flashback scenes, only seconds after Joe walked out of her front door after hinting to her that he planned to ask her to marry him the next time he saw her, Lee was tragically killed in the bombing raid (notably, pseudo-director Gail Palmer is featured in a cameo role during this scene where she is in 'yellowface' and dressed like a Jap streetwalker). During the first day or two that Joe is on the island, the only company that he has is his bittersweet memories of his beloved yellow pussy-peddler. During his second day at the island, Joe does fairly mundane things like take a shower under a waterfall and cut down coconuts from a tree with a machete that he just happens to have with him. Of course, when Joe happens upon two completely unclad blonde beauties bathing in a creek, Joe cannot help but investigate, even if they lack the yellow skin that he has a special fondness for.

When Joe follows the two mysterious blondes, he discovers that they are Saphic SS sluts that are under the command of a short and bloated SS commander named Hans von Shlemel (Gail Palmer regular Elmo Lavino credited under the pseudonym 'Heinz Müller') who has a special fetish for cracking his whip, especially on the asses of female prisoners, but for whatever reason he does not like to take a hands-on approach when it comes to female flesh. Hans' two guards are named Ilsa (Seka) and Greta (Sue Carol) and they especially love dining on yank prisoner cuntlet, though they decide to make a special exception when they eventually see Joe's extra long joy prong. Aside from Ilsa and Greta, a tiny yet super stoic Japanese girl named Suke (Jade Wong) is absurdly responsible for guarding the entire Nazi base with a single rifle. Needless to say, Joe is disgusted when he watches an American army nurse named Gloria (Brenda Vargo) being ruthlessly eaten out by Ilsa while Greta forces her to say, "I love the Führer," as if Uncle Adolf has turned cunnilingus is a form of National Socialist patriotism. As a cultured mensch that jovially declares, "Wagner will be here when Germany conquers the world...and so will I," Hans routinely plays the music of Richard Wagner when the lurid carnal 'tortures' are carried out. While snooping around the Nazi base, Joe eventually finds another imprisoned American army nurse named Carol (Nikki Anderson) who he naturally promises to help. Ultimately Joe decides to attempt to save both nurses by starting a fire to create a diversion and running inside the Nazi headquarters to get Gloria while Hans and his gals are scrambling to put out the fire. While Joe manages to get both Gloria and Carol off the base and take them to a seemingly safe place in forest, he and the girls are soon found and brought back at gunpoint by Suke after they make the mistake of taking a temporary break in the woods when the nurse complain that they need to rest.

When Joe and the nurses are brought back to Nazi headquarters, Nazi she-bitch Greta immediately pats the protagonist down and mistakes his cock for a concealed weapon, which Ilsa subsequently pulls out, thus inspiring Hans to joke, "They thought you had a gun down there. Pretty good joke, yeah?" Of course, Joe does not find Hans very funny, especially after the Nazi commandant attempts to rationalize his sexual sadism by stating that, "it is rather boring on this island. If we did not amuse ourselves, we could go crazy this far from civilization." After Hans declares, "American girls are lovely creatures. They're so full of fight and spirit. You should perhaps try a German girl sometime. You ever try a German girl? They have their high-points too, you know...cunning, intelligence, and obedience. They will do anything you want, like Ilsa and Greta here. And right here, my friend, it appears that they want you," Joe is forced to sexually service both of the SS dykes, with the protagonist first eating Greta's pussy while she has her Luger pointed at his head and then fucking Ilsa whilst she moans with barely concealed anti-American hatred. Right before Joe blows his load, Ilsa screams, "Don't you cum in me you American swine," so he ejaculates on her stomach, thus assuring that the feisty Fräulein will not be impregnated with the mongrel spawn of a stupid American.

As is fairly predictable, Japanese guard Suke eventually begins falling in love with Joe and even starts grinding her rifle with her crouch while watching him fucking one of the Nazi guards. For his own voyeuristic pleasure, Hans forces to American nurse Carol to suck Joe's cock, which rather enrages the superficially gentlemanly all-American sailor boy. Hans also forces Joe to fuck Carol and then busts on her face by threatening him and stating, "You want her to live? You'll put that thing in there." When Hans declares that he will be whipping Carol after Joe reluctantly blows his load on her face, the protagonist becomes completely irate and declares, "You jerry bastard, I'm gonna kill you, you and those dyke cunts of yours." Although Hans does not physically torture the protagonist for making the major mistake of insulting a German officer, he does call Joe a "frankfurter-sucking friend" and then informs him that his, "girlfriend will pay dearly" for what he has done. When Joe is led back to his prison, Suke's panties seem to be soaked as she immediately declares her love for the protagonist and the two proceed to fuck while the protagonist experiences flashbacks in regard to plowing the puss of his dead Jap hooker girlfriend (after all, apparently all Asians look the same, so it is not hard for Joe to imagine that the guard is the same person as the dead gutter slut that he fell in love with). When Suke is subsequently accidentally killed in a scuffle after Ilsa starts a bitch-fest due to her jealousy over Greta's Sapphic infatuation with Carol, Joe becomes exceedingly enraged and finally starts beginning to act like a real man. Indeed, when Ilsa runs to Hans for help after Joe manages to grab a gun, the protagonist screams at her, "Stop, you kraut bitch, or I'll blow your head off," but of course she does not listen. Luckily, Joe does not have to do any work in terms of combat (he is a sailor after all), as Ilsa accidentally starts a fire at Nazi headquarters after knocking over a lamp that leads to all three of the evil nasty Nazi dying instantaneously. Indeed, just as Greta mindlessly runs into the burning building to join her comrades, it conveniently explodes. In the end, the film concludes with the epilogue, "Three years after the end of World War II, one American sailor, two army nurses and five children were rescued from a remote South Pacific island near the Philippines...no further details are available at this time," thus revealing that sailor Joe finally got over his seemingly incurable case of yellow fever.

Aside from featuring virtually nil genuinely erotic scenes, Prisoner of Paradise has to have what is one of the least charismatic 'heroes' of cinema history. Indeed, Mr. Holmes' (in)famously long dong does not save him in the film, though his character certainly seems like the sort of insecure white dude that is fairly common nowadays who chases after Oriental skirts. Intrigued by how truly terrible Holmes' performance was in the film, I decided to check out the documentary Wadd: The Life & Times of John C. Holmes (1999) directed by Cass Paley where the 'King of Porn' is revealed to be a sort of super loser and outrageous compulsive liar with psychopathic tendencies who was incapable of ever achieving a full erection and who intentionally failed to disclose to his Italian co-stars the fact that he had AIDS when he appeared in the Guido fuck flicks The Rise of the Roman Empress (1987) and The Devil in Mr. Holmes (1987), which would be the last two pornos he starred in before dying of gay cancer (it is speculated that Holmes might have contracted AIDS while starring in various gay porn flicks, including The Private Pleasures of John C. Holmes (1983) where he fucked experimental pornographer Fred Halsted's longtime boyfriend Joey Vale, who notably died of AIDS in 1986). In the Wadd doc, a number of the talking heads argue that one of Holmes' greatest appeals to men was that he seemed like a fairly normal and unpretentious chap who did not act like a prick because he had a big dick, which does seem somewhat apparent in Prisoner of Paradise when his character does seem genuinely displeased when he is forced to fuck the ferocious Fräuleins. As the doc also reveals, Holmes apparently completely lost interest in sex in general and refused to ejaculate unless he was getting paid for it, thus demonstrating how completely and utterly soulless his life had become. Certainly, the only captivating character in Prisoner of Paradise is Seka's Ilsa as she genuinely seems like a sexy little Nazi bitch who gets whatever she wants (notably, Hebraic hardcore leading man Jamie Gillis once described Seka as a "white trash queen" that thought she was "a bit above porn"). After Holmes croaked, Seka decided to get out of the porn business out of the fear that she might also contract AIDS, which is a somewhat strange thing to think about when you watch her get manhandled in the film by Johnny Wadd while she has an expression of savage ecstasy on her face.

Somewhat ironically considering the film's fairly tasteless depiction of the Second World War and National Socialism, there was later an award-winning documentary made entitled Prisoner of Paradise (2002) about German-Jewish actor Kurt Geron, who was coerced into directing a Nazi propaganda film about Theresienstadt concentration camp entitled The Führer Gives the Jews a City (1944) in the hope that he and his family would be spared from a very certain death at Auschwitz. Undoubtedly, the hardcore flick is even more absurd in terms of historical accuracy than Geron's deluded doc (which was never released, though a 23-minute fragment survived and can easily be found online), but I guess that is what one should expect from an American porn flick that was filmed in Hawaii and that immediately concludes with an advertisement for supposed Gail Palmer flicks, including Ecstasy Express and the Chaucer reworking The Ribald Tales of Canterbury, even though the former does not exist and the latter was actually directed by porn star Hyapatia Lee's husband Bud Lee. It should also be noted that Holmes spent about three years living in West Germany while he was enlisted in the U.S. Army before he became a porn star, yet Prisoner of Paradise does not exploit any German that he might have learned during his stay in Krautland (though he makes a botched attempt at saying about two words in Japanese). If you are looking for Nazisploitation oriented erotic/porn with some actual teeth, there are countless other films to choose from, including José Bénazéraf's Bordel SS (1978) aka SS Bordello, Tinto Brass' Salon Kitty (1976) and Senso '45 (2002) aka Black Angel, and Phillip Marshak's Blue Ice (1985), just to name a few. Of course, if you ever got the urge to beat your meat to Hogan's Heroes and/or you are one of the many white American (beta)males that suffers from yellow fever, Prisoner of Paradise is probably just the film for you.

THE GREEN ELEPHANT

Svetlana Baskova (1999) Russian director Svetlana Baskova directed a rough war horror film based on the Bolshevik Gulags (Death Camps). The film circulates around two unidentified men in prison. They discuss various meaningless facets of life such as shit and flies. This is Quite an amateurish move for the director to have made. The director could have pulled a smarter move by discussing point metric systems in fast food and would have not been as ridiculed as much. This inane dialogue continues for around 50 more minutes until the film gets at least a little entertaining. These two bickering men decide to try and rape one another and attempt to slaughter each other while pissing on their bodies. The only real contingency to the film is the shock factor, which is present. It's not everyday you see two hairy Russian men try to grope and slaughter one another. The film was banned after one showing in it's homeland due to its scatophile, coprophilia, necrophilia, and extreme mutilation. Perhaps the only really interesting fact about this film is imagining hundreds of Russians running from the screening vomiting and the director getting banished. To see a film of this quality made in 1999 is in many ways depressing. Quality of film in other countries sure has fallen steep. The Green Elephant AKA Zeleniy Slonik is a trash effort and should not be regarded as a piece of war cinema. Avoid this film if you expect any cinema seriousness. DEAR MR. GACY
DEAR MR. GACY

Svetozar Rištovski (2010)

I used to be friends with a hot young lady (like Soiled Sinema, she has the initials SS) that was pen pals with pseudo-Satanic serial killer Richard Ramirez during her high school years. Being the sweetheart she was, my friend scanned the letters she received from Ramirez and sent them to me online so that I could read them. I immediately realized Ramirez's letters were completely and utterly unintentionally hilarious. Aside from being sub-literate like most Mexican metalheads, Ricky Retardo's letters were full of childish questions such as asking my friend what her favorite color was. In the film Dear Mr. Gacy, we see the true story unfold of a college student named Jason Moss who starts hustling (for a college thesis) the cunning yet obnoxiously bloated serial killer John Wayne Gacy through via snail mail. Unfortunately for Jason Moss, when you start playing games with big gay Gacy, you're playing for keeps as the disgusting killer leaves no young man untouched.

Jason's present to Gacy

I really do not understand the American obsession of worshiping serial killers as Sainly media darlings. After all, John Wayne Gacy has become as popular and iconically American as Hollywood cowboy John Wayne. Aside from torturing, sodomizing, and slaughtering adolescent males on the side, John Wayne Gacy was living his life as an upstanding American citizen, juggling multiples roles (businessman, community organizer, and clown), even taking a photograph with former first lady Rosalynn Carter. For those that hate clowns, John Wayne Gacy also makes the ultimate devil as contrived funnyman "Pogo The Clown." I found out about Gacy's crimes as a young child and I have not been able to look at clowns the same way ever since. The only clowns that have horrified me in a similar despicably vainglorious way as Gacy is those horrendous Dago jokesters featured in Fellini's I clowns (1970). In the humorless words of Morrissey, That Joke Isn't Funny Anymore in regard to the John Wayne Gacy featured in Dear Mr. Gacy as the man now wears the uniform of a dead man walking. Of course, Gacy has his last young male suitor in mind in this film, even if it is just to get into the college boy's dangerously inquisitive mind.

Dear Mr. Gacy was directed by Macedonian director Svetozar Rištovski who cites auteur directors ranging from Robert Bresson to Stanley Kubrick as influencing his own brand of filmmaking. When watching Dear Mr. Gacy, nothing is really impressive about the filmmaking, aside from the dark shades of colorlessness featured throughout the film which compliments the overall dark feeling that this motion picture resonates. Immediately, unlikeable protagonist Jason Moss attempts to entice John Wayne Gacy, sending him erotic photographs of himself (taken by his own brother) and writing the sad sadist clown provocative letters. Jesse's becomes obsessed with Gacy and ruins his relationships with his girlfriend in the process. Gacy is played charismatically by William Forsythe, expressing the various dimensions (and multiple personalities) of the all-American serial killer. I do not know whether or not it was the director intention or not but near the end of the film, Gacy becomes a more likeable character than Jason. Like Gacy, Jesse has proven that he is willing to screw over anyone to get what he wants. The difference is that Jesse lacks the testicular fortitude to carry out his desires whereas Gacy has gone all the way, hence why serial killers seem to be so well respected by their American admirers.

Jason Moss and John Wayne Gacy, 1994

Not only did the real-life Jason Moss correspond with Gacy but he also traded letters with other notorious serial killers such as Jeffrey Dahmer and Henry Lee Lucas. Moss came up with the extra cliché title The Last Victim for his memoir as a serial killer fanboy. What makes the title especially cliché is the fact that Jason Moss would take his life years after writing his memoir. This makes one wonder what exactly lead Moss to suicide, the guilt of dealing with God's unholy men or the weakness of his own mind giving way after being exposed to those with mental aberrations worse than his own. Whatever the reason, knowing the background behind Dear Mr. Gacy makes the film much more interesting but does not save the film from being a piece of subpar cinema. After all, I found Mark Holton (Pee-Wee Herman's nemesis in Pee-Wee's Big Adventure) to be a much scarier Gacy in the direct-to-video release Gacy. When it comes down to it, no one makes a creepier cinematic clown than unsweet transvestite Tim Curry.

CASTLE KEEP

Sydney Pollack (1969)

I must admit that the prospective of a Gothic World War II flick does sound most appetizing for the eyes and ears, but the successful execution of such an ambitious work is quite dubitable as demonstrated by unevenness of Michael Mann's The Keep (1983), especially if it is directed by someone as seemingly ill-equipped as Sydney Pollack, director of Tootsie (1982); a work featuring Dustin Hoffman in drag. Of course, during the beginning of his filmmaking career, Pollack directed the notably manly Western masterpiece Jeremiah Johnson (1972); a film about an Injun-extermimating mountain-man who is unwaveringly determined in his personal campaign to conquer land, man, and beast. Before ever gaining praise for directing Jeremiah Johnson, Pollack assembled the eccentric esoteric Gothic war dramedy Castle Keep (1969); a film based on a William Eastlake novel of the same name about a squad of American soldiers who squat in a phantasmagoric Belgian castle under the more or less superficial pretense that they will guard it, and its aristocratic Count owner and his beautiful Countess wife from advancing German forces. The setting of the film is during the Battle of Bulge, yet the owner of the castle (and the castle itself) seems many centuries old, which is unequivocally an anachronistic tool symbolizing the old political and physical infrastructure of Europe. Aside from combining conventions from the WWII flick with elements of a traditional Gothic castle tale, Castle Keep is, most importantly, a cinematic death certificate for Europe, albeit a ferociously facetious and flagrant one. Admittedly, I have been hoping to find a film that addresses this critical global power-shifting, but little acknowledged, post-Spenglerian phenomenon for some time now, so I was entirely taken aback when I randomly found this theme in a mostly disregarded war flick directed by Sydney Pollack of all people. Unsurprisingly, Pollack, being a proud Israelite, was ostensibly unsympathetic towards the land and peoples of Europe, most especially those terrible testosterone-fueled Teutons whose accents and affinity for kultur are mocked in a malicious manner that rivals South Park and Family Guy throughout Castle Keep, but that did not stop the filmmaker from portraying American GIs as hopelessly impenetrable philistines who, like islanders that were shipwrecked many generations ago, missed out on imperative cultural and intellectual advancements that were long ago established in Europe.

Upon arriving at the castle they will keep thoroughly occupied like a meth-fueled rapist with a hogtied virginal victim, the soldiers are quite vocal about their absolute disillusionment with the war. One soldier states that they have all already died twice, while another admits he has no idea as to what they are actually fighting for. These opening sentiments set that tone for the rest of Castle Keep, an acutely nihilistic and strikingly idiosyncratic quasi-existentialist work with misanthropic undertones. I would not be surprised if Sidney Pollack had a smug smile and fat joint in hand throughout the production of Castle Keep, as the film has the feel of a culturally refined vaudeville act disguised as European arthouse film. If one were to watch the film without audio it would seem like a totally different film, not too dissimilar from Harry Kümel's dreamlike Gothic castle masterpiece Malpertuis (1971). Thankfully, Castle Keep has plenty of black humor and gorgeous pseudo-Baroque imagery to adequately counter its all-encompassing philosophical and intellectual unpleasantness. Indeed, Castle Keep features an aristocratic buffet of laboriously prepared rotten food for thought, but such morbid ingredients are quite welcome from a film industry that thrives on gross disingenuousness. In the ridiculous realm of Castle Keep, American soldiers indulge in the fruits of the European aristocracy without any actual understanding of these rare cultural treats. Anything these soldiers can't eat or fuck, they break, including priceless art, architecture, and landscapes. Undoubtedly, Castle Keep and its many absurdist scenarios act as a singularly demurgic and enthralling analogy for American involvement in the Second World War. Despite contributing to the dissolution of Europe as the world's most powerful political and cultural entity, and the dismantling of all remaining European empires, to this day, most Americans and American veterans are at a loss when trying to come up with a complex explanation (aside from, "The Japs bombed us!") as to why their nation was involved in an overseas fratricidal quasi-Civil War, nor the political and cultural magnitude of the war's outcome. By the end of Castle Keep, the castle and its many cultural treasures lay in ruins, as do many of the American GIs, and for what? So one half of Europe can be occupied by culture-distorting international capitalists and the other half by culture-destroying international communists; two alien powers contra to the continent's ancient cultural and socio-political traditions. These sort of issues are discussed nonchalantly by the soldiers throughout Castle Keep. In one particularly important, if random (like most of the film), scene, a soldier states, "Europe is dying" and, in turn, another soldier matter-of-factly replies with, "No, she is dead. That's why we're here. Don't you read the newspapers?" Indeed, Europa is dying but the American GIs of Castle Keep are too busy raping her daughters and killing her sons to take much notice, let alone, care.

Despite the quasi-apocalyptic nature of the content featured throughout Castle Keep, these morbid and melancholy movie moments are coated in a certain addictive bittersweet comedic cynicism that distances the viewer from the true grim reality of the content. In the film, countless people are killed in a variety of body-dismembering ways, a civilization's art is burned like trash to forever disappear from the world, and a continent is all but irrevocably annihilated, yet these surly circumstances are portrayed in a fashion that is ultimately comedic, thus proving that any subject, no matter how deplorable or taboo, can be made hilarious given the right creative mind. Of course, Castle Keep does have its moments of pure and silly comic relief. For example, a bonhomie hillbilly GI literally falls in love with a semi-supernatural Volkswagen Beetle in a scene that reflects the peculiar American redneck obsession with imported wheels. Although two soldiers attempt to kill the enemy car via shooting and drowning, they are no match for the Aryan automobile's superior Germanic engineering. Even though featuring a wealth of physical slapstick comedy, the majority of humor featured in Castle Keep is contained within its sharp and witty dialogue. The film especially reminded me of William Peter Blatty's The Ninth Configuration (1980), except it is more coherent and slightly less serious than its sometimes overly spasmodic predecessor. Like The Ninth Configuration, Castle Keep is a military-related work that will most likely leave most genuine military men left dumbfounded with its keen philosophical insights and reflections, atypical tragicomedy style, and all-around ambiguity. That being said, I would love to hear what a couple of real-life American WWII veterans would have to say about Castle Keep, as they are a secondary (with the Europeans being the first) butt of the joke, whether they acknowledge it or not.

It might come as a revelation to some people, but few people probably know that popular Hollywood director Mike Nichols, director of The Graduate (1967) and Closer (2004), is the maternal grandson of Gustav Landauer, the Shakespearean scholar and communist-anarchist (if that oxymoron of a political persuasion makes any sense) who became the 'Commissioner of Enlightenment and Public Instruction' for the short-lived and traitorously created Soviet Republic of Bavaria that was created during the so called "German" Revolution of 1918-1919. When indigenous Germans finally recovered the city of Munich and Bavaria state, the communist leadership, which was made up of mostly alien Judaic traitors, was subsequently arrested and executed, including Landauer, who was stoned to death on May 2, 1919. I bring up Mike Nichols grandfather to illustrate the sort of mentality and politics that have dominated Hollywood throughout its existence. The people who run Hollywood are not merely moderate 'left-wingers' and kindhearted humanists who want to repair the heart of the world, but individuals who are fundamentally hostile to traditional European culture and morality, as exemplified in everything from their crude Hebraic neo-vaudevillian comedies to their quasi-Trotskyite period pieces. Although Jewish commentators and academics often boast about their ethnic group's contribution to science and cultures, they pale in comparison to the achievements of Europeans, hence their collective resentment towards European and Occidental kultur. As the great German-American iconoclast H.L. Mencken once stated, "The Jewish theory that the GOYIM envy the superior ability of the Jews is not borne out by the facts. Most GOYIM, in fact, deny that the Jew is superior, and point in evidence to his failure to take the first prizes: he has to be content with the seconds. No Jewish composer has ever come within miles of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms; no Jew has ever challenged the top-flight painters of the world, and no Jewish scientist has equaled Newton, Darwin, Pasteur or Mendel....The GOY does not, in fact, believe that the Jew is better than the non-Jew; the most he will admit is that the Jew is smarter at achieving worldly success. But this he ascribes to sharp practices, not to superior ability.” Sydney Pollack, being of same generation and a similar cultural background (both of their families emigrated from Europe to the United States) as Mike Nichols, most likely shared a kindred personal hostility towards Europe as his compatriots, as vividly expressed in much depth in Castle Keep, a work that is saturated with quintessential Jewish humor. While portraying Europeans as impotent (the Count is literally infertile) degenerates with no future, the film depicts Americans (aside from a mostly misunderstood and despairing white art historian and a uncommonly witty yet supremely arrogant Negro author) as profound ignoramuses who don't even have the mental capacity to understand that their role in the Second World War will lead to the destruction of their ancient ancestral homelands, and, inevitably, white America's loss of cultural and political domination of the United States. After all, I doubt most white Americans from the 1940s would have agreed to fight in the war if they knew it would eventually lead to a future mulatto president and a perpetual deluge of immigrants from the third world. The Count of the castle in Castle Keep even calls the American soldiers traitors near the conclusion of the film, a statement these soldiers clearly fail to understand as communicated by their blank stares.

Castle Keep ends with a literal Holocaust and the castle inflames, which indubitably acts as an allegorical delineation of Europe as a whole after the conclusion of World War II. Everyone in America knows that, apparently, six million died during World War II, but very few can cite how many Europeans were senselessly slaughtered and what cities and landmarks were inexorably incinerated. While I find Pollack's political persuasion to be dubious, I must commend him for his refreshing honesty and his brilliant direction. Castle Keep is such an outlandish and solitary work that it is seemingly lacking in flaws. The typical lemming film-goer will probably criticize the film for its lack of character development and somewhat incoherent plot, but these complaints are basically irrelevant as it is plain to see that Castle Keep is a work where actors (even if they are big names like Burt Lancaster, Jean-Pierre Aumont, and Peter Falk) are used as props for delivering clever dialogue and the storyline is a mere palette for expressing an assortment of ideas and potent imagery. Neither pro-war nor anti-war, Castle Keep is an open-ended work that demands individual interpretation, hence the marginal popularity of the film in the United States. Naturally, American audiences detest films that make a mockery of their intellectual ineptitude and lack of cultural refinement, thus Castle Keep will undoubtedly be destined to the same fate as the European films it aesthetically mimics: in the celluloid dustbin of history.

Sydney Pollack (1972)

Jeremiah Johnson is quite possibly the best movie ever made. It just portrays such a gnarly character loosely based off of an even bigger bad ass. The real Jeremiah Johnson was terrifying. Homeboy ate the livers of the people he killed and wrestled bears. The Sydney Pollack film though, shows a lighter side of the mountain man who basically hated everyone, and wanted to live on his own in the mountains. Sound familiar? Into the Wild was a recently released movie about the same idea, but Emile Hirsch's character in that film has nothing on Jeremiah. The film starts out with one of the most awkward things you can sit down and watch in a movie, an overture. My suggestion for this part is to eat lots of steak, blast your own music (preferably metal), and drink heavily. By that point, you're ready for the first scene of Jeremiah Johnson. The film starts showing a clean cut Robert Redford heading out into the wilderness. As the film progresses, it shows Jeremiah go from shooting fish in a stream to killing bears at close range. He also takes shit to an all new level of brutal stumbling upon another mountain man frozen to death, and takes his gun. There are so many other awesome things this guy does, but you need to see it for yourself. The film builds up to the legend of this character that ate the livers of the people that crossed him, gambled, partied hard, and fucking kicked! Jeremiah Johnson was the only mountain man that would lay kicks down in a fight. The film is a tenderer look at this historical mountain man, but does a better job at portraying fighting for survival in the wilderness than any movie ever filmed. If you want to see bad ass in its purest form, see this film. It is long, but pay attention, and don't fuck this up! By the end of the movie, you will have probably grown fifty thousand beard hairs. When my kids hit puberty, I am not telling them shit about the birds and the bees. I am just going to have them watch Jeremiah Johnson.

ROCKY BALBOA

Sylvester Stallone* (2006) Rocky Balboa is yet another recent Sylvester Stallone franchise film directed by the man himself. Stallone has stated that the newest Rocky film is, "The End" so don't expect another film about the slowwitted and hard driven fighter. In Rocky Balboa, Rocky has long ago already reached his fighting abilities peak. His beloved wife Adrian has died of "woman cancer" and he merely spends his days running his fancy restaurant. Rocky's son Robert has a fairly cold relationship with his father and has become a corporate asshole. All in All, Rocky's world seems to be less than ideal, and of course unexciting.

The city Rocky lives in is now your typical American urban ghetto. The locals of the city that he grew-up in are less than admirable. In a bar, Rocky encounters a young lady that is fairly fluent in Ebonics and after denied a "free drink" by rock she irrationally states, "you ain't not better den me." Rocky seems more disturbed by this situation than anything. He soon makes his way out of the bar with "little" Marie (her character is featured in the original Rocky film stating, "screw you, creep"). When Rocky realizes "big" Marie now has a mulatto son, he looks a little shocked by it, and of course he attempts to downplay his reaction. Rocky's brother-in-law Paulie isn't in too good of shape either. When Rocky invites Paulie to have a "special" at his restaurant he replies, "Italian food cooked up by a bunch of Mexicans ain't so special." Paulie's statement reflects the feelings of most blue collar workers and seems like a direct blow to Rocky for hiring them. Essentially, Rocky Balboa shows how America, American Unity, and American communities have gone down the drain because of weakling guys like Rocky's son. Of course, all the negative things turn around as can be expected in a film of typical Hollywood conventions. Rocky gets back into boxing and fights a much younger boxer. One can only wonder if this is reflexive of Stallone's own personal mid-life crisis. Rocky Balboa has various references to the original and this is appropriate as this is the last film and second best film. Sylvester Stallone found the perfect way to end the "fight your way up" American dream series.

Sylvester Stallone* (2008)

Within every genre, there are select films that earn the title of "Best in the Genre". For romance we have Casablanca, Drama we have Citizen Kane and American Beauty, and for horror we have The Exorcist and Jaws. The fourth outing of Sylvester Stallone's Rambo series is among the placeholder of best action films. Now when I heard of JOHN RAMBO (Alternative Title) I about pissed myself. Having seen the trailer once, I quickly rewatched it for about the length of the film itself. Not only does it entertain on a visual level but the sheer amount of carnage and limbs flying around only make it better. Having left off with Rambo III, we return with our beloved Anti-hero John Rambo working in Thailand. He has his own boat and just wanted "The quiet life". He is confronted by a handful of solid missionaries wanting to go into the dreadful land of Burma. Mr. Rambo refuses because it is a place of genocide. After some breaking, he decides to take them in due to the kind eyes of a looker. After killing a pirate ship (Don't laugh) and dropping them off at the shore, the missionaries are quite unimpressed with his barbaric style of NOMERCY killings. Ten days later, a priest from a church in Colorado wants Rambo to take a group of mercenaries to the point where he dropped them off at for an extraction mission. Turns out the idiots who wanted change without weapons and killing got the ass-end of the deal. So looks like it's up for not only Rambo to save the idiot American's lives but the lives of the mercenaries as well. So for all the critics and citizens alike who complain that there is no plot or fiber to the film, that it is all blood and extreme violence, you are seriously missing the entire point of the film. It's not a happy film by any means. Things like this actually take place in the world. Too bad we don't have any John Rambo's to make it better by blasting, ripping, and stabbing our way to a better future. As the tagline for the third film goes. "First was for himself, Second was for his country, This time....it's for his friend". This chapter adds a fourth line. The last time, is for the world because that is what Rambo believes in. He eventually comes to terms that he is a war-bred machine. Expect an amazing ending to a perfect film. The only thing that could make this film better would be Rambo standing on a cliff, banging his chest letting loose a guttural war cry. Contrary to that, we have plenty of Rambo being a badass motherfucker, not involving scenes of him escaping a massive explosion on foot, ripping out someone's throat, or the 50 caliber carnage scene that will leave fans of Braveheart and Saving Private Ryan squirming in their cribs. It's funny how the line in this film "Killing is as easy as breathing if you are pushed" is the most accurate statement someone with natural instincts can make. Anyone can kill. Watching the breakdown of some of the Catholics as they have no choice but to kill is an effective scene. Expect many dead Asians. "Live for nothing.....or die for something" These words not only mean the most to a person, but actually might inspire a revolution similar to the one depicted within. Upon the film's release, Rambo was banned in Burma. However, that hasn't stopped DVD pirates from selling thousands of copies below the military's un-keen noses. This film might even push into a full scale revolution. Now how epic would that be?

SKULL /& BONES
SKULL /& BONES

T.S. Slaughter° (2007)

Enter the appropriately named director T.S. Slaughter, director of the gay "HOMO-cidal" film SKULL & BONES. Upon getting my screener copy i had no idea what i was in for. It is impossible to say this film is a horrible film, while i was damn near entertained, i only had a few annoyances. You meet Nathan and Justin, two gay sex buddies who live a dull life in a local university. Due to their love for serial killers and their hatred for Ivy League preps, they take it upon themselves to rape and humiliate anyone who dare crosses them. What makes this film so special is its use of political incorrectness and its avid conspiracies being thrown into the mix. Nathan and Justin are pretty normal guys who live and lust. Justin is the underling and looks up to Nathan. This is shown in several horribly acted segments. "You are SOO awesome, Nathan". Derrick Wolf who plays Nathan is an absolute blast to watch. From his maniacal laughter and his Peter Sarsgaard sounding voice, he is but a pillar to hold this movie. One gripe i had was the coffin. It was made with bits of cardboard it seemed, and had over the top creaking-dungeon-door sound effects added in. Later in the film, we see a slide show slide of some of the more famous real life serial killers. Many are noted as being homosexual. Could this be a undertone saying that homosexuality spawns homicidal urges? Do not expect anything from this film without knowing anything more than the plot. But expect Gay rape scenes involving political caricature masks, pretty pythons, the same hilarious baiting scene used four times, and every fruit known to mankind used to sodomize these poor richies. I also loved the deep message it conveys, basically saying that in every male is a homosexual side. Despite the sometimes horrid acting and shitty set design, Skull & Bones manages to be a good indie horror gem with a very different type of feel; hence it not sticking to a specific genre. I also enjoyed the use of exotic animals to build almost a primitive and classic horror feel, similar to the films of Coffin Joe or the more widely known, The Serpent & The Rainbow. As said in Scream, "Now Sid, don't you blame the movies, movies don't create psychos, movies make psychos more creative!" Let's see what Mr. Slaughter can do with a "butt-jet" Get it?

SEXUAL PARASITE: KILLER PUSSY

Takao Nakano (2004)

Only the director of unofficial Uratsuki-dôji spin offs (ExorSister) could direct something this sexually menacing. Sexual Parasite: Killer Pussy is a bit of softcore Japanese weirdness. Bringing back the Vagina Dentata superstitions, this is a valiant and more enticing film than remake Teeth could ever hope to be. The idea of a grotesque creature transferring bodies to rape and devour men is Oscar worthy in itself. Running a short 60 minutes, Sexual Parasite is defiantly erotic in some very strange senses. You might even question your own fetishes after seeing a mongoloid tapeworm invade every orifice of the body. Sexual Parasite borrows a similar theme of foreign invasion as seen in Dead Alive. The very similar plot line follows a group of teenagers who go into an abandoned jungle and in an abandoned warehouse. They soon find themselves in a heap load of trouble when a menacing creature threatens their lives... and sexuality. Sexual Parasite fashions many gore scenes out of the usual deviant arousal films including castration and... wait, that's about the only thing really featured in the film and it's honorable. A killer pussy can only do so much. In a ridiculous last several minutes, the lead actress (blessed with marvelous breasts) goes Rambo with various tools and blades in order to take care of the evil parasite. The facet I admire most is the weapon fashioned to her arm as a nod to Die Hard and the average hero. I will be the first to admit the cat fight at the end is ridiculous and directed by a 9th grader. Had Takao Nakano not been given the option for digital effects, much of the film would have a fluid flow rather than out of place scenes of wobbly eyeballs and awkward parasite transfer scenes. Sexual Parasite promises sex and parasites and it doesn't disappoint. The sheer amount of bloodshed and topless females makes up for near any error that an independent film could make. How shallow of me. Sexual Parasite is every bit of an homage of Evil Dead, Dead Alive, and every perversion-horror film ever made. It should be viewed as a director's purposeful piece of work and not as a film made for fans. The demographic for this specific set of fans doesn't seem wide enough to warrant a DVD release from Discotek but surprisingly, the genre fans find themselves irrevocably drawn to this. To be honest, if I saw a film called Killer Pussy, I too would lunge at the chance to buy this. On term of film making as an art, this film fails miserably. It's brash, crude, salacious, and the equivalent of a Shock-O-Rama feature meets The Karate Kid. All this equals a sometimes fun, most times irritating, but competent film worthy of a viewing. That is, if you can brace for what a film called Killer Pussy has to offer.

GODZILLA 2000

Takao Okawara (1999)

Godzilla is a fine example of an alignment dubbed Chaotic Neutral. At times he will save the world and other times he exhibits an extreme nihilism towards the human race, such as what is displayed in the resurrected once more Godzilla 2000. We last saw Godzilla suffer defeat at the hands of Destroyah. He was since resurrected due to the huge flop that Emmerich's Godzilla envisioning was (The only thing it had going for it was Jean Reno). In Godzilla 2000, It's a cold fact that in a franchise of 20+ films, you're going to have several stale entries surrounded by unbridled monster mashes. Godzilla 2000 is a feeble attempt at kick starting life into a series that was abruptly ended thanks to his nuclear heart. Much of my dissent is born from a metaphorical H-Bomb as I discovered my DVD didn't feature original Japanese audio. This just goes to show how sadistic and close-minded Sony Pictures can be at times. Godzilla 2000 is plagued by poor writing. I recall in one scene while detailing the destructive force of a new man made weapon, the designer retorts "I guarantee it will go through Godzilla like crap through a Goose!" I don't know if it is just me or what, but that sentence makes no sense. Many of the characters are type casted as hell from pulling off their glasses slowly while whispering "Oh my god..." to a picturesque happy ending until this somber moment is shattered by Godzilla's fury. The design on Godzilla this time around has been overall improved. Horrible Sci-fi Channel-like CGI is noticeable around every corner and this is the poison that slowly drains this film of nay old-school Kaiju combat. If I wanted to watch Godzilla awkwardly rampage through Green screens and swim underwater while doing several new positions thanks to computer graphics, I'd just wait for Godzilla 3D. The ending of this film has Godzilla mercilessly murdering his human rival while the hero embraces his newborn family. After this tender moment, Godzilla decides to Atomic breath the living shit out of Tokyo, murdering millions in the process. I don't know which depraved genius mind thought this up but he is in order for an award. As a Villain, Orga is just an attack on the TriStar release of Godzilla. Roland Emmerich is that one director who created filth like Independence Day and 10,000 B.C. Orga's space craft is seen perched over top buildings sapping all of Tokyo's data and information from the supercomputer's network. After this, he steals Godzilla's "Regenerator G1" and morphs into a Godzilla clone. Godzilla plays around with the idea of letting this impostor get the upper hand and then mutilates his mouth with his signature breath. This is really "sticking it" to the studio that thought remaking a film that has more than enough offspring's, prequels, re-boots, and sibling videos a good idea. Godzilla 2000 at times is honestly pathetic. The effects range from hideous to glorious. I'm really digging on Godzilla's new spine spikes. They capture the feel of a monster more than an awkward rubber lizard. When not being dragged to its grave, Godzilla 2000 can be a competent sequel with some amazing shots of Godzilla doing what he does best; surviving. There is enough potential in this to at least recommend to fans, though.

IMPRINT
IMPRINT

Takashi Miike (2006) Showtime's Masters of Horror is far from a collection of short films from the "masters of horror." Most of the directors involved in this series are second rate Hollywood directors and/or horror directors that the seasoned horror fan "knows of." I will give Don Coscarelli, Dario Argento, and Takashi Miike the credit of being "masters of horror." In fact, Miike's Imprint is the best one out of the series. Takashi Miike seemed more focused on aesthetics with Imprint than most of his other films. Beautiful colors and fetuses makes for a soothing experience. Only in a fantastic dream could one find a variety of colorful flowers surrounding a fresh stream of abandoned babies. Imprint reminded me of Akira Kurosawa's Dreams. I think that I prefer Takashi Miike's dreams. Things also get confusing during storytelling with another possible Kurosawa influence Rashomon. Japanese cinema has changed dramatically over the past half century. I believe it is for the better. Showtime cowardly decided not to air Imprint on cable television. They prefer showing softcore porn and Suburban drug dealing fantasies (Weeds). What a shameful act on their part. What American would not want to see the floating body of a pregnant woman on their way to a whorehouse? I don't even need to go into the cutesy topless Asian girls being tortured by their madams. I think America is finally ready for Takashi Miike. Next season Masters of Horror needs to feature Jorg Buttgereit, Nacho Cerda, Jim Van Bebber, Shinya Tsukamoto, and possibly even Nick Palumbo. But that probably won't happen. Realistically you can expect the director of The Fog remake and executive producer of the Grudge 2.

SUN SCARRED

Takashi Miike (2006)

Been a while since I've written anything down with the exception of several snail-mail letters to my significant other. Truth be told, I don't really recall how this transference of thought-to-virtual paper operates anymore. In light of Soiled Sinema's hiatus, I've managed to watch fewer movies than I should have. My big kick as of recently has been the Death Wish franchise which is a bumpy ride at that. During my in depth immersion into the world of Paul Kersey, vigilante-for-hire with a 1/8th motivation of revenge, I've become stricken with the media craze of revenge. Perusing through articles and films alike, hell, even thumbing through "ex-girlfriend" web pages, I've become acquainted with this idea of violent retaliation and in a sick sense, I can't wait for my chance to thrive off of a blood lust. With these fundamental ideas in mind, my reception of Sun Scarred (Scars of the Sun) might differ from those Miike enthusiasts but I promise to appreciate this film's accidental approachability while embracing the fevered flaws that pepper most of Miike's modicum. What started off as a seasonal viewing some odd months ago, I got about halfway through Sun Scarred when some random event arose and I had it on an indefinite pause until now. While I feel as if this film wasted itself away with its high-rise levels of intensity to bottom out to watching paint dry, I feel had the film had a stronger opening, I might have never had paused it for little-to-no reason. The story is about as parallel to most revenge films as you'd imagine. The formula is altered in the way that our Japanese "salaryman" (aren't they all?) breaks up a group of youngsters attacking someone and winds up falcon punching a lollipop-toting metro-sexual whose very idea is a rip off of popular anime/manga character "L" from Death Note. This incredibly obvious tracing is the main reason why I can't take this certain character for all the ruthlessness they aspired to have him offer. If not for the lollipop then the terrible quirkiness attempted and the squeakiness of his annoying Oriental voice. With that being riffed to death, we'll move onto the continuation of the story arc. After punching the effeminate Kamiki several times and receiving all the blame as he is a minor, Kamiki kidnaps our hero's (Katayama) daughter and murders her off screen. Racked with guilt and terrible oppressive media, Katayama's wife hurls herself off the roof of a building in a scene that I can only describe as shocking. The effectiveness of this particular scene is the general disgust and phobia that comes with death attributed to falling. Or perhaps that's just my acrophobia talking? When filmed correctly and as harrowing and swift as the event is, the final result is unnerving. For more crashbang attempts at this science of brutality, note both [rec] films as being leaders in this under-appreciated moving portrait of living fast and dying hard. Combined with the blood dripping and his later breakdown, Katayama doesn't really sell his chops enough to be the miserable man that he is aiming to be. After all is said and done, Kamiki finds himself being released 3 years later for good behavior. Being a vengeful sprite, Katayama sets out on his obsessive quest to bring his own hard boiled justice to Kamiki and his youthful accomplices who are itching to kill. What consistently works in Sun Scarred is often shadowed over by what doesn't quite work. Being helmed by cinema's love-him-or-hate-em master of whatever he does exactly, Miike's impression is definitely left on this blank faced revenge tale that serves as a commentary on youth violence more so than it does on the faults of the justice system or the importance of violence in every ones life. While Sun Scarred doesn't play too head on with the issue of violence in youth or that children kill for nothing, a few key scenes really comb through the problem with a fine teeth. One scene in particular is when Katayama disarms a child with a pistol and beats him around a bit. When he attempts to withdraw pertinent information from the child, the kid remains on the ground holding his bloody nose crying for his mother. Combine this layered aesthetic of "youth in revolt" with perhaps one of the more satisfying paybacks in recent cinema, Sun Scarred is an exceptional entry in the revenge thriller sub genre while not being bogged down by a decent opening and a terribly slow middle; but it's the calculatingly furious finale which proves that Miike still has what made him one of Japan's angriest directors as of recent but even so, with this wild card expect heaps of unwatchable trash with bits of fine metals littering the piles.

SUKIYAKI WESTERN DJANGO

Takashi Miike (2007)

Takashi Miike is critically acclaimed for an estimation of about 5 films. Little does anyone realize, that he has directed about 70 films that don't matter, each getting shittier than the last. Sukiyaki Western Django is his remake of classic spaghetti western film DJANGO. Someone who is known to have no style to his films should never remake a film such as DJANGO. This film has a wayward plot concerning two rebel factions in a town searching for a treasure while wearing ridiculous outfits, muttering broken "engrish". A lone gunman mercenary battles gang member after gang member to no end while frilly swordfighters complain about the fear of death. This remake was made for English audiences in Japan, which can lead to complications. Such as the all Japanese cast speaking horrible English. I found it silly to make a film designed for the lack of subtitles, when you need subtitles to even grasp what they are saying. The beginning opens up with Quentin Tarantino sitting on a log in picturesque background (literally painted for the hyper stylized look). He is surrounded by men and begins to tell a classic tale of the two warring gangs in a horrible accent. It is obvious that Tarantino had a small say in what he says due to the horrible pretentiousness reeking off the script. Japanese films lately have become too full of themselves. They prance around quoting Shakespeare, acting cool with piercings. Due to the Americanization of the film, a villain dubs himself "Henry". It's hard to not laugh when the similar scene from Kung-Pow comes to mind. One pivotal character is a woman who has lost love due to the reds. We then see a scene where she gets fucked staring at her dead husbands body and watching her son cry over it. She now chain-smokes and bar-dances to gloriously capture the agony of her soul. Sukiyaki Western Django is a film that is a bold disgrace to both the art of the Samurai and the essence that westerns carry. After this film, Miike should be exiled into Japan, for it is clear that the influence of Tarantino has ruined his already lacking style.

THE LAST FRANKENSTEIN

Takeshi Kawamura (1991)

Fresh off my acquisition with the incredible The Man Who Stole the Sun, I hopped right back onto similar terrain with Takeshi Kawamura's The Last Frankenstein, a film I have been encouraging myself to watch for some time but only recently attaching subtitles. Taking the bare blueprints of Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, Kawamura, an avant-garde playwright (supposedly wrote the screenplay for a similarly take on classic horror - My Soul is Slashed), took a great deal of fantastical liberties with the progress of a manmade ... man. In The Last Frankenstein, a science teacher named Sarusawa continues to mourn the death of his wife, victim of suicide, and is forced to adapt to a way of life with his telekinetic daughter, Mai. The fragile bond the two share and the city are thrown into turmoil once the recent rash of suicides have been scientifically linked to a disease that is spreading - an epidemic of persuasive death. Seeking out Dr. Aleo, a mad genius whose philosophies of the continuation of our species involve creating, from scratch, new super-humans and forcing them to copulate, Sarusawa hopes that his twisted mind can bring the eventual fall of man to a halt. The Last Frankenstein, if one thing, is certainly Japan's own. Taking post-modernism and Western influence into account, Kawamura has been crafting subversive stage plays using these similar aesthetics of J-culture and Western persuasion since the 80s, The Last Frankenstein being an earlier theatrical production of his own design. For reasons he saw fit, perhaps due to the epic apocalypse within, a feature length film was made.

Opening on Moonlight Sonata, The Last Frankenstein establishes itself as a film that has intentions to move, which surprisingly, it does. Even the avant-garde absurdist nature of Kawamura's lovechild never gets in the way of a larger effect on the humanity of the viewers. The warnings came early with the appearance of various strings of "suicide clubs" that crept along the city streets simply chanting "death" to the point of irrepressible audible meltdown. To understand the very fractured way of life expressly lead by Sarusawa, one must realize the burden left on him by his wife's suicide. Certainly a selfish act, or was it? With word that the suicides can be linked to a disease, a bodily manifestation of a virus leading one to take their own life, surely his wife couldn't have carried this same bug, or could she? Carrier, perhaps - This question and more are asked very subtly by director Kawamura. Never is it stated but always does it resonate. The pure melancholy of it all achieves a far greater emotional impact than more than half of engaging international cinema past millennium. A leading intellectual on the school board mentions the mad Dr. Aleo and reassures Kawamura of Aleo's notoriety. Upon leaving his study, a gunshot rings through the hallway causing Sarusawa to pause, drop the collected works of Aleo, and sprint back into the room, only to find an apology letter and brain matter on mahogany. This is just one example of how the collected effect of The Last Frankenstein ranges from humorous to frightening. Witnessing a hunchbacked assistant prowl the streets at night, in order to kidnap women, Sarusawa gives chase to the hissing abomination. This eventually results in Sarusawa's extended stay at Dr. Aleo's castle, which, more or less, is the near death experience for The Last Frankenstein.

Here lies my only problem with The Last Frankenstein. Originally conceived as a theatrical stage play in 1986, the filmic rendition of Kawamura's inspired reaction to increasing Japanese suicide left him three separate acts, each with their great strengths. The first act, discovery of the death religion, bears a great weight on human empathy. Staying silly, but not too silly; builds up to a boiling confrontation with death, eventual, of course. The second act stays strong with the impending doom of complete self-annihilation of, not just Japanese culture, but the world. Balancing both comedy and tragedy, the second act is the strongest of all. The third act finds itself around an hour and a half into the feature with Sarusawa's stay welcomed and his daughter being used in the creation of the creatures. Romance is fleeting and the script gets flighty. Balance is the main issue I have with the finale. The Last Frankenstein's final moments toss out recognition of previous events. In fact, the suicide virus is mentioned briefly, as Aleo refuses to help humankind, rather, let them die out in order to kick-start a new race, and the cult only returns in one swift scene and disappears entirely from the film. For spending the better half of an hour on such tragic events, only to cast them out in favor of absurdism and repetitious scenes of two sewn bodies of "perfection" watch pornographic material, you'd think The Last Frankenstein would have some grand plan up its rotted sleeve. Regardless of this, which I didn't favor, The Last Frankenstein is still an utterly excellent film. Marvelously acted, weighty, and gloomy, it surely has to be seen in order to believe.

Takeshi Kitano (1993)

I'd like to start this review of one of Takeshi Kitano's indisputable masterpieces with a quote from prolific French actor Alain Delon -- "this is not an actor [...], he only got three facial expressions and he almost doesn't talk on top of this". This, of course, is an indirect retaliation towards a recommendation from a French publisher. You would think Delon would know something about the beauty of stoicism, if harnessed correctly, and Kitano is indeed an expert in his craft of cruelty. Words like these bring about an image of immaturity. Something you can recall faintly on a recess yard, something that conjures mental remnants of runny noses, tattletales, and soiled jeans. The error in part of Delon's was not to rival Kitano's picture, which may or may not have offended his delicate and pampered sensibilities, but the lack of effort on his part to embrace something that switches between cold and warm on a whim. What I am referring to is Kitano's excellent chemistry with the camera. Sonatine is one of many masterpieces that Kitano himself wrote and directed. Taking a natural and personal turn in utilizing stoic suicide as the centerpiece, Sonatine marks the film before his near-fatal motorcycle accident that Kitano himself referred to as an "unconscious suicide attempt". This, no doubt, can be partially blamed on the incredibly bleak and nihilistic atmosphere of his earlier pictures. Continuing on, Sonatine is a scrapbook of the best and the worst of what life has to offer - a stunning collaboration between the warm embrace of life and the fleeting triumph of death.

Sonatine concerns its pivotal character Murakawa and his ever-increasing dread. A ruthless and emotionless Yakuza, Murakawa and his gang are sent to the tropical island of Okinawa to mediate between two warring clans. Knowing better, Murakawa senses danger, a waft of betrayal. Sure enough, Murakawa and his gang are ambushed and having nowhere else to go, retreat to a seaside cabin and spend their time exploring the inner reaches of playfulness - successfully rekindling a comfort that they had long since forgotten. Essentially, Sonatine is about men regressing back into boyhood, the polar opposite of your standard coming-of-age story. Sonatine takes this formula and rewinds it, thus making it a point to connect with our inner child instead of aggressively chasing after dreams of mortgage, responsibility, and the ever-looming presence of total and utter detachment. Murakawa experiences this the most out of all his fellow criminals. Seen earlier on, resulting in the life of a rival, Murakawa now spends his time playfully bantering with a woman he rescued from a rape situation and engaging in activities that border on both extremes, e.g. a game of fortified roman candle warfare turns sharply as Murakawa smiles and unloads his weapon in the general vicinity of his rival team, still his own men, mind you. Another example would be the game of William Tell quickly turned even more sinister with Murakawa's implementation of Russian Roulette rules mixed with a splendid game of Rock-paper-scissors.

Suits are abandoned for Hawaiian shirts, past discrepancies are wiped away - all that is left in Sonatine is a group of kids with weapons. Contrast that with both Kitano and Murakawa's wavering will to live and you have a poetic piece of self-doubt and what was once imprinted on celluloid, will now be imprinted upon your memory banks. Kitano is an accomplished actor and a cultural icon, one of which you have seen before. Either the uncultured in film will recognize him from the likes of MXC or Johnny Mnemonic or ones suited to Japanese cinema will recognize him from Battle Royale, Izo, or any of his sobering directorial efforts, such as his debut film, Violent Cop. Sonatine also happens to be influenced by Sympathy for the Underdog, directed by Kinji Fukasaku, the director of Battle Royale and a portion of Battle Royale II (before his passing). This might be in part to Fukasaku's backing out of directing Violent Cop originally. Kitano just so happened to pick up the project and severely rewrite the script, thus equating in the masterwork that is "up there" with the gloomiest motion pictures in existence. It is the touch that Kitano presents that takes his films from the ordinarily twisted into such an extreme and intimate nature. And as I mentioned before, the profound impact isn't from the spent shell casings clattering on the floor nor the projectiles ejected from the weapon, it's the unflinching eye of Kitano's, evident in any scene of violence that he himself partakes in. It's the smile he bares on occasion and it's the beauty and honor of his bloodshed.

The finale of Sonatine is of grave importance to Murakawa's condition. After watching his men get picked off one by one, it stands a silence that is hardly a whisper. Murakawa must act now. Not only has he been betrayed for greed and his men left to die, the principal of such is nonexistent. Murakawa isn't a good man, he is a cold killer, but honor has been a constant in Japanese society, and so Murakawa must persist. Sonatine is Kitano's career paradoxically perfected - a tender assault on the senses. The breadth of his visual lyricism is compelling and the classical soundtrack is a beaut. Sonatine channels light and dark exquisitely and creates characters so temperamental, brash, and endearing that as they drop like flies, you can't help but to focus on the better times and withhold moments of vulnerability, as per Murakawa's hardened behavioral traits. This is largely evident in a scene in which Murakawa, resting peacefully and hidden by the hull of a beached boat, stares at the horror-stricken face of a comrade as he receives a bullet directly in his forehead. Sonatine promises to assuage any and all desires for explicable artistry in film. It is the peak of Kitano's directing career and bittersweet to the very last frame. Kitano's acting style may seem odd to the third party audience member but when examined at a closer distance, becomes something that no one has ever achieved before - a keen ability to smile in the face of death. Sonatine is perfect.

NEGATIVE HAPPY CHAINSAW EDGE

Takuji Kitamura (2008)

Japan's answer to the nerd-chic counterculture lies within Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge. What I'm referring to is the demand for such backwards absurd material bordering the idea of zombie ninjas vs. pirates with talking wigs. If you're salivating at the mention of that idea, please leave this website. Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge is based off an unheard of manga that concerns a boy who follows a warrior-schoolgirl to various locations at night to fight a Chainsaw-armed cloaked wraith that falls from the sky, prompting snow. While the idea is, at times, enjoyable, Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge's low fuel tank sputters occasionally in key plot driven scenes, not just a hiccup here or there, but comes to a standstill position that leaves itself vulnerable to attack, much like our irritating subhuman lead.

From the opening scene of snow drifting down slowly then stopping, beautifully frozen in time, we witness a hulking and dreadfully intimidating figure wielding a chainsaw. His lumbering pace over a bridge brings him in contact with his mortal enemy, schoolgirl Eri-chan. Yamamoto decides to prove his virility to his dead friend by accompanying her on future nightly missions of CGI-injected masturbatory dreams of chainsaw-dagger deflection starring the presence of a prepubescent klutz that is completely soulless and unlikable. The former is the greatest wound to the enormous ego of Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge. Every minute that Yamamoto is present on the screen, the more entertainment this film loses. Soon you'll become so tired of his pathetic countenance that you will consider him a plague of sorts. I can imagine putting this single character in American classics just to watch the film crash and burn, whimper and die. What an experiment that would be!

On terms with other East Asian splurges of stylized violence and CGI misuse, Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge stands victor over some of the other abominations as Tokyo Gore Police and 1/2 of Meatball Machine. Now in Negative Happy's defense, Chainsaw Edge features a storyline that is interesting, trampled at worst, and adds tissue to the characters. The idea of a Super Shredder-like wraith that grows larger based on emotion is a stellar idea and I'd love to see this concept more based around an action-oriented foundation, rather than a bumbling romantic-chainsaw-comedy. Try as it might, Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge never fully develops into a prime piece of film, as in beginning, middle, and ending. It stays developed within its own cocoon and struggles for life in a strictly metaphorical sense. It might have the aesthetics to embellish it within the cult and foreign fan base but there's not really much to admire other than sometimes-slick visuals from a first time director. Imagine a similar octane style to Wanted, except rationed out in extremely tiny increments. In battle, the chainsaw wraith will throttle his mechanical appendage which results in a detailed and hyperkinetic autopsy scene showing the implausible mechanization of his deadly arm. This leaves much to be expected but sadly deploys the overused cop-out method of Eri throwing a quartet of daggers only to swat them out of the way using slow motion. I'm not exaggerating - we see this same scene up to near three times. For being a later incarnation of the ancient Nikkatsu studio, I expected more, however, I was treated to a more story-based envisioning of new-wave Japanese absurdities. Had this been created with a youthful, angry approach rather than being characterized as timid like a mouse, Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge would be visitable over and over again. I don't regret watching the film but its priorities are severely out of wack.

NIKU DARUMA

Tamakichi Anaru (1998)

Also known as Psycho: The Snuff Reels. Also known as Tumbling Doll of Flesh. Amidst the J-sploitation onslaught that ravaged gorehounds leaving them stirring in their sleep, Tamakichi Anaru created some of the more prolific films. You may have heard of Suicide Dolls, Womens Flesh: My Red Guts, or his masterpiece - Niku Daruma. One can only assume from the sur-title "Snuff Reels", the transfixed idea had been brainstormed for a short period of time. A Hole in My Heart, this is not. A copy of subtitles has been scavenged for since the dawn of this film. I prefer the lack of words to be honest. It creates a false sense of security and births tension so thick that you could cut it with a knife. Had video art films had commentary explaining what each shot means and forcing you to interpret it one way, the mysticism would be gone. The unknown is much more satisfying, pointed out by Fox's comment on La Cabina. If Unearthed Films ever decides to release this film, the subtitles should be turned off by default. The plot in a nutshell is a home video tape of an amateur porn shoot in which an ugly ass Asiatic woman (with Dolphin teeth) gets picked up for a home video. It starts off normal enough with the trademarked Japanese mosaic covering the genitals, but then they begin to sodomize her and practice Japanese rope bondage. She doesn't take too kind to this and leaves for the bathroom. Upon entrance, she is hit upon the head with a bat and tied up to star in her greatest - and last performance. In the arsenal of graphic imagery at hand, there comes many newcomers to cinema in general. Such infamous scenes as the potato peeler scene populate Niku Daruma. A male fucks a drugged woman while she becomes a multiple amputee. Her screams were voted to be cut short by swift way of potato peeler to her tongue in graphic and shocking detail. A hole is cut in her stomach then fucked by the male porn star only to ejaculate a crude mix of sex fluids and blood. The scenes of violence are aided with the hand of the sound of her curdling cries choking on blood. The real question is, would you except death for pleasure? Think Flowers of Flesh & Blood but sleazier. Niku Daruma will undoubtedly leave a horrendous taste in your mouth. Tamakichi "Anal" Anaru has transformed shoddy directing into a disgusting art form, not quite on the scale of visual performance pieces but a perfected Jess Franco technique, though shocking to the touch. Niku Daruma has nauseated people across the globe (that is, if they can find it). This film has inspired some truly pathetic talent such as horrorcore rapper Sutter Kane (from Carpenter & Lovecraft). His newest album is called Cyco: The Snuff Reels. I'd prefer to avoid this material. In any case, this film has received some less-than-favorable reception, but then again, most people that watch these films always seem to miss the depth and beauty of sex & death. It would be reasonable to say I have an aesthetic fascination of such topics.

SUICIDE DOLLS

Tamakichi Anaru (1999)

Chances are that you've heard of Team Psycho, that is, if you follow exploitation or foreign smut closely. Their film Psycho: The Snuff Reels (Tumbling Doll of Flesh) is the most well known, followed by the harakiri short Womens Flesh: My Red Guts. The other effort of theirs is called Suicide Dolls. Now first off, I must hand it to them for some very creative and depraved titles. Tumbling Doll of Flesh would make a great bumper sticker. Suicide Dolls takes a failed Der Todesking approach on suicide. It follows three women who commit suicides three different ways. Rather than focusing on the effects of deterioration or even madness, this takes a silent aspect of the method of suicide. Without subtitles, we aren't missing much. Team Psycho aren't well known for having story-driven films, i can assume. The first woman has a newly purchased apartment and seems to be bored out of her damned mind. She is surrounding my towering boxes of her belongings, none of which she has unpacked. Time passes slowly as we begin to yawn and feel the same blueness that our bedazzling heroine is feeling. Just like Loſt Highway, it was the directors idea to create a boring atmosphere. This woman answers her phone, chats for a minute, and resumes her boring life. Eventually, she finds a handgun in her possessions and while playing with it, blows her brains out. Then her doorbell rings. Then we encounter a hanging and last but not least, some good ole' fashioned harakiri including a last minute eyeball scooping scene. Team Psycho is known for their extreme amount of pornography and explicit gore and violence, and it is not like them to disappoint. As usual, the sets fucking blow. The style of film making is bland and leaves a tart taste in your mouth. While being a fan of J-sploitation though, I can't hold the technical aspects against this film. Suicide Dolls does what it intends to do; shock and offend. The scenes after the suicides are also extremely unsettling due to the silence and monotone environment surrounding the recently departed. Suicide Dolls opens up with an eerie stop motion animation and ends with the same, leaving us with a spooky message of death. Suicide Dolls is a trip worth delving into.

WOMEN'S FLESH: MY RED GUTS

Tamakichi Anaru (1999)

Tamakichi Anaru, the director behind the more infamous Niku Daruma and Suicide Dolls, directed this short film alternatively titled Watashi no akai harawata (hana). It follows two traumatized females and their own quest into various forms of self-mutilation. This is typically a film you can only get on the glorious trails of the world wide web, so have fun searching. The film opens with a block of Japanese text which has a date. There are currently no subs for this film so as to what it says, i have no idea. The first scene is a static flash of light over a woman in a bathroom. She seems to be in a state of shock, barely noticing the flickering light up ahead. She begins to stand up and notices the toothbrush in it's respected cup. She takes it out and begins to play with it, slowly massaging its tip and then deep throating it. The build up almost seems reminiscent of the similar scene in Cutting Moments. After salivating it up some, she begins to insert it inside her, toying around. This scene could have been repulsing had the director decided to fix the huge goof in which she manages to penetrate herself while wearing underwear. I can see that this is due to the anti-genitalia laws in Japan. After teasing she begins to prod and stab at her womanly parts until blood and tissue fall out. If this sounds bad, wait till she begins to chew the tip of her index finger off. For some reason, that really got to me. Something about tearing joints and fountains of blood being gargled that bothers me. We then switch to victim # 2 who begins stabbing herself with a fork. Seems these women have a thing for mutilation. We see harakiri being performed. At first, her intestines greatly resemble the old "sausage link under shirt" but as soon as she bites into them, i lost track of what they were. After this, she decides to cut her tongue off. Funny thing is, is that she didn't even hold it. I don't care how much you love pain, you need to hold it or else your instinct will be to retreat it in your mouth. Even the great Kakiyama knew to hold it. After all is said and done, we seem a panning camera detailing their dead bodies, zooming into the violated parts and switching editing styles faster then a Michael Bay film. Women's Flesh: My Red Guts is a decent splatter film. Nothing to really hold it together though. Only a couple flashback scenes with imperceptible phrases. After the main feature, we have another short film from BAROQUE which is a 10 minute long scene with random dead people on the streets including deformed babies. An entertaining film compilation for the most part. Could have skipped a couple of the scenes and the "repetitious zoom in to the same action being performed to add to the shock value" mentality of the director. See this as an addition to watching extreme J-sploitation films.

Special thanks to Louis over at The Coroner's Report for this upload.

THE SPERM

Taweewat Wantha (2007)

Thai films are loaded with promise now-a-days. We got the amazing martial artist Tony Jaa, mixed with the new upcoming Martial Arts meets autism film Chocolate. It was no surprise to me that the film The Sperm was going to be great, I just had no idea it was going to be this damn quirky. Suthin is an average American youth, but Thai. He loves Slipknot, metal, and masturbation. Over a drunken clamor, he stumbles into the city streets and masturbates over a photo of the love of his life; An actress named Lammy. His sperm meets radiation and become crazy and multiply, bouncing around the streets impregnating women all over the capital of Bangkok. What makes this different is the fact that these babies grow within 24 hours. The Sperm is essentially a comedy, but is a mutt of sorts. It's main course is science fiction but is also a romance, sex comedy, and drama. The Sperm is the creation of a mix between Michel Gondry and Judd Apatow. The film never gets old and always keeps you the edge of your seat with it's own frenetic zaniness. It is loaded with visual flair and effects, including comic style introductory panels and a 50 foot tall masturbating clone of Suthin. You have never seen anything like this. The Sperm has acquired a couple of negative remarks from critics in Thailand, but it seems they don't appreciate original concepts and ideas just as Russia spites creativity. The film speaks of it's deep morals in a non-subversive way, teeming with anti-whore ads. It's basically an allegory for how these swim suit magazines and theories that sex sells are transforming our youth into sex crazed hormonal slackers. Which may or may not be true. For a script, it flows with creativity and pop culture references. It's truly is a beautiful sight. Respect goes out to the entirely original idea and concept. I forgot the last time a film pulled a double surprise on me. It built me up casually to it's ending. When i found out what happened, it did a complete u-turn and left me wholly satisfied. All in all, The Sperm is a zany, mad-cap look at modern sexuality, a sexual extremity in comedy, and one of the damn cutest films i have had the insane pleasure to view recently.

WAKE IN FRIGHT
WAKE IN FRIGHT

Ted Kotcheff (1971)

It has always been a dream scenario of mine to have some of the most effete, uptight, and culturally intolerant leftist pansies, social justice warrior dorks, and other mental cripples to be forced to spend a week or so in the company of highly hospitable hardworking and hard-drinking rednecks, as it would probably be very beneficial to their mental health and help to demystify their grand delusions in regard to their supposed enemies and how the world works as a whole. Thankfully, the classic Australian artsploitation drama-thriller Wake in Fright (1971) aka Outback directed by Bulgarian-Canadian filmmaker Ted Kotcheff (First Blood, Uncommon Valor) features a somewhat similar scenario in its delightfully daunting depiction of a pretentious, uptight, and exceedingly effete school teacher portrayed by real-life gay boy Gary Bond—an English actor of Welsh extraction that died of AIDS on 12 October 1995 at the age of 55, exactly one month after his boyfriend Jeremy Brett's death—that finds himself descending into complete and utter moral depravity and mental derangement after being stranded in a proudly blue collar mining town located in the hellishly hot and arid Australian Outback. A cinematic work that some native Australians somewhat rightly argued exploited their people and culture, Kotcheff's fourth feature is a rare cinematic work that manages to be made of equal doses of both art and trash in the best sort of way imaginable. Despite its fairly distinct and organic regional setting, the film is also a rare film that features a rather realistic and uniquely unsentimental yet nonetheless empathetic depiction of the white working-class (as director Kotcheff has noted in various interviews, he and his crew more or less lived like the locals throughout the film's production). Indeed, while I have never been to Australia, the characters in the film were in many ways shockingly familiar to me in terms of their aggressive hospitality, exaggerated extroversion, hardcore dipsomania, playful fighting and wrestling, and strong zest for life despite living fairly meager existences due to my personal experiences with the working-class whites I grew up with. In fact, when I first saw the film, I was shocked by how much similar these characters were to some of my real-friends who degenerated into hardcore alcoholism after succumbing to a life of full-time lumpenproletariatism. Made at a time before wiggers, OxyContin, crystal meth, and tolerance towards miscegenation, Wake in Fright manages to portray the good, the bad, and the ugly of the white working-class in a manner that would actually appeal to said white working-class while, at the same time, exposing the hypocrisy, effeminacy, and overall soullessness of certain members of the sheltered bourgeois.

A classic cinematic work that is like the missing link between the Australian New Wave and Ozploitation (not unsurprisingly, the film has been somewhat rightly credited as belonging to both movements), Wake in Fright is like a uniquely unkosher Kafkaesque fever dream full of cheap beer and bloody kangaroos that reminds the viewer that man is an animal and being an animal is far more preferable to being a spiritually castrated cosmopolitan cocksucker that merely complains about life instead of actually living it. Arguably the greatest and most emotionally daunting 'drinking film' ever made aside from possibly John Huston's underrated Malcolm Lowry adaptation Under the Volcano (1984), the film is like a coming-of-age piece depicting a 30-something-year-old wuss whose testicles never dropped and ultimately receives a most ruthless rite of passage into unadulterated manhood that includes kangaroo slaughtering and booze-fueled homo rape, among other less than polite things that do not typically involve a pansy school teacher. Adapted for the screen by Anglo-Jamaican screenwriter Evan Jones (Modesty Blaise, Funeral in Berlin) from the 1961 novel of the same name by Australian writer and documentarian Kenneth Cook, Wake in Fright hardly feels like a contrived and closely scripted work as it features many real-life Aussie Wildmen as extras and in unforgettable secondary roles that add to the film's distinct charm. Additionally, the film features seemingly nil bogus film sets and was shot in buildings and homes that reek of postcolonial decay and cultural decrepitude. Of course, the film is also (in)famous for featuring real-life nocturnal kangaroo killings despite the director being a vegetarian, but one should not expect anything less in a cinematic work that attempts to feature an accurate portrayal of Aussie rednecks who, not unlike their American counterparts, are and will forever be the only true representatives of their nation as men whose blood built that countries they live in. Needless to say, the film does not do anything to help Australia's reputation as being the land of the semi-feral white shackle draggers, but then again it is hard not to like many of these supposed dingo-fuckers once you have seen the film. While the film does not feature any characters that are as depraved as the eponymous antihero of Dutch-Australian auteur Rolf de Heer's classic cult item Bad Boy Bubby (1993), it does feature the sort of Aussie wild men that might make illegal immigrants think twice about flooding into Australia.

Notably, in his rather prophetic work The Passing of the Great Race: Or, The Racial Basis of European History (1916), American lawyer, eugenicist, and conservationist Madison Grant wrote a century ago, "Australia and New Zealand, where the natives have been virtually exterminated by the whites, are developing into communities of pure Nordic blood and will for that reason play a large part in the future history of the Pacific. The bitter opposition of the Australians and Californians to the admission of Chinese coolies and Japanese farmers is due primarily to a blind but absolutely justified determination to keep those lands as white man's countries." Judging simply by Wake in Fright, one would assume that Australia has more or less the same hearty no bullshit racial stock that Grant speaks of, but of course, like all of the West, the nation has since had a deluge of undesirables and untermenschen from various third world hellholes. In Kotcheff's film, the viewer is exposed to a fairly primitive type of Nordic stock that seems to still carry the mirthfully barbaric spirit of its Viking ancestors. Indeed, forget the absurd Hollywood stereotype of the dark-haired hero, Wake in Fright features true blue blond beasts of prey that hunt, kill, and fuck just for the instinctive thrill of it all. Undoubtedly, Nietzsche certainly describes the kangaroo hunters of the film when he describes the ancient Nordics as follows, "at the bottom of all these noble races the beast of prey, the splendid blond beast, prowling about avidly in search of spoil and victory; this hidden core needs to erupt from time to time, the animal has to get out again and go back to the wilderness." Not unlike various parts of rural America, New Zealand, and other ex-colonies, the Outback is place where archaic European instincts have the opportunity to be shamelessly exercised, or so one learns while watching Wake in Fright where a pansy ass prick is forced to come in touch with his more visceral and even murderous side after being egged on by proudly boorish men that seem to have been passed by a couple centuries worth of advancements in European civilization.

While Wake in Fright is full of wild and reckless blond beasts, the deracinated blond Nordic protagonist John Grant (Gary Bond) is certainly no Übermensch as he is a smug yet impotent, intelligent yet weak, and cultivated yet cultureless cosmopolitan white man that is quite typical nowadays, especially in Europa. Naturally, it is only most fitting that Mr. Grant is portrayed by a cocksucking Brit as opposed to an Aussie as the character is symbolic of spiritually castrated, morally decrepit, and innately suicidal contemporary Europe, which has lost all touch with the sort of instincts that once made it great. Additionally, while John has blond hair and a typical tall Nordic physique, his eyes, which look more like they belong to a neurotic Mongolian little girl than a proud Europid man, are a clear window into his hopelessly effeminate and decadent soul. An anally retentive introvert that does everything by the book despite his disdain for authority who spends his free time drawing, reading about Plato, and hopelessly dreaming of going to the beach with his Sydney-based girlfriend, John is relatively impotent chap that gets the shock of the lifetime when he spends some quality time with a clan of working-class heroes with big balls and loudmouths. As a result of being a self-described "bonded slave of the Education Department," John is forced against his will to teach at a tiny grade school in a small Outback hellhole named 'Tiboonda.' Luckily for him, John has six weeks off for Christmas break and plans to spend it with his girlfriend in Sydney. Rather unfortunately, before flying to Sydney, John makes the unwitting life-changing mistake of spending the night in a small isolated hick city named Bundanyabba (aka 'the Yabba') that ultimately swallows him up and violently vomits him out.

Not long after arriving in the Yabba, John meets a seemingly nice and gregarious local cop with a subtle sinister undercurrent named Jock Crawford (popular Aussie actor Chips Rafferty in his final acting role) at a local bar that uses his passive-aggressive charm to force the protagonist to get drunk with him to the point where he gets stupidly drunk. While Jock is friendly with John, it is obvious that he thinks the protagonist is a pretentious and whiny little twat. Needless to say, John has a smug response when all of the patrons stop drinking and gambling at the bar to engage in a nightly “Lest We Forget” ritual in tribute to fallen Australian military men that are glorified with a fancy plaque on the wall. Even in a thoroughly inebriated state, John cannot help but reveal his sense of superiority over Jock and the rest of the Yabba locals, but it is ultimately these working-class philistines that have the last laugh. Of course, little does John release that Jock is a sly fellow that, not unlike a degenerate dope dealer, is slowly but surely getting the protagonist immersed in a hermetic realm of nightmarish hick hedonism and self-destructive lowbrow decadence that eventually inspires both desperate murderous and suicidal impulses in the fairly fragile character. After begging Jock to take him to a place to eat where he buys a nice fat juicy steak, John meets a super degenerate hobo philosopher of sorts named Clarence ‘Doc’ Tydon (Donald Pleasence of Halloween (1978) fame), who passively states regarding the Yabba locals, “All the little devils are proud of hell.” When John asks Doc what he means, he reveals his strange empathy for the locals by replying, “Discontent is a luxury of the well-to-do. If you gotta live here, you might as well like it.” When John reveals his intolerance of the locals by stating, “I’m just bored with it. The aggressive hospitality, the arrogance of stupid people who insist you should be as stupid as they are,” Doc ridicules his pretenses by replying, “It’s death to farm out here. It’s worse than death in the mines. Do you want them to sing opera as well?” While John does not know it yet, he and Doc will soon become disturbingly close in a way that neither will ever forget.

When John foolishly loses all of his money in the “Biggest two-up game in Australia” in a desperate attempt to earn enough cash to pay off his bond as a teacher and leave the redneck Outback for good, he finds himself coming to the bitter realization that he is stranded in Yabba pandemonium indefinitely and naturally becomes a completely intolerable prick as a result. In fact, John acts like a complete dickhead to an old guy named Tim Hynes (Al Thomas) after he asks him to drink with him at a bar, but the insulted working-class hero lightens him up by buying him endless drinks, albeit not before screaming in his face that he will pay for his drinks. When Tim later takes him back to his house, John meets his lecherous debutante daughter Janette (Sylvia Kay), who carefully stares him down and eventually makes a botched attempt at fucking him only hours after first meeting him. Unfortunately, John is incapable of even commencing coitus due to a rather embarrassing vomiting fit. At Tim’s house, John is also introduced to two handsome and muscular yet barbarically gregarious dudes named Dick (Jack Thompson) and Joe (Peter Whittle) who assume the protagonist is a poofster because he strangely prefers talking to Janette to drinking beer with the boys. Despite his initial flaky behavior at Tim’s house, John eventually joins the party and ultimately gets so drunk that he is surprised to wake up the next day at 4pm in Doc's dilapidated shack with a killer hangover that he reluctantly nurses with more booze and kangaroo meat. On top of revealing that he does not even actually own the shitty shack he lives in, Doc tells John his entire patently pathetic life-story, stating with a sort of subtly ironic pride, "Shall I satisfy your curiosity? I'm a doctor of medicine. And a tramp by temperament. I'm also an alcoholic. My disease prevented me from practicing in Sydney, but out here it's scarcely noticeable. Certainly doesn't stop people from coming to see me. I charge no fees because I'm not interested in money. Anyway, I'm unreliable. But I'm accepted socially because I'm an educated man . . . of character. I get me food from my friends. My requirements in beer. Which, with some measure of self-control, is the only alcohol I allow myself. It's possible to live forever in the Yabba without money. As you probably noticed, some of the natives are very . . . hospitable." In short, Doc is a shameless social parasite of the highly educated sort that lives off of the generosity of proletarian drunks that take pride in buying another man a beer. Naturally, Doc wants something from John, but it is something that is a bit more personal and intimate than cheap beer.

As Doc makes quite clear, he loathes "little puritans" and states regarding Janette that she is "an interesting biological case" and that "If she were a man, she'd be in jail for rape" due to her rather sexually aggressive behavior. As a fellow outcast and virtual sexual outlaw, Doc sees Janette as a kindred spirit of sorts and is probably the only mensch in the Yabba that truly has respect for her. While he picks on him for his puritanical and anally-retentive behavior, Doc also seems to see a kindred spirit in John and he is bent on getting the protagonist to engage in increasingly degenerate and debasing activities so that he will be more like him. As a result of boasting while drunk the night before that he once "won a silver medal at school for target shooting," John find himself going on an alcohol-fueled hunting expedition of sorts with Doc, Dick, and Joe that involves the extremely violent liquidation of half a dozen or so kangaroos. When Joe demonstrates he is a cool bad ass by 'boxing' and then personally slitting the throat of a large and quite pugnacious kangaroo, John feels obligated to demonstrate his seemingly nonexistent masculinity and takes on a poor animal that he himself describes as "badly wounded" and "just a baby." Clearly uncomfortable with killing the virtually defenseless creature, John hysterically cries and punches the kangaroos while Doc and his friends laugh hysterically at his seemingly bizarre melodramatic behavior, though the protagonist eventually gets the gall to slit the poor animal's throat. After John kills the kangaroo, Doc reveals his approval by stating to himself in an almost sinister fashion, "Well done" and then the entire group declares to the protagonist, "Now you're one of us." To celebrate their reasonably successful roo-slaughter campaign, the boys go to a local seedy bar where Dick and Joe engage in some fairly brutal play-fighting that involves blood while Doc philosophizes with a hammer and reveals he is a sort of Cioran of the Outback by aggressively proclaiming, "Progress? Vanity spawned of fear. A vanity spawned by fear. The aim of what you call civilization is a man in a smoking jacket, whisky and cider, pressing a bottom of . . . a button . . . to destroy a planet a billion miles away, kill a billion people he's never seen." After John passes out, Doc, Joe, and Dick get involved in a hilarious anarchic three-way brawl that more or less results in the destruction of the entire bar. Of course, Doc's savagery does not end there, as he opts to sexually seduce John when they get back to the shack in what can probably be best described as gay redneck date rape. Needless to say, John is more than a little bit perturbed when he wakes up the next day lying next to a pantless Doc and realizes that he has just been involuntarily sodomized by a stinky old wino.

Naturally, John hightails it out of Doc's shack when he realizes he is a victim of homo sodomy, but not before grabbing a rifle that was gifted to him by Dick and Joe for his senseless killing of the little kangaroo. Indeed, while roaming around downtown Yabba with the rifle in his arms and his body and clothes covered in dirt as perplexed onlookers stare at him in disbelief, John looks like a desperate derelict that has just been gang-banged by an entire motorcycle gang. Of course, John is desperate to get out of the Yabba by any means possible, but before he does he bumps into his old cop pal Jock, who supplies him with some much needed nicotine and beer in between questioning about his dubious behavior and plans. While John manages to hitch a ride 50 miles out of town from a less than dapper toothless hick, he treats the poor guy like shit by refusing to have a drink with him and then complaining, "What's the matter with you people, huh? You sponge on you . . . You burn your house down, murder your wife, rape your child, that's all right. But don't have a drink with you, don't have a flaming, bloody drink with you, that's a criminal offense, that's the end of the bloody world." Ultimately, John offers a trucker his new prized rifle for a ride to Sydney, but when he finally arrives at his ostensible desire location, he realizes he is in the Yabba again as a result of a miscommunication between him and the less than sophisticated driver. Luckily, the trucker lets John keep the rifle due to the miscommunication, so the protagonist irrationally decides to use the weapon to kill Doc, as if it will somehow redeem him of being rectally reamed. Unfortunately Doc is not at the shack when he gets there, so John changes his plans slightly and turns the gun on himself in what ultimately proves to be a badly botched attempt at improvisational DIY self-slaughter. On top of surviving the suicide attempt despite having the barrel of the gun pointed directly at his head at ultra-close-range, Jock, who is not too fond of his hometown's high suicide rate (apparently, in real-life, the Yabba had a female suicide rate that was five times the national average during the 1970s), decides to coverup said suicide attempt by writing a phony police report that John signs that declares that he shot himself by accident. When John finally recovers from his injuries and gets out of the hospital, Doc greets him and declares, "You'd think a bloke who'd won a silver medal at target shooting could hit himself in the head at a range of three inches.” In the end, the film comes full circles, with going back to Tiboonda and drinking with a local bartender-cum-slumlord named Charlie. As to what the future holds for John, I certainly would not be surprised if he degenerated into a sort of more anally retentive version of Doc and became a perennially wandering lost soul that is fueled by cheap alcohol and plagued by regrettable sexual encounters.

While Nicholas Roeg’s first solo feature Walkabout (1971) is indubitably a seemingly immaculate flick that is to the Outback what Arnold Fanck’s Der heilige Berg (1926) aka The Holy Mountain is to the Teutonic mountain film and what Sergio Leone’s The Good, the Bad and the Ugly (1966) is to the spaghetti western, Wake in Fright is arguably the single greatest and most entrancing Outback flick ever made, even if it was directed by a guy that would go on to direct such hokey Hollywood kitsch as Weekend at Bernie’s (1989) and Borrowed Hearts: A Holiday Romance (1997), among other less than artistically significant cinematic works. Indeed, the film might be somewhat exploitative in its portrayal of the Outback and its seemingly forsaken inhabitants, but it certainly does not make a pathetic mockery of ‘Australian Aryan noble savage’ myth like a carelessly goofy Hollywood flick like Crocodile Dundee (1986), which incidentally seems like the sort of film Kotcheff might have directed later in his career. Despite not being nearly as big of a commercial success as his later films like Weekend at Bernie’s, Kotcheff more or less confesses in the audio commentary for the Drafthouse Films DVD/Blu-ray release of the film that it is his greatest cinematic work, as well as the movie that he had the most fun working on. Kotcheff is also quite proud of the fact that Wake in Fright is one of only two films to have ever been screened twice in the entire history of the Cannes Film Festival (notably, Martin Scorsese, who originally saw the film when it had its world premiere at the festival in 1971, used his clout as the head of the Cannes Classic department to have the film screened in 2009 after it underwent a much needed restoration). Aside from being what is arguably the most endlessly entrancing, shocking, and unforgettable film about the Outback, Kotcheff’s cult classic is, aside from possibly Terry Gilliam’s Brazil (1985), the most innately un-Christmas of Christmas films, even if it is a cinematic gift that keeps on giving in terms of sheer replay value. Somewhat surprisingly, Wake in Fright is not the only classic Australian cult flick directed by a Slavic outsider that features references to Christmas time, as Dusan Makavejev’s underrated absurdist comedy The Coca-Cola Kid (1985) features Italian-Australian actress Greta Scacchi stripping off a Santa Claus outfit so that she can fuck Eric Roberts. While fairly different films in terms of message and emotional tone, Wake in Fright and The Coca-Cola Kid surely make for an immaculate double feature.

In the audio commentary for Wake in Fright, auteur Kotcheff noted that the working-class Aussies that he interacted with on the film were no different than the lumpenproles he knew growing up in Ontario, Canada in terms of their proud patriarchal love of beer, fighting, fucking, and merry violence. As an American that grew up in a nice rural area just below the Mason–Dixon line yet was born a good number of decades after Kotcheff’s Canadian prole buddies, I can still concur that the working-class whites that I sometimes hung out with during my early adult years are strikingly similar to the ones featured in the film, even in terms of bizarre quasi-homoerotic behavior. Indeed, aside from their tendency to fight and wrestle each while usually sweaty and shirtless, I once witnessed a fellow holding a friend’s penis while he was peeing because he was supposedly too drunk to hold it himself. Of course, Wake in Fright is in many ways a sort of degenerate modernist Männerbund movie that would highly appeal to born-again Androphiles and Jack Donovan fanboys, but arguably most importantly it demonstrates probably better than any other film why Australia is, in terms of the landscapes and eccentric people, one of the greatest places in the world to shoot movies. In fact, as mentioned in Mark Hartley’s mildly amusing doc Not Quite Hollywood: The Wild, Untold Story of Ozploitation! (2008), Kotcheff’s film was probably more influential than any other cinematic work in terms of making Australians realize that their country-cum-continent was the perfect place to create great movies. Surely, no other place could have produced such organically atmospheric cinematic works ranging from Peter Weir’s Picnic at Hanging Rock (1975) and The Last Wave (1977) to Colin Eggleston’s Long Weekend (1978) to George Miller’s Mad Max (1979) to Albie Thoms’ rarely-seen psychedelic avant-garde films like Rita and Dundi (1966) and Marinetti (1969), among seemingly countless other examples. Thankfully, Kotcheff’s film also lacks of the sort of xenophobic white guilt, misguided abo-philia, and anti-Anglo sentiment that is prominent in some of the films of Hebrew Philippe Mora (Swaštika, Mad Dog Morgan) and Fred Schepisi (The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith), among countless others. Notably, the only part of Wake in Fright that features an Australian Aborigine person is an early scene where the protagonist is depicted sitting on a train by himself just like an abo man in a symbolic scenario scene that insinuates that both characters are outsiders in mainstream white society. In its depiction of an effeminate white educator being in the same figurative boat as an Aborigine man, the scene reminded me of a quote from Ted Kaczynski’s classic anti-technology text The Unabomber Manifesto: Industrial Society and Its Future (1995) in regard to why white liberals, who typically come from privileged backgrounds, have a special affinity for racial minorities, “Many leftists have an intense identification with the problems of groups that have an image of being weak (women), defeated (American Indians), repellent (homosexuals), or otherwise inferior. The leftists themselves feel that these groups are inferior. They would never admit it to themselves that they have such feelings, but it is precisely because they do see these groups as inferior that they identify with their problems. (We do not suggest that women, Indians, etc., ARE inferior; we are only making a point about leftist psychology).” Likewise, people like the protagonist of Kotcheff’s film loathes rednecks due to feelings of inferiority in regard to strength and masculinity and not simply because they see working-class whites as insufferable philistines. After all, protagonist John Grant developed a certain degree of much needed masculine confidence and self-esteem after hanging out with the Outback boys.

A work that might be described as a sort of arthouse action-adventure-drama-thriller hybrid for Australian proles that has the capacity to entertain and provoke people of virtually every persuasion, Wake in Fright is certainly as timeless and endlessly enthralling as films come, especially when compared to many Australian films of the same era. Notably, I first saw the film about four years ago when I was at an inordinately happy point of my life. After recently rewatching the film in what is undoubtedly a low point in my life, I can say that it had an even bigger impact of me. Indeed, suddenly I miss the redneck friends of my youth and getting drunk by a bonfire, even if I did not have much to talk about with them aside from the size of a girl's ass and the hilarity of racist jokes. The fact that a tough, visceral, and uncompromising cinematic work like Wake in Fright was directed by a Bulgarian-Canadian filmmaker that is best known for Hollywood hack work and kosher comedies like his Mordecai Richler adaptations The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz (1974) and Joshua Then and Now (1985) certainly makes the film seem all the more magical and enigmatic, as if Ted Kotcheff, not unlike protagonist John Grant, was somehow consumed by the collective unconscious of the Yabba's inhabitants while directing the film. After all, you know a filmmaker is indubitably doing something right when he manages to make a film featuring the unsimulated slaughter of cute kangaroos that does not feel tasteless or pointlessly exploitative. Somehow, I also suspect that Wake in Fright is more accurate in its depiction of the sort of cowboy mentality that was responsible for conquering and taming the wild west than any Hollywood western ever could be.

FIRST BLOOD

*Spoilers for the original Morrel novel of the same name*Regardless of what any one's reasons are for not liking Rambo, their opinion is void on this film. First Blood is not what you'd expect it to be; It's not a brainless action film with a musclebound invincible warrior. It's an incredible story of survival from one of the most emotionally detached action heroes in America. God bless Rambo. First Blood is the relative story most of us have heard, but with more of a vengeance bite. John Rambo is a Vietnam Veteran who won a congressional medal of honor and is an ex-Green Beret. Like most vet's of their time, he is shunned in his society and all of his friends have abandoned him or are now deceased. Rambo is drifting through a quiet suburban town, when a fat fascist pig (played by Brain Dennehy) picks him up, denies him food, and insults his appearance. He drops Rambo off at the edge of town and tells him to walk another 30 miles for food. Rambo being the bad ass that he is, he don't take no shit, and marches back in the town. Seeing this, the Sheriff gets all hyped up and arrests him. In jail, things turn towards the worst when many of the officers get rough with Rambo, using him as a pawn in their sick game. Rambo freaks out, injures many officers, and escapes in the woods which results in one of the most intense survival films ever made. This movie comes from a vicious book sharing the same title, written by David Morrel. The stories are the same, but the differences are many. Rambo kills almost every police officer he comes against. He ever guts an officer with a straight razor. He had it coming. Another difference is that Rambo does not survive in the novel. As that would have been fitting, it would have pissed a lot of simple-minded Yankee's off, and warranted no sequels. This isn't a brainless action film at all. There are explosions, but the maniacal face of Rambo illuminated by the smoldering remains of a society that neglected him is a beautiful image. If only every town had their own Rambo. It seems his films do good things for society, in all honesty. Rambo does what he does best; home-grown propaganda. The music for the film is done by Hollywood's musical slut Jerry Goldsmith. It is an exceptional score which sets the mood for his adventures aloft in the jungle of his soil. Richard Crenna plays the only confidant that Rambo has, his maker. Colonel Trautman is a stern man, who has much appreciation for his soldier. He is the only intelligence throughout the film. As Rambo said "They drew first blood", it sets the tone that has also been felt in such films as La Haine. Many of these police officers feel incredibly real, from having their head stuck up their ass, and the bewilderment from being incapacitated by the Italian Stallion. Just like Friday the 13th, and Halloween, the sequels became more and more silly, involving cartoonish Russians over-acting and using torture techniques. His newest film, aptly titled Rambo, improves and actually delivers a similar feel to the original classic. His original film has been looked down upon due to his "Gung-ho" classic sequels. Quite a shame, but damn are they entertaining. It's official, anyone who says Stallone cannot act, is a fucking retard. That, or they haven't seen the ending of this film. Either way, no one cares about their opinions and should be shot immediately. Rambo is a one man army, who is only beset by his harrowing experiences in 'Nam which gave him haunting visions of the past and his inability to create a future. Rambo is everything that embodies an American; brutish looks, kindness, arrogance, and the ability to look bad-fucking-ass in a bandana.

Ted Nicolaou (1999)

If you're feeling generous enough to tell me that a film "so bad it's good" doesn't exist, I'll direct you to the nearest copy of Full Moon/Big City's Ragdoll. Perhaps the most pitiful film attempting to capture the soul of urban society, Ragdoll remains a foul embarrassment to Africans all over the globe with Jiggaboo Jones following for a close second. When Big City Pictures banded together, they began releasing Full Moon budgeted films directed towards the "urban" crowd such as Ragdoll, Killjoy & Killjoy 2, and The Horrible Doctor Bones. I don't need to point out how bad their experiment failed, do I? Ragdoll is one of the most ill-received films in the Full Moon lexicon. Whereas more hatred should be channeled to the likes of the last 3 Puppet Master films and anything that has come out in the past year, people decide to "player hate" on Ragdoll for "telling it like it is, dawg". While Ragdoll consists of A) The most atrocious acting this side of America and B) The worst editing known to man, I still derive so much satisfaction at watching these crazy Negroes stumble around talking about rap and voodoo magic. Big Pere is the local crime boss. He wants to control the success of Kwame's rap group. In retaliation, Kwame' sends a rather rude shout-out to Big Pere one night at a local concert. When a group of thugs send his witch doctor grandmother into critical care, Kwame' invokes the magic of the killing kind and summons the Shadow Man to possess a Ragdoll into murdering each of their black asses. The contingency of the plot is water thin. Nothing is explained as to how Gran is his grandmother and what happened to Kwame's mother. The Ragdoll is controlled by the worst animatronic crew I've never heard of. It scuttles around the floor with a plastic looking knife shrieking a sound never quite heard before. It sounds sort of like what I'd imagine a rabid Ewok sounding like. I prefer the mental image of a blood thirsty African doll though. This isn't Tales from the Hood, no matter how much it tries to be. I first picked up Ragdoll at a pawn shop in the neighboring shopping center. The level of how much I enjoyed this film came as a great shock to me. I found Ragdoll to be quotable, absurd, retarded, laughably-bad, and an all around great time. I've shown this film to some select friends. Some liked it, others condemned me to get face cancer. Either way you look at it, Ragdoll is what it is and excels at doing just that. With no visual direction, It's safe to say the fictional characters of Kwame' and co. got washed out in Hurricane Katrina. Too soon?

PUPPET MASTER vs. DEMONIC TOYS

Ted Nicolaou (2004)

Never has versus material been cooked so raw and horridly. The approach for Puppet Master vs. Demonic Toys was taken with no interest to the namesake of Full Moon or Puppet Master and I lay blame entirely on Charles Band for selling the rights to such an epic showdown to the lucrative SciFi Channel. This has long been in the works and even a stockpile footage fest like Dollman vs. Demonic Toys would have been an ideal set up for a tiny terror war. Another thing in the works was a line of Puppet Master figures gone cyber. These toys were prototypes of robotic puppets with lethal tools of murder. This, sadly, never became much of anything, only a "What if?" SciFi, after laying claim on what could have been great, starts off with an idea of combining demons, puppets, Corey Feldman in his boxers, the cybernetic puppets, Christmas, and any other antonym into a huge cauldron. Out comes the finish product and boy is everyone unhappy with it. I don't think I've ever read a positive review on this film. People who aren't fans of the originals loathe this film enough, us Full Moon aficionados got it the worst. This vehement wind of cheesy nostalgia dissects both series, discovers what makes it tick and their strengths, then mercilessly removes that. You liked Jack-in-the-box? He's been gutted and turned into a baby clown face. Same has been done to Baby Oopsie-Daisy as he is a rubber prick. The puppets' metamorphosis is the most atrocious. Pinhead now appears like one of those Homie figurines, Blade has long scraggly hair, Tunneler's no where to be found as with Torch. Jester is a cheap imitation and Six Shooter's sly grin has been replaced with something that cannot be described and isn't even painted right. Remember when Pokemon and Dragonball Z's popularity surged and much bootlegged merchandise came forth? The tiny stars of Puppet Master vs. Demonic Toys show promise of being one of the offspring's from the copycat boom. The worst thing about this is that the dolls don't even really battle. At all. 2001 Cyber Puppet photos courtesy of Ween. Corey Feldman walks a path under the steady eye of Ted Nicolaou - director of the much maligned Ragdoll. The only difference here is that Ragdoll was a fiercely racist horror/comedy depicting retarded stereotypes that sadly are existent in our current society and Puppet Master vs. Demonic Toys doesn't really show you anything other than how malformed Pinhead looks. Why Feldman still has remnants of a career is beyond my comprehension. He's giving us classics in the past but mainly relies on cute cameos poking fun at his 80s cult status. Vanessa Angel plays the villainous role of Erika. After viewing her filmography, I'd say her most notable role is stemming from SuperBabies: Baby Geniuses 2. Nice pants, ass. Puppet Master vs. Demonic Toys features a plot about Christmas terror; dolls with the intention of Christmas day world domination. To say that this product isn't a pastiche would be lying to yourself. Nicolaou has created something absolutely fervidly disappointing on all parts and I would even go out of my way to protect anyone from seeing this film. I once thought about buying this used off of Amazon for a low, low price of 5 American dollars. I can see now that it would have been a grave mistake punishable only by humility then death. Feldman has even taken the Toulon name and befouled it with an utterly terrifying performance riddled with horrible accents, forced persona's, and slimy narcissism. This is arbitrary cinema terrorism at its peak.

GO TELL THE SPARTANS

Ted Post (1978)

Go Tell the Spartans is a Vietnam war different from most that I have seen. The fact that it was shot on such a low budget worked to its advantage. This gives it a more realistic feel in comparison to other Vietnam war films (or War films in general). I still don't know whether I like it or not, but at the very least, I think it is an important film. The army's not accepting of Major Barker as the general didn't really matter to me. From the Major, you get an important realization of Vietnam in comparison to others. When Barker states, "Too bad we couldn't show you a better war" you realize the insignificance and worthlessness of the Vietnam war. Not only was the war a waste of life and money for the United States, but it was also a military embarrassment. Go Tell the Spartans makes no lies about that. At the end of the film when Barker is laying dead and naked, it couldn't get any more embarrassing and dehumanizing than that. At no point in the film does the war seem appealing or heroic. The men over time become more fed up and emotionally unstable, one higher officer even commits suicide. The soldiers look out of place in Vietnam just as they were. It never looks like they are helping anyone, and certainly not themselves. In the beginning, it is interesting how the soldiers make fun of France for their failures. America ending up doing nothing in Vietnam and its arrogance is revealed in Go Tell the Spartans. The film just left me feeling bitter. At least it was more honest than Oliver Stone's rich kid cry-fest, Platoon. But even then, I think I was still entertained and enjoyed Platoon a lot more. I don't even really consider Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now to be a Vietnam war film. It may be set in Vietnam, but comes off more as a bizarre nightmare. The fact they repeatedly tried to receive support from the U.S. military is a joke. I can respect him for trying, but I don't see how that film could benefit the United States or its military. Coppola claiming that Apocalypse Now was "honest, mythical, pro-human, and therefore pro-America," was the funniest reasoning for why it should be supported. Although I think Apocalypse Now is a fun film, I would never want the government to waste money on it (among other things). When comparing Go Tell the Spartans and Apocalypse Now, they are about as different as Vietnam war films can get. Go Tell the Spartans is as realistic and banal as a war film could be. Apocalypse Now is more like a fantasy. I find myself going back to Apocalypse Now once every couple years. I don't think that I will revisit Go Tell The Spartans.

EXQUISITE CORPSES

Temístocles López (1989)

The National Socialists and their kindred spirits may have been wrong about a couple of things, but they were totally right in regard to the debasing and degenerating power of cities, or as Teutonic Conservative Revolutionary philosopher Oswald Spengler—a man who prophesized a number of the societal ills that now plague the Occident—once wrote, “Long ago the country bore the country-town and nourished it with her best blood. Now the giant city sucks the country dry, insatiably and incessantly demanding and devouring fresh streams of men, till it wearies and dies in the midst of an almost uninhabited waste of country.” Indeed, the soul-sucking metropolis has the power to turn a rampantly heterosexual country cowboy into a morally corrupt campy cocksucker who moonlights as a drag queen, or so one learns in a much neglected celluloid cult item. In the fiercely farcical piece of unfortunately but unsurprisingly forgotten psychotronic low-camp celluloid Exquisite Corpses (1989) aka Deadly Cabaret directed by Venezuelan auteur Temístocles López (Chain of Desire, Bird of Prey) just that happens, as a work that follows a conservative country boy of the happily heterosexual sort who relocates to NYC and degenerates into the kept-man of a conspicuously gay casting agent, who transforms the sub-literate cowboy into a flamboyant cabaret singer in what is indubitably one of the most wanton and whacked-out reworkings of Pygmalion ever made. I do not know how many Midnight Cowboy (1969) rip-offs exist, but Exquisite Corpses most certainly has to be the most insanely idiosyncratic one, as a work that is part erotic thriller, part cabaret musical with Vaudevillian undertones, part campy dark comedy of the innately immoral sort, and part political satire of the loony left-wing variety. As one can expect from such an aesthetically and thematically ambitious low-budget film that attempts to do a million things at once, Exquisite Corpses is a major mess that falls apart at the seams, yet that is one of its greatest appeals as a marvelously mystifying and never mundane mess of a would-be-midnight-movie that deserves a cult following, if only a minor cult following as a work that was made with seemingly no audience in mind aside from diehard cinephiles with an appreciation for unhinged camp, genre mutilation, and/or the belated beautiful bad girl Zoë Tamerlis Lund. Directed by a man who worked as a stage director in the mid-1970s and directed classic plays as varied as Shakespeare’s The Tempest, Cocteau’s The Knights of the Round Table and Goethe’s Faust and who co-penned the script for the Salvador Dalí biopic Dalí (1991), Exquisite Corpses was clearly helmed by a man with a vast understanding of European art, culture, and cinema, yet it is a film that wallows in conscious bad taste and reeks of 1980s low kultur cheese, cardboard kitsch, and all around thematic and aesthetic tomfoolery of the pomo homo sort. I discovered the film by happenstance after reading an article about junky actress/model/writer Zoë Lund, who is probably best known for her iconic role in Abel Ferrara's artsploitation flick Ms. 45 (1981) and co-penning the script and shooting up junk in Bad Lieutenant (1992), and I must admit that the tragic little lady steals the show as a lethally lecherous femme fatale who ultimately proves to be no match for the always conspiring minds of communist spies and jealous shitstabbers. An exotic Europid of half Swedish and half Romanian extraction, Lund demonstrates in the film her talent for enticing an eclectic selection of men, but being a queer work, she ultimately meets a tragic fate in a work that uses a role reversal of typical film noir conventions, thus also making the film a work of resentful and somewhat misogynistic fag fantasy.

Tim Lee (Gary Knox) is a confederate cowboy who moonlights as a tromboner that moves to seedy late-1980s Manhattan because he plans to marry his stereotypically dumb blonde girlfriend Sue (Ruth Collins), yet on his first day there, not only does he get dumped by his fiancée for a decidedly dumb rocker named Jim (played by David Ilku, who made his acting debut in the cult classic Liquid Sky), but he also gets robbed by a gang of rowdy metal head degenerates. When Tim goes to a bar the same night, some hustler scams him out of most of his money for something called 'megabucks,' which he naturally does not deliver and a Call Girl (Zoë Lund) attempts to swindle the rest of his money, but he does not have enough to give. When Tim plays his trombone in public in a pathetic attempt to beg for cash, a blond art fag/urban alchemist asks him to stand next to a pile of dog feces that he has spraypainted gold so that he can take a photo. Indeed, the Art Fag is working on a pretentious art project entitled 'Freud Redux,' describing the major theme of the project as follows, "Freud had this theory equating excrement with money...anally retentive nature of capital...excrement is money, gold is excrement, excrement is gold thing." Later on that day, Tim turns down a ponytailed pansy club owner (ironically, played by Zoë Lund's rampantly heterosexual husband Robert Lund) down for a job because he cannot see himself working for a flaming 'fag' at a club frequented by a bunch of flamboyant fruits and fairies. When Tim is approached by a gay casting agent named Lou (Frank Roccio) and flattered with the compliment "I can tell...by your bone structure. You have a very expressive face," he agrees to demonstrate his 'talent' for the horny homo. When Tim goes to Lou's apartment, the sexually voracious queen begins feeling him up, with the moronic cowboy asking, "What...is this some kind of method exercise or something?," as if it was not patently obvious that the cultured poof wanted to get in his pants. Needless to say, Tim leaves without a job because he has yet to become desperate enough to sell his pole and hole to a flagrant fairy. Out of abject desperation, Tim tries in vain to get jobs ranging from working at an Art Deco gallery to slavishly serving at sleazy restaurants, but no one will hire him and he eventually becomes homeless, even losing his much cherished trombone and all his other possessions in the process after being evicted for failing to pay his rent. Tim is even robbed at scissorpoint by a raving whack-job with a horrendous haircut, but he has no cash to give his exceedingly eccentric attacker. While walking the streets, Tim meets an eccentric old homeless spoken word artist with a pet chihuahua who teaches him to love with a pure heart and even wish his enemies good luck. Of course, Tim eventually becomes the unwitting victim of both friends and foes, but luckily he develops a pseudo-romantic relationship with a faithful fag who will save his loser life.

Finally fed up with being homeless and seeing bums dying while sleeping with trash bags for blankets, Tim opts for going back to gay casting director Lou, who gives him a complete queer-eye-for-the-straight-guy makeover, including a new wardrobe, accent, and, most importantly, new pompous prick attitude, but it comes at the cost of his rampant heterosexuality and unique urban cowboy persona. Indeed, Tim sells his soul to sodomy and almost instantly becomes a cultivated cocksucker and hit cabaret performer, who even dresses in drag from time to time, after becoming Lou's slavish lover. While at a tryout session for a club gig, Tim bumps into his ex-girlfriend Sue and her boyfriend Tim, who is playing with his band and demonstrates his undeniably unique talent by farting into a microphone. While Lou is ostensibly his boyfriend/mentor/sugar daddy, Tim begins a romance with a fellow cabaret performer named Belinda Maloney (Zoë Lund), who he previously met when she was working incognito as a high dollar hooker and who is married to a rather wealthy fellow named Pat Maloney (Chuck Perley). Of course, although he gives her three orgasms a sex session, Belinda has ulterior motives for fucking Tim as she wants to use him to kill her hubby, but little does she realize that husband Pat has also hired him for his own ends. While Tim does ostensibly murder Pat by shooting him in front of Belinda, the man is really not dead as the whole thing is part of an elaborate charade to fool the femme fatale. Among other things, Pat is really a Soviet spy and he is in cahoots with the CIA. As a Yiddish spy named 'Spitz' (who is really Pat in disguise) tells Belinda regarding Pat, he is apparently, "the most honorable and brilliant Russian spy to ever set foot in this country. Unlike the Reagan administration, he has never been caught in his multiple and varied secret deals. As a matter of fact, he just completed his final assignment with the willing collaboration of the pentagon. Thanks to him, the Kremlin now possesses the ultra Star Wars secret plans." Eventually, Tim is arrested for the dubious murder of his lady lover by a sleazy Policeman (Robert DiTillio), who has been spying on the lapsed Cowboy's affair with Belinda and has secretly recorded everything they have done together, that is working with Pat (the two do a secret chant, "Until victory or destruction, with secret devotion, the world will be ours."), but luckily lover boy Lou comes to his rescue while in drag and demands while pointing a gun at the corrupt cop, "I want you to set my baby free." In the end, Tim gets out of prison and goes to Paris with his ex-girlfriend Sue and Lou as strikingly attractive ménage a trios. To go back to Spengler regarding the sort of person it takes to survive in NYC (a common theme throughout the entire film): “In place of a world, there is a city, a point, in which the whole life of broad regions is collecting while the rest dries up. In place of a type-true people, born of and grown on the soil, there is a new sort of nomad, cohering unstably in fluid masses, the parasitical city dweller, traditionless, utterly matter-of-fact, religionless, clever, unfruitful, deeply contemptuous of the countryman and especially that highest form of countryman, the country gentleman.”

Undoubtedly, aside from the absurdly underrated Belgian-Dutch-French co-production Mascara (1987) directed by Patrick Conrad and starring Charlotte Rampling, which is like a Werner Schroeter film meets a Hollyweird murder mystery, Exquisite Corpses is one of the most ambitious attempts at mixing camp with film noir genre clichés. Apparently, auteur Temístocles López was such a queen on the set of the film that star Zoë Lund described him as, “an impossible director.” Ultimately, Exquisite Corpses seems like a sick sodomite fantasy covered in grotesque glitter and glam as a work where a manly cowboy is converted to homosexuality out of desperation, the femme fatale who steals a man from a man is murdered, and a flagrantly faggy fellow becomes the main hero in the end. A sardonically playful piece where characters are more like intentionally shallow stereotypes/crude archetypes than actual individuals with real emotions and the CIA is portrayed as an even more innately evil entity than the KBG, Temístocles’ film is certainly a work that was sown in deep, if not obscured, hatred, but it is also inconspicuously sprinkled with sod sugar on top so as to make it more palatable for so-called ‘heteronormative’ people. Of course, Temístocles failed in that regard as Exquisite Corpses is far too campy, convoluted, and just downright debauched to appeal to the tastes of the typical Hollywood-lobotomized automaton, hence why the film is all but totally unknown today, except among diehard Zoë Lund fans. The most audacious reworking of George Bernard Shaw’s Pygmalion (1912) since Radley Metzger’s porn chic hardcore flick The Opening of Misty Beethoven (1976) starring Constance Money and Jamie Gillis as a camp-ridden black comedy musical farce where a conservative cowboy is inexplicably transformed into a charming and cultured avant-garde cabaret artist virtually overnight, Exquisite Corpses is nothing, if not a piece of patently perverse postmodernism that actually manages to rise above pretense and puffery, as it buries its eclectic source influences under a playfully putrid pile of eccentricity and pageantry. Like the films of kraut queer auteur filmmakers like Rosa von Praunheim (i.e. Tally Brown, New York, Überleben in New York aka Survival in New York), Walter Bockmayer (i.e. Flammende Herzen aka Flaming Hearts), and Monika Treut (i.e. My Father is Coming), Exquisite Corpses features a romanticized outsider’s depiction of the rotten Big Apple that lingers between heaven and hell in terms of its various subcultures and (non)mores. With that being said, one must also note that the film is more effective in capturing the essence of NYC than virtually any of the films associated with the so-called Cinema of Transgression and related film movements, even though it employs camp and satire in a patently preposterous fashion. Indeed, Exquisite Corpses features a sort of sometimes nefarious neo-Weimar microcosm where sexual and monetary deceit is the name of the game, thus making the film like the Cabaret of obscure NYC cult flicks, albeit infinitely more outrageous, if not nonsensical, not to mention the fact that Zoë Lund gives what is arguably the most mystifying performance of her short but nonetheless notable acting career. That being said, Exquisite Corpses is mandatory viewing for any self-respecting camp connoisseur and/or Lundphile.

Temístocles López (1992)

Before the obnoxious trend of humanist we-are-the-world-and-everyone-is-connected films like that putrid piece of multiculturalist trash Crash (2004) where one sees how various seemingly unrelated characters of all colors and creeds are magically linked together in the end, Venezuelan-born cult queer auteur Temístocles López (Bird of Prey, Home - The Horror Story) made a little movie that is now all but forgotten featuring an eclectic all-star cast entitled Chain of Desire (1992) that depicted how various perverts with different perversions who did not know each were all connected via genital juices and STDs. Indeed, like Robert Altman's Short Cuts (1993), except with AIDS, sexually flexible gays, neo-cabaret, and a tinge of high-camp, López's film seems like a superficial soft-core flick upon a superficial glance, but as a work that features Malcolm McDowell as a TV journalist who screws young twink prostitutes behind his sexually repressed wife's back, Elias Koteas as a lecherous Latino family man who finds time to bang fine white chicks in between cleaning crucifixes, and Cassavetes veteran Seymour Cassel portraying a hack modern artist in the spirit of Julian Schnabel who has made a second profession out of screwing every woman aside from his wife, Chains of Desire is cultivated kitsch with a number of titillating and anti-titillating twists and turns that manages to be both erotic and provocative despite featuring next to nil nudity and largely taking place in crummy apartments. Featuring a somewhat intricately spun web of wantonness during a time and place where even heteros were scared of contracting gay cancer, López's work is certainly packed with cultural pessimism that is quite liberating and the perfect antidote to the ungodly aesthetic sins of Hollywood sentimentalism. When auteur López came out of the closet at the ripe age of 18, his machismo-oriented padre gave him the following fatherly advice: "There's only one thing for you to do: shoot yourself," so it should be no surprise that many of the characters featured in Chain of Desire use sex as a self-destructive and even sometimes suicidal force, with virtually everyone screwing up their life in some fashion by screwing. Featuring a purgatory-like cabaret where a creepy, semi-drag-queen acts as the Master of Ceremonies and declares with a grating Brooklyn accent that, "The sex apocalypse is upon us," Chain of Desire is a debasing descent into the NYC underworld where nearly everyone has made a figurative pact with the devil of debauchery. Whereas López's first feature Exquisite Corpses (1989) was a warped campy reworking of both Midnight Cowboy (1969) and George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion, Chain of Desire is an unhinged update of Max Ophüls' Arthur Schnitzler adaptation La Ronde (1950). Directors including Roger Vadim, Otto Schenk, and Fernando Meirelles would also attempt cinematic reworkings of the original Schnitzler play yet none of these films are quite as slimy, grimy, immoral, and dejecting as Chain of Desire, which is a work where the characters are indeed chained to something, but it is hardly love.

Sassy yet classy Guido gal Alma D'Angeli (Linda Fiorentino) is upset that her ex-boyfriend Michael, who she is still in love with after all the years, keeps calling her, so she goes to a church and cries about it. A savior of a Hispanic custodian with the rather apt name Jesus (Elias Koteas) sees Alma crying and consoles her and before they know it, the two olive-colored strangers are having passionate sex around the little lady's apartment. After getting done playing with the nice Italian girl, Jesus goes home to his family and is yelled at by his mother for describing their ancestral background as "third world." Jesus' young wife Isa (Angel Aviles) helps give her hubby a bath, thus unwittingly washing away the carnal juices of another woman off his body as he discusses how he will one day achieve the American dream by becoming a business owner. Isa is a maid and one day her TV producer boss Jerald Buckley (Patrick Bauchau) catches her looking at an antique copy of the Kama Sutra. Of course, Jerald gets aroused at the sight of a sub-literate third world girl attempting to read erotic literature, so he forces Isa to drive her high heel into his genitals until he achieves orgasm. Needless to say, Isa quits the job and Jerald pays her off so that she does not tell anyone about their depraved 'sexual' encounter. Naturally, Jerald hires a new maid named Linda (Grace Zabriskie), but he does not pay her as she is a sexually repressed housewife that is looking to spice up her nonexistent sex life. In fact, Linda's husband, Hubert Bailey (Malcolm McDowell), is a hack TV journalist who works for Jerald and the two have just finished a series on JFK's extramarital affairs. Among other things, one learns that JFK had a thing for arrogant Jewesses, forced ladies that he foolishly knocked up to get abortions, and had a fleeting fetish for negresses, with one black mistress complaining, "It was bam bam, thank ya' man, except he didn't say, "thank you"." Regarding the JFK tabloid trash he produced, Hubert states, "It was a disgusting masquerade. All those women were fakes" and confesses to his wife, "I hate this goddamn business." That night, the husband and wife discuss the lack of passion in their relationship, with Linda even admitting she is screwing Hubert's boss Jerald, yet he does not care for reasons that will soon be revealed. Linda tries in vain to get her husband to have sex with her, even telling him how he was the best man she ever slept with, but Hubert falls asleep. Of course, Hubert no longer sleeps with his wife because he is a closet homosexual who regularly has hustlers sent to his apartment. The next day, Hubert has a young twink from Iowa named Keith (Jamie Harrold) delivered to his door, but their little get together is abruptly aborted after the hustler's pimp calls and attempts to blackmail the journalist out of $20,000 by threatening to tell the media about his secret poof proclivities. After Keith leaves, he goes and smokes some crack and gets in a scrap with his pimp, who he beats up, but he loses his shoes and what little is left of his dignity in the process. Keith is later approached by a gay government worker with a broken leg named Ken (Tim Guinee) whose job is to find homes for young homeless homos. As Chain of Desire makes quite clear, NYC is not a very nice place for sensitive young gay boys looking to escape from their conservative hometowns. Of course, Keith learned that the hard way.

Ken takes Keith with him back to his apartment where he lives with his bisexual rocker/cabaret singer boyfriend David Bango (Dewey Weber), who does not take too kindly to young homeless homos crowding up his home, so he goes and stays with his hot virgin friend Diana (Holly Marie Combs), who offers him her virginity but he respectfully declines because he "couldn't be 100%" with her, plus they are both high on ecstasy. Instead, Diana hooks up with a successful yet totally talentless modern artist named Mel (Seymour Cassel). Meanwhile, Mel's sexy Spanish wife Cleo (Assumpta Serna) is waiting for her husband to come home so they can celebrate their anniversary, but he has forgotten it and is too busy trying to get in Diana's panties. Unfortunately for Mel, Diana is unimpressed with the con-artist, especially after he says, "Let's not talk about art, it's a bore," thus revealing he is a fraud with no interest in art. When Mel attempts to give Diana what he describes as the "Lolita treatment" upon learning that she is a virgin, she laughs in his face and leaves. Of course, when Mel gets back home, his wife threatens to divorce him due to his pathological lying and cheating. The next day, Cleo goes by Mel's art studio and discovers evidence that her husband was cheating on her after Diana calls and leaves a message. Suddenly, Cleo gets a devilish smirk on her face, walks up to a muscular worker named Joe (Kevin Conroy) that was hired by Mel, puts her hand up his shorts, and begins jerking him off. Needless to say, the two begin to have sex and ruin one of Mel's degenerate paintings while rolling around it. Of course, Mel walks in on them and fires Joe, but Cleo merely laughs in her husband's face, stating, "That was a lot of fun. My very first...but a lot of fun." Out of work, Joe takes up the respectable trade of being a phone sex worker where he pretends to be everything from an Italian stallion with a heavy Guido accent to a psychopath WASP Wall Street stockbroker, but he really is not cutout for the job. After failing to turn on ladies via telephone, Joe begins peering out of his window with a pair of binoculars at the people that live in the apartment complex across from him and eventually his eyes catch sight of a black chick that he finds arousing, so he begins masturbating in front of his window in plain sight. In easily the sleaziest homage to Hitchcock's Rear Window (1954) ever directed, Joe and the black chick, Angie (Suzanne Douglas), have non-contact sex via window-to-window voyeurism session, with a young teenage wop boy even joining in. At the end of Chain of Desire, the work comes full circle when all the characters come together at a cabaret and it is revealed the first character featured in the film, Alma, is a friend of the final character Angie, as the two friends work at the club together as singers. Alma receives another phone call from her ex-boyfriend Michael while at work just as she did at the beginning of the film and this time she actually agrees to here what he has to say. Ultimately, Michael reveals to Alma that he has AIDS, which causes her to break down. Although Alma refuses to sing that night, Angie eventually convinces her to do so because, after all, the show must go on.

In describing his film Chain of Desire, director Temístocles López once offered the following insights: “My film is about desire, with moments of love...I wanted to say that no matter what your sexuality, there’s no wrongs or rights, sex is to be seen as a force—relentless—which has no boundaries of any kind. It is true that the gay material was longer than any other part of the script, but that is what I wanted as a gay director.” Actually, the film is only 40% gay-themed and virtually none of these scenes feature sex, not to mention the fact that it does not exactly include the most flattering depictions of gay life. Indeed, while an ostensibly erotically-charged work, Chain of Desire ultimately leaves one with the feeling that they need to take a shower after watching it and not in a good way, as the film is inhabited by dead souls whose whimsical sexual encounters are mostly a form of desperate escapism from their decidedly dreary and insufferably humdrum lives. While Chain of Desire is clearly a more coherent and cultivated work, the director’s first feature Exquisite Corpses proved to be a much more rewarding experience for me as a work of contemptible camp that never wallows in misery and melancholy in the malignant fashion that the director’s second film does. Indeed, a sort of Basic Instinct (1992) meets Cabaret (1972) for the morbidly depressed, López’s Chain of Desire is like a romance for hopeless heterosexuals that live sexual lifestyles similar to those of gay men and is thus, rather unfortunately, more relevant today than when it was first released. Co-produced by Scottish actor Brian Cox (Manhunter, Rushmore) of all people, Chain of Desire is a rare erotic drama that has the power to scare people away from promiscuity. It is also notable for being a rare semi-gay-themed work where it is the heteros and not the homos that become victims of AIDS. Needless to say, I doubt Rosa von Praunheim would approve.

Terrence Malick (1978)

Out of Terrence Malick's small lexicon of films, Days of Heaven is easily his greatest achievement. The film takes in the Texas panhandle circa 1916 when America still had much of its natural beauty. A manual labor conman named Bill, his sister, and girlfriend leave Chicago after the man is assumed to have killed his boss. While in Texas, the three runaways end up working seasonally for a nice young Aryan farmer. Bill finds out that the farmer is about to die so he decides to whore out his girlfriend. The farmer falls in love with Bill's lady and the three peasants start living the good life. Days of Heaven is a film featuring a truly bizarre love triangle set at a time in America when things were thought to be more "wholesome." But with a man of a questionable ethnic background and unwarranted peasant arrogance such as Bill, things get a little ugly. I can imagine a young Marxist idealist finding Days of Heaven to be an anti-proletarian and pro-capitalist film. But the farmer in Days of Heaven is a swell young business man and Bill is a pathetic schemer. Destructive and irrational politics aside, Days of Heaven is an aesthetically pleasing experience. Linda Manz stars as the young sister of peasant criminal Bill, and she also narrates the film. This is an appropriate job for Manz as her character is stuck in the middle of the love triangle. Although she is the sister of the conman who organized the fake love affair with the farmer, she is merely an onlooker to the unpleasant situation. Linda narrates the film as if she has no real strong opinion on anything. Even at the end of Days of Heaven as an orphan, her attitude towards life has not changed. The strongest point of the film is when a storm of locusts hit the farm. The locusts cover the farmer's field and are soon appropriately dealt with. In the process, the farmer confronts Bill and ends up accidentally burning down his whole field with the mere swing of a lantern. The arrival of the locusts introduces the climax between the love triangle. The firestorm that erupts in the field reminds one of hell on earth and the aftermath of the fire is unfortunately appropriate. Farm owners should always be weary of wanting peasants. The beauty of nature truly conflicts with the unholy thoughts of man in Days of Heaven.

THE THIN RED LINE

The Thin Red Line (directed by Terrence Malick) is quite different than most World War II combat films (or the combat film in general). The film comes out more as a collage of images and poetry lacking most conventions associated with related material. This is no surprise as Malick accomplished similar things in The Badlands and Days of Heaven. Malick was able to refresh the stale World War II film with a somewhat anti-war approach. Most films dealing with the second World War to at least some extent glorify war. As everyone knows, America won World War II therefore, going into The Thin Red Line you expect a triumphant victory at the end. Instead, the war ends with another company of soldiers going into war. The war never ends also in the respect of all war in general. There is the chaos of man just as in the chaos of nature (which is brought up in the film). I found the ending of The Thin Red Line to be very human. Unfortunately it wasn't the most uplifting. The sacrificed soldier by Witt at the end of The Thin Red Line emphasized the impact of the individual in war. By acting as a decoy, Witt (James Caviezel) was able to save his company. When surrounded by Japanese he raises his rifle and is instantly shot. I thought it was interesting that Caviezel played sort of a savior in The Thin Red Line and The Passion of the Christ. The character of Witt to me, was the most important as although he was uninterested in serving in the war (in the beginning he is AWOL living among Melanesians), he becomes the biggest hero for his fellowman. When he swims among the Melanesian children in a dreamlike sequence after he is killed, he seems to have found his peace. The Thin Red Line also made war look a lot messier and chaotic than most World War II films. In the film most things are unpredictable. The sergeants and colonels come up with plans just as the fighting goes along. This chaos parallels a lot of what is going on in many of the soldiers' heads. All of these men are scared, confused, and on the brink of insanity. The difference in the men comes in the form of what they are willing to sacrifice for their fellow soldiers. Other men are killed fast and forgotten. Another interesting element of The Thin Red Line was its presentation of the Japanese. It takes a good while in the film to actually see these soldiers. Before we see Japanese soldiers, it feels like a never ending death machine wiping out American soldiers. When the Japanese soldiers are finally captured in their bunker they are very scared and helpless looking. This element of the film really stuck out to me. It showed how quickly man can change when facing different situations. One other scene that really stuck out for me was the baiting of a dying Japanese man by one of the American soldiers. The American soldiers tell the Japanese man that it's all over. That he will soon be eaten by various birds in the sky. This scene was important in The Thin Red Line as it showed the hatred man can be pushed to in war. Out of all the World War II films that I have seen, this was the only one to feature such a hateful yet attractively powerful scene. The Thin Red Line may now be my favorite American World War II film. Its unparalleled battle artistry introduced a new style in the World War II film. The only thing that hurt the film was its use of big name actors which in my opinion, take emphasis of the film itself. It's quite odd to see stoner surfer Spicoli (Sean Penn) in the middle of a chaotic World War II battlefield.

Terry Gilliam (1985)

Somewhat pathetically but not surprisingly, at least to me, it has been such a longtime since I have been truly in the Christmas spirit that I literally cannot remember the last time that I got a natural high from things like Xmas lights, eggnog, nutcrackers, chocolate covered cherries, the smell of fresh pine needles, and incessant re-watching of seasonal classics like A Charlie Brown Christmas (1965) and Bob Clark's A Christmas Story (1983), so naturally I decided that I would watch a film during this so-called 'holiday season' that would be more in tune with my more morose and misanthropic than merry spirit. While I initially settled upon attempting to warp my brain with old school American avant-garde works like Gregory J. Markopoulos' Christmas USA (1949) and Barbara Rubin's Christmas On Earth (1963 - 1965), the former proved to be too arcane and had virtually nothing to do with Xmas and the latter was nothing more than completely worthless and uniquely unsexy Jewish aberrosexual anti-Christmas agit-prop porn, so I decided that I needed to watch something with a more nostalgic quality, thus leading me to revisiting the keenly kaleidoscopic and scathingly satirical dystopian epic Brazil (1985) directed by proud lapsed American Terry Gilliam (12 Monkeys, The Imaginarium of Doctor Parnassus), which is not only set during a particular mirthfully morbid Christ's Mass, but is also a work that I incidentally first saw for the first time exactly twelve years ago during a remarkably miserable Yule. Admittedly Gilliam is a filmmaker that I have always had mixed feelings about, but after re-watching what I would describe as his unequivocal magnum opus, I cannot deny that it is a somewhat shockingly timeless cult classic that has only gotten more relevant since when it was first released three decades ago and, quite thankfully, surely only gets better with each subsequent viewing. Surely, Gilliam's greatest talent as a filmmaker also seems his greatest weakness as sort of Anglo-American Fellini (in fact, the film once had the somewhat more fitting working title 1984 ½, which was in tribute to both Orwell's 1949 novel of the same name and Fellini's autobiographical masterpiece 8½ (1963)) whose films are oftentimes too visually overwrought and aesthetically decadent to the point of completely burying the storyline, but Brazil ultimately proves to be a nearly immaculate combination of visuals and storyline as the sort of rather ideal big budget film that Hollywood might regularly produce if Americans did not tolerate regularly consuming celluloid shit and the studio heads and producers were not a bunch of culture-distorting parasites that look at the general public as a group of collectively retarded ADHD-ridden toddlers.

An arguable piece of decidedly decadent defeatist dystopia where the true horror is not in the form of an ominous Big Brother figure but instead a sort of ludicrously labyrinthine pre-apocalyptic bureaucracy and absurdly pernicious self-perpetuating machine that exists solely for the nihilistic purpose of propagating itself and its own cancerous growth and, not unlike most far-leftist collectivist governments, thrives on enemies (e.g. terrorists) and its own failure (e.g. the rise of crime and poverty) to sustain its seemingly perennial growth, the film is certainly more relevant today than ever in a seemingly pre-apocalyptic age where America's phony double-bastard mulatto puppet president's solution to the rapid decline of the country is creating more worthless bureaucratic government programs and flooding the country with racially hostile rabble from the third world who just happen to be the same sort of people that are waging an international terror campaign against the country. Set in a completely culturally vacant, innately materialistic, emotionally barren, and spectacle and slogan oriented retrofuturist pandemonium that is simultaneously anachronistic in both a sort of Dickensian and Rockwellian fashion (among other retro cinematic influences ranging from German Expressionism to Charlie Chaplin's Modern Times (1936) to 1940s/1950s film noir) and ominously Orwellian in an almost grotesquely cartoonish way (in fact, Gilliam, who has always maintained that the film depicts the present and not some foreseeable future, once described the film as a "political cartoon"), Brazil—a virtual popcorn movie for cultural pessimists—tells the fairly aesthetically pleasing tale of a hopelessly naïve dreamer of the day that gets immersed in a real-life nightmare after unwisely getting involved in rectifying the wrongful government-ordained death of a poor prole and ultimately encountering by happenstance a butch babe that he somewhat preposterously believes is the literal woman of his dreams. A quite apt antidote to the putrid piece of true celluloid dystopia Star Wars: Episode VII (2015) directed by pernicious kosher culture-distorter and human-gargoyle J.J. Abrams, Gilliam's gorgeously grotesque masterpiece is ultimately a fantasy film for people who, like myself, hate most fantasy films because they act as sort of Huxleyan celluloid soma for overweight lemmings and virginal fanboys. Indeed, Brazil is one of the few fantasy flicks that you can watch without potentially succumbing to the guilt or pathetic weakness of embracing mindless fanboy twaddle, as an eccentric piece of aesthetically and narratively erratic anti-escapism that ultimately tricks the viewer into embracing the unfortunate reality of the forlorn present and the all the more fiercely foreboding future.

Set in a unnamed technocratic anarcho-tyranny "somewhere in the 20th Century" that seems like a parody of 1950s America as sodomized senselessly by the sad and pathetic ultra-P.C. post-European surveillance state that is modern-day multicultural England, Brazil begins with a Christmas time terrorist explosion that blows away a guy dressed like a film noir extra that is pushing a car full of worthless junk. After the explosion, an elderly wheelchair-bound cripple named Mr. Helpmann (Peter Vaughan, who is probably best known nowadays as Maester Aemon on HBO's Game of Thrones (2011-2015))—a happy-go-lucky pseudo-paternal dictator of bureaucracy that has the distinguished title of 'Deputy Minister of Information'—declares on public television that, in regard to the mysterious terrorist bombing, it is purely the result of, "Bad sportsmanship. A ruthless minority of people seem to have forgotten good old-fashioned virtues. They just can't stand seeing the other fellow win. If these people would just play the game." Indeed, not unlike contemporary America and Western Europe where people are legally forced to pretend that all people, no matter how savage or sexually/morally degenerate, are 'equal' and where you can be completely socially ostracized and/or even be imprisoned for sharing unpopular ideas, Brazil is set in a wholly socially engineered nightmare realm where one either has to be an automaton or sociopath to get ahead as success is based purely off of the ability and willingness of the individual to follow all of the rules of the game, no matter how absurd and self-debasing. Hapless protagonist Sam Lowry (Jonathan Pryce of Glengarry Glen Ross (1992) and Christopher Hampton's Carrington (1995)) is vaguely more admirable than most people, as he begrudgingly plays the game just enough so that he can get by and sustain himself, even though his slutty mother, Mrs. Ida Lowry (Katherine Helmond), is a socially prestigious society woman that is a longtime friend of bigwig Mr. Helpmann and could easily get him a decent job as a member of the supper echelons of the bureaucratic machine. As a man that seems to be passively revolted by everything about his society, Sam prefers to hide in a cramped office and engage in abstract paper-shuffling as a mid-level white collar serf. When Sam's mother uses her connections to get him a nice employment offer, he initially turns it down, but he later changes his mind after a series of situations that lead him to devoting all of his time, effort, and resources to hunting down the woman of his dreams. Unfortunately for Sam, his love interest is a suspected terrorist, thus it is only a matter of time before he and she are swallowed up by the machine after attempting to consummate a love affair in a loveless world where romantic relationships are nothing more than cold and strategic business transactions.

Sam is a fairly physically and intellectually unimpressive fellow with no ambition and a somewhat passive-aggressive mentality who prefers to rot in an office than to grab life by the balls and make something great out of himself. The only source of solace that Sam has in his life is his dreams where he is a sort a classically heroic angel-knight with heavenly cloud-caressing wings who regularly saves and embraces the woman-of-his-dreams/damsel-in-distress (Kim Greist). Unbeknownst to Sam, there is actually a real-life sub-lumpenprole dame with a dyke haircut named Jill Layton (also Kim Greist in a performance that Gilliam was quite dissatisfied with) who looks exactly the same as the woman-of-his-dreams, albeit she is somewhat dirtier and remarkably less feminine. At the beginning of the film, Jill bears witness to the violent window-smashing and door-crashing nightmare arrest of her downstairs neighbor Mr. Archibald Buttle (Brian Miller) by a brigade of rather robotic Gestapo-esque thugs that sport all-black futuristic SWAT gear. Indeed, as a result of an absurd technical malfunction involving a fly getting jammed in a printer and accidentally printing the name 'Buttle' instead that of a supposed terrorist named Archibald 'Harry' Tuttle (Robert De Niro in arguably the most bizarre role of his career as the true hero of the film), the quite literally poor family man is arrested and ultimately mysteriously murdered while under interrogation for a dubious crime he did not actually commit. Sam is a mid-level officer clerk and as a favor to his weak, meek, and pathetic boss Mr. Kurtzmann (Ian Holm of Ridley Scott's Alien (1979)), the protagonist agrees to travel to the post-industrial ghetto where Mr. Buttle's wife lives and personally deliver to her an 'overcharge receipt' in an attempt to fix the 'clerical error.' Indeed, in the absurdist realm of Brazil, criminals are expected to pay for their own arrests, but since Mr. Buttle was accidentally arrested, his widow is owed a monetary refund. After surviving a virtual urban battlefield where barbaric little kids rob and kidnap other barbaric little kids with machine-guns, Sam manages to arrive at the Buttle's apartment, which is located inside an architectural monstrosity known as Shangri-La tower, and is quite disturbed at the sight of a grieving Mrs. Buttle, who screams at the protagonist, "He hadn't done anything. He was good. What have you done with his body?" and then begins crying hysterically. After Mrs. Buttle's grade school son abruptly attacks Sam, the protagonist is in for the joyous shock of a lifetime when he randomly catches the reflection of the woman-of-his-dreams in a broken piece of a mirror, though she unfortunately runs away before he can actually catch up with her. After unwittingly talking to Mr. Buttle's daughter, who is waiting in the street in vain for her father to come home, Sam learns that the woman-of-his-dreams is named 'Jill Layton.'

Much to the chagrin of his revoltingly effete boss Kurtzmann, who almost seems to have homoerotic feelings for the protagonist, Sam decides to accept the job offer at 'Information Retrieval' because he believes it will give him the technical resources he needs to dig up more information about Jill and her seemingly dangerous background. Unfortunately for Sam, Kurtzmann has forged a rejection letter for the job, so the protagonist opts attend a party at the lavish home of Mr. Helpmann, who surely can use his unique power as Deputy Minister of Information to get him the new position. Luckily, Sam's cosmetic-surgery-obsessed high-class whore mother, who is regularly followed by her fittingly Judaic named surgeon Dr. Jaffe (Jim Broadbent), is more than willing to help procure distinguished employment for her loser son via Herr Helpmann. Ultimately, Sam reduces himself to the level of helping handicapped Übermensch Helpmann take a leak in a urinal and even zipping up his fly, but it is a small price for him to pay to get closer to tracking down Jill. As Helpmann (pseudo)sentimentally states to the protagonist during their meeting, Sam's father was once his boss and best friend before a dubious terrorist bombing cut his life short. Strangely, Helpmann describes Sam's dead father as always been in his presence, even going so far as to describe him as, "A ghost in the machine." Unfortunately, Sam is also on his way to becoming a tragic phantom in the technocratic penitentiary.

Clearly completely unaware of what he is really up against or the fact that he is being regularly followed and monitored by shadowy figures in trench-coats, Sam does not think twice of befriending ostensible terrorist Archibald 'Harry' Tuttle when he randomly drops by his apartment after intercepting a call that the protagonist makes to report that his air-conditioner is broken. Harry is a sort of anarchic electrician who seemingly works for free and when Sam foolishly asks him why he just does not get a normal official position with the government, he proudly expresses his seething hatred for paperwork and sums up his overall Weltanschauung as follows, "I came into this game for the action...the excitement. Go anywhere, travel light, get in, get out...wherever there's trouble...a man alone. Now, they've got the whole country sectioned off...you can't move without a form." While Harry swiftly fixes Sam's air-conditioner, two vindictive government workers (one of which is notably played by Bob Hoskins of the decidedly dumb dystopian dud Super Mario Bros. (1993)) from 'Central Services' later completely destroy it in revenge against the protagonist for asking them for the appropriate paperwork. Sam ultimately makes a mysterious mistake by befriending Harry, as his new comrade has been officially classified as a wanted renegade terrorist by the very same government bureaucracy that the protagonist has just begun working for. Ever since Sam decided to break protocol and personally visit Mrs. Buttle to give her the overcharge receipt, he has been being followed by a mysterious figure in a trench-coat who has been keeping tabs on everything he has done, including his attempts to find information about Jill, who has also been designated a fugitive terrorist as a result of running her mouth about the wrongful arrest and death of Mr. Buttle. As a previously quite apathetic mensch that is now obsessively in love with a woman that he faithfully worships, Sam naturally does not have much time to pay attention to small details like his quite sinister surroundings, even if it could result in his arrest or even death, or so he eventually learns after unwittingly poking his nose in a pernicious place that it does not belong.

As a deleteriously naïve chap that does not have a single emotional connection with anyone, Sam is completely oblivious to the fact that his longtime best friend Jack Lint (Monty Python regular Michael Palin) is a seemingly psychopathic opportunist who is responsible for interrogating and torturing suspected terrorists. As a fairly successful extrovert and obscenely opportunistic go-getter that is married with children and is wholly willing to utilize his glacial charms in his ruthless mission to abide to the rules of the bureaucratic game for personal gain, even when it involves coldblooded murder, Jack is the complete opposite of an introverted underachiever like Sam, who opts to do the bare minimum to get by and would prefer it if no one acknowledged of his pathetic existence. After beginning his new job at Information Retrieval where Jack also works, Sam foolishly questions his phony friend about Jill and Tuttle and even asks him if he is responsible for the death of Mr. Buttle. Although he does not deny killing Tuttle, Jack refuses to take responsibility for his death, snidely stating to Sam, "Information Transit got the wrong man. I got the right man. The wrong one was delivered to me as the right man, I accepted him on good faith as the right man. Was I wrong? It wasn't my fault that Buttle's heart condition didn't appear on Tuttle's file." Jack describes Tuttle as being involved with the questionable crime of "freelance subversion" and then accuses Jill of being a terrorist, stating, "She witnessed the Tuttle—Buttle arrest. It seems she's been going around making wild allegations, obviously trying to exploit the situation. She's working for someone, and I don't think it's us." While Sam manages to coerce Jack into giving him Jill's government file, he ultimately does not need it as he subsequently finds his lady love at the front-desk of the Information Retrieval building where he narrowly saves her from getting arrested by some gun-wielding NKVD-esque thugs.

While one would assume that Jill might be at least somewhat thankful to Sam for saving her from being imprisoned and even potentially killed, she immediately attempts to run away from him after he gets her to safety. Of course, hopeless loverboy Sam is persistent and manages to jump inside Jill truck where he proceeds to absurdly declare his love for her, stating in a fairly neurotic fashion, "You won't believe this...and...I know it's going to sound incredible, but I've been dreaming about you. No, not like that. I mean, I love you. In my dreams, I love you." Not surprisingly, Jill replies to Sam's pathetic declaration of love by literally kicking him out of her truck while it is moving, though the protagonist manages to grab onto the side of the vehicle and write "I love you" with his finger on a dirty window. After nearly killing Sam, Jill eventually calms down and begins feeling sorry enough for him to cease her dangerously bitchy behavior. Needless to say, Jill is far from the warm, loving, and embracing angelic beauty from Sam's otherworldly dreams, but that does not stop the protagonist from believing that she is indeed the woman-of-his-dreams. Unfortunately, Sam soon begins suspecting that Jill is a terrorist when she takes him to a highly dangerous construction site where a strange fellow gives her a dubious package. When a terrorist attack later occurs at a shopping mall that they later opt to hideout at after killing a cop or two after a dramatic chase scene, Sam becomes quite hysterical and immediately blames Jill, only to soon realize that he is completely wrong. After attacking a boorish cop that manhandles Jill, Sam is predictably knocked out and arrested. While Sam is taken back to work instead of prison due to his prestigious government position, he is separated from Jill in the process and subsequently repeatedly verbally reamed by his boss and co-employees due to his questionable behavior. In fact, Sam's so-called best friend Jack more or less tells him to fuck off, stating, "Sam, we've always been close, haven't we? Well, until this all blows over, just stay away from me." Naturally, as a man that is in love with a terrorist and friends with another, it is only a matter of time before Sam faces the cold wrath of the bureaucratic system due to his glaring incapacity to be like everyone else and “just play the game.”

When Jill pays him a visit at his apartment after work, Sam is naturally extremely overjoyed and decides to provide her with sanctuary by taking her to his mother’s lavish home. Since his mother is spending Christmas with her plastic surgeon, Sam has free reign over her apartment, which he believes will be a secure hideout for his lady-love. While Jill seems fully willingly to strip off her redneck dude wardrobe and finally share her carnal knowledge with Sam after he is thoughtful and caring enough to provide her with safety at his mother’s flat, the protagonist decides that the long-awaited fuck session must be temporarily postponed until he can try everything within his means to protect his lover by going to Mr. Helpmann for help. While Helpmann is not there, Sam foolishly decides to hack into his boss’ computer and falsify Jill’s records to make it seem like she has died. When Sam gets back home, he is delighted to find Jill all dolled up just like the woman-of-his-dreams and then happily informs her, “You don’t exist anymore. I killed you. Jill Layton is dead.” Naturally, when Jill asks him, “Care for a little bit of necrophilia?,” Sam immediately eagerly jumps into bed with her and then the two proceed to assumedly make love. The next morning, Sam is exceedingly enthralled to find Jill in bed with him wearing nothing but a ribbon over her tits, but the fleshy fun comes to an ugly and violent end when a bunch of sinister SWAT team goons crash through the windows and arrest the lovers. After being arrested and knocked out in the process, Sam later awakens to finding himself hanging from a hook while trapped inside a sort of futuristic straitjacket while about half a dozen or so different lawyers give him questionable legal advice about such ludicrous things as pleading guilty to various charges so that he can save some money. Among other things, Sam has been charged with, “Wasting ministry time and paper.” After that, Sam is placed in a padded cell where he is visited by Mr. Helpmann, who is dressed in a Santa Claus outfit and generously offers him a bottle of, “barley water.” When Sam begs Helpmann to prove that he is worthy of his surname by helping him, the perennially smirking old fart replies, “I’m doing everything in my power...but the rules of the game are laid down. We all have to play by them. Even me.” Needless to say, Sam breaks down after Helpmann informs him that Jill was gunned down while supposedly attempting to resist arrest. After that, Sam is hauled to an extremely large, open, empty, and ominous cylindrical room to go undergo interrogation. When the finally interrogator arrives, Sam is shocked to see that it is his supposed friend Jack, who is attempting to hide his identity behind a creepy baby mask. After Sam begs him for mercy and cries, “I feel frightened,” Jack exposes his true psychopathic self by stating, “How do you think I feel? You shit.” Luckily for Sam, just before he undergoes some sort of torture method, an unseen terrorist puts a bullet in Jack’s brain and then Harry Tuttle and a band of terrorists/freedom-fighters subsequently magically appear and proceed to rescue

After escaping from Ministry headquarters and blowing up the entire building on the way out, Sam and Harry head to a local mall where the latter curiously disappears into thin air after being consumed by a mass of flying scraps of paper, thus hinting in a fairly obvious fashion that the entire situation might be a fantasy. Indeed, from there, Sam ends up at a lavish high-camp funeral for his mother's similarly cosmetic-surgery-addicted friend Mrs. Terrain and is frightened to discover that his mommy now looks exactly like Jill and is being fawned over by half a dozen handsome young gentlemen callers. After haphazardly falling into Mrs. Terrain's open casket, Sam falls through a seemingly bottomless pitch black abyss that ultimately brings him to a fairly familiar urban nightmare realm from his dreams, which is covered in piles upon piles of post-industrial junk and inhabited by grotesque baby-faced monsters and a giant neon Kurosawan samurai beast. Luckily, Sam manages to evade the beastly beings via a pile of flex-ducts where he ultimately finds a door at the top that magically leads him to the trailer of Jill's truck. From there, Jill drives Sam out of the city and the two begin a new simple traditional life upon taking refuge at a quaint trailer located in a perfectly pastoral fairytale-esque mountain region. Of course, as the viewer somewhat suspects, this all-too-happy-ending has nothing to do with reality. Indeed, from there, the film cuts back to the interrogation room where Mr. Helpmann states, "He's got away from us, Jack" and Jack replies, "I'm afraid you're right, Mr. Helpmann. He's gone." As it turns out, Sam has suffered virtually the same exact pathetic fate as Nietzsche and has succumbed to a sort of blissful insanity where he is depicted with a stupid smirk while humming the theme song "Brazil."

Like any halfway decent piece of dystopian science fiction, Brazil is in many ways more relevant today than when it was first released, even if it completely fails to do what Ridley Scott's Blade Runner (1982) by depicting the Occident as a virtual corpse that is being fed on by hordes of gutter-dwelling third world rabble who have replaced the indigenous Europic population (in fact, I did not notice a single non-white person in the entire film). There is also a great irony in the fact that Gilliam's film was produced by Israeli producer Arnon Milchan, who would reveal in late 2013 on Israeli TV that he was a real harbinger of dystopian times by bragging that he was a Mossad spy that engaged in espionage, big-ticket arms-dealing, and obtaining sensitive technology and materials for Israel's quite apocalyptic nuclear weapons program. While the mainstream media and American politicians constantly complain about how dangerous and horrific it would be for towelhead nations like Iran to obtain nuclear weapons, Israel already has them and various Israeli leaders have threatened to destroy the entire world, including their so-called allies in Europe, were the security of their nation to be compromised. Indeed, as Israeli military historian Martin Levi van Creveld once gleefully stated in regard to his Hebrew homeland's ominous Samson Option, “Most European capitals are targets for our [Israel’s] air force....We have the capability to take the world down with us. And I can assure you that that will happen before Israel goes under.” In other words, Milchan’s criminal deeds have helped to give his nation the means to unleash a nuclear holocaust. Certainly, the fact that Milchan produced both Gilliam’s film and various other Hollywood dystopian works like David Fincher’s Fight Club (1999) only gives these films an all the more absurd and disturbing essence that makes it seem as if all sides have been compromised and that there is a controlled-opposition, hence why there are virtually no films that deal with the serious and oftentimes quite blatant issues that are contributing to a real-life dystopian world like so-called multiculturalism (translation: racial conquest), racial miscegenation, philo-Semitism (which is a spiritual virus that, as indicated by his memoir, Gilliam seems to suffer from), socially engineered sexual and cultural deracination, rampant culturally/racially suicidal altruism, political cuckoldry, spiritual retardation, and xenophilia/ethnomasochism, among other fairly flagrant yet rarely cinematically depicted social and cultural diseases that Hollywood has played a central role in promoting and incubating via Bernaysian manipulation of the American psyche. Of course, Brazil gets a number of important things right in regard to the social decay and dysfunction of the modern age, including the corruption of religion (e.g. as reflected by a shot of a “Consumers for Christ” flag during a parade), inefficiency of technical efficiency, rise of postmodernism and cultural nihilism, gender inversion (while Sam is weak and passive, his lady love Jill is butch and aggressive) and disharmony between the sexes, trend of vain and superficial environmentalism (e.g. a petty old woman ruthlessly yells at Sam for dropping mere papers on the street even though the air is so bad that there are public oxygen dispensers), extreme pathological vanity (e.g. Sam’s mother’s plastic surgery addiction), the sexualization of children (e.g. a little girl played by Gilliam’s daughter Holly states to Sam in a quasi-salacious when he prepares to change his clothing, “Put it on, big boy. I won’t look at your willy”), social justice warrior style sloganing, thought crimes, and total intolerance from dissenting opinions, among other things.

As a result of recent experiences, I found the ending of Brazil to be extra putridly poignant, especially in regard to the quasi-catatonic protagonist humming to himself the eponymous theme song while looking like a blissful retard. Indeed, one day recently while I was at work, I noticed a less than sophisticated middle-aged co-worker loudly humming to himself a completely indecipherable mess that I assume was supposed to be some stupid pop rock song, only to encounter three or four other employees humming their own equally incoherent version of the same garbled mess over the course of the next couple of days, thus confirming to me that most people—not matter how intelligent or cultivated—have innate herd mentalities and tend to mindlessly consume and pantomime whatever worthless garbage that passes their general orbit. Of course, the most obvious example of this is how it seems to be a favorite pastime of Americans to quote stupid movie lines, even if they do not understand and/or have never seen the movie in question (after all, it seems that very few of the people that use the classic Hollywood insult “schmuck” in their vocabulary realize that it is actually Yiddish slang for “penis”). While the tendency of individuals to both consciously and subconsciously copy other people is surely an ancient survival instinct, the mainstream media, radio, television, Hollywood, and even public schools exploit these instincts and infect the masses with these self-destructive trends. Certainly, stupid yet catchy pop songs are excellent tools for putting a population under a sort of collective spell so that they will make for loyal and unquestioning worker bees that will tolerate being regularly shit and pissed on, as the music acts as an unconscious reflex that provides emotional support during times of stress or anxiety, with the protagonist of Brazil experiencing such a brutal degree of psychological trauma that his mind completely deteriorates and he falls into this escapist reflex permanently. As Gilliam’s film reveals, while the West may be an extremely overpopulated place where ‘teamwork’ is considered one of the highest virtues, especially by governments and employers, it seems that very few individuals have the capacity to have real and intimate connections with other people, with the hapless quasi-autistic protagonist not even realizing that his ostensible lifelong best friend is an uniquely unscrupulous psychopath who makes a living torturing people to death for a godless bureaucratic machine. Despite the absurd name of Hebraic lawyer turned Hollywood culture-distorter Sid Sheinberg’s completely butchered “Love Conquers All” cut, Brazil depicts a world where true love is, at least socially speaking, impossible and women are nothing more than mere proud consumer goods that strive to enhance their physical appearances via plastic surgery as a means to attract more desirable male buyers, who are naturally always looking to upgrade their female flesh, whether it be by buying a new babe or upgrading an existing one with fake tits or new lingerie. Indeed, love and emotional compatibility never enter the equation in the wholly materialistic sexual economy that is sardonically depicted in Gilliam’s flick. Quite like real-life, protagonist Sam and his shieldmaiden Jill would have no problem spending a beautiful lifetime together had they lived during a much simpler time when men were men and women were women and no one was confused about their role in life, but every aspect of the dystopian nightmare realm that they live in has made this innately impossible for various reasons.

I must confess that I am not really a fan of Terry Gilliam as either a man or a filmmaker as I find him to be somewhat of a perennially posturing left-wing pussy that acts like it is profoundly heroic to obnoxiously express impotent political statements that are, quite unlike with a lower-middleclass man that lives paycheck-to-paycheck, fairly safe and easy to make if you’re a respected wealthy man with dual-citizenship and multiple homes around the world, yet

I cannot deny that I regard Brazil as both a sort of personal Christmas time favorite as well as one of the few important films to come out of Hollywood during the 1980s. Indeed, Gilliam's film is like a It's a Wonderful Life for Cioranites and the rare sort of tough-minded individuals that can read Pentti Linkola yet still maintain a sense of humor. Arguably the last great 'American' anglophile, Gilliam almost seems like the kind of culturally confused Frankenstein monster that would be sired as a result of a decidedly disharmonious anti-romance between Peter Greenaway and Steven Spielberg as a strange bird that seems to think he can get away with creating Hollywood blockbusters for straight edge art fags, bourgeois anarchists, autistic libertarians, virginal middle-aged math teachers, and teenage nihilists. Undoubtedly Gilliam's most personal cinematic work to date, Brazil is ironically a film about a sort of sub-beta-boy that was directed by a man that would eventually become an alpha-male of sorts, albeit in a sort of absurd nerd fashion, thus underscoring the social dysfunction of our very real dystopian world, which artificially elevates people that would have failed miserably in previous societies. After all, chances are that someone as radically physically revolting like Spielberg clone J.J. Abrams would be peddling soiled socks out of a suitcase in a Polish ghetto only a century ago. In other words, like in Brazil, the 'game' is completely rigged and people like Abrams and Michael Bay do not become rich and famous because of talent or artistic prowess, but because of a certain combination of ruthlessness, nepotism, psychopathy, and/or greed, hence the glaring difference between the history of Hollywood and European arthouse cinema. Indeed, as far as I am concerned, Gilliam is a sort of glorified court jester who would have probably had his throat slit in more primitive times for running his mouth at a less than auspicious time, but of course, the difference between him and Hebraic hacks like Abrams and Bay is that he is actually an artist with a personal vision, hence why he has been less monetarily successful and has routinely battled with studios over his projects. Like a manic Monty Python molestation of Orson Welles' The Trial (1962) and Federico Fellini's 8½ (1963) as directed by a yank anglophile with goofy delusions of grandeur and a curious case of cultural amnesia, the film also seemingly unwittingly demonstrates why virtually anything of cultural value that is produced in the United States tends to have deep European influences (after all, even a proud leftist like Gilliam could not help but turn into a European). Likewise, in its bizarre yet quite fitting mix of British and American actors and ambiguous and anachronistic settings, the film demonstrates is an assumedly unintentional way that the cultureless mongrel known as the United States is largely responsible for the decay and deracination of the Occident, as a cancerous ex-colony that has begun to consume the very motherland that gave birth to it. Rather unfortunately, globalization and Americanization is transforming the entire world into a sort of all-homogenizing anarcho-tyrannical toilet that every single individual is expected to submit to, or as Robert De Niro's character sardonically states to Brazil protagonist Sam, "We're all in it together."

12 MONKEYS

Terry Gilliam (1995)

Or Twelve Monkeys, whichever you prefer. I missed this film for many years meaning that I didn't see this film till about a couple weeks ago. I'd put off re-viewing it until the time being as to let the theories and ideas of Terry Gilliam soak up in my brain. I'd consider myself a fan of Terry Gilliam but I'm more a fan of the esteemed Bruce Willis who plays the lead man James Cole as he drifts through time to prevent an apocalyptic crisis. To note, I'm not necessarily a fan of Brad Pitt. I admire some of his roles in films such as The Mexican, Kalifornia, Snatch, and of course Cool World. His performance as the viably insane antagonist chilled me to the nerves. Everything about his character rubbed me the wrong way - most notably his crazy eye. To say the least, Mr. Pitt outperformed every character in this movie. While Bruce Willis played the miserable role on key, it wasn't enough to topple to heavyweight champion of the film. Do pay attention to the synchronicity between Bruce Willis and Madeleine Stowe. After watching 12 Monkeys, I can see that I've been missing out for some time. The ending of 12 Monkeys is titanicly bleak and morose. I even pitied myself as the credits began to roll leaving a misty haze rotating around each individual thought. I viewed this film during my break at work so you can imagine most of my motor functions being rusted. I knew David Morse was a chilling man but I never expected to be so horrified by one of his characters. The punchline of the joke is that the characters aren't even the highlight of the film. In the story lies a tragedy of unforeseen proportions. 12 Monkeys is intriguingly similar to the avidly popular web game Pandemic 2. The idea of spreading a virus to each corner of the world isn't a very explored path of misery. Some of Gilliam's previous archetypes are indulged upon. The very similar future scientists are akin to many of Brazil's offered oddities. 12 Monkeys is a defined curio in the realm of many post-apocalyptic mainstream endeavors. I frequently beat myself up for not viewing this film sooner. I predict that had I seen this many years ago, I would have been beyond disturbed. 12 Monkeys tackles many identifiable flaws in the theory of time travel. For instance, diseases that might not have been tackled by immunity some years later. Even while Terry Gilliam creates many ideological theories about his course of time travel, the very figment of fourth-dimension traveling can be scientifically argued upon. 12 Monkeys isn't a film explaining the theories of time travel per say. The institutionalized may not always be the crazies you discover them to be. 12 Monkeys is a harrowing trip through time that still creeps along your spine to this day.

FEAR AND LOATHING IN LAS VEGAS

Terry Gilliam (1998)

Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas is a mildly entertaining book written by the late Hunter S. Thompson. I can imagine the book was “revolutionary” when first released for its overwhelming drug content and contempt for authority. Now these “subversive” ideas and acts of Thompson have been mainstreamed and common place in American society. Thankfully Terry Gilliam decided to spice up Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas with an ambitious cinema adaptation. I have to say that Johnny Depp makes a more interesting Hunter S. Thompson than the real man. Depp narrates the words of Thompson in a way that brings a whole other element to the feel of the novel. Depp makes a drugged out “character” of Thompson while creating new life to the “Gonzo” journalist. Benicio del Toro, an actor I have always hated, is successful in his comical role as Thompson’s attorney suffering from a horrible “racial handicap.” Director Terry Gilliam is notorious for being obsessed with creating a powerful and overwhelming mise en scène in his films. As can be expected, Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas is no exception. Gilliam created a world in Las Vegas that brings new power to the words of Hunter S. Thompson. I especially enjoyed the scene in which Thompson sees a group of blood thirsty humanoid Lizards at the bar with him. Only Terry Gilliam could have imagined such an image in his mind to be put on celluloid. Of course, Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, like many of Terry Gilliam’s other films has its flaws. Gilliam spends so much time obsessing with the image that the film is almost weighed down by aesthetics. Throughout the film, I would noticed myself nodding off or forgetting that I was watching the film. Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas does get better with each viewing. Terry Gilliam did a much better job balancing the image and story with his master Brazil. Although many drug users and addicts love Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, I didn’t find the film to make illegal substances appealing. Hunter S. Thompson is in a constant state of paranoia and confusion. I will say that the book and film do a good job portraying the “effects” of drug experimentation. I was really hoping that Hunter S. Thompson dropped the radio in the bathtub of his Samoan attorney as “white rabbit” by Jefferson Airplane peaked. Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas no doubt had an appropriate soundtrack. After all, you would have to be on drugs to enjoy much of the music featured in the film.

Terry Gilliam (2005)

Anglophile Terry Gilliam claims that his inner child is a little girl. I have no doubt of this as his most recent film Tideland (2005) is his masterpiece. This dark film follows a young girl who has lost her parents due to drug overdoses. Her father even has her help shoot up so that he can go on "vacation." The little girl is more than happy to oblige. Eventually the little girl becomes stranded at her Grandmother's abandoned country house.

A mentally retarded young man by the name of Dickens eventually befriends the little girl. For me his character was quite disturbing. As a child I was always scared yet fascinated by mentally retarded children. In fact, they became sort of an obsession for me. Dickens has that same effect on me in Tideland. Terry Gilliam truly was able to capture the innocence of a child in a dark and twisted world. The little girl sees strange thing after strange thing yet is able to maintain her personhood.

The little girl's best friends are the doll heads that she wears on her fingers. Her interaction between the heads can be quite revealing to the strange mind of a little girl. The actress who played the little girl (Jodelle Ferland) gave an amazing performance. She must have great parents. It will be interesting to see what roles she does in twenty years from now.

Terry Gilliam has always been a director that is more obsessed with visuals and aesthetics than any other aspect of filmmaking. Tideland is no different however it is more successful in its attempts than any of Gilliam's other films. The surreal visuals of the film work hand and hand with its child perspective. Most of Gilliam's suffer from his utilization of fisheye lens and odd shots. One can't get past the image to enjoy the film. Tideland finally does what Gilliam set out to do right.

Tideland is a film that is obviously both love and hated. I plan to revisit it every so often. Whether you like it or not, it's a new and different experience. Something you have to invest yourself in. I doubt Terry Gilliam will ever make a film to top it. Making films about little girls at age sixty can't be topped.

FLESH FOR THE BEAST
FLESH FOR THE BEAST

Terry West (2003)

Naked women are generally a given when it comes to most contemporary horror films. For a lot of horror films, success depends on their combination of nudity and gore. Flesh For the Beast, directed by Terry M. West, is no exception. What makes Flesh For the Beast different is its employment of shoddy childlike masks not even worthy of Wes Craven's Swamp Thing.

Any hypnotic sexual appeal from these exposed harlots is lost as soon as they turn ghoulish and harness bargain bin Halloween masks. Terry M. West must be a fan of both R.L. Stine's Goosebumps series and Lucio Fulci's City of the Living Dead. Weak costumes and semi decent gore don't really match. Twenty years ago Terry M. West may have been able to get away with it as a novelty. Now he just seems like another unimaginative fan boy hack.

A Ken Foree clone and Sergio Leone henchman(Aldo Sanbrel) attempt to sparkle but fail in bringing even the most slightly plausible performance. If either had done something interesting, it wouldn't have rescued Flesh For the Beast from being the mediocre and banal bore-fest that it is. The film fails in all attempts to pay homage or even steal from other films. Terry M. West seems like the type of horror director who saw a couple of the great Lucio Fuci and Dario Argento films and thought he could recreate aspects of those films surely. Instead, he created a weak contemporary model for underground horror film-makers to come.

Surprisingly, the films soundtrack courtesy of KFCphile Buckethead, compliments its frenetically flawed editing. When I started watching the film and saw that it featured music from Buckethead, it made my expectations for Flesh For the Beast to be low. After viewing the film, it was one of the very few redeeming qualities . It added a sort of comic element to the film that was in contrast to the films literal attempt at comic relief in the form of a weasely documentary film cameraman.

Overall, Flesh For the Beast is another passable disk. Filled with uninteresting films and even more uninteresting extra features, it makes you even more aware of the stagnant independent horror film world. Although excellent underground films are being produced, films like Flesh For the Beast seem to be the most promoted(it has been released in a special edition set and two other releases). Watch it so you don't let your film turn out this way.

BLIND BEAST VS. KILLER DWARF

Teruo Ishii (2001)

Allow me to experiment a bit with this film writing. This isn't some attempt to bash a film but rather, a calling out to cinema-goer's of all types who appreciate film for more pretentious values. I've done it before. I've loved certain films because of how they look or the plot devices used. It's rare to find someone that hasn't had this guilty pleasure. This isn't so much a review as it is a testament to how wrong this film was made. Regardless of inspirations, the first thing I noticed about this film was how horribly they butchered the source material for the classic serialization of Blind Beast, let alone the masterpiece in Roman porn that Masumura created. To kick it off, imagine (if you have seen it) Blind Beast. We can all agree that it was a solid masterpiece and could be the poster child for any perverse or sadistic fetish that no one had the gumption to admit having. Blind Beast was a mosaic of perpetual sexuality. The Set's alone were among the most disturbing pieces I have ever encountered. Imagine if you will, Taking true art and pissing all over it. For instance; Any Warhol painting or Tarantino film. (Although I did enjoy Pulp Fiction regardless of how many ideas he stole from short films) Teruo Ishii has taken the setting of the tortured artists studio and dulled it down with embarrassing sculptures that I could even re-create. (Blind Beast: 1969) (Blind Beast vs. Killer Dwarf: 2001) I first blame Rampo for this. Being the writer who penned the serialization of the original story; Blind Beast, It is quite saddening to see this raping of a classic. This is almost as bad as when George Sluizer remade his own masterpiece (The Vanishing) into another rife Americanized film which debases art or originality in cinema while forcing you to spend 60 minutes staring at a younger Kiefer Sutherland in tight blue denims. I'll be the first to admit I haven't seen any of this directors other films. Judging by his filmography and cult status, I understand that he might have been a great director, but this last film before his death due to lung cancer stunk to high heavens. Like the "great" Tarantino, it seems that Ishii had decided to mesh a few good ideas stolen from original movies to create an even more original film. Not even science would allow such an abomination to occur. Now more onto the film, It's filmed in a generic soap opera style, the acting is abysmal, there is no engaging experience, and the dialogue feels like it is written by a children's book author. The next plot point is a Killer Dwarf who walks around parks at night dropping a woman's arm cut off to the shoulder. A noir detective played by legendary Shinya Tsukamoto (Shame on you!) attempts to follow the midget around various set So Ishii and Rampo teamed up to create a cross between Blue Velvet, Blind Beast, and every "curious author who wants to find the truth in an extremely risky situation" film. So they've done that, now what? You think a detective following a midget samurai around is bad? Wait till you find out that this midget also played Godzilla's son in one of the many sequels. What a resume. As my original argument stated, I don't understand how people can conform to a certain film for bare bones aesthetics. I guess that same could be said for my love on Švankmajer's Alice. While I never tire of the film, I can understand how the annoying dub and some of the scenes can rub a cinephile's skin the wrong way. It definitely wasn't his best work, but I still hold a fan-boy crush on all of his works. Another example could be Slaughtered Vomit Dolls. This is a remarkable achievement in vomit cinematography but that's really about all the steadfast weight it carries. It does have deep meaning and several underlying themes which chill you to your bones, but when you watch Slaughtered Vomit Dolls, face it, you're watching it for the gore. More examples are Santa Sangre from auteur Jodorowsky, Pretty much any Miike film, most of Argento's work, and most of Lynch's later works. While these films lack in substance or any narrative, most people still flock to these films due to the popularity of his other works. Obscurity is the new fad and it won't stop with the birth of the term "Indie Rock" or "Indie Films" True Story: Ty E and I saw 1408 in Target with an Indie sticker. What has the world come to?

Tessa Hughes-Freeland (1994)

While nowadays associated with degenerate (sub-beta)male auteur filmmakers like Nick Zedd (We Eat Scum, The Bogus Man) and Richard Kern (You Killed Me First, Fingered), the Cinema of Transgression movement apparently had a less ballsy and more gynocentric flavor when it originally began, or as one of the female members of the scene, Casandra Stark Mele, complained in an interview featured in the book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant, “When I first met up with other filmmakers I felt these concepts were shared. I remember a lot of diversity, a lot of unique filmmaking going on at first. And it was not, at the beginning, male dominated. Tessa Hughes-Freeland and Ela Troyano organized all the downtown, underground film showings, as well as making and screening their own films. Quite a few women I recall were working and showing their films: Alyce Wittenstein, Beth B, Phoebe Legere, Leslie Lowe, Kembra Pfahler, Penelope Wehrli, etc, quite a few. It didn’t feel male dominated to me at all. It was later that certain egos seized opportunities to dominate, by the usual means of manipulation and feigning appearances as being the biggest, meanest, baddest, loudest; the usual infantile perversions.” Indeed, apparently the little known female auteur, who is (in)famous for denouncing and disassociating herself from the Cinema of Transgression scene, blames Zedd, Kern, and their dimestore cum-bucket diva Lydia Lunch for the degeneration of the NYC underground film movement. Admittedly, I was so intrigued by Mele’s candid shit-talking that I decided to hunt down as many as films directed by female filmmakers associated with the would-be-avant-garde cinema movement that I could find, thus leading me to viewing some of the most insanely inept and directionless Super-8 films that I have ever seen (and I say that as a fan of works like J.R. Bookwalter’s The Dead Next Door (1989), Leif Jonker’s Darkness: The Vampire Version (1993) and John R. Hand’s Frankenstein’s Bloody Nightmare (2006), among other shot-on-Super-8 schlock). While I did not mind seeing Mele’s largely aimless anti-romance short Wrecked on Cannibal Island (1986) where a dumb ass dude named Natz performs cunnilingus on the filmmaker (notably at the end of the short, there is a brief shot of Mele’s bushy guidette beaver, which has “Abandon All Hope Ye Who Enter Here” above it over the artist’s womb), I found most of these hopelessly D.I.Y. works to be decided duds that seem like they were directed by mental patients who were handed Super-8 cameras during some art therapy experiment gone awry. Indeed, for every somewhat interesting film like Alyce Wittenstein’s fairly memorable dystopian flick Betaville (1986), which is like Godard’s Alpaville (1965) as molested by Slava Tsukerman’s Liquid Sky (1982), there is a considerably childish homemovie experiment like Lung Leg’s 2-minute celluloid turd Worm Movie (1985) where the seemingly autistic underground pin-up model turned would-be-auteuress thinks simply filming herself with a worm in her mouth while making rather retarded faces is edgy enough to qualify as 'avant-garde' cinema. Out of all the female-directed films that I have seen that are associated with the Cinema of Transgression scene, the fiercely farcical feminist neo-fable Nymphomania (1994) directed by British-born experimental filmmaker Tessa Hughes-Freeland (Baby Doll, Rhonda Goes To Hollywood) and written by and starring Holly Adams is certainly one of the more timeless yet nonetheless idiosyncratic films to have sprung from the mostly mediocre movement, even if it seems like it was assembled in a couple hours while the film crew took turns passing around a joint.

While many, if not most, of the films associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement seem quite typical of their particular zeitgeist and, in turn, have aged less than gracefully as a result, Nymphomania features a classic silent era aesthetic that seems to fall somewhere in between F.W. Murnau's swansong Tabu: A Story of the South Seas (1931) and Kenneth Anger's Rabbit's Moon (1950), albeit with graphic nudity and cunt-stabbing violence, though it certainly pantomimes elements from the very beginning of film history, even if it naturally looks hopelessly amateurish compared to something like Georges Méliès' masterpiece Le Royaume des fees (1903) aka The Kingdom of the Fairies. Indeed, in that sense, the 9-minute black-and-white silent short has way more in common with the works of Jack Smith (Flaming Creatures, Normal Love) and James Bidgood's kaleidoscopic high-camp micro-masterpiece Pink Narcissus (1971) than the sub-lowbrow trash works of Zedd and Kern. Rather unfortunately, the film comes equipped with an extremely moronic one-dimensional misandristic message that could have only slithered out of the same NYC art fag ghetto as the likes of Karen Finley and other chicks that seem pissed that they do not have dicks. A work that depicts an ostensibly graceful fairy with a dyke haircut who is literally fucked to death by the great god Pan, who is depicted as sort of brutally buffoonish sex demon with a radically repellent melungeon-like appearance and a long yet skinny dagger-like prick, Nymphomania is notably described on Hughes-Freeland's official website as follows: "The original idea for this film came about as a reaction to a sense of violation experienced through a love affair gone wrong." Indeed, it seems that the film is a clichéd hysterical female response to a botched love affair where the big mean male, who is literally portrayed as a murderous monster with the IQ of a gnat in Hughes-Freeland's work, is held completely culpable for the perennial disharmony between the sexes. Of course, if interpreted as an expressive depiction of one woman-child's post-childhood disillusionment with the storybook romance of fairytales, Nymphomania is much easier to digest.

Nymphomania, which is somewhat fittingly set to Claude Debussy's "Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune", begins in a sort of classic Golden Age Hollywood fashion with a shot of tree branches that quickly disappear from the screen to voyeuristically reveal a scantily dressed winged fairy nymph (Holly Adams), who awakes from sleeping on a large rock in the middle of a forest and then proceeds to perform a graceful ballet dance that demonstrates the elegance and angelic splendor of the character. Seemingly completely naive to the oftentimes brutal nature of the world, the nymph surely makes for easy prey for any half-serious predator. Meanwhile, in a less aesthetically pleasing area of the forest, pernicious pervert Pan (Bob Mook)—a fairly grotesque and loathsome looking being that resembles a sort of crack-addled demonic metalhead—wakes up with morning wood and makes an exaggerated face of abject disgust, as if he got drunk on too much fairy dust the night before. A bestially carnivorous devil of the violently impulsive sort, Pan satisfies his voracious appetite for live meat by biting into a cute furry animal and then vulgarly spitting some of its less appetizing guts out. Naturally, when Pan spots the nymph prancing around the forest, he seems to interpret the dance as some sort of exotic mating ritual, becomes instantly aroused and begins fiercely filing his fun-rod as if he has never seen a female fairy before. Of course, when the naughty nymph strips off her clothes and then proceeds to carry on her pseudo-provocative prancing, Pan becomes all the more ferocious in his recklessly wanton wank routine. When the naked nimble nymph eventually notices Pan staring at her in a less than savory fashion while he is bludgeoning his beefsteak and notices the bestial lust in his eyes, she naturally immediately attempts to run away from him, but it does not take long for the predatory beast with the dagger-like dick to grab her by the leg and begin manhandling the completely helpless fairy in a savagely sensual fashion. Unfortunately for the poor fairy, Pan has a rather large member and while forcibly plowing the playful forest princess' magical puss, his pernicious prick manages to pierce completely through her tiny abdomen, thereupon killing her in the middle of coitus. As she dies, a tear of blood runs down the nymph's face. In the end, Pan triumphantly blows his horn as if to celebrate his act of inter-species rape turned accidental necrophilia.

In an admirably no bullshit approach to analyzing her own film and, in the process, unwittingly exposing her own misguided misandry, auteur Tessa Hughes-Freeland wrote regarding Nymphomania: “Hoping to express the conflict between the feminine experience of sex as a loving unifying event and its corruption by the male's base animal instincts. The female body is not necessarily portrayed as a sexual phenomenon. It is the male who transforms the nude female form into an image of sexuality. The inclusion of nudity and penetration in film is often perceived as and labeled pornographic, in this instance, nudity and penetration are not intended to arouse or stimulate the audience. Instead, it invites the viewer to contemplate the relationship he or she has to his or her own sexuality.” Since Hughes-Freeland's film has apparently invited me to contemplate my own sexuality, I must say that the short did not in any way arouse me, but only made me think that the director seems to absurdly believe that women are sexless children and men are rabid rape-mad monsters who live solely to eat, destroy, and fuck, even if innocent fairies happen to get killed in the process. Indeed, despite its scenes of nudity and inclusion of a big devilish dick, Nymphomania seems almost puritanical in its portrayal of sex and sexuality, thus giving credence to the timeless stereotype that feminists are frigid cunts that fear and loathe cocks and cannot stand the fact that women typically take a fairly passive role when it comes to carnal acts. In fact, the film's allegorical portrayal of the male sex is so absurdly over-the-top that the short ultimately feels like a parody of post-Dworkin feminism, thus making it tolerable to those sane cinephiles that think Laura Mulvey is an annoying twat and consider popular feminist flicks like Lizzie Borden's Born in Flames (1983) and Rose Troche's Go Fish (1994) to be the celluloid equivalent of a STD. Still, one must give credit to Nymphomania for being a truly all-female flick in terms of both spirit and film crew (Hughes-Freeland even gave herself the politically correct credit of 'cameraperson'), with Rachel Amodeo, who went on to direct and star in the fairly decent post-Cinema of Transgression melodrama What About Me (1993) featuring NYC underground figures ranging from Johnny Thunders and Dee Ramone to Richard Hell and Nick Zedd, acting as the film's special effects assistant. With her short Rest in Peaces (1991), Amodeo would manage to assemble a Gothic horror work with a style more akin to Carl Th. Dreyer's Vampyr (1931) than to the preposterously juvenile post-punk celluloid puke of Zedd or the beta-boy junky (sado)masochism of Kern, thus making the film a great double feature with Nymphomania.

While probably not the greatest film directed by a female filmmaker associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement (Jeri Cain Rossi's savagely sardonic Flannery O'Connor adaptation Black Hearts Bleed Red (1992) is certainly better), Nymphomania is, for better or worse, one of the few true classics of the NYC underground movement as a work that is nearly immaculate in its quaint D.I.Y. amateurishness. Notably, the film, as well as Hughes-Freeland's early burlesque oriented short Baby Doll (1982), was included in Cinema of Transgression 'canon' featured in the bilingual English-German book You Killed Me First: The Cinema of Transgression (2012), which was a companion piece to the movement's first collective exhibition at the Kunst-Werke Institute for Contemporary Art in 2012. Of course, compared to other films that also utilize anachronistic cinematic techniques, like the works of a filmmaker Guy Maddin or even the queer New Zealand short Twilight of the Gods (1995) directed by Stewart Main, Hughes-Freeland's anti-fantasy short seems somewhat weak and infantile, but of course that is part of its charm as a kitschy girly film with teeth. Indeed, as director Hughes-Freeland stated in an interview featured in Deathtripping, "In terms of the sensibility of the people involved, I think that people regarded the Cinema of Transgression as infantile, which it undoubtedly was, with all the fun involved in being completely fucking infantile, completely irresponsible." If Nymphomania proves anything in regard to the gender politics of the Cinema of Transgression, it is that at least some of the lady filmmakers associated with the movement had more class and eloquence than both Kern and Zedd combined, but I guess that does not really say much.

WILD ZERO
WILD ZERO

Tetsuro Takeuchi (1999)

Wild Zero is known to me solely for the very similar traits to that of Versus and in part of the Lightning Bolt/Guitar Wolf 7" Split that I jubilantly indulged in during the height of my musical adolescence. I discovered many questionable traits to distinguish appeasement from guilty pleasure and on this quest for the ultimate thrill I weakened my standards to include, not up to glorious entertainment with an ethnic propagandic twist seen only in Japanese trash cinema. Stereotypes of Italy leading in as the full purveyor of trash are dutifully ill-informed and in this preposterous lie the truth comes to light: all Japanese films excluding a few are trash. Trash meaning of a trashy aesthetic, cheese, and B-habits such exhibited in Wild Zero. The Japs courageously stepped upon unstable ground and have managed to mold a market out of second-rate zombie films and low-budget J-horror films that have no elements of terror other than vanishing, stoic figures with jet black hair. In many pieces of eccentric Pan-Asian video experiments, the Japanese will also stroll through their native city limits, come across an electric guitar, pick it up and be instantly transformed into an egomaniacal slant-eyed badass with enough attitude to slick his hair into a quiff. This acute extension of pride has had many recent offenders? Detroit Metal City, Electric Dragon 80000v, the hit video game Gitaroo Man, and yours truly, Wild Zero. In regards to the previous statement of instrument phallicism, Detroit Metal City hangs weight as a stark example. Soichi-san has dreams of creating Swedish pop music but upon his failing talent at such, he picks up an electric guitar and is transformed into the formidable Johannes Krauser II. Acoustic guitar: homosexual, Electric guitar: heterosexual badass - See the manifestation of transferring sexual orientation? It's all too clear to just be a stroke of accidental recurring themes in the midst of Asian rock. Their attempts to create an Eastern rockabilly fashion in Wild Zero is laughable at best and that's the kick that lies in the taste of this scintillating query of oddball antics that eventually spirals into sexual confusion as our "lovable" hero, Ace, who doesn't play guitar, turns into a homosexual by films end. Pushed to beliefs that "love knows no genders" by Guitar Wolf himself, Ace drops his own perception of targeted affection in order to snootily follow a beeline placed before him by a band of Japanese noise-punk musicians. Let it be known that I'd first eat my own shoe than take relationship advice from someone from Japan. Apart from the amount of sheer complacency, Wild Zero soon matures into a prime piece of zombie cinema that had a rough start without the help of Guitar Wolf to even the ties. With Guitar Wolf's absence, Wild Zero would have been just another Tokyo Zombie. All play and no work makes zombie films sour to the core and in this statement I'd like to approve Wild Zero's cause of non-stop play to have something of a productive nature in building a semi-serious film - serious as in the way it was created, not marketed. Wild Zero is basically pure immature adrenaline in personified film form. With aliens, rock shows, and zombies, the odds were against Wild Zero for succeeding with so much inclination for the absurd and for the better, it did. To top off this piece of brilliantly sub-par cinema, a scene with a topless femme fatale is included, shower and all. Wild Zero is the apotheosis of a hypothesis : an intellectually scarred vision of how modern Japanese absurdity should be confined into a single shell casing that features everything one could hope to achieve with the promise of "over the top." If you can manage to look past the homosexual force fed flair (trust me, I did,) then you might come out of this film in grand working condition. Don't let my stoicism get to your inner workings. I am merely a jaded cynic with a fiery temper to boot. Wild Zero offered me everything I needed to cool down and in the end I found this film to be an utmost necessity to the Japanese cult movement. Any tag line that reads "Jet rock 'n' roll" must boast a swift undercurrent of zany entertainment that can only be extinguished by the saddening (old) news that Bass Wolf died of natural causes in 2005.

CONFESSIONS

Tetsuya Nakashima (2010)

Selected as the Japanese entry for Best Foreign Film in the 83rd annual Academy Awards, Tetsuya Nakashima's most recent work in "pop filmmaking" is Confessions, a twisty diorama of revenge and manipulation. I would be lying if I didn't admit that the first 30 minutes of Confessions leveled my expectations, comprising of a teacher's confession to her classmates. I plan to open my review in the same vein that the teacher Ms. Moriguchi scolds her students and dive right into the meat and matter of the story. Near the end of the term, Ms. Moriguchi speaks under the bustling homeroom of shrieking girls and boasting boys to mention that she is retiring from teaching. After rebutting the claim that she is avoiding responsibility, she then mentions her status as single mother, going on to reiterate her daughter's death that occurred not too long ago. The film gets tricky when Ms. Moriguchi reveals that the death was no accident and that the killers are seated among the very demographic before her. What is so strange about Confessions is the manner in which it is produced and compiled. The central components aiding the accessibility is the inclusion of the Radiohead song Last Flowers till the Hospital, instrumentals from Boris, and the frequent usage of slow-motion and melancholy as to capture fleeting moments with ardor.

There are a few points in Confessions that did make me question the need for such grandeur. While Nakashima is predominately known for his pop art with film, as Kamikaze Girls' popularity bleeds through, the repetition of slow-motion acts and ambient streams of instrumentals makes it feel like you are watching the same instance over and over again, which you are. The narrative of Confessions is what grabs hold and justly so. After Moriguchi's confession to her class, the story progresses past into the next year to show the aftermath but halts mid-step and backs up a bit, replaying the events from different perspectives and confessions. So essentially, Confessions is much in tune with a broken record, although being one that doesn't inflame your senses. When conceptualizing Confessions from a novel to a feature length film, Nakashima visualized Takako Matsu as Ms. Moriguchi and vowed only to proceed with filming if her name was attached to star. I find such dedication to a vision flattering the very meaning of cinema. Confessions is many things: tragic, compelling, accessible, empowering, and true to the spirit of teenage years. Nakashima invokes teenage gossip so well that I found myself reminiscing my own high school years while watching Confessions. Culturally and worlds apart, sure, but the cruelty of children remains intact regardless of landmass, this I know. Employing scenes of text messages to scatter the harsh opinions of fellow classmates, Confessions' student body is essentially a pack of piranhas, eager to devour any and all forms of life upon breaking the water.

What it boils down to is a boisterous stage drama. Confessions boasts many wonderful set-pieces, is filmed with a keen eye for wide shots, and gift-wraps its "psychological thriller" package with a fantastic palette of vivid colors. It is what you'd expect of a Hollywood film but living up to its promise of intrigue. Most self-proclaimed psychological thrillers couldn't hold a flame to Confessions and the many darkly-comic passages of teen angst that resides in its sterile walls. Not all things can be hidden with style and polish though. Confessions is malnourished Japanese cinema down to its core - call it culturally deficient. Replace the characters with American actors and you'd hardly recognize the drastic change of casting. I can appreciate the effort put forth into Westernizing it and the budget saves it from piling atop the amateur and dry stack of most Japanese filmmakers but what I want with Japanese films is something that cannot be replicated outside of its walls, hence why I explore international film in the first place. This isn't all bad though as this, in turn, morphs Confessions into an excellent gateway exception for even the most prudish of snobs who refute the idea of "reading while watching". But for what it is worth, Confessions is presented perfectly; it's a film that is a cultural chameleon, can be enjoyed by near anyone, seemingly impossible to dislike (invalid to opinion unless you dissect for dissent), and a precise mixture of woe, humor, and MTV. Look forward to this release from Third Window Films, can you ever go wrong with their catalog?

BANGKOK DANGEROUS

The Pangs (2008)

Major Spoilers in the 4th paragraph Bangkok Dangerous is that film; the one you lampoon and crack witty jokes before the release while laying a claim of hatred upon something you haven't seen. Whether it be Nicholas Cage's awful hairdo (Almost rivaling Tom Hanks' in The Da Vinci Code) Every year, a multiple amount of films were released away from prying eyes but this didn't stop uneducated word of mouth to demolish a film's box office chance. This is the story of one film that got a last laugh by being a somewhat enjoyable film experience. Now I haven't seen the original yet, but it's in my queue. I expect the original to blow this out of the water and force me to look down disappointedly on this Nicholas Cage hair vessel. When this motion picture isn't being bogged down with repressive noir monologues (from a character that was intended to be deaf & mute), extremely predictable situations, and flawed and immature side characters, the film retains some substance. The film assumes some condescension over the original by making the lead character speak fluidly and wear a ridiculous cowboy hat. It also doesn't help the fact that some American guy named Joe, the ONLY white man in Bangkok, is an international hitman. Being a hitman is about stealth and creating a disguise and/or alter-ego. I guess Cage never thought ahead too well or he could have called this one from afar, sticking out like a sore thumb and all. It's the final moment of the film that seals its fate. Watching Nicholas Cage wounded in a car with his last target, sitting beside him with a dead silence about them both is a mesmerizing scene. One of which you silence your friends to watch what happens next. He puts the gun to his head and pulls Surat's head parallel to his. With a squeeze of the trigger, we see the back seat explode in a fire flash and blood. Nicholas Cage's limp arm is seen recoiling and death twitching through the rear window. This is an image you won't soon forget. Alternate Poster that I thought deserved a view The action is a weird mix of styles. You can notice the fact that two directors are at work. One produces wonderful techniques such as seeing bullets pierce a body in a boat, then a quick cut to the murky depths below as we see bullets trail through the water. The water then turns a dark shade of red as blood begins billowing out of the holes. The other director is the Michael Bay type who has a fetish for people standing on top of exploding motorcycles while aimlessly shooting water jugs in a strafing manner. Allow me to be biased and irrational for a moment's time. If Nicholas Cage didn't sport such a god-awful toupee and cowboy hat, I would have respected The Pang Brothers re-envisioning a hell of a lot more. Bangkok Dangerous is riddled with flaws, I won't lie, but there is something behind the thin shell that is more meaningful than I could have imagined. A punk Joaquin Phoenix could have been a much better sidekick to Nicholas Cage in Bangkok Dangerous than Kong ever could.

SPEED RACER
SPEED RACER

The Wachowskis° (2008)

Kicking off the summer season is a list of long awaited blockbusters directed by some of Hollywood's biggest names. Remakes and adaptations are the biggest craze in the film industry, so it comes as no surprise that Speed Racer would be green-lit. The directors and stars were juggled around for several years until they found the duo with the perfect intentions. The Wachowski Brothers are very well-known for their cyber trilogy The Matrix. Together, these brothers create a breathing world for what was once a series of drawings. This breathing world features amazing schemes of colors that were created with a massive amount of green-screening. We have cars with elaborate safety devices similar to the ones featured in Demolition Man. We have a great depth of a crime ring reminiscent to Dick Tracy's villains. Part Sonic the Hedgehog and Part Kung-Fu, Speed Racer is like a clashing of classic entertainment to create an action smoothie. When the film's trailer was released, many fans of the huge series groaned and were disappointed. While the film did do very bad at the box office, this lies blame to the release of the mega hit Iron Man and also the fact that the people viewing this film expect some intriguing plot for something that is potentially a story that could never have any depth. Speed Racer is what it is; eye candy. The visual effects are so off the wall and gorgeous. Speed Racer is a kaleidoscopic retina rapist outfitted with amazing performances from Richard Roundtree, Matthew Fox, and Emile Hirsch. Granted, the film has its own problems but this film still sprints to the finish line. It serves as a childrens film and even has something for adults. Many one liner's grace the screen. The most memorable would be John Goodman calling a ninja a "nonja" Some of the scenes suited for children will literally leave any adult facepalming due to the flagrant marketing to children. I long dreaded the day the word "cooties" would be used in a film again. As every film should have, Speed Racer also has it's share of controversy. During filming, the Chimpanzee bit the stand-in for Spritle and due to this, the chimp got hit. I would like to say beaten up for comedic value but it was simply a strike. Due to this ridiculous incident, the AHA rated Speed Racer unacceptable. Speed Racer is an experience unlike many. The plot is quick and delivers a smooth road to the action which is sprinkled through out the film nicely. Matthew Fox is Racer X. After my recent LOST obsession, It's nice to see Fox play another role besides Jack. Speed Racer will make you laugh, wow, and near tear up due to the montages of inspirations. It is arguably a great film. It depends on your idea of fun. Relive your childhood and enjoy this.

HER NAME WAS LISA

A couple years before his depraved dream collaboration with Hebraic hardcore star Jamie Gillis (Through the Looking Glass, Water Power) that produced the two nastily nihilistic blue movie masterpieces, Corruption (1983) and Midnight Heat (1983), artsploitation auteur turned rather reluctant pornographer Roger Watkins aka 'Richard Mahler'—a troubled and truly underground figure best remembered today for his brutal and majorly misanthropic Manson-esque exploitation flick The Last House on Dead End Street (1977) aka The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell—made his directorial debut in the wayward fuck flick world with the considerably gritty and undeniably unnerving work Her Name Was Lisa (1980) starring archetypical 'porn bitch' Samantha Fox (Jack n' Jill, Babylon Pink) and Hispanic negress Vanessa del Rio (Foxtrot, Maid in Manhattan). A former streetwalker and call girl, del Rio is probably best known for having a grotesquely large clitoris, so it was probably to Watkins' benefit that he refused to shoot the sex scenes for his first porn flick. Unfortunately for the viewer, Watkins had his financial backer/cinematographer Dave Derby shoot these scenes and for whatever reason, the money man thought it would be a good idea to spend most of the sex scenes doing super close-ups of the performers' mostly unflattering rectums, cunts, and clitorises. As Watkins described in an interview with interview with David Kerekes featured in Headpress 23: Funhouse (2002), he accidentally got involved in the porn industry after going with his friend to collect money from Mr. Derby, who asked him "You wanna do some porn?" after hearing that he was a filmmaker. Of course, Watkins, who had money trouble for most of his life, agreed with the stipulation that he would not direct the fuck scenes, later recollecting regarding the rather strange and somewhat depraved experience of directing his first porno, "So I made this film called HER NAME WAS LISA, which I thought was pretty perverse because Derby had a daughter named Lisa. He says to me, "I have this daughter. I see a film that opens up with this girl called Lisa in a coffin, and I want to see how she gets there." That was what he wanted to do. So I wrote this thing, which took about two hours—because how much dialogue can there be in a porn film? I remember he paid me $2,500 and I thought "God, this is great!" Then he lost the script [...] He called me up and I just wrote it again and he gave me another $1,000." Of course, Her Name Was Lisa was a big hit and would lead to Watkins becoming one of the most 'respected' auteur pornographers of his time, which is no small accomplishment since it was era of 'porn chic.' A rather morbid and less than titillating (anti)pornographic tale told through a series of flashbacks about how a lowly massage parlor slut who went from becoming a successful model and 'kept woman' of a perverted publisher, only to degenerate into a junky lesbo who died prematurely after getting hooked on heroin after being introduced to it by her nefarious negro girlfriend, Watkins' film might be described by some as a cautionary anti-drug piece, but it is just too plain dark, depressing, and needlessly nihilistic to convince anyone to stay off drugs. Instead, it might inspire some more less-than-stable junkies working in the so-called adult entertainment industry to blow their brains out.

Opening with a seemingly somber young man named Paul (Rick Iverson of Roberta Findlay's Justine: A Matter of Innocence and Charles Larkin's The Love-In Arrangement) attending the Catholic funeral viewing of a beautiful young brunette named Lisa (Samantha Fox), the viewer soon questions how the young girls ended up in a wooden box in the first place. Indeed, through a series of episodic pseudo-erotic flashbacks, the viewer will soon find out what led poor Lisa to a semi-lavish life of lechery that ultimately turned tragically lethal. Flashback to an unspecified period of time in the near past and little Lisa is a bitchy and seemingly stuck-up prostitute who works at a 'massage parlor' where clients pay $20 to spend 15 minutes receiving a quick carnal thrill from the girlish hooker. When a young, vaguely handsome, and superficially charming photographer named Paul pays $20 to "talk" with Lisa about the prospect of becoming one of his models, her life is, for better or worse, changed forever. Indeed, although finding the photographer's intentions to be somewhat dubious at first, Lisa comes by Paul's studio and witnesses bloody naked chicks with guns being photographed to the soothing Teutonic electronic sounds of "We Are the Robots" by Kraftwerk. While Lisa and Paul develop a pleasant professional, as well as sexual, relationship, that all changes when the latter's employer decides that he wants to meet the new model.

Stephen Sweet (David Pierce of Debbie Does Dallas and Carter Stevens' Double Your Pleasure) is a successful publisher and entrepreneur and Paul owes his career to the perverted businessman, who regularly buys nudie photos from the small fry photographer, who cannot say no to his prestigious pompous boss' demand to see his latest model. Against Paul's will, Mr. Sweet comes to meet Lisa, who he has become obsessed with her since seeing nude photos of her. Before she can really say anything, Mr. Sweet begins feeling up Lisa and bragging about how successful of a businessman he is. While Lisa claims that she is "nobody's fool" and tries to hold her own against the rather persuasive Svengali-like businessman, she soon becomes the virtual sex slave and 'kept woman' of Mr. Sweet, who gives her a fancy apartment stocked full of expensive alcoholic beverages, sex toys, and other lavish, if not decadent, creature comforts. After showing Lisa the apartment that he has bought specifically to keep her semi-imprisoned in so that he can use her as his own personal whore, Mr. Sweet makes the following stipulation to his sassy sexual serf, "Alls I ask in return is that you're here when I want you to be." Indeed, a pathologically punctual man, Mr. Sweet demands that Lisa be at the apartment at no later than 10pm that night and that she get acquainted with "a few odds and ends in the bedroom," which includes whips, a leather gimp mask, and other stereotypical BDSM related items. When Mr. Sweet returns that night, Lisa demands that Mr. Sweet strip of all his clothes and then she proceeds to tie him to the bed, but not before slapping him across the face like a little bitch. Of course, being a social sadist who is really a closet masochist like so many other successful businessmen and lawyers, Mr. Sweet rather enjoys the decidedly degrading experience. After strapping Sweet to the bed and putting the gimp mask over his head, Lisa hatefully whispers to him "I'm not going to let you cum...even when you beg me, I'm not going to let you cum." Indeed, after pouring wine over his body and less than impressive prick, Lisa forces Mr. Sweet to lick her "nice ass," which he does with gusto for a number of minutes in a rather grating scene that features less than flattering close-ups of Ms. Fox's tail. When they are finished doing what some might describe as 'fucking,' Lisa hatefully states to Mr. Sweet, "Get out and don't come back until your tongue grows another six inches." Of course, born sexual dictator Lisa is not amused when he brings two of his friends, 'Doc' (played by Samantha Fox's common law husband Bobby "Clown Prince of Porn" Astyr) and 'Dopey' (Randy West of Kim Christy's Squalor Motel), over to gang-rape her. Indeed, after giving Lisa some pain killers in what is her first step towards drug addiction, Mr. Sweet masturbates to his concubine being devilishly defiled by depraved duo Doc and Dopey in a variety of eclectically damaging and degrading ways.

Luckily, Lisa has just made friends with a big black beastess that she met at an otherworldly spa named Carmen (Vanessa del Rio) and she will help her take revenge against Mr. Sweet because, as she states, "I hate seeing beauty being abused." Indeed, one night, Mr. Sweet is delighted to see Carmen randomly show up with a long whip and leather S&M garb while Lisa, whose thighs are covered in large bruises, ferociously masturbates on the floor in a rather acrobatic fashion. After declaring like a true pompous posh pervert, "My, my...I guess the evening won't be a waste after all. Let me compliment you on your choice of friends, dear," Mr. Sweet joins Lisa and Carmen for the carnal escapades but before he knows it, he is being raped in the rectum by a vengeful woman. Indeed, While Carmen pins Mr. Sweet down and declares, "Get it all the way up there...fuck his ass," Lisa hate-fucks him with a thick strap-on while he begs for mercy in vain, though the viewer suspects the majorly masochistic businessman enjoys being viciously bum-bugged by a woman. While Carmen earned Lisa's love and affection by acting as her savior and helping her take her revenge against Mr. Sweet, she is really a disturbingly deceptive and conniving little Sapphic cunt of the certifiably psychopathic sort and she wastes no time in getting her new 'friend' hooked on heroin. Indeed, as the film ultimately reveals, compared to Carmen, Mr. Sweet seems like a slightly depraved little angel. In an offbeat scene featuring an orgasmic opium haze juxtaposed with the fitting sounds of "Dazed and Confused" by classic rock degenerates Led Zeppelin, Lisa begins peddles her pussy to a threesome-inclined husband (Ron Hudd Cecil Howard's 1982 classic Scoundrels) and wife (played by Robin Byrd, who later hosted the 'adult oriented' cable talk show 'Robin Byrd Show') so that she can fund her devastating drug habit. Looking for a fix after she can no longer seem to sell her gash for cash, Lisa soon comes crawling back to wanton wench Carmen, who immediately remarks upon seeing her fallen friend, "you look like hell," to which the withdrawing junk replies in a meek fashion, "I feel like hell. That's why I am here." After Lisa begs for some dope in a groveling manner so that she can inject it into her arm to temporarily relieve the pain of heroin withdraw, Carmen demands a kiss, but when the jaded junky gives her psychopathic non-friend a passionate peck on the lips, the nefarious negress does not kiss back but merely looks at her desperate victim with abject contempt. After giving Lisa a cold figurative kiss of death, Carmen states, "I'll let you help yourself" and hands the forsaken beauty a needle with the heroin that she will ultimately unwittingly kill herself with. As one might suspect, Her Name Was Lisa ultimately concludes coldly with a shot of the eponymous anti-heroine's casket.

Despite being one of Roger Watkins' greatest artistic efforts, be it fuck flick or otherwise, the filmmaker had mixed feelings on his wicked little pornographic debut Her Name Was Lisa, stating in an interview featured in Headpress 23: Funhouse: "I don't like the film very much. It had some things I like quite a bit: it has a scene where Vanessa Del Rio is injecting Lisa was heroin and stuff. And I like the ending, it's pretty bleak." Indeed, Watkins' was so disappointed by Dave Derby's direction of the porn sequences that he later decided to break his rule that he would never direct porn scenes, stating regarding the poorly directed sex segments: "But what I don't like is Dave Derby's photography and directing of the sex. And its tempo. It looks like a Mexican Super-8 loop or some shit. That's why some of the later pornography I did I directed everything. If I've got to do it, it's going to look good." On top of directing some of the most sexually unflattering porn scenes in film history, Derby was apparently part of a sleazy social scene that was just as degenerate as the one featured in Her Name Was Lisa, with Watkins later remarking regarding working with him on the production of the film: "Here we are, Easter Sunday, 1979. There are derelict coke-heads lying on the floor, some bitch got mad at Samantha Fox, picked up a knife, threw it at her, it went in the wall about this far from her head. There are drugs all over the place. I'm turning around and some guy's dick is standing there..." Not surprisingly, Fox also led a drug-addled life comparable to that of her character in Watkins' film, though she apparently eventually got off the hard stuff and in 2003, she had the distinct honor of being inducted into the AVN Hall of Fame.

Unquestionably, in terms of its aberrant 'aesthetic' brutality, cultural cynicism, psychosexual ultra-violence, unwaveringly nihilistic essence, and misanthropic undertones, Her Name Was Lisa comes closer than any of Watkins' other films to resembling the depraved tone of the director's maniacal magnum opus The Last House on Dead End Street. Interestingly, the films have a couple similarities, with the most obvious probably being that the character 'Stephen Sweet' in the porn flick is clearly named after the actor of the same name who played the rich fag porn producer character Steve Randall in The Last House on Dead End Street who is tortured and humiliated by being forced to deep throat a deer hoof that is worn by a crazy topless bitch. Rather interestingly, as the exploitation flick demonstrates in its depiction of sociopathic ex-con (played by Watkins himself) that takes revenge against a society that he believes has wronged him by torturing and killing porn producers and other untermensch rabble, it is as if Watkins—a man who once bragged that he spent the entire budget of his first feature on drugs—foresaw his own timely degeneration into a resentful pornographer. Indeed, long before he ever made his first porn flick, Watkins dealt with themes of post-Manson sexual violence, sadomasochism, and nihilistic sex, so I see it as only natural that he got in the business, even if he claimed that he initially never had any plans to do so. A protégé of Hollywood bad boy Nicholas Ray (Rebel Without a Cause, Bigger Than Life) who once penned a Sapphic reworking of Thomas Mann's classic novel Death in Venice for female porno/exploitation director/producer Roberta Findlay and directed an extra-loose pornographic adaptation of Richard Wagner's opera Das Rheingold under the title Corruption (1980) starring Jamie Gillis, Watkins epitomized more than probably anyone of his time what one might described as the "fallen artist" as a considerably cultivated man with genuine artistic talent that loved opera and German classical music but who got mixed up in hard drugs, nihilism, and a dark and depraved underground scene that probably contributed to his premature death in 2007 at the age of 58 from a heart attack before he could make a real comeback (indeed, with the long-awaited release of The Last House on Dead End Street on DVD in 2005 by Barrel Entertainment and various planned collaborations with contemporary horror filmmakers, it seemed like Watkins would have at least directed a couple more films). As a fan of the seemingly accursed director's oeuvre, I can certainly imagine a great biopic being made about Watkins' life under the title His Name Was Roger, though I somewhat hope it would not be pornographic.

Upon reading up on assassinated Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh (Loos, Blind Date), I encountered an unintentionally hilarious article written by some do-gooder leftist pussy type where the slave-morality-driven author makes various pathetic attacks on the director's personal character. In regard to van Gogh's first feature Luger (1982), this certain hysterical and culturally cuckolded writer, who will go unnamed, made the following complaint: "Already in his first movie [...] Van Gogh, with sadistic pleasure, had a gangster push his pistol in a woman's vagina." Indeed, to the limp-wristed pansy liberal's credit, van Gogh's first feature is a limp-wristed pansy liberal's worst celluloid nightmare (in fact, when the film was first released, various Dutch film critics used the typical pathetic neo-Trotskyite buzzwords like "fascist" and "anti-Semitic" to criticize the film), as a work that not only features not a single so-called "person of color," but also includes rather uproarious jokes at the expense of women, cripples, negroes, innocent animals, and other specially protected groups that devout leftists (aka spiritual eunuchs) with slave moralities feel the need to hysterically defend as if they are protecting their gods. Of course, considering that most active left-wingers are completely humorless, the hysterical libertine humor of a film like Luger would be totally lost on them. A severely sardonic (anti)film noir flick that makes a total mockery of the entire classic Hollywood film style it parrots starring now-popular Dutch actor Thom Hoffman (Dogville, Black Book) in his first 'major' film role, van Gogh's daring directorial debut is a rare cinematic work that features uncompromising contempt for virtually everyone and everything. Hell, auteur van Gogh would once even confess regarding his intent with the film: "There was no intent or purpose. We wanted just a movie, as politically incorrect as possible. The more sacred cows we killed the better." Since one of Van Gogh's angry ex-girlfriends threw one of two total existing prints of the film into a canal, the film was impossible to find until rather recently after the surviving print was discovered at the filmmaker's home after he was assassinated by a ticked-off towelhead in 2004. Naturally, after having South Africa auteur Aryan Kaganof, who collaborated with van Gogh on a couple projects (the Dutch filmmaker appeared as a freaky foot fetishist in Kaganof's 1992 avant-garde short La séquence des barres parallèles), tell me that Luger was an "absolute masterpiece," I had to see it and after actually viewing the work, I can happily report that it is as charmingly fucked as I expected it would be, albeit in a fiercely farcical fashion that one might describe as the sort of slapstick comedy that an ex-SS man with Alzheimer's disease might enjoy, as an innately iconoclastic piece of strangely aesthetically potent black-and-white celluloid grit that makes a valiant attempt to offend all viewers, despite whatever race, class, sex, gender, and/or creed they may belong to.

In the first couple minutes of Luger, the viewer is introduced to the eponymous antihero played by Thom Hoffman (back when he used to go by the name "Tom Ancion") as he liquidates a bunch of bleach blonde babes at a night club in what is truly a disco bloodbath. When Chris Luger slowly and gently puts his prized black leather gloves on a ritualistic fashion, you know he is about to kill someone, but otherwise it is hard to know what his next move will be because he is as cold as ice to the point of parody and he has a fiercely flat affect, especially when murdering or committing some other sort of wicked act. The antihero hates modern Hague as the city is "getting black" and "speed heads are too lazy to work," not to mention the fact that he apparently works for "men who sit on their asses all day," but that does not stop him from collecting a monthly negro-approved welfare check. As Luger explains, his ultimate goal is to get rich quick so he can buy a castle in Palm Spring and tell his butler: "James, throw another nigger on the fire." After failing to take the "cherry" of a crippled 21-year-old "spoiled bitch" named Eve in front of her sailor grandfather (he was quite excited about seeing the untimely deflowering of his granddaughter and even paid the deranged Dutch gangster to do it), Luger learns from a friend that: "Jews don't deal in gold but in diamonds. Gold is too heavy. They have to travel light. That's why they're into diamonds." Luger decides he also wants to "travel light" like a member of god's chosen tribe, so he conspires to kidnap the retarded daughter of a millionaire named Marsjaupt so he can ask for a ransom of "half a million in diamonds," which he plans to sell to a wealthy "freaked out faggot" named Repsure that he knows from Central Park. Unfortunately, Marsjaupt is a miserly old bastard and he is not going to give away half a million dollars worth of "girl's best friend" to save the retarded daughter that he is probably more than glad to get rid of in the first place. On top of not getting his ransom money, Luger has to clean and bath mental invalid Lelia (Laurien Hilderling) who, being a worthless retard and all, constantly shits and pisses in her panties like a newborn baby. Of course, the psychopathic would-be-gangster does find some use for Lelia, as he gets her to help him kill a couple cats just for kicks by putting them in a dryer. Meanwhile, Luger starts a bizarre relationship with an overweight ex-nurse named Esther (Frieda Ysebaert) who proclaims to love the pope and seems to have latent lesbian tendencies (or so one would assume based on her bull-dyke-like appearance and lack of dainty dame qualities). Of course, Luger ultimately finds himself falling for Lelia.

At one point, Luger attempts to get Lelia to rape Esther, but he ultimately decides to put his pistol in the old slag's pussy instead, hilariously stating, "you have to cock it first" before putting a hole through her fleshy hole. Upon first meeting Esther, Luger confesses that he wishes he could be reincarnated as a legless SS man, stating: "I'd come back as an SS officer without legs. I'd be called Hocus Pocus. Hocus Pocus in a wheelchair. I'd ride along the beach with little boys on my lap. I'd give them my gun and say: Shoot the fish. But give me your fishing rod. I'd tie it to my wheelchair with your Tampax on the hook." When Luger manages to get what he believes is diamonds and attempts to sell them to queer criminal queen Reppure, he is told they are nothing but worthless glass. Reppure also tells Luger that he is a third rate criminal and "talented whore" who should know that, "Diamonds are for Jews. Not for a bastard like you." Needless to say, Luger puts the "freaked out faggot" in his place. While Luger never achieves the great wealth he so eagerly craved, he does end up exterminating a number of people and even seems to fall in love with a retard, who he lovingly adorns with a dog collar. Ironically, in the end, invalid Lelia kills Luger. Indeed, during what seems like a mock symbolic wedding at a train station, Luger makes the major mistake of handing his trusty Luger to his prisoner Lelia who, despite being rather retarded, immediately shoots and kills her crazed kidnapper. No doubt, Lelia ultimately proves to be the most subtle and calculating yet simultaneously exceedingly retarded femme fatale in film noir history in the end. Undoubtedly, it is hard to discern whether or not Luger has a happy ending, but it certainly has a hilarious ending to what is overall a hilarious film.

In her book Radical State: How Jihad is Winning Over Democracy in the West (2010), kosher conservative journalist Abigail R. Esman wrote: "Theo van Gogh's first film, LUGER, premiered on April 8, 1982. It was by no means a great film, or even, by many accounts, a good film. It was, however, certainly a controversial one, one which would have allowed its producer plenty of notoriety and recognition no matter what his last name might have been: it was for LUGER that Van Gogh created his infamous scene, with the two cats in a washing machine. It was tasteless. It was an unnecessarily dramatic performance in the breaking of rules. It was shock for shock's sake. But it was quintessential Theo: he had something to say, and he was damn well going to say it." Of course, what the Jewess forgets to mention about van Gogh's film is that it features many jokes at the expenses of Judaics like herself, which is a big "no, no" in the pathetically philo-Semitic Netherlands. Indeed, aside from criticizing Jews for always complaining about the holocaust and incessantly using the 'Shoah card' to deflect attention from Israel's less than kosher treatment of the Palestinians and what-not, van Gogh wrote hilarious pieces about "copulating yellow stars in the gas chamber" and even once wrote an article during the 1980s for the Amsterdam University magazine Folia about Dutch Jewish writer Leon de Winter regarding something called the "Treblinka love game" where the Semitic scribbler put a "piece of barbed wire" around his already mutilated circumcised member. Indeed, maybe the director's assassin Mohammed Bouyeri should have considered van Gogh's more anti-Zionist qualities before killing him, as few other Dutchman have the gall to question the Jewish question. Apparently, the director was convinced that, despite receiving death threats from crazed camel jockeys after the release of his short film Submission (2004), no one would ever actually kill him because, "Nobody kills the village idiot." Indeed, Luger is certainly the perverse product of a village idiot, but a rather jovial idiot who was too sophisticatedly sardonic for his own good, hence why a group of medieval-minded muzzie morons did not get his jokes. Somewhat in the spirit of Fassbinder's early 'avant-garde' gangster flicks like Love Is Colder Than Death (1969) and Gods of the Plague (1970) due to its European-flavored deconstruction and wicked mutation of the film noir style, albeit replacing Teutonic Weltschmerz with distinctly deranged Dutch dark humor, Luger may not be a cinematic masterpiece, but it is certainly a masterpiece of ideally iconoclastic absurdism. For those interested, the film also features a Hitchcockian cameo by van Gogh from his pre-beer-gut years.

Hebraic hebephile Roman Polanski and assassinated Dutch iconoclast Theo van Gogh are about as different as filmmakers and individuals as two people could be, with the former being a small and swarthy avant-garde auteur turned major Hollywood blockbuster director and the latter being a tall, blond, blue-eyed, and beer-gutted born subversive who never seemed to tame with age, but they both have one major thing in common and that is cinematically adapting the novel A Day at the Beach (1962) by Dutch writer and poet Simon Heere Heeresma. While most cinephiles and cineastes would probably assume Polanski's version is infinitely superior, they would be oh so terribly wrong, at least in my less than humble opinion. To Polanski's credit, he only penned and produced A Day at the Beach (1972), as he apparently opted to have his Danish friend Simon Hesera—a first-time filmmaker whose sole other film before giving up filmmaking altogether was the curiously titled documentary Ben Gurion Remembers (1973)—direct the film instead due to 'extenuating circumstances' in his own personal life. Indeed, the film was apparently originally intended as Polanski's directorial follow-up to Rosemary's Baby (1968) and was only given to Hesera to direct after the director's wife Sharon Tate and unborn son were there victims of the murderously maniacal Manson family. Receiving only a limited theatrical release in Europe and assumed lost by Paramount Pictures for 20 years due to a supposed 'paperwork error' until it was tracked down by the director in 1992, the Polanski version certainly had no influence on van Gogh's version and thankfully so as a work that, although not featuring the novelty of Peter Sellers as a queenish queer store owner like the original adaptation, was certainly made to be filmed in its native language and location. Despite being adapted twice, Heeresma's novel has ironically been described as an 'unfilmable' novel, yet Een dagje naar het strand (1984) aka A Day at the Beach is arguably the most mature, malignantly melancholy, aesthetically accomplished, and decidedly Dutch film ever directed. Van Gogh's second feature following his pathologically politically incorrect anti-noir debut Lüger (1982) starring popular Dutch actor Thom Hoffman (Dogville, Black Book) as a fascist gangster who kidnaps and starts a loony love affair with a retarded heiress, the equally darkly humorous yet dejecting work follows the day in the life of a super cynical and sadistically shameless dipsomaniac who takes his crippled daughter for a play date at the beach where he spends most of his time scamming booze and getting drunk while constantly losing track of his poor progeny in the process. Like Ingmar Bergman meets Luis Buñuel in its curious cocktail of dark drama, unhinged humor, and even sometimes sardonic surrealism, A Day at the Beach demonstrates in a far from preachy and shockingly intricate sort of way why alcoholism is a fate worse than death and why a boozier should never get a broad pregnant, let alone attempt to raise a kid.

Bernd (Cas Enklaar) is such a pathetic and hopeless alcoholic that he wakes up still drunk from the night before on the day that he is supposed to take his estranged prepubescent crippled daughter Walijne (Tara Fallaux), who wears a leg brace, to the beach. Poor Walijne calls the antihero 'Uncle Bernd' as her mother Medusa (Helen Hedy) married another man named Carl (Emile Fallaux) who agreed to adopt the girl and call her his own before she was even born since her biological father is a good-for-nothing boozier who is just not father material. As Bernd thinks to himself before his disastrous playdate with his daughter, "Thousands have each other; I only have my drinking." While talking with his ex-lover/baby-momma Medusa before taking Walijne out, Bernd causes the mother of his daughter to cry as it is clear she is depressed over the fact that she had to leave him for a banal old groveling cuckold like Carl. Notably, Bernd plays the old school video-game Frogger, thus reflecting his inability to give anyone his completely undivided attention, as well his propensity to engage in childish games. When Bernd meets with Walijne, they both give each other a huge hug even though the little girl thinks the man is her uncle and not her daddy. Unfortunately for both of them, this is the extent of how intimate their relationship gets as their ultimately botched day at the beach demonstrates.

Before even getting to the beach, Bernd is beaten in front of his daughter at the bus stop due to not paying an outstanding liquor tab he owes. Walijne does the best that a crippled little girl can do after he is beaten and Bernd seems to lap up the special attention. Although it is not exactly the best day to go to the beach due to the fact that it is rainy and dreary out, it certainly immaculately matches the melancholy yet strangely beautiful tone of the film. Upon arriving at the beach, Walijne soon gets lost playing in wicker chairs while Bernd is approached by a blonde named 'Babs' who works as a waitress at her mother's seemingly closed restaurant. Babs provides Bernd with bottle after bottle of beer and when he perversely recommends regarding the next bottle she brings out, "Warm it up under your armpit...or in another intimate spot" by stating absurdly that it is "an old custom, honored by the people I belong to," the waitress' mother asks the antihero, "How peculiar, are you Jewish perhaps?" in an unintentionally humorous fashion. Bernd takes the woman's question as "an unexpected compliment" and then hallucinates her sitting in the lap of a young handsome blond SS officer while she describes how her father kept 25 Jews at her house during the Second World War. To get out of paying for all the bottles of beer he has drunk, Bernd accuses Babs and her mother of being prostitutes and runs away without paying. Indeed, if there is any talent Bernd has aside from being perennially inebriated, it is finding a way to get inebriated without having to pay a cent.

When Walijne loses a souvenir seashell that her father has given her, he goes to a seashell shop to buy her a new one where he is immediately repelled by the two owners, an elderly old gay queen and his overweight middle-aged beau who is missing one of his front teeth. When Bernd asks the old queen, "Hey you fag, do you sell beer?," he agrees to get him some from his "private stock" for "such a charming man" and his fat beau goes in the back to get the booze. While the toothless queer is getting the beer in the back, the old queen complains to Bernd regarding his much younger lover, so the antihero helps the elderly poof by telling his beau when he gets back with the booze, "Each time he meets a nice little boy the most delightful...and promising contacts are ended by your vulgar appearance. You stink and even the mildest people would wish to punch you in the face...so, do change, Papi." While Bernd is happy to have gotten both a new seashell for his daughter and more beer, he is quite distressed when he notices his daughter is missing after leaving the store and, as the narrator of the film states regarding the alcoholic antihero, "He went cold with fear" because "You don't lose a child like an old hankie." Luckily, it does not take long for Bernd to find his progeny again, but he soon suffers the annoyance of a small elderly man calling him a "rat" for not paying to use wicker chairs on the beach, so he threatens to murder the old miserable fart and bury his bones in the sand. Before threatening the old man, Bernd asks him, "Does my lack of character show on my face that clearly?" thus reflecting his own rather low opinion of himself, as a man who has figuratively crawled into a beer bottle where he plans to ultimately die a most lonely and pathetic death.

Arguably, the true depth of Bernd's moral bankruptcy is revealed when he bumps into his poet friend Nicholas who shows up at the beach in a tiny, goofy European automobile not much bigger than a bumper car with his reasonably attractive blonde wife Toni and their young and rather sickly seeming child. Among other things, Bernd coerces Nicholas into leaving his wife and child behind in the rain while they predictably take a drive to a local bar. It is clear that Bernd does not think much of Nicholas as both a poet and painter when he remarks to him, "Poets are most receptive and often drive their friends desperate. They listen so intensely to their inner voices...that they mistake a voice from outside...as coming from within them. To avoid this, Nicholas, I took your watch as...so that no woman can coerce you...which you'll regret later!" On top of taking Nicholas' watch, Bernd also lies to him and tells him that he will buy him his first round of beer. When Nicholas' wife Toni arrives at the bar, Bernd begins kissing her passionately while his 'buddy' is passed out. Nicholas also tells Toni that her husband has "no personality at all" when she mentions that Nicholas wanted to try smoking heroin after hearing that Lou Reed did the same. Indeed, Bernd may be a boozing bastard but he certainly seems like more of an authentic poet and artist than Nicholas, who cannot even stop his wife from kissing another man right in front of him. While at the bar, Bernd also calls his daughter's mother Medusa and states, "This morning I wanted to kiss you very hard on your lips," thus revealing that, despite his rudeness to her earlier that day, the antihero actually loves Walijne's mother and were it not for the fact that he was a self-destructive and nihilistic dipsomaniac, he might have actually made a serious attempt at becoming a husband and father instead of giving his only child to another man to raise.

After parting ways with Nicholas and his family, Bernd naturally makes his way to another bar and of course he leaves his daughter Walijne in the rain while doing so. At the bar, Bernd strikes up a conversation with an old white man from Ghana who he confides in by stating, "I drink because I have great sorrow...but mainly because I'm predisposed to it. I am not afraid of a hangover." The old man is less interested in personal interests and responds by stating, "The British are the heaviest drinkers. The Americans too...but they are noisy anyway, drunk if sober. But you will not hear the English...and you will not notice anything." When Bernd annoys the barmaid by mocking her dyed hair and comparing her less than favorably to negresses by stating to the old man, "Think of the negro girls in Ghana [...] in which no calculation is hidden," the antihero finds himself unwanted at the bar and inevitably leaves, soon finding Walijne outside being watched by a group of concerned old women. After coercing an old liquor store owner into selling him some beer after hours after proclaiming to have an ostensible "vitamin B deficiency," Bernd, who is so drunk that he seems to be on the brink of alcohol poisoning, calls Walijne's mother Medusa to let her know that he will be bringing their daughter home late. The next day, Bernd wakes up still drunk on the beach and he is rather shocked to learn that little Walijne is nowhere to be found. A Day at the Beach concludes with the following intertitle regarding the film's perturbingly pathetic antihero Bernd: "A few stopped to look at him. Another eccentric training for the decathlon, cheering himself on. It occurred to nobody to impede this sportsman's progress."

Admittedly, I have an innate intolerance towards alcohol and alcoholics and I cannot fathom how someone can tolerate living the life of a drunkard, yet after watching the preternaturally compassionate work A Day at the Beach, I certainly feel that I can better understand what might inspire someone to crawl inside of a beer bottle and stay there. As someone who dropped out of law school due to drug and alcohol abuse and spent his entire life agitating people with his ruthless remarks, van Gogh unquestionably had a special understanding of the character Bernd in his film. Indeed, despite being oftentimes obscenely humorous, Theo van Gogh's film is easily one of the most malignantly melancholy films I have ever seen and I have a feeling that it reveals more about the filmmaker's true essence than any of his other cinematic works. I sincerely believe that had his assassin been able to absorb (which is rather unlikely) the sensitive yet equally biting emotions that van Gogh expressed in A Day at the Beach, he probably would have never been able to get the gall to murder the filmmaker in such a savagely sadistic and coldblooded fashion. Surely van Gogh's film is all but infinitely superior to the version of Heeresma's novel that Polanski penned, which is somewhat ironic considering one of the Dutch filmmaker's favorite films was Repulsion (1965). As Annemarije Heijerman revealed in her article THEO VAN GOGH: Director, Storyteller and Auteur regarding Heeresma's story, van Gogh had stated, "Why this story? Because it is brilliantly written, it is my guiding book," thus highlighting his uncommon respect for the source novel. Interestingly, Heeresma also considered van Gogh's version to be far superior to Polanski's adaptation. Unlike Polanski's film, van Gogh's A Day at the Beach is dark in the way that could have only been made so by a true criminal, misfit, outcast, and subversive just like the antihero of the film who, like the director, was probably an intriguing person to be around, but brought trouble and destruction to wherever he went, hence his early grisly death. Apparently, van Gogh still stopped by to see the little girl that played the antihero's crippled daughter years after the film was released, which does not surprise me as A Day at the Beach has a certain truly 'idiosyncratic humanism' to it that, despite van Gogh's lifelong tendency towards making hateful and misogynistic comments, also demonstrated that he truly loved people, especially those that no one else seemed to love.

Long before larger hordes of Muslims had invaded the Netherlands and towelheads became an easy, if not politically incorrect, target for criticism, Dutch Auteur Theo van Gogh—a born iconoclast who felt the savage wrath of Allah after he was assassinated and almost beheaded with a butcher knife in November 2004 at the age 47 after some crazed Moroccan Islamist got offended by his short Submission (2004)—directed black-and-white avant-garde absurdist works of the darkly hilarious and seemingly rather morally bankrupt sort. For his debut feature Luger (1982)—a fiercely fucked no-budget film noir of sorts starring the now relatively popular Dutch actor Thom Hoffman—van Gogh told the seriously sardonic story of a suavely dressed ‘fascist’ psychopath who kidnaps the retarded yet reasonably attractive daughter of a miserly millionaire who refuses to pay the ransom, with the director later confessing regarding his objective with the film, “There was no intent or purpose. We wanted just a movie, as politically incorrect as possible. The more sacred cows we killed the better.” Undoubtedly, with his third feature Charley (1986), the debauched Dutchman opted for slaying, cooking, and eating more sacred cows, as it is a sickly sardonic and statically directed cinematic work about a mute Aryan beauty of the decidedly deranged sort and her lesbian girlfriend/partner-in-crime who routinely lures horny and mostly socially defective men into their home, poison them, and fry and eat their body parts. Featuring an eponymous antihero with looks that can kill but who is as quiet as a dead mouse, van Gogh’s film also dares to present the homicidal man-hating lead as an innately infantile molestation victim who was raped by her own father while she was only toddler. While a discernibly unrealistic work that has a bizarre and sometimes semi-surreal atmosphere that is somewhat comparable to the later works of Luis Buñuel, albeit done in a distinctly Dutch fashion, Charley is rather accurate in its depiction of female serial killers because, as history demonstrates, women typically like to kill their victims in a cowardly and passive fashion via poison for oftentimes financial reasons (indeed, one of the top Dutch female serial killers, Maria Swanenburg, who was suspected of killing over 90 people via poison, did it so she could collect her victims’ insurance and/or inheritance money). Unlike Fassbinder’s similarly themed work Bremen Freedom (1972), which depicts 19th century kraut female killer Gesche Gottfried as a misguided proto-feminist of sorts, van Gogh’s Charley portrays its killer in a much more ambiguous, if not somewhat strangely empathetic, light that reminds one why the auteur was no fan of medieval-style Muslim misogyny. Of course, van Gogh’s film is not exactly the sort of work that will make a feminist’s panties wet either.

When blonde mute beauty Charley Pasja (Marie Kooyman) was only just a toddler, her working-class mechanic father decided to molest her in the shower and ever since then she has continued to have sex with daddy dearest. It seems that, like many molestation victims, Charley has not mentally matured much since the first time when her father first raped her, as she carries around a baby doll as if it is a real baby and likes to play with little boys on swings, among countless other childish things. While Charley is repelled by all other men aside from her father, she is in a hot and heavy lesbian relationship with her criminal accomplice/roommate Berie Werie (Rosita Steenbeek), who sometimes watches her girlfriend have sex with her dad in the shower (indeed, for whatever reason, Charley's father only likes molesting her in the same place where he once took her virginity). Despite looking completely different (Charley has fair-skin and platinum blonde hair and buxom brunette Berie almost looks Latin), people oftentimes confuse the two Sapphic sisters for biological sisters, as no one seems to suspect they a lesbian lunatics who seem to have taken Valerie Solanas' SCUM Manifesto (1967) quite literally. As for their modus operandi, the two lure men to their home, Berie has sex with them and poisons them, and then they both subsequently drop their victims' corpses on train tracks so as to make the men's deaths look like suicides. While disposing of their victims, Berie likes to make goofy jokes like, "You know what they found in Regan's belly?...Rock Hudson's watch!" One day, the girls encounter a majorly misogynistic Taxi Driver who calls them "grumpy bitches" and who self-righteously declares, "women are worthless," so needless to say, they kill him by giving him poisoned caviar, but not before Berie bumps his fuzzi. A rather passive and seemingly introverted young lady, Charley likes to listen in on the men's deaths via a downstairs baby monitor while Berie sexually defiles their corpses in their bedroom. The girls live in a small home owned by Charley's comic publisher uncle and he has no clue that they have turned his place into the Dutch equivalent of the quaint home from The Texas Chainsaw Massacre. Although Charley likes to play with her prepubescent nephew Max, she becomes rather infuriated when the little lad pushes pins through her precious baby doll's eyes. Despite the fact they are both coldblooded killers, Charley and Berie act like a bunch of feminist hypocrites and tell Max's father that he is a sadist that is in need of some teaching. Unfortunately, it seems the boy is far too young for them to kill.

One day, the two girls go to a bar and listen to the patently perverted scatological poetry of a seemingly demented dude named 'Brother Gabler' who swoons Charley with the following poop-preoccupied poem: "What abstinence forbids, as I saw my shit in the loo...I thought: no runny shit this time, but a healthy turd decorating the bowl. Fat and streaming in the poet...can I not feel my dick groping up my groin? That brown boy turns me on. My heart thumps as saliva I spawn. I think I'll wank above the turd...because my sphincter when I cum makes itself heard. I think I'll flush. Yes, an old fashioned flush. I lost my heart. A modern jerk is not better than a fart." In fact, Charley loves the poem so much that it causes her to smile for the first time in the entire film, though Berie is less than impressed and berates her girlfriend for approving of such frivolous filth. Of course, Berie does not mind boning and killing Gabler. When a group of Gabler's mindless disciples arrive at the girls' flat looking for their pseudo-Rimbaudian messiah, Charley decides to poison every single one of them. With their relationship falling apart, Berie eventually ends up dead after being bedridden for a while and Charley somehow learns how to talk in the process, as if her lesbo lover had previously stolen her voice (indeed, Berie was certainly the dominant of the two lethal lipstick lesbos). When Charley is asked by the police to come to a mental hospital to meet a man named Larive who she and Berie stole money from a couple days before, she naturally poisons the gent. While at the hospital, Charley is introduced to an ambiguously gay fascist police inspector named Beerekamp (Michiel Berkel) who seems suspicious of the Sapphic psychopathic killer. While her beloved Berie is dead, that does not stop Charley for sleeping with her corpse and wheeling it around in a wheelchair. In the end, Beerekamp and his buffoonish cop comrades discover that Charley is a serial killer after finding countless corpses in her humble abode. After concluding with the following epilogue: "Inspector Beerekamp was promoted for heroism. He's Head of the narcotics brigade. Charley was given life. She's in therapy with her fauther and makes progress every day," a grotesque drawing by Dutch cartoonist Eric Schreurs appears featuring an exaggerated-looking demonic female putting a dismembered dick in her large negro-like mouth.

Somewhat like a sordid celluloid marriage between the absurdism of Herbert Achternbusch, the female trouble of John Waters, and the unhinged grotesquery of Christoph Schlingensiefel as directed by the more comically-inclined son of Frans Zwartjes, Charley is an indisputably original and belligerently daring work that somehow even manages to make incestuous father-daughter pedophilia seem funny. Of course, not a single one of the characters in the film is realistically portrayed, as the film feels like what might if someone tried to translate a sardonic libertine comic into cinematic form. Indeed, Charley is almost terroristically tongue-in-cheek, as if van Gogh made the film solely to see how much he could get away with artistically, so it quite easy to see why some humorless camel jockey would get so enraged by his work that he would violently slaughter the filmmaker. As is especially apparent during the hysterical conclusion, a good part of van Gogh's film was improvised. Indeed, apparently the director's publisher van Wulften (who had just published a book of the director's poetry featuring illustrations by Dutch cartoonist Eric Schreurs) not only gave him funding for the film, but also the use of his house, workshop, employees, and even children (during the first couple seconds of the film, a naked toddler wearing a party hat appears). While not exactly a masterpiece, Charley is a truly underground comedy in the spirit of early Robert John Downey, Sr. flicks like Chafed Elbows (1966) and Putney Swope (1969), albeit more subversive and iconoclastic. Indeed, as far as I know, van Gogh's film is the greatest Sapphic cannibal serial killer flick ever made.

Loos

Theo van Gogh (1989)

Although I saw Paul Verhoeven's Basic Instinct (1992) as a tiny tot and vividly remember the (in)famous scene in the film where the Sapphic femme fatale played by Sharon Stone spreads her legs in a rather provocative fashion, I never thought of the Dutch, especially rather rotund and goofy Dutchmen, as being masters of dark erotic thrillers, but I change my mind the more I dig into the relatively eclectic oeuvre of the late and sometimes great auteur Theo van Gogh (1-900, Blind Date). While I have been engaged in a sort of unofficial van Gogh marathon for the past week or so, I must admit that I recently decided to watch the director's eccentric erotic thriller Loos (1989) aka No Potatoes aka Wild because I am an ass man and could not resist watching the film after seeing its poster art, which features a pair of long legs and a reasonably large unclad derriere. Luckily, van Gogh's film is not merely a soft core flick disguised as a conventional thriller, but an absurdist S&M-tinged 'arthouse' thriller contained within a wayward world that falls somewhere between Lynchian and Anderssonian, but is decidedly Dutch in its curious cynicism and almost psychopathically dark humor. Notably, van Gogh stated in a 2004 issue of Esquire Magazine regarding his personal taste in cinema: "In the top 25 of DVD's one has to have, there will always be at least two parts of THE GODFATHER, something by Kubrick, something by Woody Allen. And I know that those gentlemen are great filmmakers in their own way, who as the cliché indicates: 'can't be ignored.' I don't like war films; neither do I like fighting films. I fell asleep while I watched KILL BILL. I don't care about nature films, films about music don't attract me, not even THE SOUND OF MUSIC, and porn makes me yawn. Even worse are seriously intended science fiction films, except ALIEN. A disgrace, yes, but we have to face the bitter truth; I am more attracted to films in which people talk to each other, instead of people beating each other up or shooting at one another, with raping, kidnapping, or both. Not because I am a coward, I think, but because I grew up with the idea that there doesn't exist a more exciting adventure than the fight between two people that is called 'love.'" Indeed, van Gogh's Loos may be a borderline deranged erotic thriller featuring Jap tranny weirdos running around in campy clothing, naked morbidly obese women bound to poles, gritty snuff film footage, foul-mouthed little blonde girls who hate their fathers, sadomasochistic prostitutes who like to be walked around on dog leashes, homo-queen bartenders with sassy mouths, and a guy having a nail hammered through his foreskin and into a piano by a blind cripple, but the film is also about "the fight between two people that is called 'love,'" and it is quite a dark, loony, and labyrinthine one that demonstrates the superlatively self-destructive lengths that men will go for the women they love. A work that was advertised by describing auteur van Gogh as the "Fassbinder of the Low Countries" (notably, van Gogh's comrade Edwin Brienen would later be described as the "Dutch Fassbinder"), Loos is the story of an eponymous lawyer who finds himself a forsaken slave of a sort of Dutch Sodom known as the Rotterdam underworld where he is coerced into defending a purported 'sex-murderer' and falls in love with a dangerously whimsical sadomasochistic coke-addled prostitute that is in some way connected to his scumbag client. Unquestionably, Loos makes Basic Instinct seem like hokey and hopelessly banal Hollywoodized neo-noir barf by comparison.

Loos opens with a hot Aryan blonde seductively asking some nameless/faceless person, "Can I undress for you? Can I kneel for you?" and said nameless/faceless person hatefully replying by stating, "You fucking white slut!" following her into a closet, and strangling her to death with a rather flamboyant multi-colored handkerchief that looks like it would be owned by a sassy old Afro-American lady. The woman that was strangled to death is a 26-year-old saleslady named Marlies Benninkmeijer (Heleen Hummelen) and judging by the fact that her killer/sex partner called her a "fucking white slut" before snuffing her out, one would assume the murderer is not a native white Dutchman, but a savage untermensch of some sort. A rather ugly man with a mustache that looks more like he is from Southern Italy named Harry Wery (played by actor/journalist Max Pam)—a proud pervert that owns an S&M-themed strip club called Showcase—is charged and arrested for the murder and he naturally wants Rotterdam's best lawyer, Tommie Loos (van Gogh regular Tom Jansen), to defend him. When weasel Wery sends his rather gaunt and goofy yet sinister righthand man De Vries (van Gogh regular Cas Enklaar of the underrated masterpiece A Day at the Beach (1984)) to meet with Loos, he refuses to represent the club owner as he is tired of doing "rapist and sex-murderer" cases as he feels "too old for it" and he does want his young daughter thinking he defends bad guys. Unfortunately, Loos' daughter Angelique does not think much of him and yells "Daddy, you're an asshole!" when he goes to pick her up at a pool. Indeed, Loos' ex-wife hates him and has brainwashed their daughter Angelique to think he is "not a real man." Unbeknownst to Loos, another member of the 'fairer sex' will also question his manhood, albeit in a fashion that he will soon come to find delight in.

While hanging out at a fancy pseudo-futuristic bar, Loos is approached by a wanton woman named Anna Montijn (van Gogh regular Renée Fokker of Blind Date (1996) and Baby Blue (2001)) who kisses the lawyer and then takes him to a ritzy hotel where she jumps his bones. When Loos wakes up the next morning after experiencing the best sex of his life, he finds both Anna and his keys gone. When Loos talks to the front desk attendant, he learns that Anna's room was paid for by someone named "Rubico in Brussels." On top of finding nothing about the whereabouts of Anna or his keys, Loos suffers the distinct humiliation of standing around a group of exceedingly effete Japanese men in drag complaining that, "All dildos are taken." When Loos goes back to his house, he finds De Vries, who has clearly gotten the attorney's keys from Anna, sitting at his desk wearing a child's chicken beak mask on his face. After proclaiming, "The blackmailer called to say that the pictures are ready," De Vries shows him sadomasochistic footage of a woman driving her high heel into Anna's throat. After that, Loos finally decides it's probably a good time to visit Wery in jail where he learns that the murder victim used to work for the strip club owner. Needless to say, after Wery threatens his daughter, among other things, Loos reluctantly decides to represent him, even though he seems to believe that his client killed Marlies. That night, Loos goes to Wery's club Showtime where a celebration is being held for a crippled 'star' named Nicolette's 31st birthday. On top of the birthday girl receiving the gift of being allowed to hammer a nail through some poor dude's foreskin in a Schramm-esque fashion in a seemingly unstimulated scene of genital mutilation, Loos witnesses morbidly unclad morbidly obese woman tied up in chains and a flaming fag bartender who is chained to the bar. The fag bartender reveals to Loos that the police never bothered to come by and investigate Showtime Club after the sex-murder, so the lawyer decides to get in contact with his cop friend.

If Loos has anything even remotely resembling a real friend, it is a old troll-like cop named Dorrius (Leen Jongewaard) with whom he demonstrates some sense of solidarity as the two take a leak next to each other in a communal urinal wherein he describes how much he wishes his ex-wife would croak. Dorrius is convinced Wery is the killer and he demonstrates to Loos why by showing him a quasi-snuff film shot by the club owner featuring an unclad woman bound to a bed being cut up with a butcher knife. Dorrius also gives Loos the keys to Wery's home where he discovers a snuff film and and Polaroids of the club owner, the dead chick, and a large negro. Loos soon learns that the large negro is named Frank Benninkmeijer (Edgar Cairo) and he is the widowed husband of dead girl Marlies. Loos goes to question Frank at a gym, but when he makes a joke about the sizable spade being a pedophile, he is physically assaulted and does not get any of the answers he is looking for. Upon talking to Dorrius, Loos learns that Frank has an alibi as he was "swinging from trees of the gym" during the day of the murder and "20 apes can confirm it." Dorrius is rather confused about the fact that Loos wants to defend a scumbag like Wery and asks him if he would even defend Klaus Barbie, to which he stoically replies, "that's what lawyers are for."

Of course, Loos continues looking for his mysterious ladylove Anna and when he goes back to the same bar he originally met her at, a super tall blond begins reaming him in the ass, as if raping him with a giant strap-on dildo. After opting to sleep with a third rate prostitute, Loos is summoned by Anna via taxi. Upon arriving at the hotel room where Loos is staying, he finds his object of desire standing naked on a large box-shaped purse which her feet have been strapped to. After yelling at Anna for stealing his keys and stealing a vial of cocaine that she has hanging from a necklace around her neck, Loos decides to take a stroll at a degenerate 'modern art' museum where he is assaulted by visions of large black-and-white Robert Mapplethorpe pictures featuring rather nasty naked obese women and a woman sporting futuristic bondage and strap-ons, among other things. The next day, Loos goes back to see Anna and discovers she is still standing naked on her pursue, so he forces her off and manhandles her, thus ushering in the beginning of their tragic romance. Anna asks Loos if he loves her and he replies by saying, "I never loved a woman that cheated on me." When Loos takes Anna out to a fancy dinner, he manages to give her a spontaneous orgasm by telling her that he would like to "buy" her and wrap up her body so that no one could ever see it again. After their unconventionally decadent dinner date, Loos takes Anna back to his place where she tries to coerce him into snorting coke, but he proudly proclaims "a healthy mind in a healthy body" and opts out. When Loos intentionally sneezes on Anna's coke, the little lecherous lady goes berserk, begins beating her beau, and forces him to snort a line. When Loos later asks Anna, "Will you stay with me, always?" the majorly masochistic prostitute becomes exceedingly enraged and forces the lawyer to walk her around Rotterdam on a leash. Upon arriving at a subway station, Loos locks Anna to a vent and tells her he will come back in a couple hours to get her, but when he does, she is gone. From there, things get even more bizarre for the eponymous protagonist and Loos does not exactly conclude on a happy note.

After watching Loos, I find it hard to believe that it was not a huge influence on Verhoeven's Basic Instinct, which may have been penned by Hungarian-American screenwriter Joe Eszterhas, but certainly shares a lot with Loos in terms of tone as a subversive neo-noir with sadistic sapphic femme fatales. Notably, Verhoeven fought Eszterhas over including a lesbian love scene in Basic Instinct, thus that he might have taken influence from van Gogh's film, which in terms of innate transgressiveness, makes the Sharon Stone flick seem like superficially stylized fluff that was specially tailored by a European arthouse fag to make Americans feel somehow chic and cultivated. Somewhat ironically, van Gogh filled the vacuum that Verhoeven left when he moved to Hollywood. Of course, right from the get go with his directorial debut Lüger (1982) starring popular Dutch actor Thom Hoffman as a suave fascist psychopath, van Gogh demonstrated that he was a more incendiary, iconoclastic, and insanely idiosyncratic filmmaker than Verhoeven and with Loos, the auteur proved that one could produce mainstream works that are just as demented as the most avant-garde of avant-gardist works. Indeed, van Gogh's erotic thriller is like a more rampantly heterosexual version of the underrated Belgian-Dutch-French coproduction Mascara (1987) directed by Patrick Conrad and starring Charlotte Rampling were it directed by the more jovial and goofy brood of Dutch experimental filmmaker Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento) and R.W. Fassbinder. Like with the more socially vicious and brutal works of Fassbinder, Loos depicts love at its most deleterious and lethally masochistic and people at their most pathologically pernicious, but like virtually all of his films (aside from, ironically, Submission (2004), which was the work that got him killed), van Gogh depicts these unsavory things with a sharp smirk. Flagrantly politically incorrect with negroes being referenced as 'Zulus' and carpet-munchers being depicted as the coldest and most ruthless yet strangely passionate of killers, Loos is ultimately proof that, in the right hands, a film from one of the most cliché-ridden and self-conscious of film genres (i.e. film noir) can be turned into something that not only borders on the avant-garde, but is also endlessly enthralling.

FALSE LIGHT

For a fat goofy dude who did not exactly seem like he would be a superstar stud in the bedroom, assassinated Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh (Interview, 06/05 aka May 6th) was extremely preoccupied with sex, love, eroticism, and tragic romances, as if he lived vicariously through the forsaken femme-fatale-fucking characters of his films. Of course, as the director once famously stated in regard to his eruditely erotic 'phone sex romance' 06 aka 1-900 (1994): "I don't like messages that much. I prefer covering the war between a woman and a man." Van Gogh must have been on the losing side of a perennial total war of love because during the shooting of his flick Vals licht (1993) aka False Light, as his then-wife decided to cheat on him with the star of the film, Ellik Bargai, who is not exactly the most charming nor handsome of men, though I guess he was a bit thinner and younger than the director at the time, plus stupid people tend to care more about actors than directors, as if films somehow make themselves. In fact, van Gogh, who even had a sense of humor when Islamist were threatening to kill him, alludes to this exceedingly embarrassing fact in the film in a semi-cryptic fashion during a scene where the following message is broadcasted at a railway station: "Mr. Bargai, please contact Mrs. Van Gogh." While van Gogh was cuckolded on his film, his embarrassment and naivety is nothing compared to that of the protagonist of False Light, who absurdly thinks he can tame a pathologically whorish Swedish hooker and self-destructive 'fallen woman' with shady underworld connections and turn her into a respectable monogamous woman who does not feel the need to sell her flesh and soul for a few shekels. Based on the 1991 "AKO literatuurprijs"-winning novel of the same name written by Dutch modern novelist Jooft Zwagerman, van Gogh's ostensibly wild and wanton flick but ultimately culturally cynical and even misanthropic anti-romance about a charmingly wicked woman unequivocally demonstrates that there is no hope for whores or the men that moronically love them, as it is fairly common knowledge that lying, thieving, and scheming sluts that are so dead inside that they are willing to routinely sell themselves to strange men can never be changed, let alone be transformed into nurturing mothers or marriage material. As the great Austrian Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger recognized, the 'prostitute' is more of a mindset than a profession. False Light is also a work that indubitably demonstrates that despite their well known 'liberal' attitudes towards prostitution, among other things, the Dutch do not exactly have much empathy for so-called 'sex workers,' though van Gogh seemed to have more sympathy for them than most Dutchmen as a subversive outsider that was able to understand a fellow group of outsiders, but of course that does not mean he fails to portray pussy-peddlers in a less than glamorous light, for no sane person could come away from the film thinking it is reasonable to date a woman who has about as much as respect for her own naughty bits as a toilet. Indeed, like many of his works, van Gogh's Zwagerman adaptation demonstrates why he was once called, "Fassbinder of the Low Countries," as the auteur had an understanding of the warped female psyche that few filmmakers, especially heterosexual ones, can boast, hence another reason why he would probably be hated by Islamist goatfuckers and liberal hysterics.

Simon Prins (Ellik Bargai) is a 21-year-old college student from Amsterdam who suffers the curse of having a hopelessly banal and seemingly sexless girlfriend of the relatively homely sort named Antoinette, so he spends a good portion of his time voyeuristically gazing at a strikingly statuesque yet forlorn-looking prostitute (Swedish actress Amanda Ooms of Carl-Gustav Nykvist's The Women on the Roof (1989) and Jan Troell's Everlasting Moments (2008)) at the apartment building across from his in a Rear Window-esque fashion via a telescope. Like most young men, Simon is obsessed with sex and naturally offends his academic girlfriend by remarking, "They saw whores love doing it with Alsatians. They're faithful. But a Rottweiler licks better," thus causing his little lady to leave abruptly without even saying "I love you" back to her loving beau. When his brazenly bitchy girlfriend rudely leaves without even giving him so much as a second-rate hand-job, would-be-sex-fiend Simon gets the gall to approach the prostitute in building across from his, though he has no idea that this random meeting will ultimately plunge him into an unpredictable labyrinthine erotic nightmare of delusional love, lies, criminality, cocaine, violence, murder, and, of course, steamy sex. The prostitute says her name is 'Janice' and Simon, who tells her his name is 'Eric,' absurdly attempts to show off his literary prowess as a Dutch major by bringing up popular novelist Willem Frederik Hermans, but the lecherous lady of the night has no clue who the writer is. Somewhat strangely, Simon impresses Janice by just paying to see her half-naked body and not actually having sex with her like most her Johns, thus letting the seemingly amiable hooker know that he is a so-called 'nice guy' who can probably be easily manipulated by an attractive woman. Janice is Swedish and she tells Simon that she decided to come to Holland because, "The Swedish think me too bony," as if the Dutch and the Swedes are not two of the most racially similar peoples in the world, especially when it comes to height and weight. After paying to see Janice's not-too-large tits, Simon leaves, but he decides to go back to the prostitute after noticing two criminal-like fellows going into her building and then leaving abruptly, as if they have just done something that they do not want to get caught doing. As it turns out, the two degenerate dudes smacked Janice around a little bit and Simon decides he is going to 'save her for from herself,' even telling her, "I come to save you" and then pretentiously reciting the quote from Dutch poet and classicist J.H. Leopold, "In this Love, Death shall be but sleep peaceful sleep. Waiting for you, be but waiting," to which she somewhat humorously replies to by crying and saying, "I'm so dumb." Simon also absurdly says to the professional pussy-peddler, “to me you’re not a whore,” thus making her realize that he is the perfect cuckold and a ‘mark’ that she will use and abuse for her own conniving conspiratorial ends.

As it turns out, Janice does not actually live across from Simon, but is merely using the apartment as a special place to sell her gash for cash. As it also turns out, the aggressive hooker’s real name is not ‘Janice,’ but Lizzie Rosenfeld—a rather Jew-y sounding name—and she lives in a rather lavish apartment with a giant aquarium containing large exotic sea turtles. Before he knows it, Simon finds himself spending all his time at Lizzie’s flat where he eventually meets her coke-addled ex-boyfriend Wesley (popular Dutch actor Thom Hoffman, who starred in van Gogh’s directorial debut Lüger (1982)), who he mistakes for a pimp after the debauched ‘cool guy’ offers him some nose candy upon introducing himself. Wesley makes his living as a photographer who, among other things, takes pornographic photographs of unclad ditzy dames in wheelchairs spreading their legs and striking intentionally retarded-looking poses. Needless to say, jealous Simon is not too happy when Wesley threatens him by stating in a preposterous illeist fashion regarding Lizzie, “Take good care of her or Wesley will be angry.” Of course, Lizzie is a femme fatale and she does not believe that she needs to be protected by any man, bragging to Simon regarding her curious career choice, “I’ll say it just once. I’m not ashamed of what I do. I’m not on drugs, I have no AIDS and I have no pimp.” Naturally, being a pathological liar, Lizzie later somewhat contradicts herself by claiming that she originally became a prostitute to support her and her then-husband’s lavish lifestyle of exotic vacations and cocaine addiction. Being a jealous little boy, Simon decides to track down Lizzie’s ex-husband Jasper, who tells him that “Lizzie is bad news” and denies that his ex-wife ever had a drug problem, stating, “Lizzie is only addicted to one thing...herself.” When a gangster-like fellow named Philip (Tom Jansen of van Gogh’s Return to Oegstgeest (1987) and Loos (1989)) randomly shows up at Lizzie’s apartment when she is not there, he decides to make a statement by having his goons dangle Simon out of a window by his feet while sardonically stating, “They say that dying is as nice as coming. At least when you’re hung. Seems to give you a hard-on.” Needless to say, Simon is not too happy about being almost killed and confronts Lizzie about it, so she tells him an extravagant bullshit story about how Philip is an ex-John who has been threatening her ever since she lost a suitcase of his that he told her to hold at one point. Indeed, apparently Lizzie mindlessly gave the suitcase in question to someone that claimed to be Philip’s friend and when Philip found out, he decided to brutally beat the prostitute’s then-boyfriend Wesley, hence why he left her. Naturally, since Simon is Lizzie’s new swain, he will now also serve as Philip’s new punching-bag.

After almost being dropped from three stories by Lizzie’s ex-John, Simon decides to dump her, but not before hatefully stating to her, “You’re a bitch. You’ve known they [Philip and his goons] were coming all this time. You’re lying. Junkies always lie. You're just a common whore. How could I ever have thought you weren't. You can't even have an orgasm." When Lizzie subsequently moves away, Simon cannot handle it and soon begins obsessively searching for her, ultimately finding her at a high-class whorehouse in the South Holland city of Hague where the two make passionate love, though the protagonist pays(!), and somehow the seemingly emotionally dead prostitute even manages to have a real orgasm, thus hinting that she might actually slightly love her cuckolded beau. Due to the fact that Philip and his thugs are looking for them, the two loony lovebirds decide to runaway together, but when Lizzie makes the mistake of going to her ex-boyfriend's apartment to pickup her stuff, Wesley forces Simon to fuck the prostitute in the ass at knifepoint. Seemingly unphased by being forced into performing spontaneous sodomy in front of a knife-wielding lunatic, Simon subsequently takes Lizzie to meet his parents at a fancy restaurant and his sleazy father (Cas Enklaar of van Gogh's Een dagje naar het strand (1984) aka A Day at the Beach) immediately begins hitting on and feeling up his son's girlfriend, who naturally lies and tells her beau's proud progenitor's that she works as a nurse instead of a call-girl. After the dinner date with daddy and mommy, Simon takes his girlfriend to a college party and Lizzie intentionally insults her boy toy's ex-girlfriend Antoinette by asking her, "what is it like to be a virgin at your age?," thus demonstrating her absurd sense of jealousy despite being a chick her makes her living selling her body to strange dirty old men. Needless to say, Simon gets in a fight when one of his friends reminds him that his girlfriend is a hooker. After the pansy brawl, Lizzie thanks Simon for defending her, but he gets rather agitated and hysterically screams "You're lying!!!" like an agitated little cuck. Ultimately, Simon gets Lizzie to quit whoring and attempts the seemingly impossible by making her a sort of domesticated "kept woman," but with Philip and his goons still looking for them, the two decide to escape to France. When Simon asks his father for money for the trip, he replies by telling his son that he knows Lizzie is a hooker by remarking that he "knows the type." Somewhat irked but determined to get money to fund his and his girlfriend's getaway, Simon strategically asks his father if he was one of Lizzie's customers, which the old man does not deny, and then makes a rather dramatic attempt at begging for money by absurdly arguing, "If you paid for her then, why not now?," but big daddy refuses to pay because, after all, he is not getting any pussy out of it. Eventually, Lizzie's hooker negress friend double-crosses her and tells Philip about her and Simon's whereabouts, so the two go on the run and spend a good amount of time hiding in a museum. In the end, while Simon does his girlfriend's dirty work by 'confronting' Philip and his pals in a hysterical storm of bullets that results in a shattered turtle aquarium and the discovery of about half a dozen or so large bags of cocaine, Lizzie strategically avoids the violence by flying to Cannes. After countless pointless deaths and lethal lies, Simon finally realizes that Lizzie's love for him was a fantasy and delusion and he ultimately gives up on their relationship, though it is quite clear that he still loves the conniving cunt despite everything that has happened. Of course, lethally lecherous whore Lizzie gets what she wants in the end and does not even break a single nail in the process.

While not exactly Theo van Gogh's greatest film about a deluded dude that falls under the spell of a career slut, False Light is certainly a sort of underrated classic of decadent yet strangely aesthetically dignified Dutch neo-noir. Indeed, like with van Gogh's somewhat superior and certainly more idiosyncratic work Loos, the film puts the Hollywood erotic-thrillers of blockbuster screenwriter Joe Eszterhas to shame in terms of mere subversiveness and gall, especially in regard to its insights about the less savory and more unscrupulous members of the so-called fairer sex. The fact that van Gogh's then-wife cheated on him during the production of False Light with lead Ellik Bargai only add to the film's perverse potency in terms of its dissection of the darker elements of the 'feminine mystique.' In its depiction of a compulsively scheming, conniving, and lying whore who has nil interest in children and plays men like chess pieces to get what she wants, van Gogh's politically incorrect Dutch take on film noir more or less cinematically depicts Austrian philosopher Otto Weininger theory of the 'prostitute archetype' in a way that can be easily understood by the layman. Personally, I have never found the sort of woman that downs a dozen dicks a day that appealing, no matter how delectable her body may be and I certainly would have no desire to attempt to 'save' such a less than fresh and overtly unsalvageable woman, so van Gogh's film ultimately offered me an experience that I would never want to have otherwise in a fairly 'safe' sort of way that did not involve potential hazards like herpes or vengeful dope-dealers. While women get into prostitution for various reasons ranging from poverty to social awkwardness to sexual enslavement, it certainly takes a special kind of women who does it because she genuinely wants to as False Light so devilishly demonstrates. To go back to Weininger again, he once wrote, "Great men have always preferred women of the prostitute type." Of course, that statement says just as much about men as women. Indeed, van Gogh's film may feature an uniquely unflattering depiction of a certain kind of woman, but it also contains a provocative portrayal of various sorts of men who, despite their differences, all mindlessly fall prey to the same exact thing: pussy. As for Mr. van Gogh, one can only wonder whether or not it was worth it to him lose his wife as a result of directing False Light, but then again, as the film demonstrates, no man can control the whimsical essence of women.

COOL!

While his final feature 06/05 (2004)—a subversive fictionalized account of the assassination of gay Dutch anti-multiculturalist politician Pim Fortuyn by a seemingly ethno-masochistic animal rights extremist that incriminates the Dutch Secret Service in the politician's death—received some degree of popularity and critical praise because it was released in the wake of his grisly assassination by a super swarthy towel-headed Moroccan untermensch terrorist (though some believe he was the victim of more shadowy circumstances involving the Dutch Secret Service), Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh's penultimate feature Cool! (2004) is fairly unknown, which is somewhat peculiar since it is more or less about the same good-for-nothing second-generation third world degenerates that the iconoclastic artist's assassin belonged to. Without a doubt, van Gogh was killed as a direct result of directing the Islam-unfriendly short Submission: Part I (2004)—a low-budget production made in collaboration with lapsed muslim Somali-born feminist writer and politician Ayaan Hirsi Ali featuring a nude Arab woman whose body has been painted with verses from the Quran—but if I was a young towel-head of Moroccan or Turkish mongrel stock, I would have surely been more offended by Cool! which accurately depicts the Dutch-born Arab youth non-culture as something akin to that of American negroes. Indeed, the teenage untermenschen of van Gogh's surely ironically titled work are hip-hop and crime worshipping illiterates of Berber, Moroccan, Turkish, and Caribbean negro stock who live in a liberal Occidental society they can never possibly survive and thrive in by any legal means, so they rob banks owned by evil rich white people when not grunting out sub-literate rap lyrics and defiling homely second-rate white chicks that no self-respecting white man would ever touch. A sort of Dutch teenage anti-Scarface that demonstrates why there is no real place in the West for people spawned from women that are forced to always wear medieval do-rags over their seemingly empty heads, the work ultimately demonstrates why its director once stated, "This is what our multicultural society has brought us: a climate of intimidation in which all sorts of goatfuckers can issue their threats freely." Of course, with the recent January 2015 killing of twelve people that worked at the French leftist satirical weekly newspaper Charlie Hebdo by three delinquent Islamists, including a dope-smoking aspiring rapper, Cool! is surely more relevant than ever, as a work that reflects the sort of crude and savage criminality that a country and, in turn, continent, begets when it becomes 'tolerant' of the innately intolerant and ultimately intolerable. Indeed, the fact that the great-grandnephew of artistic royalty like Vincent van Gogh would ever direct a film featuring teenage Turks rapping in Dutch just goes to show the decidedly deleterious effect that the malignant social cancer known as multiculturalism has had on the Netherlands. Filmed at a real-life juvenile delinquency facility and starring a couple real-life juvenile delinquents, Cool! is filmic realism in its most radically repugnant and endlessly anti-entertaining form, as a sort of cinematic equivalent to spending 90 minutes or so in Islamogangster pandemonium.

A clique of teenage 'people of color' totally botch a bank robbery and in the process kill an elderly Dutch bank manager after he suffers a heart attack when one of the outlaw youths nonsensically fires a firearm into the air, so the superlatively swarthy homeboys are sent to a juvenile detention facility called Glenn Mills and there they celebrate by singing rap lyrics like, "...keep cool in all you do...I have to keep cool and fuck the rest...smoke ganja every day against the street..." as they're being driven to their new home. As the film soon reveals, the colored would-be-gangsters are led by a Hitler-loving white wigger that sports a FTW (aka "Fuck The World") beanie named Prof (Johnny de Mol), who demonstrates his love for his girlfriend Mabel (popular half-caste Dutch-Chinese-Surinamese actress/singer Katja Schuurman, who previously starred in van Gogh's popular 2003 film Interview) by giving her a "real bolshevik" bracelet "from Russia." Prof seems to have about the same opinion of Arabs as director van Gogh as he jokingly tries to coerce his Nosferatu-esque homeboy Najib (Najim Laoukili) into fucking a goat, but when his colored comrade fails to comply, he shoots the poor animal with his handgun. Unfortunately for Prof, his main bitch Mabel has a thing for a pube-headed turd named Abdel (Fouad Mourigh) that works for him. Clearly, Abdel, who is one of Prof's underlings, forgets the truism "bros before hoes" in what ultimately makes for a pointless and putrid (un)romantic subplot. Of course, there is no honor among thieves, especially if they come from the third world and wigger wuss Prof luckily eventually gets what he is asking for.

Like criminally-inclined American negro youth, the 'colorful' characters of Cool! also talk about things like "respect" and "pride" as if they have any idea what such words really mean. After being sent to Glenn Mills for their roles in the botched bank robbery, a couple of the characters like Abdel and his negro friend Jeffrey (Julien de Roover) are forced to learn 'respect,' 'discipline,' and 'self-control' so they can get out of the detention center, which makes Abdel especially crazy because he wants to bone his wigger boss Prof's girlfriend Mabel. Meanwhile, Prof moronically plots a bank robbery for one million Euros at the same bank where Mabel works and which Abdul and his pals previously failed to rob. To make a long, banal story short, the bank robbery is intentionally botched and Abdel is killed while shielding Mabel from his bullets. Luckily, alpha-wigger Prof is also killed by the cops. At Abdul's hip-hop funeral, one of his friend raps, "death is our friend but Abdul did not deserve this end." Not surprisingly, Mabel is impregnated by Abdel's similarly short, swarthy, and pube-headed comrade Mohammad (Farhane El Hamchaoui). As for the rest of the camel jockey gangsters, they predictably continue being proud criminals.

Unquestionably, the story behind Cool! is much more interesting than the film itself, especially in regard to the real-life thugs that played some of the lead roles. As documented in his book Murder in Amsterdam: The Death of Theo van Gogh and the Limits of Tolerance (2006), Anglo-Dutch-Jewish journalist Ian Buruma, who is incidentally the nephew of Anglo-Jewish auteur John Schlesinger (Sunday Bloody Sunday, Midnight Cowboy), took the time to interview some of the stars of van Gogh's film, most notably Farhane El Hamchaoui, who engaged in gangster gang-bangs, the mugging of elderly white Dutch people, and even the robbing of the headmaster of the 'special' school he was sent to as a juvenile delinquent before becoming an actor. Despite the fact that van Gogh gave him his first big break by giving him his first acting role as one of the leads in Cool!, El Hamchaoui stated regarding the Dutch filmmaker and his assassination as a result of directing Submission, "I would never support Mohammed Bouyeri. But about the film he was right. No Moroccan respects Mohammed Bouyeri. To commit a murder during Ramadan — that is totally unacceptable." Indeed, because van Gogh directed a film featuring verses of the Quran painted on an unclad body, El Hamchaoui believes it was totally justified that the Dutch filmmaker was savagely assassinated and, even more absurdly, only takes any sort of disagreement with the assassination because it took place on Ramadan, thus reflecting his innately Islamist worldview. Of course, El Hamchaoui is no Muslim extremist and he is as assimilated as 'Dutch Moroccan' people come yet he believes the senseless slaughter of a goofy Dutchman that jumpstarted his career was justified simply because said Dutchman had the gall to direct a short film that might hurt the typical towel-head's feelings. Interestingly, when Buruma asked El Hamchaoui if he "ever felt Dutch," he replied that he felt "neither Dutch nor Moroccan," though when it comes to the Dutch playing the Moroccans in soccer, he replied rather revealingly by stating, "Then I'm for Morocco, for sure! But if I had to choose between a Dutch passport and a Moroccan one, I would choose the Netherlands. You have to think of your interests. A Moroccan passport would be useless. But with soccer I can choose for my own blood." Indeed, unlike the decidedly deracinated Dutch and most other Europeans, Arabs and virtually all other people know that blood comes first in terms of loyalties and the only reason that non-whites are in Europe in the first place is to suck on the tender teat of the welfare system, which subsidizes the large and largely non-working and uneducated families of foreigners while taxing the hell out of the indigenous white population so they cannot afford children of their own, hence the declining birth rates in not only the Netherlands, but virtually every single other European nation on earth.

Indubitably, compared to van Gogh's earlier more subversive and experimental features like his debut Lüger (1982), sardonic Sapphic serial killer flick Charley (1986), and darkly comedic sadomasochistic thriller Loos (1989), Cool! seems like a culturally confused mongrel of a movie directed by someone who has given up on their own idiosyncratic artistic vision and has become obsessed with a racially alien element that has made him feel like a stranger in his homeland. Of course, as his other later works like the 2002 television play Najib en Julia (a reworking of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet featuring a love affair between a rich white girl and Moroccan prole), Submission, 06/05, and unrealized drama series Duizend en één dag aka A Thousand and One Days demonstrate, van Gogh was absolutely obsessed with the Islamic ghetto that his tiny Germanic lowland nation was degenerating into to the point where he found it almost unbelievable. Indeed, even after receiving multiple death threats, van Gogh found it inexplicable that someone might murder him for asserting his right to freedom of speech, apparently stating, "Nobody kills the village idiot," but of course a medieval-minded dune coon proved him wrong. It is surely a bad sign of a race's survival instincts when a proud queer like Pim Fortuyn, a pathologically rude nihilist like van Gogh, and racially mixed Zionist of partial Indonesian Asiatic stock who dyes his hard blond like Geert Wilders are the only public figures in a nation that have enough testicular fortitude to make light of the fact that their country is devolving into a hotbed for third worldization, Isalmification, deleteriously decadent late-stage liberalism, and racial suicide.

As the grandson of a 'racially insensitive' Dutch WWII resistance fighter, I see the general Dutch passive reaction to the third world Muslim deluge in their country as patently pathetic because if previous generations were willing to fight in vain against the Wehrmacht and Schutzstaffel, ridding themselves of literally barbarian-minded uneducated third world rabble who swoon over Mohammad should be a no brainer. Notably, ever since his father was assassinated, Theo van Gogh's son Lieuwe has been the target of multiple attacks from Moroccan and Turkish 'youths' yet the Dutch police refuse to protect him. At least Lieuwe can look back proudly on the fact that his padre was one of the few Dutchmen that had the balls to 'call a spade a spade' and demonstrated via his films, books, and TV appearances that goatfuckers have no place in a healthy Holland. Indeed, while I found the film fairly intolerable due to its retarded rap songs, pimple-plagued teenage towel-head stars, and anticlimactic bank heists, Cool! ultimately does what van Gogh intended to do via what might be described as an 'Islamic neo-minstrel hip-hop show' by demonstrating that no amount of liberal-minded 'reforming' programs will ever be able turn the spawn of Turks, Moroccans, and negroes into real Dutchmen, let alone law-abiding citizens who contribute to society instead of defile it with an antisocial crime-glorifying pseudo-culture that has done more to harm the untermenschen than any form of colonization or nonwhite pogroms.

Rather ironically yet quite fittingly, the last film Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh (Blind Date, Interview)—the great-grandson of the art dealer brother of tragic post-impressionist painter Vincent van Gogh—directed before he was himself assassinated was a political thriller based on the assassination of so-called ‘right-wing’ populist politician Pim Fortuyn, who was supposedly gunned down by a pansy vegan animal rights activist who felt his victim was a racist who was using towelheads as ‘scapegoats.’ Indeed, despite being openly gay, Fortuyn was one of only a handful of Dutch politicians who had the testicular fortitude to admit that the Netherlands had a serious immigrant problem (in fact, he once wrote a book entitled Against the Islamization of Our Culture (1997)) yet he was a pro-market kind of guy and his views on immigration were rather liberal compared to serious nationalists (for example, he had no problem assimilating non-whites). Naturally, as someone that was a personal friend and supporter of Fortuyn, van Gogh was able to assemble a film that is more personal, intimate, and intriguing than similarly themed works. Indeed, while certainly no masterpiece (let alone anything close to the director’s greatest film), 06/05 (2004) aka May 6th aka The Sixth of May manages to depict the exceedingly erratic essence and socio-politically schizophrenic multicultural-inspired inner turmoil of a culturally degenerating democracy that prides itself on its ‘openness,’ ‘liberalness,’ and dedication to free speech. Featuring a decadent journalist as a protagonist who is more or less a parody of Dutch liberalness and who has no serious problem with his teenage daughter dating an exceedingly ugly Moroccan thug, 06/05 is a quasi-labyrinthine story in a semi-docudrama style of the hermetic craziness that ensues when a reporter attempts to uncover the dubious assassination of fallen ‘fascist fag’ Fortuyn and finds himself immersed in a dangerous world involving the Dutch Secret Service (aka AIVD), animal rights activists, defense contractors, members of the Bilderberg Group, and scheming American businessmen with glaring hook-noses. A realist depiction of the aftermath of what some might describe as the Dutch equivalent to 9/11 shot in a documentary-like 3-camera-setup technique style and featuring real stock footage of Fortuyn (including when he was once the victim of pieing that would somewhat humorously foreshadow his death) and old newsreels, 06/05 is, quite unlike Oliver Stone’s sophomoric conspiracy turd JFK (1991), plausible in terms of its message as a work that demonstrates that many people in politics, business, and the Muslim world had much to benefit from the ill-fated fag fascist’s tragic death. Perhaps even more interestingly, the film also brings up questions regarding van Gogh’s own assassination, which took place exactly 911 days after Fortuyn’s, with the work being released posthumously about a month after the director’s violent death (somewhat notably, 06/05 was the first to be released online before it hit the theaters in the Netherlands).

Jim de Booy (Thijs Römer) is an exceedingly cynical 32-year-old divorced photo journalist and while doing a photo shoot with a hot actress model named Birgit Maas (Georgina Verbaan)—a lecherous little lady who talks about her unsavory yet stereotypical goal of attempting to find a ‘sugar daddy’ and how her father remarked regarding her performance in a Harold Pinter play, “I didn’t get it, but you’ve got a nice ass”—in Hilversum, North Holland, he becomes an unwitting witness to controversial Dutch anti-Islamist politician Pim Fortuyn’s untimely assassination by a seemingly deranged animal rights activist named Volkert van der Graaf. While Jimmy boy fails to take pictures of the actual assassination, he does notice a number of dubious individuals hanging around the general area of the curious killing. Meanwhile, a young Turkish-born animal rights activist that belonged to a group called ‘Green Offensive’ named Ayse Him (Tara Elders), who just got out of jail after serving an 18 month prison sentence for her questionable involvement in the death of a night watchman, is packing all of her things to move out of her apartment, which is adorned with far-left propaganda posters reading “Pim the Savior – Stop Racism” depicting Fortuyn as Hitler. Two of Ayse’s lovers, a degenerate Dutch Aryan animal rights activist named Wouter Heemskerk (Gijs Naber), who was the one that was actually responsible for the death of the night watchman, and a middle-aged Turkish far-left journalist/terrorist named Erdogan Demir (Cahit Ölmez), were near the general location at the time when Fortuyn was assassinated. When Erdogan walks in on Wouter attempting to drown Ayse in a bathtub, he kills him and gets his girlfriend to help dump the degenerate Dutchman’s body in a canal. Upon arriving at the crime scene to take photos when the corpse of Wouter, who was placed in his car as if he accidentally drowned after driving into the water, is pulled from the sea, Jim realizes he is one of the strange people that he spotted at the site of Fortuyn’s assassination. Meanwhile, members of the Bilderberg Group and Dutch Secret Service, as well as Jewish-looking businessmen, discuss the future of Dutch politics in the wake of Fortuyn’s death.

After Jim turns into a sort of degenerate Sherlock Holmes and does some detective work with the help of his teenage daughter Marije (Caro Lenssen), Jim learns about Ayse and begins watching her every move. Unfortunately, two Secret Service men—a lard ass named Van Dam (Jack Wouterse) and his pernicious pint-sized minion ‘Wester’ (Marcel Hensema)—realize that Jim is on to their sour scent. Unbeknownst to Ayse, her new boyfriend Erdogan is in cahoots with the sinister yet rather silly acting Secret Service men that were involved with the conspiracy to liquidate Fortuyn, who more than likely would have won the upcoming election for Prime Minister, which would have caused major trouble not only for the members of the Dutch SS, but liberal politicians, globalists, shady American businessmen, Muslims, and other culture-distorting rabble who want to turn the entire planet into a worldwide third world inhabited by raceless, sexless, soulless, cultureless, materialistic brown serfs. When Jim eventually catches up with Ayse at a crowded water park and essentially saves her life, he finds himself a marked man, with his friends and family members also being victims of their wrath. While a statuesque Secret Service woman attempts to kidnap Jim's daughter Marije but fails, the SS men do manage to kidnap the journalist's co-employee John van Gaal (Johnny de Mol), who they talk into believing that his photo journalist friend was involved in the assassination of Fortuyn. While Jim's daughter manages to find shelter in the home of her towelhead boyfriend Hamid (Fouad Mourigh)—a swarthy aspiring rapper who writes pro-terrorist/anti-Dutch/anti-gay lyrics regarding Fortuyn's assassination like, "They say Left sent the bullet but I don't believe it...Pity Al-Qaeda didn't shoot him dead along with all the queers in bed. Volkert – your country needed you...Heroes aren't born, but you'll do"—the Secret Service guys eventually track her down, though they fail in a fight against a group of stoned stupid Muslims. In the end, it is revealed that Pim Fortuyn was probably assassinated due to his disapproval in participating in the development of a U.S. jet (aka Joint Strike Fighter project). Indeed, after he was assassinated, Fortuyn's carefully selected successor approved of the jet plan.

While a rather aesthetically unimpressive political thriller with an absolutely horrendous soundtrack and oftentimes unintentionally unnerving acting performances, 06/05 is a consistently enthralling work that probably does a better job than any other film of the past decade or so in terms of depicting the precarious political and cultural situation in the Netherlands today. Indeed, depicting a seemingly insane world where white Dutch girls date unsavory Arab rappers and where politicians literally wish death upon their political contemporaries for holding pro-Dutch politically incorrect political views, van Gogh's film demonstrates that post-WWII liberal democratic values have dissolved the cultural fabric of the Netherlands and turned it into an increasingly troubled place where hostile foreigners are given special treatment over the indigenous Dutch, who, with the assassination of Fortuyn, have no voice to fight against the rising tide of color in their densely populated Germanic nation. Undoubtedly, one of the most potent and incriminating scenes of the film is a montage featuring carefully selected real news footage of Fortuyn's enemies wishing death on him, including one politician who sadistically states, "I think Fortuyn has hurt himself. I hope he hurt himself. I hope the wound is so deep, it doesn't stop bleeding before May 15." Of course, one of the politicians attempts to paint Fortuyn as a neo-Nazi by quoting Anne Frank and comparing the assassinated politician's anti-immigration policies to those carried out by the Nazis during the holocaust. No doubt, the most hateful of Fortuyn's detractors is a popular Dutch TV personality named Marcel van Dam (of course, van Gogh named the fat Secret Agent after this fellow), who unsuccessfully attempted to have his scene cut from the film where he accuses the politician of being "an extremely inferior being” and “rabble-rouser” who seeks to, “exploit potential xenophobia among Dutch people.” Of course, as auteur Theo van Gogh’s own assassination by an ugly untermensch Moroccan demonstrates (which was carried out because said untermensch was offended by the director’s controversial yet ultimately unimpressive short Submission (2004)), the only active xenophobes are the Muslims, not to mention the fact that so-called ‘xenophobia’ is a completely rational feeling for the Dutch to have seeing that they have been displaced within the confines of their own tiny nation. Interestingly, some suspect that van Gogh was not assassinated by a camel jockey, but by the Secret Service (interestingly, the SS was aware of his assassin Mohammed Bouyeri, as he and his terrorist group were under surveillance). Indubitably, after watching 05/06, which depicts the Dutch Secret Service (AIVD) in an exceedingly unfavorable light, it does not seem all that implausible that they would want to kill the filmmaker. Ironically, van Gogh’s father Johan van Gogh served in the AIVD (when it was known as the ‘BVD’), thus the filmmaker probably had certain insights regarding the Secret Service that influenced his rather damning film. Indeed, apparently Fortuyn was hated by the Dutch elite (which van Gogh also hated, as a man that belonged to a political party that calls for the abolition of the Dutch monarchy), who called a boycott against him a couple years before his assassination. Before his death, polls indicated that Fortuyn would have won the 2002 election for Prime Minister and of course he would have taken his revenge against the elite.

Assassinated exactly 911 days after Fortuyn was assassinated, Theo van Gogh, who was arguably the most controversial public figure in the Netherlands at the time of his death and certainly a thorn in the side of not just Islam but Zionism and American imperialism, certainly seems like the sort of individual that certain people wanted to have permanently snuffed out. Ultimately, by whom and why he was assassinated is irrelevant as all of these entities are of the same odious anti-Occidental disease and should be treated as such (as they say, if you don’t kill cancer, it spreads). When van Gogh was assassinated, the Jewish Zionist extremist mayor of Amsterdam, Job Cohen, had the gall to call for the unity of the Dutch and Muslims, absurdly remarking, “People can be cynical about this, but I can’t do anything about this.” Also, Cohen, who was publicly attacked by van Gogh (who once compared him to a Nazi collaborator due to his weak stance on Islamic terrorism and the Islamization of the Netherlands), was notorious for refusing security to any public figure that held ‘right-wing’ or ‘nationalist’ views while at the same time demanding that the Dutch, “fight nazism and racism.” It should be noted that 05/06 also depicts miscegenation in a negative light, with the protagonist Jim rhetorically asking his daughter regarding her ‘romantic’ relationship with a Muslim, “A nice shit Moroccan? Or are you his whore?,” while at the same time not realizing that his lack of parenting skills is largely responsible for his progeny’s degenerate choice of sexual partners. Of course, Jim is also depicted as a negligent father/husband who divorced his wife so he could play 'Don Juan,' thus indicating his daughter's raunchy race-mixing is a form of self-destructive rebellion. Indeed, despite being a lifelong free speech activist who directed some of the most iconoclastic Dutch films ever made, van Gogh seemed to begin to understand the decidedly deleterious effect that liberalism, multiculturalism, Zionism, and globalization were having on his nation. Since it seems rather appropriate, I am going to conclude this review with a remark that Fortuyn made on TV that is featured in 05/06 regarding his revolutionary and much needed dream for the Netherlands: "I reflect an important feeling in Holland. What is wrong with saying that? This is one of the most densely-populated countries. I understand all too well, as I have repeated, I should repeat it more clearly, if I say we should stop [...] But it's essential, if we want to dam the excesses because there's a massive influx pressuring integration and security, using education, health care, and our social security provisions. If you don't want the structure to collapse, and I don't... then we should prevent more from coming in." If more popular public figures need to be assassinated for Europeans to wake up once and for all to thwart the pervading malignancy that is turning Europa into a third world sewer, then so be it.

SILENT NIGHT, BLOODY NIGHT

Theodore Gurshuny (1972)

Featuring Warhol Superstar Mary Woronov (Chelsea Girls, Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills), as well as fellow factory fairies and fag hags Ondine, Candy Darling, Kristen Steen, Tally Brown, Lewis Love, flaming filmmaker Jack Smith (Flaming Creatures, Normal Love), degenerate artist Susan Rothenberg, and John Ford star John Carradine, Silent Night, Bloody Night (1972) aka Night of the Dark Full Moon – a dispiriting proto-slasher horror flick set during the eve of Jesus Christ’s birthday – is not exactly the sort of film you would expect to see with so much talentless star talent. Directed by Woronov’s then-husband Theodore Gershuny (Kemek, Sugar Cookies) and co-produced by tro-maniac Lloyd Kaufman (The Toxic Avenger, Tromeo and Juliet) and a couple other Hanukkah-honoring Hebrews, Silent Night, Bloody Night is the sort of innately antagonistic anti-family affair that is more likely to inspire more suicides and patricides during the holiday season than Christmas caroling and kissing under the mistletoe. Somewhat resembling an old school American home-movie due to its scratchy, grainy, and deteriorating film stock, as well as startlingly cinematically seductive sepia-tone flashback scenes which add to the film’s overall ominous aura of domestic dismalness, Silent Night, Bloody Night is a wicked work that feels like it was directed by someone with an alien, adverse, antipathetic feeling towards Christmas and the typical American yokel family that celebrates it during the yuletide season. Featuring completely kosher horror genre clichés like rural-based incest, horrid and hidden familial secrets, peculiar peasant paranoia, small town small-mindedness, anti-Anglo hostility, and intrinsic distrust of all things traditional white Christian America, Silent Night, Bloody Night was a relatively ‘revolutionary’ horror films for its time, predating (although released in 1972, the film finished shooting in 1970) Wes Craven’s The Last House on the Left (1972), Bob Clark’s Black Christmas (1974), The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), John Carpenter’s Halloween (1978), Friday the 13th (1980), and countless other related works, but that does not necessarily mean it’s a superior work, just an overlooked one (relatively, speaking of course!) As amateurishly assembled as it is thematically aberrant, Silent Night, Bloody Night is a Christ Mass flick for Christ-Killers, Warhol factory addicts, and those seasonally sadistic spiritually stagnant individuals who are more naughty than nice.

Aside from all the Hollywood and mainstream media propaganda regarding slavery among a marginal and mostly wealthy minority of men mainly of English, Irish, and Jewish descent, few films have depicted the maniac and mongrelized microcosm that is the a good portion of the United States population; a citizenry descended from criminals, outcasts, political and religious fanatics, and savages and barbarians. In short, a nation of people so desperate in their life of misery and squalor that they were willing to risk everything, including their nationality, culture, customs, familiarity, extended family, and even their lives, in a gambling attempt at bettering their lives. Whether intentional on the director's part or not (I would go with the former), if any horror film allegorically portrays the 'esoteric' genetic history of America and its inhabitants in an effective manner, albeit in a fiercely fictionalized and absurdly ridiculous manner, it is Silent Night, Bloody Night; a work where the most ostracized of social outcasts, mental patients, escape from the loony bin and make up the entire population of a small town. Centering around the dark and tragic history of a small Massachusetts town (although filmed on location in the Hebraic haven of Long Island, New York), Silent Night, Bloody Night begins with the story of a once prestigious patriarch named Wilfred Butler (Philip Bruns) who returns to his majestic maniac mansion, which had been turned into an institution for the criminally insane, on one fateful and ultimately fiery Christmas Eve where he is set on fire and burned alive on that very same night. Flash forward to the present where the manor, now uninhabited but with all the original family's nicknacks and what-not adorning the walls, is now in the hands of Wilfred Butler's grandson Jeffrey (James Patterson), who inherited the house via his grandfather's will and now wants to sell it, but the suspicious locals, including the mayor and sheriff, seem rather overprotective of the house. The mayor's daughter Diane Adams (Mary Woronov) narrates the story and the doomful day inheritor Jeffrey and an escaped serial killer come to the Butler mansion just in time for Christmas. As all the characters in Silent Night, Bloody Night find out, the murderous lunatic is out to celebrate a venomous and violent "season of vengeance," with a slick big shot lawyer and his exotic European wife being the first victims.

"That's what usually happens in America" says the beautiful wife to her lawyer husband when he remarks that no one seems to remember what the "monument" (i.e. old family photos, antiques, furniture, etc.) in the Butler mansion is for. Indeed, Silent Night, Bloody Night is just a fictional version of so many forgotten tales of dubious founding fathers and the curious origins of everyday citizens. Although the locals of the town claim to be mostly the descendants of people who came to the town during the depression, their origins are much more ominous with their history of settling being more unsettling. While surely an uneven film that is somewhat slow to pick up pace, Silent Night, Bloody Night proves to be a dirty diamond in the rough among the sea of slasher sewage, especially when it comes to the film's last 30 minutes where the morbid mystery of the mad manor is revealed to the audience via the narrated writings of Wilfred Butler and delightfully deteriorated sepia-tone footage that reveal the macabre and monstrous history of the town and its inhabitants. This sleazy yet strikingly stylized scene probably could be described as a "Night of the wanton Warhol Superstars" as this is when most of the factory burnouts make their appearance with Candy Darling – who despite having a penis, is easily the most beautiful “woman” in the film, thus making the seedy cinematic work hardly of interest to the oh-so many horror fans looking for some cheap carnal thrills – being the most visible. Ultimately, both Christmas and Warhol’s weirdos are only incidental to the story of Silent Night, Bloody Night, but these seemingly discordant ingredients also make the film worth seeing. Indeed, by no means a masterpiece in any traditional sense of the word, Silent Night, Bloody Night is, at best, a neglected proto-slasher flick and a curious cult item and, at worst, a miserable money-motivated propaganda film assembled by a conglomerate of hostile entities whose artistic ingenuity is no greater than their love of Christmas. More gritty than Silent Night, Deadly Night (1984), more gruesome than Christmas Evil (1980), and featuring a more marvelous mythos than Black Christmas (1974), Silent Night, Bloody Night is one of few remotely redeeming slasher flicks that is not overblown nor overrated. After all, how many other no-budget slasher flicks feature an arthouse tranny that has starred in Paul Morrissey and Werner Schroeter films and a back-story that is quasi-Lovecraftian in its essence regarding tainted towns and bloodlines. Just don’t watch Silent Night, Bloody Night after just realizing that you’re significant other kissed someone else under the mistletoe, as you might find yourself intentionally overdosing on your alcoholic eggnog.

Theu Boermans (1994)

If you ever wondered how the Netherlands became a seemingly forsaken land that is mainly associated with great legal weed, prostitution, euthanasia, government subsidized sex changes, and virtually any and every form of disgustingly degenerate neo-liberal socio-cultural rot, the little known Dutch feature 1000 Rosen (1994) aka 1,000 Roses aka Duizend Rozen directed by Theu Boermans will certainly lead you in the right direction. In fact, it is the only film I can think of that tells it like it is and—instead of portraying Americans as the great liberators—exposes the fact that the United States turned Western Europe into its own museum-cum-whorehouse after the World War II. Based on the 1990 play of the same name by Austrian playwright Gustav Ernst—a man probably best known in the cinema world for penning the Austrian cult flick Exit... nur keine Panik (1980) aka Exit... But No Panic and its sequel Exit II - Verklärte Nacht (1995) aka Exit II - Transfigured Night—the film was fairly critically successful in the Netherlands where it won three Gouden Kalf in 1994, including Best Actress, Best Actor and Best Film, yet it remains completely unknown even among seasoned cinephiles outside the Dutch speaking world. Indeed, despite winning the Dutch equivalent of an Oscar in three major categories and various other coveted prizes in other festivals, Boermans' film, like the seeming majority of great Dutch cinema, has never been released outside of the Netherlands, which is rather unfortunate considering it features an absolutely scathing socio-political message that is very much relevant to contemporary Western Europe and various other parts of the world. A political parable disguised as a black dramedy featuring bittersweet moments of lusciously colored magical realism that somewhat ironically symbolizes the collective death of an entire population and its history, 1000 Rosen depicts the swift and savagely painful yet nonetheless beautiful death of a long dying town as a result of a devilishly duplicitous American company coming to town and completely dismantling the entire place. Depicting a necrotizing microcosm plagued by rampant fatherlessness, alcoholism, pedophilia, and various other forms of all-too-common social dysfunction and cultural decay, Boermans's striking debut—a cinematic work based on a play that the director began performing in 1990 with a troupe of actors that would partly make up the film's cast—is a pleasantly political incorrect work that depicts American hegemony and globalization as something akin to a nuclear holocaust, albeit somewhat more aesthetically pleasing. A fairly amazing debut for a theater actor and stage director with seemingly nil film directing experience, the film can be certainly compared by cinematic works by Alex van Warmerdam, Adriaan Ditvoorst, and Roy Andersson in terms of their aesthetics and darkly comedic depiction of the decline of the Occident, yet Boermans' film can hardly be described as derivative, even if seem Dutch film critics have criticized it for being supposedly too contrived and formulaic. Ultimately, 1000 Rosen reveals why Francis Parker Yockey was right when he wrote in 1953 in his book The Enemy of Europe regarding the decidedly deleterious effect of America on Europe, “The Europe of 2050 will be essentially the same as that of 1950, viz. a museum to be looted by barbarians, a historical curiosity for sightseers from the colonies; an odd assortment of operetta-states; a reservoir of human material standing at the disposal of Washington and Moscow; a loan market for New York financiers; a great beggars’ colony, bowing and scraping before the American tourists.”

While I have never even visited the Netherlands, I have known my entire life that something horrible happened to the tiny Lowland nation as a result of the Second World War because my grandfather was a Dutchman who regrettably left his homeland for the United States of America in the 1950s. Indeed, I was always told as a child that my grandfather came to the U.S. because he was thoroughly depressed by what had become of his homeland, but it was only until I was much older that I truly began to realize how the Netherlands degenerated from a relatively powerful empire with colonies all around the world into becoming an overcrowded neo-liberal hellhole that is being invaded by third world barbarians and savages that would love nothing more than to exterminate the country and people that subsidize their mostly parasitic existences. While the Germans—a longtime foe of the Dutch despite their shared blood and history—typically gets the blame for the Netherlands’ decline due to the Nazi occupation during the Second World War, 1000 Rosen demonstrates in a wonderfully wicked sort of way that it was ultimately the Americans that raped and destroyed the country and turned it into, not unlike the rest of Western Europe, a servile vassal state with no true sovereignty of its own. In its depiction of a classically tall, dark, and handsome Clark Kent-esque American businessman from Minnesota named Mr. Marshall who comes to a destitute Dutch town as an elusive all-powerful savior and ultimately proves to be the worst sort of wolf in sheep’s clothing by buying out the main factory and deindustrializing the entire area, the film reveals in a fantastic allegorical fashion how the so-called Marshall Plan (aka the European Recovery Program, ERP) dismantled the country’s infrastructure, industry, culture, traditions, and self-determination, among other things. Indeed, 1000 Rosen is anything but a tribute to the false song of globalism and its assorted social afflictions like multiculturalism, pop culture, feminism, and various other forms of deracinating nation-destroying degeneracy.

Depicting a morally inverted world where unmarried mothers put their own petty concerns over that of their much loathed fatherless bastard daughters and featuring an extra eerie conclusion where a little girl and a pedophile banker that is obsessed with said little girl are the only survivors and thus leave town together in what is indubitably a hauntingly sardonic conclusion, 1000 Rosen might be rather dark and depressing yet it also quite entertaining, humorous, and aesthetically pleasing, not to mention a rare quasi-mainstream Dutch flick that dares to reveal that post-WWII Netherlands became the desperate whore of the pernicious bloodsucking pimp that is the United States of Zion. Indeed, a rare piece of anti-American cinema that, quite unlike a bombastic agitprop piece by archetypal American liberal slob Michael Moore, is not innately insipid, juvenile, or cynical in an impotent leftist sort of way, the film depicts in a semi-surreal fashion the last gasp of the land that produced Rembrandt and both van Goghs in a manner that can be understood by children yet appreciated on a deeper level by pretentious art fags. While I hate to quote the old bitter kosher commie culture-distorter, the film is also thankfully a rare cinematic work that manages to contradict Adorno's statement regarding modern art, "[A]rt no longer has the task of representing a reality that is preexisting for everyone in common, but rather of revealing, in its isolation, the very cracks that reality would like to cover over in order to exist in safety; and that, in doing so, it repels." In fact, 1000 Rosen features both literal and figurative cracks of a rather grim reality regarding the slow and painful secret ethnic cleansing of Western Europe by generic looking American men with phony smiles that operate under the pernicious guidance of hidden forces that would love to transform every church into a McDonald's and replace every native Dutchman with an automaton-like Indian or Chinese slave-wager.

Rather fittingly, 1000 Rosen begins relatively wholesomely with an unseen dipsomaniac putting the finishing touches on a wooden mouse maze. The maze was created by a working class zero named Harry (Jaap Spijkers) as a birthday present for his longtime girlfriend's daughter Liesje (Tessa Lilly Wyndham). As the film eventually reveals, no one seems to know who Liesje's biological father is, but it is hinted that her so-called 'uncle'—a sleazy and creepy bank director named 'Otto' (Hannes Demming)—might be the little girl's true progenitor. Likewise, it is also hinted that Otto is the father of Liesje's mother Gina (Marieke Heebink), as he apparently has a sexual history with both the mother and daughter. Indeed, not only is Otto a predatory capitalist, but he is also a unabashed sexual predator who has no problem feeling up a prepubescent girl while in the company of said little girl's grandmother. As a self-absorbed bitch that lives a pathetic existence and wants someone to blame, Gina naturally resents her daughter Liesje because she has no life as a result of getting pregnant at 18 and being forced to work at the local wiring factory instead of pursuing her dream of studying languages and traveling abroad. Despite loathing her life, Gina is better off than most people in the area since she is the manager of the local factory, which is the town's main source of income. Not surprisingly, Gina's mother (Marianne Rogée) also resents her for similar reasons, though she loves her granddaughter Liesje and even confesses to the little girl, "When you were born, I knew right away...that the best part of my daughter was you." As the mouse maze at the beginning of the film alludes to, all of these characters are trapped in a perennial maze of insufferable redundancy and, not unlike the mice, they will inevitably die mostly slow and painful deaths in their proletarian prison, though not before suffering the misguided delusion that they might escape after the yanks come to town and ostensibly save the day.

The film is set in an anachronistic world with aspects of both the early 1960s and early 1990s where Low German (aka ‘Nederduits’)—a dialect of Northern Germany that can be understood with relative ease by Dutch people—is spoken and children are virtually nonexistent. Little Liesje—an inordinately adorable yet tragic child that has already clearly suffered much suffering in her short and seemingly rather static life—seems to be a mute as she does not speak at all and seems to be quasi-autistic yet at the same time she displays almost mystical insights that, quite unlike the dysfunctional adults that surround her, give her the capacity to realize that her town is on the brink of a catastrophic disaster. Obsessed with staring at a painting of a red rose on her blood-colored bedroom wall, Liesje notices everything that the adults cannot seem to see, including random appearance of quasi-apocalyptic cracks in the earth and plants sprouting in the most random of places. When a group of Americans led by an almost mythical figure named Mr. Marshall (Rik Launspach)—a shadowy yet handsome and seemingly all-powerful character that is always symbolically depicted standing behind doors and windows—the plants become more prominent and random citizens begin coughing up blood for seemingly no reason as if consumed by some sort of mysterious plague that ultimately seems to be more metaphysical than physical in origin. Indeed, the unexpected arrival of the Americans, including a couple well dresses negroes, completely corrupts the equilibrium of the town, especially in regard to romantic and familial relationships. For instance, Liesje’s mother Gina soon drops her longtime boyfriend/pseudo-husband Harry—a sub-literate forklift driver that seems to mean well but is just too much of a dumb and dangerous drunk to ever be a truly decent husband/father figure—for a meek, weak, and pathetic white knight computer nerd named Kernstock (Bert Geurkink) who is married to a large, masculine, and grotesquely overly domineering nurse named Rita (Marisa Van Eyle) who calls him “little bear” and gives him unwanted blowjobs. Aside from giving distinctly disgusting blowjobs where it seems like she might suck off her husband Kernstock’s cock, Rita does think think twice about giving passive handjobs to elderly patients while simultaneously carrying out wifely duties like frying eggs. As Kernstock reveals regarding his life ambitions, “I always thought one half of me would work...and the other half would prepare for a Canary Island. One half sold to the factory and the other half able to live.” Unfortunately for Kernstock, like virtually everyone in the town, his dreams are about to degenerate into a horrendous nightmare that makes the final days of the German occupation seem like a gentle stroll in the park by comparison.

Aside from Liesje, her grandmother, who is a stereotypical old-timer that hates change of any sort, seems to be the only other person that has a strong feeling that the Americans will bring disaster to the town. Indeed, grandma even reacts violently when her daughter Gina buys a used computer from Kernstock for accounting purposes at the wiring factory. Grandma has dedicated her entire life to working at the factory and as she proudly screams at Harry and Gina regarding her seemingly indomitable work ethic, "At your age I was up at five! You're weaklings! No Bones! [...] I've stood all my life! I never laid down! Even when I laid down! I remember myself as only being upright." When Gina goes behind her back and gets a large loan from 'uncle' Otto so that she can buy her own land and house, grandmother kicks her out of her home, which is incidentally located inside the same building as the factory, and throws all of her belongings into the street, thus forcing her to sleep in her work office. Not surprisingly, Gina does not seem to be concerned with the fact that her daughter Liesje continues to live inside her mother's home. Meanwhile, Harry is left seriously hospitalized after crashing his work truck into a billboard after getting in a fight with Gina over her relationship with Kernstock and her refusal to move inside his Winnebago. While Harry originally purchased the Winnebago so he would not have to live under the same roof as Gina, Liesje, and the grandmother, the loss of his ladylove to Kernstock finally made him realize how important she was to him, hence his desperate suicidal decision to crash his truck into a billboard advertising to "invest now" in the dubious American corporation. Of course, Gina is one of the fools that opts to invest and her banker uncle Otto even gives her a fairly decent sized loan which she suspects is an attempt for him to make amends for the fact that he molested her when she was a little girl, though he charges her 11% interest because, as he matter-of-factly states in a slightly sinister fashion, "Only death is for free." Needless to say, Gina and virtually everyone she knows will receive this once-in-a-lifetime freebie by the end of the film. Not long after hotheaded Harry's rather convenient accident, Kernstock gets completely fed up with his raunchy ratchet wife Rita and leaves her for good after she gives him a rather nasty involuntary blowjob from under his computer desk. Notably, while receiving the completely grotesque unwanted face-fake, Kernstock states to Rita in a rare moment where he displays some level of testicular fortitude, "It's slim legs I think of, if you must know...and tight cunts I think of...and not your barn hole." To add insult to injury, Kernstock not only takes Harry's woman but also takes residence in his beloved Winnebago. When she and her mother later visit Harry in the hospital, Liesje confirms that Gina is fucking Kernstock, even though they have not technically sealed the sexual deal yet (as is quite apparent throughout the entire film, Gina has her eye on Mr. Marshall and is simply using poor cuckold Kernstock as a sort of slavish life-planner due to his supposed economic intelligence and prowess behind a computer). Eventually crippled Harry and Rita proceed to begin a grotesque 'rebound relationship' where they both declare to take murderous revenge against their ex-lovers. Indeed, while Harry vows to kill Kernstock in a most gruesome fashion, Rita brags in a rather venomous fashion how she plans to kill her hubby in his own bed whilst giving him one of her infamous handjob. Meanwhile, Gina and Kernstock are so happy about their would-be-bright future together that they literally slow dance together on top of graves in the local graveyard in a darkly humorously symbolic scene that seems to reflect the absurdly misguided, blind enthusiasm that the post-WWII Dutch had for mindlessly of disposing their nation's entire history and culture and forgetting their ancestors in the hope that they would monetarily benefit from the Americanization of their homeland. Of course, in the end, the scheming Americans, who have no organic kultur and are solely monetarily motivated and thus anti-Occidental, not only bring them deindustrialization and destitution, but death and total destruction.

In the last 30 minutes or so of the film, 1000 Rosen takes a sort of fantastic apocalyptic turn for the worst that has its genesis in the American corporation secretly dismantling the industry of the entire town literally over night and leaving to go back to the United States in what is undoubtedly a symbolic depiction of America's pernicious predatory effect on a rather vulnerable post-WWII Western Europe. When Liesje's grandmother witnesses firsthand the dismantling of the factory that she has slaved away at her entire life, she hysterically screams, "I knew it! I knew it right from the start!" and then sets her eyes on treacherous banker Otto and rightly yells at him while he watches pathetically from the comfort of his office window, "And you did too! You've ruined us! All of us. The town, me, Gina! You and your bloody friends!" just before killing herself by throwing herself in front of one of the trucks that is hauling away the equipment from the town as her haunted granddaughter looks on. Notably, while all this is going on, Gina is spending a splendid vacation at the beach where she finally gives Kernstock what he wants by less than passionately fucking him. Indeed, instead of being there for her traumatized daughter Liesje, who has just witnessed the brutally tragic suicide of her grandmother, Gina is busy riding the cock of a cuck that she seems to have nil sexual or emotional interest in, but of course one should not expect anything less from a modern liberated woman who puts self-interest above all us. The next day after the Americans have completely abandoned the area and shipped all of the local factory's machines and equipment to some shithole on the Dark Continent (notably, when Gina later asks Otto why the Americans would be interested in such "junk" machines and equipment, the sleazy pedo banker replies that they are, "Good enough for Africa"), the town is in a fully apocalyptic state where every single person is trying in vain to evacuate the region before they croak. Indeed, when Rita finally arrives back to town from her vacation with Kernstock, she is somewhat startled to find corpses hanging from ropes, dead bodies in the street, buildings on fire, and everyone in acting with the utmost animalistic desperation. In the film's somewhat surprisingly ultra-violent and forebodingly atmospheric climax, little Liesje takes a sort of prophetic revenge against the adults that failed her by locking her mother

Gina, pseudo-father Harry, Kernstock, and Rita in the abandoned factory and unleashing two black hellhounds on them. Notably, before the Americans left the area for good and the entire town went to hell, Liesje seemed to have a premonition of the tragedy that would ensue after looking at the maze mouse she received for her birthday and discovering that all the mice were dead. Both distressed and angered by the sight of the dead mice, Liesje smashed the maze to bits in a rather violent fashion, as if she had a reluctant emotional longing for the destruction of the people and entire world that failed her. Now trapped in the mazelike factory like scared rodents, the adults in Liesje's life have become the mice and of course now they must die, or so Liesje seems to believe as demonstrated by her actions. Indeed, after Harry brutally slaughtering Kernstock with a chainsaw, Liesje's dogs maul Rita to death while she is sobbing and caressing the corpse of her dead hubby. When Gina dares to rebuff his love and declares she is making a new life for herself in America after he corners her in the factory, Harry, who has become murderously lovesick, uses a forklift to crush her body against a wall. As for Harry, his fate is no less gruesome as Liesje blows his brains out with his own shotgun, which is somewhat ironic considering he was the one responsible for teaching the little girl how to shoot in the first place. In the end, the entire town transforms into a sort of inordinately beautiful and dreamy graveyard after it is completely overgrown with wild plants and red roses. As for little Liesje, she tragically but not surprisingly follows in the footsteps of her grandmother and mother by becoming Uncle Otto's whore and leaving the town with him in what is ultimately a hauntingly stunning conclusion to a deceptively dark and morbid film where lecherous humor and raunchiness is cleverly utilized to make the prospect of the slow and painful American-funded extermination of an entire Dutch town easier to swallow.

While undoubtedly a decidedly dark and grim cinematic work that might possibly drive more sensitive and vulnerable minds to suicide, 1000 Rosen is unequivocally a classic of Dutch comedy, though it would be unfair to describe it as simply a comedy as it totally transcends both genre conventions and expectations as an unpretentious arthouse work that seamlessly weaves elements of comedy, melodrama, romance, fantasy, and even horror in an elegant yet nonetheless ultimately brutal fashion. In terms of depicting a post-WWII Dutch town as a culturally and morally decaying hellhole in a strangely humorous fashion that reminds the viewer why the Netherlands has never recovered from the Second World War but instead mutated into a virtual Americanized graveyard, the film is comparable to works like Adriaan Ditvoorst's quasi-biblical anti-liberal epic De Mantel der Liefde (1978) aka The Mantle of Love, Rudolf van den Berg's somewhat uneven Gerard Reve adaptation De Avonden (1989) aka Evenings, Alex van Warmerdam's De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners, and Martin Koolhoven's Suzy Q (1999), yet it also features surprising moments of magic realism comparable to the films of Belgian auteur filmmakers like Harry Kümel and Baron André Delvaux (incidentally, the film was mostly shot in the historical town of Bois-du-Luc in southern Belgium). Interestingly, contemporary Belgian auteur Koen Mortier—a filmmaker whose debut feature Ex Drummer (2007) takes a darkly comedic approach to depicting the abject moral and cultural deterioration of contemporary Belgium—worked on 1000 Rosen as a location manager and it seems that being involved with this film inspired his entire approach to filmmaking. It should also be noted that auteur Theu Boermans was born in the ‘Dutch Caribbean’ of Netherlands Antilles, thus he probably has a somewhat different and distinct perspective on the decline on the Netherlands. Boermans, who is certainly better known as an actor and stage director than as a filmmaker, would demonstrate his versatility with Dutch dialects by portraying a tragic Limburg farmer in Frouke Fokkema’s underrated anti-Heimat piece Kracht (1990) aka Vigour, which features a number of the same actors as 1000 Rosen and was produced by the same production company. If Ex Drummer, Kracht, and 1000 Rosen all have something in common, it is that they depict a sick, senile, and decrepit Europa where even small towns and villages in the countryside are not immune from the spiritually, culturally, and economically deleterious effects of Americanization.

In his arguable magnum opus Histoire(s) du cinéma (1988-1998)—a highly personal 8-part video project about the history of cinema that the auteur took over a decade to complete—French alpha-auteur Jean-Luc Godard brings forth the rather reasonable yet rarely acknowledged historical thesis that both Germany and the United States were in competition during World War II for total world domination, or as kosher film critic Richard Brody noted in a typically whiny Judaic fashion in his tome Everything Is Cinema: The Working Life Of Jean-Luc Godard (2008), “Though Godard was obsessed with the Holocaust as an unparalleled horror, he relativized the monstrosity of the political force that brought it about. As Godard asserted in ALL THE STORIES, the war resulted in not one but two attempts at world dominion—Germany’s unsuccessful military conquest, and America’s successful cultural one: just as ‘after the First World War, Hollywood destroyed French cinema, after the Second World War Hollywood destroyed all the cinemas of Europe with television and money.’ On-screen, Godard flashes the word Endlösung (final solution), suggesting that, while Hitler had used the cover of war to try to exterminate the Jews of Europe, the United States had used it to wipe out the national movie industries of Europe. He shockingly presented these two deeds as parallel, as motivated by a similar sense of national self-righteousness and drive for hegemony. Thus, rather than considering Germany alone to have been the invaders and the United States the liberators, Godard saw wartime France and the other European nations as innocent victims caught between these two behemoths.” Of course, Brody’s glaring hysterical Hebraic outrage aside, Godard is mostly right, hence the importance of a film like 1000 Rosen that dares to propose that America has had a largely catastrophic effect on Europe and European culture. It should also be noted that Godard rightly believes that Hollywood is largely run by Jewish gangsters and criminals, so naturally American movies should be considered nothing more than toxic culture-distorting trash that is used by an alien people to not only deracinate and debase Europeans with degeneracy, but also the American white majority and virtually every other group of people in the world. Indeed, while the United States might have officially won the Second World War, it was ultimately a loss for Western Europe and European-Americans in the long run as they came under the influence of a hostile anti-Occident people, or as Francis Parker Yockey noted in his magnum opus Imperium (1948), "The result of all this is a powerful spiritual influence on the American people. This people reads the books which aliens write or edit for it. It sees the plays and cinemas it is allowed to. It thinks the thoughts that are put into its head. It is thrown into wars against American interests, which it can only lose. The issue of war and peace, life and death, is decided for America by the Cultural alien. America has been given a semitic countenance. Americans who hold power hold it in the deference to the alien. To oppose him dare no public men. Americans were told that they must be concerned with the partitioning of Arabia, and no national channel existed through which an American could deny fundamentally the world-picture which supported such a policy." While Yockey wrote these words in 1948, they clearly ring true today. Notably, Godard, himself a lifelong leftist and ex-Maoist, also believed that the Third Reich had the last truly and organically European cinema, even once stating in a 1991 interview with Le Monde, "The German cinema under Nazism is the only cinema that wanted to be European . . . The German cinema is the only one that fought against America, that did what Jack Lang would like to do." Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes 1000 Rosen such a liberating cinematic experience is that it is innately anti-Hollywood and, in turn, totally Judenfrei (somewhat ironically, the French politician that Godard mentioned, Jack Lang, is descended from a family of Jewish freemasons, thus hardly someone that you would expect to be an advocate for a Renaissance of a truly French cinema).

While 1000 Rosen subtly credits the Marshall Plan as destroying Western Europe, the film fails to mention a much more pernicious and malefic conspiracy known as the Coudenhove-Kalergi Plan that entails the 'passive extermination' of the indigenous European peoples as envisioned by the demented and philo-semitic half-breed Austrian-Jap aristocrat Richard von Coudenhove-Kalergi, who might be best described as the spiritual father of the dystopian anti-imperium known as the 'European Union.' Like many racially mongrelized individuals, von Coudenhove-Kalergi—a staunch philo-semite whose friendship with Baron Louis de Rothschild led to him being funded in his anti-Occidental political pursuits by Judaic banker Max Warburg—was rather sensitive about his dubious pedigree and arrogantly sought for the systematic destruction of the indigenous European races via race-mixing while at the same time hypocritically advocating Jewish racial purity as reflected in his unhinged words like, "The man of the future will be of mixed race. Today's races and classes will gradually disappear owing to the vanishing of space, time, and prejudice. The Eurasian-Negroid race of the future, similar in its appearance to the Ancient Egyptians, will replace the diversity of peoples with a diversity of individuals [...] Instead of destroying European Jewry, Europe, against its own will, refined and educated this people into a future leader-nation through this artificial selection process. No wonder that this people, that escaped Ghetto-Prison, developed into a spiritual nobility of Europe. Therefore a gracious Providence provided Europe with a new race of nobility by the Grace of Spirit." Rather curiously, von Coudenhove-Kalergi's hateful anti-Aryan dreams have largely become true and it should be no surprise that he was the first to be awarded the so-called Charlemagne Prize, which has been only awarded to the most treacherous of Zionist-approved leaders like Henry Kissinger, Tony Blair, and Angela Merkel.

While 1000 Rosen does not depict the flooding of Europe with hostile aliens from the third world, it does hint at the racial hostility of the shadowy leaders of the United States in a scene where American negroes in fancy business suits pay off the leaders of the town with suitcases full of cash, thus reflecting the racial treachery of the U.S. and how white Americans disgraced their own peoples by treating them lower than American blacks after the Second World War. Needless to say, the film has never been released in the United States despite the various prestigious awards it has won as such a provocative film goes against the interests of left-wing and largely Jewish-owned foreign film distribution companies like the Criterion Collection, Kino Lorber, and Cohen Media Group. Of course, it is no surprise that the Netherlands is also the country that produced Theo van Gogh, who was assassinated for directing a short that simply exposes the brutally misogynistic character of the Koran. Van Gogh was notorious for his vocal criticism of both Jewish and Muslim influence on the Netherlands, thus making his death all the more tragic yet unsurprising. Likewise, the nation is also responsible for Edwin Brienen whose feature Revision - Apocalypse II (2010) features a female protagonist that argues that contemporary neo-liberal West is worse than any of the horrors of the Third Reich. After all, although they might have been deeply impacted by American hegemony, the Dutch are among the most brutally blunt people in the world and largely lack the naivety and delusional guilt that plagues their German neighbors, though the country still certainly has its fair share of leftist lunatics, cucks, and exceedingly emasculated ethnomasochists. In its delectable combination of morbidly dark humor, uncompromising anti-American political incorrectness, magical realism, brutal violence, and beautiful surrealist flower arrangements, 1000 Rosen is not only one of the most important and entertaining Dutch films of its era, but also a pure and unadulterated reflection of the best and worst aspects of the Dutch national character, thereupon making it mandatory viewing for anyone with an interest in true Western European cinema.

THE PIG FUCKING MOVIE
THE PIG FUCKING MOVIE

Thierry Zéno (1974)

AKA One Man and his PigAKA Wedding TroughAKA Vase de noccesMany have heard the boasting of the great enigma film-maker David Lynch and his talks of how Eraserhead is 100% original and uninspired, but I see flaws in that statement. It seems our very underrated obscure film "The Pig Fucking Movie" has some very... familiar scenes in it, to say the least. This is a Belgian Art-House film that is only existent through a VHS tape being reprinted onto a DVD which is in the trader's circle. The plot is derived from what we, the viewers, take in visually. We meet a lonesome man who lives on a rural farm. He has no lover, no children, and no real responsibility as it seems. He spends all day performing surreal acts of the twisted sort and tending to his ill-natured perversions, such as morbidly putting baby doll heads on pigeons and organizing jars of weird relics similar to the Sawyer's residence in the original Texas Chainsaw Massacre. In case you didn't know, this film is known by many names. This is one reason that attests as to why this film is so hard to get a hold of. One title aptly being The Pig Fucking Movie. So as you can guess, he falls in love with his sow in glorious black & white. While this degree of zoophilia might turn people off from viewing this film, It really would be a shame for you to miss this experience. While it does hold itself a little bit pretentious by calling it art, most people don't examine the outer scenes. If you spend the majority of the runtime scoffing aloud and not paying attention to every grainy detail in this film, I could imagine getting pissed off too. Thierry Zéno lead an arcane film career. Not much is known, but it seems he has been blacklisted for creating this film. When you take the context of the film, you are given a horrifying love story and a film of the utmost tragedy. When I was not basking in this film's horrible, wretched noises or grainy quality, I was paying attention to the soil. Every step along the way, Zéno has a way of visually capturing your attention on the most trivial of things. While you are supposed to be watching this weird, macabre love story, you find yourself staring off into the background items. The Pig Fucking Movie is more or less, about a man that makes love to a pig and produces hybrid spawn. Hence my relation to Eraserhead. Mind you, I have more than one reason to suit my claim while The Pig Fucking Movie is not exempt from my cynical wrath. I can clearly derive a bit of Un chien andalou from some of the scenes. This film is a wonder to behold and will not leave your head for a while. Watch for a gratuitous amount of feathers being collected in jars for a symbolic good time. If for nothing else - a tragic love story that bleeds familiarity to another classic, Fando y Lis.

VASE DE NOCES

Call me heartless, but in my experience, autistic people have easily been some of the most blatantly depraved and morally bankrupt people I ever met, including a childhood classmate who eventually hogtied, raped, and slit the throat of his cousin, an adopted Colombian toddler who kept babbling on about cutting off angel heads and setting their holy bodies on fire, and a nearly thirty year old virgin fanboy with a virtual army of action figures who would spontaneously start kissing and feeling up girls that had enough empathy to actually talk to him, so naturally I was quite intrigued when I discovered the infamous Belgian arthouse film Vase de Noces (1974); a wonderfully wacked-out gritty black-and-white cinematic work without dialogue (and only dissonant and disarranging score) about an autistic farmboy with a perverse proclivity towards porking and 'wedding' a pig on a post-apocalyptic farm with no other humans in site. Best known as The Pig Fucking Movie among sick cinephiles everywhere, Vase de Noces directed by Belgian auteur Thierry Zéno is generally called Wedding Trough under its English title, as well as One Man and His Pig and Der Hochzeitstrog in German, but until relatively recently, only a miniscule number of moviegoers even knew about this film, let alone had seen it, but like a lot of ostensibly obscure cinematic works, the internet has given this sometimes sardonic swine skin flick a rebirth of sorts. Oftentimes described as "one of the most obscure movies that is not a lost film," Vase de Noces was recently unearthed by both a German and Swedish distributor, thus making the seedy swine sex flick readily available for those individuals who know how to find such films, thereupon somewhat demystifying this holy grail of horrid hog-humping in the process to some extent. Admittedly, I had next to nil interest in watching a scatological swine flick about a half-retarded fellow fornicating and falling in love with a piggy and only until relatively recently – out of sheer boredom – did I get around to seeing it so as to scratch it off my mental list of infamous cinematic works that tests one's psyche to a particularly penetrating, if not superficially perverse level. Now, I can safely say that Vase de Noces belongs in the same incendiary idiosyncratic category of low-budget aberrant arthouse work as Jörg Buttgeriet's Nekromantik (1987), Pig (1999) directed by Rozz Williams and Nico B., and Marian Dora's The Angel's Melancholia (2009) aka Melancholie Der Engel; as a work too artsy fartsy for the average horror fan/gorehound and too extreme for the average granola-bar-nibbling arthouse poof. A phantasmagorical rite between autistic pervert and a sweet swine, Vase de Noces rightfully earned an X-rating despite being an arthouse flick and was initially banned in the outback, until director Thierry Zéno was able to convince the censor board of the film's anti-erotic esoteric merit, only to be banned again.

The fellow simply credited as the "Farmer" (played by Dominique Garny)

in Vase de Noces has a lot of problems. Aside from being what seems like the last man in the world in some desolate post-apocalyptic wasteland where only farm animals seem to have survived, he is also autistic (as described by director Zéno), so although he has no more problems with disturbing people with his seemingly retarded and unhinged behavior now that everyone is gone, he is no better communicating with animals, hence his positively perverse proclivity for affixing doll-heads onto pigeons and chasing a pig around as if he wants to do something unsavory with the sow, which he most certainly eventually does. On top of being a pig man, the fucked feces-fondling farmer is a scat-man as well and certainly a fellow who does not allow any part of an animal to go to waste, including animal reproductive systems. A protrusive pig porker, the farmer somehow manages to get his miss piggy pregnant, thereupon siring a collective of three cute little piglets, but the fellow is certainly not father material, thereupon leading into the most swinish of consequences akin to a ham holocaust via pig sty hanging. An inquisitive autistic fellow who will try anything just to find out the consequences, the frantic Farmer is always literally and figuratively digging into something, but the only thing he seems to ultimately discover, aside from how soothing flying a kite can be, is death and defecation: waste (with his idol existence being the biggest of biological junk). A pathological partaker in coprophagia cuisine, which is ironic since the ancient Chinese used to feed pigs human feces and garbage (the "Pig Toilet" which is still used today the Indian state of Goa), the Farmer finds himself turning more and more like a common swine as he realizes that his piglets have an incapacity for taking on human characteristics as his autism won't allow him to comprehend. In the end, the frightened farmboy does what many most frightened failures of fathers do. Needless to say, I would not recommend Vase de Noces to fans of Babe (1995) or even the darker sequel Babe: Pig in the City (1998), as this obscure little arthouse work will remind, at least to some extent, the price one must pay to eat bacon and then some, as the Farmer loves his sexy swine with a side of saucy shit.

By no means as depraved and daunting as one would assume knowing the film's fiercely foul subject matter, Vase de Noces will more likely than not bore those views just looking for sensual sow sensationalism. As explained by director Thierry Zéno in the documentary Of Pigs and Men (2009), one of the greatest influences for Vase de Noces was Pier Paolo Pasolini's Teorema (1968), which is no surprise considering the gay Marxist Italian Renaissance man was known for his use of rather grotesque and sensational semiotic techniques. Zéno cites the pig as a quite sweet symbol of femininity and the Farmer's feces feasting as a sick sort of atavistic awakening and an absurdly anomalous attempt at athanasia via alchemy. That being said, Vase de Noces may be the most seemingly unpretentious, pretentious film ever made, thereupon making it mandatory viewing for any venturesome cinephile, but probably not the sort of filmgoer who would describe Jean-Luc Godard's Breathless (1960) as one of their top ten favorite films, nor the sort that would describe Wes Anderson as one of the greatest contemporary arthouse directors nor George A. Romero the king of horror, but someone looking for a new pile of celluloid pieces. Essentially, like A Boy and His Dog (1975) meets Eraserhead (1977) meets Nous étions un seul homme (1979) aka We Were One Man, Vase de Noces is certainly a decidedly diacritic cinematic work and not just because it features a socially retarded reject porking Miss Piggy, but because it also features an audacious antagonistic and antithetical atmosphere that does the opposite of what most films are supposed to do: embarrass the viewer, at least if one does not happen to suffer from autism nor Asperger syndrome. With a warped score that sounds strikingly similar to the one from the PBS children's TV-series Reading Rainbow (1983-2006), albeit had it been played by a schizophrenic science fiction fan with an unhealthy addiction to synthesizers, Vase de Noces is a hard film to take literally, but a wholly worthwhile one if one is interested in getting lost in a colorless celluloid pandemonium of pig-and-poop based pathology.

THE DITVOORST DOMAINS

Thom Hoffman (1992)

Due to the fact that I am unrepentant cinephile who has watched so many films that I rarely come across cinematic works that I haven't seen that ultimately end up leaving a deep impression on me, it is not often that I discover a film that immediately becomes one of my favorite flicks, so naturally when I do I make sure to hunt down ever single film, no matter how obscure or marginal, associated with the director of such a shockingly good work. Indeed, such is certainly the case with tragic Dutch auteur Adriaan Dittvoorst whose cinematic swansong and magnum opus De Witte waan (1984) aka White Madness I now regard as, at the very least, one of my top ten favorite films of all time even though I only first saw it about a month ago. About three years after the release of his final masterwork, Dittvoorst committed suicide by swallowing some pills and drowning himself in the Scheldt River near his hometown in Bergen op Zoom after decades of struggling with drug addiction, unemployment, cultural pessimism, and the inability to get any of his projected film projects off the ground as a man who originally intended to make 3,000 films during his life but ultimately only managed to realize nine. Despite the fact that his directorial debut Ik kom wat later naar Madra (1965) aka That Way to Madra was one of the sixteen films added to the prestigious Canon of Dutch Cinema (aka 'Canon van de Nederlandse Film') and his work was revered by some of the most important and influential European arthouse filmmakers of his time, including Pier Paolo Pasolini and Jean-Luc Godard, Dittvoorst is still a marginal and mostly unknown figure in his small homeland of the Netherlands, which is demonstrated by the fact that The Cinema of the Low Countries (2004) edited by Ernest Mathijs—one of the very few serious English-language academic books on Dutch cinema—does not even feature one single reference to the filmmaker or his work. Luckily, Dutch actor Thom Hoffman, who was a personal friend of Dittvoorst and played the lead role in White Madness, decided to pay distinguished respect and uncompromising tribute to the criminally neglected filmmaker by making an unusually candid, strikingly poetic, and provocatively insightful, if not somewhat dejecting, arthouse documentary about his life and work. Indeed, part experimental documentary, part neo-Gothic docudrama, and part filmic funeral, Hoffman's De Domeinen Dittvoorst (1992) aka The Dittvoorst Domains is not only a beautiful tribute from one artist to another and an endearing yet 'no bullshit' look at Dittvoorst's lebensmüde existence and totally singular oeuvre, but also a rare film that takes a serious look at post-WWII Dutch cinema history that features highly memorable and refreshingly less than sentimental interviews with various filmmakers and cinematographers, including Jan de Bont, Robby Müller, Wim Verstappen, Pim de la Parra, Rene Daalder, and token Guido Bernardo Bertolucci (who was an early proponent of Dittvoorst's work), among various others. The sometimes pathetic portrait of a man who, in terms of under-recognition during his lifetime, poverty, internal suffering, and self-destructive tendencies, was most certainly the Vincent van Gogh of his era and artistic medium, The Ditvoorst Domains presents Ditvoorst as a somewhat enigmatic and impenetrable phantom-like figure who struggled with his existence until he finally gave up and walked into the sea for eternity.

A child of war that was born in January 23, 1940 to a lower-middleclass Catholic from Bergen op Zoom in the southern part of the Netherlands where people tend to be darker and slightly shorter than people from the northern part of the country, Adriaan Ditvoorst first met tragedy in 1950 when he was still just a relatively young lad after his father was killed in a car accident, with the event affecting him in such a catastrophic way that he felt as if “the world stood still.” For whatever reason, Ditvoorst theorized that his father’s death was really a suicide which he committed to “hurt his mother and to hurt him,” yet as the director’s friend and collaborator Jan de Bont theorizes in The Ditvoorst Domains, “It was a bit weird. I never believed it. Why would a father do that? He had a family, children...All seemed normal when I visited them. I felt his imagination played him parts. He seemed to need pain. Sometimes he invented pain. I didn’t always believe him.” Unquestionably, unrelenting internal pain is the name of the game when it comes to Ditvoorst’s oeuvre as demonstrated by the fact that most of the (anti)hero’s of his films choose death over living a life of indomitable Weltschmerz and perpetual existential crisis. Redheaded dame Pamela Koevoets, who played the leading lady in the director’s debut feature Paranoia (1967) and appeared in most of his other films, lovingly describes Ditvoorst as a handsome “black romanticist” with “green wolf eyes” as if she is in love with him. Of course, any great artist, not matter how poor and pathetic is, at least to some extent, a lady’s man. While Ditvoorst’s filmmaking career would progressively deteriorate as the years slowly passed by, his debut work Ik kom wat later naar Madra aka That Way to Madra temporarily made him a superstar auteur of sorts who was regarded as the best filmmaker in the Netherlands and who was admired by Godard, Bertolucci, Pasolini, and Ivens, among countless others in and outside his country (notably, forgotten American avant-garde auteur Peter Emmanuel Goldman would pay tribute to Ditvoorst by including scenes from Paranoia in his 1969 work Wheel of Ashes).

At the beginning of The Ditvoorst Domains, director Thom Hoffman narrates, “This is a story about my dearest friend: Adriaan Ditvoorst. In October 1987 he committed suicide. I was stupefied. Aristotle said that a solitary man was either a savage or a god. Adriaan lived in seclusion in an attic with the freedom he always sought. While looking for an explanation, I talked to his intimates” and then asks, “Could his suicide have been prevented? How lonely was he when he walked into the waves? What drove him to it? Who was my good friend...Adriaan Ditvoorst?,” thus setting up a poetic objective for his doc. Somehow, I doubt Hoffman received any new insights about his comrade after directing the film, but of course that is part of Ditvoorst's appeal as a mysterious and idiosyncratic fellow whose very being is the thing that artistic legends are made of. Rather strangely considering he was so innately anti-authority, Ditvoorst served in the Dutch army from 1963 to 1965 and during that time he got bored and ultimately found himself wandering into the Amsterdam Film Academy where his life was changed forever. Heavily inspired by Alain Resnais' masterpiece Hiroshima Mon Amour (1959), Ditvoorst felt that he had found the greatest and fullest art form for expressing himself, as he looked at the cinematic medium as a cross between poetry and painting and he did not care if people were able to identify with what he expressed, as a sort of metaphysically anarchistic Über-auteur with a lot of pent up Catholic guilt. Indeed, highly influenced by the then-trendy auteur theory as promoted by the French New Wave, Ditvoorst once wrote regarding his ambitions as a filmmaker, "Filming is settling accounts...Riding yourself out of obstacles...Obsessions begging for solutions...Screaming for a climax. I want to make 3000, three thousand films!," yet he ultimately only made nine films because he absolutely loathed producers and virtually all his films were flops, thus naturally nobody wanted to give him any money. If it were not for certain highly sympathetic film critics and film societies, as well as friends that worked in the film industry, it is highly dubious as to whether or not Ditvoorst would have been able to direct half as many works as he did. Somewhat ironically, Ditvoorst was friends with monetary-motivated Suriname-born Sephardic Jewish writer, director, producer, and quasi-Marcusian crusader Pim de la Parra who collaborated with Wim Verstappen on a series of successful and pseudo-artsy counterculture-tinged exploitation flicks like Blue Movie (1971) and Frank en Eva (1973). Somehow, it is refreshing to hear someone like De la Parra say regarding Ditvoorst, "He had great talent, that cat," as it demonstrates that despite having a much more monetarily successful career than his compatriot, he recognized his failed friend's artistic genius. Also to De la Parra's credit, he was responsible for starting a film journal in the spirit of Cahiers du Cinéma called 'Skoop' that totally revolutionized the way people, especially filmmakers and cinephiles, looked at cinema as it started "a revolt against cinema de papa" that brought Dutch cinema into the modern age. Of course, where De la Parra and Verstappen merely broke sexual taboos with their works, Ditvoorst took things a number of steps further and created audaciously avant-garde works that the masses thought were too dark, disturbing, and shamelessly personal.

As Hoffman narrates regarding Ditvoorst's life in 1970, "Adriaan at the peak of his career. He received a scholarship from Ingmar Bergman. He met the love of his life: Jacqueline. He filmed Camus' THE FALL for TV. A lawyer ends up in the gutter, after failing to stop a suicide." At this point in his career, Ditvoorst had only directed one feature, the 1967 Willem Frederik Hermans adaptation Paranoia, and three shorts. After directing the sleekly assembled and somberly colored Camus adaptation De Val (1970) aka The Fall, the auteur directed the more or less immaculate dark yet humorous phantasmagoric medium-length neo-Gothic absurdist flick De blinde fotograaf (1973) aka The Blind Photographer which, despite being another Hermans adaptation, looks like something that might have inspired David Lynch when he was assembling Eraserhead (1977). As Ditvoorst once wrote, “I despise everything superficial” and in The Blind Photographer he transformed the banal and everyday into the brazenly bizarre and murderously eccentric. After failing in 1973 to realize an ambitious project penned by Polanski’s longtime screenwriter Gérard Brach entitled De Idioten aka The Idiots that was about “two poor devils living since the dawn of time” who argue about whether or not the world is about to end, Ditvoorst twiddled his thumbs for a couple years and eventually decided to make the one artistic compromise of his career by directing the relatively conventional Tim Krabbé adaptation Flanagan (1976)—a revenge-themed gangster flick with the structure of a Greek tragedy—but it was also a major flop that caused the director to fall into a deep depression that his friends say he never fully recovered from. Not unlike the characters featured in Flanagan, Ditvoorst began living a sort off-the-grid outlaw lifestyle that pushed him even further away from mainstream society.

After moving to a secluded attic near Vondelpark in Amsterdam, Ditvoorst began living the loser lifestyle of a perennially unemployed nocturnal hermit libertine by the second half of the 1970s. With the love of his life abandoning him for good and his latest film a major flop, the filmmaker became a self-destructive drug addict and bar-dwelling alcoholic and even served some stints in jail, or as Jan de Bont remarks in the doc, “He was ashamed a creative man like himself had ever been in prison. Adriaan was a conventional person. It was clear to me that it involved a homosexual relationship. He refused to talk about it. Unable to utter a word about this...he left it for others to discover.” While I somehow doubt that the director was ever a “conventional person,” he certainly was not an ordinary fellow by the late-1970s as demonstrated by the fact that he befriended a drug dealer/porn producer named Luc Bijkerk who produced his next feature De mantel der Liefde (1978) aka The Mantle of Love, which is an (anti)religious epic set in contemporary Holland that takes a somewhat Pasolini-ian/Citti-ian approach to ‘adapting’ the Ten Commandments, albeit in an all the more sardonic and sexually depraved fashion (notably, Guido porn maestro Lasse Braun co-produced the film) and with added bonus of a soothing synthesizer-driven original soundtrack by Vangelis of Blade Runner (1982) fame. Probably the most savagely satirical, sacrilegious, and merrily grotesque Dutch film ever made, The Mantle of Love is described by Hoffman as a work where Ditvoorst, “revenged himself with a cheerful comedy” due to his crumbling personal life and commercial failure. Of course, that film was also a flop, but those lucky few that are familiar with the work consider it an unmitigated unhinged masterpiece.

Although directing the aesthetically decadent and somewhat high-camp work Lucifer (1981)—a seemingly impossible-to-find adaptation of Dutch Golden Age playwright Jooſt van den Vondel's 1654 play of the same name that centers around "the unbridled ambition of Lucifer, adept in human failure"—Ditvoorſt was spending moſt of his time lurking at his favorite bar and picking up "common broads" (apparently, his favorite type of women at this point in his life). During the laſt 30 minutes or so of The Ditvoorſt Domains, a series of candid interviews with a couple of the less than savory friends that the filmmaker made during his final years paint a fairly bleak portrait of his worldview at the time, with one notably ſtating, "Adriaan's prophesies were not optimistic. He ſaw all beauty deſtroyed. He feared decay, ſaw it everywhere. Saw himſelf living in a nightmare. He could not be part of it. It meant making compromises. The firſt compromise was participating in life. This he reſused." For his final maſterpiece White Madness, Ditvoorſt went ſo far as to depict heroin (ab)uſe as, to quote Hoffman, "...a ſymbol of freedom. A ſymbol of flying, release from reality. Release from the world, the fuſs, people." Indeed, when the film's painter junky protagonist Lazlo ſhoots junk into his arm, he fantasies about himſelf as an eagle ſorrowing through the ſky. Like the character of his film, Ditvoorſt dreamed of a personal utopia of ſolacing ſelf-impoſed ſolitude and otherworldly aethetics that drown out all the ugliness and decay of the modern world. Notably, White Madness was Ditvoorſt's final deſperate attempt at ſtarting both a personal and artiſtic new beginning and while the film would eventually develop a loyal cult following, it was a complete failure upon its initial release, thus ſealing the filmmaker's already rather forlorn fate as a fellow that always dreamed and talked about ſuicide and finally found the perfect time to carryout his morbid lifelong fantasy. Ditvoorſt rightfully recognized White Madness was his beſt work, ſo for ſuch a uniquely ambitious and truly ſoulful film to receive ſuch an underwhelming reſponse was a fatal blow to his very being and thus he ſpent the final years of life rotting away in complete ſolitude, hanging out with heroin-addled hobos and antiſocial ſkinheads, and preparing to meet his date with the almighty Scheldt. Before killing himſelf, Ditvoorſt viſited his mother who had he not ſeen in about two decades and mailed a ſuicide letter to various friends reading, "When you read this, I will have entrusted my body to the waves. All is ſilence. There is nothing elſe." As The Ditvoorſt Domains reveals, although the filmmaker oftentimes diſcuſſed his fantasies of ſelf-ſlaughter and even confided to Jan de Bont about two decades before he committed the irreparable act that he would like to commit ſuicide by drowning himſelf in the Scheldt, everyone was ſtill quite ſhocked when he decided to make himſelf fiſh food.

Unlike moſt modern Occidental artiſts and filmmakers working today who ſeem to go out their way to prove that they are groveling xenophiles, philo-

Semites, spiritually castrated cultural cuckolds, and/or ethno-masochists, Adriaan Ditvoorst apparently had a strong and unwavering deepseated connection to European kultur, or as the director's friend Arend Holm states in The Ditvoorst Domains regarding the auteur's undying love for his people's culture, "Letting go, means letting yourself go...Believing in anything but the importance of European culture and film was impossible for him." A man who adapted works ranging from a Luciferian play by 17-century Dutch playwright Jooſt van den Vondel to short stories by popular post-WWII novelist Willem Frederik Hermans, Ditvoorst ultimately paid tribute to the greater part of Dutch art history and one could probably argue that it is quite fitting as he was quite possibly last of his kind as a born anarchist that understood the importance of cultural heritage and artistic tradition. In that sense, the title of Ditvoorst's final film could be looked at as having a secondary meaning, for the work certainly bleeds the decadence, senility, and metaphysical rot of the post-WWII Dutch as a truly 'Fin de siècle' work of 'White Madness' that manage to encapsulate and communicate the fatally forlorn feeling of it's seemingly apocalyptic zeitgeist. Incidentally, The Ditvoorst Domains director Thom Hoffman's ex-comrade, filmmaker Theo van Gogh (who apparently ended his friendship with Hoffman after he began starring in crappy mainstream films, or as the actor-turned-documentarian explained, "He called me an S.S. officer with Vaseline up my ass"), appears in Ditvoorst's film as a fiending junky who literally murders for dope. The fact that a respected filmmaker and public figure like van Gogh could be brutally assassinated in his own country by a Dhimmitude-inciting racial alien from a third world shithole who should not be even be in the Netherlands in the first place just goes to show the rapid cultural degeneration of the country in such a short time, for only an ethno-masochistic, defeated, apathetic, and spiritually comatose people would tolerate such culturally suicidal tendencies. As someone who had a lifelong aversion to authority, especially of the spiritually based sort, one can only guess how Ditvoorst would have responded to the Muhammadization of his nihilistically liberal welfare state of a nation had he lived long enough to see it. While various filmmakers in The Ditvoorst Domains theorize that Ditvoorst might have had a more successful life and career had he moved to a more filmmaker-friendly country like France, I cannot fathom the idea of him working anywhere but the Netherlands as even his Camus adaptation is hopelessly Dutch in persuasion. Indeed, Ditvoorst working outside of Holland is as unthinkable as Pasolini working outside of Italy or Fassbinder working outside of Germany. Of course, the irony is that, despite the innate Dutchness of Ditvoorst's work, it also guaranteed he would have a dead-end career in his own homeland, or as Wim Verstappen noted in Hoffman's doc, "If you do something well in Holland, you don't get any credit. Making films in small countries is a lifelong struggle. I have the deepest respect for people who try it. Adriaan feel victim to it." If there ever was a filmmaker that was a kindred spirit of Ian Curtis, it was Ditvoorst and like the Joy Division frontman, he probably would have reacted negatively to achieving commercial success. Of course, the real tragedy is not that Ditvoorst was neglected in his own homeland or even that he killed himself, but the fact that he did not get the opportunity to make more films and fully realize his artistic potential.

COLONY MUTATION

Thomas Berna (1995)

I thought something was afoot when I received a copy of Colony of the Dark (1995) in the post from Apprehensive Films. I had stared at the cover art for what might have been minutes - a drawing obviously from a sketchbook neophyte containing a big-breasted woman getting groped by severed limbs with an eerily Teutonic head licking the side of her face with an expression of utter pain. I perused the back of the box to divulge the plot when I realized I'd heard this before. Earlier on, I had gotten a hold of a copy of a film known as Colony Mutation. When I attempted to back up the film's original title with research I discovered another title! This time they dropped the subtitles and stuck to a simple Colony. Either way, none of these titles can make up for what might be the most irredeemable piece of shit I have ever attempted to sit through in my cinephilic life. I was teased and tickled with the idea of a Super8mm grainy horror film which involved phallic self-dismemberment and copious episodes of seduce & destroy but what I was so ungratefully given is a film so unwatchable that I am sure Flesh Eating Mothers is a tour de force in comparison.

Given that I only ingested a short 40 minutes of this film's running time before I pried the DVD tray open with a fork only to subsequently hurl the disc down the hallway, I can only comment so much on the film without treading into presumptive territory. Jim Matthews is a dolt as a husband and a scientific researcher. For the past several months he has been bedding down with his strong-willed secretary behind his wife's back. This leads to problems when his wife discovers the infidelity from an exaggerative paper-trail. In an outrage, she grabs the nearest unprotected beaker of experimental serum and splashes it in his face. This leads to terrifying bodily mutations as Jim discovers an unquenchable hunger within him, one that can only be suppressed with raw meat and the soft, tender flesh of whores. I'm not really a nit-picker in regards to horror films anchored in scientific illiteracy. I can handle all the hotel affairs or implausibility that the next guy can. Why, though, would someone waste premium, superior Super 8mm film stock on a tale that doesn't even tell itself? Since I never finished the film I can't rightly say. I don't even blame the lack of oozing creature effects, either. No, my infernal hatred stems from elsewhere, in the script, maybe. The characters find themselves in situations so problematic that it takes a hardened patience and a lack of anything better to do than watch this. For example, a scene that really chafes me is when Jim uses his credit card to get a hotel room with his secretary and then his wife receives the credit card bill later the same night. I could really go on and on but I will not put any more effort into writing about this disaster as I did watch it.

Add the fact that Jim's wife has a mustache that can be faintly outlined with the grainy footage and you have yourself another reason as to avoid this film.

COLONY MUTATION

I find that is already too easy to ignore. You might not have heard of it for a reason. The only scene of merit I can find myself to comment on without forced persuasion [gun to my head] is the iconic scene of scorned fellatio - everyone's favorite. In a rage over his wife's serum transmogrifying his body into a living, breathing Mr. Potato Head, Jim gives her a good beating and then while she's crying on the floor, unzips his pants and while she sits there weeping, grabs her head and performs irrumatio. Before his member devours the inside of her face, that is. This scene was a glimmer of hope for me. Perhaps Colony [Mutation] [of the Dark] could have been something of note, even in idle conversation but alas, I found myself forgetting about the film as soon as it begun. I then sat in silence bordering awe at the complete disregard for vision and the general anti-aesthetic. I wouldn't recommend Colony Mutation to any soul living. Hands down, the worst film I've seen since in the past 3 years.

WUNDKANAL

Thomas Harlan (1984)

If any filmmaker dedicated his life and art to the seemingly pathetically paternally pathological by belittling his father in oblivion and acting as the repellent archetype of the self-loathing post-WWII kraut, it is Thomas Harlan; the rather regretful son of German auteur Veit Harlan, who is best known for his National Socialist melodramas Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süss and Opfergang (1944). As for his son Thomas, if he is remembered for anything, at least as far as cinema history is concerned, it is his bewilderingly incriminating Baader-Meinhof Group-deifying quasi-docudrama work Wundkanal (1984) aka Gun Wound aka Wound Passage that involved the decidedly dishonest and arguably demented director into conning an ex-SS officer named Alfred Filbert – who like Veit Harlan was charged with war crimes – to go under interrogation under patently false pretenses about his involvement with the death of around 11,000 Jews in Eastern Europe. As a crew member for Wundkanal explained in the documentary Our Nazi (1984), he deeply felt that Thomas Harlan and the production crew were, "doing really monstrous things and he has no idea; he doesn't know what the purpose of this movie is. He feels he has a truth to tell and we won't let him," in regard to how Dr. Filbert was treated during the direction of the "war criminal-exploitation" film. Of course, as it became quite clear while watching the film, Wundkanal was made as a sort of warped pretext for Thomas Harlan to channel his lifelong loathing of his father Veit, who had already been dead about two decades upon the release of the film. Although Veit Harlan was acquitted of "crimes against humanity" for his role in directing the notorious Nazi propaganda melodrama Jud Süß, it seems that son Harlan was not happy with the outcome so he finds his father guilty by proxy via Dr. Filbert in his venom-laced work of sicko son celluloid patricide Wundkanal. Although Thomas Harlan had the rare honor of meeting Adolf Hitler when he was 8-years-old and would, unlike most Germans of his time immediately following the absolute devastation of his Heimat during the Second World War, grew up relatively comfortably due to his father's success as a filmmaker, the fortunate son would spend the rest of most of his adult years dwelling on his contempt for his father and Fatherland's legacy. One can only guess where this radical resentment of the patriarch began, but it probably starts with the fact that Thomas' father divorced his actress mother Hilde Körber due to political reasons relating to his dedication to National Socialism and married Swedish actress Kristina Söderbaum – the buxom blonde star of Opfergang (1944) and Kolberg (1944) – not long thereafter. Not unsurprisingly, Thomas was not the only one to prove that hatred and biological resentment ran deep in the Harlan family as his sister Susanne Körber converted to Judaism and married a holocaust survivor and would inevitably kill herself in 1989. Needless to say, I doubt brother Thomas' film Wundkanal did much to

Long before directing Wundkanal and physically degenerating into what would resemble a bitter old obese lesbian, Thomas Harlan began his highly personal campaign of obscenely obsessed 'intellectual Nazi hunting,' which quite possibly began with a symbolic trip to Israel with Klaus Kinski of all people in 1952. Although Thomas was given the opportunity to collaborate with his father on a screenplay for the the cinematic work Verrat an Deutschland (1955) aka Betrayal to Germany – a surprisingly symbolically titled work that would make for a great biography title for the third-rate arthouse director's contribution to Teutonic cultural history – which Viet Harlan also directed, the two battled over the content of the script and the son's contributions to the written work were distorted to some degree, thereupon probably putting the final nail in the coffin for their ill-fated father-son relationship. By 1959 hysterical Harlan was being sued left and right by various ex-Nazi-turned-West-German-politicians for libel and by 1960 had moved to Poland to do fanatical research on concentration camps and as a feverish and forbidding far-left activist ultimately collected enough information on undetected war crimes to help bring about over 2,000 criminal proceedings against fellow Germans, but proving his commitment to personally heedless, needless, and senseless self-destruction, the self-stylized would-be-revolutionary was put under house arrest for one year for breaching Polish state secrets and would also be denied a German passport for ten years and was not allowed to enter the Federal Republic of Germany for using classified German interrogation records in Polack publications. A decade after suddenly giving up his research on the holocaust, Harlan displayed his ever so erratic and all-consuming ethno-masochism by traveling to the Amerikkkas and hooking up with a number of Marxist and far-left terrorist groups, including joining the Chilean resistance movement against anti-Castro Chilean president Augusto Pinochet, but it would ultimately be Wundkanal that would prove to be the 'high' point in his artistic career and the root to the failed artists' perverse paternal-based pathologies. As explained by American film professor Anton Kaes in his left-leaning book From Hitler to Heimat: The Return of History as Film (1989) in regard to the demented 'daddy-deprecating' dialectic of Wundkanal: "the more we become aware of the hatred and vindictiveness of the son, the more we pity the father; his vulnerability engages our interest more than the moral rigor of the son, whose violent revenge scenario proves ultimately to be self-destructive."

To get the whole picture in regard to the production of and intent behind Wundkanal, one must watch the companion documentary Notre Nazi (1984) aka Our Nazi directed by American Jewish documentarian Robert Kramer; a man who despite being of the Judaic faith, shows more sensitivity and compassion to the elderly old Jew-killer than the seething sadomasochistic son-of-a-Nazi who directed it. Aside from physically and emotionally torturing ex-Nazi

Dr. Alfred Filbert, exquisite ethno-masochist Thomas Harlan explains to an orthodox Jew on the film set in a groveling manner regarding the SS man while in a fit of hysterical hatred that: "this movie has been made to burn into the earth and in the heavens the fragment of truth that we can find inside this barbarian, who remained a barbarian. You're not facing a human being. You see the earthly remains of a man who no longer exists, and who never existed as a man." Naturally, Thomas Harlan, no doubt a hopelessly naïve humanist whose discordant moral compass is dictated by a victim-based mentality, goes on to describe Dr. Filbert as one of the worst humans in history to earn kudos points from the seemingly apathetic Hebrew, but unlike the much more objectively assembled work Our Nazi, one does not get a true sense as to what extent the father-hating would go to such cowardly and pathetic extremes while watching the slickly assembled yet aesthetically vapid minimalistic work Wundkanal; an unbelievably wicked work of exploitation of the elderly and self-glorifying masturbation of the worst phony leftist kind where the deranged director even taunting that the old man commit suicide via asphyxiation with a plastic bag supplied to him (which, he in fact wraps around his head), on top of having the man put a handgun at the back of his head self-execution style (apparently, many of Filbert's victims died under dubious suicides). Such torture of old terminally ill war criminals, both in film and real-life, has become quite trendy as of recently as displayed by Israel's decades long hounding of Ukrainian-American John Demjanjuk (a man who was deported to Israel in 1986 and falsely found guilty and sentenced to death there in 1988, but was eventually released due to mistaken identity), among countless other naughty 'no spring' Nazis, who was wheelchair bound and on his deathbed when he died while facing dubious charges based off Soviet falsified evidence, as well as the would-be-quirky-and-cute Hollywood cryptic-holocaust-propaganda drama This Must Be the Place (2011) directed by Paolo Sorrentino where a seemingly autistic and gender confused ex-rock star modeled after Robert Smith of the Cure named Cheyenne (played by far-left mischling Judaic Sean Penn; a master of playing filmic retards and psychopaths) forces an elderly former SS Officer to strip naked and run in the snow in a scene not unlike the sort you find in Steven Spielberg's showy shoah epic Schindler's List (1993), all because the man caused the half-retard rocker's father – an apparently miserly and hateful man who left his son a socially inept bastard – to inadvertently piss his pants while in a concentration camp.

Of course, if Thomas Harlan can be credited for any 'cinematic innovation,' it is utilizing the medium of film as a morally dubious method for exploiting the elderly in a precarious manner so as to dastardly denigrate one's father as translucently depicted in Wundkanal; a film that proves artistic talent is not always inherited by sons. While Veit Harlan's films featured vivid Technicolor, themes of love and sacrifice, an appreciation for beauty, nature, and kultur, and love for life, his son Thomas made visually unprepossessing, aesthetically and thematically mechanical, and ultimately lifeless films not unlike contemporary Hollywood action and sci-fi flicks with contrived moralizing and megalomaniacal preaching that would probably only appeal to the singularly and unsoundly self-indulgent filmmaker himself. Interestingly, scenes from Veit Harlan's films featuring the director's wife Kristina Söderbaum (the woman that replaced Thomas' mother) are featured in Wundkanal and are reminisced on fondly and nostalgically by the old SS officer, thereupon linking Thomas Harlan's with the propagation of genocide as tools for entertaining and providing therapy Nazi facing the stresses of war. At one point in Wundkanal, the old Nazi cries when recollecting the dubious death of his brother in a Buchenwald concentration camp and the complete and utter incineration of his sister-in-law in an allied firebombing campaign, which Thomas Harlan vehemently concludes is a totally disingenuous display of emotions and that the elderly man was merely weeping for himself due to the fact he didn't get a promotion while in the SS. I found this scene to be especially relevant as Harlan's assumptions seem to be a symbolic projection of his own 'artistic' career and leftist crusade as a man who claimed to be exposing evil Nazis and bringing them to justice and fighting the good fight for the Jews and other disenfranchised folks, when in reality it is quite apparent that he had ulterior motives and that his guiding motivation was seeking revenge against his infamous/famous father who, on top of divorcing his mother, brought irrevocable shame to his family name due to Germany's defeat in the Second World War.

In Europe, there is a saying that Germans will never forgive the Jews for what they, the Germans, did to them. Had Germany won the war and Veit Harlan retained his respectability as one of Germany's greatest filmmaker's during that period, it is highly doubtful that Thomas Harlan would have turned out the way he did, just as it is doubtful that a peculiar national phenomenon like the Red Army Faction – a group of morbidly ethno-masochistic 'rock star' terrorists who hated their fathers' generation for being Nazis and thus rebelled via mostly directionless and meaningless murder and mayhem – would have ever been spawned, as such individuals are undoubtedly akin to symbolic spiritual syphilis of a defeated nation with a severely suicidal collective unconscious. Despite the physical and emotional torment he faced at the hands of the innately manipulative, manic, and malicious Thomas Harlan via Wundkanal, Dr. Filbert would apparently go on to state that his "experience with the movies had been the greatest moment of his life," which is an outcome that the director was surely not hoping for, thereupon making the ex-Nazi seem like a more rational, warm-hearted, and reasonable person than the perturbed person who shamelessly tried to 'expose' him under dubious conditions of contempt. Although Dr. Filbert spent 18 years in prison for his alleged war crimes before being released due to poor health and working on Wundkanal shortly thereafter, his conscious was certainly more clear than Thomas Harlan; a man whose own family members concluded he wasted his whole life dwelling on his overwhelming malice for his father as depicted in the documentary Harlan: In the Shadow of Jew Süss (2008) directed by Felix Moeller. Of course, I guess it should not be that big of a surprise Thomas Harlan led the loser life he did as he was one of the few personal friends of the infamously crazy actor Klaus Kinski; a German national of Polish descent who was ambivalent towards his homeland after making the conscious decision to desert his soldierly duties in the German Wehrmacht, whereupon he was subsequently caught, court-martialed, and sentenced to death, but eventually escaped and intentionally had himself captured by the British and remained a POW for the rest of the Second World War. It is often said that the Jews were the greatest victims of World War II, but one only has to watch Wundkanal and countless other German films to see that it was probably the Fatherland's sons that have suffered the most, especially in regard to the soul. After all, I cannot remember the last time I saw a film directed by a Jewish filmmaker depicting the slaughter of millions of white Russian Christians by Jewish bolshevik hangmen, nor an Israeli auteur directing a work about the liquidation of Palestinian children by IDF men.

A BIG GREY-BLUE BIRD
A BIG GREY-BLUE BIRD

Thomas Schamoni (1971)

With my recent re-watching of Jerzy Skolimowski's lost post-counterculture masterpiece Deep End (1970) featuring music by krautrockers Can, I decided it was about time that I got around to seeing the similarly wrongfully forgotten West German-Italian coproduction Ein großer graublauer Vogel (1971) aka A Big Grey-Blue Bird aka Un grosso uccello grigio azzurro aka Bottom co-written and directed by Thomas Schamoni (Charly May aka Karl May in Spain, Der Eisberg der Vorsehung) who, although an important and pioneering member of New German Cinema that helped fund the filmmaker-led film distributor Filmverlag der Autoren—a company known for producing some of the most important works of its era, including Werner Herzog's Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972), Rainer Werner Fassbinder's The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), and the omnibus film Germany in Autumn (1978)—is all but forgotten today. Although a film about two rival gangs, one hippie and pacifistic and the other 'fascistic' and murderous, that fight each other while they both attempt to find five pieces of an earth-shattering scientific discovery held by five reclusive elderly scientists, Schamoni's A Big Grey-Blue Bird is also nothing short of a culturally and cinematically revolutionary act of the rather inexplicable sort. A metacinematic avant-garde psychedelic anti-sci-fi-political-thriller of the jet-set/counterculture sort partly inspired by French symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud's poem "Bottom" featured in the libertine wordsmith's uncompleted collection Illuminations (1886) and co-penned by underrated German auteur Uwe Brandner (I Love You, I Kill You aka Ich liebe dich, ich töte dich, 50/50), writer/director Hans Noever (of the popular German TV series Tatort (1989-2002)), and screenwriter Max Zihlmann (Detektive, Rote Sonne aka Red Sun) that stars Teutonic bad boy cult auteur Klaus Lemke (Negresco - Eine tödliche Affäre, Rocker) in the lead role as a prophetic, if not badly burnt out, beatnik poet, Schamoni's absurdly offbeat flick is not only one of the best kept secrets of its era (although a financial failure, the film earned various awards at the 1970 German Film Awards, including Schamoni for "Best New Direction" and cinematographer Dietrich Lohmann for "Best Cinematography"), but it is also a virtual "who's who" of pre-Fassbinder kraut cinema. Starting production after auteur Schamoni—a seemingly eccentric mensch born into a virtual filmmaking dynasty of ancient Italian extraction whose father Viktor Schamoni was a film critic/filmmaker who made at least one successful film during the Third Reich and whose two brothers, Peter Schamoni (Montana Trap aka Potato Fritz, Frühlingssinfonie aka Spring Symphony) and Ulrich Schamoni (It aka Es, Chapeau claqué) were important filmmakers in their own right—just finished producing then-unknown German New Cinema alpha-auteur Fassbinder's first feature Liebe ist kälter als der Tod (1969) Love is Colder Than Death, A Big Grey-

Blue Bird offers an intriguing look into the drug-induced delusion of grandeur that young filmmakers suffered at the time, as a work about a commune-based film crew of socio-politically idealistic, anti-authoritarian counterculture types that believe they can build a 'utopia' upon learning about a group of Nazi era scientists who proposed a theory that would give them the power to manipulate the space-time continuum, but must wage a psychological war against ostensible friends and a group of super blonde Aryan and sleazy Guido gangster types while attempting to hunt down the reclusive scientists, who have intentionally had their memories erased to forget their own scientific formula but can be reminded of it if they hear the words of the poem "Ein großer, graublauer Vogel," hence the title of the film.

A sort of kraut sci-fi-thriller counterpart to Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg's counterculture masterpiece Performance (1970) featuring a score and sound landscape by krautrockers Can, exceedingly erratic Burroughs-esque 'cut-up technique' style editing, an innately non-linear multi-media 'film-within-a-film' structure that juggles realist documentary-like footage with highly stylized neo-romantic imagery and tableaux, and a relatively fresh look at the obscenely outmoded zeitgeist it depicts, A Big Grey-Blue Bird also offers a hint of where German Cinema might have headed had the work been shown to mainstream viewers and had the plans of the 1962 Oberhausen Manifesto (of which, Schamoni's brother Peter was one of the 26 filmmakers that signed) been fully realized, as an absurdly nuanced, multilayered, and subtextual work that attempts many things at once that more or less manage to create "a new language of film." Indeed, along with Brandner's I Love You, I Kill You (1971), Fassbinder's Welt am Draht (1973) aka World on a Wire and Vojtech Jasný's Wir (1981), Ulli Lommel and Peter Moland's Haytabo (1971), and Wolf Gremm's Kamikaze 89 (1982), Schamoni's work demonstrates how the Teutons were assembling more deranging and paranoia-inducing celluloid science fiction dimensions than The Matrix (1999) at a time when Andy Wachowski and his tranny brother were still playing with Barbies and jerking off to comic books.

If A Big Grey-Blue Bird features anything resembling a central protagonist, it is super suave poet Tom-X (German auteur Klaus Lemke), who seems to suffer narcolepsy and/or smokes too much ganja as he passes out at the most random times, including after his apartment is destroyed by a group of gangster goons. Right before being snatched up by said gangster goons, Tom-X manages to escape from the apartment via the balcony with the help of his documentary filmmaker comrades which include lanky longhaired cinematographer Knokke (played by real-life cameraman/director Bernd Fiedler, who shot various films for 'New Munich Group' filmmakers like Lemke and Rudolf Thome) and Bill (played by cult actor Marquard Böhm of Roland Klick's 1970 'acid western' Deadlock and Fassbinder's 1971 hit Beware of a Holy Whore). Tom-X has teamed up with the film crew in his search to find four of the five surviving German and Italian Axis era scientists who disappeared and erased their identities and memories after the Second World War after solving the 'Weltformel' (aka 'Theory of Everything' aka ToE), which enabled them to manipulate the space-time continuum because they did not want the formula to get into the wrong hands. Tom-X and his comrades managed to track down one of the scientists, 'Belotti' aka Dr. Scheinfeldt (Walter Ladengast of Herzog's The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974) and Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979)), and interview him for a documentary, but he committed 'suicide' shortly thereafter. Tom-X and his crew are also hooked up with a goofy Guido journalist named G.O. Gio (Thomas Braut, who dubbed the voice of antihero Steiner in the German-language dubbed version of Sam Peckinpah's classic 1977 WW2 flick The Cross of Iron), who has placed the footage of Belotti in a vault in a Swiss bank for safe-keeping. After declaring, "It's a game of chess. Either we go below the ground or into the air," Tom-X, his girlfriend Luba (Austrian model Sylvie Winter of Lemke's Sylvie (1973) and Paul (1974)), Knokke, Bill, and Gio get on a helicopter flown by a bleached blond beast of a gangster named Lunette (veteran German actor Rolf Becker of Peter Zadek's I'm an Elephant, Madame (1969) and Uwe Brandner's 1971 anti-Heimat sci-fi flick I Love You, I Kill You) and fly to an ancient scenic villa in Switzerland that Belotti bequeathed to his niece Diana (Serbian actress Olivera Katarina of Michael Armstrong's Mark of the Devil (1970) and Konrad Wolf's 1971 DEFA Goya biopic Goya or the Hard Way to Enlightenment) to meet up with a shady scientist named Morelli (Italian actor Umberto Orsini of Visconti's The Damned (1969) and Ludwig (1972)) and a second team made up of dubious gangsters that are also looking to find the four surviving scientists. Of course, as Tom-X and his comrades soon find out, the other group is not looking to play nice and are willing to kill anyone who gets in their way in their campaign to find the scientists.

Unbeknownst to Tom-X and the filmmakers, scientist Morelli and Lunette's gang work for an evil elderly wheelchair-bound cripple named Cinque (Swiss actor Lukas Ammann of Adrian Hoven's horrendous Mark of the Devil Part II (1973) and Tatort), who will do anything to find the scientists, solve the poem, and thus have the formula to have omnipotence over space and time. To earn Tom-X's trust, fairly conservative-looking fellow Morelli—the kind of guy that hippie types would suspect of being a narc—begins smoking pot and engaging in orgies with him, Luba, and Diana. Despite incessantly pestering him about what he knows about Belotti and the poem, Tom-X will not tell Morelli anything aside from pseudo-esoteric hippie jibberish. Meanwhile, Knokke and Bill take advantage of the hedonistic luxuries of the villa engaging in fine dining and drinking expensive wine under the moonlight. When Gio leaves rather dubiously after explaining that he has to fly to Munich to continue his research, Tom-X and his men begin suspecting that the gangsters have unsavory motives, so Knokke attempts to escape but the criminal thugs soon catch him. After imprisoning Knokke, Lunette tries to bribe the cinematographer into joining the gang and working for them as a cameraman, but like a true hippie, he rejects the offer and states, "I only work in public, and for the public." Since Knokke refuses to collaborate, Lunette has his henchmen Herbert (Italian actor Mario Novelli of various Fernando Di Leo flicks) and O'Brian (Sigi Graue of Baal (1970) and Fassbinder's The Niklashausen Journey (1970)) kill the cinematographer, who films the gangsters shooting at him before he is shot off a cliff. While Knokke is the first to die, he certainly will not be the last.

In a major plot twist, head gangster Cinque has Tom-X brought to him and reveals to the poet that he is one of the four surviving scientists and he wants to know if Belotti revealed to him the missing word(s) from the poem. Meanwhile, Gio also discovers that Cinque is one of the scientists (or as Gio states, "one of the five wise men") and makes a deal with Lunette to betray his master and go public with their discoveries. After his concubine Luba manages to bribe Herbert, Tom-X manages to escape from the old Nazi scientist turned gangster's home and the two meet up with Bill, Gio, Morelli, and Diana to hold a press conference regarding Belotti's mysterious death and Cinque's true identity. Of course, Cinque sends his men to the press conference and when Bill begins to reveal the truth, one of the mob shoots him in the gut while he is on stage, thus fatally wounding him. In an intentional satire of what hippies and far-left revolutionaries would assume a fascist might say, one of the gangsters declares, "Resistance is futile. All exits are blocked," and then demands that all the journalists and members of the press get on stage with the threat that they will be shot if they attempt to leave. As it turns out, Lunette has betrayed Tom-X and has him and Morelli kidnapped and driven to an ancient mountainside castle by Herbert and O'Brian. Cinque has his three elderly scientist comrades imprisoned at the castle and he expects Tom-X to be their "fifth man" and "Belotti's heir." Indeed, Tom-X knows the single word from the poem that will reactivate the scientist's memory so that they can remember the formula. When Tom-X and Morelli arrive at the castle, the former puts a gun to Cinque's head while Herbert and O'Brian describe the "great stuff" (aka weed) that the poet had given to them a couple days before. After Morelli puts a bullet into Cinque's brain, O'Brian, who was bought by the other side, attacks his comrade Herbert. While Tom-X, Morelli, and O'Brian manage to escape in a convertible while being chased by an army jeep full of gangsters and subsequently hook up with Diana and Gio, Lunette soon arrives with a machine gun via helicopter and exterminates every single damn person. Indeed, in the end, ruthless gangster killer and seeming philistine Lunette proves to be the "master of the game" and "deus ex machine." After digging through the back pocket of Tom-X's corpse, Lunette finds the complete poem and laughs maniacally upon learning that the missing word is "aqua." Of course, one can only assume what lunatic Lunette will do with the formula to mastering the space-time continuum. Indeed, for better or worse, one cannot watch A Big Grey-Blue Bird without the feeling they have been brutally attacked by a semi-cryptic metaphysical force that leaves no physical scars.

While indubitably somewhat convoluted, overly ambitious, and plagued by unintentionally goofy characters with obscenely outmoded wardrobes and retro-grade hairdos, A Big Grey-Blue Bird is certainly a masterful cinematic work in its own right as a splendidly self-indulgent dream project that simultaneously attempts to say everything it can say about post-WWII German cinema, kultur, and politics in a meager 90 minutes or so, thus making it all the more tragic that auteur Thomas Schamoni would never again get the opportunity to direct another feature-length film and would be forced to work for the rest of his career in the purgatory-like realm of television. In fact, the commercial failure of the film was largely responsible for influencing Schamoni to co-found the filmmaker-owned film distributor Filmverlag der Autoren so that auteur film directors would have the opportunity to have complete artistic control over their own work. Indeed, Schamoni even attacks the West German film production system in a seemingly insignificant but rather notable scene in the film where the gangsters steal cinematographer Knokke's Arriflex 16mm camera and taunt him by pointing the gun at him just before they kill him in an allegorical scenario representing the robbery of artistic freedom from the artist. In another notable scene, one of the gangster goons drives a small camera into a scientist's throat as if it is a gun. As Tom-X remarks at the beginning of the film, he and his comrades carry cameras while others carry guns, thus reflecting Schamoni's superlatively serious perspective on the art of cinema as a weapon.

Although appreciating the film and the music and sound editing he contributed to the work, Can member Irmin Schmidt found A Big Grey-Blue Bird to be somewhat impenetrable, or as he stated in an interview with Screenslate regarding the flick, "...although this film was not such a big success because it's much too crazy, and even understanding German, you can't follow the story. It's quite confusing. But it is in a way a very nice and hippie-esque version of Germany at that time. It's not that dark, like most of Fassbinder's work. It's pretty strange and crazy." More than just a beatnik meditation on late-1960s/early-1970s West Germany, Schamoni's flick is a work that follows in a long Teutonic tradition of romanticism, which Schmidt noted when he remarked regarding the Can song "She Brings the Rain" that he contributed to the film, "It's a very romantic song, and I think the film is actually very romantic. It's in the German 19th century Romantic tradition." A sort of culmination of everything Schamoni's comrades of the so-called 'New Munich Group' like Rudolf Thome, Eckhart Schmidt, Max Zihlmann, and Peter Nestler accomplished in the 1960s with their films (indeed, it is no coincidence that the greatest and most rebellious of these directors, Klaus Lemke, plays the lead character in the film) that somewhat absurdly attempted to make avant-gardism palatable for the masses (Schamoni attempted to blame the film's commercial failure on Germany's production system, but there is no way such an untamed flick could appeal to the average filmgoer), A Big Grey-Blue Bird is certainly ripe for discovery by any serious cinephile as a work that makes the genre-bending and cinematic vocabulary of Jean-Luc Godard seem rather tame and hopelessly pedantic by comparison. Certainly, the work is a filmic fore-bearer to Fassbinder's dystopian science fiction epic Welt am Draht aka World on a Wire in terms of style, spirit, and message, but also has the grand distinction of being probably the only counterculture-themed flick I have ever seen that actually makes the late-1960s/early-1970s actually seem 'cool.' After all, it is not often that you get to see a group of fashion savvy dope-addled hippies attempting to hunt-down ex-Nazi scientists and coerce a bunch of murderous gangsters into smoking dope and engaging in foursomes.

FIRECRACKER

Thomas Schlamme (1989)

True American 'folk films' are hard to come by, especially campy gay-themed ones set in small town Kansas, so I was quite intrigued when I discovered Midwestern auteur Steve Balderson's intensely idiosyncratic and vaguely Hitchcockian psycho-thriller Firecracker (2005); a keenly colorful slice of ridiculous incest-ridden celluloid American pie shot on succulent Super 35mm film stock that – whether intentional or not (judging by the director's debut 1998 feature Pep Squad, I have to assume the former) – made me laugh for all the wrong reasons. Featuring both mainstream feline-like scream queen Karen Black (Family Plot, House of 1000 Corpses) and eccentric experimental musician Mike Patton (of the proto-wigger metal group Faith No More) starring in dual roles, Firecracker is the sort of strikingly quirky (and not in the mundane 'mumblecore' sort of way) cinematic work that most viewers will either love or hate, but surely never forget, like Pleasantville (1998) on cock-sucking crack meets Tod Browning's Freaks (1932) and David Lynch's Twin Peaks as directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder's dimwitted yet delightful American mongrel cousin. Featuring a divinely deranged dichotomy between the black-and-white banality of small town Christian American and the colorful yet equally contrived world of a freak-inhabited carnival, Firecracker is an aggressively anachronistic work that reminds the viewer that some perversions are perennial, especially those bred in brotherly blood. Watching Wamego: Making Movies Anywhere (2004) – a 'making of' documentary on Firecracker – one would never assume the film that the Balderson family (Steve's father co-produced the film and his sister stars in it) discusses their intrinsic involvement in via candid yet characterless interviews is the same one praised by none other than bloated film critic Roger Ebert as "original and peculiar" and "haunted," especially when one considers the subversive and jovially brutal incest scenarios and overall grotesque nature of the film, not to mention the very real human freaks, absurdist allusions to genital mutilation, and overall campy carnivalesque character that pleasantly plagues the picture. Quite honestly, I found the documentary Wamego to be hopelessly inane, uninspiring and a virtual unintentional parody of the American Midwest featuring sentimental local yokels who seem to have no clue as to what sort of film they are working on, thus making youthful auteur Steve Balderson seem like some sort of master manipulator of family and friends. Of course, to be honest, Firecracker is not exactly the most palatable of motion pictures, at least as far as the masses are concerned, not least of all due to its hyper-homo-ization of the barely cinematically mentioned American Midwest, interestingly inclusion of Mike Patton as a barbarous brother-buggering blond beast, and carnally campy cotton candy colors. Described as a "Steve Balderson Tragedy" (as opposed to a mere Greek Tragedy or a Shakespearean Tragedy), Firecracker reminds one why growing up a sexual pervert (Steve Balderson is, indeed, as queer as a two dollar bill) in Kansas might have downright deleterious effects for an individual. After all, just ask the BTK killer.

Firecracker opens with a black-and-white cinematic cliffhanger in a secluded suburban neighborhood in small town Wamego, Kansas. Something seemingly unsavory and smelly (at least judging by a female police investigator's nose-grabbing reaction) is buried in a shabby tool shed in rural Midwestern suburbia, but one will have to wait until the mystifying and hyper-melodramatic conclusion of Firecracker to find out what and why. The film centers on two rather emotionally ravaged and culturally withered realms of curious American quaintness that irrevocably collide; one being black-and-white, drab, decayed and depressing and the other being charismatically colorful, freakishly populated yet featuring equally dark secrets under the superficial surface. Mentally perturbed protagonist Jimmy (Jak Kendall) – a super sensitive fairy of a fellow from a superlatively sad family – acts as a misguided guide between both worlds. The youngest son of a deteriorating Christian family in a blasé b/w world of quasi-medieval moralizing, Jimmy becomes a fiercely feeble yet mostly gregarious guardian angel of sorts for his melancholy mommy Eleanor (Karen Black), but he is no match for his menacing, malicious, and ultra-masculine elder brother David (Mike Patton); a brutal barbarian of sorts who never misses a chance to belittle (and even bugger) his infantile baby bro. With the father of the family in a determinedly deteriorated and innately impotent state of virtual mental and physical immobility, David acts as the uniquely unkind king of the emotionally decrepit household. David is completely and utterly repulsed by little Jimmy's delusional dream of making a living with his "sissy-boy piano recitals" and will stop at nothing to 'make a man' out of the tiny twink of an obscenely gay, pansy boi. Since it is the Fourth of July, the joyous melodies of the carnival have come to the quiet Kansas town and Jimmy is quite excited, even if his deranged blood brother teases him about his new seasonal infatuation. The highlight of the carnal carnival is a "French singer" and an "oddity of nature" named Sandra (also played by Karen Black, if not in a more lively and lecherous manner), who remembers gentle Jimbo from summer's past. Unbeknownst to Jimmy, his big brother David banged and impregnated saucy Sandra the summer before, which infuriated sexually sterile, whip-cracking circus owner Frank (also played by Patton as another nefarious prick) – a malicious megalomaniac with a peculiar yet potent penchant for propagating misery around his masquerade microcosm – henceforth resulting in the absolute abortion of the festival-spawned fetus, as well as the singer's sense of sensual pleasure. After Jimmy attempts to save virtual slave Sandra from bodacious brother David's dastardly advances, he is penetrated like a common prison punk by his bum-happy blood brother. Clearly anally and emotionally despoiled, Jimmy is soon comforted by Sandra – a strong sexual slave if there ever was one – who acts as a strong surrogate mother of sorts for the sad sod.

FIRECRACKER

While mentally set on literally running away with the circus as a carny piano performer, Jimmy is ultimately destined to save his family and himself from his macho maniac of a brother while Sandra faces a similar fate with fuckface Frank; a virtual spiritual son of Frank Booth à la Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986). Forget the celluloid cult item Carny (1980) starring Jodie Foster, Firecracker is the real phantasmagoric murder-mystery deal.

Featuring triad-titty temptresses, decisively deformed dainty divas, pussy-pushing and purring human pussycats, terribly tattooed reptile-men in the shifty spirit of the Biblical Judas, jerk-off giants with grisly goatees, and other miscellaneous humanoid miscreations and genetic aberrations, Firecracker certainly contains a curious celluloid circus of sorts, but the most malformed of men in the film are those with severely spiteful and swinish souls; both of whom being played by Mike Patton. Of course, I would be lying if I did not admit that I found perdurable pansy protagonist Jimmy to be a most ridiculously repellent and intrinsically irritating character as a capaciously cowardly emotional cripple whose lack of courage is only rivaled by his compulsive crying campaigns and sorry, sniveling oversensitivity, thereupon making Firecracker one of a handful of films where I was able to enjoy a film in spite of my hatred for the hysterical homo 'hero.' A chromatic cinematic work of wildly whimsical mid-camp Midwestern melodrama of the freakishly sodbufter, twister-fodder völkisch persuasion, Firecracker is an extraordinary eccentric explosion of aesthetic ingredients not out of touch with seemingly untouchable cinematic works like Werner Schroeter's Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran and Daniel Schmid's La Paloma (1974), if not to a less cultivated and less serious and distinctly American Midwestern degree. In short, I don't think it would be a senseless stretch to describe Firecracker as a minor masterpiece of kaleidoscopic killer colors that gets to the very 'heart' of middle America and molests, mutilates, mangles, and ultimately rips it apart in a manner that the hostile racial aliens of Hollywood never could. As a certain famous Kansas farm-girl character played by a Midwestern-born, barbiturate-addicted 'camp icon' once so eloquently stated in one of the first films I ever saw: "There is no place like home."

CABIN FEVER 2: SPRING FEVER

Ti West (2009)

On a recommendation, from my mom of all people, I put aside the negative hype and decided to check out Cabin Fever 2: Spring Fever, the sequel to Eli Roth's masterful debut, helmed but disavowed by indie-horror darling Ti West (House of the Devil, The Innkeepers). While I've only recently been compelled to investigate what precisely went wrong with the production, from the word go West seemed an odd choice to turn out a sequel to Cabin Fever. Cabin Fever played as a particularly well-done homage to the grindhouse films of old, mixing in humor at appropriate intervals and featuring a fairly strong cast, the best being Soiled Sinema posterboy Giuseppe Andrews as the horndog, party hearty Officer Winston. Evil Dead setting, Cronenbergian body horror, soundtrack featuring re-recordings of David Hess' songs from Last House on the Left, all served up with Roth's expert touch; Tarantino with far more subtlety and less obnoxious dialogue wouldn't be far off. Ti West on the other hand couldn't be further from the fanboy former Gorezone-subscriber. At his best (House of the Devil, The Innkeepers), West works with the kind of restraint that drives most teenage death metal fans up the wall, using a slow, slow burn effect that unnerves subtly. He still manages to pay homage to influences (note the aesthetic in the eighties-set House of the Devil), but stylistically, there couldn't be someone further from Eli Roth. Contrast their beginnings- Roth wrote Cabin Fever while working on Howard Stern's Private Parts, whereas West began his career under the guiding hand of subtle-horror stalwart Larry Fessenden. What the producers saw in a film like Trigger Man that made them think West would be a perfect fit for a Cabin Fever sequel is beyond me, but what makes it on-screen (West shot the majority of the film but left during the editing process when asked to do re-shoots) is surprisingly good, goofy, GORY fun that proves that West can do big, dumb horror with the best of 'em. This could have been one of the best gonzo eighties-style horror flicks in years, right up there with the original and Piranha 3D in terms of pure horror geek nirvana, but unfortunately the director bailing definitely shows up on-screen, with tacky flash animation book-ending the action and a rushed denouement and tacked-on "sting in the tail" that effectively undercuts all of the goodwill that has accumulated throughout. That said, the footage directed by West looks great, it features another stellar comedic turn from Giuseppe Andrews, and has wall-to-wall honest-to-goodness PROSTHETIC gore to spare.

As the film opens, Paul, the sole survivor of the original film, a bloated, unrecognizable mess from the water-born pathogens that killed his friends, escapes from the forest only to be mowed down by a school bus. Deputy Winston in first on the scene, dismissing the remains as those of a moose, but in time through a series of incidents (including West mentor Fesserden going to goop in a diner) realizes what is really going on- a local bottled water company has packaged the pathogen and shipped it out, the first stop being the local high school, which is gearing up for prom. John (Deadgirl's Noah Segan) is our protagonist, hopelessly in love with the pretty, smart girl with the doucheboy boyfriend, Cassie (Alexi Wasser) and best buds with some fat comic relief, Alex (Rusty Kelley), who manages to be a lot less annoying than most characters of his ilk. The plot sets up some decent rivalries, red herrings, and makes room for some fun cameos (Mike Borchardt is always a welcome sight, especially in something with a budget over $20), but then midway through the prom, which should be the centerpiece of the film, everything speeds up and feels incredibly rushed. The shadowy disease control agents from the first film show up, put the town and school under lockdown, and it effectively feels as if we've teleported from act one to act three.

That said, what keeps the film from completely derailing is the marvelous effects work and absolute pandering to its demographic. Nary a five-minute stretch goes by without vomit, soggy, distended organs sloughing off, bountiful, bouncing breasts, liberated fingernails, table-saw amputation (definite nod to Evil Dead 2, and thus, a nod to the first Cabin Fever), heads being smashed open a la Irreversible, more vomit (only bloodier), and one of the most cringe-worthy shots of penis-discomfort this side of Antichrist (seriously, if you've ever had gonorrhea, the scene in question will be particularly impossible not to squint through)(which isn't to say that I'VE suffered through gonorrhea, female readers, and if I ever had had it, antibiotics cleared it up, so fuck off). It is gloriously offensive, well-lit, and whenever Officer Winston appears for breaks from the main action, uproarious. I hope that if the proposed further sequels ever get off the ground that they manage to snag Andrews- not only is he the perfect, skeezy mascot for an imperfect, skeezy series, but the payout would enable him to make about fifteen more of his own films. Whether rhapsodizing about pussy, nodding to the first film over a plate of pancakes or sending a clueless Judah Friedlander out to meet his doom via disease control firing squad, Andrews exudes a Southern slimeball charm that betrays his Florida birthplace and adds just the right amount of continuity to tie Spring Fever in with the original (also keep an eye out for the giant bunny Paul sees in the hospital in CF, here acting as the mascot for the high school). In fact, the whole cast is pretty able, the aforementioned Rusty Kelley surprisingly likable as a porcine pussyhound and Noah Segan proving his versatility in playing a goody-two-shoes character who is a complete 180 degree turn from his sociopathic sex fiend in Deadgirl and coming across just as likable. The supporting cast plays it pretty broad, but it works, creating an eighties John Waters vibe (no surprise as long-time Waters editor Janice Hampton took over the reins upon West's exit) that makes it all the more charming.

But alas, all is not well, and saving the worst for last, no review of Spring Fever should pass without mentioning the abysmally animated opening and closing scene, which are about as well-animated as an e-card and serve no purpose aside from making a decent-budgeted flick look considerably tackier than it really is. West apparently wanted to open and end the film this way (perhaps a tribute to Creepshow 2?), but these eyesores definitely reflect some post-production half-assery. Even worse is the "sting in the tail" just prior to the ending animation, featuring an infected stripper high school girl passing on the disease, which is horrendously shot and acted and has none of the manic drive of the West-shot footage. This five minute scene seriously felt longer than the film that preceded it, especially when the ending, as in the ACTUAL ending, with the major players meeting their makers, is so rushed and nigh-incomprehensible that we aren't granted the knowledge of what actually happens to our male lead (whereas the female leads "rescue" makes no sense whatsoever given the priorities of her "rescuers"). The suggestion is there, but alas, this isn't the Ti West of House of the Devil, and not right for this type of loud-and-proud TRASH in ALL CAPS. As it stands, Cabin Fever 2: Spring Fever still manages to be an excellent time-waster, and proves that West is a pretty versatile guy, capable of yuks and yucks but opting for a more "high brow" approach, which is great- he's one of the better young horror directors out there today. One can only hope that series producer Lauren Moews will find another energetic up-and-comer for the proposed third and fourth installment; perhaps one who won't feel sullied by having made something completely unlike his other work?

THE GATE
THE GATE

Tibor Takács (1987)

Out of all the people I have ever known, only one person truly gave me the distinctly visceral feeling that, on some strange and indescribable spiritual level, I knew them my entire life, as if our souls were always intertwined long before we had ever actually met. Indeed, aside from arriving at more or less the same political views and wonderfully warped yet refined sense of humor, our aesthetic tastes were pretty much the same whether it be paintings, films, or music. In a sort of innate and instinctual fashion, I could always pretty much predict what this individual would like or even used to like as a kid. In fact, even as children, we had many of the same favorite flicks, including ludicrously lame shit like the fantasy romcom Mannequin (1987) starring a considerably less STD-ridden Kim Cattrall as the titular character. Out of all the childhood movies that stand out in my mind, the quasi-Lovecraftian Canadian ‘supernatural horror’ flick The Gate (1987) directed by Hungarian-Canadian Tibor Takács (I, Madman aka Hardcover, Spiders 3D) is certainly best of the films that we both loved as kid. Not unlike with the pleasantly primitive stop-motion celluloid nightmare The Equinox... A Journey into the Supernatural (1970) directed by Jack Woods and Dennis Muren and Don Coscarelli’s Phantasm (1979), Takács’ film is one of those oh-so-rare phantasmagorical horror fantasies that I randomly watched at a very young and impressionable age which left me in a virtual trance due to its surreal imagery and sometimes oneiric essence, yet it would not be many years later until I learned the actual name of the film and was able to finally re-watch it. Unfortunately, unlike Phantasm and, to a lesser extent, The Equinox, The Gate is not nearly enthralling for me as an adult as I discovered during a recent viewing, though I would still argue that it is one of the greatest, if not greatest, ‘kiddy horror’ flick ever made as a cleverly constructed cinematic nightmare that was clearly specifically tailored for the nuances and specific fears of the vulnerable juvenile mind. Centering around a boy that is only concerned with his dog, family, and nerdy best friend, the film is a strangely beautiful reminder of the simplicity of childhood and the grave seriousness that some kids have for things that adults barely even think about. Wholesome in the best sort of way but hardly politically correct (for example, the timeless word “fag” is thrown around a couple times), Takács’ film very well may be the best introductory film for both child horror movie novices and adolescent would-be-metalheads. In short, showing a little kid The Gate is indubitably the cinematic equivalent of handing them a CD of Slayer’s classic third album Reign in Blood (1986), though you certainly do not need to be a budding metal-fag to enjoy the film.

Fairly similar to the innately inferior and horrendously directed Canadian horror flick The Pit (1981) aka Teddy—a major mess of a movie directed by one-time filmmaker Lew Lehman (who notably directed his own daughter in a nude scene!) about an insufferably autistic preteen whose only friend is a teddy bear and who feeds people to bloodthirsty ‘troglydytes’ (or what he calls “Tra-la-logs”) that live in a pit near his house—Takács’ film is certainly not an auteur piece as a highly collaborative effort that was the brainchild of screenwriter Michael Nankin (Midnight Madness). In fact, Nankin originally intended to direct the film himself and envisioned it as a much darker and more adult orientated film about bad kids who sadistically kill animals and ultimately rightly face a sort of demonic justice. Needless to say, adult oriented films featuring kid protagonists are not exactly popular, so the film was later changed into a soundly sentimental yet quasi-satanic scare-fest about kids that was made for kids. Indeed, Takács assembled a film with a little kid cast that virtually every kid can identify with, including a sensitive yet likeable wuss protagonist, his sexually developing big sister, and four-eyed metalhead nerd friend. A somewhat surprisingly allegorical film that examines the most common fears and anxieties associated with childhood, The Gate screenwriter Nankin once notably described the demonic monsters in the flick as follows, “The demons in most good horror films are metaphorical [and] representational for darker feelings, darker emotions; they are the demons within us. THE GATE is about guilt and is about Glen the hero kid’s fear of abandonment . . . His parents leave for the weekend . . . His sister is drifting away from him. Everyone’s leaving him. And these fears are basically what are the catalyst for the demons to come out.” Indeed, the boy protagonist of the film played by a very young Stephen Dorff—the mischling star of popular cinematic works ranging from Blade (1998) to John Waters’ Cecil B. Demented (2000) to Sofia Coppola’s Somewhere (2010)—has some serious yet fairly realistic psychological issues that include guilt and an unwavering fear of abandonment. A rare 1980s horror movie that is devoid of scatological stupidity, hokey humor, retarded jokes, and tasteless titillation, The Gate is a somewhat startlingly emotional horror-drama for kids about a well meaning wimp with strong principles that is forced to develop a certain degree of testicular fortitude after he and his four-eyed comrade unwittingly reawaken the Old Gods in the former’s backyard.

While many film critics and reviewers seem to assume that The Gate was Takács’ debut feature, the Magyar film director actually began his feature-length filmmaking career with the rarely-seen kitschy yet vaguely avant-garde sci-fi-musical-cum-dystopian-parable Metal Messiah (1978), which was based on a controversial stageplay by fellow Hungarian Stephen Zoller (who later produced Takács’ totally trying turd 984: Prisoner of the Future (1982)) and advertised as the, “ultimate space rock spectacle of the 1970’s.” Undoubtedly, watching Metal Messiah—a film that has never been released on DVD and thus only exists today in extra shitty quality VHS form—a couple years ago was, to some extent, somewhat akin to first watching The Gate was a kid in the sense that I found it to be a somewhat unpredictable and strangely beautiful phantasmagoric nightmare that suggests that Takács might have had the potential to become a sort of bargain bin Fellini of genre cinema had his career taken a somewhat different and less television orientated route. While not exactly a true 'auteur' since he penned none of his best films, Takács is certainly a talented artisan with a distinct vision as is clearly apparent in his greatest films, including Metal Messiah, The Gate, and I, Madman, though both his artistic prowess and opportunities seemed to have fizzle out by the end of the 1980s just like the horror genre in general. Indeed, while Metal Messiah suggests he was a somewhat idiosyncratic artist with a special knack for creating otherworldly cinematic realms, it seems the surprise commercial success of The Gate resulted in Takács being left pigeonholed and relegated to directing corny kiddo crap, including various episodes of Sabrina, the Teenage Witch (1996-2003) starring Melissa Joan Hart and The Crow: Stairway to Heaven (1998-1999), among other hack work. Not unlike with kiwi auteur David Blyth, who went from directing sardonic avant-garde punk flicks like Angel Mine (1978) to subversive cult horror like Death Warmed Over (1984) to episodes of Mighty Morphin Power Rangers, it seems Takács was forced to completely dispose of his artistic integrity to pay the bills. Of course, one cannot blame the filmmaker for being unable to top what is like suburban little kid equivalent to Fellini Satyricon (1969), as The Gate offers the ultimate surrealist aesthetic overload for kids and acts as a virtual celluloid gateway drug to the wonderfully aesthetically decadent. In that sense, it is only fitting that lead Stephen Dorff would go on to play Warhol superstar and alpha-tranny Candy Darling in Mary Harron's I Shot Andy Warhol (1996).

Although he may look like the average little kid from the suburbs, 12-year-old The Gate protagonist Glen (Stephen Dorff in his very first feature-film role) is a neurotic mess who has an overwhelming fear that his parents and 16-year-old sister big sister Alexandra aka 'Al' (Christa Denton) will soon abandon him. Indeed, Glen seems to have an ever growing hole in his somewhat wounded heart, which only gets bigger when an ominous hole appears in his backyard. At the very beginning of the film, Glen has an intricate nightmare where here comes home and discovers that his entire family has mysteriously vanished without a trace. In the same dream, Glen gets the scare of a lifetime when he enters his treehouse, which is immediately hit by lightning after he picks up a creepy vintage babydoll. Rather inexplicably, the next morning when he wakes up from the nightmare, he discovers that his treehouse was indeed hit by lightning and a big ugly gash is left in the ground where the tree once stood. Naturally, Glen is excited, if not somewhat perplexed, to discover a Geode rock has been unearthed at the site. Of course, Glen opts to dig further into the ground and is immediately bombarded with a deathly reek that absolutely repels him. Unfortunately, Glen bleeds near the hole after pricking his finger on a piece of wood. While Glen has no clue yet, he has unwittingly begun to reawaken the long dormant Old Gods that have been imprisoned in an infernal underworld. Luckily, his weirdo nerdy metalhead friend Terry Chandler (Louis Tripp)—a kid that is rather cynical for his age due to the fact that his beloved mother recently died—has the knowledge and tools to fight these primordial demonic beings in the form of a very special European heavy metal band that might have inspired a very young Varg Vikernes of Burzum.

Unlike many kids his age, Glen becomes rather depressed when his parents tell him that they will be leaving for three days and his sister will be babysitting him. For whatever reason, Glen has an irrational fear that there is a very good chance his parents will never come back if they leave. Although Glen clearly deeply loves his sister, she has been recently treating him in a condescending fashion because she is a sexually budding teenager that wants to impress her lame friends and has a crush on some dude jock dude. At one point early in the film, Al can be seen briefly admiring her own breasts and derriere, though she abruptly stops as if she is ashamed of her own behavior. Naturally, since her parents are gone, Al decides to throw a party the night they leave, though she does not let Glen or Terry join in on the festivities, at least at first. While his sister and friends are hanging downstairs and discussing the occult, Glen and Terry manage to break the Geode, which causes strange incantations written in an arcane foreign language to magically appear on a notepad. Of course, the boys are also somewhat taken aback when the inside of the Geode begins to glow as if it has some sort of magical powers. Needless to say, Glen and Terry foolishly decide to read the incantations, thus further summoning demonic powers to invade the house. When Al's obnoxious teenage friends opt to attempt to levitate Glen during the party and it actually works so well that the protagonist manages to break a light upon floating up to the ceiling, they unwittingly perform another ritual that further awakens the Old Gods. At this point, the Old Gods have enough power to emotionally terrorize the protagonists with phantoms and highly personalized nightmarish hallucinations. Indeed, that night, Terry is visited by an apparition of his dead mother and immediately embraces her, only to soon realize in a horrifically heartbreaking fashion that it is actually Glen's beloved dog Angus and that he has accidentally strangled the poor creature to death. Meanwhile, as Terry dances with the demonic phantom, Glen is awakened by ominous moths and watches in abject bewilderment as the walls of his room begin to stretch as if they have come alive. At this point, it is obvious that the house has become an extension of the demonic gate. Of course, by killing Glen's beloved canine friend and sadistically teasing Terry about his tragic longing dead mommy, the Old Gods are seeking to emotionally destroy and isolate the little lads so that they can be easily defeated and enslaved by demonic forces, but luckily they are tougher than they look. Considering Glen's worst fear is losing his friends and family, it is only a matter of time before the Old Gods come for Al and Terry. Indeed, unbeknownst to Glen, he is a passive pawn in a demonic game of quite literally hellish proportions.

THE GATE

Terry may be a ludicrously lanky four-eyed turd of a boy that bitches like a sex-starved middle-aged woman and seems to suffer from Asperger's syndrome, but he is not afraid to embrace the dark side and is a rather devoted fan of obscure metal groups, especially a quasi-Satanic European group named 'Sacrifyx' whose foolish occultnik members all died in a plane crash shortly after releasing their first (and ultimately last) album. By using Sacrifyx's mysterious first album, which features excerpts from the 'The Dark Book'—a sort of bible of demonology that features striking medieval demon art—Terry is eventually able to convince Glen that they have awakened the 'Old Gods' and thus they must seriously prepare for the worst lest they succumb to the darkness. Unfortunately, some handsome yet unbelievably stupid and careless teenage boy that is friends with Al tosses Angus' corpse into the hole in the backyard, thus giving the Old Gods the power to begin unleashing various demons. While the boys recite excerpts from The Dark Book in the hope of stopping the Old Gods and naturally assume their problem is over with after noticing the hole is filled, the depositing of the dog's corpse ultimately acted as an imperative final sacrifice to summon the demonic gods. Indeed, from there, the serious demonic trickery begins and various menacing demonic entities begin lurking around the house for prey.

That night after reading from The Dark Book and wrongly assuming their problems are over, the boys get a rude awakening in the form a violent swarm of moths crashing through Glen's bedroom window and Angus' glowing corpse magically appearing in Terry's bed. Naturally, Al finally realizes things are not quite when grotesque demon arms almost pull her under a bed, but thankfully Glen and Terry manage to save her from the demonic being and then inform her of the sinister dark forces that are beginning to infiltrate their less than humble abode. Indeed, small and absurdly diminutive demonic beings known as 'Minions,' which resemble a cross between an ape, frog, and elderly ghetto negro, begin invading the house and taunting the protagonists. As depicted in ancient images featured in The Dark Book, the Minions are savagely sadistic creatures that enjoy collectively dismembering human victims, among other things. On top of that, two demons in the form of Glen's parents appear outside the house and the one in the form of his father begins choking the protagonist. When Glen fights back, the demonic pseudo-father's face falls apart and a white semen-like liquid gushes from his neck. After Al is almost attacked by a virtual army of Minions upon daring to investigate the backyard, Terry forces everyone into the basement in the hope of finding a way to defeat the demons and close the gate in The Dark Book, but it spontaneously bursts into flames, so they are forced to settle on a Bible. While Terry resolves to read from Psalm 59 and the gate seems to begin to close, he is a goofy know-it-all nerd and thus predictably falls into the hole before he can finish reading. After being bitten by a Minion and two brutally crushing one of them by rapidly stomping on it, Terry somehow manages to crawl out of the hole and read from Genesis, which seemingly seals the hole for good, or so the heroes naively think. That night, the boys get quite the surprise when a rotten 'Workman' (Carl Kraines)—a zombie-like being based on fictional suburban folklore about a worker that ostensibly died while working on Glen's family home—crashes through a wall and soon begins attacking the particularly petrified yet nonetheless pugnacious preteen protagonists. Unfortunately, the Workman soon pulls Terry inside a wall where he is trapped inside. The Workman also appears in a mirror while Al is admiring her own reflection, but she is a bad little bitch and soon destroys the zombie prole by throwing a stereo at him, though his body subsequently disintegrates into a dozen or so rather speedy Minions that scramble in different directions like cockroaches. Somewhat similarly, when one of the Minions loses its arm, the limb disintegrates into a dozen or so speedy sperm-like creatures. In other words, the demonic beings seem to be immortal.

Before the two know it, Terry reappears in an Übergeek demonic form and attacks Al, but it is ultimately the Workman, who reappears in a seemingly stronger form, that drags her to hell, thus leaving poor Glen to fend for himself. Before succumbing to the Workman, Al seemingly kills the demonic Terry by violently stabbing him in the eye with the legs of a cheap plastic Barbie doll in a surprisingly shocking and subversive scene. As a result of both his big sis and best bud being consumed by the gate, Glen's single worst fears—being alone and helpless—comes true. As a result of both Terry and Al being 'sacrificed,' the gate finally fully opens and a large and grotesque serpentine-like demon named 'The Demon Lord' appears and literally congratulates Glen for unwittingly opening the gates for the Old Gods by warmly patting him on the head like a good boy. Indeed, in what proves to be a more bitter than sweet moment of dark irony for the young protagonist, the demon leader credits Glen for the infernal invasion and treats him as a comrade. As a result of having his hand touched by the Harryhausen-esque alpha-demon, an erratic eyeball appears on the palm of Glen's hand. Naturally, the demon is not too happy when Glen acts like an awful ingrate, rejects his new demonic status, and opts to stab his new tweaker-like hand-eye. In what ultimately proves to be an absurd, albeit fitting, Deus ex machina of sorts, a powerful toy rocket—a symbol of the protagonist's love for his sister and vice versa (or what the protagonist describes as, "love and light")—is ultimately used by Glen to kill the dreaded Demon Lord. In fact, the rocket not only kills the big bad demon by blowing its body into seemingly millions of pieces, but it also closes the gate for good. In what ultimately proves to be the most patently absurd yet reasonably fitting of happy endings, Al, Terry, and even dog Angus emerge from closets and return to Glen in the end. Naturally, Glen is so happy to have all his loved ones back that he is not even worried about the fact that his parents' house is completely destroyed and that he will probably be grounded for the rest of his childhood. Of course, the entire experience has not only brought him closer to his sister and best friend, but has also transformed Glen from a whiny wimp to a real mensch.

Admittedly, recently re-watching The Gate proved to be an extremely, if not quite unexpectedly, bittersweet experience that stirred emotions in me that I did not really anticipate, namely a sort of melancholic nostalgia that came as a result of my realization that I have become quite cynical and have lost all innocence. While it is easy to make fun of the boy protagonist and his sheltered suburban life, the film was certainly made with clear good intentions and is surely not the production of some scheming producer that was looking to make a quick easy buck on morally bankrupt cheap thrills. Indeed, the film might be silly, sappy, and sentimental in certain regards, but it does have a genuinely wholesome message about the importance of friends and family in a cinematic work that truly proves the platonic love conquers all and that the only thing that really matters in life is your love ones, including your dog. Indeed, forget Jack Clayton's Something Wicked This Way Comes (1983), Joe Dante's Gremlins (1984), The Monster Squad (1987), the classic Stephen King miniseries It (1990), and even Nicolas Roeg's classic Roald Dahl adaptation The Witches (1990), Takács' film is indubitably unrivaled in terms of its purity of soul and spirit as far as authentic kiddy horror is concerned. It goes without saying that I certainly cannot imagine such a film being made nowadays, as it would probably be plagued by a morally dubious message, token non-Europids and/or mystery meat mongrels, and repugnant video-game-like CGI effects (of course, it should be noted that Judaic Brit Alex Winter has been planning to direct a 3D-remake for a number of years, but thankfully it no longer seems like it is happening). Unfortunately, I can only recommend Takács' innately inferior sequel Gate 2: The Trespassers (1990), which only features Louis Tripp, to die-hard fans of the first film and nihilistic horror film completists.

Undoubtedly, The Gate was probably the last film to feature great and uniquely unforgettable stop-motion animation special effects in the spirit of German-American maestro Ray Harryhausen. Aside from that, the film is also notable for being the last filmic work to feature matte paintings created by British master Albert Whitlock, who previously created striking visual effects for classic Alfred Hitchcock flicks like The 39 Steps (1935) and The Birds (1963), Willy Wonka & the Chocolate Factory (1971), Hal Ashby's Bound for Glory (1976), John Carpenter's The Thing (1982), David Lynch's Dune (1984), and countless films by Disney and Universal Studios. Additionally, the main special effects guy behind the film was Randall William Cook, who did some interesting work on cult flicks like Larry Cohen's Q (1982), Tom Holland's Fright Night (1985), and Ate de Jong's underrated neo-Orphic horror-fantasy Highway to Hell (1991) and would later become famous for his work on Peter Jackson's The Lord of the Rings trilogy. Somewhat surprisingly, Cook and director Takács mention in the featurette THE GATE: Unlocked that, in terms of the film's somewhat understated comedic content, they were influenced by old school Hollywood greats like Ernst Lubitsch, Preston Sturges, and Billy Wilder and not the sort of kitschy low-camp crap that is typical of horror.

If the bastard grandson of Jean Cocteau attempted to direct a sort of Lovecraftian neo-fairytale for angst-ridden preteens from American suburbia, it would probably resemble The Gate. Indeed, in terms of the film's idiosyncratic use of practical special effects, including mirrors, it can be compared to classic Cocteau flicks like Beauty and the Beast (1946). While the big kids and adults of the 1980s may have had the luxury of experiencing the surrealist slasher scenarios of the A Nightmare on Elm Street films, the little kids certainly got an equally cool, surreal, and playfully phantasmagorical equivalent in the form of Takács' film. Indeed, I can imagine many of the fans of the film would, for better or worse, grow up to become Aleister Crowley and/or Anton LaVey fanboys and fangirls. I certainly cannot deny that the film probably had some influence on my lifelong love of the dark side, whether it be the early albums of deathrock band Christian Death, the satantic Nietzschean strangle tales of Hanns Heinz Ewers, or my unhealthy, albeit rather eclectic, taste in horror cinema ranging from German Expressionism like The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) to old school American cult horror like Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls (1962) to no-budget kraut artploitation like Jörg Buttgerit's NEKRomantik (1987). Undoubtedly, if I ever have kids, which is questionable due to my increasingly shitty health and complete and utter disillusionment with dames and relationships, I will be sure to show them The Gate at a very young and impressionable age. I can certainly remember my somewhat hidden excitement when the girl that shared the same political, aesthetic, and comical tastes as me revealed that she also loved the film as a child, which is rather fitting since she reminds me of a more beauteous version of the character Al. Indeed, although I certainly do not want to sound like some faggot feminist cuck that gives girls credit where credit is not due, The Gate also has the distinction of featuring a rare example of a likeable and memorable teenage girl character and not the sort of completely phony and fiercely feminist all-competent 'Mary Sue' archetype that is quite typical of Hollywood films nowadays. In short, it is hard to find anything to dislike about the film, but one should not expect anything less from a surreally demonic Pandora's Box story where teenage girls say sassy things like "fagging off," a morbidly cynical preteen metalhead slow dances with a dead dog that has taken the form of his dead mother, and a very young and neurotic Stephen Dorff cries like a little girl after falling victim to the darker side of levitation.

DER SAMURAI

Till Kleinert° (2014)

Far from the anti-bourgeois Artaudian melodramatics of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, hysterical aberosexual agitprop of Rosa von Praunheim, diva-obsessed aesthetic decadence and cultivated kitsch of Werner Schroeter, the autistic avant-gardism of Michael Bryntrup, and the AIDS-ridden gutter punk degeneracy of Michael Stock, Der Samurai (2014) directed by Till Kleinert (The Longest Night, Boys Village) demonstrates that kraut cocksuckers are a great deal less serious nowadays than they used to be and have been nurtured on a steady diet of Hollywood celluloid junk, yet somehow that does not mean that the film is totally unoriginal or uninspired. Indeed, although like a mix of classic homo horror flicks The Hitcher (1986) and A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy's Revenge (1985) meets Nicolas Winding Refn's Drive (2011) and Adam Wingard's The Guest (2014) that is quite flagrant with its American influence, Kleinert's film also has quite Teutonic roots that thankfully predate the Nazi era (in fact, Kleinert has described F.W. Murnau as his favorite German director) as a work featuring not only elements of German Romanticism and the Brothers Grimm fairytales, but also the much maligned Heimatfilm genre. Directed by a young queer that grew up in East Berlin as his 'graduation feature' for film school, Der Samurai is a rare German flick with a rare sense of German identity, which is usually a no go zone for most German filmmakers, who will typically do anything to avoid being perceived as 'nationalistic' or discernibly 'Germanic.' As most of his oeuvre demonstrates, Kleinert has a sort of fetish for the East German countryside and quaint rural village living, which he seems to be simultaneously infatuated with and horrified by, thus making for a strangely mystical and fantastic view of the Teutonic wilderness in his films. Of course, Der Samurai is no different as it depicts what happens when a young passive-aggressive pussy policeman of the latent homosexual sort is forced to hunt down a dress-wearing and sword-wielding eponymous killer who comes to his small village out of nowhere and starts wrecking havoc in a rather drastic attempt to get the protagonist's attention, thereupon forcing him to confront his long repressed fagdom. An oftentimes irrational and romantic work that ultimately communicates a message in an allegorical way similar to a fairytale, the film is being promoted by its American distributor Artsploitation Films as recalling "early David Lynch," but Kleinert's film is probably better described as an absurdist (anti)Heimat horror flick as directed by a young East German that has more of an appreciation for 1980s American horror than New German Cinema and post-Godard European cinema in general. While by no means a masterpiece of any sort, Der Samurai thankfully demonstrates that not all German filmmakers have become soulless dilettantes and succumbed to lame filmmaking trends like the so-called 'Berliner Schule.' Featuring arguably the most patently pathetic cop in cinema history as the protagonist and a sort of cross-dressing micro Kinski as the villain, Kleinert's work probably has the potential to become a kraut cult classic of sorts, though American filmgoers might not be able to accept an unhinged and ferociously flirtatious quasi-tranny twink as a serious slasher killer of sorts, but then again anyone who looks at the flick as a horror movie will certainly be going in with somewhat misguided expectations, as Der Samurai works best as a stylish and somewhat sardonic savage comedy that forces the viewer to laugh at things that would otherwise be considered sick and depraved.

Jakob (Michel Diercks) is a self-loathing, uptight, and anally retentive social misfit who is denial of the fact that he is resented by most of the people in his small village and is constantly mocked by everyone despite the fact that he is an officer of the law. Despite the fact that he is denial of his dubious social status, Jakob secretly and seemingly unconsciously demonstrates his empathy and solidarity with fellow outcasts by regularly buying large quantities of animal guts from a butcher and leaving them in a local forest for a wild wolf that is hated by most of the locals who regularly complain to the protagonist's police station about the wild beast. With both of his parents dead and having literally no real friends, Jakob spends his free time doing banal things like playing cards with his grandmother (Ulrike Hanke-Haensch), who suffers from dementia and who he takes care of. Ultimately, Jakob's suffocating humdrum life changes dramatically when he receives a strange package at his work. Indeed, after playing cards with his beloved grandmother one night, Jakob receives a random phone call from the owner of the package who tells him to listen to the howl outside and requests that he bring him the box. When Jakob goes to hand deliver the package to the mysterious owner, he ends up wandering into a house where he finds a man wearing a dress—the eponymous 'Der Samurai' (Pit Bukowski of Kleinert's Cowboy (2008))—who asks him "Like what you see?" while applying red lipstick to his lips in a manner that makes him seem like some sort of cheap bargain bin she-male bimbo. Although Jakob has no clue who the goofy transvestite is and what he wants from him, the superlatively strange fellow seems to know everything about him and he is determined to convert him to cocksucking, but the protagonist is determined to stay a hidden homo even though everyone else in his life seems to realize he is gay. Seemingly like the Teutonic son of "Buffalo Bill" of The Silence of the Lambs (1991), albeit with a twisted sense of humor and a more extroverted personality, the samurai is a mensch on a mirthfully malefic mission to prove he is the right lebensmensch for the protagonist and he plans to destroy tons of property and kill tons of people with his sword while trying.

When the samurai confesses that the house he is in is not actually his, Jakob tells him to leave or he will have to arrest him, but before he can do anything the unhinged mensch in the dress opens the package, whips out a sword from inside the box, and then makes his way outside where he begins running towards an oncoming train as if he has a death wish. Needless to say, Jakob reluctantly follows the psychotic samurai, who dodges the train at the last second and heads for the woods. Of course, Jakob follows the samurai through the woods and into another village where he knows he is on the right path when he eventually finds his elderly friend's decapitated golden retriever lying in the street. While Jakob almost blows the samurai away with a shotgun upon tracking him down at a sort of sewage treatment site, the twisted tranny manages to dodge the bullet, asks the protagonist if he is ready for "the baptism," and manages to get away by jumping in the sewage water. While attempting to track down the samurai after his rather dramatic escape, Jakob eventually happens upon a blonde babe on the side of the road who has a flat tire, so he changes said tire and then saves the fair lady from a deer that he mistakes for the maniac in the dress. As the viewer suspects, the blonde ultimately gives Jakob a ride back to his village and on the way she discusses how there are still wolves in Eastern Europe and then somewhat annoys the annoyingly uptight protagonist by commenting regarding his area that it, "Must be terrible [...] Everybody knows everybody. Everybody making sure no one steps out of line." Of course, Jakob refuses to accept that he secretly loathes his neighbors and they loathe him. Before dropping him off, Jakob fantasizes about kissing the blonde babe in a hopelessly contrived fashion and then she bequeaths him with the fitting nickname, "Lonely Wolf," which he seems somewhat offended by even though his best friend is a wild wolf. Not surprisingly, Jakob will also eventually call the samurai Lonely Wolf, thus signifying that he unconsciously realizes that he has a deep connection with the dress-adorned whack-job.

When Jakob gets back to his village, he is disturbed to discover that the samurai has destroyed virtually everything in the neighborhood with his sword and he does not even bother to stop his nihilistic rampage when he sees the protagonist. Upon attempting to reason with the clearly psychotic tranny, Jakob makes a deal with the samurai that he will destroy his neighbor's trashy plastic pink flamingo lawn ornament if he agrees to stop destroying everything. Naturally, the samurai watches with glee as Jakob destroys the pink flamingo in a surprisingly impassioned fashion, as if the lunatic is starting to actually have a sinister influence on him. After the trashy lawn ornament is destroyed, Jakob decides to question the samurai about what his "crusade" is about and the deranged dress-donning dude begins to get somewhat esoteric and tells the protagonist to imagine if they had met at a local party earlier that night and slow-danced with one another in front of all of his neighbors. Naturally, closet-queen is somewhat unsettled by the prospect of looking like a pansy poof in front of his neighbors and when the samurai accuses him of being in a "narrow prison" for altogether rejecting the idea of them dancing together, the protagonist becomes enraged, assaults him, and handcuffs him to a fence where he proceeds to punch him after he makes more homoerotic remarks and accuses him of deriving sexual pleasure from beating him. Eventually, Jakob becomes so enraged with the samurai's rather aggressive flirting tactics that he storms off into the woods while the man in the dress yells, "Where do you think you're going? We're not done yet." Meanwhile, Jakob's asshole homo-hating boss Horvath (Uwe Preuss) calls him on his cellphone and curiously asks him if he is the one that neighbors have seen "wrecking havoc" around the village in a dress. Of course, Jakob denies the accusation and assures Horvath that he has caught the culprit, but when he goes back to check on the samurai, he discovers that he has escaped from the handcuffs by cutting off his own thumb.

In a somewhat humorous scenario worthy of Little Red Riding Hood, the samurai decides to visit Jakob's dementia-ridden grandmother and play cards with her just like her grandson does but things soon turn ugly when he becomes dissatisfied with the elderly woman's slow pace when it comes to shuffling cards. While the samurai does not kill granny, he decides to give her a little scare and then goes in the protagonist's room and burns up a miniature village that is an exact replica of the neighborhood that Jakob has painstakingly assembled. When Jakob comes home to find his grandma petrified and cowering in a corner, he becomes quite distressed, especially when she yells at him, "Go away!" and accuses him of not being her grandson, as if the samurai has taken his place. Meanwhile, a group of young 'redneck' bullies on motorcycles that are about the same age as Jakob and regularly taunt him spot the samurai and decide to pick on him since he is wearing a dress. The leader of the gang Schöllli (Christopher Kane), who Jakob seems to have repressed homoerotic feelings for even though he regularly berates him, decides to mock the samurai by moronically asking him, "What's going on...Halloween?," to which the mensch in the dress humorlessly replies, "You're dogs." While Jakob attempts to warn the bullies about how dangerous the tranny is, Schöllli soon knocks him down for pretending to be a hero and at the same time the samurai begins slicing up the unwitting crotch-rocket-riding jocks, who never fathomed that a man wearing a dress could be so ultra-violent and bloodthirsty. When Jakob regains consciousness, the samurai runs up to him and decapitates Schöllli only inches away from his face, thus leaving the perturbed protagonist in a daze.

After going by his police station to obtain a handgun and some bullets, Jakob goes looking for the samurai and ultimately finds him at a hellish bonfire that he has started at a local park. On top of discovering that the decapitated corpses of his neighbors have been placed in the bleachers and postured in a creepy fashion as if they are watching everything that is going on, Jakob finds Horvath hanging upside down from a soccer goal with his arms and legs bound and his mouth taped shut. After leaving Horvath literally hanging after assuring him that he will take care of everything himself, Jakob soon finds the samurai lurking around the bonfire. After the samurai states regarding all the people he has killed, "Look closely. These are the miscreants. They are like corks to our bodies, keep the spirit bottled in. It is our duty to get rid of the blockage once and for all" and tossing Schöllli's decapitated head to him like it is a soccer ball (rather inexplicably, the head somehow says to the protagonist, "Easy, Jakob, easy. We've got everything under control"), Jakob points his gun at his forehead, but cannot bring himself to kill the terroristic tranny. When the samurai wipes blood against the protagonist's head in a sensational fashion and then asks him, "What do we do now?," Jakob strangely responds, "I still owe you a dance" and the two absurdly start dancing like autistic zombies from far away from one another. While Jakob eventually embraces the samurai and begins romantically slow-dancing with him next to the bonfire, he eventually becomes disgusted upon seeing the decapitated head of the blonde who gave him a ride earlier burning in the fire, not to mention the fact that Horvath is watching him getting all touchy-feely with a dress-adorned queer serial killer. While the samurai states regarding Horvath, "I left him for you," Jakob refuses to kill his boss even though he is a dickhead, stating, "He's innocent. They are all innocent." While Jakob agrees to leave with him if he leaves his boss alone and then throws his gun and bullets to the ground as a demonstration of his sincerity, the samurai decides to hack off Horvath's head when he sees police cars coming down the road. While police soon arrest the samurai and they begin taking him and the protagonist back to a police station in separate police cars, the tranny manages to escape by jumping through one of the backseat passenger windows after the wild wolf creates a diversion by coming out of the woods and randomly attacks the cops. Ultimately, Jakob decides to steal a police car and track the samurai down. Upon finding the samurai completely naked and sexually aroused while eating the butcher guts that he has left in the woods for the wolf, Jakob goes completely berserk and decapitates his gay buddy with his own sword, thus demonstrating that the crazed cross-dressing cocksucker was at least somewhat successful in his crusade to instill the protagonist with a much needed sense of psychosexual aggression and visceral testicular fortitude.

While some might assume that the eponymous killer of Der Samurai is not actually a real person but merely a manifestation of the seemingly sexually schizophrenic protagonist's feeble and highly conflicted mind, director Till Kleinert assures the viewer in the audio commentary for the Artsploitation Films DVD release of the film that the cross-dressing swordsman is indeed a flesh and blood character, though he also acknowledges that the character could not exist without Jakob sort of summoning him from the woods, as it is a film with a sort of classic fairytale logic that is totally absent from contemporary German cinema. Indeed, if Kleinert accomplished anything with the film, it is most certainly creating the greatest filmic fag fairytale ever made and what makes it all the more impressive is that he does it in a fairly subversive and apolitical way. After all, as a work that features a defiantly gay serial killer who sports a goofy dress, gorges on raw guts, and attempts to goad a guy into converting to the pink by decapitating everyone he knows, Der Samurai is not exactly going to appeal to the dubious agendas of those sort of special interest groups with retarded acronyms like 'LGBT' that promote gay marriage and other hopelessly banal things that would have absolutely disgusted gay activists from previous generations. Arguably the most bizarre aspect of the film is that, although it features certain arthouse attributes, it is quite obvious that the director was trying to make the work as accessible to as many as people as possible, yet he still opted to include quasi-pornographic images of authentic erect cocks as if that is the kind of thing that the average horror fan wants to see. Of course, as Kleinert has revealed in interviews, he actually gets a thrill out of shocking heterosexual audiences with homoerotic horror material that goes completely against their expectations and Der Samurai certainly succeeds in that regard. Although Kleinert has concluded some of his films with unexpected happy endings like in Cowboy (2008), Der Samurai ends in such a curious and somewhat nihilistic manner that it is nothing short of unforgettable. While Kleinert is certainly no Hanns Heinz Ewers as far as Aryan homo horror masters are concerned, he clearly has a genuine love for horror and a sort of idiosyncratic knack for injecting a certain sincere sexual perversity and wicked humor into the genre. Indeed, I cannot really imagine a film like Der Samurai ever being made in the United States where true originality in horror is considered more or less heresy. In its depiction of a long-haired stranger coming to town and ultimately being killed by a self-loathing sod after knocking the social structure of the area's equilibrium, the film certainly bears strikingly superficial similarities with the underrated dystopian anti-Heimat flick Ich liebe dich, ich töte dich (1971) aka I Love You, I Kill You directed by Uwe Brandner. Undoubtedly by comparing Der Samurai with I Love You, I Kill You, one certainly gets a strong sense of how much Hollywood films have influenced Germany cinema since the death of New German Cinema. Hopefully, Kleinert will not become the next Tom Tykwer or, even worse, Roland Emmerich, but judging by his latest feature, that is somewhat doubtful. Indubitably a formative work that was directed by a relatively young auteur, Der Samurai is an undeniably entertaining and unforgettable work that, although somewhat uneven, demonstrates that Kleinert is a filmmaker to lookout for in the upcoming years. Arguably, the greatest compliment that I can pay Kleinert's film is that it demonstrates more budding talent and originality than Fassbinder's first feature Liebe ist kälter als der Tod (1969) aka Love is Colder Than Death. As far as homo horror auteurs go, Kleinert has certainly already transcended the competition (i.e. Tim Sullivan, Bruce LaBruce, David DeCoteau, etc.), so we will just have to see if he has what it takes to be the next James Whale or F.W. Murnau, which is somewhat more dubious.

LEAVES OF GRASS

Tim Blake Nelson* (2009)

Upon learning that Edward Norton starred in Leaves of Grass, a dark comedy about marijuana dealers, I expected the chameleon-like actor to have reached an all-time low in his Hollywood acting career. After finally viewing the film, I can proudly admit, not only did I enjoy this cleverly concocted dark comedy; I was also extremely impressed by Norton's acting versatility, schizophrenically playing two different characters (twin brothers) with two conflicting personalities. Leaves of Grass was written and directed by Tim Blake Nelson, who previously directed The Grey Zone (2001), a film about a Jewish Sonderkommando unit that played a traitorous role in helping the Nazis liquidate fellow Jews at Auschwitz concentration camp. Nelson, whose own maternal grandparents apparently escaped from the Nazis before the start of World War II, once again returns to a very personal subject in Leaves of Grass. Like the Jewish drug kingpin Pug Rothbaum in the film, Tim Blake Nelson also belongs to the Jewish community of Tulsa, Oklahoma. Taking cues from the Coen brothers' A Serious Man and Fargo, Leaves of Grass is a capricious portrait of an unconventional region that Hollywood generally neglects.

In Leaves of Grass, a pretentious pedantic college professor reluctantly goes back to the area of rural Oklahoma he grew up in, under the false impression that his pot-dealing brother was killed with a crossbow (which is apparently a popular weapon in Oklahoma). While brother Bill is your typically boring introverted academic professor, who finds enjoyment in writings scholarly reviews of other fellow professors scholarly reviews; brother Brady is an extroverted hick who also happens to be a mastermind in the illegal marijuana manufacturing business. That best scene in Leaves of Grass that most clearly illustrates the oppositional psyches between the two physically identical twins occurs early on in the film after the brothers are reunited and partake in a pot-smoking session. Despite having a limited and slang-filled vocabulary, Brady admits to Bill that he has read all of his brother's academic publications. Instead of being happy that his twin cares enough to read his banal work, Bill belittles Brady for his inadequate pronunciation skills. When Brady asks his brother about his thoughts on Martin Heidegger (whose name Brady pronounces in an absurd manner), Bill becomes noticeably irked and condemns the German philosopher for his support of National Socialism (Nazism). I have a feeling that Bill also dislikes Heidegger because, like himself, the German philosopher also came from humble rural beginnings, a fact that Billy boy is ashamed of, yet the German philosopher fully embraced. One of the main reasons Heidegger was an avid supporter of National Socialism was due to the fact that the Nazi ideology advocated a return to nature ("Blood and Soil") and natural instincts (as originally advocated by Friedrich Nietzsche), two things Bill has fought throughout his life to escape from. Brady, being a pot growing wizard and completely in tune with his natural habitat, would have certainly been student of Heidegger's philosophies had he went on to college like his brother. Whereas Brady uses his intellect for completely pragmatic and utilitarian (albeit criminal) purposes; Billy uses his intellect for novelty academic purposes, consciously deracinating himself from area he used to call home.

Brady may be an excellent gardener, but he's completely ignorant when it comes to running a monetarily self-sufficient personal drug operation. Due to the fact that Brady only utilizes the most state-of-the-art pot growing equipment, he ends up owing a hefty amount of cash to a prominent Jewish businessman named Pug Rothbaum. When finally meeting up with Pug and his Hebrew henchmen, Brady illogically attempts to break off his contract with the keen businessman. After hearing Brady's decision to quit drug running, Pug is thrown into an angry tirade regarding the historical persecution of Jews. Instead of shouting the famous post-holocaust chant "never again", Pug hilariously recites with a Tulsa slang twang, "We ain't gonna taken advantage of no more." Pug also goes on a rant about how Christians historically refused to deal with money, hence why he ended up having to fund Brady's operation in the first place. Indeed, Jewish wealth is the result of Christians originally banning practices of usury and money lending, enabling Jewish international bankers to eventually gain a monopoly on the most vital banks in in Europe. It should be noted that Tim Blake Nelson shot a scene in Leaves of Grass where the camera focuses on a Pug's blood-soaked pictures of former American presidents, both democrat and republican, which will seem pointless to most viewers. Although most Americans argue amongst one another regarding the petty personal issues relevant to the two main populist political parties, neither side ever acknowledges the key issues that all mainstream politicians agree on; the unconditional protection and support for the state of Israel. Pug Rothbaum angrily explains to philistine goy boy Brady that he gives all of his money to Israel, as his most imperative goal is to guarantee the preservation of the Jewish people. As his personal presidential portraits symbolically make clear, Pug could care less which political party the president belongs to; all that matters to him is that they support Israel and protect the tiny state from it's Muslim neighbors (as we are today in Afghanistan and Iraq). After all, Jewish sources provide over 2/3 of the money for the democratic party and over 1/2 of the money for the republican party. Just as Brady manufactures and sells drugs for Pug, the United States fights wars for Israel.

Leaves of Grass is a clever comedy in that under the veil of what seems to be another stupid stoner flick lies a humorous display of the inter-workings and cryptic-infrastructure of the United States. Unfortunately, just like the Coen brothers' Barton Fink and The Big Lebowski, the multilayered Judaic narrative brilliance of Leaves of Grass will be lost on most American viewers. In the introduction to Friedrich Nietzsche's The Anti-Christ, Baltimore sage journalist

H.L. Mencken (who was the first to translate the book into English) stated, "On the Continent, the day is saved by the fact that the plutocracy tends to become more and more Jewish. Here the intellectual cynicism of the Jew almost counterbalances his social unpleasantness. If he is destined to lead the plutocracy of the world out of Little Bethel he will fail, of course, to turn it into an aristocracy--i. e., a caste of gentlemen--, but he will at least make it clever, and hence worthy of consideration." Pug Rothbaum, being a successful businessman and highly regarded public figure (with public restrooms dedicated to him), certainly belongs to the plutocracy Mencken speaks of. After all, history has shown that democracy, a political system that appeals to the lowest common denominator and gives equality to the unequal, can only result in a culturally impotent society where wealth is the sole determinant for political power. As Leaves of Grass and the excellent HBO series Boardwalk Empire make clear, you can be an immoral opportunistic criminal and still reach the peak of the American dream. After all, mob bosses like Meyer Lansky and Al Capone are as American as apple-pie.

PEE-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE

Tim Burton (1985)

Pee-wee's Big Adventure is one of the first films I remember seeing. As a child, Pee-wee Herman was someone I could identify with because he acted like an exaggerated adult man-child. Most children would love to have an adult that they feel they could understand personally. Pee-Wee not only acts like a child, but lives in the ultimate child fancy home. And of course, in Pee-wee's Big Adventure, like any child fantasizes about, Pee-wee goes on a "big adventure." On the way, Pee-wee has various surreal nightmares involving horrible and disgusting clowns. Pee-wee's Big Adventure director Tim Burton was also the first "auteur" I became acquainted with. I didn't know what an "auteur" or a "director" was back then, but I knew some of my favorite movies were Beetlejuice, Batman, Pee-wee's Big Adventure, and Edward Scissorhands. I also knew that I loved all the music in these film but didn't know Danny Elfman composed it. Of course, films seem to be more magical when you don't know people are consciously behind the production of them. After just watching Pee-wee's Big Adventure again (after who knows how many times in my life), I still love it. The film is one of few that can somewhat transplant me back to my childhood. Pee-wee's Big Adventure exerts a real childlike sentiment that transcends the line between childhood and adulthood. One could say that Pee-wee actor Paul Reubens is a magician of sorts. His acting abilities and situational humor have much more put into them than just "talent." Too bad Reubens got caught doing naughty things in an adult movie theater that people who have reached puberty do. That one public "performance" essentially caused the death of the undeniably lovable Pee-wee Herman. Over years I had become a huge fan of Italian maestro and auteur Federico Fellini. I couldn't help notice the "Felliniesque" nature of Pee-wee's Big Adventure. Director Tim Burton obviously utilized Fellini's obsession with the cinematic circus for Pee-wee's Big Adventure flamboyant and "in your face" showman nature. Danny Elfman also found some influence in Federico Fellini composer Nina Rota. I found Pee-wee's Big Adventure and it's score to influenced by Fellini's 8 1/2. The difference between Tim Burton and Federico Fellini's approach is that Burton was able to make his film accessible to all audiences. Also unlike Fellini, I don't think Tim Burton likes clowns very much as the evil clowns of Pee-wee's nightmares demonstrate. Pee-wee goes on his "big adventure" to find the bike that a fat fellow man-child Francis has stolen from him. When Pee-wee and Francis childishly bicker it is reasonably cute. Even knowing that Pee-wee has a somewhat prudish childish attitude, he is still a lovable character. Pee-wee describes himself as "a loner, a rebel." He also seems very comfortable while sporting drag in attempt to fool cops (which of course he does). Dottie, the girl that loves Pee-wee, he can't seem to love back. Pee-wee's "sexuality" is very questionable. Not only was Pee-wee actor Paul Reubens arrested for public masturbation in 1991, but in 2001 Paul Reubens was arrested in 2002 for child pornography. Reuben denies that he was attempting to acquire pornography as he is a collector of "vintage erotica." Paul Reubens public response to his child pornography arrest is as follows, "One thing I want to make very, very clear, I don't want anyone for one second to think that I am titillated by images of children. It's not me. You can say lots of things about me. And you might. The public may think I'm weird. They may think I'm crazy or anything that anyone wants to think about me. That's all fine. As long as one of the things you're not thinking about me is that I'm a Pedophile. Because that's not true." I hope that Reuben is not a Pedophile because I think that it would hurt his character Pee-wee's feelings.

CHOCOLATE

Tim Burton (2005) From the action genius Prachya Pinkaew who created many action films in Thailand and recently broke out and tapped the Western market with films such as Ong Bak: The Thai Warrior and The Protector comes his newest film. After a fallout with fellow actor Tony Jaa over disputes over directing Ong Bak 2, he decided to raise a new Muay Thai machine. With this he provides an even greater twist; it's a girl.

A member of the Yakuza elopes with a traitor and creates an autistic offspring. Like most autistic children, this one is a tad bit special. Upon growing up, she finds an uncanny love in three things; her mommy, chocolate, and martial arts films. While watching these films, her brain develops and allows her to memorize every single move, turning her into an unstoppable killing machine. Bone-crunching scene after bone-crunching scene, our female star crushes every opponent. Her skills are unmatched in terms of combat. Being a female, she is naturally nimble which allows her a lot more flexibility than predecessor Tony Jaa. Pinkaew doesn't scorn the idea of keeping his inspirations intact, which allows for some of the characters viewing pleasure to be The Protector and Ong Bak. So while she is jumping around she makes note to even imitate Bruce Lee's "Hwaa!" The choreography at hand, is simply stunning. Many injuries occurred on set and were even welded into the film which gives it that realist aspect. Like most of Pinkaew's films, the stories are ridiculous, over-the-top, and a bit flat. It seems that Pinkaew is doomed to suffer the same fate as many action directors; too much of a good thing bogged down with a deadpan storyline. In regards to the plot, it isn't the characters, it's the events. A mother who is stricken ill and whose autistic daughter goes to collect money from past debts only to get entangled in the mafia doesn't really scream autuer work. Pinkaew's older Thai films had a lot more spirit. Chocolate in a nutshell is The Protector adopting Mercury Rising. The autistic elements are driven well in the story line. The lead character is cute, dangerous, and extremely terrified of flies, which gives her this existing innocence. This film does lack the gold that Bruce Willis endows with each film that he graces his presence with. Chocolate is indeed as sweet as it sounds. I cannot recall action as vicious as this. Imagine watching a mentally handicapped female take on the entire Yakuza. That's Chocolate.

SWEENEY TODD: THE DEMON BARBER OF FLEET STREET

Tim Burton (2007)

Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street is the best Tim Burton film to come out in over a decade. The film takes chances (which I though Tim Burton gave up on) and succeeds. I have always hated musicals. I doubt that there are five that I can even stomach. After viewing the Sound of Music in elementary school I was sick and disturbed for the rest of the day. Sweeney Todd isn't your typical musical. It has a beautifully woven combination of plot, sound, and picture. I recall a teacher I once had comparing the format of a musical to a porno. I would have to agree with that assertion. Sweeney Todd, on the other hand, is an exception to that rule.

Watching a throat slitting musical can be quite entertaining and especially hilarious. I am sure this was Tim Burton's intent. Releasing the film just in time for Christmas was another bold move by the Hollywood auteur. After watching David Cronenberg's Eastern Promises (which is somewhat of a masterpiece), I have been really getting into throat slitting barbershops visits. Throat slitting was the first thing I thought of as a child when I saw an elderly barber give a middle aged man a razor blade shave.

Johnny Depp's performance was excellent as Sweeney Todd. In the past couple years Depp has been taking on many cartoonish characters (I assume because he has children now). Although I hate many of these recent performances, with Sweeney Todd I have no complaints. Helena Bonham Carter, Alan Rickman, and Timothy Spall also give interesting performances. Mr. Burton loves directing character (odd ones) driven films so you can guarantee an appropriately casted film.

Sweeney Todd also echoes back to Edward Scissorhands (another Johnny Depp/Tim Burton collaboration). Eddie Scissorhands was a gentle, passive, and childishly romantic. Sweeney Todd on the other hand is bloodthirsty, fed up, and revenge driven. Both characters made great barbers. I doubt Johnny Deep would make a good barber as reflected by his hairstyles in recent years. Tim Burton seems to have the same problem.

Tim Burton has always had the ability to make the sick hilarious. Pee-wee's Big Adventure, Beetlejuice, and Ed Wood are proof of this. Sweeney Todd takes it to a different level with blood gushing throats. But it doesn't end at the death of the individual. They also take a dive head first via trapdoor (hidden behind the barber stool) into a basement. There the bodies are grinded and cooked for meat potpie. Most people will watch Sweeney Todd and not realize the sick perversity of the film (and maybe the director?). Tim Burton has always had the ability to do that.

I know have faith that Tim Burton is still capable of producing good films. With a Frankenweenie stop-motion remake scheduled for the future, Burton still hasn't given up on creating. Not bad for someone that I expect to have great deal of money. His licensed items at Hot Topic alone must bring him in million upon million of dollars every year. In twenty years from now, I hope Paul Ruebens and Tim Burton get together for one more collaboration.

Tim Burton (2012)

Tim Burton made his cinematic debut (his first project was the 6 minute animation Vincent) with the 30 minute short Frankenweenie. A film that takes the Frankenstein story and sets it in American suburbia. Disney fired Tim Burton after viewing Frankenweenie claiming the short was a “waste of company resources.” I guess they were offended by the subject matter. Quite odd when considering that Disney world now has honeymoons for gay couples. Everyone knows that kids love their dogs. Dogs are the super animal heroes and rescuers of small children. What a tragic experience it would be for a young child to witness the death of their canine companion (I wonder if this happened to Burton?). The only option for such a horrible event is the re-animation of K9 Sparky. The boy in Frankenweenie comes up with the idea during his science class where his teacher resurrects a frog via electricity. Tim Burton has the mind of a gothic child. Only he would come up with the idea of a cute and cuddly electric zombie dog. Like all dog films, Frankendog Sparky saves his child human companion. This act of bravery (filmed on a Plan 9 From Outerspace style set) creates acceptance in the once repulsed neighbors of the boy and his undead dog. Tim Burton has always had a sweet spot for “dark” outsiders. Ironically, Tim Burton has signed a deal with Disney to direct a feature length 3D stop-motion animation remake of Frankenweenie. I guess Disney has no problem with the film when they know they can cash in on it. Tim Burton’s most recent animation film Corpse Bride didn’t live up to my expectations of the Hot Topic icon director. Hopefully the animated remake of Frankenweenie will even be comparable to Burton’s brain-child A Nightmare Before Christmas.

RIVER'S EDGE

Tim Hunter (1986) River's Edge is to me, many things. It is the proper telling of a story similar to Bully (Larry Clark's horrible film), only not flaccid and bare boned. It is a story of the 80's style of life, seen through the group of rockers and druggies. Age is clearly not an issue here. Keanu Reeves (In his second best performance) plays Matt, a lone wolf slacker who enjoys smoking dope and screaming at his step dad. Matt is only one of a close-knit group of ragtag friends that spend their time doing the same things. John is an overweight asshole who tells his friends he killed his girlfriend. They don't believe him, who would? Meeting up with Layne, (Crispin Glover in a life changing performance) they decide to see if he is all talk. After grabbing a group of friends to go see the body, everyone is shocked to find out he was serious. He strangled her to death for talking bad about his mom. I will make a note on this scene. It is actually pretty disturbing in it's own right for featuring what might be the most realistic dead body without a huge budget or using the real thing. Eyes are filmed over and nails long and dirty. Truly a saddening view. Layne thinks she deserved it. Layne is obviously too naive in his nature to understand the situation at hand. He wants to hide the body, but John has no interest in hiding from the police. So Layne does the only thing one man could do in this situation, hide John with the local nut. Meet Feck. Dennis Hopper plays a pothead ex-murderer who is in love with a blowup doll named Ellie. He is also missing his left leg. Not only does the set-up promise one of the more quirkiest and insane characters but it actually builds a lot to the film. We learn motives behind both killers and the difference between love and loss and the methods of killing. The film River's Edge was the only good thing to come out of Tim Hunter's career. He seemed to have dropped out of film early and has directed episodes for the most popular shows around. Such as Twin Peaks, House, C.S.I., and Law & Order. It's easy to note his detective work behind the camera on these shows. The real star material here is Dennis Hopper and Crispin Glover. They deliver a mean son-of-a-bitch acting job. First we have Hopper, who is a delusional man that suffers every day of his life in what appears to be a loose connection to his character in Easy Rider. I frown upon people who still think his role in Blue Velvet is his finest. They obviously have not seen this film. Then we have Crispin Glover, who might be the most aggressive actor ever filmed. His body language fits perfectly with his moods. His screams and whines echo long after the movie is over and he has the most screen time. River's Edge is the perfect teen drama. It takes the true story and amplifies it with characters probably more interesting than the actual case. Not too deep for the average viewer but just enough to satisfy the obscure cinephile."Check's in the mail"

KILLER: A JOURNAL OF MURDER
KILLER: A JOURNAL OF MURDER

Tim Metcalfe (1996)

Although I have known about serial killer Carl Panzram for many years now, I did not learn about his story until I read Moors killer Ian Brady's excellent work of serial killer psychoanalysis The Gates of Janus about a year ago. In the book, Brady discusses how after running away from at age 14, Panzram was gang raped by a group of hobos. Obviously marked by the event, Panzram would eventually go on to admit that he sodomized over 1,000 men and killed over 20. After being arrested for burglary in Washington D.C., and voluntarily admitting he had killed two boys, Panzram was finally incarcerated for the last time. In prison, German-American Panzram developed a close friendship with pacifistic Jewish-American prison guard Henry Lesser, who eventually convinced the unremorseful killer to write his memoirs. In the film Killer: A Journal of Murder, the relationship between Panzram and Lesser is dramatically portrayed in a most tasteful manner. James Wood, who always seems to give his greatest performances while playing deranged criminals, is excellent as Panzram. With Killer: A Journal of Murder, director Tim Metcalfe was able to assemble a cultivated serial killer bio-pic, which is certainly no small accomplishment. Metcalfe is probably best known for writing the story for Revenge of the Nerds. In Killer: A Journal of Murder, Metcalfe shows that out of all the people that tried to knock some sense into Carl Panzram, the most unlikely a person - a Jewish socialist nerd - was able to somewhat reach him.

As dramatized in Killer: A Journal of Murder, Carl Panzram openly admitted he would kill any man that bothered him in prison. After brutally beating to death prison foreman Robert Warnke in the prison laundry room, Panzram finally fulfilled his wish of being sentenced to death via hanging. Showing he would not allow his much desired opportunity of dying stoically go to waste, Panzram threatened to kill human rights advocates that attempted to spare his life. Despite his savage behavior, Panzram was a fairly intelligent and well-read man who could be described as the "Nietzsche of serial killers." In fact, as shown in Killer: A Journal of Murder, German-American sage journalist H.L. Mencken, himself a student of Nietzsche, felt Carl Panzram's autobiography was a work of brilliance, despite concluding that no publishing company would have the gall to publish such a sadistically subversive work. If one is to learn anything from Killer: A Journal of Murder, it is that once an individual is "marked" by a certain event in their life, no amount of "rehabilitation" is going correct such a life changing taint. Once Panzram was victimized in a traumatic psyche-destroying fashion, his future fate as one of America's most brutal criminals was sealed.

Despite being far from a masterpiece, Killer: A Journal of Murder is one of few top notch serial killer films worthy of recognition. After all, even when a film director attempts to portray a serial killer in a serious manner, most of these films end up being unintentionally hilarious exercises in celluloid bungling. Killer: A Journal of Murder is not a work of comedy, but one of those very rare serial killer films that manages to keep the viewer on the edge of their seat from beginning to the neck-snapping end. Despite being two men from different species, Panzram (Woods) and Henry Lesser (Robert Sean Leonard) have an undeniable chemistry in the film that will engage even the most uninterested of viewers. Through tragedy, Panzram was able to tap into his atavistic instincts and develop the lust for blood that brought infamy to his beserker ancestors. Through the pacifistic and nonthreatening personality of Henry Lesser, Panzram was able to reveal what was left of his pre-sadist humanity. If you hate Hollywood farces like Twins (1988), yet desire seeing a serious film containing the most unconventional of odd couples, Killer: A Journal of Murder will provide you with a delectable, yet ultimately deranged experience.

Tim Sullivan (2005) 2001 Maniacs is much better than Herschell Gordon Lewis' 2000 Maniacs. This was no surprise to me as I thought 2000 Maniacs was complete trash (not even good trash). Lewis no doubt has a serious phobia of the south. 2001 Maniacs director Tim Sullivan at least has some lowbrow talent (as proven with 2001 Maniacs). It is most likely that Lewis' eyes become dilated with dollar bill signs when he keep up with the idea to do cheap gore. Blood Feast is still a classic regardless of its gimmick.

Nothing would please me more than a bunch of college students being murdered by the ghosts of Civil War Southerners. Unfortunately for them they would no long be able to play beer pong, poker, or watch football (which they have never played in their entire lives). For them, the South threatens their hedonistic obsessions. The film features a variety of big natural breasted Southern women that trap the university clowns into a trance of lust. These Southern women don't need to buy their sexual goods. The most slutty of the Southern madams even has an extra pair of teeth to prevent the act of sodomy. The old South sticks to it's conservative roots. Camcorder auteur Giuseppe Andrews exuberates Charm with a twang in 2001 Maniacs. Andrews always delivers the goods. Robert England sports a "stars and bars" eye patch like no other. England's 2001 Maniacs charismatic performance is even comparable to his role as Freddy Krueger in the Nightmare on Elm Street films. To be honest, most of the performances by the Southerners are excellent. I can't say that about the northerners. Their deaths put a genuine smile on my face. Eli Roth makes a appearance (I hate when he does that) in 2001 maniacs as a very silly armadillo throwing fellow. I would have to say that 2001 Maniacs is better than both Hostel 1 and 2. Roth seems to take himself seriously as a director. I believe that Tim Sullivan was just glad he could make a film that he and other people could enjoy.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST SINNER

Timothy Carey (1962)

Blasphemy in cinema has a severe consequence most times. Recent films like The Golden Compass or even semi-newer films as Bruce Almighty. It can kill a film, or only strengthen its status and reputation. The effect is a unpredictable wild card that is a force to be reckoned with. Timothy Carey's shoe-string budget personal masterpiece "The World's Greatest Sinner" is the most blasphemous film i have ever seen. The plot follows an everyman insurance salesman who gets bored of the game and decides he wants to do something new with his life. Accompanied with Satan dubbing over a snake as the narrator, Hilliard goes from being in a band, getting into politics, and eventually giving himself and everybody as their own god. The cult hysteria is shown in full force as a harsh reminder of an era when mankind was so gullible as to follow another man, ruining their lives in the process. It's a very weird experience to hear Carey being referred to as "God". Even the stitched insignia of God on his sleeve is every bit insane as it sounds. Carey slanders and destroys the golden rule of life and the need to pray. Then he preaches that man is superhuman and god is nonexistent. He seems like a mad dictator. Seeing God running for president has never seemed so ominous. "Don't worry God, We will win by a landslide!" The idea of family is gone, and the basic morales are annihilated. Child molestation is allowed for a god. Carey even goes as far as to make out with an old woman. This film shows that there is a market for every Radical and every thought. People are spineless beings that conform when confronted with fear. "You must understand God, you must make the people know that you are not an atheist" The image of social commentary is present. The fact that he first goes to a concert and sees the crowd go wild for these "rebel" figures is as much proof as we need to realize that these figures in media have more power than politicians themselves. Robert Johnson did it better than the rest though. It's hard to be in the shadow of the original blasphemous musician. The film has a classic score featuring a very young Frank Zappa. Pre-Mothers of Invention, mind you. Timothy Carey is a classic actor who appeared in Kubrick's The Killing. His stare, voice, and demeanor is enough to electrify the audience despite the films wear & tear. He is the ultimate classic independent director. He backed out of many big opportunities to finish this film. Just a fictitious document of how we as humans, rely on some belief. The World's Greatest Sinner is a good film beside the controversy, which is more than many films can say. Not easy to watch at first, you must get used to the horrible editing and respect the film for what it is. Man becomes a monster in the span of weeks. See this film. It is worth the cult following. It is a realistic tale which seems like a hardcore re-envisioning of The Devil & Daniel Webster. In four words, "One of a kind" Special Thanks to Pete Cann for this film.

Timur Bekmambetov* (2008)

When I think of action films, the phrases "Fuck the rules" and "Yippie Ki Yay, Motherfucker!" come to mind. Now not every film can be Die Hard, Hell, there will never be one as good as the original, but Wanted is a valiant effort from a director who understands exactly what men want in film; Women, guns, stunts, and amazing special effects. Wanted would best be described as a masturbatory shoot-em-up, only not as horrible as Shoot Em' Up. Wanted succeeded where Clive Owen's film failed miserably. Wanted is the definition of nihilism on screen and presents itself as The Matrix meets Fight Club. This is a most over-used comparison, but it happens to be the best. Geek chic meets bullet-time assassin hellbent on revenge. That's what this film mainly is; a revenge film. Wanted is the kind of film where you walk into the theater expecting fancy gun play and gratuitous expletives, and oh boy, does it deliver! James McAvoy plays a loser cubicle jockey who suffers from bad anxiety attacks. After a shoot out in a general store/pharmacy, he is recruited under a fraternity of assassins led by the esteemed Sloan (Morgan Freeman) to track down and kill his fathers murderer. Based on a controversial graphic novel, this is but a loose adaption. Had it been faithful, there would be an A-list celebrity being brutally raped. If only. Wanted is a film that is extremely successful due to it's enormous star appeal. Not too long ago, my mother expressed her wishes to see this film, to which I exclaimed "NO!" My mother is the type that resents violence, and thanks to the wise casting choice of Morgan Freeman, I guess she assumes it's a normal film that has morals. Could she be any more wrong? An action lovers wet dream; Wanted features insane stunts that could not possibly be considered due to the law of physics, although Sloan does have a point challenging the straight path to a bullet just as Sam Neill's character challenged the quickest way to get to a destination (Folding space/time) in Event Horizon. Wesley Gibson (McAvoy) starts off in the film as an embarrassment to humanity, then later morphs into a beautiful butterfly balanced with banging ballistics. I'm not kidding. This man goes bat shit insane resulting in one of the most over-the-top rampages I've seen since Rambo. If you're new to extreme nihilism, repeat "Fuck the world" before you see this film and prepare for a balls-to-the-wall action experience of which likes I've rarely seen. Don't expect calculated shots or artistic scenery in this summer blockbuster. This is the first in a trilogy from the director of the Russian smash series Night/Day/Dusk Watch. Be warned. I needed a change of underwear after this film.

THE HOWL

Tinto Brass (1968)

Before becoming one of the most internationally renowned celluloid smut-peddlers and arthouse-pornographers, and disastrously getting involved with working with poor novelist Gore Vidal and Penthouse magazine publisher Bob Guccione on the ultimately botched Italo-American erotic epic Caligula (1979) starring Malcolm McDowell, Guido auteur Tinto Brass (Salon Kitty, Senso '45), not unlike many European filmmakers of his 'bobo' (aka bourgeois bohemian) generation, made exceedingly experimental and revolutionary socio-politically-charged cinematic works, with L'urlo (1968) aka The Howl being arguably his most aesthetically ambitious and accomplished, if not innately incoherent, cinematic work to date. A work that gave Brass the distinguished honor of being nominated for the 'Berlin Golden Bear' award at the 1970 German International Film Festival (aka 'Berlinale'), The Howl is an exceedingly erratic and explosive celluloid bomb of the aesthetically terroristic sort that iconoclastically assaults everything that old school Hollywood stands for. Indeed, like fellow goombah artsploitation filmmakers like Alberto Cavallone with Quickly, spari e baci a colazione (1971), Salvatore Samperi with Cuore di mamma (1969) aka Mother's Heart, Franco Brocani with Necropolis (1970), and Liliana Cavani with The Year of the Cannibals (1970) aka I cannibali, Tinto Brass demonstrated with The Howl his solidarity with the dope-addled far-left student movement of the late-1960s and the anti-establishment spirit of his decidedly degenerate post-nationalist zeitgeist. Starring European arthouse counter-culture superstar Tina Aumont (Modesty Blaise, Fellini's Casanova)—the proud progeny of French Jewish actor Jean-Pierre Aumont (The Cross of Lorraine, Castle Keep) and Dominican-born Hollywood diva Maria 'The Queen of Technicolor' Montez (Arabian Nights, Cobra Woman)—in the role of a bride-to-be who decides to bail out on her wedding with a wayward revolutionary and go on an orgasmic psychedelic odyssey of no-return ostensibly involving the mind, body, and soul, The Howl is the sort of unwaveringly surreal quasi-metaphysical black comedy that could have only been sired in early-1970s Italy. Politically and morally speaking, The Howl is unequivocally one of the most ridiculously retarded and patently preposterous celluloid works I have ever had the bittersweet opportunity of seeing, but aesthetically speaking, it is an insanely idiosyncratic celluloid work that deserves to be compared with the films of Federico Fellini, Alejandro Jodorowsky, Luis Buñuel, Fernando Arrabal, Dušan Makavejev, and Vera Chytilová, yet still manages to stand on its own as a singular, if not oftentimes pretentious and pompous, piece of culturally corrosive and aesthetically explosive celluloid TNT. Produced by Dino De Laurentiis (The Serpent's Egg, Blue Velvet), The Howl was actually the bizarre result of director Brass—a proud member of the so-called 'Italian Radicals' aka 'Radicali Italiani' political party—convincing the producer to produce a film based as a political manifesto as opposed to a conventional screenplay. Declaring, "The time has come to blow up the screen!" Brass ultimately created a curiously creamy counter-culture wetdream featuring hippies "fucking the muck" (aka copulating with dirt), wind-up toy fascist dictators, sexually impotent anti-war activists (one lady states she does not have to care about the war since she cannot achieve an orgasm), strikingly gorgeous quasi-gothic runaway brides, dirty and literally tree-hugging hippie cannibals, and other gloriously grotesque things that prove that at one point in his early film-making career, the Italian filmmaker had the potential to be a 'Guido Christoph Schlingensief' of sorts.

Proto-gothic gal Anita Annigoni (Tina Aumont) has been arrested for 'revolutionary' activity in the past and her corporate executive boyfriend Berto (Nino Segurini) knows all about it because she detailed to him at his request how she was gang-raped by the cops, which is depicted in Warhol-esque black-and-white newsreel-like flashback scenes. Anita's tragic story about how she was porked by a pernicious pack of pigs arouses Berto so much that he proposes marriage to her, which she reluctantly accepts. Starting where Mike Nichols' The Graduate (1967) left off, Anita realizes her mistake during the wedding ceremony and decides to leave her hubby-to-be at the altar and run-off with a degenerate counter-culture type named Coso (Gigi Proietti), who sports classic jail stripes and describes himself as, "a heavenly dog." Anita and Coso hitch a ride with the sort of banal bourgeois couple that the runaway bride would have become part of had she married Berto, but the two strange strangers are soon kicked out of the car due to their erratic and scatological behavior. After taking a double-decker bus into a sort of surrealist Sodom and Gomorrah, the two new non-lovers, who took advantage of the bumpy bus ride by boning on the way, temporarily take residence in a semen-themed hotel from hedonistic hell where every room has its own preternatural sex fetish theme. Assumedly parodying the ancient period pieces of P.P. Pasolini (indeed, I doubt it is a coincidence that Berto is an executive at a company called 'P.P.P.'), Anita and Coso later get all nice and cozy with some nudist cannibals in love in a 'family tree' (in a possibly a Marxist allegory against racial purity and nationalism?!) In a scene with segments intercut from Roberto Rossellini's Paisan (1946), the two social renegades also go to a Jodorowsky-esque village where people are ritualistically murdered and a would-be-wanton woman complains, "Why should I give a damn about the war, if I continue to have difficulty reaching the climax?," as if her out-of-order pussy is the most important thing in the world. Anita and Coso also enter a dark theater stage where a toy Uncle Adolf dressed like Napoleon goes on an egomaniacal rant in a scene where absurdist images of Hitler and Mussolini are intercut with that of a monkey. During what is undoubtedly her most iconic commie revolutionary impersonation in a scene that anticipates the infamous bank robbery photo of fallen heiress Patty Hearst, Anita and her comrade Coso kill toy Hitler with a storm of neo-bolshevik bullets. While taking a pilgrimage in a scenic graveyard, Coso is approached by a bitter Negro who matter-of-factly states, "When shit is worth something, negroes will be born without assholes!" as if he has seen one-too-many Robert Downey Sr. flicks. In the end, Anita dies in a car wreck after driving around carelessly in a sports car while sporting her bridal dress, with her newly cold-corpse being devoured by flames and an off-screen narrator tragicomedically declaring, "A beautiful girl, intelligent but nuts, had a terrible ending. I knew it, poor girl. Terrible ending...better than I expected. Also, it's not all her fault. We live in an age of syncretism. Whose fault is it? Everyone's and no one's. In fact, A is to B as B is to me. Me is to C as C is to believe. Is it clear? See is to believe. See is to believe. Nice. Very nice. Nice. Nice, nice, nice. In any case, nice."

A merry yet morbid celluloid Magical Mystery Tour that seems like it was directed by a spastic and acutely schizophrenic Trotskyite with an actual sense of humor but also just as much pretense, The Howl not only makes for an excellent case against hallucinogenic drug use and loony left-wing politics, but also demonstrates that a serious celluloid artist once lurked inside cinematic titillator Tinto Brass. Rather unfortunately, a decidedly deluded utopian dreamer of the far-left sort also lurked in Brass as reflected in the audio commentary given by the director for the Cult Epics dvd release of The Howl where he pathetically namedrops such slave-morality-loving revolutionaries as Rousseau and Mao Tse-tung. On top of that, The Howling derives its name from Judaic pederast Allen Ginsberg's obscenely retarded 1956 poem of the same name. Like Ginsberg's putrid poetry, The Howl would ultimately land Brass in trouble with the law due to obscenity, thus resulting in a four-year ban of the film, as well as a 2-minute segment from the sperm hotel scene being excised from the work. With all the characters, including the beautiful yet mostly mute Tina Aumont, being nothing more than mere ciphers used by Brass to spread the incendiary ideas of his megalomaniac movie manifesto, The Howl ultimately takes the idea of the cinematic 'auteur' to pseudo-messianic extremes as if the filmmaker was play-acting at being a communist dictator, so it is only all the more ironic that he would find his niche in the usually undignified realm of high-class pornography. While not even a minor masterpiece, The Howl is certainly a hysterically humorous celluloid treat for the more adventurous cinephile. Apparently, Brass was asked to cinematically adapt A Clockwork Orange but turned it down to direct The Howl (!), which is just one more reason to respect the existence of the film as it would have been nothing short of a cinematic tragedy had Kubrick never got the chance to adapt Burgess' novel. Featuring great one-liners like, "what a wonderful smell of smegma," "Latin is simply manipulative action of the class system," "contemplation is a bourgeois attitude," "fucking the muck, fucking the muck," "long live the married couple," and "Your order is the order of logic. And logic is always false like morale, coherence," The Howl also makes for a great unintentional satire of the truly 'reactionary' and regressive (and now thankfully retrograde) phenomenon that is far-left idealism.

Tinto Brass (1969)

After recently re-watching and reviewing Italian auteur-pornographer Tinto Brass' avant-garde counter-culture flick L'urlo (1968) aka The Howl, I felt it was about time to dig deeper into more of the filmmaker's pre-porn experimental works, with the Nerosubianco (1969) aka nEROSubianco aka Attraction aka The Artful Penetration of Barbara aka Black on White aka Barbara the Yes Girl being the most provocative, if not thematically and aesthetically putrid, choice. Presented by Jewish American arthouse pornographer Radley Metzger aka Henry Paris (Camille 2000, The Opening of Mišty Beethoven) via his distribution company Audubon Films under the less than charming title Black and White (which was later changed to the suavely sleazy title of The Artful Penetration of Barbara), Nerosubianco—a work produced by Dino De Laurentiis (Dune, Hannibal) that was not surprisingly almost universally panned by critics, thereupon falling into relative obscurity fairly fast after its release—is a sort of avant-garde agitprop flick that is part 'collage film', part musical, part incoherent quasi-commie celluloid manifesto, part surrealist/avant-garde cinema tribute (with references to everyone from Luis Buñuel to Federico Fellini to Jean-Luc Godard) and all counter-culture puffery that manages to reconcile the works and film theories of Sergei Eisenstein with the spastic surrealism of the Panic movement and Fernando Arrabal and the carnal celluloid cheese of the sexploitation subgenre. A thematic and aesthetic heterosexual equivalent to great Guido auteur Alberto Cavallone's hit miscegenation-themed lesbo artsploitation flick Le salamandre (1969), Nerosubianco is proudly 'progressively' degenerate counter-culture crud about a gorgeous goombah gal who cruises the streets of Swinging London while her husband goes sightseeing elsewhere, only to become infatuated with a lone American Negro. Although not very popular with the general public upon its official release, Nerosubianco was a big enough hit when it premiered at the 1968 Cannes Film Festival that it inspired some of the big wigs at Paramount Pictures to fly auteur Brass all the way to Hollywood to discuss with him adapting Anthony Burgess' dystopian novella A Clockwork Orange (1962). Of course, it would ultimately be Stanley Kubrick (and, well, Andy Warhol also previously directed a strange static version of the novella in 1965 under the name Vinyl) who directed A Clockwork Orange and Brass would ultimately enter the less than dignified realm of erotica (and later working with Malcolm 'Alex DeLarge' McDowell on the epic erotic celluloid abortion Caligula (1979)), but at least with Nerosubianco he demonstrated that at some point in his somewhat uneven filmmaking career that he was a semi-serious artist. Rather unfortunately, the film also proves that Brass is a cultural and spiritual cuckold who gets off to the idea of black brothas banging his beauteous countrywomen.

Set to twelve mostly retrograde quasi-psychedelic tunes by the British rock band Freedom (a group made up of members of Procol Harum), Italian broad Barbara (Anita Sanders, who got her big break in acting appearing in Fellini's Juliet of the Spirits (1965) in a small uncredited role) walks aimlessly yet contemplatively around London whilst her wanker four-eyed husband Paolo (Nino Segurini) plays by himself elsewhere. Ultimately, Barbara's urban journey in for-once-sunny London begins becoming interesting when she catches the sight of a yank Negro (Terry Brown, who is probably best known for his role in Jack Hill's blaxploitation Foxy Brown (1974)). Indeed, Barbara has an acute case of jungle fever, but she has not been 'penetrated' hard enough by the perverse propaganda of counter-culture cultural cuckolds to give into dipping into the mud. Instead, Barbara engages in a seemingly schizophrenic psychodrama of the particularly pathological sort revolving around anti-war, anti-fascist, and anti-bourgeois subjects that always have some sort of pseudo-Freudian angle. While the anti-bourgeois Barbara is at a lavish bourgeois spa, she thinks to herself, "Who knows why people who are afraid of pubic hair are the same people who hate Negroes, Jews, homosexuals, beatniks, and hippies." Little does Barbara realize that in only a couple decades, the same homo, heeb, and dirty hippie lovers that run the porn industry will also become afraid of a full healthy bush of genital hair. While in a beauty salon, Barbara sees all the women getting their hair done turn into large goofy cows, thus demonstrating the bourgeois babes are nothing more than beautified bovines with a lot of money to waste on nothing (or something). Later in the day, Barbara is approached by a little commie Chinaboy who gives her a couple of Mao's red manifestos (which, as Barbara discovers after opening the book, is really the English translation of commie frog filmmaker's Jean-Luc Godard's script of La Chinoise) and the black man returns the favor for her by giving the East Asian pinko a copy of The Autobiography of Malcolm X, thus demonstrating his solidarity with dominating cracker bitches and the black power movement.

Throughout the day, Barbara sees a number of bizarre things like a father throwing his infant out the window and said infant's mother subsequently committing suicide as a result of her homicidal hubby's insane act of infanticide. In a scene that seems like a poor man's take on a Carmelo Bene film, a dorky vampire priest appears with his buddy the Grim Reaper and the Mummy and preposterously declares, "Encourage people to make love because it's dangerous, but it's not forbidden, even though more dangerous than encouraging them to make war, so from this moment dangerous and forbidden pictures of love scenes will be substituted by pictures dangerous but not forbidden of war scenes," while an Eisenstein-esque collage (aka "pornography of violence") featuring stock-footage from various 'fascistic' wars appears to inanely drive home Brass' hippie philistine point. In another one of the countless random rants featured in the film, Barbara narrates how sexual violence is big in the USA, stating, "U.S. incidents of sexually related torture are reported in the cases of women. The torturers shove as many fingers as possible or a foreign object into the vagina and twist and tear brutally. This is also done with the anus. A tube is inserted into the anus and warm water driven into the prisoner under very high pressure. In the case of men, beatings on the genitals with long thin sandbags have frequently been reported. One trade unionist was beaten so much that a testicle was driven up in his body." Meanwhile, the American Negro sinisterly laughs at an image of a white woman's clean shaven pussy. Brass reveals the reason for her interest in the jigaboo gentleman when she complains regarding her hubby Paolo's apparently contrived coital and puritanical tactics, "He always wants silent, darkness, mystery...but what mystery? That's the whole trick...they invent mystery where there isn't any. This is their great discovery; keep everything hidden, keep everyone in the dark until mystery breeds mystery and fear." Luckily, black never truly gets on white as Barbara is far too bourgeois to allow herself to be defiled by an American Negro (though surreal dream images of such a scenario briefly appear), so the black buck assumedly goes home with blue balls and an even greater affinity for brother Malcolm.

Despite featuring miscegenation-championing images and emasculating songs lyrics like, "Free your women, let them do...anything and everything they want to do" featured throughout the film, Nerosubianco thankfully never seals the dirty dago deal in terms depicting explicit jungle fever between a Guido gal and a black brother, though the film whimsically wallows in foreplay regarding such sad sentiments. Undoubtedly, compared to auteur Tinto Brass' subsequent avant-garde agitprop piece L'urlo (1968) aka The Howl—which although similarly playful, is a much more grim and grotesque work featuring next to nil hippie happy-go-lucky bullshit—Nerosubianco is a somewhat more lighthearted work that 'teases' in a similar type fashion to the filmmaker's later erotic works. Undoubtedly, with its curious combo of big tits and asses with equally redundant holocaust footage, not to mention its flagrant fetishization of interracial sex and various other forms of modernist sexual debauchery, Nerosubianco is now ironically what the mainstream establishment is all about. Indeed, nowadays even a music video featuring sickly slag Miley Cyrus seems more edgy than Brass' film, but then again the only intrinsic value Nerosubianco has today is as a piece of novelty celluloid waywardness created during a terribly delusional zeitgeist when anything seemed possible, even a multicultural utopia orgy where impotent hippie homos and suavely dressed American negroes are the foremost liberators of the world. Advertised with the it's-too-retarded-to-be-true tagline, "a motion picture for the stoned age" when it was released in America by Radley Metzger under the rather unfortunate Toback-esque title Black on White, Nerosubianco also acts as a sort of intriguing historical celluloid artifact that demonstrates just how wrong counter-culture types were about their 'progressive' theories and how they, and only they, could and would 'liberate' society from injustice, poverty, racism, and self-control. Of course, with the birth of millions upon millions of bastard mulatto babies and various other mixed miscegenated beings, the apocalyptic arrival of AIDS, the total selling out of the hippie generation, and the virtual total death of the Italian film industry since the film's release, Nerosubianco now seems as eclectically naïve as films come, even putting the more fanatical of Eisner era Disney films to shame, but that is one of the things that makes the film so surprisingly entertaining. Indeed, a rare film that namedrops Martin Luther King, Che Guevara, black power, and Karl Marx that manages not to totally suck, Nerosubianco, with Brass' two other frenzied free-association films from around the same time Deadly Sweet (1967) aka Col cuore in gola and The Howl, is a superlatively spastic celluloid pop-art piece that really reminds the viewer how screwed up the brains of the Baby Boomer generation were.

SALON KITTY

Tinto Brass (1976)

Fitting somewhere inexplicably between big budget low-camp, superlatively salacious satire of Euro-sleaze arthouse flicks like Luchino Visconti's The Damned (1969) aka La caduta degli dei, Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter aka Il Portiere di notte (1974), and Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) aka Salò o le 120 giornate di Sodoma, a controversial cinematic uncovering of curious events regarding the history of the Third Reich, and blockbuster pornography, Salon Kitty (1976) aka Madame Kitty directed by Italian maestro auteur of epic X-rated films, Tinto Brass (Caligula, The Voyeur), managed to homogenize sex, style, and the secret and sordid sins of the Schutzstaffel in a morbid yet merry manner that has never been seen before, nor since. Bringing cinematic extravagance to National Socialist excess, Salon Kitty is indubitably one of the most subversive and sardonic films ever made as a rare work that would have infuriated Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels just as much as it would the Shoah business saint Steven Spielberg in its frantically farcical, Felliniesque playfulness and decided disregard for sensitivity for certain terribly taboo topics of twentieth century history, thereupon making folly not only of fascism but also its victims. Directed by a self-proclaimed anarchist who once stated, "I am always on the side of the losers," and a rebel of the cinematically risqué sort whose country belonged to the Axis powers during the Second World War, Salon Kitty is a succulently stylized piece of subversive cinema that is just as much of a satire of humanity as a whole as it is of Adolf and his infamous gang. Admittedly, a film I did not much care for upon my initial viewing a decade or so ago, Salon Kitty has grown on me over the years in a manner similar to unhealthy junk food in that the more and more I indulge in it, the less I care about its deleterious effects on my health. Of course, featuring blatant homages to master works of cinema, including an appearance by Aldo Valletti, who played the scatological president in Pasolini's Salò, as a penis-dart throwing brothel perv, Salon Kitty is certainly a so-called Nazisploitation with preternatural class and sass, unlike kosher concentration camp SSkin flicks like Ilsa, She Wolf of the SS (1975) produced by a funny filmic flesh-peddler named David F. Friedman (who was credited in the film under the pseudonym 'Herman Traeger' for obvious reasons). At its worst, Salon Kitty is the sort of film that might have influenced Italian Jew Theodor Adorno to rethink his deluded dictum, "To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric," because there are few things more poetic and cultivated than a scene featuring a leather-clad Helmut Berger during a magic moment of magnificent megalomania as a lunatic libertine of Uncle Adolf's 12-year-old millennial Third Reich.

Based on Peter Norden's novel of the same name, which was based on a real-life high-class Berlin brothel run by the SD (the intelligence agency of the SS and the Nazi Party) for espionage purposes that was bugged with hidden microphones to listen on the secrets of prominent members of the military and foreign diplomats while they patronized prostitutes, Salon Kitty only presents fantastic fragments of truth that are totally overwhelmed by Brass' brazen brand of fetishism of fascism. Indeed, while Joseph Goebbels was apparently keen on seeing lecherous lesbians in action and SS commander Sepp Dietrich proved he was just as good at commanding streetwalkers as he was at SS men due to his involvement in twenty girl orgies, Salon Kitty – with its images of blonde beastesses bedding deformed midgets, bloody butcher shop orgies, heated homoerotic SS sauna scenarios, eccentric eroticizing of dead hookers and Negroes, and inclusion of hysterical homo Helmut Berger as a fetishistic whorehouse Führer – is far too tongue-in-cunt to be taken too literally. Like in the stranger than fiction real-life story regarding Hitler's harem of harlots, a certain business woman named Madame Kitty (played by Ingmar Bergman diva Ingrid Thulin of Wild Strawberries and Cries and Whispers fame) employs a number of prostitutes to pleasure a number of important men, but, unlike the real "Kitty Schmidt" who actively worked with the Nazis, she does not realize that the Gestapo is listening in on her high-profile clientele's incriminating secrets. Ordered to work for the greater good of National Socialism or face financial disgrace, Madame Kitty, to her decided disliking, has her business model and inventory revamped by a certain Mr. Wallenberg of the prestigious SS. Bored with the new Nordic girls and their stoicism and lack of sass forced onto her by the Third Reich, Ms. Kitty gives them delightful makeovers, especially in between their legs. Of course, Helmut Wallenberg (played by a flagrantly fag-sciistic Helmut Berger) – named after real-life SD chief Walter Schellenberg who ran espionage at the brothel – is the one really running the show and he has no shame in trying out the voluptuous 100% Aryan meat merchandise, even if he considers them nothing more than wayward whores not even fit to shine his Gestapo boots. After making the mistake of enlisting a sassy seductress named Margherita (Teresa Ann Savoy), who falls in love with a treacherous German Luftwaffe officer named Hans Reiter (Albanian actor Bekim Fehmiu) who wants to defect to the enemy side due to his distaste for certain war crimes, Wallenberg's wild and wanton world of sadomasochistic SD decadence is set on a course of destruction. Facing a dastardly debacle of war torn romance not all that different from that of protagonist Willie of Fassbinder's Third Reich epic Lili Marleen (1981), Margherita must show her loyalty to the Third Reich as an informer while attempting to spare the life of her lover. When she finds out that her beloved renegade of the Reich Reiter has been executed for grand treason, Margherita begins her own war of murder and mayhem and enlists her cunning boss Madame Kitty to help, who is only too happy to oblige after learning her beloved brothel is bugged by brutal and sinister SS thugs. In a world where one cannot "piss in peace," only the lurid, lascivious, lunatic, libertine and, ultimately, lethal undercover lover activities of laced mutton Margherita and her malicious madame can provide a more cryptic cloak-and-dagger campaign against the highly secretive SS, at least in Tinto Brass' ridiculous realm of Iron Cross coochs and super stiff swastikas.

Of course, things come tumbling down for Helmut Wallenberg when a secret recording of a candid conversation between him and Margherita is delivered to members of the Gestapo with the incriminating statement, "My wife's grandfather was a Jew, not to mention the confession that in regard to many members of the Nazi leadership, including Himmler, he knows, "every single weakness of each of them...The type of cocaine they use...Their impotence, their perversions...the larcenies, the betrayals, their rivals...A variety of cowards!" Of course, Wallenberg – a man who recklessly and unwaveringly wallows in wantonness – dies in a compromised position fit for a SS twink, thus making for a climatic conclusion to Salon Kitty; a certainly sinful cinematic take on less known anecdotes from history. Of course, the most incriminating and insightful segment of the racy recording of Wallenberg's words, even more so than the revelation of his racially impure, 2nd degree Mischling (1/4 Jewish) wife, is his statement regarding the creation and social infrastructure of the Third Reich: "I don't give a shit about National Socialism...just as none of our leaders gives a damn. It's a means to an end...All of them have just one goal: power!...There are no ideals, no belief system!...You are the one who has illusions, Margherita...You, and millions of Germans like you who believed in us...It was a way to put all of you at our feet...You...a middle-class girl...at the mercy of a pimp...To get you and all that you represent, I've reduced you to my level...Just like all the others...Reduced to a world of gangsters...We turned everyone of you into a criminal...murderers, thieves, corrupted accomplices...and slaves." (A paraphrasing between both English-Italian versions of the film). Despite being a work of epically erotic and nonsensically naked National Socialism, one could argue that Salon Kitty features more hard truths regarding not only National Socialism and its leadership, but also any and every political system more or less, than Hollywood World War II epics like Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993) and Saving Private Ryan (1998) ever could. Although no one wants to admit, if the United States of America were to turn into a neo-fascist empire with a race-based ideology, both pimp politicians, cuckold celebrities, and the prostituted populous would fawn for the new Führer in no time just as the ethno-masochistic white liberals and non-white minority groups swoon over Chairman Obama today.

Spawning an unofficial remake/rip-off almost immediately entitled SS Girls (1977) aka Casa privata per le SS directed by guido exploitation auteur Bruno Mattei (SS Extermination Love Camp, Zombi 3), as well as countless other forgettable and totally worthless and innately impotent Nazisploitation knock-offs, Salon Kitty is certainly the filmic Führer of seedy SS skin flicks featuring crude concentration camp campiness and radically risqué renderings of the Aryan race. An exceedingly aesthetically enthralling yet equally exploitative combination of salacious and satirical ingredients from the monumental authoritarian Nazi imagery of Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will (1934), the double-screen celluloid pop-art of Morrissey/Warhol's Chelsea Girls (1966), the cultivated cinematic camp of Visconti's The Damned (1969), the psychotic cynicism of Castle Keep (1969) directed by Sydney Pollack, the debauched disregard for historical reality of Werner Schroeter's Der Bomberpilot (1970), the aberrant and aesthetically antagonistic Aryan Aktionism of Otto Mühl and Kurt Kren's SS and Star of David (1970) and The Lascivious Wotan (1971) aka Der geile Wotan and the fiercely foul fetishism of fascism of Pasolini's S&M swansong Salò (1975), except with the superlatively singular and strikingly stylized sleazy of excess of Tinto Brass, Salon Kitty is certainly an epic enigma of film history created during a zany zeitgeist when an ostensibly healthy medium between celluloid art and trash still seemed possible and would even be taken to a greater extreme with the filmmaker's subsequent and ultimately abandoned work Caligula (1979). More campy and comical than Charlie Chaplin's The Great Dictator (1940), more debauched than Visconti's The Damned, more provocative, penetrating, and scatological than Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), and more aesthetically stunning and historically sound than Tarantino's Inglourious Basterds (2009), Salon Kitty is a film that deserves to be seen at least once by every self-respecting cinephile as a reminder that cinematic sleaze can be both ravishing and refined, even when depicting one of the most taboo subjects of human history as more of a hot yet humorous whore show featuring nubile Nordic nudes as opposed to a hysterical and horrendous horror show comprised of sad, starving, swarthy, and stripped Semites.

Tinto Brass (2002)

The female cuckold is certainly an underused figure in cinema, especially nowadays, which is probably partially the result of feminism and other sorts of social plagues that prop up women in a superficial way, but whatever the reason, it is certainly a damn shame. Out of all the films about cucks with cunts that I can think of, two classic melodramas especially stick out in my mind: William Wyler's The Heiress (1949) and Luchino Visconti's Senso (1954). While both films feature wealthy yet naïve women who become almost willing victims to Don Juan-like characters that were played by bisexual men, Wyler's film seems like classless counterfeit twaddle compared to the aesthetically aristocratic majesty of maestro Visconti's visually orgasmic celluloid opera. An aesthetically revolutionary work for Guido cinema that also marked the director's transition from commie-inspired neorealism to lavish and kaleidoscopic melodramas that make the great Technicolor of the Hollywood Golden Age seem like pumped up kitsch masquerading as high kultur, Senso was also Visconti's first color film, yet it looks like the product of a seasoned master of colors who approached cinema the way a Renaissance painter would a painting. Based on the decadent 1882 novella of the same name written by Camillo Boito—an Italian architect and engineer of half Polish extraction who also happened to be a talented art historian and novelist who dabbled with dark themes like incest and necrophilia—Senso is a salacious slice of high-melodrama about ill-restraint, lust, treachery, decadence, and deceit set around 1866 in Risorgimento-era Italy during the end of the Italian-Austrian war of unification about a proud yet sexually repressed middle-aged countess in an unhappy marriage with an old fart who falls for an Austrian suave and dapper young Austrian Officer of the manipulative man-whore sort. Featuring Symphony No. 7 by Anton Bruckner as adapted by Nina Rota as a musical score and an antihero named in tribute to Gustav Mahler, the work also was one of the director's first films where he would flex his Teutonophilia (of course, both the composers mentioned were technically Austrian, but the film was made with a post-WWII context kept in mind, as Bruckner's music recalled the German occupation to viewers at the time the film was released). A work that somewhat attempts to 'rehabilitate' Italian nationalism, albeit from a revolutionary leftisti/'proto-Bolshevik' perspective, Senso makes an attempt at connecting the Italy of yesteryear to the present by using references to timeless feuds (i.e. Aryan occupation of Italy) and important historical locations (i.e. Salò, which is where the Nazis set up their puppet state in late 1943 after the Allies beat Mussolini's ass) that would certainly be pertinent to Guido filmgoers when the film was first released. Originally featuring an ending that was banned by censors in the Italian government due to its unflattering (yet probably realistic) depiction of Austrian soldiers as drunken horndogs and eager defilers of women, Senso is a

Opening at La Fenice opera house in Venice during a colorful performance of Giuseppe Verdi's 1853 opera Il Trovatore aka The Troubadour during on May 27, 1866, Senso immediately lets the viewer know they are about to watch a rare operatic melodrama that seems like an immaculate reproduction of the time it depicts. At the conclusion of the character Manrico's reciting aria Di quella pira, the opera is rudely interrupted by a brazen and belligerent bunch of Italian left-wing nationalists who not only want the Austrian occupiers out of their country, but also the Austrian troops out of their opera house, for no Aryan could possibly understand the great Goombah opera. The rowdy protest was organized by an aristocrat named Marquis Roberto Ussoni (Massimo Girotti), whose unhappily married countess cousin Livia Serpieri (played by Italian diva and real-life Baroness Alida Valli, who was of partial Austrian aristocratic ancestry) is also in attendance at the opera, though unlike her flamboyant relative, she hides her patriotism and merely watches her cousin do all the work while she charms Austrian military men. As a result of his subversive activity and insulting an Austrian officer named Franz Mahler (played by American actor Farley Granger, who is best known for his roles in the Hitchcock classics Rope and Strangers on a Train), Roberto is sentenced into exile, but that does stop his sexually repressed cousin from starting a secret lurid love affair with the Austrian soldier who got her beloved relative banished. An oddball and decidedly deracinated officer who openly admits to his lover that he couldn't care less about the military, has no sense of patriotism/nationalism, and is described by his comrades as a predictably unpredictable philanderer who oftentimes disappears for long periods of times with strange women, Franz is not exactly the most ideal mensch for a cheating woman to fall in love with, but Countess Livia—a woman married to a wealthy Italian collaborator who kisses the ass of the Germanic occupier—is no longer in control of her emotions or so she learns when it is already too late, thus making her the perfect prey of a scheming Aryan Don Juan, who is quite conscious of his narcissism and even openly admits to his mistress: "I never pass by a mirror without looking at myself."

While Livia initially manages to keep her hot and steamy love affair a deep dark secret by renting out an apartment on the other side of the city and meeting Franz there so they can make love, the Countess becomes crazed with heartbreak and jealousy when the Austrian officer fails to meet her at one of their planned sensual sessions and goes all around town looking for her sweetheart, even visiting his military barracks and making a fool of herself. With war breaking out, Livia is forced by her husband to flee to the country so as to avoid possible death, but before she leaves, the Countess is told by a maid that a man has come to see her, so she gets excited and goes to meet her. Livia's husband follows her, but the Countess does not care and confesses to her cuckolded hubby about her affair. Unfortunately for Livia, the man that came to see her was not Franz but her cousin Roberto, who has come back from exile and is more politically active than ever. Believing that his wife was only attempting to hide her cousin, Livia's husband ignores his wife's confession of extramarital deceit and attempts to win Roberto's favor, as he knows that as an Italian collaborator, he may face a bitter backlash from his fellow Italians. Upon her bittersweet reunion with his cousin Roberto, Livia is told to temporarily hold a jewelry box full of money and jewels which will be used to supply weapons for partisans who intend to fight the Austrian occupiers. Of course, little does Roberto realize that his cousin has become a slave of love to the very man that was responsible for his exile.

Although Livia flees to the country, Franz somehow finds her whereabouts and pays her an unexpected visit that will ultimately determine her romantically tragic fate. Of course, Livia is exceedingly happy to see Franz, who is only there to ask for money from his "wealthy patron." A coward as well as a con man, Franz tells Livia about how certain Austrian soldiers can get exempted from battle by bribing corrupt doctors who certify that they are unfit for battle. Naturally, as a desperate woman who does not want her love to die on the battlefield, Livia gives Franz the money that Roberto told her to hold that was intended to fund the Italian partisans, who are destroyed as a direct result of her actions, as they are too ill-prepared to battle Aryan Übermensch. Indeed, Livia is guilty of a double betrayal, or as she confesses herself, "Now I was irrevocably tied to him. For his sake I'd forsaken and betrayed everything for which the others were so desperately fighting – those dreams for which they had struggled so long to make reality." While the Countess receives a letter from Franz saying he is safe, he warns her not to visit him, but her anxiety has gotten the best of her and she does so anyway, even traveling through hordes of injured soldiers returning from battle to see him. When Livia arrives at Franz's apartment, she immediately notices he is living a life of luxury and lechery, as a would-be-playboy who is drunk with alcohol and guilt. After Franz states to Livia, "You shouldn't have come. You were wrong to come, and you'll be sorry you did. You see...I'm not an officer now. I'm not a gentleman now. I'm a drunken deserter. And I stink to high heaven of cowardice and vice!" the Countess hears the voice of a young woman crying out her lover's name. Indeed, Franz has been using Livia's money to pay for a regular prostitute named Clara (played by Marcella Mariani, whose acting career was tragically cut short when she was killed in a plane crash at the mere age of 19), who is much younger and more beautiful than the aged Countess. After forcing Livia to meet Clara and hatefully proclaiming, "I'm not your romantic hero. And I don't love you anymore. I needed money and took it – that's all," Livia runs out of her meta-treacherous lover's apartment while he calls her a "trollop" and even tells her break her neck on the way out. Hysterical, heartbroken, and on the verge of insanity, Livia decides to go to the headquarters of the Austrian army to reveal that Franz is guilty of treason. After telling an Austrian general her story, Livia warns that her actions will make her nothing short of a murderer, but she does not care and tells the military man to carry out his duty. In the end, Franz is executed by firing squad and Livia runs into the night while calling the name of the man she condemned to death.

Notably, director Luchino Visconti originally intended to cast Ingrid Bergman and Marlon Brando for the lead roles. While I think that Alida Valli made for a wise replacement for Bergman, the less than Aryan looking Farley Granger was not exactly the best choice for the role. Rightfully determined to find a blond actor to play a blond Don Juan beast, Visconti apparently tried to hire various other popular heartthrobs for the role, including Tab Hunter, but he ultimately settled for Granger, whose hair he even attempted to dye blond. But then again, Granger was perfect for the role if one interprets the film from a less than philo-Semitic angle. Indeed, aside from the fact he is rather swarthy and played a character loosely based on a real-life gay Jewish child murder in Hitchcock's Rope (1948), Granger plays a role in Senso that Visconti intentionally named after the late-Romantic Jewish composer Gustav Mahler (indeed, in Boito's source novel, the character's name is 'Remigio Ruz'). Additionally, Granger's character could not be more anti-Aryan and stereotypically Jewish in character, as a cowardly and deracinated draft-dodger who is afraid of battle, as well as a cunning schemer who debases women from other nations, with the aristocrat always being the main target of the wandering Jew. Somewhat ironically, Visconti chose to use Anton Bruckner—a composer heavily associated with National Socialism who had a lot in common with Uncle Adolf (they were both Austrian-born Wagnerites from peasant backgrounds)—instead of the seemingly more fitting Mahler for the score. As Roger Hillman noted in a chapter on Senso in his book Unsettling Scores: German Film, Music, and Ideology (2005): "In a Viennese musical journal of October 1932, one critic takes to task the New York Bruckner Society for spreading propaganda for Mahler alongside Bruckner. He sees this as an affront to European sensitivities, and he counterpoints the two composers as "the Aryan Bruckner, our German composer, and Mahler, with the disintegration attendant of his Jewishness... On the one hand edification, on the other a destructive tendency, even modernism! This, too, makes interesting reading when approaching the sundered character of Visconti's figure Mahler, who appears to the strains of Bruckner."

Although producers hoped Senso would be a hit in the United States (hence its America male lead), it never really received a proper release in America, as it was only played at a couple Italian-language theaters that catered to unassimilated Guidos, thus making the film a lost masterpiece of sorts, at least among the Yanks. Somewhat interestingly, a butchered 94-minute English-language version of the film featuring dialogue written by Tennessee Williams and Paul Bowles was released in England and later the United States under the somewhat sleazy sexploitation-like title The Wanton Countess, but of course the film somewhat betrays Visconti's original vision. Additionally, nearly a half a century after the film's initial release, quasi-pornographer Tinto Brass (Salon Kitty, Caligula) also remade Senso under the title Senso '45 (2002) aka Black Angel, though he made the story much more cynical, replaced Bruckner with an original score by maestro Ennio Morricone, and changed the setting from Risorgimento-era Italy to the Fascist era, with the female protagonist falling for an SS officer instead of a first lieutenant in the Austrian army. On top of that, frog Television hack Gérard Vergez adapted Boito's novel for the French TV series La grande collection (1991-current) in 1993 under the original title Senso in a work starring Chiara Caselli (who Americans probably best know for her roles in Gus van Sant's 1991 masterpiece My Own Private Idaho and Liliana Cavani's 2002 hit Ripley's Game) as the lead and featuring Jean-Pierre Aumont. A socio-politically-conscious melodrama like Gone with the Wind (1939) of the lavish, luscious, and sensually-charged sort, albeit much more cultivated and aristocratic, Senso is a rare look at history and class from the perspective of a true blue, blue blood who ultimately proved he was right when he said, "Melodrama has a bad reputation because it has been abandoned to schematic and conventional interpretation." Indeed, it is harder to think of a film that is more simple yet sophisticated, as a work with a misleadingly simple storyline that is layered with subtext and allegorical aesthetic references that only the most cultured of viewers will understand, at least in any more meaningful way.

Tinto Brass (2002)

Leave it to Italy's foremost 'erotic auteur' aka pornographer, Tinto Brass (Salon Kitty, Caligula), to take a classic Italian film like Luchino Visconti's luscious Risorgimento-era melodrama Senso (1954) and turn it into a quasi-campy fuck flick set during the end of the Second World War featuring sensual SS men as played by Guidos with glaringly fake blonde hair and Nazi whores urinating into bedpans. Ironically, Brass claimed one of the reasons he decided to 'remake' the film was because he did not like Visconti's version and felt the director took a too liberal approach to Camillo Boito's 1882 source novella of the same name. In other words, Brass probably felt Visconti's film had a homo essence and had far too much histrionic acting and not enough hairy beavers and supple big sippers. To Brass' credit, his remake/re-adaptation, Senso '45 aka Black Angel (2002), is apparently more faithful to Boito's novel, though both film version make the female lead older and more sympathetic, as if the films were specially tailored for old bourgeois trollops who want to reminisce over the good old days when they had affairs with handsome and sexually virile young men. On top of being another Senso adaptation and arguably Brass' last 'masterpiece,' Senso '45 is a work of self-reflexive cinema that acts as a 'fascist-film-within-an-antifascist-film' with various references to the director's previous works, especially his (in)famously salacious Nazisploitation flick Salon Kitty (1976) incidentally starring Visconti's Austrian boy toy Helmut Berger. Featuring gratuitous pussy shots of the corpse of female partisans who have been executed by fascists troops, a blond SS man selling pornographic watercolors by degenerate German artist Georg Grosz to a morbidly obese Jew, underwater shots of an SS man's hairy balls and bunghole, and various other of forms of Brassian celluloid bawdiness, Senso '45 is, if nothing else, the most elegantly degenerate and lavishly lecherous Nazi-occupation film ever made. Indeed, a truly 'libertarian' work (Brass is affiliated with the 'Italian Radicals') in that it mocks pretty much everyone, including the aristocracy, bourgeois, fascists, commie partisans, and Italian industry, Brass' film certainly deserved the 1.6 million Euros given to the film's overall budget by the Italian Minister of the Arts and Culture, as a quasi-erotic war epic that puts Liliana Cavani's somewhat similarly themed work The Berlin Affair (1985) aka Leidenschaften to abject shame in terms of sensuality, aestheticism, and socio-political critique. Featuring a scene where, "Cinema is the strongest weapon," is featured on the chalkboard of a film studio, Senso '45 demonstrates that—for better or worse—European cinema has come a long way since the days when Joseph Goebbels oversaw the production of melancholy Veit Harlan melodramas.

Unlike Visconti's film, Senso '45 features black-and-white scenes from the 'present' where protagonist Livia Mazzoni (Anna Galiena) tells how she feel head-over-heels for SS man Lieutenant Helmut Schultz (Gabriel Garko). Beginning on, "March 25, 1945, Year 23 of the Fascist Period," with Livia riding in the car of family lawyer Ugo Oggiano (Franco Branciaroli)—a man she has made a "wicked pact" with—as they drive to get Helmut, the film is mainly comprised of color flashback scenes chronicling the almost always carnal, sometimes comical, and even sometimes accidentally corny rise and fall of the protagonist's extramarital romance, as well as the German occupation of Guidoland. While watching a horrendous play with her old fart yet opulent husband Carlo (Antonio Salines) where commie partisans stormed the stage and dropped leftist leaflets, Livia first set eyes on Helmut, whose mere stare managed to not only wet her panties, but give her an orgasm. As described by Ugo, Helmut got his elite position in the SS as a member of the German Film Unit and his status as a "stud who fucks them all" by acting as Joseph Goebbels' pimp, even hooking up the Minister of Propaganda with his Czech mistress Lida Baarova. That night, Livia is forcibly fucked behind by her husband while she stares at the moon, but her hubby finishes in a couple seconds, so she masturbates while thinking of Helmut to achieve an orgasm. While her husband tells Livia while he is fucking her that Helmut is, "amoral, cynical, a gambler, a degenerate, with women too," the horny middle-aged countess does not care. Luckily, the next day, Helmut stalks Livia as she walks down the road, follows her inside her home, and immediately begins manhandling like a major champ while declaring to her "you're mine," thus commencing a hot and steamy yet short and bittersweet romance.

As Livia in all seriousness states regarding her ridiculously risqué romance with Helmut: "Venice acted as pimp to our love." Of course, Helmut has a different view of things, as he treats the city as his own personal whorehouse where he buys morphine that is supposed to be used for partisans so he can get high and where he ultimately uses Livia as his southern 'sugar momma,' as she offers to pay his way, including funding his drug use and gambling habits, among other things. Before Livia offers to pay his way, Helmut makes money doing dubious things like selling a stolen George Grosz paintings to grotesquely fat Jewish art dealer for 20,000 liras. After the transaction, the Jewish art dealer lets Helmut know that he forgot his suitcase, to which the sardonic SS debauchee says he can keep it, hilariously stating to the Israelite, "A memento of Dr. Goebbels, as a gift from me." Indeed, Helmut is a shameless opportunist who, although he has a macho Apollo-like appearance, is really quite the degenerate who couldn't care less about the National Socialist cause as demonstrated by the following rant he makes to Livia while bugging her bum: "to fuck the whole world in the ass. Fuck Hitler! Fuck Mussolini! Fuck Stalin! Livia, I'm drunk on your ass! Fuck the priests! Fuck the bosses! I want to go crazy in your ass! Tell me it's drunk! Say it!" Needless to say, Livia's husband and lawyer Ugo soon realize that she is regularly humping Helmut, but the wanton aristocrat does not care as indicated by various confessions she makes like, "I realized I was entirely dependent on him. Even giving him money made me cum." Unfortunately for Livia, Helmut is more interested in her cash than her gash, which she ultimately realizes when it is too late, thus resulting in tragic, if not tastelessly titillating consequences.

A would-be-playboy who loves gambling all his hard stolen and blackmailed money away, Helmut eventually realizes he can use Livia for large sums of money. Indeed, after Helmut gambles all of Livia's money away at a campy drug orgy featuring chicks roaming around wearing giant golden strap-on dildos and SS uniforms sans pants, his mistress agrees to gamble herself to a lesbian actress named Elsa (Simona Borioni) if he loses. Of course, Helmut loses and Elsa penetrates Livia with a strap-on dildo, but the debauched blue blood babe does not care, as she is high on cocaine and feels like she is proving her love to her boy toy by "sacrificing" her heterosexuality. Naturally, when Livia is told by her cuckold husband that they must move to their chateau in the country because the war is getting bad, she nearly cracks, as she cannot stand to be without her sensual SS man. Before Livia moves, Helmut comes by her home and tells her that he needs 1 million liras so that he payoff some quack doctor so that he can sit the rest of the war out. Of course, Livia obliges Helmut and after handing him the money, she proceeds to give him a rough blow job.

Needless to say, Livia does not handle being away from Helmut too well after moving to the country, so she offers her lawyer/husband's friend Ugo sex if he agrees to drive her to Venice to see Helmut. Of course, being grovelingly in love with Livia, Ugo agrees to the "wicked pact" and the two head to Venice. When the two finally arrive in Venice after their car breaks down and they hitch a ride from a truck of fascist soldiers, Livia stops by Helmut's apartment, only to walk in on him screwing a young prostitute and discussing to the somewhat average-looking streetwalker how he does not love his mistress and merely uses her for her money. Hysterically heartbroken, Livia decides to head to local Nazi headquarters to tell a Nazi general that Helmut is a deserter. When the General questions her motives and tells her regarding Helmut, "You're signing his death warrant, Livia coldly replies, "I've done my duty. Now do yours." When Helmut is arrested and brought to Nazi headquarters to be executed via firing-squad, Livia takes Ugo to watch the big event. A coward to the pseudo-kraut core, Helmut shouts, "I don't want to die!" and attempts to escape, but is shot down almost instantly like a rabid dog, with his young (and topless) prostitute soon running out to hug his corpse while crying hysterically. Rather hurt by seeing the prostitute crying over Helmut's death, Livia demands that Ugo fuck her right then and there in a desperate attempt to dull her own pain.

Despite being a quasi-pornographic remake of Visconti's melodramatic masterpiece, Senzo '45 was heavily inspired by the Italian neorealist films of Roberto Rossellini, especially Rome, Open City (1945), or as director Tinto Brass stated himself in the featurette, The Making of Black Angel, regarding his film: "There are many cinematic elements. Other than character typing, there are scenes, tributes to those I consider my masters. Other than the fact that it can be retraced to Visconti...In fact, the language of the film is more Rossellinian. I was more influenced by Rossellini, who was my master since I was his assistant director. One sequence explicitly refers to the one when Magnani is cut down by machine gun fire as she runs after the van that is taking her husband away." Of course, there is little about Brass' film that is socially redeeming aside from the fact that it demonstrates the upper-classes are literal and figurative whores who will join any political movement, even communism, if it is ultimately to their social and monetary benefit, or as protagonist Livia states while quoting Mussolini: "The people are like women...they go with the winning man." Featuring an original score by Italian maestro Ennio Morricone, countless references to classic Italian films and painters (somewhat notably, Brass received his nicknamed 'Tintoretto' from his grandfather Italo Brass, who was a celebrated Gorizian painter), and seemingly immaculate technical direction, Senso '45 is certainly not your typical Nazisploitation flick as a work that unequivocally proves that Guidos are probably the only masters turning sleazy and oftentimes senseless eroticism into relatively respectable celluloid art. Indeed, for all those individuals that are tired of seeing cliché World War II films that milk the holocaust, portray commie partisans as morally pristine heroes, depict all SS men as humorless bureaucrats and/or coldblooded killers, and present WWII as a clear cut example of holy and righteous battle against evil, Senso '45 ultimately offers something more morally ambiguous and absurdly amorous, as a rather risqué Rossellini-esque dark epic romance of the Hightalian quasi-impressionistic sort.

THE BITCH IS BACK
THE BITCH IS BACK

Tjebbo Penning (1995)

Never would I have thought I would be having so much with a short little Dutch film. The Bitch is Back. The title reminds me of an early John Cusack film. The plot line takes a morose and quirky turn as a perverted lone service worker is stalked by his blow-up doll while she attempts to brutally murder him while quoting popular movie lines. It's like watching Schramm, like any normal cinephile would, and then witness that torso sex doll flip over and massacre the already fated killer then and there. Essentially, the film is one big experimental pun. Say the doll picks up a corded phone in a vain attempt to squeeze the life out of you. The doll would then rasp "E.T... phone home." That's the way the film works and manages to vastly entertain with each individual pleasantry. I wasn't expecting much. Perhaps a Z grade schlock fest that can be hardly called entertaining. What I was hand delivered, was in fact the camp film of the decade. There isn't much to this film other than a tacky premise and suspenseful situations. Things get down and dirty as the man fights for his life against a blow up doll. Keep in mind, this doll seems to be made of metal. Watch as it headbutt's him, breaking his nose on impact. These increasingly noticeable flaws are easily overshadowed by the plot at hand. I mean, how often do you see a film like this? The Bitch is Back is a pop-culture slaughter smörgåsbord. A film that is the complete opposite of what I Love the 80's is. Not the best short film I've ever seen, nor does it compete, but it made me feel two things - suspense and humorous. No film is sacred. The Exorcist, E.T., The Shining; all classics of all genres are explored leaving room for many moods. I want this bitch to be back...for a big-budget sequel.

To Man-Bo (1979)

As I had explained on the Soiled Sinema facebook, I received a tip that led me to a thrift shop up the road with a large handful of martial arts films. Among these rare Ocean Shores Video Limited tapes was Ruthless Revenge (1979). Boasting wild cover art of two extraordinarily goofy gentlemen trading blows with a bearded fellow, I decided that Ruthless Revenge would be the first of the many to set sights towards. Also known as Invincible Kung Fu and The Two Tricky Kids, Ruthless Revenge passively employs physical farce much akin to The Three Stooges which lightens the action and makes for a truly enjoyable motion picture. In the opening, a drunken fool pickpockets a student of kung fu aboard a ferry. Transplanting his funds into the pocket of another martial artist, the drunken "wizard" knowingly orchestrates a burning rivalry between the two that persists even ashore. Once there, these two "masters" ("Bruce" Leung of Kung Fu Hustle fame and Kwok Choi Hon) compete in a ridiculous sparring match in which one trumps the other on a basis of turns. Bruce Leung's secret weapon is a weathered book detailing forms and styles of martial arts dependent on kicks and Kwok Choi Hon's previous master taught him the strengths of fist combat. This sets a handicap for each other to duel endlessly as they are equally skilled. Only when the two squabbling masters come together can they overcome a greater enemy.

After this primary round of sparring meets its end, the two are offered their own "kwoon" - school of kung fu. With both buildings positioned adjacent to each other, a line is drawn in between, separating the buildings and the teachings. When a local criminal leader discovers that the two kung fu masters seek to move in onto his territory he sends groups of thugs to straighten them out. Bouncing between the territories marked before the buildings, the two masters slap and reduce their enemies into pulp, all the while deploring one another with obscene insults. It is this intense slapstick that makes the comedy so effective in Ruthless Revenge; not even just the incredible choreography which features the two men vying for a particular item in a juggling-like fashion but the general insults slung at each other. The two on-screen persona's that endlessly bicker create such a wild world for the kung fu shenanigans to take place within. After defeating the local lord, help is sent for and the two masters are made homeless by the lord's elder relative. Only the help of the drunken master responsible for their conflict of interests can aid them in defeating their new enemy. And so is the plot of Ruthless Revenge - quite a product of narcissistic escapism. Mindless fun is the only thing to be had here so anyone expecting the flair of other Oriental productions such as Shaolin & Wu Tang might want to explore other venues of complicit Chinese design. Ruthless Revenge even ends on such a ridiculous and compelling note as getting slapped on the wrist and sent home empty handed.

I have mentioned before the seemingly cold remove of the Asiatics towards domesticated creatures. Not quite cattle nor slaughterhouse material; the Eastern continents have no problem grievously harming creatures on camera for, in this case, HK authenticity. A very similar case would be Men Behind the Sun or even Don't Play With Fire - both feature cruelty to felines, although, in Men Behind the Sun's case, we witness the death of the cat, whereas in Don't Play With Fire, a cat is simply tossed out of a high window. I bring this up because Ruthless Revenge unspools a similarly petrifying scene of unfortunate injury to a domestic cat. The scene suddenly came out of left field. Here I was, enjoying a kung fu farce that is obscenely simplistic when, all of a sudden, my American sensibilities were challenged when, to prove a point, a drunkard thrusts a cat in a cramped cage with an irritated goose and snake. Despite being tonally thrashed during the climax of said scene, Ruthless Revenge remains an oft-hilarious excursion in slapstick and creative combat. Even for being cast adrift chink tropes, Ruthless Revenge was quite endearing to me, even if it ended on such a sudden cue that you're left blinking in disbelief. Way to force morality upon enthusiasts and students of an ancient art.

EGGSHELLS

Tobe Hooper (1969)

Long before he became the absolutely artless and innately inept self-parodying horror hack he is today, Texas-born filmmaker Tobe Hooper (The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, Poltergeist) was actually a serious and inventive auteur who attempted to test the bounds of cinema as an art form, with his first feature Eggshells (1969) aka Eggshells: An American Freak Illumination, which he co-wrote with Kim Henkel (who was also responsible for co-writing the script for TCM, as well as writing/directing Texas Chainsaw Massacre: The Next Generation), being his most uniquely uncompromising and aesthetically ambitious celluloid effort to date. Apparently screened no more than 50 times upon its release before it fell into obscurity for nearly half a century, Eggshells was finally rediscovered, screened for the first time in 42 years, and recently re-released at the end of 2013 as an extra feature on a 3-disc limited edition Blu-ray release of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 distributed by the UK company Arrow Films and luckily I managed to track down a copy of the film. Described by Hooper as “a hippie movie” and producer David F. Ford as a “head movie,” Eggshells was advertised as a “time and spaced fantasy film” and “an American freak illumination,” which are both rather fit descriptions for this shockingly idiosyncratic, if not decidedly discombobulating, piece of undeniably penetrating psychedelic pretense. Like Donald Cammel and Nicholas Roeg’s Performance (1970) meets fellow Texan Richard Linklater’s Slacker (1991) as aesthetically molested by Kenneth Anger’s Invocation of My Demon Brother (1969) and Stan Brakhage’s Dog Star Man (1961-1964) cycle, Eggshells is an uneven mix of spacey cine-magic, plodding psychedelic retardation, counter-culture cinéma vérité, superficial Swinging Sixties comedy, and a dose of supernatural horror/sci-fi conventions. Indeed, while not Hooper’s greatest film, Eggshells is unquestionably the director’s most unique, complex, esoteric, and aesthetically ambitious, so it is quite unfortunate that the entire film is essentially a pseudo-spiritual tribute to dope smoking, albeit with stereotypical ‘free love’ and left-wing counter-culture politics thrown in for good measure. A softcore degenerate depiction of a small group hippie of slackers in their early 20s that live in a haunted commune house inhabited by the spastic spirit of a brain-dead beatnik artist who lives in another dimension, Eggshells is best viewed as a ‘cinematic experience’ as opposed to a film with a linear narrative (which the film does sort of have, but it is only of secondary importance). Featuring everything from real-life deluded hippie protestors to phantom swords fights to Texas-fried Jewish weddings, Eggshells is a film that is screaming for cult status as work the makes Hooper ‘classics’ like Eaten Alive (1977) and The Funhouse (1981) seem like worthless celluloid trash by comparison. Indeed, if nothing else, Eggshells is ample evidence that the director’s career might have taken a much different path had he not directed the film that would prove to be his prematurely created magnum opus, The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974).

It is the late-1960s and none of the pansy beatnik boys living in Austin, Texas want to fight in the Vietnam War, so they impotently rebel by protesting in front of government buildings, listening to shitty music, smoking dope, and having sex whilst under the influence of said dope. The first piece of evidence that Eggshells is not a normal movie comes in at about the 10 minute mark when a young dirty hippie bastard named 'Toes' (played by co-writer Kim Henkel) throws a paper airplane in the air which ends up exploding against his house as if it is 'napalm' in what is probably one of the most bizarrely moronic anti-Vietnam War scenes of film history. Although it might be hard to discern while watching the film, the meager man that threw the airplane is a spirit from another dimension who now haunts the house in a manner not unlike the Aubrey Beardsley character from George Barry's equally bizarre counter-culture cult classic Death Bed: The Bed That Eats (1977). The house that the hippie haunt Toes haunts is the central setting of Eggshells and, rather unfortunately, none of the other characters are nearly as interesting as the stoned spook. Unbeknownst to the people living in the house, a crypto-embryonic hyper-electric presence lurks in the haunted abode and has major influence over its oftentimes inebriated inhabitants. Essentially, there are no real main characters in the film, thus giving it a celluloid 'commune' vibe, though a philistine hippie couple probably has the most screen time. Allen (Allen Danziger) and Sharon (Sharon Danziger) are engaged to be married, but the problem is that the former does not like the latter's anti-communist gentile father, so the two lovebirds impotently bicker amongst one another in a bathtub in a scene mimicking the iconic celluloid mundanity of Godard. In fact, the hippies do a lot in the bathroom, including typing propaganda on a typewriter while sitting on a toilet in a pseudo-Henry Miller-esque fashion and making would-be-passionate love, among other equally uninteresting things. Meanwhile, the lonely hippie spirit Toes battles phantom spirits with a sword (which he finds sitting next to a toilet) and admires degenerate modernist self-portraits that he painted of himself. Eventually, the spirit discovers egg-like tubes in the house's basement and is sucked into one and sent into some sort of psychedelic orbit. In another standout scene, a THC-addled hippie writer decides he wants to be totally 'free,' so he beats up his car with a sledgehammer, strips off his clothes, and ultimately blows up his rainbow-colored eggshell-adorned beatnik-mobile like pseudo-rebellious artistic action hero without real a cause. Eventually, Allen and Shiksa Sharon 'sell-out' and get married at a very public outdoors Jewish wedding (and, indeed, the scene is actually a document of their real-life wedding, though the two apparently got a divorce not long after). In the end, most of the characters of the film enters a balloon-covered forest, sit in what looks like a semi-futuristic beauty salon hair dryer machine attached to a porta-potty and are sucked up by said machine and spit back out in the form of a black liquid that looks like oil, while their spirits take on a formless smokey haze. In the sometimes insightful audio commentary for Eggshells, auteur Tobe Hooper states regarding the character's seemingly degenerative transformation: "They get purified." Apparently, the smoke is a "pure spirit disguised as marijuana smoke," thus indicating Hooper was a proud dope fiend when he directed the film.

In describing the film himself, director Tobe Hooper stated the following pretentious gibberish: "Eggshells, An American Freak Illumination Time & Space Fantasy of the exploding Austin inevitable crypto embryonic hyper-electric presence dueling with itself as Vince Sobrosek is in the bathroom yelling "listen to yellow dog, goddamn yellow dog!" The devil's hose dog tongue loops and lollies through a glory hole to your uninvited dinner guests and the bedroom paints itself on it's way to the wedding as your girlfriend and her lover dance beneath the hemoglobin balloons the writer-man takes an axe to the exploding windshield the naked man makes bathes the girl he loves for her breasts and they all grab a seat under the protoplasmic hair dryer transmogrifying as Vince proclaims, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth will make you free." Indeed, Hooper's own description is a better synopsis than any for an audacious and innately abstract avant-garde flick that, for better or worse, provides a totally singular celluloid experience of hippie Austin during the late-1960s. Rather unfortunately, Hooper originally intended for Eggshells to be a much more darker and intricate work, but opted for getting rid of various scenes and subplots, including a curious character named the 'traveling prophet.' Indeed, I am sure that I would have enjoyed Eggshells much more if it was more in the spirit of Messiah of Evil (1973), but Hooper had yet to realize his niche in horror cinema.

Still, I was rather shocked by Eggshells as it made me realize that there was actually a time in Hooper's mostly forgettable career when he had a passion for making truly passionate, personalized, and highly experimental cinematic works. Described the filmmaker himself as "being a mixture of Andy Warhol's Trash and Walt Disney's Fantasia" and shot on a reasonably meager budget of around $100K, Eggshells is a true testament to the fact of how Hollywood morally and artistically corrupt filmmakers. After all, 13 years after releasing Eggshells, Hooper would become the meek pawn of Steven Spielberg while 'directing' Poltergeist (1982) and apparently even allowed the Hebraic producer to take control of the film as a sort of ghost-director. In fact, Spielberg had the gall to publicly insinuate that he was the real 'auteur' behind Poltergeist, commenting, "Tobe isn't... a take-charge sort of guy. If a question was asked and an answer wasn't immediately forthcoming, I'd jump in and say what we could do. Tobe would nod agreement, and that become the process of collaboration," thereupon making Hooper seem like a stoned stupid shabbos goy with a kosher-contaminated philistine brain. Yiddish midget Zelda Rubinstein also confessed that during production of Poltergeist, Hooper apparently "allowed some unacceptable chemical agents into his work” and that “Tobe was only partially there.” Undoubtedly, in the audio commentary for Eggshells, Hooper sounds like a badly burnt out egomaniac and even gets discernibly offended anytime the interviewer, David Gregory, mentions any other filmmakers aside from himself as if he is some sort of marvelous messianic auteur. Indeed, while a interesting experiment, Eggshells is riddled with hippie pseudo-metaphysics that—as Hooper’s horrendous post-The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 (1986) filmmaking career certainly attests to—in the end proved to be pure bullshit, as the director’s youthful worship of weed and crap slave-morality-driven counter-culture politics ultimately contributed to the total evaporation of his artistic talents. The then-novice director’s very own Texan take on Zabriskie Point but with an experimental flare comparable the films of Werner Nekes, Eggshells is pre-hack Hooper before the curse of hard drugs and Spielberg, and thus much be watched accordingly. Assumedly, the title ‘Eggshells’ is an allegorical reference to the director’s belief that people are delicate and must be handled like ‘eggshells.’ Of course, if that is the case, it seems that Hollywood hedonism caused Hooper to crack and fry long ago.

EATEN ALIVE

Tobe Hooper (1976)

Blind purchases were a thing of the past. Upon my first job many years ago, I found myself becoming a consumer whore, buying every film that peaked my interest. I have had nothing but pleasant experiences for Dark Sky Films. They release quality films with quality transfers. That and amazing editions. The Steel book Texas Chainsaw Massacre is truly a collectors dream come true, that is, until the "Seriously Ultimate Edition" came out. And yes, I am serious. Up until now Dark Sky has amazed me (Besides from Henry II, but I can allow this misconception to pass, seeing as how they released the original). Eaten Alive is a follow up film to The Texas Chainsaw Massacre. Tobe Hooper created the definitive horror piece which still stands strong today. The icon of Leatherface still lives on and the horror never quite fades. What better way to add onto his success than making a better film? That doesn't happen, though. Eaten Alive might be the biggest over-rated piece of shit horror film ever created. Over-rated can be a deceptive label. One might construe the idea that is loved by all. This is the most common usage. When I say over-rated, I mean that anyone enjoying this film is a blasphemous result. There is absolutely no redeeming material about this film. Not even Robert Englund's role as Buck or the line he produces that has been "noddod" at by the likes of Tarantino, can justify the existence of this film. Eaten Alive is purely a film that has no merit at all. Watching Eaten Alive might be the equivalent of a Circus midget cart-wheeling into a Hippopotamus's mouth. And yes, this actually happened. Eaten Alive has a clever marketing strategy - It has 14 different titles across the globe. Do the math. 14 different names is 14 different chances to be fooled into purchasing one of the most absolute disappointing films to be released in this decade. I might agree with the idea of a psychotic war veteran owning an inn to be a cool idea, Hell, I even think the Crocodile is a bit of innocent fun. But when these two mix, it unleashes a fiery hellspawn onto your screen that just smells, tastes, and looks bad. I don't think it would be a gross exaggeration to call Eaten Alive the biggest piece of shit filmed from a respected director. The characters are as generic as they come and the deaths aren't exciting. Chainsaws were pretty rare to be seen in horror cinema. What Hooper did with the chainsaw, he attempts to do with the lengthy scythe. While the scythe is a formidable and daunting weapon, its usage is ineffective as displayed in the film. What a waste of what could have been quality kills. Eaten Alive is no more worth a watch than having your family abducted, sodomized, and ground to a pulp. Think of the circus midget. Would Od want you to watch this? No. He wouldn't.

Tobe Hooper (1985)

Until rather recently and in part due to its questionable reputation, I had never seen Tobe Hooper's science fiction horror epic Lifeforce (1985). Undoubtedly, one of the reasons for this is due to the fact that, aside from The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) and its silly yet sardonic sequel The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 (1986), I have always considered Hooper a hack and Hollywood hooker (with Spielberg being his one-time pimp) of horror especially considering that he has yet to direct a decent film for the genre in nearly three decades, not to mention the fact that he sold his soul to the celluloid devil himself, Steven Spielberg. Of course, a great film is a great film no matter who directed it nor whether the film was a commercial failure that lost a celluloid battle at the box-office with retard Ron Howard's empty elderly-ploitation flick Cocoon (1985). Indeed, I was so shocked by how enthralling my initial viewing of Lifeforce was that I actually watched it again the next day – a compulsive childhood habit that I broke with long ago, even with films I like – and, to my amazement, the film was still just as potent with its big-budget killer, albeit accidental, kitsch of the curiously charming and infectious celluloid space vampire sort, thus making a sort of "2001: A Space Odyssey of horror." Based on British 'New Existentialist' novelist/philosopher Colin Wilson's novel The Space Vampires (1976) – an unconventional sci-fi/horror hybrid inspired by the supposed phenomenon of 'psychic vampirism' about a group of ill-fated astronauts who make the mistake of investigating a beautiful castle-like alien spaceship full of vampiric extraterrestrials who can take human form, thus inadvertently exposing the hostile yet erotically hypnotic beings to planet earth where they take the bodies of human beings – and a screenplay written by Dan O'Bannon (Alien, The Return of the Living Dead) and Don Jakoby, Lifeforce is a rare epic of science fiction that actually contains an erotic component in the form of a female vamp from outer space played by French model/actress Mathilda May (Naked Tango, The Tit and the Moon) who is totally au naturel for the majority of the film, hence her lethally lecherous life-draining properties. Originally planned to be titled The Space Vampires instead of the lifeless "Lifeforce" (Cannon Films felt the original title sounded too much like the low-budget exploitations they were known to release), the cinematic work was the first film in a three picture (Invaders from Mars, The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2) deal that Hooper had with Cannon Films that would ultimately signal in the beginning of the end of his prestigious Hollywood horror filmmaking career, but at least he proved before his fall that someone could actually direct a film featuring aliens, vampires, and zombies that appeals to people other than those who spend their lifesavings on getting autographs from faded stars at fanboy horror conventions.

You might as well be cursed when you're a member of a space shuttle named

Churchill, or at least such is the case for the astronauts of a spaceship named after Great Britain's most famous bloated drunkard. After discovering a 150-mile long spaceship, members of the Churchill investigate and find a dead army of mummified bat-like creatures and three nude Eurypid humanoids – a beautiful woman (Mathilda May) and two twink males (Chris Jagger; Mick's brother, and Bill Malin) – seemingly in a comatose state suspended vertically in something that looks like a glass coffin. Clearly not something they should just leave behind in space, the crew takes the three sensual somnambulist-like creatures back to earth, but on the way, mission control loses contact with the shuttle, which is badly burnt when it finally reaches the home planet with the three aliens being the only things that remain. The exotic extraterrestrial beings are taken to the European Space Research Centre in London and in no time the fem-alien has sucked the "life force" out of a gully security guard and eventually escapes from the seemingly secure building, thereupon wrecking havoc upon the British city. It is revealed that the three aliens are from an ancient and highly aggressive race of shape-shifting space vampires who prefer draining the "spirit" of the person as opposed to mere hemoglobin like your typical Eastern European bloodsucker. It turns out that one man, redneck Texan Colonel Tom Carlsen (Steve Railsback), did survive the Churchill spacecraft via an escape pod. Naturally, Carlsen is flown to London where he reveals how the "life force" of his crew was drained over time. Under hypnosis, it is also revealed that Carlsen has a special psychic link to the venomous space vamp, thus allowing him to have some metaphysical insight into finding the soul-sucking succubus. Carlsen hooks up with SAS Col. Colin Caine (Peter Firth) and they travel to a psychiatric hospital in Yorkshire, but the out-of-this-world femme fatale has only deceived them and the American astronaut is instead treated to an unwanted kiss from Patrick Stewart (playing a hospital manager who has been put under a spell by the aberrant alien). While flying back to London, the succubus (contained inside Star Trek Stewart's body) inevitably escapes from her humble host. Meanwhile, the two male aliens have escaped the Space Research Centre by shape-shifting into the soldiers that were guarding them and they penetrate the city, causing what Morrissey might call 'Panic in London' by turning its perturbed populous into zombies who further spread the disease by trying to drain the life of other humans. It is revealed that the male aliens are merely the 'worker bees' of the female alien as they deliver all the life force to her, which she transfers to a spaceship in earth's orbit. The queen bitch alien is eventually found on a church altar delivering the human energy to her spaceship. While Caine fights off the male aliens, Carlsen struggles to 'penetrate' the evil alieness and fight mind over cock and balls to savemankind.

Since the release of Lifeforce, Cannon Films (and its parent company The Cannon Group Inc.) has gone out of business and Tobe Hooper's filmmaking career has plummeted to the point where he has resorted to remaking exploitation films like The Toolbox Murders (1978) that are inferior to his own breakthrough horror film The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) released around the same time. While Hooper's greatest financial success as a filmmaker was undoubtedly Poltergeist (1982), co-writer/producer Steven Spielberg's celebrity and 'E.T.' imprints can be seen all over the film thus eclipsing the horror director's notoriety and earning Mr. Shoah of show biz all the glory. According to Hebraic midget Zelda Rubinstein, Spielberg was the 'de facto director' of Poltergeist, in part, due to the claim that Hooper was high on the set, or as the actress stated, "allowed some unacceptable chemical agents into his work." As Spielberg in a maniacal fit of Aspergers induced narcissism candidly stated of Hooper himself while working with him, "Tobe isn't... a take-charge sort of guy. If a question was asked and an answer wasn't immediately forthcoming, I'd jump in and say what we could do. Tobe would nod agreement, and that become the process of collaboration." Indeed, being a cuckold of S.Spielberg is probably not the most prestigious way to be remembered as a filmmaker, but I will always remember Hooper as the man who created the only two decent TCM films, as well as the one fellow who directed the single redeemable vampire-alien-zombie horror-sci-fi hybrid, even if Lifeforce is the cinematic equivalent of reading one of H.P. Lovecraft's less wonderful Weird Tales while sitting on the balcony of an expensive vacation resort at night while under "unacceptable chemical agents."

THE TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE 2

Tobe Hooper (1986)

The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 was released in 1986 as a promising sequel to one of the scariest films of all time. What the audience got was not the promised messiah but perhaps the most misunderstood film in the history of celluloid. This remains the only Texas Chainsaw Massacre sequel to uphold to the original timeline of the horrific incident that occurred in the summer of 1973. Mainly focusing on family excursions, a now lost side-story revealing Lefty to be Stretch's illegitimate daughter was completely erased. This might have boasted a scene of powerful emotions between the eccentric and disc jockey but I digress otherwise. The saw is family is what the tag line promises, but what they failed to mention is how many rewrites the original script had. So much original material was canned due to Cannon Films' not being appreciative towards a satire classic. If the first film was the landmark for horror, then the second is the landmark for horror-comedy. While not being mainly humor, there is enough grue and taboo material to satisfy the deepest blood lust. A rich blend of satire and an equal dose of horror leaves you in shock. You don't know whether to laugh or flinch. The first archived TCM body count consisted of irritating hippies and the most obnoxious ass hat in a wheelchair ever. The fact that a character this annoying whilst handicapped gave me a temporary hatred for the movement-impaired. To make a complete full turn from the original material, the newly elected cattle has been handpicked by Tobe Hooper and the writer to be yuppies. After all, these are almost completely opposite character types. One's dirty and sleazy, relying on nature and beauty while the other is stuck up, a fruit cake, and completely dependent on technology. This marks the huge generation gap. In Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2, Leatherface is given a colorful personality outside of being a psychopath with a chainsaw. He meets Stretch and falls in love. What ensues is a beautifully erotic scene of chainsaw foreplay. Clutching the almost phallic instrument of wood-cutting and death, he caresses her inner thigh with the sharp edges of the saw teeth. The result is a blissfully erotic scene in a lampooned horror film. Much of these "out of place" scenes actually give the film its own place to settle down. One of the sparkling new additions to the TCM lore is the arrival of the new iconic character - Chop-Top. Bill Moseley from House of 1000 Corpses and The Devil's Rejects fame stars as the screwy character with a metal plate in his head. He dishes out some A grade dialogue and livens up every scene he is in. I don't know what's better - watching Chop-Top scratch the cusp of his skin where it meets flesh with a hot coat hanger or Dennis Hopper dual-wielding small chainsaws with war in his eyes. The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 boils down to a hilarious parody of its former self and I gladly accept the new transition. What follows this film is two incredibly horrible sequels that depict our lovable anti-hero as a cross-dressing homosexual. Tobe Hooper has created gold with the first two Texas Chainsaw Massacre films and created cinematic atrocities such as Eaten Alive. The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 features everything to love about the horror genre with a truly terrifying scene of Leatherface storming out of a record vault ready to maim. With a starring role from an insane Dennis Hopper and Bill Moseley as the lovable Chop-Top, this remains a bold classic that is true to itself.

SPLINTER

Toby Wilkins (2008)

Remember that film released not too long ago called The Ruins? Yeah, that was a disappointment on some level. So visual affects designer Toby Wilkins decided to direct a loose adaptation of the general could-be theory of a vegetative parasite that attaches itself to humans. The rules might have been changed but the final product is a wholly entertaining spectacle with some down-right vicious effects that makes my nerves twitch. It's as if Cabin Fever and Goosebumps' Stay Out of the Basement had a wonderful Mandrake child that is as vicious as it was cute. A loving couple of awkward clichés get taken on a hostage trip when their original plan of camping gets trampled on. From this point on, they will stop at a gas station to give witness to a new genetic strain of parasite - one leaving its mark on horror society by sprouting vicious quivering spikes and practicing the art of symbiosis with victims in order to create a vicious spiny creature. The infection is spread through contact with blood stream. Typical horror rules apply. Sever the limb and avoid contact. Survive as long as you can until help arrives. While Splinter is your average horror film in most ways, this still makes it better than 83% of horror films nowadays. Statistically speaking, horror sucks now. The oasis of fruitful ideas to bring terror on screen is in a drought thanks to modern directors. That passion of film is barren and dry. Brainstorming only generates dust. There are still many great untapped ideas that haven't been completed successfully and this was one of them. Splinter falls prey to it's own appetite for destruction but ends on a relatively disappointing explosion. The final product is a vibrating mess that found itself victim to the "shaky-cam" syndrome. Due to this small flaw, we are denied any substance known as tension or suspense when we see a thorny and bloody monster rampaging after us. This could have been almost nerve-shattering but the full transcending never took place. Can you imagine having roots and splinters invading your mortal flesh? Stuff made of nightmares, folks. When the light dims, Splinter is a competent creature feature film featuring a pretty decent cast. For being a list of unknowns, the convict resembles Henry Rollins in fierceness and masculinity while the savvy lead seems more like an innocent Daniel Stern in the Little Monsters era. If you're looking for a monster movie or an infection film, look no further. For being hatched in the dull year of 2008, it's nice to have something to smile back on.

Tod Browning (1932)

Freaks is probably the most daring film ever made in the early Hollywood studio system. Even with its very simple and linear plot, it keeps you amazed throughout. The "freaks" stun in everything they do. They are the other and that is always strange to us. The film completely relies on them.

Freaks was directed by Tod Browning who earlier directed Dracula starring Bela Lugosi in 1931. After he directed Freaks in 1932, he sealed his fate as a director. The film was a commercial failure even after many edits of material considered controversial and disturbing. It was later hard for Browning to find projects. He would never again be able to achieve the quality of his earlier films.

There seems to be a trend of films featuring German midgets. Everyone is grotesque and brilliant. Even Dwarfs Started Small directed by Werner Herzog, and The Tin Drum directed by Volker Schlöndorff are two other masterpieces. Both films are also mandatory viewing for anyone interested in extraordinary and pocket-sized human abstractions.

The pinheads in Freaks may be the most frightening characters in any film ever made. They speak a language of slurred babble and have the movements similar to that of an excited puppy. Tod Browning was admirably heedless in his direction of undesirables. Somehow in the end he has us rooting for these malformed humans. Whether its our sympathy for them and/or hatred of their swindlers is unimportant. It's their strength in the end that is most significant. Got a light? At sixty-two minutes in length, Freaks is digestible on a regular basis. It can be viewed over and over again with same replay strength as The Evil Dead or Night of the Living Dead. Each further viewing is a nostalgic experience. It is no surprise that Freaks was selected for the National Film Registry's archive of important American Cinema. Freaks is a film that should be viewed by all fans of horror. It stands alone as a film that fits into no type of horror subgenre. Your getting more than your average early Hollywood studio system flick. Little Hans should be forever honored.

VELVET GOLDMINE

Todd Haynes (1998)

Velvet Goldmine is a rock film directed by suave Jewish homosexual Todd Haynes. The film takes its name from the David Bowie song of the same name. Velvet Goldmine takes a fictional look at homo glam rockers. The main character of the film is based on David Bowie's 'Ziggy Stardust' persona. Velvet Goldmine also features references to Oscar Wilde as the gay Irish poet that was one of first gay "pop icons." A young Christian Bale stars as a cross dressing journalist that is obsessed with glam rockers. His obsession hits an all time low when his father walks in on him masturbating to the images and music of his favorite "glam rock" star. It is said that Bale's character is modeled after the journalist featured in Orson Welle's Citizen Kane. Of course, Christian Bale's character isn't "in the dark" as much as the journalist from Citizen Kane. Velvet Goldmine features an exciting and rockin' soundtrack guaranteed to entertain anyone that remotely likes music. Velvet Goldmine is essentially a musical that works. The story perfectly compliments the music thus resulting in a solidly constructed film. Most musicals seem to have a similar format to pornography. Velvet Goldmine could be considered soft pornography. Velvet Goldmine is a perfect film to watch back to back with Hedwig and the Angry Inch. Both of these sexually depraved musicals follow in line a long tradition of perverted musicals. Todd Haynes was the right man for the job for directing Velvet Goldmine. After watching the deranged melodrama featured in Far From Heaven, I knew Velvet Goldmine wouldn't be short of original and entertaining.

HATED: GG ALLIN AND THE MURDER JUNKIES
HATED: GG ALLIN AND THE MURDER JUNKIES

Todd Phillips (1994) GG Allin (Born Jesus Christ Allin) was no doubt one of the greatest American comedians of the past century. His untimely death broke the hearts of thousands of Americans. Thankfully Hollywood hack Todd Phillips was able to document some of GG's remaining years in Hated: GG allin and the Murder Junkies. Phillips went on later to direct banal comedies Old School, Road Trip, and Starsky & Hutch. Five minutes of Hated has more comedic spirit than all of Phillips other films combined.

GG loves to expose his master chode while fondling it with his own shit. GG Allin recycles this same shit with his mouth. He also manages to fight his fans naked at various concerts (many times resulting in trips to the hospital and prison). I guess that would make Mr. Allin a real "punk rocker." Punk enough to scare Dee Dee Ramone out of the Murder Junkies just a couple days after joining. Maybe GG, Dee Dee, and Joey Ramone are covering Joe Meek songs in hell right now (Mr. Meek is obviously in Heaven playing to angels).

Hated is also possibly the best music related documentary ever produced. The documentary is obviously low budget and even amateurish. That doesn't matter considering the brilliance in the documented concert footage, interviews, and piss drinking. It's also great way to get a glimpse into the loyal followers of the fallen GG Allin Army. Fan Unk is a true American patriot and drinker of piss water.

Unk the Punk

When GG was in High School he enjoyed dressing in women's clothing. Near the end of his life he started sporting daisy duke shorts and Nazi-style helmets. His war was fought heroically. Was GG a true American revolutionary? Did GG Allin have the potential to start a second American Civil War? No way in hell. GG Allin was just a man that gave the fringe of society something to get beat up to. He also did a good job beating women. SKIN IS LIKE PAPER!

Hated is one of the greatest all-American comedies ever made. Before Jackass ever existed, GG Allin gave Americans true national comedy. Mr. Allin never contrived his behavior. This is what made him a true artist. He was one of the very few "stand-up" comedians. Taking hostages on stage will never again be done with such passion. Todd Phillips should have gone into law after directing Hated: GG Allin and the Murder Junkies.

FEAR, ANXIETY /& DEPRESSION

Todd Solondz (1989)

Long after his childhood years when he seriously contemplated being a rabbi and long before he became the greatest cryptic cinematic social critic of the American Jewish bourgeoisie, New Jersey bred cinematic satirist Todd Solondz (Welcome to the Dollhouse, Dark Horse) attempted to be a sort of more repel-lently neurotic, hyper hysterical, and melodramatically lovelorn Woody Allen. Indeed, Solondz's first feature Fear, Anxiety & Depression (1989) starred the severely sardonic and curiously cynical auteur as a lovelorn loser and would-be-playwright who absurdly writes Samuel Beckett in a feeble attempt at a possible collaboration. Solondz ultimately abandoned his first feature, yet it is quite arguably the director's most personal, intimate, and 'sentimental' work to date, as a self-reflexive work of patently pessimistic metacinema. Unfortunately, the film lacks the critically keen political incorrectness, especially of the Judaic bourgeois and 'Americanism' that has come to define his work. Like cinematic quasi-father-figure Woody Allen, Solondz is a frail, weak, whiny, and uniquely ugly four-eyed neurotic Jewish dork with a deleterious soft spot for shikshas (indeed, it should be no surprise that one of the director's favorite writers is Philip Roth), or so one learns while watching his strikingly self-debasing, if not rather uneven, cinematic debut Fear, Anxiety & Depression. Thankfully, Solondz's cinematic persona is quite different from Allen in many respects, namely that he is less paranoid (there are no phantom anti-Semites in his film) and egomaniacal and is not plagued by airs of superiority, not to mention the fact that he seems to lack a taste for degenerate jazz (in fact, the director created his own goofy Daniel Johnston-esque soundtrack for the film). Indeed, as a sullen yet satirical celluloid molestation of classic Allen works like Annie Hall (1977) and Manhattan (1979), the film not only depicts the patently pathetic protagonist's loser love life, but also makes a mockery of various NYC/East Village art scenes/subcultures, including the Club Kids, degenerate kosher capitalist hack painters like Julian Schnabel, no wave, the no-talent juvenile pseudo-iconoclasts of the Cinema of Transgression, and the cocksuckers of Christopher Street. An equal-opportunity hater, Solondz depicts all these groups/movements as more or less equally untalented, pretentious, bombastic, shallow, trivial, senseless and only deserving of scorn and ridicule. Indeed, Fear, Anxiety & Depression may be the only film ever made where a Hebraic geek ultimately comes out looking more sympathetic than a hot punk chick. In short, Solondz's first feature is a lost cult film in desperate need of some sort of cult following.

30-year-old aspiring playwright Ira Ellis (Todd Solondz) is such a weak and pathetic looking dork that he seems like he might suffer a heart attack if he merely sneezes. During the first couple minutes of Fear, Anxiety & Depression, Ira writes a letter to Irish avant-garde playwright Samuel Beckett reading: "The reason I'm writing to you is two-fold: 1. To inform you of my particular respect for your work and the uncanny kinship I feel it shares with mine. 2. To see if you would like to read my most recently completed play DESPAIR and then, perhaps, meet to discuss perhaps a potential collaboration." Like Beckett's writing, Ira's life is plagued by unending tragicomedy and gallows humor, albeit of the Judaic as opposed to paddy sort. On the advice of his pretentious yet marginally talented painter friend Jack (played by Max Cantor, who previously appeared in Dirty Dancing (1987) and died in 1991 at the age of 32 from a heroin addiction while writing an article on drug addiction for The Village Voice), who remarks, "You're an artist and if you want to be an artist, you have to suffer. All great artists suffer, starve, and live miserable lives and you, Ira, will yet be a great artist," Ira decides to quit his blue collar job and dedicate his life to that of an artist by living with constant fear, anxiety, and depression. Subsequently, Ira's play Despair is a huge flop, not least of all because it features a guy dressed like an angel incessantly stating, "Life...Life...Life...Death...Death...Death..." while a group of cloaked men with goofy masks stand under nooses and act as an exceedingly grating chorus. While Jack tells Ira his play is a great "post-Beckettian" work, he tells his aspiring actress girlfriend Janice (Alexandra Gersten) that his friend's play is totally unoriginal, with the title being "right out of Nabokov."

Of course, Ira's play receives horrendous reviews by the press, with one reviewer absurdly writing, "The homophobic Mr. Ellis has attempted to supplement his own abnormal neurosis into a work of art. What a mistake." Even Ira's parents disapprove of the play as they feel it features a false portrayal of his upbringing and they ultimately 'cut-off' their son so he no longer has free time to work on his art, with his father telling him that he might be able to write another play one day if he becomes successful after working for decades at a string factory. To add insult to injury, Ira soon learns that his dullard schoolboy 'friend' Donny (Stanley Tucci) is now a critically and monetarily successful playwright who is constantly compared to his hero Beckett. Of course, Ira's life is no less calamitous, as his exceedingly whiney and seemingly half-retarded girlfriend Sharon (played by Jill Wisoff, who later composed music for Solondz's 1995 cult hit Welcome to the Dollhouse) is a clingy ex-pill-popper who the aspiring playwright has been trying to break-up with for some time, but every time he tries, she attempts to commit suicide. Meanwhile, Ira becomes obsessed with a degenerate half-braindead punk-goth 'club kid'/performance artist named 'Junk' (Jane Hamper)—a walking and talking art school cliché—who grew up in the suburbs yet says moronic things like, "living in suburbia was such a degrading experience, I mean, like I had to wear a dress" and who proudly states, "Maybe I'm junk...but at least I'm not trash like you" and "I don't do junk, I am junk." Junk is an unwitting fag hag that is suspicious that Ira might be gay because virtually every single one of her boyfriends in the past were gay, except for one with whom she "used to share syringes." When Ira sets up a date with Junk at the 1988 New York Gay Film Festival at Bleecker St. Cinema, she naturally does not show up. Of course, Ira's night only gets worse when he ex-girlfriend Sharon attempts to commit suicide by downing various pills with Jack Daniels, but he brings her to Beth Israel Medical Center in time, so unfortunately she survives and continues to nag him with histrionic threats of self-slaughter. While Ira manages to start a quasi-romance with Junk, the pathetic playwright's 'Jack' soon steals her away from him. Luckily, Ira manages to get with Jack's ex-girlfriend Janice, who he has always had a thing for, but that does not last long. Meanwhile's Ira's successful 'friend' Donny agrees to help him become a revered playwright, though he warns him regarding the art world, "They are not into truth, they are not into art, they are not into beauty...it's all self-promotion and bourgeois protection." To Ira's surprise, Donny is now dating his ex-girlfriend Sharon, who is now a successful mime. While Ira attempts to get Sharon back, telling her he never realized how "beautiful" she is, his once-desperate ex ultimately turns him down. In the end, Ira goes back to working his blue collar window installing job and falls out of a window, though he finally receives a reply from Samuel Beckett, who writes, "Dear Ira, keep on writing."

Luckily, after Fear, Anxiety & Depression, director Todd Solondz continued writing, as all his subsequent works are undoubtedly superior to his debut film, yet it still has its merits as a reasonably mirthful piece of naked neuroticism with camp elements that makes for a marvelous mockery of the rotten Big Apple and its superlatively overrated and always degenerate art subcultures. In many ways, the film features Solondz at a more innocent and less unhinged point in his career when he had yet to become completely enamored with the spoiled and increasingly dumber Jewish bourgeoisie, American Zionism, multiculturalism, pedophilia, black-on-white rape, and other assorted untouchable but increasingly pertinent subjects that no gentile could get away with cinematically portraying. Indeed, Solondz has become like the bad bastard prodigal son of tragic Austrian Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger and Woody Allen, as a man who has more or less cinematically depicted virtually every deranged Judaic pathology known to man, hence why his films have become less than popular and more absurd and esoteric over the years. Interestingly, the auteur once stated of his work, "My movies aren't for everyone, especially people who like them." Of course, it is quite apparent while watching Fear, Anxiety & Depression that the film, as a highly personal auteur piece, was made for the director himself, thus making it all the more ironic that Solondz ultimately abandoned the work. Indeed, I think it was wise for Solondz to give up the Allen routine early on in the game and stay completely behind the camera, as, I for one, can only handle looking at Hebrews that resemble caricatures for National Socialist propagandist Julius Streicher's tabloid magazine Der Stürmer for so long before feeling like I am trapped in some sort of autistic Freudian pandemonium. Indeed, Fear, Anxiety & Depression is certainly a nauseatingly neurotic Hebraic nightmare of sorts, but it is also a Solondz flick and of course that makes all the difference.

FEAR, ANXIETY /& DEPRESSION

HAPPINESS

Todd Solondz (1998)

Todd Solondz is easily one of the most controversial contemporary American filmmakers. Despite his perverted sensibilities and obsessions, Solondz seems to rarely receive negative criticism from film critics. I guess the rationality is as long as it's contributing to the decline of morals in the United States and abroad, it's OK. Todd Solondz's Happiness, which isn't a happy film at all, attempts to dissect various Americans real hidden sexual perversions and embarrassments.

One of the main characters of Happiness is an upper middle class psychiatrist name Bill who likes to masturbate to magazines featuring "cool" pre-teen boys. Like many psychiatrist's, Bill really isn't too mentally stable himself as he likes drugging and raping young boys. Todd Solondz paints Bill's family as the ideal American family in upper middle class suburbia. Only Mr. Solondz could make such a sick joke out of the most seemingly typical of nuclear families. Dr. Bill has a bitch for a housewife that seems to have some pent up aggression from her lack of sexual activities. It must suck for a wife when her husband would rather fuck young boys.

Phillip Seymour Hoffman does an extraordinary job as a pervert that likes to jerk off whilst making dirty phone calls. This man is obsessed with his next door apartment neighbor and is willing to make a complete degenerate ass of himself while trying to obtain her love. This perverted prank caller also happens to have a beast of a woman infatuated with him. A woman that is raped by a tiny Latino man name Pedro who is about 1/3 her size. She also likes to mention how Pedro lost his penis.

Sick Pedophile or just your average psychiatrist?

Happiness features a variety of other perverts that are guaranteed to make the most desensitized of viewers feel uncomfortable. Todd Solondz managed to create an ordinary looking and constructed film that is full of the most depraved sexualities ever captured celluloid. When I say depraved sexualities, I don't mean the type you would expect to see in a Mexican surrealist film. I mean the type that you would expect to hear about on the five o'clock news. Todd Solondz is a director that does the opposite of what most directors do; he confronts the harsh and unmentionable realities of our society.

STORYTELLING

Todd Solondz (2001)

Todd Solondz's Storytelling tells two special stories blending "fact" and "fiction." In today's so-called "postmodern" world, fact and fiction have started to blur. A piece of filth like Michael Moore's Sicko is a great example of something claiming to be "fact" but going in the direction of "fiction." YouTube is also full of videos that make one wonder what is real and what isn't. In today's world, it doesn't matter if something is real. What matters is if someone is willing to believe it's real. Todd Solondz takes a somewhat politically incorrect approach to examining the difference between "fact" and "fiction" with Storytelling. The first half of Storytelling is called "fiction." This half of the film follows a white girl at your typical liberal arts school. She dates a boy with a physical handicap, she has pink hair, and she promotes various forms of diversity (or weakness). Essentially, this girl is your typical naïve college girl that falls prey to the lie that is liberal arts cultural Marxism. Eventually she lands into the bedroom of her very angry and large Negro college professor. He has written a book called A Sunday Lynching and is typical of your angry black professor. "NIGGER FUCK ME HARD" is what the black professor forces his pupil to say while reaming her from behind. The girl fought racism by getting raped by her black teacher as she has embraced multiculturalism to its fullest. Sadly, she goes back to her handicapped boyfriend and cries. Fortunately, the unexpected sexual experience enables her to do the best writing of her life. The students are offended by the "fictional" story, then the girl blurts out that it actually happened. The Negro professor then affirms that once something is on paper, it is fiction. The second half of Storytelling, "Non-fiction," follows a well off Jewish Zionist family from New Jersey. The son in the family, Scooby, is a very apathetic fellow. He allows homosexuals to blow him for just the hell of it. He also enjoys categorizing his CD collection on weekends. Scooby seems to have an admiration for Adolf Hitler as if it wasn't for Hitler, Scooby would have never been born. Director Todd Solondz was brought up a Jew and had ambitions of being a Rabbi at an early age. With "Non-fiction", Solondz doesn't hold back in his critique on the modern day American Jewish family. "Non-fiction" follows a loser documentary filmmaker filming a documentary about Scooby and his family. The documentary almost immediately becomes an exploitation as many documentaries are. American Movie documentary star Mike Schank is also featured in "Non-fiction." This is no surprise as Schank was kind of exploited in American Movie. I recall a bitchy young Jewish liberal professor I once had that fell into hysterics as she laughed at such a pathetic man of European descent. Still, American Movie is one of the greatest American documentaries. An elderly Hispanic woman takes revenge against a Bourgeoisie Jewish family in Storytelling. Todd Solondz has yet to make a bad film, and Storytelling is a great example of that. In these modern days of cultural Marxism and authoritarian censorship, it is hard to find an artist that is willing to stand up to Hollywood. Todd Solondz is just lucky that he had a Bar Mitzvah, as he has a little more freedom. When watching Selma Blair get plowed by a gigantic Afro-American, just remind yourself "It's only a movie."

PALINDROMES

Todd Solondz (2004)

Certainly, virtually every little girl with a truly feminine soul dreams of growing up to be a mother. The inclination to care for another being, especially one of your own flesh and blood, is so strong from an early age that little girls are inevitably stereotyped as playing with baby dolls, an innate desire which eventually prepares them for future motherhood. Of course, the real, tangible future fruition of this childhood, feminine fantasy—having a real baby and the point in time in which one chooses to do so—is determined by numerous, intertwined factors: genetic predisposition first and foremost perhaps (the possibility that our genes are more in control of guiding our destinies than the conscious mind) but with the strong or subtle influence of environmental factors such as one's family dynamic growing up, surrounding peer pressure, delaying child birth in order to pursue career aspirations, or an unexpected, accidental (or not so accidental) teenage pregnancy. Thoroughly cynical American Jewish auteur Todd Solondz (Welcome to the Dollhouse (1995) and Happiness (1998)) masterfully portrays this topic in Palindromes (2004) with his brilliantly cast showcase of American degeneracy covering the rather unpleasant and controversial subject of abortion as well as pedophilia and kooky, cultish fundamentalist Christians, all delivered in his typically sardonic fashion; this time, however, he delivers with a bit less humor than usual and a much more biting and serious tone which will surely elicit pangs of sympathy and possibly even horror-filled empathy from pro-choice and pro-life women alike, especially those woeful ones of the fairer sex who have themselves undergone an ill-fated abortion (or elicit pride in the thankfully small minority of deluded feminists who believe that abortion is a sacred and celebrated rite of passage which all young women should undergo).

Intended as a sequel to Solondz's Welcome to the Dollhouse (1995), Palindromes opens by paying homage to the former's main character, Dawn Wiener, the paltry and pathetic protagonist who has apparently committed suicide after being date raped and falling pregnant with some misbegotten offspring (it is worth noting that Solondz had originally intended for Heather Matarazzo to reprise her role as Dawn but she adamantly refused, leaving him with no choice but to kill off her unfortunate character). Dawn's brother, Mark, donning stereotypical Jewish garb with mournful Hebraic prayers being sung in the background (and who has apparently become a full-fledged pedophile), steps up to a pulpit beside her casket to deliver a pitiful eulogy to his ever doomed sibling. The scene then cuts to Joyce Victor (played by Ellen Barkin (Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, Ocean's Thirteen) and who looks very believable in the part with her cosmetically "enhanced" face and Botoxed to hell trout pout blowjob lips), the do-gooder, liberal Jewish matriarch of the one-child Victor clan, which is of direct relation to the Wiener family, consoling her chubby, adopted black daughter Aviva after Dawn's funeral as she tucks her in for the night (the entire scene, while appearing utterly ridiculous, is entirely plausible as it is so much the norm nowadays for deracinated whites to be seen gingerly caring for the offspring of other alien races). Aviva joyfully proclaims that she doesn't want to be anything like Dawn, a total loser, and that it is her greatest and not so unusual wish as a little girl to someday "have lots and lots of babies!" ushering in the main theme of the film: Aviva's undying maternal yearning and ultimate journey to go about having a baby at any cost, even if it means awkwardly sleeping with and becoming impregnated by virginal, under-aged, spoiled Jewish boys or perverted pedophile, racially ambiguous truckers with sickeningly hypocritical Christian bents.

Of important mention here is Solondz's use of multiple characters of varying ages, sexes, and races to portray Aviva at various points in her journey. I found this unusual and radical filmic device—which calls to mind Luis Bunuel's That Obscure Object of Desire (1977) in which two actresses alternate in playing the same lead—to be somewhat interesting, but a bit pretentious (while some reviewers take the rather predictable and absurd standpoint that this technique was employed solely to test the viewers' biases toward certain characters who are facing the same difficult situation, Solondz himself noted, "I just think it's a neat idea" and also noted how frequently it is used in soap operas and television series, but never "in the movies.") The film is sliced into chronological chapters, aptly titled with either a blue or pink baby theme and name, to represent whichever incarnation of Aviva will manifest herself, ranging from "Judah" Aviva (who in my eyes represents the most true-to-life Aviva as a young, unattractive, frizzy-haired Jewess of presumably Russian extraction in actuality); to "Henry" Aviva (played by a gawky, red-head who looks like an ardent fan of Blind Melon and who probably believes she died at Woodstock in a past life); to "Huckleberry" Aviva (who is apparently a male but appeared entirely female to me upon initial viewing of the film); to, perhaps most shockingly of all, "Mama Sunshine" Aviva, a morbidly obese negress who bears a striking resemblance to Gabourey Sibide of Precious (2009) fame; to "Mark" Aviva, played by Jennifer Jason Leigh who, in spite of being roughly 40 years old at the time of filming, very effectively pulled off the whole gawky and awkward adolescent girl look, among several other versions of Aviva. In spite of the actors' vast physical differences, each very effectively and uniformly pulls off being Aviva in spirit: a gawky, 12-year old Jewish girl from New Jersey with a penchant for wearing too tight pants and midriff tops and who is painfully, neurotically soft-spoken, and who, in spite of her bourgeois Jewish upbringing in the suburbs, intrinsically wants nothing more than to live and die by the penis, not as a sex-crazed teenage slut you'd see on the Maury Povich show, but above all else, so that she can become an unwed, teenage mother with "lots and lots of babies."

could easily fit in as the homely, teenage wife of a Rebbe in New York's Diamond District. Aviva, wearing a too-tight, belly baring shirt and ill-fitting jeans out of which her belly fat seems to pour (as she does throughout the film), attends a summer get-together with her parents at the home of some fellow Jews where she enjoys some alone time with Judah, the other family's spoiled, overweight, and horny virgin son who has posters of fake-breasted, faux-Aryan porn stars plastered all over his bedroom walls. After rather awkwardly viewing a pornographic film together (and both being seemingly unimpressed with it), Judah and Aviva decide to partake in carnal knowledge together for the first time, albeit for entirely different reasons—Judah, to prove his prowess and finally “make it” with a girl, and Aviva, to get pregnant. Somewhat miraculously, in spite of Judah lasting barely more than 30 seconds, and despite it being her first time, Aviva pulls it off and gets pregnant, giving some credence to the oft-spoken mantra of high school sex-ed that “it only takes once.” After falling ill with morning sickness as the newly incarnated, red-headed “Henry” Aviva, she is found out by her furious parents who, in spite of her pitiful, naive protests to keep the baby, insist that she have an abortion, which her thoroughly leftist, pro-choice mother Joyce justifies by revealing that she herself aborted Aviva's little brother many years before, citing rather insignificant financial reasons for slaughtering the baby, and that the cluster of cells rapidly dividing within her womb to form into a new human being is, “not a baby—not yet; it's like it's just a tumor!” Aviva winds up seeing the same Jewish abortion doctor, aptly named Dr. Fleischer (meaning “butcher” in German) who aborted her baby brother years before, who proceeds to take care of Aviva's little problem, albeit accidentally giving her a hysterectomy in the process. Upon waking after the ill-fated procedure, Aviva's parents begrudgingly reveal to her that her misbegotten offspring would have been a girl, opting to leave out the unfortunate, life-transforming bit about her inability to ever conceive a child again. In the aftermath of this traumatic situation, and still with the undying desire to have a baby at any cost, Aviva decides to run away from home and hitchhike to wherever she may find some easily obtainable, wanton, and wayward source of biological gold (semen).

As “Henrietta” Aviva (who looks very much like “Judah” Aviva), the desperate teen attempts to hitch a ride with any stranger who is willing to pick her up on a busy New Jersey freeway. Coincidentally, Dawn Wiener's pedophile brother, Mark, who is driving an old clunker Mercedes Benz, picks her up at the side of the road, imploring her to let him take her home. She coldly and adamantly refuses, and he goes on to explain to her that her name is a palindrome, meaning that it's spelled the same way backwards as forwards (as the director put it, “this functions as a loose metaphor for the ways in which we don't change...the nature of the film explores that part of ourselves which does not change, which is one of the film's central themes: change vs. stasis”). Aviva agrees to wait in the parking lot in his car while he runs some errands. Instead of waiting, however, Aviva jumps into the back of a truck in the parking lot having no clue, nor caring, where it may eventually lead her. Aviva winds up in the front passenger seat with the truck driver many miles into the journey (presumably somewhere in the south), and that night, the pernicious, yet awkward pedophile winds up defiling her the Catholic way in a budget motel. The next morning, "Joe," a somewhat strange, racially ambiguous cross between a wop and a redneck with a predilection for flannel shirts, deserts Aviva leaving her on her own again, sexually satisfied yet obviously fearful of being caught for his thoroughly perverse butt-buggering of a preteen girl. Like most idiotic teenage girls who come into contact with pedophiles, Aviva seems rather enamored with and fawns over the much older, lascivious lumberjack-like trucker, seemingly the first male to give her any real attention, softly remarking before he makes his stealthy exit that for her, "last night was...beautiful," not realizing he's a filthy pervert who's only looking to take advantage of her. Abandoned and dejected, Aviva is incarnated as "Huckleberry" Aviva, in actuality a boy who looks like a dykey mid-western teenage girl, and traverses by foot the nearby countryside, eventually hopping on what appears to be an abandoned Fisher-Price children's boat in a lake and floating, somewhat symbolically in a biblical sense, downstream, destination unknown.

Awakening on a shore in the middle of the woods as perhaps her most curious incarnation, "Mama Sunshine" Aviva, a morbidly obese, middle-aged black female, Aviva meets Peter Paul, an overly friendly and helpful, cystic-fibrosis addled youth who has stumbled upon her (of obvious Semitic extraction and who could easily pass for Ben Stein's son), who unquestioningly welcomes her into his adopted family, the Sunshine clan, a group of fundamentalist Christians (and very obvious contrast to Aviva's liberal, Jewish family), who have adopted a motley crew of assorted retarded and deformed children (who would have otherwise been aborted had their mothers not been totally out of their minds on drugs, retardation, and/or religion), including a blind, albino Nordic girl, a creepy and flagrantly faggy twink with a boyish bowl cut (who seems to have nothing wrong with him except that he looks like he could have easily starred in some degenerate trash twink porn), an Indian midget with a barely intelligible lisp, a characteristically chipper boy named Skippy with Down Syndrome, and a mulatto flipper baby, all of whom are cared for by "Mama Sunshine," a kind and matronly big-bosomed, Borreby Jesus fanatic who presumably couldn't have children of her own and so graciously took on "the Lord's work" by adopting and caring for a veritable zoo of every type of retard known to man. Soon after arriving at the Sunshine home, Aviva falls into a deep sleep, during which Mama Sunshine has her examined by the family physician, "Dr. Dan", who determines that she is sick from dehydration. After waking up and rather flagrantly but convincingly lying about her dubious origins (citing that her parents had been killed in the 9/11 attacks, that her kindly grandmother died of brain cancer, and that her cruel, evil foster parents abused her), Aviva is warmly welcomed into the family by Mama Sunshine who dresses her in a matronly pink dress that when adorned by this particular incarnation of Aviva very effectively evokes the image of the shrimp n' grits makin' "Mammy" caricature of the antebellum south.

Aviva takes a walk with Peter Paul in which he leads her to a nearby, abandoned tract of land where the dismembered parts of aborted fetuses are illegally disposed of in plastic bags, along with various other assorted garbage. Horrified and screaming after Peter Paul innocently picks up a bag of guts to show to her, the two kneel down and say a prayer for the unborn children, which is bizarrely punctuated with a kiss as Peter Paul seems to have an unrelenting crush on Aviva. Around this time, he also reveals to her that the family has a good friend, a man named Earl, who was once a convict but has since reformed himself as a born-again Christian, who lives in a trailer near the family's property. Later that day, after being welcomed into the physically deformed, yet spiritually perfect family and even joining the family's Christian pop group, "The Sunshine Singers," in which the children ecstatically sing (sometimes almost eerily erotically so in mainstream pop fashion a la Britney Spears or N' Sync) of their love for Jesus, Aviva shockingly learns that Earl is actually "Joe," the same man who took her anal virginity in a hotel room and abandoned her just days before, after he shows up with Dr. Dan while the children are performing a dance routine in the family's basement. The two make eye contact but say nothing to each other, and later that night, as she is spying on the male head of the household, Mr. Sunshine, Dr. Dan, and Earl in a private room in the basement, she learns that Dr. Dan had rather disgustingly taken photos of her genitals while she was unconscious, which he shows to Mr. Sunshine and Earl, remarking with this photographic evidence that Aviva is clearly a "child whore." The three then begin discussing their plans to assassinate Dr. Fleischer in New Jersey, the very same abortion doctor who very recently performed Aviva's ill-fated procedure just weeks before. Aviva, still eager to win Earl's love and affection and hoping to be impregnated by him still in spite of how niggardly he treated her, ventures out into the woods that night to Earl's trailer, and the two refine the nefarious plan to kill Dr. Fleischer together as a team. The ill-fated duo again embarks for New Jersey, all the while with Aviva coaching doubtful Earl of what he must do, egging him on that it's god's will and that the awful abortionist must pay "eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth" style. Earl, a misguided soul who is ever hesitant and indecisive over just about anything he does, quietly pulls up to the doctor of death's suburban home with his rifle and Aviva at his side, walks up a sliding door and hesitantly pulls the trigger, accidentally shooting Dr. Fleischer's young daughter in the head and subsequently downing Dr. Fleischer with the second shot. In the terribly tense and uncomfortable scenes that follow, Earl is markedly upset and suicidal over what he's done as the two find themselves holed up in a local hotel room, with Earl vomiting and lamenting "I did the wrong thing...God hates me...I'm going to fry...I could change, but now I'm going to die." Like all hormone-addled adolescent girls, Aviva foolishly implores Joe to stop spouting such nonsense and with her undying love and devotion for him, she states that she is willing to take the blame for the murders. Of course, the cops show up in no time and when Joe unwisely goes to the door with his rifle in tow, he intentionally or not commits self-slaughter when he opens the door to a round of bullets puncturing his guts from every which way.

Palindromes begins to wind down with the final incarnation of Aviva, "Mark" Aviva, played by Jennifer Jason Leigh (who, at nearly 40 years old very convincingly plays the angst-addled yet soft-spoken adolescent). It seems at this point that, given her tender age, Aviva was able to legally bypass any responsibility for the events that had transpired in the weeks before, and perhaps in casting her as an older woman, Solondz is demonstrating that Aviva has grown up to some extent, that perhaps she has even changed and matured. However, in this particular segment of her journey, during a family birthday party held for Aviva by her parents, the naive young lady has a rather nihilistic and despairing conversation with Dawn Wiener's brother, Mark, a recently convicted and now much loathed pedophile who is being entirely ignored and/or reviled by other guests at the party, who wisely asserts and again harkens back to the main theme of the film that, "People always end up the way they started out. No one ever changes. They think they do but they don't...it makes no difference. You're essentially the same in front, from behind, whether you're 13 or 50." Nowhere is this more penetratingly evident than in the penultimate scene of the film in which Aviva has a clandestine meeting with Judah in the woods who assures her, "I'm a changed man... I think I've matured a lot," who then proceeds to unzip his pants and again have his way with her, only to again fail in lasting any significant amount of time, and with Aviva imploring him to try again, as quickly as possible, because she's still as eager as ever to have a baby.

In conclusion, Palindromes reminded me somewhat of another Jewish-directed effort, Capturing the Friedmans (2003), directed by Andrew Jarecki in that, much like that film, which rather ambiguously handles the subject of pedophilia, Solondz makes no clear indication with Palindromes as to where he stands on abortion. While he very accurately, yet somewhat negatively portrays the Christian fundamentalist Sunshine family as all out bible-thumping wackos with murderous desires to annihilate abortion doctors, he almost portrays them—a family which cherishes even the most unloved and unwanted of children—in a more sympathetic light compared against the much more liberal Jewish Victor family (a family dynamic with which he is much more intimately familiar) in which unwanted children, physically defective or not, are completely disposable. While on the surface it seems that Aviva's parents are overwhelmingly caring and only looking out for the best for her (with her own mother even self-critically lamenting toward the end of the film that perhaps she had been a horrible mother, and that she still had the ability to change for the better), it is made obvious by Joyce Victor's rather callous statements about her own abortion (that she'd done it to financially protect Aviva, such that she'd have as many material possessions as possible growing up versus the much more fulfilling love and memories of a sibling) that perhaps it was rather ironically and hypocritically this decision and her means of raising her daughter that ultimately instilled Aviva with the overwhelming desire to get pregnant, to have a child of her own who would love her unconditionally. In the end, one may never know exactly what it is that drives Aviva so strongly toward conceiving a child in her early adolescent years, but such an insatiable itch is really rather pervasive in the decadent and perverse West, only now most teenage girls are taking it a step beyond simply having a baby, and desperately trying to conceive a very special, ill-fated sort of baby of the brown bastard variety, since it is not simply their own family which has rendered them unloved, but their entire race as a whole. And lastly, while one can argue that all of Solondz's films have a decidedly Jewish bent about them, and while Palindromes may take a somewhat ambiguous position about abortion, one thing is certain: unlike other Jewish directors, Solondz is hardly sympathetic or kind in his portrayal of his own tribe, instead invariably opting to very honestly and at times crudely portray them, warts and all, as a neurotic group which, while responsible for much of the degeneracy and decline of the west, may ultimately find itself on the same doomed sinking ship in the same stench-filled, muddied waters of multiculturalism and "die-versity" which threaten to drown the whole world.

DARK HORSE

I, much like the film Dark Horse's "primary" character of study, Abe, have been left with this deep burning hole within my core. The reason being is that Dark Horse is a film of tremendous talent from both sides of the camera but the actual events that transpire on film are what left me polarized and puzzled; I'm unable to manifest a concrete decision on how dearly I hold this film. For Abe, this sentiment is shared with life, for me, my thoughts on the film itself. With Dark Horse comes Todd Solondz's most challenging film to digest to date, released during the years which seem to be the fall of the American elite. With Cronenberg's Cosmopolis, Ferrara's 4:44: Last Day on Earth, and Solondz's Dark Horse, semi-independent cult cinema is shown to be artistically swaying due critical and commercial failure all but nigh. After all, these director's careers weren't built off of glowing puffery in newspapers, as the director's got their start in the marginal underground. Unlike the earlier referenced 'fallen auteur directors' for example, Dark Horse shows signs of multi-layered cinematic hemorrhaging and begs questions to be asked long after the credits roll, which is more than the other films could hope to achieve. Dark Horse is similar to a typical Solondz film but with more hallucinatory qualities, say, more in tune with Dylan Baker's dream of murder in Happiness. It is also more explicitly Judaic than his previous work and, like the others, has scripted alumni returning to form a cohesive web of quirky characters in a singular universe of dysfunction (e.g. the lead actress Selma Blair portraying Miranda) but as the closing credits note (Formerly "Vi"), meaning Storytelling's Vi - the original "Nigger Lover".

The partial setting of Dark Horse is a small business climate which is abused by Abe, a spoiled Jewish 30-something (but looks more like a 40 or even 50-something) who is on the verge of pathos and far more repellant than a colicky infant hungry for its mother's tit. Abe is absolutely infuriating to watch on the screen. There is no doubt that Todd Solondz himself views Abe as a cancer of sorts, even to his own "people." Day in and day out, Abe browses the Internet looking for hot deals on action figures, presumably to further complete his sheltered man-child escapism, as indicated by the Gremlins and the Simpsons memorabilia that decorate his juvenile room. Abe's parents are a divisive pair, the father being played by Christopher Walken and the mother being Mia Farrow, with their discussions of Abe's empty future as two separate strings of their son's case is hopeless. The father quietly exudes possible malice aforethought and somberly stares at a television in the peace of his own home. Abe's mother is the polar opposite of the father and much of the interaction with her son involves her coddling the track-suit-sporting thirty-something toddler into an ignorant stupor. This typically culminates into his instinctive inability to see himself as the self-loathing abscess of human waste he is. Other than the sometimes incomprehensible approach Solondz took while filming Dark Horse, I found the most difficult obstacle Dark Horse had to offer was the character Abe himself. Abe is an utterly revolting creature who cruises the streets in a blindingly yellow Hummer blasting candy-sick pop music who frequents Toys"R"Us to complain about minuscule defects on Lord of the Rings action-figures. The fact that Abe is such an amateurish collector that he would open an action figure mint-on-card to later complain about a chip in the figure states a lot about the lack in discipline of his character.

In order to understand the other main character, Miranda, Abe's love interest, one must draw a connection between her character Vi and where she left off in Storytelling, and her current social status. There is no spin I could apply to this deplorable transition that could make it any easier for you, the viewer, to grasp. Storytelling left off with Vi, an idealist liberal who had been recently "raped" by her Pulitzer Prize-winning Negro professor, believing that she had a chance of being an incredible writer, emotional dead-weight in tow. Combine that thought with her own demented and adverse sense of altruism (e.g. "Fuck me, Nigger! - also, having a relationship with a product of Cerebral Palsy) and we can paint the image ourselves, but with Dark Horse following her tragic blip of wasted youth. Dark Horse finds her as a failure who moved back into her parents who has since contracted an STD from a homosexual Indian who refers to himself as a "Westerner". Another film, another collage of multicultural horrors unmasked as Todd Solondz has already shown us how, without effort, this is his signature that leaves us wanting. Reverting discussion back to Abe, his character is first shown at a Jewish wedding which is appended with a choreographed scene of dance-floor disruption to the too-loud musical seances of an over-produced urban cacophony, namely, mundane pop group Kid Sister's song Right Hand Hi. Spanning from this to Abe's fashion comes the various examples of the many ironies exhibited within Dark Horse. Essentially, everything about Abe is a product of postmodern America; a product of a spoiled generation's waste. But then again, during the rise of network TV's latest addiction - the grotesque white-trash Honey Boo Boo, what isn't to be expected when the ideal of standards is literally favored towards mediocrity and cultural decay? Overweight and overzealous, Abe devours the limelight as television's pop parasites have, and will continue to do.

During the middle mark it becomes apparent that there is something quite strange about the architecture of Dark Horse. I, for one, chalked it up to a loss of steam; a stream of obtrusive offenses against the film that had mighty to do with the film's occasional and more frequent dipping into the waters of the surreal. It was only after Dark Horse ended that I had this nagging itch that I had missed something that was right in front of me for the majority of the film. At this moment in the review is where I will begin to submerge into a theory that will completely and utterly spoil the film for those who have not seen it, so tread cautiously. Dark Horse is primarily told from Abe's perspective; his woes, troubles, loneliness, and disparity. Near the end of the film, Abe's psyche becomes so hopelessly wounded that he begins having casual conversation with characters who do not exist in his relative space. Abe's appearingly involuntary arguments with characters that do not exist near his material state drop in and out, becoming more and more of a frequent activity closer to the ending. These events didn't begin suddenly but were introduced sporadically, with previous examples that were, at first, ones to shrug off. For instance, after leaving Miranda's house following a first date marriage proposal, Abe's father's secretary, Marie, sprints towards his car and, without breath, hands him a stack of spreadsheets that his father had been pestering him to complete. This and other instances of Marie's "guardian angel" apparitions are what tilt Dark Horse towards something that isn't incipiently recognizable as what could be perceived as a sub-textual film shedding its translucent disguise. This is dramatically heightened once you realize that Abe is dying/dead due to a scene earlier in which Miranda admits to being a carrier of Hepatitis B. What has been presented as a plausible theory is that Dark Horse is not illustrated from Abe's perspective but from Marie's, capturing on film her own desires and motherly instincts taking full, malicious control of her psyche. This can be attested to in the multiple screen personas of Marie, as Abe views her as a loose-virtued "cougar", motherly figure, caretaker, and labor-driven sexpot. What this is equating to is also evidenced by the fact that, during one of Marie's out-of-character revelations, she reveals that she was a mother of twins who have since been deceased. Her following closely behind Abe's metaphorical coattails would explain the middle and the end, and as for the beginning, well, that could be argued as the first clashing of personalities. Unless, of course, Marie was viewing his Thundercats action figure-filled browser history while he was away from the office and thus getting a more personal understanding of him, as he was often due to chronic temper tantrums. This candy colored painting of conflicting identities is further highlighted with the final shot of Marie, devastated by Abe's death, staring off into emptiness while the office scurries about with business as usual. Her face frozen in silence properly demonstrates the void of Abe's infantile office drama as there is no more Abe.

Since the release of his feature-length debut, Welcome to the Dollhouse, Todd Solondz has shown insights in the understanding of the importance of music to moving images to synchronize/amplify thematic patterns as often as he injects irony and vigor into helplessness. Not leaving anything to chance though, Solondz outfits Dark Horse with its musical trump card who goes by the name of Michael Kisur. Michael Kisur's song "Who You Wanna Be" rings out as the most eerily infectious of the bunch. It captures perfectly the, at times, Abe's infantile, self-indulgent optimism. "Who You Wanna Be" can be described as playground tunes of a Ritalin-ridden pre-teenster whose positive outlook on life is second only to the artwork of early nineties Trapper Keeper-alum Lisa Frank.

DARK HORSE

Truthfully, it must be heard to be believed. In Dark Horse, Todd Solondz has surely created something original. The formula isn't the same as the prior events are left with much to be desired, thus explaining my aforementioned alienation. Taking Dark Horse entirely at face-value is how I had initially interpreted it and I was left wanting more. Notwithstanding, after tinkering with the idea that I have fleshed out in the previous paragraph, Dark Horse becomes an entirely different beast. Somehow Abe's inconsistencies and de facto flaws become less enraging as a different character's perspective is realized. With this perception of Dark Horse comes a new form of insights and without official address from Solondz, leaves Dark Horse as a superlative conversation piece.

Todd Verow° (1996)

Gay serial killers seem to be a dime a dozen, especially when it comes to the exceedingly sexually erratic sort of lone-wolf exterminator, yet there seems to be a lack of homo-cidal murderer movies and even less that take an unwaveringly intimate approach to this absurdly unspeakable subject, thus I was quite impressed when I discovered abberosexual American auteur Todd Verow's sod sex slayer Frisk (1995); a film where one man's fiendish fantasy for mutilated flesh turns into a life-consuming obsession of the most ominous and – at least for the character – odorous sort. The virtual 'American Psycho of gay serial killers films,' Frisk is ultimately more gritty and controversial and less cartoonish in comparison to the feminist-directed and lesbian co-penned black comedy, not least of all due to the fact that Verow's film takes a matter-of-fact approach to the subject that was not meant to spare anyone, hence why the wanton work was condemned by a sizable segment of politically correct poofs. In short, Frisk has no moral compass, let alone a fag fabulous political agenda. Featuring a sicko sad-ass jock type with a redundant tribal tattoo as the calculating blood-lusting, cock-busting serial killer of swinging punk Sodom, Frisk has a lot in common with the aberrant German arthouse flick Prince in Hell (1993) aka Prinz in Hölleland in terms of featuring the sort of severely subversive depiction of Dorian Love that most uppity and hysterical pc homos would like to see put back in the closest, so it should be no surprise that Michael Stock – the writer/director/star of the curiously crude cock-sucking kraut flick – also plays a Teutonic hustler twit in Verow's film. Indeed, featuring fag-murdering fags and Aryans, and lacking any sort of stale sentimentalist social commentary, Frisk is not exactly the sort of flick that would have been distributed by the Weinsteins. Featuring a less than uplifting but certainly catchy and complimentary soundtrack by post-industrial group Coil whose lead singer John Balance was so similarly self-destructive of a homo as the hopeless hustler in Verow's film that he died rather randomly after falling from a two story balcony (apparently, as the scatology-spirited singer serenaded many times before, "there was too much blood in his alcohol"), Frisk is a fag flick that isn't actually 'faggy,' at least in the prissy and pretentious sense, as it transcends the STD-riddled ghetto of mainstream gay 'culture,' opting for being perversely provocative over poofster pussyfooting, stern sadism over sappy sod sentimentalism, bodacious brutality over barren buggery, hate over happiness, and fleshwounds over fecal matter in a work that never demands tolerance, but instead that one have enough gall and balls to sit through the whole thing.

Based on the 1991 novel of the same name by Dennis Cooper – a punk poof writer whose early written works were heavily inspired by the Psychopathia Sexualis-worthy writings by Marquis de Sade and Arthur Rimbaud – Todd

Verow's sin-saluting cinematic adaptation stays true to the roots of the novel, at least in spirit, but at that same time it is an original work in its own right that features experimental editing with distorted video imagery and a soundtrack that lecherously livens up the psychopathic pig room celluloid party. Centering around completely crazed yet curiously charming anti-hero Dennis (Michael Gunther) – a stoic homo that began developing a fetish for dead bodies and murder after checking out some snuff magazines when he was only an highly impressionable teenager – Frisk automatically lets the viewer know from the get go that it is not your typical serial killer flick as the work is from the first-person perspective of the necrophiliac butt bandit himself. Most of Frisk is narrated through a series of letters written by Dennis to his surely sick yet slightly less sadistic sometimes-boyfriend and dubious best friend Julian (Jaie Laplante); a fiercely foul fellow who has quasi-incestuous relationship with his own younger brother Kevin (Raoul O'Connell), who himself is gay thanks to his brother's warped mind, on top of seeming rather autistic. Needless to say, when Julian moves to Europa, Dennis – a cunning alpha-fag that is always conspiring a plan to transcend his already rather perturbing perversity – moves in on Kevin and earns his trust and love even more so than his own brother ever could. Of course, Dennis' main motivation in life is man-handling and mutilating corpses of timid teen twink, but he needs to build up enough confidence and further desensitizes his already terribly tainted conscience to go from simple cock-sucking to corpse-fucking. After a young hustler named Henry (Craig Chester; who played the infamous Jewish homosexual child murderer Nathan Leopold Jr. in Tom Kalin's New Queer Cinema classic Swoon), who Dennis originally intended to kill but chickened out is murdered by a bourgeois leather-fag, the novice necro decides he no longer wants to play gay games and inevitably murders his first hustler; a bleached-blond cum and beer chugger. After his German hustler friend/fuckbuddy Uhrs (played by Michael Stock) catches wind of his original plan to kill and dismember him, Dennis' trail of rent boy blood is tracked via the killer's letter by the kraut cock-sucker and his nihilistic female friend Ferguson (Parker Posey). Motivated more by her perverse and unquenchable hatred of humanity than a fetishistic fondness for blood and guts, Ferguson and her creepy fag friend end up joining Dennis for a Ménage à trios of murder and mayhem. Writing off Dennis' letters as being the "same old apocalyptic porn," feminist femme fatale Ferguson brings a certain "logical approach divorced from emotion," thus enabling the necromantic to evade the law. In one especially stand-out scene, pre-tranny Robert "Alexis" Arquette plays a punk hustler that is so fucked up on 'Cocteau's kick' that he does not realize that the three psychopaths are in the process of murdering and dismembering him as they collectively strip him while wearing latex surgical clothes so as to not get their oh-so dainty hands dirty. After Dennis barebacks the punk gigolo (who states "that's the best you can do, big boy" while getting sodomized sadistically), the terrible threesome ties him up and guts him like a pig. Of course, Dennis has more personal motivations than his two intellectually insipid compatriots, so he looks to his best friend Julian's younger brother Kevin for macabre answers.

What I noticed immediately upon watching Frisk is that it seems like libidinous lunatic Luka Rocco Magnotta – the gay Canadian porn star and homo go-go dancer who murdered and dismembered the body of a cock-sucking Chinese student named Lin Jun and mailed his body parts to the offices of various Canadian political parties and even an elementary school, thus earning the title of “Canadian Newsmaker of the Year for 2012” after there was an international manhunt when he fled his own country for Europa – must have watched Verow's film and viewed it as a kind of spiritual blueprint before carrying out his frenzied campaign for necrophile fame, as such a rather raunchy and wretched murder-romanticizing work would surely give the extra push needed for less than a psychologically stable individual to carry out their carnal corpse-caressing fantasies. As one can expect from such a uniquely uncompromising work, Frisk has been condemned by a number of hysterical homophile film reviewers as being ‘homophobic,’ as if showing one's fist up someone's ass or eating shit is not bad enough. A virtual “film for all and none,” Frisk may feature a lot of homo-sadist imagery and whatnot, but it is surely not a distinctly ‘gay film,’ at least not in any conventional sense, sort of like William Friedkin's Cruising (1980), albeit causing more shit-stirring (pun intended), if not at a more marginal work being an independent film. Unfortunately, director Todd Verow has yet to direct another film with the same idiosyncratic intensity and awfully aberrant aesthetic imagery as Frisk and has settled for directing more softcore, low-budget fag-friendly films for his production company Bangor Films. As the son of a Northern New England politician who became a hustler after swooning over a punk streetwalker as depicted in his later work Between Something & Nothing (2008), Verow did lend a certain autobiographical authenticity to Frisk, so it's a shame he later settled for being a relatively unknown hack filmmaker as opposed to leading a life like the anti-hero in his infamous sodomite serial killer film. If Frisk is anything to go by, Verow would have at least been more successful in his libertine lust-killing than murderous attention whore Magnotta. At the very least, Verow could go back to his roots and cinematically redeem himself by directing a bodacious and brazen biopic about Mr. Magnotta and his macabre man-meat-mutilating monkey business.

Todd Verow° (2004)

After valiantly enduring subversive homo-auteur Todd Verow's dauntingly deranged documentary Bottom X (2012) – a worse than wretchedly wanton work about a decisively depraved bug-chasing HIV-positive poof who has an unhealthy obsession with having his diseased 'man-cunt' creamed with equally soiled, STD-ridden seed – I figured it was about time that I checkout some of the firebrand fairy filmmaker's celluloid back catalog, thus leading me to his debauched digital video work Anonymous (2004); a film about a miserably masochistic fellow who lives to be fucked in most unflattering ways in public places. Starring director Todd Verow (Frisk, Bulldog in the Whitehouse) himself as the patently pathetic protagonist 'Todd' – a severely sensitive and surely sad fellow who enjoys masturbating whilst chatting on his cell phone with prospective sex partners and being borderline raped in public bathrooms – Anonymous is a seemingly semi-autobiographical work directed by an auteur filmmaker who, not unlike Bruce LaBruce (Super 8 ½, The Raspberry Reich) but all the more in the gay gutter, seems to wallow in his own sexual insanity. In part filmed at the movie theater that Verow actually worked at during the film's production, and featuring displays of erratic homoeroticism that are undeniably authentic, Anonymous is an audaciously gritty piece of gay guerrilla filmmaking. A veteran of New Queer Cinema who, unlike many of his cinematic compatriots, still swims in the seedy semen-drenched cesspool as a filmmaker who knows no budgets and certainly no sexual mores, Anonymous acts as a virtual digital video manifesto for the auteur filmmaker's one-man revolution against absurd authoritarianism of mainstream fagdom. With his early sadomasochistic sodomite serial killer Frisk (1995), Verow inspired flaming fag-on-fag hatred and groundless accusations of 'homophobia' by prissy politically-correct poo-packers, so it was only natural that the filmmaker would write the following in a filmmaking manifesto entitled "No More Mr. Nice Gay": "No more Mr. Nice Gay! Aren't you tired by now of these buff, shiny, happy, pretty pretty gay people in (alleged) comedies about hooking up and being shirtless and oh-so-pretty and oh-so-vacant. No more documentaries about gay marriage and about "how just like everyone else" we are. No more conformity... We are outlaws, we are outsiders and we always will be. You don't need a cock just a camera (and it doesn't have to be a big camera but you have to have the balls to face down the status quo.). Pull it out. Stroke it. Dare the audience, the critics, the programmers, etc. to suck it. Create like there is no tomorrow (in this modern world, you never know) and shoot, shoot, shoot!" Indeed, with Anonymous, vehement Verow both shot and sucked and, judging by all the public sex, probably committed a couple copulation-based crimes, but he certainly did not do it incognito. As he would later reveal in his insightful manifesto, "looking back now I think after making FRISK, I wasn't ready or able to make another gay film until it was something personal, something painfully real. I was ready to do that when I was single again and moved back to NYC in 2001. I bared all (not just my ass but heart and soul) in ANONYMOUS (Berlinale 2004). I decided that if I was going to take shit from people it would be for something personal," and, indeed, few films are so incriminatingly intimate as Anonymous; an agile, if not oftentimes aesthetically agitating, auteur piece from the bowels of the homocore underground that will probably make most male viewers think twice about using a public restroom.

Todd has led a fairly pathetic and miserable life, which is probably rooted in the fact he was maliciously molested at the impressionable age of 12-years-old. As director Verow candidly admitted to kraut queen auteur Rosa Von Praunheim in 2008 during their televised date on the German-French Arte show Into the Night with... (2002-present), he also faced a similar real-life harrowing fate as a young child at the hands of a sick sexual predator and the byproduct of this life-changing experience certainly bleeds through in Anonymous; a delirious digital diary about a damaged and emotionally destitute man whose only source of solace in life is sodomy, sucking, and being verbally and physically abused. A 36-year-old man (that tells everyone he is 32) who works as the night manager of a Manhattan movie theater, Todd uses his work hours to masturbate, get manhandled by random men in the bathroom, and perform flamboyant stripteases solely for himself, but during his free time, especially when he goes back at his apartment with his boyfriend, depression kicks in. Naturally, Todd has a hard time keeping up with all the men he gets screwed by and so does his boyfriend/roommate John (Dustin Schell). As Todd states in a most monotone yet melancholy manner, "John works during the day and I at night, which has probably kept us from strangling each other over the last five years...although, that would be a welcome change now." Of course, it seems things were not as bad in the past and there used to be some romance in the relationship as demonstrated by his confession, "We had so many plans for fixing this place up...but we never really got around to it." Indeed, the only thing that terminally tragic Todd gets around to doing is being buggered senselessly in begrimed bathrooms by anonymous men for such is the lonely yet lecherous life of a supremely salacious sex addict/sex abuse victim whose only method of connecting with others is being anally reamed and cummed on. One day, Todd's wanton world comes tumbling down when his much more conservative boy toy John surprises him at work and catches him receiving a glory-hole blow-job from another boy in the libertine latrine. Furious and fuming, John brutally beats, strips, and writes "FUCK HERE" (which another fellow does relentlessly later that night) on Todd's butt cheeks. Needless to say, John locks Todd out of the apartment and throws all his ex-beau's belongings into the street, so he spends the night at an old trick's house and is buggered by the brown man most belligerently. After stealing a pair of

ANONYMOUS

Wizard of Oz-style 'magical ruby slippers' from an unconscious woman, Todd is fired from his job when the movie theater management discovers that he is engaging in torrid tearoom sessions in the public bathroom (not to mention the fact that an auditor discovers that he has been stealing). Luckily, Todd makes a couple extra bucks doing some poofier pin-up photos prior to the termination of his employment and makes some friends in the process. Of course, not all things are bad for Todd as he and his new group of debauched friends play an erotic game of Red light/Green light.

Although not Todd Verow's most accomplished (let alone most subversive) effort, Anonymous is an excellent place to start to understand the avant-garde auteur behind the camera as a self-exploitative exposé and an exceedingly explicit and engrossing sort of contemporary American equivalent to Frank Ripploh's queer kraut cult classic Taxi zum Klo (1980). Essentially, Anonymous depicts a patently pitiable man with a lurid yet ironically lackluster life who lacks even the will power to commit suicide (or so he admits with an anecdote at the conclusion of the film). Neither a pretentious work, nor a vainglorious piece of mundane movie masturbation (although weirdo wanking is featured throughout), Anonymous is an equally hopeless yet humorous film that is hard to forget, whether one would like to or not. As someone who makes a living from his micro-budget movies and managing a movie theater part-time, Verow's decision to be the main character in Anonymous – a rather ridiculously reflective work – surely makes the filmmaker not so 'anonymous' anymore. One of the very last heretical hardcore auteur filmmakers, Verow partly fills a void in an increasingly Hollywood-influenced phenomenon of homogenizing homos in the United States that, on top of turning the United States of America into a neo-bolshevik authoritarian nation, stifles creativity and individuality and fosters mediocrity and conformity, especially among a historically artistically-inclined minority group. As a filmmaker who wrote in his manifesto, "I have a natural instinct to destroy in the name of creativity. Besides, we had a blast shooting a big "fuck you" to the growing political correctness of the 90's, and to the mainstreaming of gay culture which started then. A riot broke out at our screening during the San Francisco Lesbian & Gay Film Festival, the editor of The Advocate magazine said I should be shot," and "To me, experimental or underground film and queer film were synonymous," Verow certainly proved that he practiced what he preached with Anonymous; a digital video depiction of one damaged dude's desperate desire to down gobs of dicks in a depraved and depressing fashion that will remind you why the word "gay" has totally lost its original meaning.

BOTTOM X

Undoubtedly, I have seen my fair share of decidedly deranged and delinquently debauched films, but I can state without the slightest hint of hesitation that – for better or for worse – New England homo-auteur Todd Verow’s surpassingly sickening cinéma vérité documentary Bottom X (2012) is the most ghastly and revolting film that I have ever endured in my entire life and I tend to watch no less than three movies a day, most of which are in some way subversive and/or unkosher. Based on the real-life personal blog “confessions of a bareback cunt” written by the pseudonymous wayward interweb writer “bare_whore24,” Bottom X is a soul-damaging DV document about one HIV-positive human cum-bucket’s real-life sadomasochistic encounters with superlatively seditious sodomites and semen-demons who are living the discrete dirty ‘dream’ of creaming an already disease-ridden man with their spoiled Satanic seed. An uniquely unsettling doc on clearly sexually and emotionally damaged individuals, Bottom X, despite being a no-budget work shot on diarrhea digital video, more resembles a nefariously nauseating Dogme 95-style science fiction nightmare that is more perturbing, piggish, and (unfortunately) penetrating than any surrealist genital landscape that Swiss artistic H.R. Giger could dream up about a fiercely foul fellow who describes his life’s work as being a cryptic yet committed “cum dump.” Bent bastard bare_whore24 sums up his lethally lecherous life at the conclusion of Bottom X with the perversely proud statement of a self-crowned semen-sanctifying champion: “First 50 load weekend. I feel like the biggest cum dump on the planet.” By “50 load weekend,” this aberrant anonymous ‘anti-hero’ means that he had no less than fifty strangers of Sodom come to his bare-bones apartment in New York City and ream his ripped rectum with their diseased ramrods, but not without saving their spudwater so he could squirt it out of his ass for the candid cocksucker camera. Needless to say, Bottom X is as close as films come in making the viewer feel as if they have been vehemently violated as a victim of a vile virtual virus that not even a triple viewing of The Adventures of Milo and Otis (1986) could neutralize.

Who is “bare_whore24” and how the hell did he get so fucked up? Was he raped with a dildo at the ripe age of 6 by his half-retarded step-uncle? These are the questions that I compulsively asked myself while watching Bottom X; a debasingly damning document of one S&M maniac’s masochistic obsession with sinisterly swimming in a creamy cesspool of contaminated man-juice. A proud poz-cock pervert whose asshole is a veritable petri dish for breeding the most ungodly sorts of super bug STDs yet known to man, the shameless subject of the documentary is clearly not satisfied with simple computer viruses, so he actively recruits renegade aberrosexuals off wacked-out adult classified websites and has heretical homos literally waiting in line to pack his rancid fudge within a mere

10 minutes. Indeed, Bottom X goes well beyond simple poofier pornography as something more venomously and viciously visceral as a morbid and moribund document of the sexually insane featuring disturbingly defiled individuals whose idea of eroticism has the inverse result of standard sex because instead of producing progeny these wretchedly wanton fellows consciously spread disease and inevitable death, thus bringing true meaning to the quote at the beginning of the documentary by Romanian 'Theatre of the Absurd' playwright Eugène Ionesco: "Suffering and fear are born from the repression of the death wish." As written on the back of the DVD case of Bottom X: "None of the scenes were staged, re-enacted or directed by the filmmaker or subject. Everyone presented in the film is over the age of 18 and consented to being filmed." Indeed, Bottom X is a rare documentary work where one not only sees the sadomasochistic spread of deleterious disease via bareback buggery, but also severely stomach-turning footage of a man squirting STD-ridden spunk out of his broken brown-eye and snorting it up his nasty nose. A completely corrupt cum collector who probably has a larger quantity of population paste than the average inner city sperm bank, the pathological poof known as "bare_whore24" is nothing short of a dedicated harvester of dead biological souls and an ungodly grotesque grim reaper of suicidal Sodom. A mystical masochist who believes that, "it's not important" how many loads he shoots because "it's all about my bareback cunt," bare_whore24 is a real-life example of the more unsavory sodomites who live on the more wayward and wicked side of Brokeback Mountain, so Hollywood homos be advised, Bottom X is bugger blasphemy to p.c. pansies and limp-wristed LGBT loonies.

Forget Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), Water Power (1977), Cannibal Holocaust (1980), Niggas' Revenge (2001), The Life and Death of a Porno Gang (2009), Melancholie der Engel (2009), and A Serbian Film (2010), Verow's Bottom X is aesthetic warfare of the completely creepy and incapacitating sort and the only film that has caused me to cringe and wince since my more innocent grade school years. That being said, I never plan to see Bottom X again, as the mental misery and metaphysical malady that is this decisively diseased digital documentary has already done enough damage to my soul for a lifetime. Admittedly, after seeing Verow's somewhat recent work Between Something & Nothing (2008) not too long ago, I thought the subversive sodomite auteur might have gone soft since directing S&M serial killer flick Frisk (1995), but Bottom X is as aesthetically brutal, beastly, and sleazy as films come as a fetid visual feast of fatality fetishism. Featuring voice manipulated narration by 'star' bare_whore24 that sounds like Jeffrey Dahmer talking through a vocoder in some sort of homo Hades and a direful portrayal of the human body that totally transcends the biological absurdity of genuine autopsy videos and abhorrent Viennese Aktionism, Bottom X is an absolutely odious yet obscenely objective portrayal of a man who has stared into the semen abyss and unflinchingly decided to jump in head first and bring as many other hexed homos with him. As an accidental anti-

AIDS PSA, Bottom X might be the only film ever made that could stop some man-juice starved homo from swapping sperm with the first guy to answer his craigslist ad, or even de-recruiting him from fagdom altogether, for not only is this one of the sickest movies ever, but also one of the most unflattering portrayals of homosexuality ever crafted. Much like Rosa von Praunheim before him and his cock-sucking cinematic compatriots John Greyson and Bruce LaBruce, Todd Verow portrays Kinsey 6 sex in a passionately perverse manner that puts to shame the sort of anti-pooof propaganda that any Pentecostal pastor could ever produce. Bottom X is a deathly decadent depiction of death sex, and nothing more and nothing less.

THE ENDLESS POSSIBILITY OF SKY

Todd Verow° (2012)

As far as gay American auteur filmmakers are concerned, Todd Verow is undoubtedly the least tamed and infected with the politically correct LGBT mainstream that has homogenized the homos and turned them into an automaton collective that is no less banal and braindead than Evangelical Christians. Leaving his big and infamous impression on the independent/ New Queer Cinema world with his sweetly scandalous sodomite serial killer flick Frisk (1995), a wicked work based on the seemingly unfilmable 1991 novel of the same name by poofer punk author Dennis Cooper, Verow has displayed an almost pathological and superhuman knack for churning out films like Rainer Werner Fassbinder and, naturally, like the German New Cinema alpha-auteur, many of his films are 'hit or miss.' While I thought Verow had gone flaccid with queer melodramas like Between Something & Nothing (2008) and The Boy with the Sun in His Eyes (2009), he has created a number of idiosyncratic and sexually iconoclastic works of the delightfully disturbing sort, including the documentary Bottom X (2012) and The Endless Possibility of Sky (2012), in the past year or so that are worthy of serious attention. While Bottom X, a sort of quasi-anthropological study of an AIDS infected "bareback mancunt" who has fifty different strangers sodomize him over the course of a weekend without using rubbers, is a virtual real-life horror show about a muscular maniac of a homo with a serious death wish, The Endless Possibility of Sky is an aberrant arthouse flick full of lunatic libertinage that takes a look at a group of self-destructive fags with self-absorbed swag who consume any and every drug they can find when not (but also often-times while) engaging in suicidal sex and addiction-inspired prostitution. A sort of strangely hypnotic piece of arthouse (anti)erotica featuring scenes of kaleidoscopic yet minimalistic anti-hipster animation of the pop degenerate variety, The Endless Possibility of Sky, as expressed in its allegorical yet matter-of-fact tagline "Once you reach the sky...it's all downhill from there," shows what happens when too much sex, drugs, and indie rock consume a small clique of cocksucking compatriots who rely on a demented fag hag for their daily doses of hardcore narcotics. An innately nihilistic piece of anti-Wes Anderson-esque arthouse meets hysterical hagsploitation and Halsted-esque S&M art-erotica, The Endless Possibility of Sky (2012) is the sort of uncompromising 'no bullshit' work of queer cinema that, much like an AIDS-infected shot of semen, strikes pulsating, penetrating fear into the quivering, angst-ridden hearts of "we're just like everybody else" gay rights activists and phony pro-egalitarian art fag hipsters alike.

Drew (Brad Hallowell) is a gay man from the middle-of-nowhere Waterville, Maine, so he naturally finds himself addicted to a life of vice after becoming part of little Sodom subculture in New York City. A former Christian churchgoer from an isolated and sheltered background, Drew eventually adopts a simple nihilistic and hedonistic philosophy in NYC that he describes as follows, "Life and all that other bullshit doesn't matter. It's just the stuff that gets in the way in between parties because there is no afterwards. The party must never stop. I'll do anything to keep it going...sex with strangers who have more...sex for money to get more. Steal money...steal drugs...sell drugs. Whatever it takes not to have to stop...that feeling is too good to just go away." Drew, like his sexually fiendish friends, is a patron of a psychotic woman who claims to get her drugs from aliens and is a self-described 'venture capitalist' named Mistress Datina (Verow 'diva' Philly), a wreck of a woman who invites "clean" (she sprays their penises at the door!) albeit AIDS-infected homos over for sexual and narcotic debauchery as she has never gotten over the death of her son, thus her fag friends, who engage in meaty manwich orgies right in front of her, act as sort of surrogate sons. A fellow with a certified 'poz-cock,' Drew valiantly admits "I don't know when I became positive" as it "doesn't matter," after having one too many lewd libidinous encounters with dozens of other lascivious bugchasers; later on, he learns that his first great lover Christian (Michael Vaccaro) is also HIV positive and he has no interest in taking the drugs that will save his life, but he certainly has a perturbing proclivity for popping the pills that will put him in an early grave. Mohawk-sporting Mestizo Rob (Rob Ordonez) is a punk rock poof that gets carnally involved with Christian, even popping his so-called "slam cherry" by shooting him up with his first shot of "Tina" aka crystal meth and then proceeding to assfuck him silly while he's high as a kite. Rob is not a particularly intelligent individual and almost finds himself cut up into tons of tiny pieces after he overdoses at Mistress Datina's pleasure dome, but he survives the ordeal, only to become the sex slave of a Dionysian 'Poppa Bear' fellow who looks like Peter Kern after he is drugged and repeatedly sodomized over a number of days. Indeed, trouble in poof paradise comes to the gay boi hustlers, porn stars, and badly damaged dick-stabber druggies of The Endless Possibility of Sky, a film that explicitly but not (too) exploitatively demonstrates that with every great high, be it erotic or narcotic, once must come down and very likely fall very hard in the process. In the ridiculous libertine renegade realm of The Endless Possibility of Sky, once someone enters a figurative hell, there is virtually no return, unless you come back as a self-righteous recovering addict who is willing to literally kill to prove a point.

Near the beginning of The Endless Possibility of Sky, protagonist Drew sums up the wanton Weltanschauung of him and his copulating compatriots as follows, "I felt like an outlaw...like before being gay become all mainstream...before gay became so fucking boring...getting married, having kids, being in the military...back when they would have sex in late night parks, in dark restrooms, trucks...there was a danger, there was an excitement. Yeah, I know...full of self-loathing and internalized homophobia. But it's bullshit...trying to fit in, trying to copy straight bourgeoisie culture...that is self-loathing, that is homophobia. We're animals, we are the new sexual outlaws. The knowing looks...the codes...the secrets...the only difference is that now, it's all about the drugs...not the sex." Indeed, like all of Verow's digital dime-store works, The Endless Possibility of Sky features no phony LGBT sermonizing or far-left diatribes as the characters of the film are neo-leather-fags (minus the leather) of the designer drug age who form an erotically erratic elite, at least in their own drug-addled minds as they engaged in ritualistic bacchanalia of the boy-buggering variety. While I personally find the severely sadomasochistic behavior portrayed in The Endless Possibility of Sky to be rather repulsive and even reprehensible, the film itself is a thematically liberating affair that bows down to no one, especially the mainstreaming cocksucking queens in Hollywood that have created a pre-packaged pansy 'gay culture' that seems to be all the more loathsome and hideous than a couple of anti-p.c. poofs who are proud to have diseased poz-cocks like those featured in Verow's film. Unlike sell-out sods like Gus van Sant, Todd Verow rightfully seems to realize that Fred Halsted is infinitely more important and less deleterious to both gay and straight culture than Harvey Milk. Undoubtedly, The Endless Possibility of Sky features vulgar people doing vulgar things, but it has more aesthetic grace than Hebraic homo sitcoms like Will & Grace.

In a manifesto entitled "NO More Mr. Nice Gay" that he wrote for the Berlin Film Festival Teddy Awards, Todd Verow concluded with the following words: "No more Mr. Nice Gay! Aren't you tired by now of these buff, shiny, happy, pretty pretty gay people in (alleged) comedies about hooking up and being shirtless and oh-so-pretty and oh-so-vacant. No more documentaries about gay marriage and about "how just like everyone else" we are. No more conformity, (whatever that is) and whatever happened to "We're here we're queer get used to it!" Stop pretending that AIDS (or at least the devastating effects of AIDS), homophobia (outside and inside the gay culture), violence, rape, oppression, murder, censorship, don't exist. We are outlaws, we are outsiders and we always will be. You don't need a cock just a camera (and it doesn't have to be a big camera but you have to have the balls to face down the status quo.). Pull it out. Stroke it. Dare the audience, the critics, the programmers, etc. to suck it. Create like there is no tomorrow (in this modern world, you never know) and shoot, shoot, shoot!" And, indeed, if we were to judge him by his work The Endless Possibility of Sky, Verow is thankfully a man that practices what he preaches, so much so that it is rather incriminating, but, more importantly, culturally iconoclastic. However, one can only hope that Todd Verow doesn't have quite the same deleterious death wish as most homos but that, if he does, he's not going to quite such extreme lengths as the curiously debauched poz-cock possessing, "bareback mancunt" of Bottom X or the deliriously drug-addled Christian of The Endless Possibility of Sky so that he can continue producing some of the most aberrant and incendiary American-made homo films of our time.

EROTIKUS: A HISTORY OF THE GAY MOVIE

Tom DeSimone (1973)

Before becoming a semi-decent exploitation auteur and directing post-The Exorcist Linda Blair in hokey horror flicks like Hell Night (1981) and tasteless TV series like Freddy's Nightmares: A Nightmare on Elm Street: The Series (1988-1990), filmmaker Tom DeSimone (Reform School Girls, Angel III: The Final Chapter) was a prolific gay pornographer who directed skin flicks with curious titles like How to Make a Homo Movie (1970) and Swap Meat (1973) under the less impressive pseudonym 'L(ancer) Brooks.' In fact, DeSimone cited his formative poof porn years with nostalgia and fondness, once stating, "I did some really good work in those days, considering the budgets and conditions. I learned to shoot fast and from the hip." Personally, I have next to nil interest in DeSimone's cinematic oeuvre—be it gay porn or otherwise—but I decided to watch his documentary Erotikus: A History of the Gay Movie (1973) when I learned it starred my favorite porn-auteur Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool) as its mumbling and masturbating host and narrator. Advertised in its press release as follows, "the naked narrator, Fred Halsted... guides the viewer through decades of all male erotica," Erotikus was ultimately denounced by Halsted, not least of all due to the fact that the doc reedited the conclusion of his legendary film LA Plays Itself (1972) in a manner that depicts sadomasochistic sodomy in an unflattering light by associating it with the Manson Family murders (a shot of a 1969 Los Angeles Times headline reading "New Weird Cult, Link to Tate Murder" concludes the excerpt). Starting out with Master Halsted fully clothes, the auteur-turned-narrator begins to drop his clothing and choke his chicken as Erotikus progresses, ultimately concluding with a climatic fireworks-like cum shot. Of course, as queer auteur/gay archivist William E. Jones (Finished, Tea-room) revealed in his Halsted biography Halsted Plays Himself (2011) regarding Erotikus, "At the end of the film, he masturbates and reaches a climax during a montage of cum shots set to the theme of Ravel's Bolero. DeSimone was not satisfied with Fred's performance in this capacity, so he used a double with a larger endowment and more impressive ejaculation. Presumably this was DeSimone's excuse for paying Halsted less than his promised fee, to Halsted's enduring resentment." Indeed, more than anything, Erotikus is an advertisement for DeSimone and—to a lesser extent—Halsted's porn flicks than an eclectic and all-encompassing history of celluloid homoeroticism. A seemingly 'prejudiced' work excluding important fucked fag flicks that had yet to be released like Roger Earl's Born to Raise Hell (1975) and the plot-driven 'arthouse' works of Jack Deveau (Left-Handed, Drive), Erotikus ultimately seems like a plodding premature ejaculation of a poorly edited mix-tape narrated by a man who clearly is much more charismatic and commanding when fisting young twinkles in the ass than when delivering an oral history of blue movie buggery in a most monotone

Beginning in a somewhat satirical storybook manner typical of films from Classical Hollywood cinema era, Erotikus then introduces the film's chapter titles (Chapter 1: Where Do We Go From Here?, Chapter 2: The "Barriers" Are Down, and Chapter 3: The Spectaculars!) and finally Mr. Fred Halsted, who only seems semi-interested with his job as the decadent doc's homo hunk host. As Halsted humbly reveals, homos had to buy 35 cent 'fitness' magazines before the aberrant arrival of hardcore gay porn flicks during the early 1970s. An American bodybuilder named 'Ed Fury' (born Edmund Holovchik), who starred in 'sword and sandal' flicks in Italy during the 1960s after following the lead of fellow muscleman Steve Reeves, was also apparently big with gay boys. A forgotten fellow by the name of Monte Hanson was purportedly the first to pose totally nude (minus erections) and was filmed doing so whilst reading nudist magazines in his bedroom. Eventually, some pervert opened up a place called Park Theater that played softcore porn flicks directed by a fellow named Pat Rocco. From there, Erotikus basically jumps forward all the way to the 1970s and Halsted presents excerpts from DeSimone's debauched S&M-themed flick The Collection (1970), an explicitly wanton and even deranged work of sadistic sod celluloid grit about a demented dude who kidnaps young men and keeps them as his own personal sex slaves, among other things. One also sees clips from DeSimone's Assault (1974)—a home-invasion-themed homo hardcore flick—as well as excerpts from the director's work Duffy's Tavern (1974), which features bleach blond hippie homos playing pool and proceeding to penetrating one another with a different sort of stick. Other DeSimone films featured in Erotikus include the cynical ethno-masochistic/miscegenation-themed gay-western Dust Unto Dust (1970) and the fittingly titled Confessions of a Male Groupie (1971), which was the first gay porn flick to feature a Milligan-esque fag hag in one of the leading roles. Of course, Erotikus also gives a gentle nod to Wakefield Poole's popular crossover flick Boys in the Sand (1971), which was one of the first porn flicks to receive mainstream credibility, even predating Deep Throat (1972) starring Linda Lovelace and Harry Reems by a year. Director DeSimone must have been jealous of Halsted's idiosyncratic aberrant-garde skin flicks as Erotikus only features a couple minutes of LA Plays Itself, which has the grand distinction of cinematically introducing fisting and almost singlehandedly popularizing the S&M subculture. In the end, Erotikus concludes with Halsted narrating, "Gay movie... innocent... poetic... commercial... erotic... artistic... all of these or none of these, it remains today the essence of the Greek erotic hope...the adoration and glorification of the male animal's finest moment," which is followed by an overly long scene of a climatic cum shot that was ejaculated by someone paid to pretend to be Halsted's cock and balls.

Ultimately, the only real value Erotikus has today aside from the obvious is its inclusion of long excerpts from various long out-of-print Tom DeSimone skin flicks that will probably never ever again be released due to copyright issues relating to the use of surprisingly mainstream music (i.e. The Rolling Stones). Of course, compared to Halsted's own films, namely LA Plays Itself (1972), The Sex Garage (1972), Sextool (1975), and A Night at Halsted's, as well as work by other auteur pornographers like Jack Deveau (Strictly Forbidden aka Le musée, A Night at the Adonis) and Jacques Scandelari (New York City Inferno, Cock Story), Erotikus seems rather tame in terms of aesthetic prowess. In fact, Erotikus does not amount to much more than a sort of 'Tom DeSimone's Greatest Cocksucking and Buttfucking Hits,' but I guess the auteur did not feel he was charismatic enough to actually host the film itself, so he got then-popular-porn-superstar-auteur Fred Halsted to do so for him. As someone whose solely aesthetic interest in porn does not really transcend porn chic works like Through the Looking Glass (1976) and Water Power (1977) aka Enema Bandit, as well as the shockingly artful auteur pieces of Halsted and Deveau, Erotikus did not amount to much more than an outmoded novelty for me. The fact that Halsted denounced Erotikus only made it all the more unappealing, as he may have been a sexually violent pervert, but he was neither a prude nor pretentious and would have never started a career making cheap exploitation flicks like DeSimone did. That being said, Erotikus is the only DeSimone flick I have ever managed to finish viewing in its entirety, so I think the filmmaker should have stuck with what he knew best – fucked fuck flicks.

NOCTURNAL ANIMALS

Tom Ford° (2016)

While I would not really expect a flaming fag fashion designer that once recommended that all straight men suffer the supreme debasement of taking a dick in the ass at least once in their lifetime to know much about the nuances of serious heterosexual relationships, Tom Ford—a Texas-born queen that was once absurdly described as “the straightest gay man in the world”—has demonstrated with his second feature Nocturnal Animals (2016) aka Tony and Susan that he is somehow capable of crafting one of the most emotionally true and undeniably unforgettable of contemporary dark tragic romances. Indeed, Ford’s debut feature A Single Man (2009) is so good in terms of emotional resonance and maturity that it would probably trick many people into thinking that gay men have the same exact wants and needs when it comes to love as straight men, yet I really did not suspect that he had the interest or insights to understand the nuances and dynamics of the sick sad joke that is contemporary Western heterosexual love and its badly misbegotten bastard son known as lovesickness, but his latest cinematic effort certainly proves otherwise. Not surprisingly considering his last film, Ford’s second feature also reveals that he has a keen queer eye for the aesthetically rich and sometimes just plain downright cinematically decadent. In terms of his knack for brutally honest melodrama that swiftly and coldly pierces the heart like a seasoned serial killer on a midnight stroll in the red light district, Ford might be best described as the American Fassbinder of fag high-fashion, though his newest film also reveals some flirting with genre conventions, namely that of the western and film noir. Of course, it is hard to imagine that someone that would appear in a pseudo-zany Ben Stiller vanity piece like Zoolander (2001) would have even a shred of artistic integrity or brilliance, but it seems that designing tons of fancy female clothing and hanging out with tons of fucked up beautiful models with coke problems and severe daddy issues equipped Ford with the carefully crafted tools to assemble a film with the masculine prowess of a John Ford flick but the strange sensitivity for socio-sexual politics of Douglas Sirk. Ford also seems to have a hard-on for hicks, as Nocturnal Animals features an intentionally sexy yet savagely murderously sadistic redneck gang that has more in common with James Dean and early Marlon Brando than NASCAR and Marlboro Reds when it comes to sheer style.

A film that demonstrates the absolutely devastating effects of the callous and oftentimes romantically fatal female instinct of hypergamy and how it leads to the destruction of true love and the abject emotional nightmare of loveless and sexless marriages, Nocturnal Animals—a relatively faithful adaptation of the novel Tony and Susan (1993) by belated novelist and literary critic Austin Wright (1922–2003)—is a revenge tale of the heart where a redheaded rich bitch that has everything but orgasms and a husband that loves her receives her just deserts in the form of a cleverly crafted literary assault by her ex-husband who reveals via a fictional narrative the unwavering sense of betrayal and heartsickness that he has suffered as a result of being thrown away like rotten trash by his oh-so-bourgeois ex-wife nearly two decades ago. Simultaneously a neo-western, ghostless ghost story, neo-noir nightmare, allegorical romantic tragedy, and metaphysical revenge flick, Ford's second feature is like a Bergman flick like Scenes from a Marriage (1973) if it were made for genre-obsessed American philistines, though it would be somewhat dishonest to say that the majority of American filmgoers enjoyed it (after all, imdb.com is flooded with countless highly negative, emotionally-charged reviews). A virtual obituary for a savagely raped and slaughtered romance in the form of an emotionally grotesque revenge fantasy where no one really wins in the end, Ford somewhat surprisingly reveals a certain latent primitive masculinity behind his weepy yet ruthless melodramatics. I also suspect that Ford had some influence from Douglas Sirk classics like All That Heaven Allows (1955) and Written on the Wind (1956), though the film probably owes more to the Coen brothers' debut Blood Simple (1984) in terms of aesthetics and atmosphere when it comes to the eponymous novel-within-a-film.

Auteur Ford might make a living designing insanely expensive superficial clothing for superficial rich people, but in Nocturnal Animals he deals a coldly precise and unrelentingly deadly blow to the sort of vanity that fuels such an innately soulless industry. In short, Ford seems to have modeled a number of the characters after people he personally knows (in fact, he has described the female lead as being of a somewhat autobiographical nature). A film that might teach some girls not to listen to their insufferably cynical and materially motivated mothers and instead embrace both who and what they genuinely love, Ford's flick might sometimes succumb to certain irritating clichés, but it also demonstrates in a decidedly emotionally devastating way that true love is worth all the wealth in the world and that the greatest tragedy is that most people will probably not realize this until it is far too late as they have already disposed of their beloved for a terribly banal yet insanely well paying career and fake philanthropic husband. Indeed, the film's sharp-witted yet virtually terminally melancholic fire-croched protagonist Susan Morrow (Amy Adams)—a stinking rich art gallery owner from LA that peddles absurdly priced pseudo-artistic degenerate trash that would probably only appeal to kosher capitalists—has everything a gal could want materially speaking, but her fiercely forlorn eyes reveal that she is deader inside than a Muslim gang rape victim. Somewhat ironically, Susan was at her happiest when she was at her poorest and still married to her struggling writer ex-husband Edward Sheffield (Jake Gyllenhaal), but she eventually got tired of the fact that her beloved was more creatively than monetarily motivated so she divorced him for some fake preppie fuck and dedicated her life to advancing her career. As revealed at the very beginning of the film by her tragic cold stare during a campy degenerate art exhibit at her gallery that involves naked morbidly obese women dancing around in anachronistic cabaret hats, Susan is completely dead inside and lately she has been thinking about the estranged ex-husband that she dumped 19 years ago. In short, Susan is an unloved and unsatisfied middle-aged beauty that suffers from a serious case of sehnsucht, though only a handful of her friends seem to suspect this. In fact, not even Susan's husband or daughter seem to realize that she is in the middle of a deep and dark existential crisis. In what proves to be a cruel yet fitting instance of kismet, Susan is somewhat bewildered to receive a package containing a manuscript written by her long estranged ex-husband that is dedicated to her. Featuring a provocative eponymous title, Susan instantly knows that the novel is about her due to the fact that her ex-hubby Edward used to call her a "nocturnal animal" due to her tendency towards sleep deprivation. Needless to say, upon beginning reading the novel, Susan finds her insomnia getting worse as she soon discovers herself the deserving victim of an intricate form of literary-based revenge that only she can truly understand on an any intrinsic level. Indeed, while Edward's novel is getting published and might be a big success, he was clearly mainly motivated to write it as a semi-hermetic means to express to Susan in a deservedly emotionally vicious and barbaric fashion that she put him through a sort of perennial pandemonium of lovesick lunacy as a result of betraying him nearly two decades ago and divorcing him in a most devastatingly despicable fashion. Indeed, not only did Susan divorce Edward, but she took his family away and destroying all of his hopes and dreams, at least those not pertaining to writing.

Just under two hours in length but feeling like a dark romantic epic, Nocturnal Animals ultimately offers two relatively elegantly interwoven films (and three subplots) in one. Indeed, aside from depicting Susan's present-day humdrum life and flashbacks from her failed marriage to Edward, the allegorical story contained in her ex-husband's carefully tuned manuscript is depicted as she reads it, thus adding an extra layer of pathos that ultimately expresses more about the essence of the aborted romance than the flashback scenes. Indeed, by the end of the film, the viewer not only learns why and how Susan ruthlessly sabotaged her marriage with her ex-husband, but also the violently visceral emotions Edward felt after being cravenly betrayed by his one-true-love. Somewhat provocatively, Edward is never depicted in the present, yet his spirit ultimately dominates the film via his novel, which is naturally more exciting than Susan's insufferably phony and contrived real-life life. Vaguely Lynchian in character and containing a sort of neo-retro/neo-noir aesthetic comparable to the underrated crime-drama Cold in July (2014) directed by Jim Mickle, the novel-within-the-film is certainly the most enthralling aspect of the flick and acts as a nice contrast to the sad and pitiful banality that is Susan's post-love (non)existence. Naturally, Jake Gyllenhaal portrays both Edward and the tragic hero Tony Hastings of Edward's titular novel, as the character is semi-cryptically autobiographical. Not unlike Edward, the protagonist of his novel, Tony, loses his family, albeit in a much more brutal and cinematic fashion that underscores the novelist's long brewing deep-seated rage, irrevocable sense of sorrow, Weltschmerz, obsessive self-loathing, and undying thirst for the ultimate form of revenge. In the novel, Tony's wife Laura (Isla Fisher), who bears a striking resemblance to Susan, and bratty teenage daughter India (Ellie Bamber) are brutally raped and murdered by a fearsome redneck threesome that includes head honcho hick Ray Marcus (Aaron Taylor-Johnson) and his two swarthy and similarly poorly shaven underlings Lou Bates (Karl Glusman) and Steve 'Turk' Adams (Robert Aramayo). After being forced off the road by the gang in the middle of the night on a secluded highway in West Texas, Tony finds himself being immediately intimidated and ruthlessly emasculated by Ray Marcus and his mad mongrel crew. Indeed, without the protagonist even putting up any sort of a fight, Tony's wife and daughter are kidnapped and he is forced by Lou to drive himself to a secluded desert dumping ground where he would have surely himself been killed himself had he not had the foresight to immediately hide from his stupidly sinister redneck tormentors. Of course, it is not long before Tony discovers what has happened to his wife and daughter and he is immediately wracked with severe guilt, which is only nature for a poor mensch that lost his entire family in the most dehumanizing of fashions without even putting up a fight (just as Edward did not seem to put up much of a fight when Susan divorced him for another guy). Luckily, a bad ass cowboy named Detective Bobby Andes (Michael Shannon)—a character that acts a symbolic voice for Edward/Tony to take action/get revenge—that believes in justice at any cost is assigned to Tony's case. While Detective Andes eventually catches the killers (sans 'Turk,' who is killed in a botched robbery), shady judicial politics leads to them being set free due to lack of evidence. Dying of lung cancer and unwilling to lose his final case as a proud man that is being forced into early retirement against his will, Andes offers Tony the rare opportunity of vigilant justice and he naturally takes it. In the end, Tony manages to get revenge against the men that raped and murdered his wife and daughter, but he ultimately dies soon later in a freak accident that involves him shooting himself with his own gun upon falling on the weapon following becoming blind after an injury he sustained during his final showdown with mad dog Ray Marcus.

Undoubtedly, it is no surprise that the protagonist Tony of Edward's novel dies in the end, as the character's miserable yet strangely triumphant demise is symbolic of the novelist's own sort of post-marriage spiritual death. Indeed, as he communicates to her in a somewhat hermetic fashion in his novel, Susan killed all of Edward's hopes and dreams in regard to having a family, thus leaving him with a non-existence that is arguably worse than death. As the film eventually reveals towards the end that really underscores the true extent of the heroine's cravenly self-adsorbed treachery, Susan not only divorced him but also went completely behind his back and aborted his child without even telling him she was pregnant. To add insult to injury, Edward caught Susan with her new secret boyfriend Hutton Morrow (Armie Hammer), who she later married, sitting in a car together outside of the abortion clinic right after she had done the dirty deed in what is indubitably one of the cruelest scenarios of cuckoldry in cinema history. Naturally, the teenage daughter that is raped and murdered in Edward's novel is symbolic of the unborn daughter that Susan so callously aborted (notably, Susan has a daughter with her husband Hutton that was clearly conceived not long after she aborted Edward's child). As to why Susan divorces Edward, it can probably be summed up simply in Nietzsche's words, "Whom does woman hate most? – Thus spoke the iron to the magnet: 'I hate you most, because you attract me, but are not strong enough to draw me towards you.'" Indeed, while the love was clearly mutual between the husband and wife, Susan eventually began to resent Edward for not being 'strong' enough for her as a spouse as a man with a mediocre book store job and lack of monetary ambition. While the film features a number of cruel ironies, arguably the cruelest is the fact that Edward is only able to gain the strength to be a great and successful writer after Susan has destroyed his life and turned him into a perennial bachelor that devotes himself completely to his work and lives a life of relative solitude (or so the viewer can only assume). Undoubtedly, Edward's completion of his magnum opus Nocturnal Animals was his best revenge against Susan, as she never had faith in him as a writer and largely dumped him because he valued his art over mere monetary gain. Of course, it is a perverse irony that the perennial lovesickness that Susan caused him would ultimately equip him with the highly personalized inspiration that he needed to pen such a provocative pathos-ridden work. Naturally, Susan is left completely devastated by Edward's morbidly tragic novel, but that does not stop her from setting up a fancy dinner date with her ex-husband. Unfortunately for Susan, who got all dolled up for the special reunion, Edward does not show up for the date and she is left to look pathetic and lonely at the restaurant while waiting in vain for the man she loved but senselessly threw away. Susan is clearly crushed as a result of Edward blowing her off, as the date is the only thing she seemed to look forward to in the entire film. Additionally, by being stood up by Edward—a man that she once crushed like a fly and destroyed his entire life without much hesitation—Susan must come to the dreaded conclusion that no one loves or cares about her anymore, including the overly emotional ex-husband that wrote an entire novel dedicated to her. As for Edward, the viewer never sees him in the end, but I think it is safe to say that he is quite happy to be finally free of the red beastess and that his carefully executed existential revenge is complete.

Surely, one of the more intriguing aspects of the film is that it dares to depict the deleterious effects that mothers can have on their daughters. Indeed, as depicted in a flashback, Susan's mother Anne Sutton (Laura Linney) made a rather aggressive attempt to talk her daughter out of marrying Edward despite the fact that he is a longtime respected family friend. As the best friend of her estranged gay son, Anne always felt that Edward was too weak and surely not adequate material for her strong, energetic, and entrepreneurial oriented go-getter daughter. While Susan only had bad things to say about her mother and somewhat pathetically describes her as, "religious, conservative, sexist, racist, Republican, materialistic, narcissistic, racist," Edward somewhat ironically noticed that the two have 'positive' similarities and even once stated to his beloved, "you both have the same kind of sadness in your eyes. You and your mother. Oh, I'm sorry. I don't mean to offend you. I just . . . She just always seemed sad to me. She has sad eyes. And I've thought that since I was a little boy. You have the same eyes. They're beautiful." While Edward attempted to encourage her to be a vulnerable artist that was willing to express herself instead of selling out and establishing a safe career, Susan's mother ruthlessly mocked such sentiments and recommended that her daughter play it safe and keep her eye on the money like a good bourgeois whore. Unfortunately, it seems Anne understood her daughter better than Edward ever could, as she is a spoiled poor little rich girl that grew up living a life of luxury and thus incapable of maintaining a happy marriage with a romantic starving artist type. In fact, Susan's mother made an accurate prediction when she warned her regarding her materialistic tendencies and how it would ruin her marriage in the long run, "I know you think that we don't care about the same things, but you're wrong. In a few years, all these bourgeois things, as you so like to call them, are gonna be very important to you, and Edward's not gonna be able to give them to you. He has no money. He's not driven. He's not ambitious. And I can promise you, if you marry Edward, your father's not gonna give them to you either." As the brutally bitter breakup of Susan's first marriage revealed, Anne was quite right when she somewhat ominously stated to her daughter in regard to her beloved Edward, "The things you love about him now are the things you'll hate in a few years. You may not realize it, but you and I are a lot more alike than you think." Of course, it probably came as a great source of shame for Susan when she remembered her emotionally glacial mother's foreboding words, "We all eventually turn into our mothers." Naturally, it should be no surprise to many viewers that queen auteur Ford has described Susan as a sort of stand-in for himself, as most gay men seem to take after their mothers.

In his magnum opus Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character, suicidal Viennese semite Otto Weininger put forth the provocative thesis that the archetypal woman is both innately soulless and lacking any sort of true individuality, or as he wrote in his book, "Undine, the soulless Undine, is the platonic idea of woman. In spite of all bisexuality she most really resembles the actuality. The well-known phrase, "Women have no character," really means the same thing. Personality and individuality (intelligible), ego and soul, will and (intelligible) character, all these are different expressions of the same actuality, an actuality the male of mankind attains, the female lacks." Undoubtedly, heroine Susan epitomizes Weininger's harsh remarks, as a hopelessly weak and impressionable dame that ultimately gives up the love of her life and her art to become a mindless and lifeless bourgeois bitch that has passively dedicated her life to vomiting bromide to her equally fake friends (including a dumb twat that is proud of the fact that she is married to an effeminate gay man that literally sports Tom Ford designer clothing) and projecting a safe yet lame image of opulence. Had Susan had even an inkling of personal integrity and, in turn individuality, she would still be married to the man she loves, but she just cannot find it in herself to be a genuine human being in the way a serious man can, hence why she is a character that can hardly be described as sympathetic. In short, Susan is a sort of archetype from the perennial tragedy that is womanhood. Indeed, Susan ultimately adapted herself to her new materialistic husband Hutton and inevitably became something she always dreaded and ultimately hated, but as Weininger noted, "As a rule, the woman adapts herself to the man, his views become hers, his likes and dislikes are shared by her, every word he says is an incentive to her, and the stronger his sexual influence on her the more this is so. Woman does not perceive that this influence which man has on her causes her to deviate from the line of her own development; she does not look upon it as a sort of unwarrantable intrusion; she does not try to shake off what is really an invasion of her private life; she is not ashamed of being receptive; on the contrary, she is really pleased when she can be so, and prefers man to mold her mentally. She rejoices in being dependent, and her expectations from man resolve themselves into the moment when she may be perfect passive." Of course, Susan ultimately chose the wrong man to be influenced by, as he is philandering prick that does not even attempt to hide the fact that he cares more about money than her. While Nocturnal Animals adequately demonstrates why Susan ultimately decided to divorce Edward and abort his unborn child, anti-feminist Jewess Esther Vilar surely provided further insight as to why their relationship was an abject failure when she wrote in her classic text The Manipulated Man (1971), "As a result of 'love,' man is able to hide his cowardly self-deception behind a smoke screen of sentiment. He is able to make himself believe that his senseless enslavement to woman and her hostages is more than an act of honor, it has a higher purpose. He is entirely happy in his role as a slave and has arrived at the goal he has so long desired [...] Since once can expect nothing from a woman but love, it will remain the currency for any need she might have. Man, her slave, will continue to use his energies only according to his conditioning and never to his own advantage. He will achieve greater goals and the more he achieves, the farther women will become alienated from him. The more he tries to ingratiate himself with her, the more demanding she will become; the more he desires her, the less she finds him desirable; the more comforts he provides for her, the more indolent, stupid and inhuman she will become – and man will grow lonelier as a result.” Indeed, aside from never realizing that love was never enough for Susan, Edward never considered that most women are innately materialistic and expect real physical currency as opposed to the largely imaginary sort that women so effortlessly and passively provide. As to why Susan wanted to so desperately see Edward after reading his novel, she wrongly (and quite arrogantly) believed that he—the effete emo-fag-esque loser she once threw away like outdated clothing—would be her virtual ‘security blanket’ and provide her with the love and emotionally support that her philandering husband, seemingly slutty daughter, and army of servants were incapable of providing her with. Undoubtedly, if Susan is the victim of anything in the end, it is her own hypergamic female instincts just as Edward was a victim of the deluded male belief that ‘love’ means the same thing to women as it does to men.

Admittedly, Nocturnal Animals somewhat surprised me and left a fairly deep impression on me for largely personal reasons, namely in relation to how the heroine shares many of the tragic irrational feminine qualities that some of my ex-girlfriends had. For example, I have been in relationships with women that, despite having genuine artistic and intellectual talents and political views that were sometimes at the right of Savitri Devi, could not bear to quit a ‘multicultural’ corporate job that they hated because they instinctually prioritized the material over the spiritual, cultural, emotional, and artistic, as if they were possessed by a evil tormenting spirit that geared them towards masochism and nihilism, among other things. Indeed, this intrinsic material need seemed to outweigh virtually any other consideration, including their own future and fertility. Not unlike the lead heroine, one of these girls that I knew was totally brainwashed by her similarly cold and seemingly soulless mother, who was not beneath using emotional blackmail and monetary threats against her daughter. Of course, the greatest tragedy is that she opted to waste her intellect and artistic talents when she clearly had the talent to be a notable writer that used her talent for good instead of contributing it to a sinister globalist realm full of semites, arabs, indians and other untermenschen that she could not even bear the sight of. Like Susan, she listened to her deluded mother and never even once seemed to consider that she had genuine talent that could be used for good. Admittedly, unlike the male protagonist of the film, I never felt the need or desire to ‘get revenge’ against this girl after she betrayed me because there was no question in my mind that her own irrational actions and cowardly self-betraying conformist behavior would lead to her own misery. In that sense, I see the male lead’s literary revenge to be somewhat effeminate and pathetic, even if I can empathize with his plight. In fact, I am ashamed to admit it, but I cannot shake my empathy and compassion for her to this day.

Notably, in an interview with deadline.com, auteur Tom Ford—one of a number of fashion designers that have been heavily influenced by the films of R.W.

NOCTURNAL ANIMALS

Fassbinder—revealed he has always had refined tastes in cinema when he stated, “You know fashion designers are probably some of the greatest experts on film that you can imagine because every time we start to design a collection, that is an inspiration. I have built entire collections around Fassbinder’s BITTER TEARS OF PETRA VON KANT. We know film backwards and forwards, and images and sets and clothes and costumes and people and characters, and so we’re storytellers in that sense.” Indeed, Nocturnal Animals does not seem like the work of a second time filmmaker, just as A Single Man did not seem like the work of a first time filmmaker. Aside from Fassbinder’s clear melodramatic influence, the high-camp opening of Ford’s flick featuring grotesquely obese naked women is so disgustingly degenerate that it would probably even make Werner Schroeter blush as a result of suffering from an acute case of fremdschämen. Indeed, while Schroeter was certainly not beneath casting chunky spinsters and horrifying trans-weirdos in his films, I doubt that he could seriously stomach the truly all-American Wal-Mart-esque white whales featured in the singularly loathsomely campy opening of Ford’s flick. Not surprising, Ford has had kind things to say about these extra big-boned (sub)human blimps, as he sees them as the polar opposite of the tragic heroine in the sense that they completely embrace who they are to the point of gleeful self-exploitation. While the film has been sold as a sort of drama-thriller-mystery hybrid, Nocturnal Animals is pure and unadulterated melodrama of the vaguely masculine sort. Like his Mongol-eyed Aryan hero Fassbinder, Ford thankfully believes more in real pathos and realistic endings than Hollywood-esque sugarcoated happy endings, hence why the film seems to have sharply divided both professional film critics and lemming filmgoers alike.

Tom Ford might be a flaming faggot fashion designer, but he is not that much of a pretentious twat as he has no problem admitting what his film is truly about, or as he stated quite clearly in the short featurette The Making of Nocturnal Animals in regard to the central theme of his film, “This story, for me, is really about not throwing people away. You know, we live in a culture where we throw everything away, it’s so disposable. We throw people away. And, so, Susan’s at a moment in her life where she’s achieved everything that she thought she should achieve, from the outside of what her life should look like, yet she’s dead inside. And then all of a sudden, this novel arrives, and it reawakens a lot of things that she’s already feeling. You know, it’s really the last straw that frees her. And, um, so that’s the central theme, and to me that’s an important one. When you have someone important, someone that you love, don’t throw them away, don’t let them go. And, to me, that was the thing, really, essentially about the story that spoke to me.” Indeed, the film depicts the most tragic yet all-too-human of wastes and reveals that regret is one of the most decidedly debilitating of emotions. In that sense, I would argue that Nocturnal Animals is one of the few contemporary films that has the capacity to provide the viewer with a borderline traumatizing experience depending on the background, especially when it comes to the perils of love. On the other hand, the film can also provide certain lovelorn male viewers with a strangely optimistic message. Indeed, when Nietzsche wrote, "Sickness is a powerful stimulant – but one has to be healthy enough for it," he might as well have been explaining the formula for turning lovesick misery into a potent aesthetic weapon, which Edward surely accomplishes in the end.

FINGERED

Tom Green (2001)

If assassinated Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh's 06 (1994) aka 1-900 is the most strangely charming and cultivated phone-sex flick ever made, the quite literally titled work Fingered (1986) directed and co-written by Richard Kern (Nazi, You Killed Me First) and starring and co-written by Lydia Lunch is easily the most overtly sleazy, scummy, and stupidly sinister film on the subject. Booted off stage when it had the honor of premiering at the 1988 Berlin International Film Festival, Kern's 25-minute (anti)erotic micro-epic is pure and adulterated celluloid trash that one might describe as the hokey heterosexual hick equivalent to the avant-garde serial killer short Pig (1998) co-directed by Nico B. and Rozz Williams, as a gritty black-and-white piece of fiercely fetishistic celluloid road kill set in Death Valley not far from where Manson and his minions engaged in psychedelic orgies, siring various bastard kids, and ostensibly planning an apocalyptic race war. A sort of thematic sequel to Kern's The Right Side of My Brain (1985) as a work where 'co-writer'/star Lydia Lunch once again engages in sleazy but hardly steamy unsimulated sex acts with white trash dudes that like sporting sunglasses in dark and shadowy rooms, albeit more 'hardcore' (while Lunch sucks cock and feels up East Asian tits in the earlier film, she gets fucked in both her pussy and asshole by her ex-boyfriend Marty Nation in the later film) and slightly more artistically ambitious, the unsavory short was apparently intended to be anti-pornographic, or as the auteur said himself in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier, "The title sounds like a porno film, but the whole point was to make people feel bad about sex, so it's supposed to be anti-pornography." Indeed, probably the only people that would diddle themselves to Fingered are murderously misogynistic psychopaths like Edmund Kemper and Ted Bundy, and/or misandristic wenches like Lunch herself who regularly describe men as 'pigs' and 'assholes' yet get hopelessly wet at the prospect of an abusive prick violently bending her over and demonstrating who is truly the dominant sex with his hard dick (indeed, such is the overtly salacious scenario that plays out in Fingered). Admittedly, when I first saw the film about a decade ago or so, I thought it was a worthless pile of celluloid shit that senselessly wallowed in being offensive for offensiveness's sake, but after re-watching it recently I realized it has some genuine character and charm as a wild and wanton white trash artsploitation piece where real whores portray screen whores and real working-class lowlifes portray screen working-class lowlifes. Featuring perennial dumb cunt Lunch having a revolver violently reamed up her crusty old cuntlet and dirty dimestore diva Lung Leg being violently sexually assaulted in a way that the (non)actress/sometimes filmmaker would later describe as degrading (despite her rather vocal hatred of men, Lunch is apparently no less harsh in her dealings with members of the so-called fairer sex), Fingered ultimately manages to juggle visceral hatred and decidedly dark humor in such a way that is guaranteed to leave most viewers feeling defiled, emotionally schizophrenic, and/or discombobulated.

In Fingered, Lydia Lunch more or less plays herself as a phone-sex slut that moonlights as a gutter prostitute in what is arguably the most fitting role of her entire acting career (notably, Lunch would later state in the doc Blank City regarding the importance of her quasi-pornographic performance(s), “THE RIGHT SIDE OF MY BRAIN and FINGERED were like public psychotherapy because no one else was talking about this attraction to fear. It was about a violent expulsion bred by the riots, by Charles Manson, by the Son of Sam, and instead of turning the trauma inward, I turned it outward. You’re battered... You battered back”). At the beginning of the film, a fiercely foul fat slob (poof poet Emilio Cubeiro whose 1989 spoken word album The Death Of An Asshole was produced by Lunch) calls up Ms. Lunch while sitting pant-less in a chair in his apartment and declares to her while talking like a baby that sounds like it was raised in a 42nd Street gutter, “I want to speak to my mommy” and she replies, “I can only put mommy on, Joey, after you’ve given me the credit card number and the expiration date. You know it takes money to talk to mommy. She taught you that, didn’t she? Now, go ahead, Joey, give me the number.” Of course, the man-baby inevitably gives Lunch his credit card number (though he claims it is his “father’s” because he is “too young” to have a credit card of his own since he is ostensibly a baby) and joyously talks about sucking his mommy’s “big brown nipples.” Of course, since Lydia is a ludicrously lazy phone-sex whore who takes a less than lackluster approach to pretending to be the man’s mommy, the obnoxiously Oedipal urban ogre soon becomes fairly hostile and angrily bitches about how his mother was a “fucking pig cunt” who ignored him as a child so she could fuck an “asshole Irish insurance guy,” “Mexican slime delivery kid,” and “fucking black janitor with a dick bigger than his brain,” among various other eclectic losers. After declaring, “that foul cunt I came out of. It makes me, even me, cringe to even think about it,” the momma’s boy proclaims, “I don’t want to fuck your cunt. No no no no no. I want to fuck your pink republican asshole. Your sweet Avon pink Republican butthole” and soon Lunch hangs up on his sorry infantile ass. Luckily, the next man that Lydia talks to gets her so terribly turned on that she actually gives him her address so he can come by and finger-fuck and sodomize her in person.

Upon subsequently phone-sexing with a longhaired metalhead-looking degenerate played by Marty Nation on the phone, Lydia proudly declares, “I’m the hottest fucking slut in town... you know that” and her patron responds while masturbating, “You were born to worship my fucking cock and to slurp on my knob and tongue my fucking ballsack and just take my load of spew in your fucking face.” After the phone sex gets too hot to handle, Lydia gives Marty her address and tells him to meet her in 20 minutes. When finally Marty arrives,

FINGERED

Lydia lies on a table while opening her legs in a spread eagle position while the ostensibly ultra-macho longhaired moron says things like, "I always get what I want because I fucking take it." To get Lydia's pussy all warm and wet, Marty whips out a switchblade and carefully cuts off her fishnet stockings with the knife. Despite being fairly overt in her unwavering hatred towards all thing male and masculine, Lydia sure likes her men to be almost maliciously macho and misogynistic as demonstrated by the flagrantly flirtatious fashion in which she asks Marty, "A big fucking man like you must have a lot of whores, right baby?" and is naturally quite sexually thrilled when he replies, "That's right. I like whores. I know what they want and I give it to them." Lydia and Marty seem like the perfect match made in hell as far as couples are concerned, as she likes a man with a "big fat cock and a pocket full of cash" and he prefers pussy-peddling sluts, or as she states, "Most fucking bitches are whores. A whore just asks for it right up front. A whore is just a little bit more honest than most bitches." As Lydia lets Marty know regarding whores, "Not more honest, baby. They just lie better." After the two talk dirty to one another for a couple minutes in a joyously vulgar manner that seems much more authentic than a foreplay scene from the average 1980s porno flick (apparently, Lydia and Marty began dating when the latter was only 16-years-old and the two remained friends after they broke up), Marty bends over savagely sassy slut and begins fiercely finger-fucking her while she ecstatically screams, "make me fucking cum you fucking pig. Fuck me. Fuck me." While Marty eventually mounts and buggers the swarthy streetwalker, he seems to get a little bit excited in the process as it is not long before he expels his load and then proceeds to fist-fucking Lydia. Indeed, while Marty violently fists Lydia, who sounds like a horny hog in heat, she screams, "make me fucking cum, you filthy cock. Do it!" and then proceeds to have an orgasm.

After the two equally depraved strangers complete coitus and leave the apartment, Lydia is immediately approached by a sleazy middle-aged pervert on the street who grabs her arm and asks her, "Hey, baby, how much?," to which she hostilely replies, "Get your filthy hands off me. You can't afford it." Needless to say, the would-be-john is pissed and retorts, "Well, fuck you. You whores coming around here ruining our neighborhoods with your goddamn faggot boyfriends." Unfortunately for the sidewalk sex scavenger, Marty pops out immediately after he says, "goddamn faggot boyfriends," and threatens the man by angrily stating, "Hey, you got a problem, buddy? Fat ugly motherfucker." Although just initially threatening to kill the man due to his rather rude behavior, Marty gets a little bit too excited and stoically slits the sorry sap's fatty throat with the ease and precision that one would expect from a barber who is giving a customer a quick shave. While Lydia seems somewhat afraid of Marty after he violently murders the stranger in cold blood, she meekly follows his orders when he demands that she "Get the fuck in the car" and then proceeds to take a little road trip with him in Death Valley that ultimately has savagely nihilistic consequences that even a morally bankrupt ghetto whore like her could not predict. While riding in his car, Lydia has the nerve to ask Marty, "What's your goddamn problem? You didn't have to do that, you know. What are you trying to prove, anyway?," but he merely replies in a self-satisfied fashion, "He got in my way and had to pay." Indeed, Marty has a malevolent plan that involves having some good clean fun with Lydia and some friends, but of course the two encounter a couple 'detours' on the way that somewhat predictably have rather deleterious results.

The first place that Marty takes Lydia is a place called 'The Snakepit' where the working-class antihero soon spots a redneck comrade of his lifting weights outside while listening to cheesy country music, which inspires the character to ask his friend, "What's this cowboy shit?" Naturally, the poorly dressed desert weightlifter is quite pleased to see Lydia and immediately says to her with a sort of L.A. hillbilly twang, "Looky, looky, nice fresh nooky," to which she whorishly replies, "If you can afford it, it's yours." Of course, Marty's friend is immediately pawing at Lydia and playing with her tits, thus inciting animosity between the two sub-lumpenprole pals that eventually erupts into senseless violence. Indeed, while his friend is carrying Lydia and playing with her unclad mammary glands, Marty stabs him in the thigh and then forces the dirtbag (anti)diva to get back into his car, thus bringing a swift end to their trip to the so-called Snakepit. Not surprisingly, Lydia gets pretty angry at Marty at this point and bitches at him, "I'm sick of your macho bullshit. A real fucking hard guy. Fuck you!," to which he characteristically replies, "You know, you talk a lot of shit, you dumb fucking cunt." While Lydia continues to bitch incessantly in a manner that would put even a morbidly obese black ghetto welfare queen to shame in terms of sheer obscenely odious obnoxiousness and intolerability, Marty thankfully decides enough is enough, violently drags the lecherous unlady out of his car, bends her over the hood of said car, and then proceeds to ram his loaded revolver in and out of her seemingly putrid poontang, which she seems to rather enjoy despite bitching, "you stupid fucking macho pig." After using his assumedly well greased gun as a sort of redneck dildo, Marty penetrates Lydia's discernibly loose asshole while she shoots off rounds from the revolver in what ultimately proves to be a particularly absurdly humorous orgasm that makes it seem like lowlife criminals are masters of improvised carnal fun.

When Marty spots a greasy haired teenage waif (Lung Leg) with torn white clothing while driving in the desert, he gets extremely excited, announces to Lydia, "Yo, check it out! Some teenage flesh hitchhiking," and then proceeds to coerce the seemingly petrified girl into getting into his car. It must be the worst day of the discernibly shaken teen's life, as she has no idea that Lydia and Marty are sadomasochistic sexual outlaws and immediately tells them a sob story about how a menacing man wielding a large knife got violent with her and threatened to rape and kill her. Fairly predictably, the hot twat hitchhiker's glaring fear and tragic story make both Lydia and Marty fairly aroused and they decide that they want to complete what the would-be-sex-killer failed to accomplish. While Lydia and Marty promise to drive the hitchhiker back to her house after she begs them to, the two scheming white trash degenerates soon begin manhandling the hysterical teen while they are driving down the road. Although the hitchhiker manages to put up a good fight against her sexually aberrant attackers, it does not take long before Lydia is sitting on top of her body in the desert and ripping off all her clothes like a Sapphic sadist who gets a kick out of raping young nubile girls that cannot fight back. Needless to say, Marty masturbates over the hitchhiker while Lydia feels up her tits and pulls down her panties and exposes her bushy beaver to the arid desert air. When the teen manages to break free from Lydia's savagely sensual grasp, Marty chases her down and starts brutally beating her while yelling psychopathic things like, "You dumb fucking cunt... You shouldn't have blown it. Fucking idiot, what are you fucking doing this for?! You brought it upon yourself. Goddamn fucking cunt. Why did you have to blow it? This is what you fucking get." Indeed, while blaming his victim for the senseless brutality that he is unleashing on her, Marty angrily declares with a discernible degree of seething psychosexual hatred and frustration, "I could fucking kill you." After brutally beating the hitchhiker within an inch of her life to the point where her skin and clothes are completely soaked in blood and dirt, Marty is rebuked by Lydia, who seems to realize she might be in some serious trouble due to her role in maliciously molesting the waif and complains to her lunatic loverboy, "Macho asshole jerk. I didn't even want to come here to begin with, you big fucking dick." In his defense, Marty says to Lydia in regard to beating the hitchhiker to a bloody pulp, "She fucking blew it. She had to pay." In a twist Hollywood-esque ending that seems somewhat tacked-on and that I feel makes Fingered somewhat weaker in a sort of pseudo-moralistic sense that contradicts the film's overall aggressively nihilistic tone, an off-screen cop randomly says to Lydia and Marty while they are arguing, "Freeze! LA County Sheriff!"

While it is just speculation on my part, I doubt Hollywood films like Dominic Sena's Kalifornia (1993) and Oliver Stone's Natural Born Killers (1994) could have ever been made without the imperative influence of Kern's Fingered (in fact, Stone's film seems like a sort of Hollywood postmodern pastiche of a number of Kern's films). Indeed, while films like Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde (1967), Leonard Kastle's The Honeymoon Killers (1969), and Terrence Malick's Badlands (1973) certainly predate the epic short in terms of works about outlaw lunatic lovers, Kern's superlatively sleazy slice of gutter grade celluloid featured a whole new dimension of grittiness, nihilism, human ugliness, and visceral sexual depravity that makes the other works seem like hopelessly contrived Hollywood romantic-comedies by comparison. Notably, the film largely owes its raw, rugged, and even psychopathic essence to the fact that virtually all of the actors more or less played themselves, or as Kern stated in an interview conducted by the insufferable left-wing hipster hacks at Vice, "Believe me, in FINGERED, Marty Nation was exactly like that, no exaggeration. The guy who's lifting weights, he was like that. Everybody was real. Lydia Lunch was like that. Lung Leg was like that. The story was based on Lydia and Marty's travels when she was 16 and they would hitchhike and get picked up by somebody, and Marty would take his knife out and start stabbing and cutting up the upholstery in the car, looking at the guy. All those guys were really scary. The guy who's lifting weights in it got killed about two years ago, somebody shot him finally."

Additionally, Lung Leg would accuse Lydia Lunch of taking delight in authentically abusing her while making the film, or as she explained in an interview with Duane Davis in the book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant, "I played only one role as Victim...in FIN-GERED...I was really taken for a ride in this movie...Unfortunately there was no script, if I had seen the script I wouldn't have had anything to do with it. Half way through the film I realized, this woman, Lunch is not making a film, Lunch is playing some kind of board game; with me and the other people involved...maneuvering...manipulating...etc...and for that reason I would never want to work with her again. She is abusing the medium. She obviously tried to make me appear ugly so I wouldn't get her Boys, and in so doing reduced greatly the quality of the film." While I believe that Lunch's organic sense of sadism actually adds extra layers of psychosexual horror to the film, I can certainly understand why Ms. Lung would still be upset about the fact that crusty old cunt Lunch beat her up and pulled her panties down. More or less half anti-pornographic chamber piece and half pseudo-snuff horror road movie, Fingered is ultimately a work that has few contemporaries as a sort of poor pervert's take on Jon Jost's classic flick Last Chants for a Slow Dance (1977) meets the fierce filmic fist-fucking of the experimental S&M porn flicks of gay pornographic auteur Fred Halsted like LA Plays Itself (1972), The Sex Garage (1972), and Sextool (1975). Indeed, if you're interested in experiencing a sort of metaphysical death-by-sex via celluloid in post-Manson Death Valley, Kern's film makes for a great triple-feature with Teutonic dandy Werner Schroeter's (anti)feminist arthouse horror flick Willow Springs (1973) and Nico B. and Rozz William's experimental S&M serial killer flick Pig (1998). Although I felt that Fingered was nothing more than frivolous fetishistic trash masquerading as art when I first saw it about a decade ago, I now must accept the fact that it is one of the very few great and memorable (anti)erotic white trash artsploitation horror flicks, even if I hate to admit it. Of course, John Waters probably gave the film its greatest accolade when he stated in Blank City that it was, "The ultimate date movie for psychos...it is. If you had your first date and took the girl to see FINGERED and afterwards she said, 'That was really good,' you know you were gonna get laid, but how were you gonna get laid?! That's the problem." After all, if there is any female quasi-actress that is truly believable as an evil, wanton wench who gets a sick kick out of defiling little girls to impress her equally evil and classless beau, it is Lydia Lunch, who demonstrates in Kern's film that she likes to be both fingered and doing the fingering.

FREDDY GOT FINGERED

Tom Green (2001)

Freddy Got Fingered is such a singularly caustic, anarchic pipebomb of surreal tastelessness it is a crying shame many will simply relegate it to the dustbin of recent pop cultural history wherein the rest of Tom Green's career resides. Whatever the merits of Green's love-him-or-hate-him persona, however unavoidable was the refrain of "my bum is on your..." in the summer of '99, whether or not it is fair to blame (or pity) him for the subsequent success of Jackass (which utilized many of the most notable elements of Green's MTV show- parental abuse, skateboarding, and go-for-broke gross-out gags- while in turn dropping the more challenging, surreal aspects in favor of giggly teen boy fauxmoroticism), there is no denying that for a few glorious weeks in 2001, cinema audiences the nation over were treated within minutes of the opening credits of a major studio produced comedy the sight of a man so inspired by a glimpse of an erect equine cock that he stops his car, hops a fence, and jiggles and jerks the massive member with eye-rolling glee. Why does he do this? Why not? Like the early punk anthems that form much of the film's soundtrack, Freddy Got Fingered blasts by on a pure, unadulterated urge to shock with a manic pace that never lets up. Green directs himself as Gordy, a 28-year old sociopathic manchild who dreams of nothing more than to see his senseless doodles translated into small screen success. Gordy's dad (Rip Torn!) wants nothing more than for Gordy to follow the example of his younger brother Freddy and get a job and move out of the house. In the struggles of wills that ensues we are invited to witness Rip Torn bare his ass while goading Green to fuck him (which manages to somehow be far more horrifying than an earlier scene of Green cutting open and then prancing about in the carcass of a dead deer), the hilarity that ensues when Gordy falsely accuses his dad of molesting said younger brother (hence the title), a cloyingly cute child actor brutalized in increasingly-violent turns of fate, Gordy licking a friend's open leg wound, Gordy delivering a baby against the mother's will (biting the umbilical chord with his teeth and swinging the gore-drenched stillborn around his head to revive it), and a pachyderm sperm-soaked reconciliation between father and son that must rank in Rip Torn's mind as the absolute nadir of a once-promising career. In Roger Ebert's scathing indictment of a review he rightly recognizes that "the day may come when Freddy Got Fingered is seen as a milestone of neo-surrealism" while going on to add "The day may never come when it is seen as funny." On that count, I would have to disagree- the humor in the film is well-balanced between Green's off-the-cuff weirdo asides, scatological mania, and a more successful go at the politically incorrect humor of, say, a Troma flick. The only reason my laughs were muted throughout was that my jaw was dropping at unprecedented rates, not just in terms of how genuinely disgusting much of the imagery was, but in the utter strangeness of scenes like Gordy rigging a sausage-pulley system to his fingers so he can play off-tune piano, eat breakfast and draw at the same time, or when an attempted blowjob is delayed by the discovery of a piece of umbilical cord duct-taped to his stomach. Werner Herzog fell over himself praising Harmony Korine for the piece of bacon taped above the bathtub in Gummo, but what of the umbilical cord taped to Green's stomach? It's a shame Werner never got a load of this one; not unlike Gummo, this is the work of an artist burning to tell a tale as only he can tell it, a purging of deep-seated weirdness and fantastic imagery that will never be equalled in his oeuvre. Hollywood chewed Green up and spit him out into the made-for-tv children's comedies and reality game show hell we've forged for those who are no longer relevant, but frankly Freddy Got Fingered is as succinct and subversive a statement as the guy will ever make, so fuck it. Why not? Lastly, one can't review Freddy Got Fingered without mention of Green's love interest Betty (Marisa Coughland), perhaps the most perfect female specimen to ever grace the big-screen: an endlessly supportive, blowjob-obsessed, wheelchair-bound doctor/amateur rocket-scientist who loves nothing more than being beat in her useless legs with a bamboo stick (to orgasm). "But Gord, I don't care about jewels, I just want to suck your cock." Through what mad alchemy did Green arrive at a girl that exemplifies the very ethos of Soiled Sinema?

TAKING TIGER MOUNTAIN

Undoubtedly, in terms of William S. Burroughs related films, you cannot find a more rare work than the American-UK co-production Taking Tiger Mountain (1983) aka Trechi Mynydd y Teigr co-directed/co-penned by Tom Huckabee and Kent Smith. Based on the Burroughs novella Blade Runner (a movie) (1979), which is regarded by some as a 'closet screenplay' and which has no relation to Ridley Scott's 1982 science fiction flick of the same name (though the producer's did purchase the title 'Blade Runner,' which in the novel is a reference to smugglers of medical supplies like scalpels, etc.), Taking Tiger Mountain is a decidedly disorientating and deranging black-and-white dystopian anti-agitprop agitprop piece set in the futuristic time of 1990(!) starring a rather young (and oftentimes naked) Bill Paxton (Aliens, Frailty) as an involuntary assassin who is sexually lobotomized by a London-based bourgeois feminazi 'think tank' looking to establish a 'world matriarchy' and sent out on a suicide mission to assassinate a military major/prostitution commissioner and supposed tiger-keeper at a prostitution resort town in Wales where even old slags manage to turn six tricks in under an hour's time. Originally intended as a film inspired by the 1973 kidnapping of American 'golden hippie' J. Paul Getty and aesthetically influenced by French New Wave films and writings of ex-patriate writers like Paul Bowles, Taking Tiger Mountain started production in 1975 as a totally improvised experimental film after co-director Kent Smith (who attended UCLA with Jim Morrison and made a living creating films for Encyclopedia Britannica) and then-unknown American actor Bill Paxton decided to travel to Tangiers on a whim and create a true celluloid odyssey, but after the two men found themselves bribing their way out of a Morocco prison and without any film stock left, they handed the film project over to Tom Huckabee, who decided to recruit his favorite novelist, W.S. Burroughs, to piece together a narrative of the patently perverse and paranoid sort out of the 10 hours of footage he had to work with. As Jon Dieringer at screenslate.com noted regarding Burroughs, "His novels Blade Runner: A Movie and The Last Words of Dutch Schultz expressly represent varyingly unorthodox attempts at screenwriting craft. Yet to date, Taking Tiger Mountain is the only feature film bearing direct writing credit for William S. Burroughs," yet Jack Sargeant's comprehensive study of Beat related films, Naked Lens: Beat Cinema (2009), does not feature a single reference to Huckabee's film, thus demonstrating the rarity of the work as a true 'lost film' that only a handful of people have seen, at least until recently. Indeed, a film that was originally made with a totally different (non)script, abandoned (with the original soundtrack lost), and taken over by Huckabee, who apparently hired lip readers to fill in blanks in the script and added his own off-screen character dialog to fill in the film, Taking Tiger Mountain managed to more or less unwittingly utilize Burroughs' literary 'cut-up technique,' albeit in a manner that is discernibly more coherent. As for Burroughs' actual contribution to the film, Kuckabee stated as follows in an interview, "Burroughs came to town and watched what I had on a flatbed moviola. He said, 'I think you've got something there, kid,' and gave me the rights to his material for $100. He even offered to appear in the film, but like an idiot I said there wasn't really a part for him." A marvelous mess of a movie of the quasi-metaphysical sort that arguably does Burroughs better than any other film to date, including Cronenberg's Naked Lunch (1991), Taking Tiger Mountain portrays a whacked out world of the apocalyptic sort where fecund-free feminists transcend towelhead Islamists in terms of terrorist activity, thus making it quite arguably the most bizarre and idiosyncratic piece of misogyny ever committed to celluloid.

Set in a chaotic world where America and Russia have finally decided to show off their nukes and World War III is in full swing, Taking Tiger Mountain centers on a 20-year-old anti-social Texas-born hippie draft-dodger named Billy Hampton (Bill Paxton) who, like most Americans of his time, especially draft-dodgers, sought refuge in West England from the chaos of World War III, but ultimately became the human guinea pig of a feminist terrorist 'think-tank' that claims to be attempting to 'reinstate a long lost balance between the sexes.' As one of the frigid feminists states at the beginning of the film regarding their odious objective, "The female is sociocentric. The male is egocentric. But we have found that men can be adjusted...improved permanently. And we can alter the gene pool in such a way that only convivial men can be born. Gender is a learned thing. First we need to understand the male sexuality identity. We need to know which parts are intrinsic and which are conditioned. And we need to learn what parts are essential so the rest may be scrapped away and excised." Indeed, over a 738 day period, the fiendish feminist hags used a series of aphrodisiacs and psychotropic drugs, electric shocks, and gay porn on Billy to turn him into a gynophobic homo and even had him surgically castrated, but somehow they managed to repair him back to normal as they are using him as an assassin to kill a Minister of Prostitution in Wales named Major Whitbread. Billy is programmed to believe that Major Whitbread is a 'tiger keeper' (who is also "actually a tiger") sent by god who killed his father (who really died of a heart attack) and plans to kill him. Believing he is going on a trip to a village in Wales to experience a 'sex vacation,' Billy has no clue what sort of maze of madness he is about to get involved with.

As Billy candidly states at the beginning of Taking Tiger Mountain regarding sex, "How does an orgasm make me feel? It makes me feel...it makes me feel like god, man. When I cum...no, not like god...more like Elvis Presley or something." While Billy enters the Welsh village thinking he will be experiencing an odyssey of heterosexual orgasms, what he actually experiences is psychological torture, horrific hallucinations (including, imagining his eye is being plucked out by a vulture), sadistic gay violence, superlatively shady characters, and multiple deaths. Upon entering a brothel, Billy runs into an old madam who runs the place named Mrs. Davis, who brags that she can “turn six tricks an hour...no matter what, young or old, I'd get them off before I got going.” Mrs. Davis gives Billy an aphrodisiac and proceeds to discuss how Major Whitbread prevented her from marrying her great love. From there, Billy is taken to a prostitute auction by a gay teenage prostitute slave-boy named ‘Sally John’ who recommends that he choose a girl named Judy Church because ‘she is the Major’s favorite.’ Of course, Billy chooses Judy Church and is led to her house by a little boy. Upon arriving at her humble abode, Billy confesses to Judy that he is nervous since it has been a while since he last had sex, but the two end up making passionate love (believe it or not, the scene actually features Bill Paxton receiving an unsimulated blow job from the non-actress). Assumedly as a result of the feminist brainwashing he has suffered, Billy ends up regrettably falling in love with a weird and sexually sadistic Welsh outlaw boy named Tony Boyle, who is almost Satanic in his charm, but he fights his urges. Out of nowhere, Tony begins cutting up his own lip with a pirate knife, which irks Billy, who threateningly states to the boy, “What are you trying to do, you think I get off to that? Blood doesn’t mean nothing to me. You’re no hero, man. Nobody cares what you do.” Welsh boy Tony then proceeds to cut up Billy’s lip in a discernibly homoerotic fashion, but some people scare him off before he can kill the American draft-dodger. After a number of hallucinations, street fights, and lonely days/nights sleeping on the street, Billy finally meets the Major at bar and accuses him of spying on him and attempting to make him into a male prostitute. Of course, the Major denies all these claims and tells Billy he is free to leave on the latest train out of Swansea, but Billy decides not to. After meeting with a fellow American who fled the United States after being busted for selling dope to college students, Billy is chased by terrorist assassins and his new friend is gunned down in cold blood. Billy ends up going back to Mrs. Davis’ house and she and her husband attempt to get him to hook up with their daughter Barbara. While Billy bangs Barbara, he decides to go against Mrs. Davis’ wishes and leaves her home. Ultimately, Billy confronts Tony Boyle and then proceeds to chase down Judy Church at some ancient ruins, as if she is some sort of seductive ghost. In his hunt for Judy Church, Billy ends up falling off of a cliff, but somehow reappears again alive on a beach where he attempts to beat gay outlaw Tony to death. In the end, Tony stabs Billy to death on the beach and the American draft-dodger whispers, “paradise...,” as if his demise has finally brought him solace.

Featuring automaton-like prostitutes that work for the government and a lead protagonist that candidly states, “You can’t trust anybody, really, anything real personal...because the only people that ever fuck you are the people that really care about you,” Taking Tiger Mountain is undoubtedly a singular dystopian flick in that it actually manages to conjure up a paranoid state where the personal and impersonal have become one in the same, with even the sex act itself becoming something that one cannot do without feeling that there is some dubious ulterior-motive related to the act. In terms of predicting the future, Taking Tiger Mountain manages to demonstrate how out of hand feminist culture-distorting has become. Indeed, while modern day feminists do not typically surgically castrate men and send them on assassin missions as depicted in the film, one has to wonder about a world where a deranged Jewish feminist like Sheryl Sandberg, who is chief operating officer of Facebook, seeks to have the word “bossy” banned because she believes the word somehow prevents women from seeking leadership roles because they are afraid of being called the B word (personally, I know another 5-letter word that starts with B that is more fitting for Sandberg). Socio-political concerns aside, Taking Tiger Mountain is quite arguably the most ‘trippiest’ film ever shot in black-and-white, which is no small accomplishment for a work that was filmed using the discarded short ends from Bob Fosse’s Lenny Bruce biopic Lenny (1974) starring Dustin Hoffman. Filmed with the real Welsh townspeople playing themselves (indeed, ‘Judy Church’ was played by Judy Church) in an area full of ancient ruins that seem untainted by modernity, Taking Tiger Mountain is like The Wicker Man of Beat movies meets the anti-sci-fi action of Godard’s Alphaville (1965), albeit actually entertaining and paranoia-inspiring, which is partially due to the disorientating soundtrack by Radio Free Europe and the incessant audio clips from fake news reports. Featuring references to how the so-called ‘Christian Democratic Government of the U.S.’ are planning to execute 11 people (including actress Shirley MacLaine, actor Richard Dreyfuss, and former CIA officer turned whistleblower John R. Stockwell) on September 11 (!), Taking Tiger Mountain has certainly aged quite gracefully in a rather strange way and is thus begging for a new cult audience, though it is questionable whether or not modern day viewers will be accepting of the film, as not many people appreciated it upon its release, or as director Tom Huckabee stated in an interview, “I know that some of the bigger fans [of Taking Tiger Mountain] were gay and bisexual men that seemed to get it better than maybe other demographics. And then recently when I showed it here at the theater where Lee Harvey Oswald was caught—there were a bunch of ex-film students in their 30s that all studied experimental cinema, and people like that tend to get it. I think when it first came out, it was just too weird. People mostly didn’t understand where it was coming from. I think when I show it these days, people tend to get it more.” Aside from giving me a new sense of respect for Bill Paxton, Taking Tiger Mountain has also proved to me that John Boorman’s Zardoz (1974) is not the only decent UK-based semi-pagan-themed dystopian science fiction.

Swoon is a film about the 1924 'thrill killing' committed by gay Jewish lovers Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb. These two wealthy sick perverts had the luxury of attending the University of Chicago and were both considered "geniuses." Inspired by Friedrich Nietzsche's Übermensch concept, the two Hebrews decided they would show their superiority by killing a 14-year-old fellow Jew by the name of Bobby Franks. Swoon takes a look at the Franks murder in a more accurate way than any before it. Whereas Alfred Hitchcock's Rope takes a look at the psychological reasons for the murder only, Swoon focuses on the gay relationship between Leopold and Loeb in context to the murder. Rope came out at a time when degeneracy wasn't the norm so good old Hitch had to be ambiguous about the relationship between the two "friends." Swoon features in-your-face gay sex, Negro drag queens, and a violent child murder via chisel. Swoon director Tom Kalin didn't hold back when portraying the real life child murder by two spoiled perverts. Tom Kalin made the right decision when he decided to shoot Swoon in vintage style black-and-white film stock. The film also features real stock footage from the time of the real Leopold and Loeb child murder. Swoon is a successful experiment in the power of combing old film equipment with new to achieve a film that captures the viewer in a forgotten time when murders like these were considered taboo. Swoon also features footage of phrenology tests showing how to tell by a persons head and facial experiments whether they were gay, Jewish, or even a murderer. Phrenology is now considered a pseudo science, which is fair considering the recent trend of producing mongrel children. With all the "diverse" faces, it would be impossible to categorize all the "mental illnesses" associated with them. Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb killed Bobby Franks in a rental car. In a friendly and cunning manner, the two sociopath perverts invited Franks for a ride. Upon entry, one of the young men hit the boy in the head with a chisel causing a bloody mess. After knocking Franks unconscious, they shoved a sock in his mouth and he died shortly afterwards. Although the evidence is inconclusive, it is assumed that the two men performed sexual acts on the dead boy's body. They also poured acid on the boys face, genitals, and a scar on his body so that he could not be identified. Unfortunately for Leopold and Loeb, they weren't as smart as they thought as Leopold left his distinct glasses at the scene of the crime. Swoon goes into depth on all these things in much detail (except the pedophile necrophilia of course). The Real "Dickie" and "Babe" As can be expected, when both lovers were caught they blamed the other person. Neither "men" wanted to take responsibility for their "genius" dirty work. In Swoon, the impression you get is that Richard Loeb was the mastermind of the killing and Nathan Leopold was his passive bitch. Director Tom Kalin examines the characters roles in the murder and how they relate to the sexual roles of their relationship. Swoon is certainly a masterpiece of "New Queer Cinema." I wasn't surprised by the leniency of the courts in the Leopold and Loeb case. Nathan Leopold was released after serving 33 years in prison. Richard Loeb died in prison when a fellow prisoner slit his throat with a straight razor. According to the authorities, the man had killed Loeb in self-defense (sexual perversion was involved). Ed Lahey of the Chicago Daily News stated in a homophobic manner, "Richard Loeb, despite his erudition, today ended his sentence with a proposition." I wish newsman were that honest nowadays. Swoon is an artistic film about a very brutal and disturbing event in American history. Director Tom Kalin succeeded in making an honest and original film that most people would cringe if they even knew the film existed. Out of the films based on a true crime, Swoon might possibly be the best. I rarely see films of such a repellent subject matter that have as much cinematic power as Swoon.

THE RAPE AFTER

Tom Lau Moon-Tong (1984)

Ever since my initial viewing of Centipede Horror, I have had a change of mind concerning ancient horror films, ones of the supernatural element that is. Ghosts and Spirits just are not my cup of tea. While i appreciate the theory of their existence, I don't believe they fare well on the silver screen. Since Centipede Horror, I have reconsidered my preconceived notion, and now with the viewing of The Rape After, I am positive that there is a frightening ghost tale. Ma Hsien-Sheng is a photographer of models. He also has a hobby of owning religious artifacts and during one of his photo shoots, manages to steal one of a particularly nasty looking demon. When he brings it home, the church is in an uproar and he invites an upcoming model, Shu Ya, over to his house in hopes of getting lucky. After many drinks, they both vomit and pass out. During their slumber, the statue morphs into a demon goblin and rapes Shu Ya while she is sleeping. When she awakes, she has no recollection of the night before and assumes that they had sex. Upon the news of her pregnancy, she immediately claims it as Ma's child and fearing his religious girlfriend finding out, he takes her to an abortion clinic. After a failed attempt, the demon attacks the staff and Ma runs away. Already proving how much of a coward he is in the face of imminent death, Shu Ya drops contact with him until months later. She requests to be taken to the hospital. On the way, the emotional woman begins to hit Ma causing the car to steer off the road and flip, throwing Ma from the car. After he attempts to free her from the confines of twisted metal, the car explodes, leaving Shu Ya burning alive in the car whilst uttering a curse upon Ma. Along the ride comes zombies (Haitian style), flaming crows, gooey cannibalism, and really bad haircuts. The Rape After has all the attributes of a cheesy horror film, but something about it manages to get under your skin. I'm saying that this film managed to unnerve me. The atmosphere present throughout this film feels like poison. The zombies and the charred corpses recall from a time where FX was labored over, not created with a huge budget. Ears ripped off and devoured, which reminds you of the scene in Dead Alive, except this scene wins the prize. I have noticed that in near every old Hong Kong horror film, they introduce a scene that features vomiting of a disgusting paste and sometimes creatures. Is this some sort of 80's craze? or just one of Asia's hidden fetishes? As normal, this cursed man brings his problems onto a group of other people and leaves many dead in the wake. Due to the bleak outlook of the story, It is wholly depressing and misanthropic. One scene is reminiscent of Ghoulies, In which a monk goes to the bathroom and while he is relieving himself, a demon grabs him and pulls him in his own brewery for some foul scares. While the theme of the film is nihilism, we can thank the dank lighting for creating efficient moods and the sinister score for holding the suspense. Ma is a coward, this we know, but my real problem lies with Shu Ya.

THE RAPE AFTER

It was her own fault to assume that it was his child. The entire film is about her revenge when in fact, It wasn't even his fault. Sure, he stole a demonic statue, but she didn't have to be a trifling whore. The Rape After is a film that is overlooked due to it's provocative name and a VCD classic. If you can overlook the Lifetime Women's Channel morals, then you're set for an eerie supernatural classic.

THE 4TH DIMENSION

The 4th Dimension originally started out as a student film. This was no surprise for me as it is well known Mr. Lynch's feature length debut masterpiece Eraserhead came out of a similar situation (Lynch received a grant from AFI for the film). The 4th Dimension follows a path laid out by David Lynch, James Fotopoulos, and Darren Aronofsky (the artistic poser and hack). One can't help to look at those experimental films before when evaluating The 4th Dimension. Unlike most contemporary films, The 4th Dimension features very long and calculated shots. These welcoming drifting shots bring the viewer on a ride to the unknown. The 4th Dimension also features various nicely set-up wide angle shots that Stanley Kubrick would be proud of. The creators of The 4th Dimension seem to have actually learned important techniques in film school (unlike most film school directors). Like its predecessors, The 4th Dimension was filmed in black and white film stock (including some color film during the end). The images are crystal clear and complimentary of the film's protagonist Jack's unemotional neurosis. I also got the feeling that David Lynch's Elephant Man lent some influence to The 4th Dimension's atmosphere. The 4th Dimension is a character study of an individual with an introverted personality. Only during the film's conclusion do we find the truth behind Jack's ambiguous and complicated character. Various childhood flashbacks help to build up pieces of Jack's background. As a young child, Jack was a child genius and prodigy. He eventually becomes obsessed with Albert Einstein's unified field theory. Jack's obsession with time is a result of very depressing and hopeless circumstances revolving around his mother. During the film's climax, Jack finally realizes his forgotten past and unleashes an explosion of pent up emotions. He finds himself in an abandoned mental hospital that could believably be housing various ghosts of former patients. The 4th Dimension could even be a tribute to the decayed past of a building from hell. The end of the film is unexpected yet complimentary. The film begins in ambiguity and ends in a collected package. Quite a change for the experimental film. The 4th Dimension was written, produced, and directed by Tom Mattera and Dave Mazzoni. I find it very unrealistic that two collaborators could create a film with a linear flow of ideas. The 4th Dimension succeeds in its team of two fellow students. The film features an array of beautiful cinematography, suited acting, and lonely yet warm luscious dream sequences. I will be looking out for the filmmakers further work in the future. I suggest you do the same.

THE CHILDREN

Tom Shankland (2018) I encountered a sturdy revelation in the final moments of The Children. Contrary to what Jervaise Brooke Hamster declares insistently, the British film industry has had some bloody reinventions recently marking intense extremes within the horror community: Most recently, Eden Lake and 2008's The Children. In both of these rather marvelous contraptions, scenarios that are normally shunned are given proper treatment over a spread amount of time. In Eden Lake, we watch a group of young Chavs terrorize a couple in the woods over a disputed murder of a rottweiler and in The Children, we encounter a Christmas party gone horribly awry when an uninvited virus turns the youngsters into murdering charlatans. Think Children of the Corn but without that goofy retro aesthetic that overkills the sand-colored film stock. The most alarming and fundamental aspect of The Children is the uninformed marketing of an unexplained virus. Some might get offended at the lack of insight into this epidemic but I find the air of mystique to be quite welcoming. In fact, The Children almost reminds me of equal parts Children of the Corn, Cabin Fever, and Stephen King's Cell. The moments of toddler terror even brought to mind Cronenberg's horrifying film effort The Brood. At our local Wal-Mart exists a crane game that emits a horrifying child laugh that sends shiver up and down my spine. It's official, children are the most terrifying villain ever put to screen and it's the most fresh kill count. For instance, I've seen every method of human dispatch. Watching an adult get axed or anything similar to casual hack n' slash is too deadpan for my taste. We've seen it all before and it lacks shock value. But watching a child die is like kick starting the horror genre. Only with the death of our youth will horror be once again fresh and uncompromising. To be fair to horror and The Children, this is one of the most terrifying movies to be released recently. If there were ever a film to diagnose me with parasomnia, The Children would be the culprit. The fact that the parents refuse to acknowledge their seed, their parasites, to be the villain is frighteningly realistic. Only till death will these fools see the murdering lot their children have been converted to. For that matter, after watching this film, I stumbled out into my living room in order to be greeted by stares from two children. Needless to say, I immediately thought about locking them in the attic and impaling their tiny faces on shards of glass. It's recommended prior to viewing to rest easy for several minutes before encountering children. What might cause this brief form of sibling dementia is the casting and performances itself. Very rarely do I find myself enthused about child acting but the roles of these demon children are simple astounding. Evil has never been personified in children as well as this.

As I previously stated, The Children is a testament to the rebirth of an unnerving kill count. Watching people that don't deserve to die, in fact die, is something that will cause an unsettling amount of distress. The Children is a film that will no doubt upset parents and people with escapist values but if you look past the premature version of child murders, The Children is a film that will no doubt horrify the ever-living shit out of parents. My mother refuses to watch her ex-favorite horror movie, Poltergeist, due to the violence directed towards children. If you feel the need to taint the maternal instinct of your loved ones, The Children is the cure for the common parental cold. I've seen the future of horror and it is a hot "goth" bitch killing off five year olds. The Children also features one of my personal favorite endings that caps off a frightening film with a frightening post-premise resulting in a superb naturalist pandemic of toddler Armageddon that has a fresh and visceral approach to snowbound blood splatter. Easily one of the best uses of a snowy atmosphere.

Tom Tykwer (2012)

As a man who has spent virtually his entire filmmaking career demonically prodding and probing the subjects of his films, especially his oftentimes depraved documentaries, Rosa von Praunheim (I Am My Own Woman, Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity) has been long overdue for the same treatment for some time and in the documentary Rosakinder (2012) aka Rosa's Children aka Pink Children, not one, but five very different filmmakers do just that. Indeed, directed by five of von Praunheim's former students from the Film & Television Academy (HFF) in Potsdam, the document presents a rare vulnerable and sentimental von Praunheim who becomes an object of love, hate, and ridicule. Made in tribute to the sod senior citizen's 70th anniversary, Rosakinder, which was commissioned by WDR and ARTE, is an experimental film of sorts in that each of the five directors (Chris Kraus, Axel Ranisch, Robert Thalheim, Tom Tykwer, and Julia von Heinz) involved directed a short which appears in the documentary regarding their typically troubled relationships with Herr von Praunheim. Indeed, believe it or not, the Hollywoodized MTV-addled hack who directed Run Lola Run (2008), Tom Tykwer, regards von Praunheim as his greatest mentor, even if his films have about as much in common with his ex-professor's as the blockbuster celluloid bile of Michael Bay have to do with the works of Ingmar Bergman. As one learns while watching Rosakinder, von Praunheim taught his students to, among other things, hate their fathers, make serious gay films even if they are heterosexual and, most importantly, to make honest and passionate films yet, as each filmmaker's respective short demonstrates, the pink kraut queen's influence did not exactly have a positive influence on his mostly heterosexual and hopelessly normal pupils. While watching the documentary, you don't learn that von Praunheim is the loveable old fag next door, but a seasoned master of dealing out misery and ridicule to his friends and pupils alike. Of course, as a man who openly admits he was quite relieved when nemesis Rainer Werner Fassbinder tragically dropped dead, von Praunheim does not pretend to play nice in the doc, but he does seem to be a bit confused and out of his element as a flaming old fairy surrounded by much younger heterosexuals. Indeed, as Deutschland's number #1 queer agitator who has quite arguably pissed off more people than any other German filmmaker in history (including Veit Harlan!), it almost seems silly that a group of mostly heterosexual bourgeois filmmakers are paying tribute to him, as if the mensch who directed It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971) aka Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt has somehow become respectable and is not the same man who filmed himself having sex with his sod friends in front of film students when he was teaching a class in San Francisco during the 1970s. In Rosakinder, it is von Praunheim that is lovingly roasted and for that reason alone, the documentary makes for mandatory viewing for anyone that has ever wanted to beat the shit out of the pink Teutonic poof.

As described at the beginning of Rosakinder, Rosa von Praunheim has been flaunting himself in front of the camera for 70 years “and this camera shows a sex-obsessed man-eater with colorful hats who shoots scandalous films and does gay stuff. But this camera shows nothing of what the people see who perhaps know him best, fear him most, and love him unconditionally: his children.” After detailing how they met the filmmaker and presenting a short film in (anti)tribute to him, all five filmmakers conclude the documentary by singing von Praunheim’s favorite Christmas song (“O Tannenbaum” aka “O Christmas Tree”) while sporting goofy costumes that the director picked out specifically for them. Indeed, at the end of the doc, one sees the man who directed Run Lola Run sporting an aesthetically repugnant hyena clitoris outfit. Tom Tykwer met von Praunheim in 1988 while working in a movie theater and screening the filmmaker’s documentary Überleben in New York (1989) aka Survival in New York and they have apparently been best buds ever since. Filmmaker Chris Kraus (Shattered Glass, Vier Minuten aka 4 Minutes) details how he wanted to beat von Praunheim’s ass around the time they first met and how he is shocked that no one has ever given the A Virus Knows no Morals (1985) director a good beating. Probably because she is a semi-attractive woman, Julia von Heinz (Was am Ende zählt, Hanna’s Journey) was constantly told by von Praunheim that her films were phony and Hollywood-like. Bearded beta-male Robert Thalheim (Netto, Weßkind) was in constant fear of the gay professor because he thought his teacher would think he was too ‘bourgeois.’ Undoubtedly, the youngest of the group, Axel Ranisch (Heavy Girls aka Dicke Mädchen, Reuber)—a considerably swarthy and morbidly obese gay boi who loves to get naked in his own films—has the most love for von Praunheim, as his professor helped him to come out of the closet and not feel ashamed about making films where he exposes his unclad fat flab for the entire world to see. Not surprisingly, by the end of Rosakinder, von Praunheim says to all 5 filmmakers, “I see you as human beings and as friends. But if we take Axel, for example...In terms of my work, I naturally feel a closer proximity to what he does,” thus demonstrating the cocksucker credo that all fags must stick together and that the director probably should have started his own pink film school.

During the beginning of Rosakinder, filmmaker Chris Kraus states that von Praunheim is, “the godfather of lousy taste, of lousy craftsmanship.” Despite Kraus’ less than flattering remarks regarding his teacher’s oeuvre, he was responsible for co-penning von Praunheim’s awful agitprop-docudrama The Einstein of Sex: Life and Work of Dr. M. Hirschfeld (1999) aka Der Einstein des Sex. As Kraus—a middle-aged man who says rather childish things like, “I hate fathers. I hate authority. I hate paternal authority” despite the fact that he is himself a father—mentions during the doc, he sees von Praunheim as a father figure, even though he is a flagrant fairy. In fact, there is a chance that Kraus and von Praunheim might be related as the former's SS Sturmbannführer grandfather may have boned the latter's biological mother. Indeed, the two worked together on the documentary Two Mothers (2007) aka Meine Mütter - Spurensuche in Riga after von Praunheim learned he was adopted in 2000 and wanted to find out who his real parents were. Claiming he already has a large enough burden in terms of collective guilt regarding the holocaust, von Praunheim opts for not discovering whether or not Kraus' Sturmbannführer grandfather was also his father. Undoubtedly, what all the five filmmakers of Rosakinder have in common is that they are products of the post-nationalist, postmodern ethno-masochistic disease that has transformed Germany into a cultural graveyard inhabited by dead souls who seem to know nothing about their own country's rich cultural and cinematic history, with the meticulously stylized yet ultimately soulless films of Tom Tykwer reflecting the height of this perturbing culturally apocalyptic phenomenon. Even von Praunheim seems to realize this as demonstrated by his typically scatalogical remarks regarding his student's films, "It's like a baby that's had a poo and loves his pile of poo. It's all steamy, and the baby beams with joy. It was the same with the students' films too; they were like their little poos. And when you took away their joy, they hated you." In other words, none of these pampered filmmakers have anything to say and are merely parroting the cosmopolitan post-Auschwitz bullshit they have been spoon-fed since birth.

Tykwer—a rampant heterosexual who used to date Franka Potente, the star of his films Run Lola Run and The Princess and the Warrior—has deluded himself with so much politically correct bullshit that he claims that the decidedly depraved homo celluloid scat pieces of von Praunheim have had the most imperative influence on him as a filmmaker. Undoubtedly, Kraus is even more pathetic as he credits von Praunheim for helping him to hate his once-beloved Sturmbannführer opa, stating, "My grandfather and his brothers weren't just Nazis. They weren't just in the SS. They were part of the Holocaust" and "I often cry about my grandfather, who I dearly loved as a child. And that love almost made me a Nazi forever." Ultimately, Rosakinder reminded me of the absurdity of mainstreaming homosexuality and shoving sodomy in everyone's face. After all, why should any majority have to 'tolerate' and 'embrace' the lifestyles of a minority that they, as heterosexuals, would otherwise find completely repugnant?! Indeed, whereas Tykwer probably would have learned more from Volker Schlöndorff and Julia von Heinz more from Helma Sanders-Brahms as film professors, they were all stuck with a college dropout like Rosa von Praunheim for what can only be described as dubious political reasons. After all, only a gay (and maybe black, Jewish, and/or transvestite) film professor could get away with telling his co-professor to go kill themselves by jumping out of a window as von Praunheim apparently once did (in fact, one of his colleagues even sued him). Indeed, von Praunheim is at his greatest as a filmmaker when he is at his most unrepentantly raunchiest, and the last place his 'idiosyncratic' brand of filmmaking needs to be is at a film school.

I've been putting this film off for quite some time, perhaps even since its release. When I first attempted to watch it, I was in an undeniably irritated mood and this chore was too great an obstacle to get through, especially when the run time begrudgingly stared back at me through my flat screen computer monitor. These over hyped "indie" arthouse films have begun to rub my nerves raw with the sandpaper-ish reception of critical praise. Such over used phrases calling a film a "genre masterpiece" and other abominations of writing. I mean, I'm no James Joyce, but as every film with individual thoughts gets viewed, I believe that every creative thought is deserving of its own. In case you've been under a rock or new to festival favorites, Let the Right One In is based off of a popular Swedish novel of vampires, love, and pre-pubescent emotions. Oskar, a bullied, tormented, and awfully alone child seeks revenge and companionship through a 12 year old girl he met named Eli. This little girl he has fallen in love for her is a master at puzzles such as the daunting Rubix Cube. Oh, and she's also a vampire who has been feasting off of members of Oskar's little snowy town. The bond these two share is pure and adolescent in nature. To call any film heartfelt other than Let the Right One In would be a crime. This eventual Swedish masterpiece marks the birth of a masterful spinster of tender emotions and critical resolutions. Tomas Alfredson has directed mainly unknown productions unknown to anyone outside of his homeland. With a script that breathes raw life into wonderful characters and cinematography so glamorous that it makes violence feel like a necessity, this film is proudly as stunning as hyped up to be. I can only imagine from the explosive unseen potency of Let the Right One In, that Tomas will in fact will begin directing Hollywood budgeted films and will eventually sacrifice artistic integrity for a bigger paycheck. Such woe is the infection of Hollywood. The lore of the vampire is perfected with a hybrid of beliefs. While technically not considered a vampire in the novel, this was just a precaution taken by the author to create one of those mysterious atmospheres by allegedly creating a new species of similar instinct but whole new morals. This prototype of vampiric being doesn't quite reach the suspense of Count Orlok or the terrifying appearance of those in 30 Days of Night but Eli and co. are ruthless in nature which results in extremely shocking scenes of violence that would never be expected from such a delicate romance. This is a frightening new age tale of vampirism that reaches a plan of eroticism unheard of all part to its extremely young cast. This fusion throws all needless baggage of in memory of the death of the modern vampire film. Say hello to post-vampirism and its many fruits. Let the Right One In is simply a fairytale that needs proper recognition (which it has seen more than enough). This must be seen to believe. To simply apply details to the face of this film, one might choose to mix equal parts of dynamic execution, a forbidden romance, and a brutal level of violence creating something you'd never begin to expect and a film almost worthy of family viewing. Any character of any social status can find gusto in this modern horror/romance. For many, Let the Right One In put Sweden back on the map. What a luxury it is to view a vampire film that doesn't embrace a rock n' roll Hot Topic lifestyle.

DEAD SNOW

Tommy Wirkola (2009)

Norway is in the midst of a horror boom. Only just recently did it appear to be crafting horror film after horror film, each with an advanced form of cinematography unheard of for what seems to be among the first experiments in horror. Due to the alarming festival buzz, a new Norwegian horror film is wholeheartedly accepted, especially when it's a Nazi zombie film. Dead Snow is not to be mistaken for the "viral" trailer of Worst Case Scenario, which looks to be an absolute masterpiece in presentation. As I expected it to be Worst Case Scenario, I was disappointed when I found out this was not the one and the same film I had been hoping for. In fact, what I got was yet another snowy horror film taking advantage of the fluffy white terrain to shed some much needed blood. Dead Snow is a tidy little film but the modus operandi reveals this film to be lacking in every aspect. Dead Snow depicts 7 (+1) medical students vacationing in the snowy mountains for some festivities including drinking and fornication. After a traveling old hiker warns them of the evil lurking in the woods, most likely belonging to the wrath of Colonel Herzog and his SS officers who were chased into the mountain hills after plundering the citizenry for their shiny treasures. After time, they just assumed they froze to death. Boy were they wrong. After a dark and wintry night of disgusting sex acts including fucking a fat man prior to him taking a shit; he's still on the outhouse seat no less, we find that humanity is about to fall victim to the terror of the Third Reich once more. I wish the film had taken a pulp approach such as the last line illustrates but truth be told, the "Nazis" in Dead Snow are no more Nazis than they are Vampires. You'd think a "Seig Heil!" would be in order. Hell, this state of desperation would have me even begging for Die Hard actors but alas, there's no authenticity to be found. By end's time, we're just given Mighty Morphin' Power Rangers Putty-lookalikes donning Nazi regalia. Stick to Call of Duty: World at War for the true blooded Nazi zombie experience. Dead Snow's only real strength isn't even a natural one. The constant bloodshed is this film's only point of endurance. Had these "evil Germans" aspire to do the horrific acts that history books never let us live down, then maybe this film would have something to talk about. These Nazis don't want to "gas" Jews or cause pain and suffering. They just want their preciouses. The offensive nature of the Nazis in Dead Snow is brought on by theft of the Nazis valuables. This common theme is what makes Leprechaun such a tacky and light-hearted series. For a Nazi to commit such childish acts is a disgrace to script-writing everywhere. I'm sure Jane Goody could have written more three-dimensional characters as these.

Among many flaws is something of a comedy abstaining all elemental races of horror or vice-versa. At times a more favorable approach would be to make a "69" gag or clever zombie lore antics. While comedy is normally a first-rate piece of thematic in modern horror, Dead Snow does give way for the occasional scare and by occasional I can only point towards one scene in particular that had any tension behind it at all. Besides being a shallow hole and doused with pop-punk Norwegian equivalents to Linkin Park, Dead Snow prevails for being a slice of delicious entertainment. I refuse to take this film serious in any way and will only use this motion picture to bide my time for the highly anticipated Worst Case Scenario. Other than that jazz, Dead Snow also features a captivating and violent showdown scene of a hemophobic film nerd going batshit wild with a chainsaw. Dead Snow is a film that will charm the schieze out of most zombie fans and from this, a blindness will envelop, obscuring the many present fans from an ADHD generation. Perfect for people with low-attention spans.

Tony Jaa (2008)

From time to time, strange events catapult me into an unexplainable mood that borders a body high and the effects of emotional void. No emoticon designed for Myspace and Facebook could describe even the vacant stare on my face. My inner workings are as mysterious to myself as the readers of Soiled Sinema are to us. Knowing perfectly well that Ong Bak 2's hands were not guilt free, Tony Jaa's directorial debut, finally at long last, served as the irrational catalyst for what some could call a "strange day." Awaiting Ong Bak 2 had become part of my routine film updates. Eagerly awaiting for any festival news of this became a hobby. Normally, I purge my mind of international releases as they mercilessly boast foreign treasures equipped with insane action, marvelous cinematography, and rampant yet dignified humor. These are, in fact, the very reasons why I abhor Twitchfilm.* Their extensive database of trailers and previews showcase the finest moments in globalized cinema or in other words, a collected hivemind of stylish and brutal antiques ranging from every genre. If there were a form of getting cinema blue balls, Twitchfilm would be the purveyor of such harm. Their seasoned gift of the Ong Bak 2 trailer baring ribbons & bows left me speechless. I began salivating precariously; incapacitated to the point of becoming oblivious to the animalic routine of eat/drink/fuck/sleep.

After the festival premiere of Ong Bak 2 came and went, I found myself with hardly anything left to anticipate. Sure, the film was an austere showcase of martial arts being simultaneously fused within a fighting orgy but to date, my thoughts are very scattered on this film and requires a bit of esoteric analysis to be fit into my schedule. Undoubtedly, the greatest contribution that Ong Bak 2 has presented to film is the resonating effects of the anti-triumphant ending. This ending in question breaches past atypicalities and into a sarcastic fate denouncing valor and the very generic form of diplomatic immunity that most action heroes seem to find themselves coated in. The tale of Ong Bak 2 seems to mostly manifest within the creative confines of a loosely adapted Count of Monte Cristo-like story of revenge, redemption, and inner growth. The creative genius of Alexander Dumas is partly what Ong Bak 2 must award the most credit, not just the [amazing] action choreography and the tedious and trivial back story/flashbacks. While taking a gander at several festival and randoms reviews, I noticed that many people seemed to lash out at this film as if some vendetta had boiled to a fiery temperament. Most of the negative energy seemed to circulate around the plot (or the lack of one by their offense). If you would, for a second, recall back on Jaa's previous efforts: Ong Bak - A man must reclaim his traditional heirloom by going to a city and kicking people's faces in. The Protector - A man must reclaim his traditional elephant by going to a city and kicking people's faces in. Knowing what you know now, consider this: is calling a film lacking in substance, that strays far from previous works, a down right low blow on behalf of Tony Jaa, who left the team of Pinkaew as to escape from his one-note fate? Not even I stretch an idea of no-mercy as far as the gripping "fan base" of Tony Jaa. Ong Bak 2 stands steady as Jaa's own piece of period piece action while being stylishly fierce and a distant mirage compared to his previous starring roles. It also successfully made the jump from mindless action to thoughtful action, paying debts to lovers of classic literature and a bravado piece of epic brutality aided by the bestial visage of Tony Jaa. Real fight is back and Tony Jaa's tearing up the martial arts world with unapologetic body beatings that can be compared to bungee-jumping into a pool of straight razors. Have mercy on this film for its flaws as it won't do the same for you. Final Note: mAQ is, in all actuality, is an avid reader of Twitchfilm and in no way persuades you to not read their news updates.

Tony Maylam (1992)

Akin to 80s bio-horror film The Kindred, Split Second is another blast from the past for me. The picture perfect video box art still resonates fresh within the corridors of my mind. After my maturity, I hit a memory peak where I had begun to forget the titles of the films that were most dear to me. Thanks to the IMDB plot search and Netflix, I began to track down such titles with vigor. Split Second is one of the few lucky ones that survived in my memory, ironically enough.

With a few details still fresh in my mind like I'd seen it yesterday, I began to brainstorm what exactly I remembered. A heartbeat in a distant flooded metropolis. A monolithic, though rotund man wielding incredible futuristic weaponry. Did I mention a 10 foot tall sentient alien creature armed with razor nails that give the fear of blades a whole new meaning? With a being of this magnitude, plus its adaptability towards souls and weapons, Split Second turns B-grade sci-fi horror into something of a treasure. Created in 1992, Split Second was one of the earlier films theatrically released to endorse the idea of global warming, soon followed by the much maligned Waterworld. The running commentary depicted in Split Second focuses on London as it rests several feet under water. The critical controversy wouldn't really reach a peak until the inception of Al Gore's An Inconvenient Truth. But between the two films, Split Second is far more invigorating, horrifying, and judgmental on the human species thanks to the Blade Runner inspired set pieces and the ambient bar scenes. The cold spirited show stealer is not the man himself, Rutger Hauer, but rather the alien creature he is in fact chasing. While showing signs of extraterrestrial life, this specimen seems to be sea-borne and thrives off of the old occult myth that eating one's heart will allow you to absorb their soul. This symbiotic life form features a stunning array of costumed effects that could easily be mistaken as the handiwork of the late & great Stan Winston with a dash of H.R. Giger's fantastical alien sexuality. What Split Second has going for it the most is how fascinating the film pretends to be, but then ever-so-delicately cradles your attention span. Rather than mad libbing the film with filler dialogue and useless violence, Split Second constructs an entirely adaptable fictional universe in which life can sustain in. Futuristic automatic combat shotguns, dreary and damp environments, and post-Cantina citizens; Split Second is a pure breed pedigree of 90s science fiction. I was hooked the instant Hauer stopped an attacking Rottweiler with a badge while muttering "Police, dickhead".

HELLBOUND: HELLRAISER II

Tony Randel (1988)

Most horror films stream parallel to one existing subclass genre. In question, Psychological horror (which engages the mind in non-casual thinking) and gruesome horror (which shocks and offends with violent body imagery chronicling death and other similar facets). Clive Barker is renowned for challenging that staple within his Hellraiser films, being the first two. Hellraiser II is a nightmarish fairy tale crafted explicitly for adult fans of the macabre. For a Barker tale more suited for children or people prone to take offense, I suggest the Candyman saga. Filled with religious symbolism and themes that echo intense evil that knows no boundaries, Hellraiser still manages to be a hair raising experience even as the years fly by. The leitmotif present in the first two tales monitors a strict sado-masochist rule. For any person housing a perverse fetish in secret, you'd be surprised how much of this film can be psycho-sexually appealing. One could derive satisfaction from these grisly acts of torture and conforming the sexual undertones from some of these memorable scenes. It's not uncommon to question the ending circumstance delineated in a previous episode. That mysterious outcome that leaves you stuck on a cliffhanger or questions pertaining to a justice side of horror. Surely the authorities would refuse to swallow the tall tale of a demonic massacre and soul harvesting. That's beyond most religions which sadly determines the lengths of one's beliefs. Poor Kirsty never had a chance for judicial redemption and this is how this story depicting a bout of grue begins. The Cenobites are without a doubt the showcase of the films. The stories lie as a vehicle to propel these horrifying fiends at our retinas. Cliver Barker and Tony Randel worked together to create premium special effects. The dedication of horror fans bleeds through as goopy messes and graphic body horrors are stomach-churning and very vulgar. It's odd how films made in the 80's such as Hellraiser manage to disgust more than any new-age horror film that claims to push the edge. Hellraiser II may be one of the greatest sequels of all time. One might argue Aliens in term of my favor, but that withheld nothing from the pristine original other than names and faces. They butchered the atmosphere that was constructed for explosions and gunshots. Hellbound: Hellraiser II is the average Joe's nightmare and the sado-masochist's wet dream.

MADemoiselle
MADemoiselle

Tony Richardson (1966)

Films about female psychopaths, especially good and realistic ones, are not exactly easy to come by, which one can certainly expect in a mixed world where 'feminism' (or at least some bastardized form of it) reigns and where the white male has become the cinematic archetype of sociopathy. Undoubtedly, if I were to select a single film as the greatest depiction of sociopathic behavior displayed in a member of the fairer sex, it would be the French-UK coproduction Mademoiselle (1966) directed by British auteur Tony Richardson (The Loved One, The Hotel New Hampshire) and starring Jeanne Moreau (Jules et Jim, Diary of a Chambermaid) as a sexually repressed femme fatale from rural frog hell whose propensity for arson and other forms of rural terrorism make for a rather melodramatic substitute for good old fashion coitus. Based on a script entitled Les Rêves Interdits/L'Autre Versant du Rêve by French sodomite thief novelist Jean Genet, who originally gave the screenplay as a wedding gift to French actress Anouk Aimée (who married Nico Papatakis and who Genet served as his "best man") in 1951 but ultimately sold the script three times without telling Aimée, Mademoiselle was later reworked by French writer/director Marguerite Duras (Les enfants, Nathalie Granger) and had a number of different filmmakers set to direct it, including Georges Franju and Joseph Losey, though Tony Richardson ultimately proved to be an apt auteur. Out of all places, I discovered Mademoiselle while reading the excellent Andy Milligan biography The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2003) by Jimmy McDonough, which the gutter auteur, who himself directed Genet theater adaptations during his pre-film off-off-Broadway days, described as follows, "MADEMOISELLE. THE SICKEST THING YOU EVER SAW. Stuff like that impressed me." On top of impressing real-life psychopathic sadomasochist Andy Milligan, Mademoiselle is also apparently a personal favorite of John Waters, yet despite being a fairly mainstream production, the film is fairly forgotten today, which is probably not a surprise considering it was a commercial and critical failure of sorts that was booed at its premiere at the 1966 Cannes Film Festival, though the work rightfully won a BAFTA award and was featured in a 2007 Brooklyn Academy of Music French film retrospective. Part morbid and melancholy melodrama, part psychosexual/psychoanalytic horror-thriller, and part anti-redneck/anti-heimat lynch mob flick, Mademoiselle follows a beautiful yet psychopathic school teacher of the dangerously virginal variety with a pernicious proclivity towards committing atrocities around her small village who develops an undying erotic obsession with an Italian immigrant logger that inevitably results in tragedy.

Mademoiselle (Jeanne Moreau) is an undetected psychopath whom, with her cutesy good looks and job as the village schoolmarm, no one in the town suspects of the arson attacks that have plagued their rural village, but who is in fact considered an upstanding citizen who is sexually desired by every living and breathing man in the area. Considering she opens the floodgates that ravage the village and its farm animals during the first couple minutes of the film and subsequently smashes a couple bird eggs and puts them back in the nest with a certain sadistic glee, Mademoiselle immediately establishes her complete and utter lack of conscience right from the get go of Mademoiselle. Of course, Mademoiselle has a hard time totally hiding her sociopathy in front of the villagers at all times, as she uses her respected job as a school teacher to torment children, namely an Italian immigrant boy named Bruno (Keith Skinner), whom she mocks for his poverty and shabby clothing. Of course, a strange situation brews when Mademoiselle becomes infatuated with Bruno's widowed logger father Manou (played by Ettore Manni in a role originally given to Marlon Brando). In part, it seems one of the reasons that Mademoiselle lights fires is that she gets wet from martially masculine Manou putting them out. Not surprisingly, the redneck villagers instantly start suspecting Manou of committing the crimes as the locals feel there are "too many foreigners" in town, even causing one local yokel to complain that, "One of them is carrying the Holy Virgin today" during a medieval-like church procession in a field. Meanwhile, Mademoiselle continues to torment little boy Bruno so bad that he flips out and beats a cute little bunny rabbit to death in a fierce fit of rage. Considering Mademoiselle lurks around the woods and spies on the Italian logger as he works, Manou eventually approaches her and even tries to seduce her a number of times, but she is far too cold and callous to reciprocate her feelings, though she clearly wants to yet lacks the instincts. On top of that, Mademoiselle is into self-flagellation and does rather bizarre things like putting tape over her nipples and fanatically declaring the saintliness of Joan of Arc to her pupils while in a megalomaniacal state as if she were a nefarious nun from hell. While his son Bruno is quick to realize that Mademoiselle is a certified psychopath with her own personal scorched earth policy, Manou, being the typical horndog Guido with a reckless weakness for pulchritudinous ladies, is totally ignorant of his would-be-lover's lack of sanity. After a lovely night together where the two lovebirds spend an entire night flirting with one other in a strangely innocent and even heartwarming manner, Manou reveals to Mademoiselle that he and his son are moving back to Italy, so the lovelorn sociopathic schoolteacher falsely denounces the proletarian stud for her cruel crimes, thus resulting in his brutal death via a gang of hostile hicks who hack him up and cover up their dastardly deeds. In the end, Mademoiselle leaves the village totally unscathed with Bruno, who is now orphaned, being the only one who knew of the beautiful bitch's true character, even spitting in her direction in decided disdain when she leaves.

Apparently making a number of references to writer Jean Genet's childhood village of Alligny-en-Morvan (a place that had a whopping population of 735 citizens in 1962) in central France, Mademoiselle is undoubtedly an unflattering portrait of the French rural peasantry that echoes the hick-hating sentiments of films by Claude Chabrol, but also has much in common with the anti-heimat films of German New Cinema like Hunting Scenes From Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdscenen aus Niederbayern directed by Peter Fleischmann and Hollywood flicks like Deliverance (1972) directed by John Boorman, but what makes Tony Richardson's film a strikingly singular and unforgettable film is its rare 'völkisch-noir' depiction of a superficially 'angelic' schoolteacher as a sort of lethal human black widow who conspiratorially lures strong men in and destroys them when they are at their most vulnerable, thus the cinematic work will not exactly be a favorite among feminists. As a fan of most cinematic adaptations of Jean Genet's writings, I have no problem admitting that Mademoiselle is easily one of my favorite films penned by the literary outlaw, even if Marguerite Duras probably molested the original story, thereupon bastardizing its original essence to a most deplorable degree. Notably, Mademoiselle lead Jeanne Moreau would later go on to appear in Rainer Werner Fassbinder's final film Querelle (1982), a campy cinematic adaption of Genet's 1947 novel Querelle de Brest, though her performance in Richardson's film is infinitely memorably monstrous. A psychosexually perverse cinematic parable of sorts featuring a variety of erotically-charged allegorical imagery (a snake wrapped around Manou's waist over his genitals, etc.) that quasi-blasphemously blames sexual repression for the literal and figurative 'fall of man' (or in this case, the fall of a man), Mademoiselle is macabre melodrama at its most cruelly cockblocked and exquisitely anticlimactic.

THE BORDER

Tony Richardson (1982)

Any film that enables me to emphasize with the plight of drug-smuggling illegal aliens from South of the border must be doing something right. Thus, it is to my surprise that The Border (1982) directed by Tony Richardson is an undeservedly unknown work, especially considering that it stars veteran actor Jack Nicholson and fellow classic Hollywood macho men like Harvey Keitel and Warren Oates. Equipped with a most delightfully brutal climax that is guaranteed to make any biker whore wet, it is no wonder that Peckinpah player Oates is featured in the film. Walon Green – co-writer of the screenplay for The Wild Bunch (1969) – also contributed his maverick screenwriting talents to The Border. Although set in contemporary Texas on the U.S.-Mexico border, The Border is essentially a testosterone-driven neo-Western with sentimentalist socio-political undertones that paces quite gracefully, like a true proud and stoic cowboy on the prowl. Jack Nicholson plays Charlie Smith, a California transplant who continues his career as a U.S. Border Patrol agent in the luxurious land of steers, queers, and illegal aliens. Early on in the film, Smith learns that dirty beaners are not the only vehemently reeking outlaws of the Lone Star State as a couple of his fellow Border Patrol pals foster the sort of third world criminality that they swore oppose. After dealing with pressure from his corrupt superiors and his unabashedly materialistic dunce wife, Smith eventually gives in to conforming and decides to get in on the action of embedding illegal drug and human trafficking, prostitution, and related degenerate unlawfulness, but he soon realizes that such dastardly deeds only further contribute to his misery as a lone cowboy amongst legally employed, disguised outlaws.

Aesthetically, The Border resembles the French New Wave-inspired look of revered counterculture works like Stuart Rosenberg's Cool Hand Luke (1967) and Dennis Hopper's Easy Rider (1969). That being said, I would not be surprised if The Border was overlooked during its time due to its seemingly outmoded aesthetic that died hard during the reign of Hollywood big blockbusters during the second half of the 1970s and the extremely materialistic and oftentimes fantasy-driven flicks of the 1980s. Like its raw and gritty outlaw predecessors, The Border is big on atmosphere due to its almost documentary-style visuals. Unlike the early counterculture works, The Border lacks the sort of pseudo-rebellious "rebel-without-a-cause" posturing that made the original films famous and influential on American society. In fact, The Border is a tale of rebellion against unlawful rebellion where a marginally crooked Border Patrolman straightens back up and forever annihilates the forever jagged and morally-ragged amongst his authoritarian kind, thus the film was probably not very popular with anxiety-ridden youth like the original counterculture flicks. Another interesting and unconventional aspect of The Border is Jack Nicholson's humble performance as the Ted Bundy-esque actor refrains from personifying the charismatic cool guy caricature he is eternally famous for. Charlie Smith is a fairly simple man who – unlike his wife and co-employees – is totally satisfied with living a peaceful and humble life of monotonous platitudes. It is only when Smith firsthand encounters the rotten fruits of corruption and exploitation that his rather mundane existence is given greater meaning. Smith, in the tradition of great American renegade heroes like Travis Bickle and David Sumner, takes the law into his own hands when he attempts to rescue an infant that is on the black market so that he can reunite the cute baby cholo with its exceedingly destitute mother.

If one is to learn anything from The Border, it is that corrupt whites (whether black market dealers, border patrol lackeys, or politicians) are the central partakers and promoters of illegal immigration and the slave-driven black market in the United States. Although it is Mexican black marketers and drug cartels that import crime and human suffering via South of the border, they would not be so unpleasantly prosperous without the help of thoroughly monetarily-intemperate Americans with golden dollar signs for pupils. In The Border, Smith's partner Cat (played brilliantly by Harvey Keitel as per usual) acknowledges that the Mexicans have their "own way of doing things." I found this scene to be especially symbolic of the film as a whole. While blatantly expressing the dubious facade of being morally and culturally superior to Mexicans, these Border Patrol agents neglect to walk the walk and talk the talk of their assumed gringo superiority. A film like The Border only makes it all the more obvious as to why your typical illegal alien feels that they are owed something by the nation they broke laws to land in. These illegal immigrants would not come to the United States in the first place if it were not for the supremely miserly business owners and globalist corporations that so eagerly and criminally employ them. Of course, as The Border makes clear, a life in virtual slavery in America is still preferable to living in an unsanitary desert ghetto in Mexico, so one cannot honestly blame these people for risking their lives to come here in the first place. In a lot of ways, Alex Cox's El Patrullero aka Highway Patrolman (1991) seems to be a loose remake of The Border, only set on the other side of the border where crime and political corruption is all the more rampant and socially acceptable. Making its debut nearly three decades ago, at a time when illegal immigration and governmental illegality was somewhat less glaring, The Border is indubitably more relevant today than it was upon its initial (largely ignored) release.

THE HUNGER

Admittedly, old school Deathrock aka Gothic rock has always been one of my favorite subgenres of music, so it should come as no surprise that I have made a point to watch Tony Scott's debut-feature film The Hunger (1983) – one of few mainstream works to pay tribute to the often mocked but rarely seriously examined music movement – a number of times over the years. In the film, blood takes on a orgasmic ejaculatory quality that for vampires is an afflicting addiction that comes with a viciously vexatious withdraw if an undead addict fails to adequately indulge in these vital living fluids. Opening with the song “Bela Lugosi's Dead” – which is often regarded as the first Gothic rock single ever released – by British Deathrock group Bauhaus, as well as iconic footage of the band (mainly singer Peter Murphy) itself, The Hunger is an extravagantly stylized, erotic phantasmal work that pays more than apropos tribute to a music subgenre that is often maliciously maligned (if sometimes deservedly so) and endlessly ridiculed, but rarely objectively diagnosed for its actual aesthetic attributes and influence. Fittingly, proto-Goth David Bowie plays a starring (but progressively relinquishing) vampire role in The Hunger, as does French actress Catherine Deneuve; the ridiculously resplendent international film goddess that starred in Roman Polanski's early dark masterpiece Repulsion (1965) and Luis Buñuel's popular work Belle de Jour (1967). Susan Sarandon also co-stars in The Hunger as the lesbian love interest/prey of Deneuve's character. Of all the filmmakers that could have been chosen to direct a modern Deathrock-inspired vampire flick, I would have least expected Tony Scott – a filmmaker best known for vapid blockbuster films like Top Gun (1986) and Man on Fire (2004) – but then again, the Hollywood auteur got his start creating successful television commercial advertisements, thus making him quite germane for directing the radiantly stylized montages and overly expressive horror/erotic interludes featured throughout The Hunger; a chimerical shadow play shot on celluloid. In fact, Scott cites the feverishly decadent and schizophrenically-structured work Performance (1970) directed by Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg and starring Bowie's one-time boy-toy Mick Jagger as one of the greatest influences behind The Hunger. Breaking with convention and expectations in almost every regard, The Hunger is a vampire lesbo flick on a gloriously grotesque cocktail of LSD and steroids that borrows liberally from every subversive bloodsucking flick of the past, including F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror (1922) and Hammer Horror classics like The Vampire Lovers (1970) and Twins of Evil (1971). Watch out delusional Afrocentrists, The Hunger features an ancient Egyptian vampiress of Indo-European stock whose glaring lack of melanin could be only that of an agathokakological undead honky. I do not think it would be a stretch to speculate that pseudo-sinister sodomite Aleister Crowley's ultra-hedonistic quasi-religion Thelema – which adopted a triad of deities from ancient Egyptian religion – also influenced the audacious aura, libertine themes, and Kenneth Anger-esque music video mysticism of The Hunger.

Indubitably, I think The Hunger would have somewhat benefited from having been set in New York City or Los Angeles, California as opposed to London, England. In fact, Tony Scott wanted to shoot the entire film in NYC, but due to monetary constraints, the English filmmaker settled for the dreary urban streets of his own homeland. As someone who has always had a greater affinity for American west coast Deathrock groups like Christian Death, T.S.O.L, and 45 Grave over Goth groups from over the pond, I feel that The Hunger could have had a more ‘magickal’ cosmopolitan feel of wandering-endlessly-through-undying-eternity had it been set in relatively rootless, amoral, and ahistorical Southern California. Despite having to compromise in regard to location setting, The Hunger still often has an anomalous essence that tends to transcend national boundary. In fact, Tony Scott regards the closing shot of London in the film as geographically ambiguous, as if the film could have taken place in any modern metropolis. The personal home of the lead vampire lovers Miriam Blaylock (Catherine Deneuve) and John (David Bowie) has a culturally-refined aristocratic quality that is decidedly timeless, yet at the same time startlingly futuristic. Tony Scott also made congenial use of artistically eclectic Art Deco architecture around London to further compliment the delectable yet decadent atmosphere of The Hunger; an unwonted vampire flick that, unlike Bowie’s character in the film, has scarcely shown its age over the years. Upon its original release, The Hunger was critically lambasted by the majority of film critics, including the always pompous and never less-than-charming Roger Ebert who described the film as, “an agonizingly bad vampire movie.” David Bowie himself even had doubts about the film stating, “I must say, there’s nothing that looks like it on the market. But I’m a bit worried that it’s just perversely bloody at some points.” As the test of time has undeniably proven, the popularity of The Hunger has only steadily risen over the years, not least due to the film being one of the most scrupulously polished and ideally idiosyncratic vampire lesbo flicks ever made, but it also very possibly the greatest and most cultivated abstract filmic expressions of the Deathrock movement. Unless Miloš Forman, Oliver Stone, or Gus Van Sant decides that a lavishly-produced Rozz Williams biopic will be their most ambitious attempt at directing a celluloid opus magnum, I ingenuously doubt that the world will see a more vitalizing dark love letter to the long spiritless Deathrock movement than The Hunger.

Quite honestly, the first time I viewed The Hunger about a decade ago or so, I felt the work was ridden with pulsating pomposity and unrealized artistic pretensions, but the film has certainly grown on me over the years, so much so, that I always look forward to re-watching it and discovering elements of the film that I had yet to notice before, sort of like with Tony’s brother Ridley’s masterpiece Blade Runner (1982). Indeed, in terms of aesthetic overload and plot incoherence, The Hunger, especially for a mainstream vampire film, is exceedingly self-indulgent, but so are a vast percentage of the most illustrious films ever made. Aside from True Romance (1993), The Hunger is the only Tony Scott film that I can wholeheartedly recommend, which makes it all the more interesting when one considers that it was the mostly hackish filmmaker's first-feature. Devastated by the harsh reviews that The Hunger received upon its initial release, one can only wonder whether or not Scott's career as a filmmaker would have went a different, more artistically-ambitious route had the vaulting vamp flick received the mostly positive praise it deserved. Although Scott concluded The Hunger on an ambiguous note hinting at a potential sequel, such a project would not even begin see the light of day, although the film would inspire a mediocre softcore TV horror anthology of the same name also starring David Bowie (at least for the second season). In 2009, Warner Bros. announced that the world would soon see an unnecessary remake of The Hunger based on a screenplay written by Whitley Strieber; the horror author whose novel the original film was based on. Although I find the idea of a remake to be dubious and – at best – monetarily-inspired, it would be interesting if Tony Scott followed in the footsteps of Alfred Hitchcock and re-made his own film, especially after almost three decades of overwhelming mediocrity and mundanity as a filmmaker.

Like Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973), The Hunger is one of the oh-so unsurprisingly few lesbian vampiress flicks that rises above being aesthetically-pleasing smut and for that alone, it is a noble cinematic triumph worthy of postmortem eulogy. Although most of Tony Scott's films epitomize everything that is deplorable, soulless, and humdrum about Hollywood, at least he directed what is very possibly one of the most transcendent vampire flicks of the 1980s, as well as one of the most high-class and hunky-dory vampire films ever made.

TRUE ROMANCE

Tony Scott (1993)

It is not much of a revelation to say that most action films suck and lack any thing of value in any way. That being said, the best action films are those that do a good job strictly attempting to entertain the audience. Hollywood hack Tony Scott is most notorious for his laughably horrible air force propaganda film Top Gun. I don't have much respect for Scott as a director. Maybe Tony Scott should have taken some cues from his brother Ridley (Blade Runner, Alien) who is a much better studio director. I doubt anyone would ever call Tony Scott an "Artist" so I go into his films knowing not to expect anything resembling culture. Scott, however, did direct one highly entertaining film known as True Romance written by a young and somewhat less arrogant Quentin Tarantino.

I believe that Quentin Tarantino's greatest contribution to film is his writing for True Romance. Sure the story is sleazy trash but it is highly entertaining and well written trash. What other film do you find a Negro cop yelling "wop?!" What other film do you find a coked up Jewish Hollywood producer in the middle of a big deadly drug deal? True Romance is a script written in bad taste full of hilarious racial stereotypes and lacking the "nigga is cool" feel of the films directed by Quentin Tarantino. I also believe that the True Romance story may be Tarantino's most personal piece of writing. I mean come on, a loser fan boy's life turns into the plot like five action genre films in one. Walken the Wop? My favorite scene in True Romance involves a dialogue between Dennis Hopper (who plays a cop) and Christopher Walken (who plays a Sicilian mafia leader). In this highly offensive scene, Hopper explains that Sicilians are "spawned from niggers." I found this writing from Tarantino interesting as he is a "man" of Italian descent. Tarantino's Italian-American father left him a bastard so maybe this anti-Italian scene is a little payback to his neglecting padre? Either way, not even Spike Lee, the man who directed the Italian-American exploitation film Summer of Sam, could have made a more derogatory scene against Sicilians. Quentin Tarantino has even stated that the Sicilian scene is one of his proudest moments. Tarantino stated "I had heard that whole speech about the Sicilians a long time ago, from a black guy living in my house. One day I was talking with a friend who was Sicilian and I just started telling that speech." Tarantino then realized, "Wow, that is a great scene, I gotta remember that."

The Sicilian Scene True Romance also features an "all-star cast" of sorts. A stoner Brad Pitt takes bong hits on a couch he seems to be glued to just as philistine Jew Michael Rapaport seems half retarded. A young and somewhat slim James "Tony Soprano" Gandolfini also makes an appearance in True Romance as a sadistic mafia hit man. One also cannot forget about a young and naked Patricia Arquette playing a dirty prostitute love interest. I also found Gary Oldman's role as a wigger-rafa-wannabe to be quite amazing. Like most action flicks, True Romance features a disgustingly horrible soundtrack that is dated to say the least. Whether it be the lame tunes by Aerosmith or the fruity score by Hans Zimmer, I felt my ears looking for mercy throughout the film. One also can get tired of Christian Slater's annoying voice which reminds me of some low ranking drug dealing swindler. With all the horrible noise in True Romance, I would have even preferred an Elvis Presley (someone I have no interest in) soundtrack sung by Val Kilmer. Kilmer did a swell job portraying and singing as Jim Morrison in Oliver Stones The Doors. Is True Romance a film written by a lonely romantic by the name of Quentin Tarantino? Is True Romance an ideal fantasy of Tarantino's ultimate "True Romance?" Something tells me this is true and that True Romance, despite only being written by Tarantino, is his most intimate film. For a man so obsessed with film, I have always thought that Quentin Tarantino has horrible taste in film. It is evident that Tarantino is mainly into "escapist" cinema so it is no surprise that the story to True Romance would be a somewhat personal one.

NEXT OF KIN

Tony Williams (1982)

As far as 1970's/80's exploitation films go, few continents/nations have created greater works than the Aussie auteur filmmakers of the wild outback. With such great Ozploitation films as The Devil's Playground (1976) and Long Weekend (1979) – works that transcend the usually fine line between atmospheric art and tasteless trash – one could honestly argue that the Australians even gave the ever so artistically prodigious garlic-eaters a run for their money. Out all of the Ozploitation works ever created, Tony Williams' whodunit horror-thriller Next of Kin (1982) is indubitably one of the most severely underrated and equally unseen. Sophisticatedly stylized but also totally demoralizing, Next of Kin is a sleek Kubrickian quasi-slasher flick featuring a cryptic coldblooded killer who lusts after elderly hemoglobin. Instead of arrogantly flaunting his fetishistic dastardly deeds, the senior-slayer attempts to make his crimes seem like everyday accidents that happened as a result of the aged victim's golden year senility. After her mother dies, protagonist Linda (Jacki Kerin) – being next of kin – inherits a retirement home that she seems to be somewhat ill-equipped to deal with, not least due to less than fond memories she had acquired there as child. Banished from the family estate 20 years earlier for reasons she fails to remember, Linda engages in an increasingly fermenting internal war that would intrigue any serious psychoanalyst. As Next of Kin progresses and Linda begins to come to terms with her distressing childhood, her personal quandaries are further compounded by the stark realization that a murderous maniac is lurking underneath her roof. Not unlike Roman Polanski's early masterpiece Repulsion (1965), Next of Kin is a slow but steady and often menacing and claustrophobic mood piece that engulfs the viewer in the impending hysteria suffered by the female lead. Unlike the stunning Franco-Nordic beauty featured in Polanski's film, Linda is an extremely intelligent and intuitive yet homely lady that is surely scared for her life, but that does not impede her from defending herself from the loony longings of a pernicious prick. Needless to say, if you're expecting an equally artless and aesthetically repugnant Australian equivalent of Friday the 13th (1980) with a senseless body count and lackluster direction, Next of Kin is probably not the film for you.

In my humble opinion, Next of Kin features one of the greatest endings ever featured in an Ozploitation film and, arguably even in horror cinema in general. As explained in the somewhat recent and extremely worthwhile documentary Not Quite Hollywood: The Wild, Untold Story of Ozploitation! (2008) directed by Mark Hartley, the adrenaline-rushing conclusion of Next of Kin was partly the consequence of happenstance due to a miscalculation in timing by one of the special effects men, which is quite the revelation when one considers the immaculate nature of this truly stunning and singular scene. In fact, I was so impressed by the ending of Next of Kin that I have re-watched it by itself no less than 100 times since I initially viewed the film. Comprised of televised ballroom dancing, a pyramid of meticulously stacked sugar cubes, a shotgun blow to the head a close-range, and an aesthetically-pleasing explosion that no big-budget Hollywood film crew could have contrived, the nitroglycerin-heavy finale of Next of Kin combines hypnotic celluloid poetry with gritty human brutality in a cinematic marriage that synthesizes the best attributes of Ozploitation. Unfortunately, like most horror films, even the greatest ones, Next of Kin is not without its flaws. Due to the fact that the film features a number of memorable desultory sequences throughout, Next of Kin sometimes loses steam in between phantasmagorical dream-sequences and its handful of elaborate death scenes. As explained by a commentator in Not Quite Hollywood, the film has been often compared to Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980), which is no small compliment, but regardless Next of Kin is an original film in of itself that has few contemporaries, even within the Ozploitation movement.

Featuring a musical score composed by prolific krautrock musician Klaus Schulze (Tangerine Dream, Ash Ra Tempel), Next of Kin is a film that sounds as lugubrious and ethereal as it looks, thus it is a cinematic work that is notably trance-inducing throughout; an imperative trait that any worthwhile horror film should have but few can boast. Then again, Next of Kin is not merely a horror film, but a sui generis work created during a certain period at a certain place that totally (or at least as far as I can tell) captures the radical zeitgeist of its respective era. Created during the middle point of the Ozploitation and Australian New Wave movements – undoubtedly the most stimulating and innovative period of the nation's film history – Next of Kin is a newfangled work that shares equal attributes from both sectors of the Aussie film renaissance, henceforth inevitably leading the way for much grittier (if less ambitious) future atmospheric films like Greg McLean's Wolf Creek (2005) and Justin Kurzel's Snowtown (2011). What makes Next of Kin conspicuously unparalleled among most Australian horror films is its striking supernatural/surreal scenes and overall labyrinthine essence. While featuring some of the sunny scenic realism typical of Aussie films, especially from the Ozploitation and Australian New Wave movements, Next of Kin also manages to have an ominous metaphysical aura that lingers like a foreboding malediction throughout. Needless to say, Next of Kin leaves a persisting imprint on the viewer that – like the childhood memories of the film's lead protagonist – can never be cleaned away.

ANITA: THE SHOCKING YOUNG NYMPHOMANIAC

Torgny Wickman (1973)

Anita: The Shocking Young Nymphomaniac (1973) is a sexploitation masterpiece from Sweden. The film stars the beautiful Christina Lindberg of Thriller: A Cruel Picture (1974) fame. Lindberg plays the role of a 17 year old teenage girl with the burden of being a nymphomaniac. She compulsively seeks men that can't even get her off. Only Swedish master actor Stellan Skarsgård can give a horny girl what she needs. A group of six Italians and Spaniards can't even get the job done. Sweden must be too cold for Southern European romantics.

Unlike most exploitation films, Anita takes itself seriously. The disorder of nymphomania is looked at in a serious manner and not just as a reason for Christina Lindberg to fuck every man in sight. That or Sweden has to put effort in to justifying cheap sex. Christina Lindberg's nude body speaks for itself. When you watch Anita, you're watching it to see her. Without Lindberg and maybe Skarsgard, you would have no reason to see the film.

Anita is also not up on her studies. Her cold father becomes angered at her for not knowing who Erwin Rommel is. Anita's homely sister of course knows who he is. Anita's nymphomania is caused by her family troubles. Anita has a truly positive family message. Tons of sex = really shitty family. Nordic folks have always been fans of sexual repression.

Unfortunately Anita doesn't live up to the quality of the masterpiece that is Thriller: A Cruel Picture. Hardcore pornography, eye gouging, and mass killings are nonexistent in Anita. I would even go as far as to say that Anita is lighthearted (especially in comparison to Thriller). Anita is still worthy of being watch, especially if you're a fan of Christina Lindberg. Real tits always beat silicone.

Toshiaki Toyoda (1998)

Titled Pornostar with little explanation and no visible connection to pornography in the slightest, Toshiaki Toyoda's debut feature finds an inexplicable script defining allusion towards the revolting youth of our Eastern brethren. Redubbed Tokyo Rampage for a US distribution seemed to be the only logical choice concerning the ill-kept and illogical titling of Pornostar but as quickly as the film begins, we're thrust into a story relying heavily on symbolism of unexplained hatred and prejudice against the Yakuza. Arano appears to be of mental deficiency, stalking the bustling streets with little to no human contact. Only with the appearance of a Yakuza does he resemble a human, and a violent one at that. Unexplained and unkempt are the only two traits this film abides by as it breaks all preexisting boundaries of film by offering no explanation and no mercy from the belligerent "storytelling" and sometimes shockingly beautiful scenarios. But not even raw ore can fulfill the needs of a cinematic miner as he/she struggles to find something more than rabid hatred to embrace.

Briskly acquiring speed via a narrowing view of a high-traffic crosswalk in Shibuya, the camera eventually centers on a coated figure with a blank expression of terminal sincerity. Arano is established first-and-foremost as a generic vision of troubled youth in Shibuya with modern "punk" sensibilities but a taste for bleeding the Yakuza as they are "not needed." These two words make up most of the muttered lines sprinkled across the film as he stabs and slices his way through criminal ranks until he happens across Kamijo, a Yakuza "tough guy" archetype who is troubled with the idea of stripping one of their life, which mixes beautifully with the tense brotherhood that Arano and Kamijo create. Within this bond of fluctuating intensity lies a deep-seated fear of grievous injury, seeing as how Arano was created with the intention of psychotic tendencies which even leads him to stabbing a child upon the discovery of his enrollment in Yakuza Youth. Later on during the events of alternatively titled Tokyo Rampage, a murky pretense of plot is discovered when a woman decides to hitch Arano along for a ride by skateboarding and stealing a ghetto blaster loaded with LSD, to which is later applied to a humorous context as she nearly overdoses and is repeatedly kicked in the stomach as her gaze fixates on the ceiling while her tender body lurches on the bathroom floor, creating an oddly erotic effect.

Strangely enough with the lack of non-violent confrontations, the bizarre symbolism abroad finds a way to redeem the film's lacking efforts with zeal. Scenes of somber, ritualistic killings are followed by a torrential rain of knives, clattering to the streets avoiding the body of Arano and his compulsive and brutal nature. With his psychosis immortalized on the screen, one must wonder if he is the hero or the villain of this tale. After all, Kajimo has been personalized with the sad weight of his father's funeral on his shoulders which commits heavily to his reluctance to murder. The quickness of which Arano's moods shift is exhilarating and repulsive as demonstrated during a scene of drug trade. Refusing to lower the prices for a weighty amount of LSD, Arano and Kajimo's underlings engage in a laughing fit which prompts for a bracing stature the moment Kajimo mutters "Not these guys. Don't shoot." Contrary to his request, Arano's bloody and gashed face contorts to an expression of pleasure as he pulls out a gun, shooting both dealers in the head. Further possible scenes of symbolism revolve around Arano's catatonic nature on the couch of Kajimo's loft as he continuously lights matches to watch them burn out, then throwing them to the floor preoccupied by a large amounts of tomatoes. Kajimo's worrisome nature kicks in as he steps on the matches but in the process squashing tomatoes which can be taken as heavy foreshadowing to the amount of red we will be treated to later.

Only to add insult to injury is the usage of gnarling and dreamlike guitar as a backdrop into the mind of a youthful killer. Pornostar is a bizarre debut picture from a director who later establishes himself with films entirely unlike Pornostar which circumvents the illusion here that more is better. Perhaps the stringy substance of narrative is entirely unnecessary given the right techniques and social hamstrings to sever. Or maybe this is all an experimental facade to see how far the audience is willing to accompany Toyoda on his nihilistic stint with cruel rebellion. Regardless of intention, Toyoda has created something born into the world with a fervor to live. Instead of questioning the filmic biology of life and whether or not Pornostar should be, one must embrace the existence of such a film to turn shoulder and dodge the bullets of formulaic cinema processing. For these and many other reasons, Pornostar is a film that I grow more fond of the longer I ponder about the rampant anger that Arano has distilled upon me and all who view, regardless of opinion.

FUNERAL PARADE OF ROSES

Toshio Matsumoto (1969)

Admittedly, there is something rather creepy and repellant about drag queens and trannies (hence why they are always the subject of jokes and mental derangement, especially in the pre-p.c. gay world), which probably has to do with the fact that no matter how much makeup they wear and how much money they waste on mutilating themselves with plastic surgery, their Y chromosomes will always have control, even if they have an ostensibly 'female soul,' yet it seems Japs in drag—for whatever reason (but most likely due to 'delicate' and petite overall look of the entire Japanese race, both male and female)—have a much easier time pulling their gender-bending off, especially in comparison to their Aryan and Negro counterparts, or at least that is what one would be led to believe after watching Funeral Parade of Roses (1969) aka Bara no Sōretsu directed by Toshio Matsumoto. A criminally underrated and under-seen work of avant-garde Jap pop-art of the cinematically hybridized experimental and cinéma vérité sort that schizophrenically blends elements from melodrama, horror, agitprop, and documentary, as well as fiction and reality, Funeral Parade of Roses would go on to inspire none other than Stanley Kubrick, who utilized aesthetic and thematic elements of the Japanese film for his masterpiece of dystopian ultra-violence A Clockwork Orange (1971), yet Matsumoto has only gained a marginal reputation in the Occident for his debut-feature-length masterpiece of the gender confused. The Japanese equivalent to what Warhol was doing cinematically in NYC at the time with works like Chelsea Girls (1966) and Lonesome Cowboys (1968), except all the more technically competent and all the more degenerate and morally reprehensible, Funeral Parade of Roses takes place in a superlatively seedy and socially subversive underground Sodom of late-1960s Tokyo, where gay men that are called "queens" dress in women's clothing yet hate the fairer sex and will stop at nothing to steal their men. An innately aberrant and sardonic cinematic adaptation of the Sophocles' Greek tragedy Oedipus Rex, except with a twist where the anti-hero murders his mother instead of his father due to his incestuous homosexuality as opposed to heterosexuality, Funeral Parade of Roses is a wild and wanton window into a post-WWII Japan – a place where the ancient legacy of the samurai is no more and where "men" are more willing to wear dresses and makeup and violently attack women than flying a plane into an American battleship. The first and probably the greatest gay Japanese film ever made, Funeral Parade of Roses is—not unlike many Jap films—a work that is simultaneously a goofy and grotesque piece of oriental psychopathia sexualis in celluloid mosaic form that is greater than the sum of its equally sordid and satirical parts. As a filmmaker character in Funeral Parade of Roses states, quoting Jonas "the godfather of American avant-garde cinema" Mekas, "All definitions of cinema have been erased..." and the same can be certainly said in regard to Matsumoto's magnetic and mystifying gay Jap masterpiece of the merily macabre.

Eddie (played by real-life transvestite "Pitá" aka "Peter" who later played 'Kyoami the Fool' in Akira Kurosawa's Ran (1985)) is a mixed up "Japanese Michael Alig" who does what he wants whenever he wants, especially if it is going to fulfill some sort of hedonistic desire and/or further cement his infamous reputation as a rabid drag queen of the unhinged Tokyo underground realm. A pathological narcissist who stares at himself in the mirror all day and night, Eddie has taken his stereotypically female character traits to such extremes that he is willing to do anything to calm his estrogen-driven jealousy, including bitching out women with real boobs and even brutally murdering them, including the woman who gave birth to him. Being the fierce femme in the relationship, Eddie relies on 'butch' alpha-queer Gonda (Yoshio Tsuchiya, who starred in Kurosawa's Seven Samurai, Throne of Blood, and High and Low)—the criminally-inclined owner of the fittingly titled "Bar Genet" who is involved in prostitution and drug dealing—for sex, drugs, and rock n roll, but a rival drag queen named Leda (Osamu Ogasawara in his sole film role), who runs the bar, wants to tear the terrible twosome apart. When it comes down to it, Eddie is an attention and pleasure seeking whore will do anything and everything for a meager inkling of fame and fortune, including being the subject of a documentary on Tokyo Trannies and underground porn films that are pinker than a pussy lady-boy in a kimono and go-go boots. Of course, erotomaniac Eddie's life was not always so glamorous as his belligerent bitch of a mother (Emiko Azuma) was not amused when she found her fairy son putting on her makeup and posing like a true poof in her mirror, so she naturally beat the shit out of him, but proving to be the true "queen bitch," the prodigal son turned perverted daughter paid her back by symbolically stabbing her in the womb. Plagued by his matricidal past and his deep-seated desire to be a real biological woman, deranged Eddie is naturally on the verge on detonating and with the sort of drug-addicted drag queens and fag pimps he surrounds himself with, it is only a matter of time before he explodes in a cinematic climax fit for a jaded Japanese queen. so it is only a matter of time before his As a schizophrenic film-within-a-film with pseudo-documentary and sex scenes from the porn flick Eddie is starring in, Funeral Parade of Roses is essentially like an erratic adventure through the abberosexual anti-hero's perturbed yet playful mind, where his transvestite persona and 'true self' get lost somewhere in a bittersweet maze of madness, misery, and ecstasy. Taking its central theme from the verse "I am the wound and the blade, both the torturer and he who is flayed" from the poetry volume Les Fleurs du mal (1857) aka The Flowers of Evil by Charles Baudelaire, Funeral Parade of Roses offers a sympathetic, albeit now politically incorrect, perspective of what it is like being a sexually confused Japanese man whose very essence is out of wack with his biological body, thus leading to the most brazen and, quite literally, bloody of consequences of a mixed-up man-woman who no longer wants to 'see' reality for what it is.

In regard to his use of real newscasters, hippie drug addicts, drag queens and whatnot in Funeral Parade of Roses, director Toshio Matsumoto offered the following insight regarding his technique with the film, "They appeared as real people...half acting in the roles in the film...and half portraying themselves in a real situation. That's the kind of style in which I wanted them to appear. I certainly didn't have the budget for it...so I just asked them as friends to appear in the film. However, it's very difficult to tell when you're watching the film...what exactly is a real situation and what is fictional...what I mean is that...not everything in the film...is neatly arranged within a frame of reference." Indeed, Funeral Parade of Roses is aesthetically anarchic as it is morally and sexually, as a delightfully deranged and discordant work featuring Cocteau-esque camera tricks, Warholian wantonness, a protagonist more psychosexually disturbed than Norman Bates of Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), homo human creatures as camp-ridden and flaming as in Jack Smith's Flaming Creatures (1963), yellow cocksucking criminals as callous and corrupt as those featured in the novels of Jean Genet and morbidity and grotesquery as aesthetically pleasing as the words of Baudelaire, and a postmodern celluloid montage technique that puts the works of Alexander Kluge to shame. Indubitably, it is no coincidence that novelist Yukio Mishima—a quasi-closeted gay man who worked in various avant-garde artistic mediums that would eventually become extremely right-wing and nationalist and lived by the bushido (the code of the samurai), even forming his own private army, the Tatenokai ("shield society")—committed ritual suicide via seppuku only a year after the release of Funeral Parade of Roses, thus making him, arguably, the last Japanese public figure to commit self-slaughter in such an ancient fashion. With apocalyptic quotes like, "I wish the whole country would sink underwater" and "The world is reaching its end," Funeral Parade of Roses acts as a sort of campy cinematic last rites for everything that was traditional in Japan before because, as where in the past men merely dressed in women's clothing for Kabuki theatre, now they have literally taken on female identities and adopted degenerate Occidental counter-culture garbage. Indeed, it may have been a great human tragedy when the Americans nuked the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki during the Second World War, but the greatest tragedy caused by the war was the disintegration of the nuclear family, traditional Japanese culture, and the way of the samurai, and a film like Funeral Parade of Roses just happens to be one of the few good, if not odious and ominous yet sardonically side-splitting, aesthetic occurrences to come out of this steady cultural degeneration, but as the conclusion of Matsumoto's film reveals, things in the "Land of the Rising Sun" may get rather ugly if these cultural trends do not end. After all, something has to be going terribly wrong in a nation where one can buy used female panties in a vending machine.

RUBIN /& ED
RUBIN /& ED

Trent Harris (1991)

A film that wasn't made for anyone in mind, Rubin & Ed is one of the few films that throttled Crispin Glover's career into a bizarre mix of mainstream Hollywood films to independent comedies, which led to self-financed blasphemous surrealist pictures. The tactic to give notice to, was his appearance on the Late Show with David Letterman. What was supposed to be a simple television appearance turned into a hilariously quirky in-character performance from his new film, River's Edge. Donning Rubin's attire from the film, he presents himself in a stuttering and loony fashion. He then decides to present his ability to almost kick Letterman in the face with a pair of platform shoes on. When asked about this near 5 years later, he swears it was his evil twin. He even presents a trying story to an interviewer with hilarious results.

It's been 21 years since that incident, and he gets even more eccentric with each tick of a clock. What Glover dramatized on that show could be a prehistoric trace of viral marketing. Not only did it create an insane hero in the cult circle's eyes, but it also created his career. What we have here is a non-conventional buddy film. One that flashes glimpses of infinite brilliance, and at times runs a tad bit slow. Rubin is a reclusive blast from the past, clad in bell bottoms, box frame glasses, long flowing locks, and platform shoes. His mom takes away his stereo and tells him to get a friend. He meets would-be Mr. Success. The meeting of these two people with no common ground propels them into the desert on a mission to bury Rubin's frozen cat. The character of Ed seems like the mold used in Adam Sandler's Happy Gilmore. I can spot several similarities between Ed and Shooter McGavin. Toupee, pyramid scheme, success, and similar attitude. As with many Crispin Glover films, the film follows a straight line with a specific impediment. This doesn't stop him from creating a dream-like sequence with in each film which demonstrates groundbreaking surrealism, symbolism, and the quirkiest quotable's in film. "I am the king of the echo people!" and "My cat can eat a whole watermelon!" spring instantly in mind. The genre of Math rock can be compared to the directing of this film. Various obtrusions come into play but that doesn't stop Trent Harris from delivering scenes with impeccable pride and some stunning imagery using the horizon of a phallic desert as his playground. As with another Glover film, the music delivers the mood almost one hundred percent. Distorted children songs are playing harmoniously in the background which Rubin drinks dead cat fermented water in the desert. Some of these scenes are shockingly disgusting, no matter how staged they are. Wearing bell bottoms, It's possible to see Crispin Glover's body mass in his skin-tight garb, and he is ripped. As seen on the Letterman video, I wouldn't want to fuck with Crispin Glover. For all I know, He'd pull a Shinya Tsukamoto in Ichi the Killer and rip my face off with some hidden fatality. My favorite aspect in this film, is knowing that Glover had the role of Andy Warhol in Oliver Stone's The Doors. With that in mind, several scenes are meticulously placed in the film displaying graffiti boasting "Andy Warhol sucks a big one!" It's obvious this is even Crispin Glover's thoughts on the subject. He even goes as far as to call him a "famous fraud" and I completely agree. Painting soup cans is completely expressive. Whether you like your bizarro cinema medium-rare or medium-well, Rubin & Ed has something for everyone, even your house cat. The only missing piece is a DVD release.

Troy Miller (1998)

As a toddler, the idea of a killer snowman always made my imagination laugh. I much preferred the ones displayed in Calvin & Hobbes (See Attack of the Deranged Mutant Killer Monster Snow Goons). The cover of Jack Frost displayed a truly ridiculous "evil" snowman that screamed horrifying and deadly. Although the one in the film is...cuddly. No likeness in between the two. False advertisement is a bitch. A conveniently placed toxic truck crashes with a prisoner transport truck. $1 + 1 = 2$ (Horror formulaic equation) and a killer snowman is born and on the loose in a small town looking for revenge to the sheriff who imprisoned his human form. These ideas always look good on paper but never turn out well. Jack Frost is another premature horror film that came too soon from the industry womb with a ridiculous villain that never should have been. I don't know what's more threatening, Jack Frost or Gingerdead Man? The highlights of these cheesy rental horror films are kills no doubt, so let's have a look at some of them. Jack Frost can manipulate his molecular structure which results in a really cool icicle shooting appendage. That's a pretty nice addition to an otherwise boring and silly film, but for the most part the kills are stupid and barely humorous. One-liners go into overkill mode in attempt to make this snowman an iconic slasher villain. Thankfully, that never happens. I can't tell if it's satire or not, but Jack Frost "dies" many times in this film. When I quote die, I mean when the hero disposes of him but never does the finishing blow. That scene happens 3+ times as Jack Frost gets melted, shot, soaked up, and finally anti-freezed to death. The methods of his annihilation were entertaining as well as the ingenious storing him in bottles to bury. Jack Frost is pure rental fodder. I could never recommend this as it is not memorable in any sense, but it is a fine novelty.

Trygve Allister Diesen, Lucky McKee (2008)

Jack Ketchum's been seeing some of that "proverbial phat cash" recently with the highlights of his written works being adapted to the screen. It's easy for someone of his writing caliber to see a film adaptation due to the emotional intensity that wraps around every plot of his novels. Red is about an old timer whose best friend is his dog, Red. After some teens kill his dog for no reason, Avery sets off on a mission of revenge and redemption. When I was a child, I'd grown quite partial to our canine friends. In Elementary school, I fell deeply in love with the novel Where the Red Fern Grows. Its intimacy for animals and human nature is a marvel in literature. This is the same substance that resonates from Red which ultimately makes it a fine film overwhelming with a deep emotion and frustration towards Generation X-ers. Red is a strange mix between Death Wish and Where the Red Fern Grows. For some inexplicable reason, this mix creates a revenge concoction like no other. Brian Cox is a very talented actor who plays the reclusive man, but fans of any form of cinema will pay note to another cameo by Robert Englund who plays father to one of the boys involved. Harley Davidson and the Marlboro Man villain Tom Sizemore plays almost the very same role and attitude as he denies his sons involvement up and down. The score that accompanies the film is a bland choice; just elevating levels of orchestra that don't hit any real chords with the viewers. The ending is well structured and heart-breaking. After watching this film, I feel the need to go read the book. I wonder if a cat lover would still appreciate this film's emotional aesthetics? Red isn't an art piece nor an important film. Its sole purpose is to make you think and feel and it does just that quite well. For everyone who has ever enjoyed the outdoors or the simple treasures of a country life, Red will sparkle in your eyes over other films that deal with the thought of separating from your loved ones. It is a satisfying film experience that challenges the idea of forgiveness to the core. If someone can do so much harm and not feel any sympathy, why forgive them for their mistakes when a God surely wouldn't? Red is not complete without its scripting flaws or pacing issues, but it is a damn fine film that makes me feel the need to play a game with my canine counterpart after viewing.

THE CAT HAS NINE LIVES

Ula Stöckl (1968)

When one thinks of feminist filmmakers associated with German New Cinema, they typically think of frigid hags like Margarethe von Trotta (Rosa Luxemburg, Rosenstrasse) and Helke Sander (Der subjektive Faktor, BeFreier und BeFreite) who seem to think that making their actresses seem as homely and emotionless as possible somehow makes them seem more 'intelligent' and 'liberated,' but Ula Stöckl (Popp and Mingel, A Woman with Responsibilities) not only made feature films before both of these women, but also had no problem depicting women as both beautiful and naturally feminine. A cofounder of the Verband der Filmarbeiterinnen (Association of Women Film Workers) who was taught by top GNC auteur filmmakers like Edgar Reitz and Alexander Kluge, she would go on to direct what she herself described as "the first women's film in West Germany." Indeed, Stöckl's The Cat Has Nine Lives (1968) aka Neun Leben hat die Katze is a rare 'poetic' feminist flick without all the empty political slogans and bargain bin misandry. Innately feminine in character but featuring alluring enough women and direction to appeal to male cinephiles, Stöckl's film has more in common with the works of Czech avant-garde auteur Věra Chytilová than that of the mostly aesthetically sterile and petty propaganda-laden kraut feminist flicks that would follow it. Unlike von Trotta, Stöckl flirts with both male and female viewers alike, even if The Cat Has Nine Lives is a rather 'girly' film focusing on the romantic troubles of a group of eclectic friends who all come from some particular form of 'female trouble,' or as the auteur stated in a 1984 interview with Marc Silberman of Jump Cut: "In NEUN LEBEN HAT DIE KATZE I chose the characters as types: the not-yet-married professional woman, the recent divorcee confused about her future, the career woman, the deceived wife and the ultimate dream woman — a legendary Circe. In this film the women seem to be sleeping because each thinks only of herself and that she has an advantage over the other. Each one thinks she has a recipe for happiness, or that being unhappy is her own fault because she's too dumb to be happy. In other words, these women cannot see their anxieties as having something to do with the society in which they live. They exhibit a lack of knowledge about how one could behave differently." Ironically, the film ultimately reveals that women have an innate incapacity for unity and solidarity because they are far too self-absorbed and delusional. Quite shockingly, instead of just blaming men for all the problems that women have, Stöckl's work demonstrates that, in many ways, members of the so-called 'fairer sex' are their own worst enemies. Indeed, as the film reveals, women hate nothing more than to encounter a woman who is more beautiful than they are. If you ever wanted to know why it would be an absolute catastrophe if women were ever to rule the world, just checkout The Cat Has Nine Lives.

If The Cat Has Nine Lives features anyone resembling a main character, it is recently divorced French would-be-free-spirit/proto-hippie Anne/Marianne (played by Kristine De Loup, who would later star in a couple small roles in later period Fassbinder flicks like Berlin Alexanderplatz and Lili Marleen), who is slowly but surely giving herself a lobotomy via women's lib lunacy. Although she would never admit it, Anne is jealous of her friend Magdalena, who is more or less happily married to her hubby Stefan (Jürgen Arndt), even if he is always trying to get in other women's panties. Indeed, while a guest diner at the husband and wife's home, Anne is in such a bitchy mood that she has the gall to ask Stefan whether or not he loves his wife, even going so far as to insinuate that he is in love with her and their other female friends Gabriele (Heidi Stroh, who appeared in Mario Bava's 1964 masterpiece Blood and Black Lace) and Circe. To Anne's credit, Stefan does freely confess that he is in love with both Katharina and his faithful wife. Stefan also has no problem admitting, "There's nothing we can do, our eroticism is patriarchal."

When Anne and her best friend Katharina are together they enjoy saying crude things to each other like, "A cow pissing in a tub is rib-busting but also disgusting. So... Is that bad?," but they also get rather serious about their trouble with men. Anne has come from France to stay with Katharina and her seemingly sexless journalist friend, who is easily the most uninteresting character in the entire film. Undoubtedly, the more sophisticated of the two women is Katharina, but she is aging fast and seems to be afraid of marriage. When Katharina complains, "I always approach things through my feelings. I haven't got the manual skills, the scientific know-how to get something going," her boyfriend uses the opportunity to ask her to marry him, stating, "Well, maybe you haven't got your confidence for studying things, but rather from the human angles, for instance from marriage, it doesn't have to be a formal marriage, but maybe a relation that gives you security, a certain," but she naturally turns him down. Like many beautiful women, Gabriele, who is a singer by trade, oftentimes faces hatred from her fellow women, complaining to her friends, "Women hate me...right off. Almost always. It's usually hate at first sight. Then, when they see I am different, laugh and act natural, they like me," but she has rather high standards when it comes to men, stating of her ideal lover, "An extraordinary one. He must be extraordinary...don't laugh...I've always thought if Jesus had loved women, I'd have liked to love him." When it comes down to it, although all of these women are friends, they are really only concerned with their own desires and needs and are thus losing a true sense of solidarity with their sisters.

Of course, considering that it was made in the late-1960s, The Cat Has Nine Lives features an obligatory 68er-Bewegung anti-Vietnam war protest scene, which includes a bunch of ethno-masochistic krauts carrying around Martin Luther King, Jr. signs and screaming about imaginary Nazis. While Anne, who is certainly no student, goes to the German student protest because she proclaims that she wants to help, “to create a world revolution,” she really uses the opportunity to cavort with a young kraut named Manfred that has caught her fancy. While Manfred seems to fall in love with Anne almost instantly, he later comes to the realization that, “having been waiting so long for a woman like Anne, when the time finally comes, you are only very tired.” Meanwhile, the Journalist gets in an argument with a daycare center employee about the pros and cons of childhood masturbation. While the Journalist believes that, “auto-eroticism makes you more independent of your partner,” the daycare teacher more soundly responds, “A child that is told it can masturbate freely, I would say...the damage done is as great as... the confusion that it causes is as great as the effect of repressive upbringing,” with the scene concluding in a controversial manner by featuring a group of completely nude pre-kindergarten boys and girls more or less humping pillows. Meanwhile, towards the end of the film, two of the friends discuss the arrival of Circe, who is apparently so beautiful and such a “wonderful, strange woman” that she can do whatever she likes whenever she likes and could get away with “blowing up the Eiffel Tower” if she wanted to. It is also learned in that end that Stefan has been cheating on his wife with one of her friends. Indeed, Stefan is such a sly devil that he visits his wife’s friend at the hospital when she is sick so he can prey on her during a moment of weakness, even going so far as to feel up her titties while she is on a hospital bed. Of course, Anne hates Stefan and states of him, “Stefan ought to dream that all women have vaginas on their foreheads....then he could run around the world, going bang, bang, bang...” In the end, Anne goes back to Frogland and concludes that she is “so sad.”

Undoubtedly, if there is one single line from The Cat Has Nine Lives that sums up the entire aesthetic essence of the film, it is “Beauty always makes me sad.” While noted for being, “feminist before feminism,” Stöckl’s film would most certainly offend the repugnant aesthetic sensibilities of many contemporary feminists with proud ‘fattitudes’ because not only does the film feature not a single unattractive nor overweight dyke, but it also portrays men as people with weaknesses and dreams just like women. While the film was clearly directed by someone with a strong feminine sensibility, the cinematographer also does much credit for the film’s orgasmic aesthetics. Indeed, shot by one of the greatest cinematographers of German New Cinema, Dietrich Lohmann, who largely earned his reputation by shooting virtually all of Fassbinder’s early films and also worked with Volker Schlöndorff, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Robert van Ackeren, Helma Sanders-Brahms, Edgar Reitz, and Peter Lilienthal, The Cat Has Nine Lives is certainly a work that owes a great deal of its lyricism and celluloid poetry to its cameraman, as a work that is not big on plot or storyline, but flows together almost immaculately like a river. Virtually totally unseen when it was originally released in 1968 because the film’s distributor, which originally secured 600 cinema dates, went out of business, The Cat Has Nine Lives is a rather rare example of filmic feminism that rises above the level of Andrea Dworkin's feces in terms of charm and pulchritude. Indeed, Stöck's film is not a prosaic political pamphlet written in cinematic form, but an honest attempt by a woman to examine why so many Fräuleins were unhappy during her zeitgeist. In its incessant commentary on German tradition and strikingly splendid depictions of pastoral (anti)romance(s), The Cat Has Nine Lives is very likely the first and last 'feminist Heimat' flick ever made, thus making it an important and imperative piece of Teutonic cinema history. Featuring the use of marionettes that prefigures Syberberg, bizarre silent flashback scenes of a young girl witnessing the mutilation of farm animals by her farmer father, highly sensual scenes of female nudity directed by a woman that would actually appeal to a man, and reasonably realistic female characters that act neither like ciphers nor rocket scientists, The Cat Has Nine Lives is certainly one of the more overlooked works of German New Cinema and I say that as a staunch anti-feminist.

CHRISTIANE F. – WIR KINDER VOM BAHNHOF ZOO

Uli Edel (1981)

While American's Generation X has the softcore suburban sentimentalist angst-comedies of John Hughes, including Weird Science (1985) and The Breakfast Club (1985), as well as some more radical, working-class come-of-age flicks like Over the Edge (1979), The Wanderers (1979), and River's Edge (1986), West Germany's Gen X had the much grittier and unglamorous work, Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) aka Christiane F. – We Children from Bahnhof Zoo aka Christiane F.; a relatively low-budget and decidedly depressing piece of unsentimental realist melodrama about a damaged and barely-teenage junky girl who, like her discernibly dirty and mentally-ungifted boyfriend and equally inebriated and physically emaciated friends, sells her body to buy heroin, among other undignified things. Directed by then-unknown German filmmaker Uli Edel (Last Exit to Brooklyn, Der Baader Meinhof Komplex) – who replaced the original director Roland Klick (Deadlock, Supermarkt) after he was fired by producer Bernd Eichinger (co-scriptwriter/producer of the 2004 Hitler epic Downfall aka Der Untergang) during pre-production – and based on the ghostwritten autobiography (journalists wrote the book using two months worth of candid audio-recording interviews with the junior junky) of German 'outsider celebrity' Christiane F. (born Vera Christiane Felscherinow), Christiane F. earned an instant cult following among West German youth, but also shocked older audiences into realizing that virtual children were living a lurid libertine lifestyle where they were pathetically and pathologically peddling their flesh on a day-to-day basis just so they would not have to endure opiate withdrawal. The film was released not long after a heroin epidemic hit Western and Central Europe during the mid-1970s, thus making it one of the first, if not the first, junky melodrama to unsettle the ever so stoic Teutonic soul, although gritty pseudo-cinéma vérité coming-of-age flicks like Klaus Lemke's Rocker (1972) and Uwe Frießner's The End of the Rainbow (1979) aka Das Ende des Regenbogens were nothing new in Germany. Featuring a concert performance (which was actually filmed in New York City) and musical score by post-Ziggy Stardust David Bowie, Christiane F. – not unlike fellow kraut auteur Eckhart Schmidt's Der Fan (1982) aka The Fan starring Désirée Nosbusch – ironically, to some extent, glorifies the same superficial and pseudo-spiritual rock 'n' roll lifestyle it rather relentlessly condemns, so it should be no surprise that both the character and the real-life Christiane F. would go on to become a 'rebel role model' and degenerate celebrity in the Fatherland. Needless to say, seeing your boyfriend being penetrated by a posh poof is probably not a particularly pleasant way for a little lady to remember the coming-of-age of her womanhood, but everyone knows that no one can stop a young and naïve teenage girl from making irrational sacrifices for her first boy toy in the name of idealistic young love and that certainly holds true in the pussy-pawning, toilet-bowl-clenching, vomit-friendly world of Christiane F.

The year is 1975 and 12-year-old Christiane Felscherinow (Natja Brunckhorst) lives in a cramped Western Berlin condo unit with her little sister and single mother who is always at work. With no real father figure around, Christiane latches on to worshipping glam rock messiah David Bowie; an androgynous fellow who is quite pretty for a boy despite being well into his thirties. When she discovers 'Sound,' a new disco in the city center with the unbeatable reputation of being, "the most modern discothèque in Europe," Christiane, despite being not old enough to gain legal entry, gets all dolled up with lecherous lipstick and super high-heels, and manages to get into the virtual rock utopia with an older friend from school who is a regular at the club. As fate would have it, Christiane meets the her soon-to-be-boyfriend Detlef (Thomas Hausstein) – a seemingly half-braindead degenerate who has an affinity for popping pills and tripping on LSD – and his curious crew of exceedingly gulky and gangly teenage losers who commit petty robberies while high on who knows what mind-altering chemical substances. When neo-dandy rocker god David Bowie comes to the Fatherland, it proves to be an extra special night for Christiane as she meets her virtual doppelgänger Babsi (Christiane Reichelt) and rather reluctantly tries heroin for the first time by insufflating it, so as to see what her junky beau Detlef feels like and thus getting one step closer to full-blown junkydom. Before she knows it, Christiane is equally hooked on heroin as she is in love with Detlef, despite the fact he prostitutes himself to a suavely dressed sodomite who has an unhealthy obsession with Tom of Finland drawings and looks like one of the corrupt capitalist cocksuckers from Fassbinder's Fox and His Friends (1975). Christiane rarely comes home to her mother's condo and instead squats with Detlef at a junky friend's dilapidated apartment that is covered and trash and dirty syringes. The lanky girl and her corrupted comrades also become regulars of the Bahnhof Zoo scene – a superlatively seedy subway station where sex and drugs are regularly sold – because Christiane also needs to peddle her flesh to unconventionally ugly brown men to maintain her habit or at least so she wouldn't suffer the heated horrors of "H" withdraw. As she learns while trying to kick heroin addiction with her gay-for-pay boyfriend – opiate withdraw is a dreadful thing that makes one dream of death just to stop the pain – but the terrible twosome somehow manages to get through it, only to relapse not long after they have detoxed. Pawning her personal belongings (including the precious David Bowie album her beau bought her), stealing from her family, and losing all her dignity and a number of friends to drug overdoses are just a couple of the things Christiane must go through during her life as a juvenile junky, but it only when she walks in on her dick-peddling boyfriend Detlef being savagely manhandled by a major queen that she seems to come to her senses. Needless to say, Christiane F. has come a long way in a mere two years as someone who began as an innocent

CHRISTIANE F. – WIR KINDER VOM BAHNHOF ZOO

David Bowie fan and turned into teenage junky who sold her soul and body for more than just rock 'n' roll.

Although Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo concludes with a postscript revealing that Christiane finally got straight and clean, the real-life teenage junky never really got over her heroin addiction and has served various prison sentences and is still in German newspaper headlines from time-to-time for drug-related arrests, though she did have a marginal musical career in the 1980s under the band name Sentimentale Jugend (with her then-boyfriend Alexander Hacke of the popular German industrial group Einwärtsende Neubauten) and would also star in the German cult muzak movie Decoder (1984) directed by Muscha and also starring FM Einheit (also a member of Einwärtsende Neubauten) and American avant-garde artist William “Bill” Rice (Manhattan Love Suicides, Coffee and Cigarettes) and featuring a cameo from Junky guru William S. Burroughs. Natja Brunckhorst, who played the title role in Christiane F., unlike most of the other teen actors in the film, would go on to have a marginal acting career, including appearing in German New Cinema auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s final film Querelle (1982) and playing secondary roles in popular German films like The Princess and the Warrior (2000) directed by Tom Tykwer (Run Lola Run), but never again having the success and popularity she did with her first role as West Germany’s most iconic teenage junky. Director Uli Edel would go on to portray 1950s Brooklyn junky shemales in the Hollywood production Last Exit to Brooklyn (1989); a delightfully debauched cinematic adaptation of Hubert Selby Jr.’s novel of the same name, but not to the same grueling and grimy extent as in Christiane F.; probably the only film featuring David Bowie that radically depicts to the viewer that being drug-addled, destitute, and half-dead is not exactly a good thing, not to mention being the only quasi-“After School Special” that is actually intentionally entertaining and reasonably effective in its de-glorifying of the teenage street junky lifestyle, even if it did inspire a couple kraut teens to get hip to what lifelong junky novelist William S. Burroughs called “Cocteau’s kick.”

Although best known nowadays, especially in the English-speaking world, as the mad scatological scientist with an affinity for sewing rectums to mouths in Tom Six's The Human Centipede (First Sequence) (2009), seemingly half-crazed and reptilian-like kraut actor Dieter Laser was once quite a serious actor of German New Cinema, appearing in important cinematic works like The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum (1975) co-directed by Volker Schlöndorff and Margarethe von Trotta and the omnibus film Germany in Autumn (1978), but undoubtedly his lead role in the dystopian sci-fi flick Wir (1981) aka We is one of the greatest and most important of his career, even if few people have actually seen it. Directed by Czech auteur Vojtěch Jasný (Až přijde kocour aka The Cassandra Cat, The Great Land of Small) and based on the novel We (1921) written by science fiction/political satire writer Yevgeny Zamyatin, Wir is a film that wastes no time criticizing authoritarian collectivism, especially of the comie sort. With the source novel being the very first book to be banned by the Soviet censorship board and the author Zamyatin being referred to as one of the first Soviet dissidents, Wir is, not surprisingly, one of the few 'overtly anti-communist' films of German New Cinema, albeit with little anti-fascist nuances like gas chambers and whatnot thrown in so as to assumedly appeal to the vogue far-left that dominated culture in the Fatherland at that time. Featuring a superlatively soulless world of transparent glass walls and architecture where everyone can see everything and no one has privacy, emotions and art for art's sake is a crime, dreams are considered symptoms of madness, and the people worship a megalomaniac of a charlatan who literally drains what little bit of humanity they have left via psycho-surgery, Wir certainly deserves a place somewhere in between Welt am Draht (1973) aka World on a Wire directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Traumstadt (1973) aka Dream City directed by Johannes Schaaf and Die Hamburger Krankheit (1979) aka The Hamburg Syndrome directed by Peter Fleischmann as one of the greatest works of dystopian science fiction of German New Cinema. Adapted for the German Zweites Deutsches Fernsehen (ZDF) on a discernibly low-budget utilizing archaic video technology and primitive yet aesthetically pleasing special-effects, Wir is all but impossible to find nowadays by any official means, but is certainly worth the search, even if by quasi-illegal means.

One State—a quasi-urban artificial nation comprised almost entirely of glass—is a virtual prison community where everyone wears the same exact aesthetically displeasing uniforms (greyish blue sweatsuits where their genitals hang loosely out) and people have numbers instead of names. A somewhat grotesque-looking fellow 'named' D-503 (Dieter Laser) is the chief engineer of a spaceship named Integral that will be used to takeover and occupy extraterrestrial planets. Whilst working on the Integral, D-503 also keeps a journal about his day-to-day activities and his thoughts, which he will somewhat unreliably narrate Wir with as the film progresses. Like a human computer addicted to Adderall, D-503 is sort of a like an empty vessel who impulsively spouts propaganda slogans that has little opinion on anything aside from what he has been programmed to think, the source of which being the decided dictator of One State, the 'Benefactor.' D-503 is 'friends' with and does absurd Kraftwerk-esque exercises with a fellow named R-13 (Giovanni Früh), a slavish so-called 'State Writer' who is employed to read verses at executions and who is against art and artistic geniuses and regards the individualistic non-robotic sort of creator as heretical, stating, "poetry is civic service, poetry is useful," thereupon making him a sort of aesthetic nemesis of Arthur Rimbaud. One day while exercising with his comrades in a scenario that looks like some early 1980s music video, D-503 runs into a chick named I-330 (Sabine von Maydell) and the two eventually reunite later at a place called the Ancient House—a Victorian-like home that acts as a museum in regard to how 'ancient' homes once looked—and the little lady commits the unsanctioned and unholy act of putting on a dress and acting in a spastic, albeit happy, manner. Despite the seeming deadness of his soul, D-503 begins to fall in love with wild weirdo I-330 and before he knows it, he is 'registered' (indeed, all sex is setup and scheduled by the government) to share his cold and calculating carnal knowledge, but the model citizen is more than a tad bit startled when he sees his federally registered fuck buddy partaking in the 'marvelous poison' of liquor, as well as cigarettes, both of which are serious crimes punishable by death in One State.

Enslaved by his growing love for I-330, who it turns out is a political revolutionary and member of a radical group called MEPHI that is looking to wipe out the One State, D-503 is taken through a tunnel inside the Ancient House and introduced to a rural and natural world outside his technocratic city-state, where dandy-like poets, hippies with folk guitars, naked chicks, and other beatnik types called the "Forest People" frolic in the grass gaily and live naturally, which scares the engineer because, as he states, "they look like the figures in the Human History Museum," yet they are real, living and breathing people with personal freedom. Meanwhile, D-503's assigned girlfriend O-90 (Susanne Altschul), who is considered by the government to be too short to reproduce, convinces the peculiar protagonist to impregnate her, or so she hopes. On top of that, a more hideous than homely redhead chick named U-27 (Hanna Ruess) seduces D-503 and before he knows it, he is betrayed and put under house arrest, thus making him unable to be around for the first test flight of the Integral spaceship he designed, so he can only think to himself, "Kill...Kill...Kill." Naturally, D-503 blames U-27, who has apparently read his journal, for the treachery that has been bestowed upon him, so he goes to lunge at and attack her, but she flashes her tits and the Benefactor calls him right after, so he decides against killing her, at least for the moment. D-503 is forced to go see the leader of the One State, the Benefactor, who puts the young engineer in his place. Not long after, D-503 meets up with his lady love I-330, who tells him, "The thing at issue is bigger than us. It's not about your individual happiness. But the happiness of many others," thus demonstrating she is just as much of mindless collectivist as her enemies. Not unsurprisingly, D-503 goes mad and attacks a friend and is thus given psycho-surgery, which turns him into a reason-obsessed robot who is proud to admit the high-tech lobotomy made his head feel "light, empty" and that "reason must prevail" in a seemingly possessed fashion. Of course, it is revealed that U-27 told the Benefactor about everything that was written in D-503's journal, including I-330, revolutionary group MEPHI, and their plans to lead a counter-revolution against the cosmic communists at One State. As a treat for unwittingly toppling the MEPHI with his incriminating journal, D-503 has the distinguished pleasure of watching I-330 being tortured by the Benefactor via the "famous gas chamber." Unwilling to give up her comrades, I-330 refuses to confess under the pain of the gas chamber and D-503 lives happily on as a sophisticated zombie of sorts.

Based on a novel that influenced and/or has thematic similarities with works like Aldous Huxley's Brave New World (1932), Ayn Rand's Anthem (1938), George Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949), Kurt Vonnegut's Player Piano (1952), and Ursula K. Le Guin's The Dispossessed (1974), Wir might seem rather redundant to the uninitiated in terms of dystopian films, but with its absurdly minimalistic yet ominously oneiric sets, unforgettably unhinged performance from lead Dieter Laser, and the strange vintage video format the 'film' was shot on that only adds to the tone and aesthetic of the work, Vojtěch Jasný's striking micro-budget science fiction flick certainly deserves a place in science fiction history as a crudely charismatic kraut cult film that deserves to be rediscovered and rereleased. In terms of its sociopolitical message, Wir makes for a clever indictment of commie collectivism, but also bureaucracy, technocracy, passionless productivity, soulless sex and 'utilitarian relationships,' hyper-realization, and eradication of emotion, thereupon making it a film that has become all the more relevant since its release, even if it is outmoded in other ways. Aside from being a clearly low-budget work utilizing primitive technology, Wir has a vague hippie element to it as the "Forest People" in the film, who are essentially 'progressive' types, are dressed like cliché hippie scum with stupid haircuts and Jesus sandals. With star Dieter Laser's recent and rather surprising popularity as an iconic cult horror villain as a result of his role in The Human Centipede, one can only hope that interest in the actor will result in people digging up Wir from obscurity and proving the German actor is capable of playing more than just Mengele-esque characters like he did in Tom Six's films, as well as Volker Schlöndorff's The Ogre (1996) aka Der Unhold, but also a mundane engineer who becomes more interesting after receiving a lobotomy.

LAST EXIT TO BROOKLYN

Uli Edel (1989)

As a lifelong loather of New York City and everything it stands for, I have always appreciated films that have anti-romantically depicted the superlatively shitty city in all of its glaring degeneracy and multicultural chaos, especially in the historical sense where the aberrant area is portrayed as a place that has always suffered from a certain cultural malignancy, so naturally I have developed an appreciation for Letzte Ausfahrt Brooklyn aka Last Exit to Brooklyn (1989), a film based on the 1964 cult classic novel of the same name written by Hubert Selby, Jr. Directed by German for-hire hack Uli Edel (Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo, The Baader Meinhof Complex) and produced by kraut alpha-producer Bernd Eichinger (Hitler: A Film from Germany, Downfall aka Der Untergang), Last Exit to Brooklyn undoubtedly owes a great deal of its idiosyncratic and incendiary depiction of NYC due to being created from a total outsider's perspective that makes no attempt to glorify the miscreant multicultural metropolis. Featuring hysterical tranny junkies, fag-fucking union men, less than gregarious Guido gangs, lovelorn gangbanged hookers, and an aptly apocalyptic atmosphere that could have only been sired in a so-called American 'melting pot,' Last Exit to Brooklyn is a sort of Teutonic tragicomedy that is bound to inspire a certain Schadenfreude in certain viewers, including myself, as a sordid cinematic work with such a hysterical hodgepodge of human depravity scenarios and nauseating NYC ugliness that one can only laugh when everything is said and done. Despite receiving mixed reviews upon its release in the United States, Last Exit to Brooklyn ultimately received the German Film Award for Best Feature Film in 1990 and star Jennifer Jason Leigh won Best Supporting Actress awards from the New York Film Critics Circle and Boston Society of Film Critics, thus making for a major breakthrough for the actress' career. Filmed mostly in Red Hook, NYC, a multicultural hellhole that inspired American alpha-horror writer H.P. Lovecraft's short story The Horror at Red Hook (1927) and his infamous remark regarding its citizenry, "The organic things -Italo-Semitic-Mongoloid- inhabiting that awful cesspool could not by any stretch of the imagination be call'd human," Last Exit to Brooklyn ultimately does for 1950s New York City what Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) did for late-1920s Weimar Republic Berlin, albeit to a less remarkable and less personal degree, in its meticulously stylized and sometimes even phantasmagorical depiction of an unflattering and unhinged yet ultimately captivating zeitgeist that is probably best left forgotten, yet makes for curious celluloid tales.

It is Brooklyn during the 1950s and a long-term strike in the city has left most of its virtually collectively hapless citizens broke, pissed, and irrationally violent. During the beginning of Last Exit to Brooklyn, a gang of petty philistine criminals, including Vinnie (Peter Dobson), Boyce (Jerry Orbach), Sal (Stephen Baldwin), Al (Same Rockwell), and Freddy (James Lorinz) beat up a Southern sailor because he calls one of the wild wops a “nigger-loving bastard.” To earn most of their petty dirty money, the degenerate gang uses a hot blonde prostitute with big bosoms named Tralala (Jennifer Jason Leigh) to lure drunk sailors out of bars and rob them by smashing a bottle over their head and emptying their pockets. Meanwhile, a union activist/shop steward named Harry Black (Stephen Lang) is approached by a Greek-American tranny named Georgette (played by real male-to-female transvestite Alexis Arquette) while holding his cock and taking a piss. Clearly turned on by the uniquely ugly chick with a dick, Harry becomes aroused and essentially rapes his wife that same night. Friends with members of the local gang, Harry goes to a Dionysian druggy party with the masculine hoodlums that is hosted by sassy shemale Georgette and her tranny compatriots where he meets and starts a relationship with an extremely effete queen of a less than humble homo named ‘Regina’ (Bernard Zette). After meeting a nice and handsome sailor, the seemingly unlovable streetwalker Tralala also finds temporary solace and love for the first time in his life, but rather unfortunately, loverboy is sailing for the Korean War in a couple days.

Meanwhile, a fat and belligerent wop family man named Big Joe (Burt Young) has learned that his obscenely overweight daughter Donna (Ricki Lake) is pregnant and he successfully forces the unlucky man named Tommy (John Costelloe) who got her pregnant to marry her. While everything seems to be getting a little nicer for the urban hoodrats of Brooklyn, all good things must come to an end and when workers are brought in to replace the strikers, all hell breaks loose. After sleeping in with his boi toy Regina, Harry is late for a strike rally that ultimately erupts into a full blown riot and forgets to acknowledge his boss, so he is demoted and forced to pay back all the money he has blown own his high dollar man-whore. Of course, Regina dumps Harry after he no longer pays for her fine wine and hard drugs, so the union activist falls into a morbid melancholy state, attempts to molest a preteen boy, and is ultimately beaten an inch from his life by a group of men for his sick indiscretions with the young man. After Tralala’s saintly sailor leaves for the Korean War, she is snapped back into reality, gets drunk at a bar and announces that she has “The best tits in the Western world” and allows herself to be gangbanged senseless by dozens of degenerate barflies. At unpleasantly plump patriarch Big Joe’s daughter’s wedding, the father of the bride gets in a fist fight with the groom, thus ushering the beginning of a long and painful dysfunctional relationship. Towards the conclusion of Last Exit to Brooklyn, a lovesick teenage boy who is hopelessly in love with Tralala spots the hooker’s seemingly lifeless post-gangbanged body lying on a pier, thus resulting in the loss of the boy’s innocence and marking a fitting end for the film. Before the credits role, the workers on strike finally go back to work and life goes on.

A film where virtually every character is both a perpetrator and a victim, Last

Exit to Brooklyn is a sort of pre-apocalyptic period piece that never falls into sapless and superficial sentimentalism nor politically correct provocations, but instead depicts a distinctively stylized hell-on-earth in a manner that, to the film's credit, owes much to German expressionism and classic film noir. While I would not call myself a fan of Hubert Selby, Jr.'s novels, I can state with nil hesitation that Last Exit to Brooklyn is innately more interesting and genuine than Darren Aronofsky's cinematic adaptation of the Selby novel of the same name Requiem for a Dream (2000), as well as Nicolas Winding Refn's pseudo-Lynchian work Fear X (2003), which was based on a screenplay by Selby, Jr. Interestingly enough, Hubert Selby, Jr. has a cameo in Last Exit to Brooklyn as a taxi-driver who unintentionally runs over and kills tranny Georgette while s/he is looking for he/r lover in a hopeless heroin haze as if the nihilistic novelist himself were the grim reaper himself come to collect lost souls and save them for their deleterious dead-end lives of lifeless lecherousness and monumental misery. While penned by an American, shot in America, and featuring an all-American cast, Last Exit to Brooklyn would most certainly not have been as nearly a brutal film had it been directed by some random Hollywood hack, even if director Uli Edel is no Fassbinder nor even a Roland Klick. Essentially, while Last Exit to Brooklyn is drenched in black humor, which some American filmgoers can appreciate, Edel's film is the celluloid antithesis of what most Hollywood films stand for due to its lack of clear-cut villains and heroes, as well as its lack of a happy ending, and less than flattering and far from romantic depiction of America and American urban history. Despite all the incessant mainstream media, Hollywood, and government propaganda to the contrary, so-called 'multiculturalism' is not America's strength but its unnatural and nefarious curse and will ultimately lead to its irrevocable ruin and Last Exit to Brooklyn—a work depicting 'eclectically ethnic' NYC before the arrival of every dark shade from the third world as a result of the insidious Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965—features nothing short of a cultural and biological sewer where everywhere everyone is metaphysically cursed and trapped in some sort of figurative hell.

Ulli Lommel (1971)

Undoubtedly, it says a lot about the state of a filmmaker's career and overall reputation as an artist when an arthouse dvd company ('Arthaus') releases your first feature-length film – a work that has been rarely seen and pretty much totally inaccessible for about 40 years – with everyone's name written large on the cover except the auteur himself and such is the case with Ulli Lommel's avant-garde sci-fi flick Haytabo (1971) aka Falscher Verdacht; undoubtedly a singular and standout work in the German-born director's rather eclectic yet discordant filmmaking career. Featuring Peter Moland as a 'collaborating' director/writer and Rainer Werner Fassbinder as a peppy poet in a purple shirt, as well as many recycled cast members from the German New Wave alpha-auteur's semi-autobiographical work that was released the same year Beware of a Holy Whore (1971) including Eddie and Tanja Constantine, Hannes Fuchs, and Katrin Schaake, the exotically titled cinematic work Haytabo is an outlandish celluloid oddity that makes for a must-see work for fans of the Fass-bande. Shot on a virtually nonexistent budget of $5000 over the course of two weeks with only a mere 120 minutes of film stock to utilize, Lommel only had the opportunity to shoot one take for each scene of Haytabo, thereupon making it quite the challenge considering much of the film was improvised, which is most apparent while watching the film. Shot almost entirely in rural Bavaria during the winter season, Haytabo often feels like a postmodern psychedelic German mountain film of sorts and what Arnold Fanck might have assembled had he read some Jean-Paul Sartre, consumed a potent dose of mescaline, lost his shooting script, and become preoccupied with French existentialism as opposed to völkisch mysticism. Featuring late-1960s kraut counter-kultur icons Rainer Langhans – founder of Kommune 1 (an anti-bourgeois commune that inspired the libertine living habits of John Lennon and Yoko Ono) – and his muse Uschi Obermaier (the leftist icon of the so-called "1968 Generation" and fashion model/actress who later became Keith Richard's muse), and music ranging from Deep Purple and The Moody Blues to Vivaldi, Haytabo is an indubitably "hip" work of Science Fiction and this is coming from someone who wholeheartedly despises hippies and everything they stand for, but I cannot deny that this is a hypnotic and hallucinatory, albeit oftentimes muddled, piece of filmmaking. That being said, I do not think it would be a stretch to state that Haytabo is undoubtedly one of Lommel's most diacritic and experimental films.

Haytabo centers around a scientist/biochemist (played by Eddie Constantine – who being the star of Godard's Alphaville – was no stranger to avant-garde sci-fi) that – using the research of a professor from the 19th century – believes he is on the verge of finding the universally pondered sibylline secret for human immortality, but still is missing important information for the formula. With his wife (played by Katrin Schaake), Constantine's character "Professor" decides to take a journey to the village where the 19th century professor (played by Rainer Langhans) once did his rather revolutionary research and eventually discovers that the primordial prober is still alive, thereupon culminating into a metaphysical and philosophical 'trip' of sorts for the contemporary prof and his fair lady, the ancient sage and his extra-elderly wife, and a couple more preternatural characters that tag along in this quasi-futuristic flower child freakout flick. To make things a bit more offbeat, a space alien (played by Hannes Fuchs) – who just looks like a neo-beatnik bastard typical of that time period – also joins the motley kraut crew and helps assist them in their erratic existential journey and from there on, most of Haytabo involves the folk frolicking around on the bewitching Bavarian landscape like some sort of neoteric (for that time) Fidus-esque painting come to life. An especially notable scene from the film is when Eddie Constantine and his charming consort encounter a spastic and seemingly schizophrenic music teacher who conducts a live orchestra before the couple's bewildered eyes. Of course, Eddie and his babe have yet to realize the secret to perennial bliss is not in actual immortality, but a feeling that the curious conductor – despite his odd behavior – has already tapped into. Ultimately, Haytabo is a moral tale where quality of life is portrayed as more meaningful than quantity. Ironically, one inevitably comes to the same epiphany when comparing the lives and cinematic works of Lommel and Fassbinder.

To paraphrase the 19th professor played by white gypsy guru Rainer Langhans in a most fitting role, the ultimate message of Haytabo is: "feeling good and thus enabling everyone to feel good. That's actually everything." Of course, such a seemingly shallow and sentimental sentiment is certainly not something I can take seriously, at least in the irrational 'free spirit flower power' context of the film, but that did not stop me from digging the aesthetically-pleasing allure of Ulli Lommel's lost hippie flick Haytabo; a work that is essentially the Neuer Deutscher Film equivalent of Conrad Rooks' Chappaqua (1966), albeit less phantasmagoric and frantic, but undoubtedly just as innately incoherent. Speaking of Chappaqua, like Rooks, Lommel would also develop a spiritual bond with American Indians after his immigration to the United States, even declaring on his personal facebook page that he was, "reborn December 21, 1984 at the Apache Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico as "Dataa Shigan" meaning "First Hand", since I am the first "Pale Man" to be asked by the Apache Shaman to report from "The Front"." Of course, considering that Lommel's celluloid magnum opus is the strangely shuddersome and sexually sadistic serial killer film The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe, his most commercially successful work is the supernatural slasher flick The Boogeyman (1980), and that he works almost exclusively within the horror genre today (albeit in a notably 'professional' and artistically uncompromising manner), the tall, dark, and handsome Svengali-like figure most certainly has a down-seated darkside, which is only hinted at in Haytabo; a work that would foretell the ambient atmosphere of Cocaine Cowboys (1979) and the heterodox social and storyline structure of Absolute Evil (2008).

THE TENDERNESS OF WOLVES

Ulli Lommel (1973)

Based on the exceptionally bestial acts of pederast German serial killer Fritz Haarmann aka the Vampire of Hanover – who molested, murdered, and cannibalized upwards of 27 boys and young men between 1918 and 1924 – The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe directed by Ulli Lommel (Haytabo, The Boogeyman) and produced by Rainer Werner Fassbinder (Satan's Brew, Querelle) is undoubtedly the greatest 'horror' film of Neuer Deutscher Film. Following in the hard-to-supersede footsteps of Austrian auteur Fritz Lang's self-proclaimed masterpiece M (1931) – a work also based on the real-life murder of Haarman, but also fellow post-WWI bloodlusting serial killers Carl Großmann, Peter Kürten, and Karl Denke – The Tenderness of Wolves takes a more realist and Fassbinder-esque approach as opposed to the big-budget German expressionist aesthetic assembled by the Metropolis (1927) director. Starring Fassbinder superstar Kurt Raab (Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?, Beware of a Holy Whore) in the leading role as a bald-headed bastard Haarmann, the character bears a striking, albeit more sinister and strapping (relatively speaking), appearance to Peter Lorre's character Hans Beckert in Lang's M. Decidedly anachronistic in nature due to unavailability of costumes and props from post-WWI era, Lommel opted for setting The Tenderness of Wolves amid the debris and devastation of ground zero Germany soon after the conclusion of the Second World War, thereupon giving the film a much more nihilistic, fiercely forlorn, and overall harum-scarum feel that is more harmonious with Fassbinder's deracinated Deutschland of the socially and emotionally inharmonic than the post-empire/pre-nazi years. Of course, the most obvious and important difference between The Tenderness of Wolves and M is that, unlike Lang's work, Lommel's film is decidedly dripping with blood, but more fascinatingly yet appallingly, gratuitous and seedy scenes of exposed young male bodies, including that of a particularly venerable preteen boy. That being said, I don't think it would be a stretch to say that not only is The Tenderness of Wolves one of the most aesthetically callous portrayals of a serial killer ever captured on celluloid, but it is also the sort of film that a real-life lust-slayer would see as the most potent and gratifying of arthouse pornography. In other words, The Tenderness of Wolves is to the chickenhawk serial killer what the kiddy arthouse flick Maladolescenza (1977) directed by Pier Giuseppe Murgia is to the debauched bourgeois pedophile. Needless to say, The Tenderness of Wolves is not the sort of 'horror' film that appeals to those pedestrian horror fanatics who spend their saved up allowance money dressing up in unflatteringly fitting Michael Myers costumes and going to Friday the 13th conventions.

Like William Friedkin's Cruising (1980), Todd Verow's Frisk (1995), and Marian Dora's Cannibal (2006), The Tenderness of Wolves is the sort of uncompromising homicidal homo flick that would be especially unsettling to modern prissy political correct viewers, not just because of the serial killer's sadistic sodomite persuasion, but also the pathetic way his life; or lack thereof. Living in a terribly cramped, decrepit, and filthy apartment adorned with human bones, rancid meat, and kitschy angel paintings, Fritz Haarmann (Kurt Raab) is not exactly the most hygienic fellow, thus he has no problem butchering the tender bodies of his young prey and selling it on the black market in a manner that anticipates the cannibalistic family in Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974); a work that was released one year after Lommel's film that would do for Texas farmhouses what Lommel's did for German ghettos. Haarmann also has an opportunistic bisexual boyfriend named Hans Grans (Jeff Roden) that looks somewhat like director Ulli Lommel due to his dapper appearance and who merely uses his cannibalistic friend as a source of tasty twink patties and over black market goods. Needless to say, Haarmann is a patently pathetic pervert, thereupon giving a certain 'humanity' to his mostly chilling character and thus making The Tenderness of Wolves all the more of a vexing experience for the viewer. Like "British Jeffrey Dahmer" Dennis Nilsen, Haarmann – a cunning creature of the most bestialized yet godforsaken sort – works with law enforcement, thereupon enabling him to shield his crimes, at least for an extended, mass-murdering period of time. Considering the cops themselves have come upon hard times in post-WWII Germany, they remain absolutely apathetic towards Haarmann's proclivity for penetrating young boys as they see him, so long as the baldheaded brute provides them with the sort of petty slum policing they are looking for. In fact, Germany is so devastated and depleted by war that an Arab black marketer (played by Fassbinder's tragic Moroccan lover El Hedi ben Salem) of all people has the audacity to tell Haarman that, "Germany is kaput," which is indubitably true considering an untermensch barbarian can now bed a German woman for a package of cigarettes in a country that previously put a premium on racial eugenics only a few years before. In short, The Tenderness of Wolves does for the German New Wave what Roberto Rossellini's Germany Year Zero (1948) did for neorealism: depicting the post-war Germany in a most unsentimental light where the common man is a degraded beggar and the average woman is a worn-out whore, albeit Lommel took particular advantage of these stark circumstances – soundly synchronizing horror movie genre conventions with real-life horror – henceforth creating one of the greatest Teutonic horror flicks since, well, Fritz Lang's M.

Due to his artistic degeneration into an acutely amateur auteur of such digital diarrhea direct-to-DVD horror flicks as Zombie Nation (2004), Zodiac Killer (2005), B.T.K. Killer (2005), Green River Killer (2005), Baseline Killer (2008), and other similarly generically titled and hastily assembled, wretched works, some fans of The Tenderness of Wolves question if it was actually Fass-binder in the director's seat as he was certainly on the set of the film as both producer and a co-star. In an interview featured in the book EyeBall Compendium, Lommel states in regard to Fassbinder's contribution to the film: "He actually didn't want to make the movie himself, but he had respect for our affinity for it. He didn't want to do it and it didn't fit into his career, really, and he thought it was too controversial...What I got from Fassbinder was everyone who ever worked for Fassbinder. All the Fassbinder superstars are in this movie, except for Hanna Schygulla." Indeed, after re-watching The Tenderness of Wolves not long ago, as well as some of Lommel's later works Cocaine Cowboys (1979), Blank Generation (1980), The Devonsville Terror (1983), and Strangers in Paradise (1984) and a marathon of Fassbinder's movies, there is no doubt in my mind that the arthouse-turned-shithouse auteur directed it. On top of being more gory, gritty and downright vulgar – traits that dominate Lommel's contemporary films, although in a rather retrogressive manner – than anything Fassbinder has ever directed, The Tenderness of Wolves lacks the sort of signature naked melodrama that even predominates in the Fox and His Friends (1975) director's lesser works. A malicious and oftentimes misanthropic cinematic work of vicious aesthetic and thematic vulgarity, The Tenderness of Wolves is probably the only German New Wave flick that did for horror what Fassbinder's films did for melodrama: unshrouding the collective soul of a defeated, dehumanized, and demoralized nation, which Lommel's friend/producer Marian Dora would continue with Cannibal (2006) and The Angel's Melancholia (2009) aka Melancholie Der Engel. I might be a tad bit optimistic, but maybe its about time Ulli Lommel goes back to the Fatherland and returns to his artistic roots, as the murderous mystique of cock-chomping cannibal Armin Meiwes and aberrant Austrian Aryan Josef Fritzl beckons....

COCAINE COWBOYS

Although almost a total and abject failure as a would-be audacious auteur that, aside from possibly Uwe Boll, is probably considered the worst German filmmaker who ever lived, few film directors can boast a career as interesting and diverse as Ulli Lommel (Adolf and Marlene, Diary of a Cannibal). Beginning his long and relatively fruitful (if thoroughly rotten) career as a promising protégé of German New Wave auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder and starring in his directorial debut Love is Colder than Death (1969) among some 20+ other film collaborations, Lommel eventually helmed the director's chair and found critical and artistic success with his third film – the Neuer Deutscher Film horror classic The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe; an extremely loose remake/tribute to German expressionist Fritz Lang's serialkiller masterpiece M (1931) that was based on the real-life murders of putrid cannibalistic pedophile Fritz Haarmann. Unfortunately, The Tenderness of Wolves would prove to be Lommel's greatest film, which has led some people to speculate that the crudely carnal and cruel cinematic work was ghost-directed by Fassbinder (who on top of appearing in the film, also acted as its producer). The year 1977 marked the beginning of the end as far as Lommel's artistic integrity was concerned, as the filmmaker moved to the United States and hooked up with none other than pop-con-artist Andy Warhol, who produced the German director's films Cocaine Cowboys (1979) and Blank Generation (1980); two films centering around then-popular music subcultures. While neither film features the uncompromising direction and eventual cult status The Tenderness of Wolves would obtain, the paralleling story behind Cocaine Cowboys is interesting nonetheless, so much so that it is actually stranger and more captivating than the movie itself. Featuring inane weirdo Warhol as himself and eternal bad boy of the silver screen Jack Palance (Contempt aka Le Mépris, City Slickers) as a mafia-connected music manager in a film about cocaine-smuggling rock stars, Cocaine Cowboys is a film that sounds much better than it actually is. Filmed on location at Warhol's panoramic seaside manor located on Montauk, Long Island, Cocaine Cowboys is soulless yet a sparingly entertaining example of life reflecting artless cinematic art and vice versa.

While working on post-production for his monotonous punk flick Blank Generation starring punk icon Richard Hell, Ulli Lommel was approached by his passive collaborator Andy Warhol to meet a young millionaire named Tom Sullivan at Studio 54 who was keen on making an inherently narcissistic, self-glorifying movie focusing on his unknown band and rebellious angel dust-slinging lifestyle as a scantily charismatic cocaine cowboy. Needless to say, Lommel obliged and instead of creating anything resembling a script, the German filmmaker used his dubious reputation as a profound European 'artiste' and assembled a hurried, brief story on a tape recorder for what would be Cocaine Cowboys, which started shooting a mere week later. Unbeknownst to Lommel, Sullivan made his millions, including the funding for the film, by smuggling cocaine on the international black market. While in the middle of the shooting for Cocaine Cowboys, Warhol's estate was raided by FBI and DEA agents because they thought the film was a front for a major cocaine operation, which – judging by the film's made-over-a-weekend quintessence and lack of coherence – may have been true, but, naturally, Lommel wholeheartedly denies it. Not one to hold a grudge, Lommel offered the officers roles in the playing their con-catching selves, which they happily obliged. In Cocaine Cowboys, it is the always quietly conspiring Andy Warhol of all people who uncovers the operation by mere chance while passively taking a series of Polaroids in what is probably his greatest, if stereotypically lackluster, screen performance. In the film, Destin (Tom Sullivan) and his manager Raphael (Jack Palance) – the frontman of an up-and-coming rock band and a major drug trafficker – wishes to get him and his bands out of the cocaine business, but they must do one more big deal before they can permanently sever ties with the Italian mob. When the band loses $2 million dollars worth of coke in a totally nonsensical way (the film has more than one plot hole), they must scramble to find the drugs as angry Cosa Nostra henchmen encircle Warhol's plush waterfront pad. Throughout Cocaine Cowboys, the band members roam the beach on their horses as degenerate contemporary cowboys. Instead of being Easy Rider (1969) with its promise of sly and cool cocktail of Sex & Drugs & Rock & Roll, Cocaine Cowboys is ultimately a post-hippie abortion of the ceaselessly aimless kind, but then again, for such a soulless era of vacant cock rock, masturbatory guitar solos, unimpassioned sex, unruly drug abuse, and bird-brained haircuts, the film – whether intentional or not – is a reflection of that particularly repugnant zeitgeist, thus making it an innately lackadaisical, bromidic, and superficially stylized cinematic artifact from a thankfully bygone but still influential era.

Ulli Lommel and Andy Warhol on the set of Cocaine Cowboys (1979)

Not long after completing Cocaine Cowboys, Ulli Lommel received a phone call from its star and financier Tom Sullivan asking if he could borrow $10 thousand dollars from the German director. Of course, Lommel turned him down and would later find out not much longer after the call that the once-successful cocaine cowboy died destitute in a Brooklyn gutter like a common hobo at the ripe age of 23, thus starkly contrasting the determinedly debauched dead-end lifestyle he sought to glorify in Cocaine Cowboys; a film that is almost as equally forgotten as the would-be rock star anti-hero is. Seemingly an opportunist who merely wanted to direct whatever films he could, Lommel subsequently displayed the sort of music he really loved with the highly personal sci-fi musical Strangers in Paradise (1984); the director's vaguely punk equivalent of Brian De Palma's Phantom of the Paradise (1974) about a German hypnotist (played by Lommel) that is cryogenically frozen to escape Hitler, only to be thawed out by a group of Californian Reaganites. Of course, Lommel scored his greatest American hit with the 'video nasty' The Boogeyman (1980) and subsequently went on to direct a series of irredeemably horrible direct-to-video horror flicks and the rest is history, although the filmmaker did temporarily return to Germany and the music world with the downright deplorable digital diarrhea work Daniel – Der Zauberer (2004) aka Daniel – The Wizard; a film starring Bavarian pop-trash-icon Daniel Küblböck of whom the German director described as: "I know that from my childhood: In Germany we were taught this way: You must not do certain things. You have to behave yourself. And now there is Daniel and he isn't willing to take those fixed bourgeois roles. He creates his own role. He breaks taboos, makes himself up, dresses like a girl. He cries, is clownish, is hysterical. For short: He doesn't behave himself. And because he does this in public, I think some consider this as a salvation and love him and others can't bear this and hate him." Indeed, on top of trying to capitalize off of Küblböck's less than glorious newfound infamy, it seems that Lommel also found a kindred spirit in the contemptible German celebrity. I, for one, know that no matter how uniquely unbearable and unwatchable Lommel's films are, I can't help but liking the loony kraut and following his singularly stagnating filmmaking career.

COCAINE COWBOYS

BLANK GENERATION

Paul Morrissey (Flesh, Blood for Dracula) is not the only filmmaker alpha-pop-con-artist Andy Warhol worked with during his somewhat passive, if not singular, filmmaking career. Aside from his amateur filmmaker boyfriend Danny Williams, who the artist pushed into suicide as disturbingly depicted in the rather incriminating documentary A Walk Into the Sea: Danny Williams and the Warhol Factory (2007) directed by Esther Robinson (Williams' niece), Warhol also had his boyfriend Jed Johnson (who was an interior designer and protégé of Morrissey and would later die in the TWA Flight 800 explosion) direct the final Factory film, the Waters-esque black comedy Andy Warhol's Bad (1977), yet there is another auteur he worked with that is often forgotten. Undoubtedly, the most seemingly unlikely filmmaker Warhol worked with was German actor turned auteur Ulli Lommel (Haytabo, The Boogeyman), who started working with the pop-pop-artist after receiving acclaim for his dark arthouse horror masterpiece Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (1973) aka The Tenderness of Wolves, cutting his ties with his longtime collaborator Rainer Werner Fassbinder, and moving to the United States in 1977. Apparently, Warhol was a fan of The Tenderness of Wolves and offered to produce Lommel's next film, or as the Teutonic auteur stated himself: "When the New York Times wrote in 1977 that "Tenderness of the Wolves" reminded them of Andy Warhol's work, only better, Andy attended the next screening and after the movie we met and he asked me what my plans were. I invented a love story at dinner with Warhol, Truman Capote and Jacki Kennedy called 'Blank Generation.'" Indeed, for a moment during the late-1970s/early-1980s, Lommel was Warhol's "soup du jour" and produced two of his films, Cocaine Cowboys (1979) and Blank Generation (1980), which would ultimately become two of the most nihilistic and idiosyncratic cult rock films ever made, as unintentionally damning documents of post-counter-culture American youth movements as seen from a voyeuristic Teutonic gaze. Needless to say, neither of these films are masterpieces, but they are certainly among Lommel's most interesting and experimental works, with Blank Generation being the most ambitious and artistically successful of the two films. Mixing Richard Hell & The Voidoids with Mozart and Beethoven and featuring a love story between punk rocker Richard Hell and French arthouse actress Carole Bouquet (That Obscure Object of Desire, Day of the Idiots), Blank Generation is a curious and then cutting edge mix of high and low kultur (aka European and American culture) that reminds one how absurd American cultural hegemony is considering krauts were creating great symphonies for European royalty centuries ago while American punk rockers were composing two minute songs with three power chords riffs for urban sub-prole rabble during the late-1970s/early-1980s. Named after the debut 1977 Richard Hell & The Voidoids album of the same name, Blank Generation has been routinely attacked since its release by its star Richard Hell—a mischling Jew who grew up in Kentucky and was a major influence on punk (non)fashion—who once stated of the film that, “there’s not a single authentic, truthful moment in the movie.” Personally, I could say the same thing about Mr. Hell’s music, but that is beside the point, as punk rock is merely a background to a dejecting arthouse romance directed by a man who was then in a relationship with the lead actress, Carole Bouquet, who personifies what one might describe as a mentally perturbed woman of the hysterical, detached and hopelessly scatter-brained sort who does not know what she wants. Lommel’s most ‘Godardian’ work (the director even goes so far as name-dropping the frog commie auteur), Blank Generation is like Wim Wenders’ Alice in the Cities (1974) meets Steven Soderbergh’s Sex, Lies, and Videotape (1989) with a tinge of Andrzej Zulawski’s Possession (1981), albeit set in a fashion-obsessed and emotionally and culturally vapid punk world where no one has a soul.

Opening in Times Square with a giant glowing billboard featuring the film’s title (Lommel would also use this somewhat alluring technique for Cocaine Cowboys), Blank Generation immediately attempts to give an almost mystical feel to New York City, as if one is about to enter a magical fantasy world not unlike The Wizard of Oz (1939), yet the film ultimately attempts to blur the line between fiction and reality, as a sort of punk rock equivalent to Godard’s Masculin Féminin (1966), albeit about the children of Sid Vicious and poorly painted Campbell’s Soup Cans instead of Marx and Coca-Cola. Overly emotional proto-emo-fag Billy (Richard Hell) has just started a relationship with a French filmmaker named Nada (Carole Bouquet) that he met while she was filming a documentary for French TV about him and his punk band. Right from the get go, it seems like Nada is quasi-possessed by some kind of frigid frog demon that hates men, as she almost instantaneously starts fighting with him, thus causing him to complain, “We’re together for 5 minutes and you start fighting.” Meanwhile, Billy is getting fed up with being a popular punk frontman and decides to walk off stage during the middle of a performance, fire his manager Jack (Howard Grant), and complain that he is “fed up” with the whole rock star lifestyle. Billy’s manager later gives him the following ultimatum: “You got two choices: life with a French girl or platinum records. I’ve also got to remind you that you signed a number of contracts.” Needless to say, born loser Billy chooses the French girl and moronically sells all the rights to his lyrics/songs for a measly $5000. Nada calls him stupid for selling his music rights for such a pathetic amount and subsequently dumps him in a cold and antisocial fashion by leaving a ‘video letter’ where she states that he is “driving her crazy” and she is “not the right woman” for him, concluding the tape with the following words: “forget this tape...it shows the beginning and end of an impossible dream.” Indeed, Billy’s punk rock dream is degenerating into a lovesick nightmare. Meanwhile, a German journalist from Hamburg named Hoffritz (Ulli Lommel) arrives in NYC to interview Andy Warhol and Nada immediately goes to him and they start a less than romantic relationship, thus siring a more banal than bizarre love triangle. One day after a show, Billy is followed around by an annoying punk would-be-filmmaker named Lizzy Liebenfeld (Suzanna Love), who claims to be making a pretentious documentary on “episodic film on chance.” Since Lizzy looks vaguely like Nada, Billy somewhat humors her company, though he embarrasses her by taking her wig off and smearing her makeup in a pathetic attempt to make her resemble his French ex-girlfriend. Billy also describes to Lizzy how cold and whimsical Nada was during their brief relationship, complaining, “When she was really interested, she would never say so [...] it was like it had nothing to do with us personally...she’d make the most intimate moments look like business [...] When she finally left, she didn’t talk to me...she said goodbye on a tape, in close-up on herself, and just vanished.” Lizzy speculates that Nada might still be in NYC, so Billy goes looking for her and soon finds her, symbolically giving her a blank tape for her birthday. Meanwhile, Nada’s kraut journalist boyfriend Hoffritz is about to conduct an interview with Warhol, but a goofy queer guy with flashing goggles who calls himself “Andy’s Assistant” shows up instead and begins playing discordant melodies on an electric violin. When Warhol finally does show up, Nada interviews him for TV, asking him in sub-literate English, “I’d like to know what you think about the sentence of Godard who says that cinema is a place for crime and magic,” to which the pop-artist replies while tripping over virtually every word he says: “Ummmm...Well, I still don’t understand the crime part of the question but, uh, I always think it...about the magic part of the question is when, uh, it really it shows, uh, magic, you know? And when, especially people...some people have that magic that when a camera goes on you...there’s an extra energy or something...for some people, you know, beautiful people...it makes such a difference and when they can get that extra magic on the screen, I don’t understand it but it happens.” After mumbling out his answer in a marvelously mundane and monotone fashion, Warhol asks to take a photo of Nada so he can add it to his growing Polaroid collection. In the end, Nada decides to leave NYC with Hoffritz, though she gets Billy to drive her to the airport. At the last minute, Nada decides to leave Hoffritz and stay with Billy in NYC, but the punker is already gone. In the end, chance and mere unfortunate circumstances dissolve a passionate, if not destined to be doomed, love affair.

For anyone familiar with Blank Generation and its history, it is well known that star Richard Hell absolutely loathes both the film and director Ulli Lommel, with the punk rocker confessing in an interview featured in the book Destroy All Movies!!! The Complete Guide to Punks on Film (2010) that he more or less tried to sabotage the film with a poor acting performance, stating: “I got so disgusted that my method of dealing with it was just to kind of go passive. Like passive resistance. I just would not let any expression into anything I did. And it all really was just completely inappropriate. Nothing that happens from one minute to the next—including the dialogue—makes sense. Again, it's all non-sequiturs. It's ludicrous [...] None of it has any relationship to anything that could ever happen in real life." Apparently, Hell was originally very interested in starring in the film after seeing Lommel's masterpiece The Tenderness of Wolves, but he ultimately found the director's European style of filmmaking intolerable, complaining: "The only thing I could see that he brought from Fassbinder was this bitchiness and this glory in getting petty little feuds started, playing on people's insecurities on the set. That was something Fassbinder was famous for...this queeny, bitchy cliché gay world. It may not be politically correct to say that, but it's just a face. And in Fassbinder's hands, it resulted in some amazing movies, but it's pretty ugly to me as a world. I didn't like being part of that way of dealing with other people, insulting them all the time and playing them against each other. It's kind of like the Warhol Factory world a bit. I felt pretty immune to it because I just thought it was annoying and I wouldn't buy into it, but that was his style." When the interviewer of Destroy All Movies!!! offered to edit out what Hell said about Lommel, the resentful punk responded by stating, "I don't think I'd edit anything out about Lommel, though...he's a real low life." When Lommel was interviewed for the same book, he only had good things to say about Mr. Hell, stating regarding his interest in making Blank Generation and the NYC punk rock scene: "I spent lots of time at CBGBs with Andy Warhol, watching the Ramones and Blondie. And then came Richard Hell and I fell in love with his poetry. And I was a big fan of the Sex Pistols and I also hung out with William S. Burroughs, the first punk of them all. I lived at the Chelsea Hotel in Manhattan, the punk rock hotel."

Personally, after watching the film for the third time (it is certainly more enjoyable on subsequent viewings), I have to side with Lommel, as he may not have depicted Hell in a totally realistic fashion, but he certainly did a decent job portraying the emotional and cultural bankruptcy of the moronically nihilistic scene Richard Hell & The Voidoids belonged to, as a work that demystifies pre-hardcore NYC punk. Indeed, as someone who grew up on hardcore punk groups like Black Flag and Minor Threat, I find Hell's contribution to the genre to be little more than a superficial (and rather degenerate) fashion statement. You know a guy is not too interesting when a borderline autistic fellow like Andy Warhol, who only makes a mere cameo in the film, shows him up in terms of charisma and intellectual depth. Additionally, while I found the songs by Richard Hell & The Voidoids to seem more like terribly degenerate traditional rock music than revolutionary and truly subversive punk rock, I must praise Elliot Goldenthal, who would later earn an Academy Award for his contribution to Frida (2002), for his rather ethereal and angelic musical score. A work of vaguely melancholy meta-cinema where a young female frog filmmaker literally lives her life through a camera because she lacks the emotional courage to deal with real-life love and romance, as well as a playful piece of cult cinema history featuring arguably the greatest screen performance ever given by Andy Warhol as himself and director Ulli Lommel playing an arrogant kraut, Blank Generation is pretentious self-reflexive cinema at its least pretentious, as an uneven, if not sometimes intriguing and curious, marriage between Godard and punk rock. Somewhat recently, auteur Lommel wrote, "The two movies that keep me company to this very day are "Tenderness of the Wolves" and "Blank Generation". The first one brought me to Warhol and the other one celebrates my collaboration with him." Indeed, it was only natural that there would be a link made between Warhol and Fassbinder, as both men mastered the art of celluloid Superstars and Factory style communal filmmaking. Of course, no one would ever suspect it would be a rampant heterosexual (who not only shared carnal pleasures with Carole Bouquet, but also Godard's muse Anna Karina, Margit Carstensen, and countless other screen beauties as well) that would establish the historical link between the two revolutionary filmmakers.

THE BOOGEYMAN

Ulli Lommel (1980)

While German actor-turned-auteur Ulli Lommel (Haytabo, Cocaine Cowboys) never received the same singular fame or fortune as his former collaborator Rainer Werner Fassbinder, he did manage to make it to Hollywood to create a somewhat 'successful' horror franchise that started with the highly derivative yet paradoxically strange The Boogey Man (1980) aka The Boogeyman, an international hit that made $25 million worldwide despite its mere $300,000 budget and also had the honor of making the UK's 'Video Nasties' list and spawning two sequels. Made directly after Lommel moved from Deutschland to the United States and collaborated with Andy Warhol on two cult flicks, Cocaine Cowboys (1979) and Black Generation (1980), The Boogeyman was mostly filmed in bumfuck Southern Maryland, undoubtedly one of the last places one would expect a Fassbinder superstar to end up. Co-written and starring Lommel's then-wife, DuPont heiress turned actress Suzanna Love (Olivia, The Devonville Terror), who made a number of films with the director the decade or so when the two were still married, The Boogeyman is a no-budget supernatural horror film of sorts that was made in the wake of the success of John Carpenter's Halloween (1978), but also displays discernible influence from The Exorcist (1978) and The Amityville Horror (1979). Directed by the man behind what is arguably the greatest horror film of German New Cinema, Tenderness of the Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe—a work co-starring and produced by Fassbinder based on real-life Weimar era cocksucker kraut serial killer Fritz Haarmann—The Boogeyman was certainly a career changing work for Lommel in that it not only made him a lot of money and set him up in Hollywood, but it is the first work where he shed his European arthouse cred and became forever pigeonholed as a horror hack and director of artistically unmerited celluloid junk, which is rather unfortunate for a man who worked with Fassbinder and Warhol and who directed a delightfully diacritic and decadent horror masterpiece like Tenderness of the Wolves.

Indeed, I would be lying if I tried to pass off The Boogeyman as anything aside from semi-supernatural quasi-schlock, yet the film has a certain crude charm to it as a work directed by a deracinated kraut who seems to have next to nil interest in the horror genre as a whole. Centering around one of Lommel's self-proclaimed favorite themes—childhood trauma and how such traumas haunt one for the rest of their lives—The Boogeyman is also a somewhat cryptically personal work for the director as a man who came of age in war torn Germany, stating of his less than ideal birth in Berlin in December 1944, "It was 20 degrees below zero. My mother wrapped me in a carpet because she had no blanket. Around us other babies were dying. Yet I survived, and ever since I always seem to find myself in the eye of the storm." After meeting and living next door to Elvis Presley, whose rock music ‘liberated’ the director and inspired rebellion in him, Lommel ran away from home at the mere age of 16 in what would be a life-changing and somewhat tragic experience that created an irreparable rift with the filmmaker’s father. As revealed in an interview in June 2012 conducted by Rory MacLean for the Goethe Institute London, Lommel’s father Ludwig Manfred Lommel—a rather famous German radio comedian who was described as the ‘German Charlie Chaplin’ and who was quite popular during the Weimar and National Socialist periods—called the cops on his son after he ran away from home, and when the angst-ridden 16 year old found out, he telephoned him and yelled “How could you do this to me, you old Nazi?” in what would be the last words he ever said to his father. In The Boogeyman, the themes of childhood trauma and a nasty irreparable break with one’s parents are explored in a most brutal supernatural fashion in its depiction of a killer mirror, thus expressing in a cryptic way the pain that Lommel undoubtedly laments on via the unlikely form of seemingly nonsensical cult horror.

As depicted at the beginning of The Boogeyman, when they were mere tiny tots, siblings Willy and Lacey watched through an outside window their masochistic and alcohol-addled mother having sadomasochistic sex with her degenerate boyfriend, and when the two loony lovers finally noticed the two child peeping toms, the boyfriend savagely gagged and tied the little boy to a bed. In a Michael Myers-esque revenge, Willy stabbed to death his mother’s boyfriend via a butcher knife after his sister untied him from the bed. Unfortunately, aside from being the one who untied her brother, thus acting as an involuntary accessory to the bloody butchering of her mother’s batshit crazy boy toy, Lacey actually witnessed the killing in a mirror and the reflection will prove to haunt her—both literally and figuratively—for the rest of her life. Flash forward twenty years later and Lacey (Suzanna Love) is married to a cop named Jake (Ron James) and has a young son of her own. Unfortunately, Willy (played by Suzanna Love’s real-life brother Nicholas Love) did not grow up to be as ‘well adjusted’ as his sis as he has been a mute ever since he committed the murder and now does menial labor at a farm owned by his Aunt Helen (Felicite Morgan) where his sister and her family also lives. Since Lacey has never gotten over the night that her brother brutally murdered her lecherous mother’s boyfriend, she has horrible nightmares where she is stalked with a knife and tied to a bed like her bro Willy once was, so, at the recommendation of her loving hubby Jake, she decides to consult a psychiatrist named Dr. Warren (John Carradine, whose son David Carradine would later star in Lommel’s Absolute Evil – Final Exit (2009)) so she can deal with and confront her irrational fears. After speaking with the psychiatrist and going through hypnosis, Lacey, with the help of her husband, decides to go visit her mother, who she has not seen since the murder, as well as the flashback-inducing house where she grew up in that has haunted her for entire life.

THE BOOGEYMAN

When Lacey arrives at her quaint childhood home, she and her husband Jake talk with the new family living there and everything seems alright until the young mother sees the reflection of her mother's dead boyfriend in a mirror upstairs and panics, smashing the mirror in the process with a chair. Rather absurdly, Jake has the bright idea to keep the broken mirror (with the consent of the owners, of course), including all the shattered glass, in an attempt to get his wife to get over her fear and the two leave to go back home with it, but a piece of the mirror is left behind, which glows red and, in no time, an unseen metaphysical force brutally slaughters the entire family living in Lacey's old childhood home. Meanwhile, seemingly autistic Willy begins to paint all the mirrors at his family's farmhouse black and after seeing his reflection in a mirror in a barn, he strangles a female friend of his sister who tries to get in his pants, almost killing her in the process. When Lacey and her hubby get home, Jake puts all the pieces of the mirror back together, but a couple pieces get loose, ultimately resulting in the darkly romantic deaths of a teenage couple on a nearby beach after Lacey's son's shoe, which contains a shard of glass from the mirror, shines in the teen lovers' direction. When Jake finally becomes convinced the mirror is evil, they have the family priest, Father Reilly (Llewelyn Thomas), come by to see if an evil spirit haunts the broken mirror and sure enough, Lacey and Willy's Uncle Ernest (Bill Rayburn) is killed after taking a flying pitchfork to the throat and not long after, Aunt Helen is found strangled to death with a hose wrapped around her corpse. After Father Reilly touches the broken mirror, it turns the entire room red and a shard of glass magically flies off, landing on Lacey's eye and she becomes possessed with the sinister spirit of her slutty mommy's dead lover. Eventually, husband Jake is burned up when the shard of glass covering Lacey's eye projects a neo green laser beam onto him and Father Reilly, taking a lesson from The Exorcist, pulls out a cheap toy-like crucifix and waves it in the possessed pretty girl's face in a lackluster attempt to exorcise the S&M-inclined evil spirit from her soul. Luckily, Father Reilly manages to get the sinister shard of glass out of Lacey's possessed peeper, but he dies as a result of his effort, and Willy and Jake throw the rest of the smashed looking glass in a well. In the end, Willy finally gets over his acute autism and begins to talk again for the first time in twenty years and he and his sister visit the tombstone of their deceased aunt and uncle, but a red shard of glass shines in the cemetery as they leave, thus hinting at a The Boogeyman sequel.

Indeed, thus far there have been two sequels to The Boogeyman, including The Boogeyman 2 (1980), which was co-directed (albeit by Ulli Lommel), and Return of the Boogeyman (1994) aka Boogeyman 3, for which Lommel was an uncredited co-director and for which about half of the film was comprised of recycled footage from the original The Boogeyman film, not to mention the insertion of a bathtub murder scene from the director's cult horror flick Brain-Waves (1983) aka Shadow of Death. On top of that, Lommel released a 'director's cut' of The Boogeyman 2 in 2003 entitled Boogeyman 2: The Directors Cut aka Bogeyman 2 – Redux with approximately 90% of the footage being from the original The Boogeyman, in between glaring shot-on-video pseudo-documentary footage of the director pretending to talk to police in a room that is clearly his own house (as Lommel revealed in an interview, most of the original cut of The Boogeyman 2 was actually shot at his house!). Interestingly, in a recent interview, Lommel revealed that junky queer 'literary outlaw' William S. Burroughs helped him edit The Boogeyman, so one can only wonder if the novelist's 'cut-up technique' had an influence in the editing of Return of the Boogeyman and Boogeyman 2: The Directors Cut as they are both essentially rearrangements of The Boogeyman, albeit with a couple (and mostly pointless) added scenes. Lommel is also apparently working a remake currently titled The Boogeyman: Grail of Evil, as well as a fourth film entitled Boogeyman 4D, or as the auteur revealed in an interview with Soiled Sinema a couple months ago, "Next year I'm making BOOGEYMAN 4D - why 4D? It plays in the fourth dimension, Sci-Fi /Adventure genre and not R-rated but PG-13. Budget $24 million to be filmed in 3D," thus proving that The Boogeyman never really dies. Maybe it is because I grew up near the area where it was filmed and I appreciate Lommel's 'outsider' perspective on Americans, but The Boogeyman is a quasi-guilty pleasure of mine and certainly a work I regard in much more esteem than overrated supernatural schlock like The Amityville Horror, even if it not up to par with the aberrant aesthetic perniciousness of the auteur filmmaker's Teutonic serial killer masterpiece Tenderness of the Wolves. In a recent interview, Lommel confessed, "I think that art can heal" and while making The Boogeyman might not have refurbished the filmmaker's torn soul, it might have allowed him to exorcise some demons relating to his traumatic childhood as a war baby of a defeated and destroyed nation and his lack of reconciliation with his father, on top of the fact that the film made him rather wealthy. As arty and atmospheric as genre films from the late-1970s/early-1980s of the supernatural horror sort get, The Boogeyman is one of the only films to get me in the Halloween spirit this October.

OLIVIA

Ulli Lommel (1983)

Before becoming an object of hateful ridicule and scorn amongst mostly virginal American fanboys who know nothing of the filmmaker's previous career with international cinematic greats like Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Andy Warhol, German-born auteur Ulli Lommel (Adolf and Marlene, Cocaine Cowboys) directed a couple Hitchcockian thrillers with his then-wife Suzanna Love (Hair, A Smile in the Dark), a Dupont/Standard Oil heiress, after the huge success of his cult slasher flick The Boogeyman (1980). Interestingly, the best of Lommel's 1980s Hitchcock-esque erotic-thrillers, Olivia (1983) aka A Taste of Sin aka Prozzie aka Beyond the Bridge aka Mad Night aka Double Jeopardy aka Faces of Fear, was made on a whim while Lommel was getting ready to shoot Boogeyman 2 in Arizona and was shocked to discover that the 'London Bridge' was staring back at him across the Colorado River. Indeed, as Lommel would learn upon doing some research, the original 1831 London Bridge, which spanned the River Thames in London, England, was dismantled stone-by-stone in 1967 and reconstructed in Lake Havasu City, Arizona in 1971. Seeing this as the perfect opportunity to make a film ostensibly set in London and using the bridge as a sort of metaphorical image for a film about a woman who decides to change her identity and move to another country, Lommel decided to temporarily ditch Boogeyman 2 and use the film crew for that film to shoot what would ultimately evolve into his nihilistic psychosexual thriller Olivia. Like most of Lommel's films, Olivia is a work that dwells in the misery of the past, especially in relation to a tragic event during childhood, and how it affects the future, which is certainly a personal theme for the filmmaker.

Born in 1944 in the chaos of the Second World War to Ludwig Manfred Lommel—a popular German comedian and radio personality who was sometimes described as the 'German Charlie Chaplin'—Lommel ultimately became a prodigal son and decided to rebel against his father (who disapproved of his son's dream to become an actor), so he quit school and ran away from him to seek a new and exciting life. When his concerned father called the police to help search for his son, Lommel telephoned him and yelled, "How could you do this to me, you old Nazi?" in what would ultimately be the last words he ever spoke to his papa as the comedian died three years later. Naturally, Lommel's unresolved break with his father would have an imperative influence on his work as a filmmaker and as he would later remark in an interview with Rory MacLean of Goethe Institute London regarding the importance of art: "Within every one of us is a painter, a dancer, a storyteller. I believe that if every individual's artistic side was nurtured at school, it could channel much frustration and anger, and change the way people live their lives. Change even the way a potential serial killer might have lived his life. Maybe this is just an illusion. But I really do believe that art heals.” Indeed, it is probably for the better that Lommel never became a sadistic serial killer and instead opted for directing one of the greatest kraut psycho-killer films ever made, The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe. A stylish reworking of Hitchcock’s Vertigo (1958) inspired by the shadowy yet kaleidoscopic and mirror-obsessed camera work of Fassbinder’s cinematographer Michael Ballhaus (who, like Lommel, would leave Germany and make Hollywood his new home), Olivia is the unsettling and equally unhinged story of a young woman who witnessed the brutal slaying of her prostitute mother while a young child and now hears voices from said dead prostitute mother telling her to kill. Trapped in a nightmarish marriage with an abusive rapist husband who will not let her get a job, the eponymous antihero decides to start prostituting herself around the London Bridge and in between killing unsuspecting Johns, she falls in love with a successful American man, thus ushering her attempt to fully reinvent herself and begin a new life.

While just a wee little girl, London native Olivia—the bastard child of an American and an English hooker—witnesses her working-girl mother (Bibbe Hansen) being brutally murdered at the hands of an American soldier (Nicholas Love) during a game of bondage gone terribly wrong. Flash forward 15 years later, Olivia (Suzanna Love) is now in figurative bondage as the unhappy housewife a control-freak, rape-obsessed husband who won’t even let her get a job as a mere bar maid. To pass the time, Olivia looks with almost envy as local streetwalkers peddle their fleshy goods around the London Bridge and after hearing voices from her dead mother persuading her to peddle her puss, the unemployed housewife becomes a hooker as well, but she is more interested in the metaphysical side of blood and mayhem than mere material cash-money. After brutally murdering a strangle fellow with a bizarre mannequin fetish straight out of Maniac (1980) starring Joe Spinell, Olivia goes on a random ‘date’ with a charming and considerate American gentleman named Mike Grant (Robert Walker Jr.) and the two make passionate love. Indeed, for the first time in her decidedly deplorable existence, Olivia feels true love and empathy, thereupon giving her a totally new outlook on life. Of course, all hell breaks loose when Olivia’s husband discovers his wife’s affair with the quasi-ugly American. While attempting to murder Mike, Olivia’s husband falls to his death from the London Bridge, or so the viewer assumes. Traumatized by the series of events, Olivia runs away from her true love Mike into the night and eventually starts a new life by moving to America and taking on a new identity as a blonde and sophisticated quasi-feminist babe. Flash forward four years later after that deadly night in London, Mike spots what seems to be Olivia’s doppelganger working as a successful Arizona realtor. Like Jimmy Stewart in Vertigo, Mike obsessively stalks the Olivia-look-alike and tries his damndest to get her to open up to him, which she eventually does with a bit of reluctance. Eventually, Olivia reveals her true identity to Mike and the two make passionate love all around the latter’s home. In a tragic twist, Olivia's husband is magically revealed to be alive after all and he wastes no time in brutally murdering Mike and subsequently raping his wife once again. In the end, Olivia gets the strength to murder her equally homicidal hubby, but nothing will repair the damage that has been done her fragile mind and forsaken soul.

In an interview featured on the Image Entertainment dvd release of Olivia, auteur Ulli Lommel states: "I think the big difference between Hitchcock and the way I make movies is definitely... Hitchcock has the audience in mind and I, for my films, never have the audience in mind." Indeed, Olivia certainly concludes too cynically and depressingly for the average American viewer as a film that is ultimately more nasty and nihilistic than Lommel's German New Cinema horror masterpiece The Tenderness of Wolves. In fact, Olivia was such a personal work for Lommel that he ended up hiring and firing eight cinematographers before deciding to become director of photography himself. While going on the record as stating that Olivia is his "most favorite movie of the 80s," the film would ultimately bankrupt the auteur and probably help sire the 'slippery slope' that plagued the rest of his filmmaking career. Indeed, as a man who went so far as directing a scene featuring Robert Walker Jr. of Easy Rider (1969) fame performing cunnilingus on his wife, Lommel was certainly not screwing around when he made Olivia. As to the reason why the auteur has made a filmmaking career out of depicting debased and deranged individuals in the tradition of Peter Lorre's character from Fritz Lang's M (1931), Lommel stated, "Since my childhood I've felt uneasy with the demonizing of an enemy. In my work I find myself standing up for the outsider, the accused. Again and again I want to understand their perspective," and Olivia does just that as a rare cinematic work that dares to empathize with a female psycho-killer. Indeed, while not exactly an unsung masterpiece, Olivia certainly goes farther than Hitchcock in terms of psychosexual sickness and makes the films of Brian De Palma seem like soft-core Hitchcockian celluloid bubblegum filled with artificial flavoring. In other words, Olivia was clearly directed by a troubled man with a lot of pent up hatred, acute internal pain, and a seemingly strong fetish for sadomasochism and bondage. Not unlike Fassbinder's early masterpiece The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), Olivia is an obscured autobiography of the transsexualized sort featuring an antihero who, like Lommel himself, is plagued by a childhood trauma relating to the parent of the same sex, so she tries to move to a new country and "assumes another identity hoping the future will be better than the past" (Lommel's words, not mine). While Olivia certainly did not rid herself of her inner demons and achieve the American dream upon moving to the United States, Lommel did not seem to do half bad as he outlived both his masters, Fassbinder and Warhol, and can at least say he has lived a totally singular life as a man born at a time when most of the babies of his nation were starving to death. Arguably Lommel's greatest post-Warhol flick, Olivia and the director's other Hitchcockian flick BrainWaves (1983) aka Shadow of Death certainly make welcome exceptions to the banality of slasher schlock and swill typical of the 1980s.

STRANGERS IN PARADISE

Ulli Lommel (1984)

Without a doubt, the musical is my least favorite film genre, in part due its similar conventions with the fundamentally artless film classification of pornography. After all, both film formats typically feature a minor plot and/or storyline as a weak backbone for holding together what is designed for cheap thrills. Of course, my main reasons for loathing musicals so much are their overall aesthetic unpleasantness for the eyes and ears as a source of sickening sensory overload, coupled with grating second hand embarrassment for the cartoonish performers with their superficial shit-eating grins and distinctly deranged puffer dancing, so naturally I never thought I would find even the remotest bit of merit in a melodious sing-a-long movie by Ulli Lommel (Adolf and Marlene, Cocaine Cowboys) of all people. Undoubtedly one of his most ambitious and personal works, Lommel's politically-charged yet unpretentious sci-fi musical Strangers in Paradise (1984) aka Rock America aka The Hypnotist is a film about a talented yet somewhat contemptuous hypnotist named Dr. Jonathan Sage (played by Ulli Lommel himself) who has himself cryogenically frozen after Adolf Hitler (also played by Lommel) offers him the job of providing his marvelous mesmerist skills to use against enemies of the Third Reich. About 40-years later, Mr. Sage is defrosted by a group of rabid and conspiring Reaganites who hope to utilize his hypnotizing talents as a magical means to radically reform socially subversive types, thereupon turning homos into heteros, punks into preps, prostitutes into puritans, etc. Totally ignorant of contemporary societal trends, habits, and mores due to his prolonged hibernation, Sage is ill-equipped to deal with technology of the modern world and soon, even he – a talented magus – is brought under the nefarious narcotizing spell of television. As he is told by a friend shortly after his reawakening that in regard to TV, “there was once a time when it imitated life, now life imitates TV” as everyone now seems to be a groveling slave of the videodrome. But as Sage states quietly immediately after awaking from his solitary slumber, quoting Edgar Allan Poe, “all that we see or seem... is just a dream within a dream.” Comprised of a variety musical numbers written by Moonlight Drive aka William Pettyjohn (a The Doors cover band) that schizophrenically shift between chic “progressive” music (rock ‘n’ roll psychedelic, punk, new wave, etc.) and “backwards” traditional music (country, folk, etc.), Strangers in Paradise is a lighthearted tribute to the mongrolized kultur and people of a country that Ulli Lommel would eventually call home.

The son of Ludwig Manfred Lommel – a popular comedic performer and radio personality who was once regarded as the “Charlie Chaplin of Germany” and whose popularity reached its peak during the Nazi era – Ulli Lommel certainly does not share his father's political persuasion, especially when one considers that the protagonist of Strangers in Paradise not only refuses a prestigious position utilizing his talents for the benefit of National Socialist Germany, but goes as far as having himself frozen, henceforth literally and figuratively freezing his life and gambling with his fate. As someone who sponsored the building of a veteran home for disabled German soldiers and helped form a relief organization for Germanic Silesians who had been expelled from Poland by communists after World War II, Ludwig Lommel was certainly not someone who was ashamed for being a purported 'Nazi' and patriot of sorts. As for Ulli Lommel – a Teuton who somehow managed to rid himself of most of his German accent less than a decade after emigrating to the United States and who has made a number of films attacking Nazism (Adolf and Marlene, Strangers in Paradise, Eva Braun: Her Life with Adolf Hitler) – he is not exactly a man who is loyal to the Fatherland like his national hero father (who was awarded the Officer's Cross, or Merit Cross 1st Class during his 65th birthday). In Lommel's 'lost-masterpiece' Adolf and Marlene, German traitor Marlene Dietrich (played by Fassbinder Superstar Margit Carstensen) gives Uncle Adolf (played by Kurt Raab; star of Lommel's 1973 horror masterpiece The Tenderness of Wolves) hell, but in Strangers in Paradise, Lommel as Jonathan Sage – who initially is happy to turn gay Californians into heterosexuals, but has a change of heart after realizing that boi's just wanna have fun too – unleashes a metaphysical rampage of the counter-cultural music kind against Reagan's warriors, turning yuppie yahoos into flaming and feisty fairy faggots via mass communal broadcasted hypnosis with his TV remote, which acts as a postmodern magic wand of sorts. Needless to say, most of the charm associated with Strangers in Paradise is derived from its absurdly anachronistic (even at the time at its release) after sitting in obscurity for nearly 30 years. Featuring songs that rip-off/pay tribute to The Beatles, The Doors, Devo, X, and Siouxsie and the Banshees, among others, Strangers in Paradise is a diverting and unconventionally delightful, if determinedly dated depiction of the generational pop culture and political wars in America (and Britain) as seen through the startlingly silly yet strangely spellbinding and even unsettling personal gaze of deracinated Teuton Ulli Lommel.

Although I am probably not the best person to confide in regarding such films, I can state without any hesitation that Lommel's Strangers in Paradise – a wildly wacky and tacky wayward work of Americanized melodic kraut comedy – is easily one of the most underrated and overlooked musicals of the 1980s as a sort of The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975) for alienated suburbanite punks of that era and certainly more entertaining and imaginative than related works like The Apple (1980), Can't Stop the Music (1980), and Footloose (1984). A piece of curiously corny camp for the entire family, Strangers in Paradise is an accidental indictment of the petty non-problems of Americans from the 1980s, where jock vs. nerd and carny Christian vs. suburban punk dueled it out in a totally Hollywood contrived battle of the American dimwits, while citizens from Soviet bloc countries were waiting in line for their weekly bread and egg rations. Featuring actual stock footage of Germany and London in ruins during the Second World War juxtaposed with paranoid Americans partying in bombshells, Strangers in Paradise does a good enough job itself, if inadvertently so, of illustrating the comparisons between Hitler and the Third Reich with Ronnie Reagan and the American materialistic “right-wing” – which Lommel makes quite blatant with his musical number “The Same Old Song and Dance,” especially with the lyrics from the concluding verse, “it’s the same old tune played in 4/4 time from 1939” – is an absurd one, but then again, maybe the director merely wanted to get back at Hollywood for defaming his nation. Say what you will about big H, but at least he was no prude nor posturing puritan, but instead a proponent of the arts, culture and sexual promiscuity (if Aryan children were sired as a result, of course), unlike failed actor Ronnie Reagan.

Incidentally, the real Adolf Hitler did have a hypnotist friend named Erik Jan Hanussen who also was a mentalist, occultist, astrologer, and all-around con-man that helped teach his Führer friend how to win over the German people via contrived dramatic performance. Despite claiming to be a dapper Danish aristocrat, Hanussen (real name Hermann Steinschneider) was in reality a lower-middle-class Moravian Jew whose father was a caretaker at a synagogue, yet that did not stop him from earning the friendship of the Sturmabteilung (SA) brownshirts. Hanussen has been dramatized in a number of films, including Hanussen (1955) starring and directed by O.W. Fischer, Hanussen (1988) starring Klaus Maria Brandauer and directed by István Szabó, Invincible (2001) starring Tim Roth and directed by Werner Herzog, and Fullmetal Alchemist the Movie: Conqueror of Shamballa (2005) featuring the voices of Toshio Furu-kawa and Troy Baker. Needless to say, Strangers in Paradise is quite different from these films and only makes minor allusions to Hanussen, not least of all because Ulli Lommel undoubtedly modeled his character Jonathan Sage as a sort of fantasy self and sci-fi alter-ego of the most imaginary persuasion who is contra to his own father in just about every way, aside from his expertise of entertaining. Interestingly, at one point in the film, Sage remarks that he wished they had left him frozen, especially since the character undergoes artificial hibernation around the same time Ulli Lommel was born. Like a mix between Charlie Chaplin’s The Great Dictator (1940) minus the preachy cheap talk and Brian De Palma’s merry yet macabre musical Phantom of the Paradise (1974), Strangers in Paradise is a ‘cute’ (for lack of a better word) and corny escapist science fiction rockfest that offers a tad bit more fresh food for thought than your average Hollywood sing-a-long flick, without resorting to the sort of Teutonophobia that prevalent in the works of Mel Brooks. Incidentally, according to Ulli Lommel’s website, the German-born filmmaker is planning a “Hollywood Musical about young people dedicated to changing the world” entitled “SCHOKO BEARS ‘N’ YUMMIE CATS” that, to paraphrase, includes, “among other important changes, introducing alternative candy and chocolate, without all the poisonous fats and sugars” and will be a ”film in 3-D for the entire family with 10 song-and-dance numbers.” Although I don’t know how I feel about a film that sounds like a kitschy Willy Wonka & the Chocolate Factory (1971) clone for vegans, I will give Lommel the benefit of the doubt that it will at least be as patently peculiar and personal as his lost cult musical Strangers in Paradise; a work that indubitably needs serious reexamination by cinephiles who relish in the cinematically psychotronic.

ANIMAL LOVE

Ulrich Seidl (1996)

I don't have much in common with most people, but one thing I do have in common with them is my love of dogs. Indeed, not unlike many people, I prefer man's best friend to man because, while dogs may lick each others' asses and smell rather repugnant when they are wet, canines typically tend to make better company and are certainly less full of shit, even if they tend to shit a lot, yet the decidedly daunting avant-garde documentary Tierische Liebe (1995) aka Animal Love directed by Austrian auteur Ulrich Seidl (Hundstage aka Dog Days, Import/Export) certainly made me second guess my relationship with man's best friend. Seidl has directed orgy scenes featuring unsimulated sex between fat middle-age people (i.e. Dog Days), as well as of rather rotund 50-year-old women looking in awe at young Kenyan hustlers' dongs (Paradies: Liebe aka Paradise: Love), but all of this seems fairly tame to the pathological quasi-bestiality of Animal Love. Poetically complimented by none other than Bavarian wild man auteur Werner Herzog with the following words, "...Never have I looked so directly into Hell," Animal Love features an eclectically eccentric collection of Viennese untermenschen suburbanites who have given up on searching for love in their fellow humans and instead have found their soul mates in furry yet highly domesticated members of another species. A subjectively directed experimental documentary (Seidl does not believe in objectivity when it comes to documentary film) of raw and aesthetically rancid realism that is so bizarre and preternatural that it takes on a surreal form, Animal Love is a rude celluloid wake-up call that is as equally disturbing as it is hilarious. Described by auteur Seidl in his official 'Filmmaker's Statement' as follows, "The original idea for the movie was quite radical. I imagined a film in which a man or a woman would do with their pets the things that married couples do: talk, eat, cuddle, care for each other and sleep together. And in the whole movie there would be absolutely no communication between people," Animal Love does indeed feature people talking to one another, albeit with a certain glacial coldness and impenetrability that one would expect from someone in a comatose state. A sort of aesthetically abhorrent Aryan take on the grotesque realism of eccentric Hebraic artists like photographer Diane Arbus and filmmaker Harmony Korine, Animal Love features such an unflattering postmodern depiction of Uncle Adolf's homeland that it would probably make for more effective anti-Aryan propaganda than the hook-nosed Heeb caricatures in Julius Streicher's Der Stürmer of the Jews. Indeed, Animal Love even makes the contrived antics of the Viennese Aktionists seem rather tame by comparison, but then again, Seidl's work features real people and not suicidal art fags.

Animal Love begins innocently enough with a mangy young man lovingly wrestling with his dog and then taking said mangy young man taking his dog for a walk and training his furry friend to heel and whatnot, but the aesthetically aberrant documentary soon gets ugly when dubious people on the fringes of society begin popping up and doing things with their pets that would even make a monkey-lover like Michael Jackson cringe. Before that though, the viewer is briefly introduced to the insanity of animal rescue centers, which are notorious for making outrageous demands for a person to adopt a dog, with a pet owner—an old gay queen who has a violent dog and equally irritable, old boyfriend—featured in Animal Love reading the following adoption ad from a newspaper: “the decision to acquire a dog must be thought over carefully, it must not be made on a whim. You must be prepared to spend all of your free time with your dog; barely ever coming home during the week...and going away on the weekends – is not an option! You have to have regular working hours, so that the dog never has to be alone for more than 8 hours at a time. The dog needs an established and familiar place...of his very own in the apartment.” Rather depressingly, most of the unsettlingly ‘idiosyncratic’ subjects featured in the documentary can easily pass the petty prerequisites named in the pet adoption ad.

Without any doubt, two of the most pathetic people featured in Animal Love are two young and swarthy drifters, one of whom claims to have been born in a Viennese dumpster. In one of the various schemes to con people out of money so they do not starve to death, the seemingly half-braindead dumpster-baby goes around with his pet bunny at a train station and preys on peoples’ emotions by asking them if they will give him money so he can ostensibly buy a bunny cage. The two drifters live in what looks like the bowels of a post-apocalyptic third world basement amongst a number of rats, which crawl around their furniture, but that does not stop one of the men from becoming a sort of avant-garde exhibitionist and masturbating amongst such filth for the cameraman (notably, Austrian auteur Michael Glawogger of Workingman’s Death (2005) and Whores’ Glory (2011) was responsible for acting as cinematographer for most of the film). Eventually, a man who claims to be the stationmaster busts the two drifters at the train station for soliciting and ‘fencing’ and they all get into a quasi-philosophical debate about the inability of longtime panhandlers to find real jobs. The two bums also have a philosophical debate about the nature of the word ‘cunt’ and how one of the dude’s ex-girlfriend slapped him in the face for using the word in what was supposed to be a complimentary fashion. In what seems to be old versions of the young bums, two borderline elderly dog lovers/homosexual queens read pet classifieds ads and bicker about their incapacity to pay their electric and phone bills, among various other debts. Meanwhile, a bunch of old people in a retirement home receive bunny rabbits to play with in their hospital beds, but they seem less than interested in their new furry friends as they all look like they have dementia. Unquestionably, two of the most repellent characters in Animal Love are a swinger couple that look like they are in their mid-30s but describe themselves as, “a loving, attractive couple, ages 25 and 30. SHE: flexible, lingerie-loving, looking for another nice couple between 18 and 35...for lust-filled partner-switching games, especially gentle cuddling, French style, and picture-taking." Naturally, being swingers, the couple does not mind having sex on camera and of course they do it doggy style for the viewer's viewing displeasure.

On the other side of town, a middle-age alcoholic with a huge gut gives his girlfriend an ultimatum that she must get rid of all her pets or else he will stay with his other girlfriend. The girlfriend makes the claim that he 'keeps her like a pet' and the aggressive, if not slow-witted and less than mobile, alcoholic retorts by stating, "I don't even want to come back to you" and "if you think I want to fuck you, I'll fuck you long and hard." Of course, Animal Love would not be complete without a full funeral ceremony for a little dog who the owner pays sentimental tribute to by saying, "You were our little girl," as if his child had just died. In what is one of the more humorous segments of the documentary, a married middle-aged couple that look like human pugs take turns using their pet pug as a source of therapy and solace, bashing their partner while talking to the little dog. The wife even offers the pug, whose name is 'Mopsi', a 'puggy-girl' so he can have pug pups, so long as her hubby is kicked out of the house. In a scene that might scare Israelis more than other viewers, a dead dog is cremated in an oven by an Aryan cremator. Rather strangely, the most attractive and wealthy, if not past her prime, woman in Animal Love is also the one who comes closest to committing actual bestiality. On top of dancing with her husky dog to Italian opera music and reading it love letters from her admirers, the somewhat unhinged would-be-aristocrat bourgeois cougar French kisses her doggy while declaring her love to him while rolling around with the carnal canine on her bed. In one of the more disturbing scenes towards the end of the film, a man that owns a pack of Afghan Hounds—one of the oldest yet dumbest recognizable dog breeds in the world—shows the viewer how he forces one of the dogs to run on a treadmill with a rope fastened around its neck for what is the equivalent of 10km (over 6.2 miles) a day. In what is one of the anti-Heimat scenes shot in cinema history, a less than homely woman of the sexually ambiguous and racially Alpine sort (i.e. short, stocky, round-headed, etc.) sits in front of a wall-sized picture of the Austrian Central Alps and stares into space with the blankest of stares, thus acting in stark contrast to the idealized Austria of the past, which has been eclipsed by the Americanized post-industrial and socially dysfunctional Austria of today. Indeed, while watching Animal Love, the viewer can almost imagine to themselves seeing Austrian auteur Ulrich Seidl stating to himself sarcastically, "There's No Place Like Home...There's No Place Like Home," as he directed his countrymen for this deranging document of Viennese decay.

Indubitably, one of the major themes of Animal Love is the social-retarding effect that technology and urbanization have had on humanity, with the Austrian zoophiles featured in the documentary being unintentionally entertaining, if not decidedly depressing, products of an abstract and man made society that is at odds with nature and even man's own organic essence. Aside from man himself, man's best friend is the second most foremost victim of urban domestication, so it is only natural that when humans get fed up with other humans, they turn to dogs, who almost seem embarrassed by their owners in Seidl's film. With its curious collection of subjects, including two quasi-beatnik bums, an old queen couple, distastefully wanton white trash swingers, and a pseudo-aristocratic husky-humping over-the-hill sexpot, Animal Love demonstrates that misanthropy and disillusionment with modern life have reached all parts of postmodern Occidental society. In one rather insightful, if not still hilarious, scene, the white trash swinger dude goes on an anti-technocratic rant, stating, "We destroy nature with our own hands; at some point nature will take revenge and then we humans will be the losers. The animals will be the ones to survive. Not us. We say we're the crowning touch to creation, but what are we really? Nothing. We're no better than the chimpanzee in the jungle, the hyena in the Savannah...or the deer, stag and hare in the forest. Whatever. We extinguish our own living space with our so-called borders, our so-called morality. In our arrogance we call the animals' way of living immoral. Actually they have a higher moral code than we humans." Indeed, while the degenerate swinger is clearly out of his mind and a loser who is just trying to rationalize his animal-like existence of humping like a rabbit and living in squalor, he has a point. With its typically Seidl-esque, carefully stylized head-on shots and various scenes of subjects reading off dialogue from paper, it is sometimes hard to discern what percentage of Animal Love is pure and unadulterated documentary and what is carefully constructed by the documentarian, but what is quite obvious is that Seidl is a patent pessimist and major misanthrope, though who and what he hates and why is never clear. Of course, judging by his treatment of the Austrian bourgeois in his Paradies aka Paradise Trilogy (2012), it is clear that Seidl is no more critical of the pup-penetrating lumpenproles than he is of the upper-middle class. An artful ethnology in the postmodern age where even dogs suffer pathologies from living an inorganic, abstract existence that is controlled by technology and rigid routine, Animal Love ultimately demonstrates you do not have to travel to the deadly jungles of South America like Werner Herzog did in the 1970s to encounter captivating, if not somewhat debasing, human phenomena.

PARADISE: LOVE
PARADISE: LOVE

Ulrich Seidl (2012)

Austria's answer to Harmony Korine (of course, he's been around much longer), Austrian aberrant-garde arthouse auteur Ulrich Seidl (Animal Love aka Tierische Liebe, Import/Export) has made a career out of creating curious cinéma vérité and ridiculously raunchy realist works of the trashy tragicomic sort about the less than flattering aspects and individuals of his post-Nazi nation, but with his more recent films, he has taken his countrymen out of his country, thereupon depicting a globalized world of exploiters and the exploited and slaves and masters ripe with eccentricity and absurdity. With Import/Export (2009) – a work about a Ukrainian nurse who goes to the West to find a better life and an Austrian man who heads to Eastern Europe to attempt the same thing – Seidl quasi-pornographically demonstrates in a highly intimate and indelicate manner that both ends of Europe have degenerated into vapid, culture-less cuckolds of capitalism, albeit with the German-speaking world being in a superior, if not more culturally senile and stale, situation where they can buy down-and-out Slavs for pennies. Naturally, Seidl takes things further with Paradise: Love (2012) aka Paradies: Liebe – the first chapter in the filmmaker's "Paradise Trilogy" (three films that focus on three different women from the same family) which was co-written by the filmmaker's seemingly equally cynical and salacious wife Veronika Franz, someone who has indubitably added a feminine touch to these cinematic works – as he finally travels to the dark continent, most specifically Kenya, a place where apparently lonely and sexually repressed European women go to patronize young black bucks who are young enough to be their sensual sweethearts, but for a price that literally could support a whole family. An innately anti-erotic realist tale in an exotic land about the pros, but mostly cons of globalization, multiculturalism, and so-called post-colonialism, Paradise: Love is a uniquely ugly film ironically set at a beautiful beach resort about our miserably materialist times where bought flesh of the foreigner kind makes for a seedy substitute for organic love of the domestic kind. A potent antidote to the creepy 'cougar' craze that somewhat recently molested the Occidental world via the always horny and sexually dysfunctional folks in hollyweird, as well the recent phenomenon of young African Negroes swindling extremely lonely, desperate, and naïve European women out of their money with hollow promises of love and exotic primitive potency, Paradise: Love is a radical and risqué reminder as to why the nonwhite world no longer respects its now-impotent and dwindling ex-masters, even if a rather dubious 'relationship' is still in place, albeit in a determinedly degenerating way.

Contemporary Austria is certainly not the world Uncle Adolf envisioned, as mongoloid Aryan dudes with Down syndrome can be seen riding around in bumper cars at amusement parks and 50-year-old Nordic mothers see Kenya – an East African land of Negroes – as the perfect place to take a vacation, or at least protagonist Teresa (Margarethe Tiesel) of Seidl's Paradise: Love does. After all, with all the young men in Austria being seemingly retarded, what is a lonely and lascivious lady supposed to do?! Spurred by a desperate and deep-seated desire to be loved and desired, Teresa cannot help but be flattered when young Kenyan men approach her romantically on her immediate arrival, even if she does not believe they find her sexually attractive and all considering she is somewhat overweight and certainly past her prime in terms of attractiveness, but those blonde goldilocks are virtual gold on the dark continent as they are the sign of a wealthy tourist looking for the ultimate erotic Negro experience. As Teresa learns upon arriving in Kenya, the most important words for a foreigner to learn is the Swahili phrase, "Hakuna Matata" (literally "There are no worries," but more akin to "no problem" in American English), yet the vacation proves to be nothing but problems of the lonely and heartbroken sort as the less than fresh Fräulein confuses prostitution with a genuine relationship and love with fleeting lust. Indeed, Kenya has some slick playas who know a thing or two about how to hustle a horny and romantically hopeless European women into thinking they actually have started a serious relationship of mutual affection, because instead of being blunt gigolos who bugger old babes for an upfront fee, the hustlers merely ask for financial support for family members. After being hassled by a number of brothers whose aggressive hustling methods throw her into a state of hysteria, Teresa finally meets a more mellow and mild-mannered young man named Munga (Peter Kazungu), who despite being married, inevitably cons the Austrian woman into supporting his whole family, but things naturally take a turn for the worse when the charismatic Kenyan's 'hustle and flow' is revealed, thereupon leading to heartbreak of the humiliating sort for the aged Aryaness and a couple blows to the brotha's grill. Unlike her three blonde friends – who know what they are paying for and have no qualms about doing so – Teresa is looking for a little more than a virile brotha' with a big black bush-beater, thus her impenetrable loneliness and age-based lack of self-esteem is all the more compounded by her sordid and steamy but ultimately senseless sabbatical. Naturally, the absurdity of Teresa's quest for love reaches its peak when her friends give her a birthday present in the form of a jolly and bestially gyrating Negro in his birthday suit who shakes his dick for dollars, or as one of lecherous lady's says quite jubilantly, "He is all yours, from head to dick," in what amounts to a determinedly daunting and debasing scenario that is probably the most patently pitiable scene in Paradise Love; a film that reminds the viewer that the death of the west will probably not be through genocide, but suicide via materialism and moral and cultural devaluation brought about by capitalism and globalization. Indeed, the flesh-flaunting Kenyan's body is all Teresa's, "from head to dick" for a couple minutes, but his heart and soul remain somewhere else.

Undoubtedly, Paradise: Love is not the first film of its kind and certainly not the last, but it is undoubtedly the best and most authentic of its kind, especially in context with contemporary times. While Alberto Cavallone's Le salamandre (1969) depicted the patronizing and inevitably tragic master-slave dynamic between a racially mixed black-white couple, Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) portrayed the forlorn future of a 60-year-old German widow and an illiterate Moroccan in his late-30s, Werner Schroeter's Palermo oder Wolfsburg (1980) revealed the deplorable consequences of a lost-in-translation, 'give and take' miscegenation-based relationship, and Laurent Cantet's Heading South (2005) presented sexual tourism as a necessity in a deteriorating third world society where sexually and romantically desperate women are able to buy young boy toys they could not purchase elsewhere, Paradise: Love manages to pick up on all these taboos themes that have become all the more relevant in our increasingly globalized world where social alienation and isolation is rampant, but executed in a minimalistic and understated manner that is neither preachy nor pretentious but plainly penetrating in a cultural pessimist sort of way that recalls Schopenhauer and Cioran. In fact, throughout Paradise: Love, protagonist Teresa attempts at various times during her trip to contact her adult daughter via telephone but receives no response, thus her sorrowful solitude is not merely the result of a lack of sexual and romantic affection, but an all-encompassing heartache and melancholy sparked by the fundamental structure of society itself where everything has a price, but nothing has any intrinsic value, hence people's confusion between sex and love in the modern world. In a sense, Paradise: Love is the cinematic adversary of Age of Consent (1969) directed by Michael Powell and starring James Mason – a film about an old artist (Mason) who is fatigued by the soulless hustle and bustle of NYC, so he goes to Australia and eventually finds inspiration in the fair-skinned and fecund form of a vulnerable and voluptuous teenage girl (played by a very young and shapely Helen Mirren in her first major role) in what becomes a relatively innocent relationship – as while Seidl's film is a positively pessimistic work that offers no solace from sorrowfulness aside from contrasting scenery and blacker-than-a-Kenyan dark comedy, the older film promises hope for the hopeless. Although not Seidl's greatest cinematic effort, Paradise: Love is quite unmistakably one of the director's most accessible works, thus making it a more than worthy introduction for naïve virgins of Austrian cinematic nihilism and negativity of the strikingly compelling, if not corrupting, sort.

IN THE BASEMENT

Ulrich Seidl (2014)

After directing a series of more accessible narrative features, including Import/Export (2007) and the highly celebrated 2012 Paradise trilogy, Viennese auteur Ulrich Seidl decided to return to his more cinéma-vérité oriented roots with the delightfully debasing and quaintly stylized 80-minute quasi-documentary Im Keller (2014) aka In the Basement, which has been advertised as “A Film Essay” and was made over a five year period where the auteur searched all over Austria for his country’s most ‘cinema worthy’ basement environments. Undoubtedly, with the Josef Fritzl scandal that emerged in April 2008 where a seemingly normal Austrian old fart was revealed to have kept his own adult daughter imprisoned in a secret corridor in his basement for 24 years and regularly raped her in a seemingly unreal real-life horror scenario that resulted in the birth of seven children and one miscarriage, it is no surprise that Seidl would direct a film about spending time in the most conspicuously quirky and peculiarly personalized of arcane Austrian lairs. It should be noted that in his official statement on his personal website, Seidl wrote regarding the film, “The basement in Austria is a place of free time and the private sphere. Many Austrians spend more time in the basement of their home than in their living room, which often is only for show. In the basement they actually indulge their needs, their hobbies, passions and obsessions. But in our unconscious, the basement is also a place of darkness, a place of fear, a place of human abysses.” For those familiar with Seidl’s somewhat singular oeuvre, In the Basement has more or less the same laid-back, free flowing and ostensibly structureless structure as the filmmaker’s early classic Tierische Liebe (1995) aka Animal Love, albeit it focuses on the basements of eccentric people as opposed to the pets of eccentric people. Of course, just as Animal Love does not solely focus on people getting down and dirty with their beloved doggies, In the Basement is also set in places that transcend the damp, dark, and dirty abysses in the subject’s homes. As someone that lived in a windowless basement room for a number of years and did many things down there that most people would not do in any place, Seidl’s work had a somewhat more personal resonance for me than any of his other works, though, in terms of domestic absurdity, I do not think I can compare with most of the things the aberrant Austrians do in their secret cellars in the film. Indeed, as I personally discovered, the basement can be a calming and soothing place where one can lose themselves and forget the world exists, but too much time down there can be highly psychologically deleterious as most of the subjects of In the Basement insightfully, if seemingly unwittingly, demonstrate. Featuring a soft-spoken so-called gun nut of the philosophically Weiningerian and opera singing sort, a suburban tuba-playing Hitlerite of the dipsomaniac sort who fantasizes about living in Austria’s glorious past from the relative comfort of his meticulously decorated mensch-cave, an elderly reborn doll pseudo-mom who keeps a number creepy rubber babies hidden in boxes around her cluttered basement, a rather repulsive female masochist who has a tendency towards getting her husbands stabbed or imprisoned after sustaining one too many brutal beatings, a grotesque fat and bald male slave who regularly has heavy weights applied to his testicles by his equally repugnant mistress-cum-wife while washing dishes and doing other emasculating wifely duties, and a couple more subjects that truly make one wonder if Austria would have been better off if their most infamous prodigal son Uncle Adolf had won the Second World War and erased anti-Aryan figures like Freud from history, Seidl's degrading doc is another almost perniciously potent remainder why the auteur describes himself as a, "director, scriptwriter, producer, voyeur, misanthrope, cynic, social pornographer, blackguard, provocateur, pessimist, and humanist," on his personal website.

Fritz Lang might like lurking in dark corners like his famous filmmaker namesake, but I sincerely doubt that he has a negative view of technology as depicted in Metropolis (1927). Herr Lang owns and operates a state of the art underground shooting range where, in between operatic singing sessions and rants about how he would have been good at singing the "great in-between roles" in operas, he plays a sort of unsimulated version of the old school NES game Duck Hunt that involves shooting projected images of men with real loaded weapons. As expressed by his strangely eloquently delivered monologue, "A man is always young and trim. For him time stands still. Meanwhile his wife will age. Pointless to express outrage or mourn her youth or shed tears, in truth. For what's left of her days as she helplessly decays while he, with vigor blessed, beats on his heroic chest. He feels again his vigor grow, his manhood stiffens down below. Whenever a lass he spies, a superman, he feels with pride since ere the world began its highest principle is man," Lang has probably spent some time reading Nietzsche and tragic Jewish Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger's magnum opus Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character. Of course, Lang's friends are no less 'politically incorrect' as demonstrated one man's remark regarding the dubious loyalties of an Austrian-born Turk, "He says, 'I'm Austrian.' I go, 'Sure, but at the European Cup you scream 'Turkiye, Turkiye!' He says, 'Yeah, I'm Austrian, but I'm Turkish.' You see? But he's more Turkish. Even if he was born here." The man also complains of, "100,000 Turkish malcontents screw our girls if they're blondes in miniskirts" and his fat friend concurs, adding, "And they proudly declare, 'We're fucking your women!' As men that agree that Muslims have historically raped the women of their enemies as a form of psychological warfare and make their own women sport burkas because they are "Jealous, insecure men," it is easy to see why these guys would hang at Lang's shooting range, as they seem to expect a race war of sorts, especially with the growth of illegal immigration and rape in Austria. Although Austrians, Lang's friends are merely echoing the thoughts that most honest and normal white men in the West have. While Seidl's own political views are dubious at best (he contributed a segment to the largely worthless anti-Jörg Haider agitprop piece Zur Lage: Österreich in sechs Kapiteln (2002) aka State of the Nation: Austria in Six Chapters), he dares to depict Austrian society at its least sanitized, thus making him a sort of heir to Pier Paolo Pasolini, albeit without the gay gaze.

While Josef Ochs—a man that shares the same exact name as an infamous SS-Obersturmführer who was involved in the deportation gypsies and was present in the Berlin Führerbunker during the last dark days of Hitler—does not talk candidly about the Muslim menace like Lang and his comrades, his basement is a sort of lavishly decorated National Socialist shrine that features various framed portraits of Uncle Adolf, a couple models dressed in different uniforms from the Third Reich era, and various other forms of Nazi memorabilia that are probably quite hard to come by in the contemporary Aryan world due to the strict anti-Nazi laws. Of course, Ochs does not just love the Führer, as he also has framed portraits of Richard Wagner, his patron King Ludwig II of Bavaria, Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria, and various other important Germanic historical figures hanging on his garage wall that demonstrate that he has deep Austro-Teutonic roots and feels like he is part of rich and deep culture and tradition that goes back many centuries. For nearly two decades, Ochs has been taking yearly pilgrimages to Germany to visit the Führer's headquarters at the Eagle's Nest in Berchtesgaden and, as a result, the Stasi-esque kraut police (which he accidentally describes as, "The Gestapo") have put him on a watch list, or so he complains in a half-annoyed/half-joyous fashion. On top of his Führer fetish, Ochs is a hardcore tuba player that plays in a brass band with his comrades, who he regularly drinks with in his quaint Nazi dungeon where they discuss the good old days when one could be prideful of being Austrian and taking part in Germanic cultural traditions without being labelled a "Nazi" by some emasculated brainwashed cultural cuckold or sapless ethno-masochistic xenophile. As some might assume considering he is an old dude that spends a lot of time hanging out with his friends in his basement, Ochs is also a self-confessed alcoholic, with the subject revealing regarding his daily drinking schedule, "I do like my drink. It goes hand in hand with playing. It's a given. A morning break drink. Before that, three spritzers just so I can talk. Then, with the morning break drink, 10 spritzers. And afterwards a few shots, because everything's gone so well. But I'm predisposed because my whole family drinks." Indeed, if there ever was a greater plague to the Aryan people than the ideas of Hebraic culture-distorters like Marx and Freud and their intellectual spawn, it is alcohol.

While there are other subjects in the doc that certainly come close, masochistic lard ass Gerald 'love slave' Duchek and his proudly sadistic 'mistress'/wife Alessa are probably the most innately repugnant individuals in the film, as their exceedingly sloppy and sub-homely physical appearances are only transcended by their seemingly senseless sexual habits, which seem to involve everything aside from actual sex. A totally bald and rather heavysset man who may lack hair on his head but is a virtual bear when it comes to the rest of his burly body, Gerald works security at a local fancy theater by day, but when he comes home he becomes a 'love slave' who is forced by his pink-haired Wal-Mart-esque wife to clean the entire house while completely unclad (sans various torture devices attached to his flaccid genitals) and crawling on all fours like the figurative swine that he is. When stoic she-beast Alessa urinates, she forces her anti-hunk hubby to lick her festering vag clean and he even thanks her for the orally odious opportunity. As Alessa candidly states regarding her S&M marriage with anti-gentleman Gerald, "I absolutely adore my love slave... And the opposite is also true: He worships me. It doesn't affect our love – on the contrary. Only with total devotion and love can something like this work. If I don't have absolute trust in this person... And similarly if he doesn't have trust in me, his mistress, he can't let go completely and can't serve me 100%. It's a huge sign of trust. Of course I'm aware that I'm responsible for everything here and that can only work if it's based on absolute love." When Gerald first began his relationship with Alessa, he was forced to always wear a chastity belt and was allowed nil form of sexual release, but now that their darkly obsessive romance has evolved he is allowed to masturbate when his proudly wicked wife gives him the get-go. While debauchery occurs all around the Duchek house, the basement, which has been transformed into a dungeon that puts any of the settings described in Austrian writer Leopold von Sacher-Masoch's classic S&M/BDSM novella Venus im Pelz (1870) aka Venus in Furs to abject shame, is where the real hardcore depravity occurs. On top of having a luxurious cabinet full of fancy strap-on dildos and butt-plugs that Alessa uses to peg and prod her beastly beloved's bunghole, the dungeon features a makeshift torture device where poor perennial cuck Gerard is lifted off of a table by his testicles, thus causing him to bring new meaning to the slang phrase 'blue balls.' While they are unquestionably grotesque people that do grotesque things, it is nothing short of undeniable that Gerald and Alessa are made for one another and seem to share a mutually loving and joyous romance where both of them are able to express their unfortunate sexual idiosyncrasies.

Notably, spliced randomly throughout In the Basement is footage of an unnervingly eccentric old woman named Alfreda Klebinger, who is, among other things, the proud 'mother' of a number of lifelike vinyl dolls called 'reborn dolls,' which over the past couple of years or so have become a strange trend among certain lonely woman of the Occidental world who seem to have a maternal urge that they cannot fulfill because they are too old to have children or have some sort of other problem (it is believed the some women use reborn dolls a means of grieving a child that has died). Why Alfreda collects the dolls is never actually mentioned, but it is glaringly obvious that she is too damn old to get pregnant and have a baby of her own. For whatever reason, Alfreda keeps the dolls hidden in cardboard boxes around her basement. With her hubby, Alfreda has apparently traveled all around the world and while baby talking to one of her reborn dolls while pointing at a large world map, she states regarding India, "It was so filthy, he [her husband] didn't like it either." Like Alfreda, a rather rotund hunter named Manfred Ellinger that is featured prominently throughout doc has also done a lot of traveling around the world, though he has regulated most of his time to the Dark Continent to hunt exotic animals, which he proudly describes as managing to kill with a single shot and include mostly furry creatures like nyalas, waterbucks, kudus, white-tailed gnus, warthogs, jackals, and bonteboks, among countless others. Naturally, the taxidermied heads of Manfred's prized kills have been mounted to his basement wall, which looks fairly absurd due to how many eclectic animal heads of varying sizes have been concentrated to one small area. Surely not the stereotype of the Hollywood-esque wasteful white expedition hunter, Manfred describes how he has personally eaten virtually all these animals, even getting his wife to make Wiener Schnitzel out of a warthog, though he admittedly refuses to dine on baboon. Undoubtedly, to some degree, Manfred reminds me of the expedition hunters that Austrian avant-garde auteur Peter Kubelka mocked in his classic experimental documentary short Unsere Afrikareise (1966) aka Our Trip to Africa, which almost certainly had to be a major influence on Seidl.

Undoubtedly, Seidl's doc is also notable for featuring the most morbidly obese yet happy hookers in cinema history since the ones that briefly appeared in David Lynch's Wild at Heart (1990). One of these unpleasantly plump women, Cora Kitty, describes how she decided to become a professional pussy-peddler after getting fed up with having to be nice to nasty people while working in retail, which she absolutely loathed like any sane person would. The conspicuously corpulent prostitute makes no lie of the fact that she absolutely loves her job of selling her gash for cash as it gives her the distinguished opportunity of regularly meeting many different types of men, including guys with big and little cocks, as well as dudes that shoot mighty and miniscule loads. Cora Kitty is depicted engaging in a sort of pap smear-esque session of cunnilingus where her body is strapped into a gynecological device with a small and weasel-like weakling with a rather fitting pervert mustache who is apparently able to please many hookers, who apparently let him enter their meat-curtains for free because he has a special talent where he is able to bust a powerful load where his cum splashes over the gal's thoroughly used and abused vaginal walls, or as the creepy fellow explains himself in an autistic monotone fashion, "My potency lies in, as I discovered at some point, that I can shoot off a very powerful load of semen. With it I've left many women pretty amazed." Indeed, he may be a rather pathetic looking fellow, but the tiny mustached man certainly must have a special talent if he is able to get call-girls and bar-hogs to spread their legs for free.

If there was one subject in In the Basement who rubbed me the wrong way the most, it is a self-described "masochist" named Fraud Sabine who is featured having heir ass and pussy lips whipped by a fairly old and racially Alpinish fellow named 'Maſter Walter' aka Walter Holzer who sports a prized pair of lederhosen while brutalizing the old broad's bum. Notably, the nearly elderly masochiſt, whose beat up body is far from a wonderland, goes on to describe how she ſtabbed her firſt husband because she got fed up with him regularly beating her and later she had another hubby imprisoned for four years after he got too rough with her. Somewhat curiously but not ſurprisingly considering her own background, Frau Sabine is a Caritas Internationalis aid worker who provides help to battered Catholic women. Undoubtedly, Sabine has an unhealthy fetish for exceedingly abusive men, but one cannot help but wonder if there is a little bit of closeted ſadiſt in her in that she would ſtab one hubby and ruin the life of another. It ſeems that the masochiſt hooked up with Maſter Walter as a means to control her voracious appetite for pain in a more ſafe and controlled environment where deadly violence never comes into play. Arguably, the moſt bizarre thing about Frau Sabine is that she ſeems like ſomeone that could be an office manager at ſome ſort of bureaucratic corporation, ſo it is not exactly a pleaſure to ſee her unclad ſaggy derriere being whipped by Maſter Walter in a moſtly lackluſter fashion. Notably, towards the end of the doc, while getting waſted with his brass band comrades, basement Fñhrer Josef Ochs makes the hilarious official declaration while in an exceedingly inebriated ſtate, "I am the Fñhrer of this party." Of course, the doc would not be complete without Miſtreſs Aleſsa having her ſwinish love ſlave hung from his balls. As demonſtrated by his ambiguouſly erect choad, pig Gerald moſt certainly wallows in the puniſhment.

As can be expected in a ſo-called democratic modern European nation like Auſtria, In the Basement ſubject Josef Ochs was apparently facing being charged with 'Wiederbetätigung' (a ſuppoſed act of (re-)engagement in National Socialiſt activities) after the film was released as a reſult of the Nazi memorabilia he has in his suburban Fñhrerbunker. To auteur Ulrich Seidl's credit, he has pretty much only had good things to ſay about Herr Ochs, who would later complain that the director opted to focus eſpecially on his Nazi regalia inſtead of the various portraits and memorabilia that he has in tribute to figures like Ludwig II and various Auſtrian noblemen (it ſhould be noted that Ochs never actually makes any pro-Nazi ſtatements). Although I have not gotten the chance to ſee it ſince I have yet to find a copy with English subtitles, there is a ſeemingly worthwhile documentary entitled Ulrich Seidl und die böſen Buben (2014) aka Ulrich Seidl: A Director at Work directed by Conſtantine Wulff that depicts the legendary 'Seidl method' as the filmmaker works on both In the Basement and the play Böſe Buben/Fieſe Männer for theatre. As Ochs' remarks demonſtrates, Seidl is by no means a 'documentarian' (which is a label that he himſelf thankfully rejects) in the conventional ſenſe, as it is quite clear he ſtages and highly ſtylizes his cinematic ſcenarios, which moſt certainly depict real people doing what they love beſt, albeit from a highly ſubjective perſpective where the filmmaker manages to add his own somewhat subtle and oftentimes cynical social criticism via the way he opts to direct and edit a particular scene. In that regard, Seidl is like an Aryan equivalent to conspicuously kosher confederate arthouse carny Harmony Korine, whose masterful directorial debut Gummo (1997) implemented a similarly highly stylized approach to documentary-like scenarios (of course, Korine's film also features a number of completely fictional scenarios).

It should be noted that In the Basement features a couple scenes where Austrian teens do banal things in their basements like have less than chatty parties where they drink and smoke in a particularly passionless fashion like automations who have seen one too many Hebraic Hollywood frat-boy scat-comedies. Indubitably, compared to their elders who love lurking in a cement abyss of the 'ungeheuer,' the teens seem to be totally lacking in character and individuality and are assumedly completely out of touch with their 'Heimat,' which one can only assume is the result of the deracination of Austria via Americanization. After all, these kids not only have a glorious historical past, but also tons of great contemporary filmmakers to enjoy like Seidl, Michael Haneke, Michael Glawogger (RIP), Peter Kern, Paulus Manker (who surely needs to get back into the directing game), Markus Schleinzer (who undoubtedly made the ultimate Austrian basement feature with his debut Michael (2011)), avant-gardist Peter Tscherkassky, Gustav Deutsch, and various others who remind one that even a small European nation can have a more artistically important and intriguing film industry than the global cinema gatekeepers of Hollywood. If there is anything that one can learn from In the Basement, it is that the Viennese Aktionists look like a bunch of hopelessly bourgeois art fag posers when compared to the basement-dwelling proles in Siedl's film who do what they do for the mere pleasure and not to make of spectacle of themselves. Indeed, Seidl might be a sort of distant cinematic descendant of Aktionist filmmaker Kurt Kren, but he seems to have long realized that there is more intrigue and idiosyncrasy among seemingly normal everyday people than narcissistic 'artiste' types who seek attention for attention's sake. If In the Basement gave me any insights into how unbelievable dungeon crimes as committed by sinister individuals like Josef Fritzl and Wolfgang Priklopil could have occurred in Austria, it is probably the rampant social alienation that is caused by so-called democracy, capitalism, and multiculturalism, not to mention the fact that unity inspiring movements like nationalism and especially pan-Germanism have become quite taboo as a result of the defeat of the Third Reich during the Second World War. Indeed, when it is illegal for a man to own a portrait of a national historical figure in his home, there probably has to be some sort of collective psychosis in that country. While Fritzl pathetically attempted to blame his singularly sick behavior on the discipline he learned as a child during the Nazi era, his actions undoubtedly seem like those featured in a Weimar era newspaper or Fritz Lang flick. Luckily, Austria still has his fine folks like the Fritz Lang featured In the Basement.

MEIN PAPA

Ulrich Thein (1988) Jörg Buttgerit's Mein Papa (1982) might be his most disturbing film. The short film (around 7 minutes) was shot over a period of 20 years. Buttgerit secretly directs his father who has become quite obese over the years (the film also shows a picture of Papa young and slim at his wedding). He also becomes quite intolerant of noise. 20 years later Papa is found dead in front of his TV with some of his favorite snacks. We also find out about Papa's declining health over the years due to tumors on his brain.

Mein Papa features a poppy yet haunting score that suits the film's unemotional tone. Buttgerit did not have a good relationship with his father and the short was made in spite of him. He wanted a room of people laughing at his father without him knowing. With Mein Papa, Buttgerit has immortalized his contempt for his father. It's quite interesting taking that into context when watching the short. Soon after watching Mein Papa for the first time a couple years ago I soon forgot about it. I just wrote it off as an early cheap super 8 short from a budding Buttgerit. Revisiting Mein Papa a couple times in the same day I realized its power and uniqueness. The film also reveals more about Buttgerit than any of his masterpieces feature length films could.

It is about time that Jörg Buttgerit got back to directing. I am finding that my obsession over his short films is fairly desperate. Starz should have given Buttgerit the opportunity to direct an episode of Master of Horror. In my opinion, he's a far better director than John Carpenter, Tobe Hooper, and the other "legendary" horror directors. The majority of the Master of Horror directors are hacks.

MADAME X: AN ABSOLUTE RULER

Ulrike Ottinger (1977)

Admittedly, pirates have never really floated my boat and I certainly cannot think of films as extravagantly aesthetically repellent as the Pirates of the Caribbean series and Spielberg's quasi-pederastic work Hook (1991) for such works could only appeal to small children and bugging butt-pirates. Needless to say, Johnny Depp as proto-hippie slime-bag Captain Jack Sparrow makes for a rather pathetic pirate Lord of the Seven Seas and Dustin Hoffman makes for an even worse pirate than he does as a drag queen à la Tootsie (1982). That being said, I never would have thought that my favorite seafaring freebooter flick would inevitably turn out to be that of the campy fantasy lesbian sort, but then again I would have never expected anything of the sort to exist in the first place. Co-directed by aberrant Aryanness auteur Ulrike Ottinger (Freak Orlando, Taiga) and her then-girlfriend Tabea Blumenschein (Zagarbata) – the statuesque stoic Sapphic punk goddess that would play an imperative part in the creation of her ladylove's most prolific works, including the cross-genre arthouse epics Ticket of No Return (1979) and Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press (1984) – Madame X – Eine absolute Herrscherin (1978) aka Madame X: An Absolute Ruler is not only one of the most ideally and intensely idiosyncratic buccaneer flicks ever made, but it is also the lesbian answer to the male action-fantasy film, albeit of a more absurdist, avant-garde persuasion. Unlike your typical lesbian/feminist film whatever genre of subgenre it may be in, Madame X: An Absolute Ruler is not a pirate-themed pity party of the decisively slave-morality-driven dreadful and regretful sort, but a wonderfully wayward wild woman wonder where the will to power and pleasure is the guiding philosophy. Lacking in petty sentimentalism, cliché political messages, and glorification of the weak and meek but instead the criminally rich and aesthetically wondrous, Madame X: An Absolute Ruler is a delightfully deranging Dionysian comedy of sorts that makes for the next best thing to a full-fledged lesbian fantasy fascism flick. Suffice to say, Madame X: An Absolute Ruler does for female swashbuckling filibusters what Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964) did for motorcycle and fetishistically fascistic leather-fags.

During the beginning of Madame X: An Absolute Ruler, a number of diverse but equally unsatisfied women receive hidden telegraphic messages in everything from newspapers to a box of Brillo pads (steel wool scouring pads used for cleaning dishes) to the pocket of an institutionalized mental patient suffering from 'disturbed narcissistic personality' offering the lonely ladies the following: To all women – stop – offer world – stop – full of gold – stop – love – stop – adventure – stop – at sea – stop – call Chinese Orlando – stop! The characters include everything from bored, sexually-repressed housewives to overly-intellectualized psychiatrists with physical appearances as diversified as raving beauties to gawky dyke pilots with bad haircuts, but they are united by their overwhelming dissatisfaction with their lives and professional/gender roles. To join the beautiful yet barbaric Madame X (Tabea Blumenschein) on her dilapidated ship Chinese Orlando, they must sacrifice their previous lives which none of them think twice about doing, but none of them are prepared for enduring the dictatorship of the determinedly dick-less where totalitarian tough love and topless tits reign supreme. Upon first joining Madame X on the ship as corsair crewmembers, the conspicuously cute but callous captain – using the help of a vocal and automatic figurehead, an exact replica of Madame X (also played by Blumenschein), assembled with the utmost care by a Numidian and witch doctor of great talent – displays her “absolute authority and power” via her doppelganger at the prow of the ship reciting: “Gold. Love. Adventure.” Indeed, Madame X – a muted and multipotent miss of the most magnificent mystique, and material and metaphysical magnetism – makes good on her three promises, but not without a little bit of slapstick and swashbuckling misery, heartbreak, and murder thrown in for good measure. In a backstory early on in the film, it is revealed that Madame X initially decided to give “her soul to the devil and Satanic sea arts” after her prized beauty Orlando was killed after being engulfed in the toxic tentacles of a rare and deadly jellyfish, which subsequently resulted in the loss of the Captain’s right-hand, hence her prosthetic bladed-hand. Miss X eventually became the cruelest pirate Führer of the Far Eastern sea, thus he has to be most stern and even unfair with his new novice buccaneers. Naturally, Madame X is extra hard on a flaming faggot fairy who joins the crew as a groveling man-maid after they find him floating in the sea by his lonesome, but at least he has the opportunity to admire the charming yet sometimes cantankerous Captain’s nude body, including her erotic blonde bosom hair. As far as obtaining glorious gold is concerned, Madame X and her eclectic collection of underlings happen upon a boat full of booty-full, banal, bourgeois types (one of which is played by Peggy von Schnottgenberg aka Frank Ripplöh; director of Taxi zum Klo) whom they glamour and titillate – the sort of people that incessantly and robotically repeat small talk clichés like “well, how about that?” and “What do ya know?” – and subsequently ransack at night and execute in a most Fellini-esque fashion. Naturally, Madame X: An Absolute Ruler – probably the only film where someone rides the plank in a wheelchair – is not your slap-happy alcoholic grandpappy’s sort of pirate film.

As the Chinese Orlando’s in-boat psychiatrist states in a most tongue-in-cheek manner: “The age-old oppression of woman which had consolidated the habits of passivity and dependence in their character structure, made them docile tools in the hands of Madame X, a charismatic personality eaten up with narcissism and whose lust for power grew with the quasi-masochistic submission of the women beyond all bounds.” Of course, whether victims of Madame X’s megalomaniacal majesty or not, breast-flaunting buccaneers of Madame X: An Absolute Ruler certainly have a lovely, if loaded, journey where the charismatic captain's three promises of gold, love, and adventure are ceremoniously fulfilled. Aside from the gold, Ulrike Ottinger makes good of her character Madame X's promises as well, which I would have never suspected from a muff-diving auteur, especially of the sometimes socio-politically-charged sort. In fact, I do not think it would be a stretch to say that not only is Ottinger the most demiurgic female German director of the post-WWII era, but also – regardless of sex – the greatest kraut master of postmodern celluloid mythmaking. That being said, it is quite a shame that Ottinger's personal/artistic relationship with Tabea Blumen-schein had to end, as I surely regard Madame X: An Absolute Ruler, as well as their collaborations, Ticket of No Return and Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press among my favorite arthouse 'fantasy' flicks, and I am not exactly a fan of Ani DiFranco or Ellen DeGenerate. Indeed, unlike Robin Williams in Hook, not all seamen are starved for sea-salty semen; rather, some are horny, unloved housewives, pompous pussy-licking psychiatrists, and sadomasochistic Orientalists of the bearded clam diving, cunning linguist persuasian.

TICKET OF NO RETURN

As much as I would like to deny it, I am fond of Germanic lesbian surrealist flicks, especially of the secretive and semiotic yet borderline psychotic sort, especially those directed by butch blonde Aryanness Ulrike Ottinger (Freak Orlando, Joan of Arc of Mongolia); the daredevil dame director who seems to have better taste in women than her fellow male New Wave kraut compatriots Fassbinder, Herzog, and Volker Schlöndorff, and more an imagination than lady auteur filmmakers Margarethe von Trotta and Monika Treut. Recently, I had the pleasure of viewing Ottinger's audacious alcoholic arthouse flick Bildnis einer Trinkerin. Aller jamais retour (1979) aka Ticket of No Return, a fashion keen surrealist odyssey about one lovely lady's lunatic drunken antics as she cruises Berlin-Tegel, Germany in search of booze, boobs, and bodacious bustle while dressed to impress (mostly herself) in immoderately chic new romanticist style. Predating the succulent sci-fi fashion of Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982) and the frantic lesbo lunacy of A. Hans Scheirl's Dandy Dust (1998), Ticket of No Return is a marvelous cinematic passport with a big aesthetic return if you're looking to see a highly cultivated form of cinematic degeneracy. Opening with the following narration, Ticket of No Return only gets more incoherent as it develops: "... She, a woman of exquisite beauty, of classical dignity and harmonious Raphaellesque proportions, a woman, created like no other to be Medea, Madonna, Beatrice, Iphigenia, Aspasia, decided one sunny winter day to leave La Rotonda..." Starring Tabea Blumenschein – who previously co-directed Laokoon & Söhne (Laokoon & Sons), Die Betörung der blauen Matrosen (The Enchantment of the Blue Sailors) and Madame X – Eine absolute Herrscherin (Madame X: An Absolute Ruler) with Ottinger and would later star in her work Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press) – Ticket of No Return is a work that is more than easy on the eyes due to its beauteous, if often belligerent and balmy, lead actress. Also featuring appearances from such great German New Wave actors as Magdalena Montezuma, Kurt Raab, Volker Spengler, Eddie Constantine, Günter Meisner, Nina Hagen, and Paul Glauer (one of the taller merry midgets from Herzog's Even Dwarfs Started Small), Ticket of No Return is a film that will interest any serious fan of post-WW2 German cinema, even if you're not a lesbian or alcoholic.

Seemingly an esoteric artsy fartsy cinematic essay campaigning for the acceptance of debauched alcoholism of the active sightseeing sort, Ticket of No Return is a film that will not only discombobulate most viewers with its heterodox fidelity for booze and lilly-licker hermeticism, but also its unequivocally avant-garde nonlinear structure. Although unmistakably female in appearance and in fashion sense, "She" is a stoic yet smashed street warrior with a proclivity towards older proletarian women, as expressed with her relatively unsuccessful bath and sleeper with a considerably less attractive and seemingly more mature lady. In fact, aside from a monotone chorus trio of statistic and fact spouting ladies in futuristic yet mundane grey flight attendant outfits named “Social Question” (Magdalena Montezuma), “Accurate Statistics” (Orpha Termin), and “Common Sense” (Monika von Cube), “She” never has any sort of steady esprit de corps, but instead merely meanders around like a perennial wandering Jew that is deracinated from all land and all human company. Of course, Ms. She doesn’t exactly need friends as she has no problem finding formidable fun, which includes – aside from her delightful drunken buffoonery – a not-exactly-high-wire balancing act and riding on the hood of a daredevil driver’s stunt into a wall-on-fire. Fitting somewhere in between Federico Fellini’s Amarcord (1973) minus the nostalgia and Werner Herzog’s early realist-surrealist masterpiece Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) in terms of narrative (or lack thereof) and its ostensibly absurdist aesthetic, yet a work of undeniable idiosyncrasy all of its own, Ticket of No Return is one of those rare works that reminds the viewer that the artistic medium of film is not exactly as limited and played-out as latest American ‘indy’ film would leave us to believe.

Ultimately, I think the strangely delectable she-devil anti-heroess of Ticket of No Return is sort of what Marcello Mastroianni is to Fellini’s La Dolce Vita (1960) and 8 ½ (1963), as a sort of vivid express of Ulrike Ottinger’s ideal alter-ego; a lady of stunning beauty with an exquisite fashion sense (which the director certainly lacks), but also aloof, venturesome, and wholly autonomous (fitting more in tune with the lady auteur’s predilections, at least as an artist). Of course, she’s ‘inner self’ and butch doppelgänger – a leather-clad man-boy akin to the unsavory fellows featured in Kenneth Anger’s Scorpio Rising (1964) and William Friedkin’s Cruising (1980) – reminds her that despite how beautiful and stylish she is on the outside and no matter how shitfaced she is, an instinctive masculinity consumes her soul. Personally, I cannot think of anything more unappealing in a prospective lover from the fairer sex than an aggressive alcoholic with an acute case of muteness yet with the help of Ottinger’s curious yet calculating direction and the films fashion designer, Tabea Blumenschein is nothing short of seductive as “she,” even if she seems like she might bite. Always climbing to a literal and figurative stairway to some sort intangible heaven of sorts, “she” is inevitably lost in a human storm of metropolitan lunacy and absurdity. Indubitably, a semi-autobiographical cinematic work of the decisively obscured and transcendental sort, not unlike works by fellow queer kraut auteur filmmakers Werner Schroeter (Day of the Idiots, Malina) and Rosa von Praunheim (A Virus Knows no Morals, Anita: Dances of Vice), Ticket of No Return is a one-way ticket to somewhere in between lesbian life-everlasting and limbo in the lower world.

After searching for years in vain for a copy of Ulrike Ottinger's Freak Orlando (1981) – an apocalyptic cinematic epic of the exceedingly eccentric – I can happily admit that I secured and viewed a copy of the film, albeit with a positively piss poor VHS transfer (who knows what generation), yet that did not stop me nor my girlfriend from thoroughly luxuriating in what is undeniably one of the most loony, lecherous, and lovely lesbian fantasy films ever made. More freaky than Tod Browning's Freaks (1932), more campy and obsessively stylized than Jack Smith's Flaming Creatures (1963), more marvelously mystical than Don Chaffey's adaptation of Jason and the Argonauts (1963) and more carnally carnivalesque than Federico Fellini's City of Women (1980), Freak Orlando is indubitably one of the most ideally idiosyncratic cinematic works ever made that has no contemporaries, aside from auteur Ulrike Ottinger's other Sapphic spiritual films (e.g. Madame X: An Absolute Ruler, Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press). Set in the fleeting fantasy world of 'Freak City' – a weirdo world of self-flagellating leather fags, bodypaint-covered midget artists, big bearded women, two-headed singers who sing in two-part harmony, and rival Siamese twins, among various other merry yet oftentimes miserable mother nature made miscreations – Freak Orlando is a "small theater of the world" and allegorical history of the world depicted in a marvelous maniac microcosm of the macabre yet magical. Told in five different acts of varying waywardness, the film centers around an innately unconventional protagonist named Freak Orlando aka Mrs. Orlando Mr. Orlando aka Orlando Capricho aka Orlando Orlanda aka Orlando Zyklopa (all played by Werner Schroeter's muse Magdalena Montezuma), who seems to have more lives than a black magic pussycat. On her wild and delightfully dangerous entrada, Orlando encounters a number of bestial, bloodlusting enemies and futuristic lipstick lezzy lovers, with the outcome of her literally out-of-this-world odysseys being virtually the same: love, loss, and finally enduring the lap of the gods. Featuring a quasi-medieval dystopian setting of the decidedly deformed and daunting sort – not unlike John Waters' Desperate Living (1977), except with more testosterone and meticulously assembled sets and costumes designs – Freak Orlando is a fiercely phantasmagorical film full of flaky fashion and tumultuous tragedy that reminds one of why people watch fantasy films in the first place.

Created after a series of co-directions with her doily dyke collaborator/lover Tabea Blumenschein (The Enchantment of the Blue Sailors, Ticket of No Return), Freak Orlando is a seemingly more melancholy and misanthropic work than her previous efforts, if stoically and mirthfully so. Although featuring a virtual carnival of undraped bodies, the film is less focused on glorifying the fiery femme fatale beauty than in, for example, Madame X: An Absolute Ruler

(1978) where brutish blonde bombshell Tabea Blumenschein plays an integral role. Whereas in Ticket of No Return (1979), the female anti-heroess 'She' seems to be a fantasy character composite of both Ottinger and Blumenschein, Orlando of Freak Orlando – as a stalwart alpha-female of uncompromising personal integrity, individuality, and honor – is most certainly Ottinger's filmic alter-ego. As a feisty and agile anvil-striking Führer of a heptad of dwarf-shoemakers, a two-headed singer of melodies, a fierce freedom fighter against the Spanish Inquisition, a merry but sometimes malevolent man who feels one head is better than two when it comes to bumping heads with Siamese twins, and campy entertainer with a queer quartet of playboy bunnies, Orlando is a renegade renaissance woman with a rugged interior and a oftentimes fetishistic quasi-New Romanticiŝt exterior. Like a wandering Jew hopped up on Ritalin, romance, and fervent freak righteousness, arduously anomalous Orlando attempts to bring oddball order and beauty to a mostly rural city in ruins that – despite its freak-only population – seems to hardly accept her, at least until the conclusion of the film. Her greatest enemies are the ferocious yet faggy flagellants – a curious collective of self-punishing, sadomasochistic, semi-savage leather fags that sport matching black pleather uniforms (aside from one curious fellow in white) – who brutally beat and decapitate Orlando during the first act of Freak Orlando after she refuses to become their leader when the original 'ŝtylite' lord (played by Eddie Constantine) falls to his much-desired death. Judging by her portrayal of the flagellants in the film, I think it is quite blatant that Ottinger is an opponent of leather fags everywhere, a group that homo-maniac auteur Rosa von Praunheim described as the male abberosexual group whose, "masculinity is damaged the most" in his documentary It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971). During the second act of Freak Orlando, Orlando Orlando muŝt save two acrobats from the flaming flagellants and deter their dreams of hatred, which are fueled by male inadequacy; an all-consuming character flaw the Ms. Ottinger seems to be hardly stricken with. In the end, Orlando leaves the city just as she came, admiring a topless lady flower with marvelous mammary glands.

Unfortunately, aside from a minority of unhealthily fanatical cinephiles, Freak Orlando is a film that is more often talked about and dreamed of than actually seen. After what seemed like a lifetime worth of waiting, I finally had the grand opportunity to watch this grandiose occult cinematic exposition and I cannot say I was left wanting. Considering that Freak Orlando is comprised of five decidedly distinct acts, the film is sometimes 'hit' or 'miss' in what it seeks to achieve in terms of the moral of the story due to its excessive esotericism, but one would be hard-pressed to argue that a single second of the film is anything less than enrapturing and awe-inspiring. Like Federico Fellini's Satyricon (1969) meets Werner Herzog's Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970), except with a superlatively Sapphic persuasion, Freak Orlando paints a pulchritudinous, if peculiar, portrait of the history of the world that is about as literal as a soundly asleep paranoid schizophrenic's most sordid and starkest dreams. A singularly preternatural cinematic escape from the banality of the technocratic, cosmopolitan globalized world featuring a city-sized cabaret of spastic yet spectacular characters, Freak Orlando is a film that deserves a broad fan-base outside of the pompous academic and lesbian underground world.

DORIAN GRAY IN THE MIRROR OF THE YELLOW PRESS

Part love letter to the icon masterpieces of German expressionist cinema, most specifically Paul Wegener's Golem trilogy (The Golem, The Golem and the Dancing Girl, The Golem: How He Came into the World) and Fritz Lang's Dr. Mabuse trilogy (Dr. Mabuse the Gambler, The Testament of Dr. Mabuse, The Thousand Eyes of Dr. Mabuse), part camp-ridden postmodern cyberpunk flick, and part ostensibly ominous quasi-Wagnerian opera with Oscar Wilde's iconic literary figure Dorian Gray as a tom-boyish Siegfried-like anti-hero, Sapphic German auteuress Ulrike Ottinger's Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka The Image of Dorian Gray in the Yellow Press aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press – a work released most appropriately during the Orwellian year of 1984; a splendid time for a lesbo dystopian flick – is a film of epically eccentric proportions that does the seemingly unhinged and certainly most sexually-antagonistic by casting one of Germany's best known supermodels, Veruschka von Lehndorff (Blow-Up, Casino Royale), in dandysette drag as a character with a testosterone-deprived sideshow swag. Both the final film in her "Berlin Trilogy" (preceding Ticket of No Return and Freak Orlando) and the last cinematic collaboration with her one-time lesbian lover and partner in aesthetic crime Tabea Blumenschein (Laokoon & Sons, Madame X: An Absolute Ruler) – who would subsequently end up homeless for a period of time – before their irreparable breakup, Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press also marked the close of a chapter in Ulrike Ottinger's filmmaking career right before she would go to travel the Orient and direct such works as the documentary China. The Arts – the People (1986), the adventure-romance-documentary hybrid epic Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia (1989), the 500-minute ethnology document Taiga (1992), and the documentary The Korean Wedding Chest (2009), among various other quasi-anthropological real-life fairy tale works. Most glaringly, Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press is Ottinger's last distinctly 'Germanic' counter-culture work, albeit of the pre-nazi/post-nazi persuasion, as both a tribute to the films and underworld kultur of the Weimar Republic and the dangerous, chaotic, and sinister sociopolitical climate of that time, as well as a delightful, daring, and damning dissemination of the power of mainstream multimedia in all facets of life following the conclusion of the Second World War. Centering around a pomo and ambiguous homo Dorian Gray (played by Veruschka von Lehndorff) – a figure whose striking suave playboy celebrity is contrived and subsequently shattered at the wretched whim of Frau Dr. Mabuse (played marvelous mad scientist style by French feminist Delphine Seyrig); the fierce female Führer of a all-powerful, all-seeing, all-knowing, and all-propagandizing international media empire – Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press is like Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Welt am Draht (1973) aka World on a Wire meets

Massimo Dallamano's Dorian Gray (1970) starring Helmut Berger, but more importantly, it is the sort of strikingly singular aesthetic and gender deconstructing work that could have been directed by Ulrike Ottinger.

As Dr. Mabuse states at the beginning of Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press: "Our organization will create a human being whom we can shape and manipulate according to our needs. Dorian Gray: young, rich and handsome. We will make him, seduce him and break him." With crucial help from her cunning computer specialist "Assistant Golem" (played by Werner Schroeter's muse Magdalena Montezuma), as well as "Assistant Passat" (Fassbinder's typecast "repressed" lady Irm Hermann) and "Assistant Susy" (Fassbinder's "beautiful bimbo" Barbara Valentin), Dr. Mabuse has every resource she needs to make, manipulate, and murder her dear and dapper cipher Dorian Gray. Ottinger stated in an interview that her archetypal Dorian Gray is effectively, "The narcissus, the dandy, especially the dandy has his feminine side. Therefore in art – I am thinking here of Proust, Oscar Wilde, Gustave Moreau, Reynaldo Hahn, who are all indirectly cited in my film – these were among the first artists who as men made aesthetically manifest feminine qualities." Indeed, the gender/sexuality of the "s/he" in Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press is never made clear, thereupon making it all the more of a provocative and, at times, trying and terribly teasing work. With his only 'family' member being a Chinese servant named "Hollywood" (Toyo Tanaka), who also acts as a narrator for the film, Dorian Gray – a boyish yet athletic extrovert of the spontaneous sort – is more than willing to take up the malicious Ms. Mabuse on her ingeniously generous offer, thereupon skyrocketing the lonely and ego-deprived orphan onto a literal and figurative world-stage of great fame and prestige. As the last of the famous international playboys, Dorian naturally acquires a beautiful and blonde lover named Andamana (played by the notably rather skinny and oftentimes almost completely naked Tabea Blumenschein) who Dr. Mabuse has employed as a seductive sly spy slut, and who the media closely follows with the more intimate and loving moments, as well as scandalous and risqué, of their grandiose ballad-ridden bond being broadcast for the entire world to see from the comfort of their living room. With his new life behind the candid camera and in the yellow press, Dorian also must make various planned public appearances, including "press balls," an aptly named event where everything, including the wallpapers, flowers, and wine glasses are made out of newspapers and where, through the misguided guidance of Miss Mabuse, he is also able to indulge in the wonders of the world, including kosher animal mutilation, Amerindians cohabiting in sewers, and his lover luridly trading tongues with a new lesbian ladylove of the less than ladylike sort. As Dr. Mabuse states herself, "The willful Italians are hard to control," but with hunky-dory Dorian posing in the world spotlight, even hot-headed Hightalians "fall for Nordic beauty." Needless to say, the whole world adores Dorian Gray and he exults in the extravagant lifestyle of an entertainment superstar, but all good things must come to an end and Dr. Mabuse is a master at managing melodramatic meltdowns of the magnificently and morbidly marvelous mass media mishmash.

In Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press, the three virtues of journalism – being “independence,” “non-partisanship,” and “objectivity” and who Dr. Mabuse assumes to be retired – are frail and shriveled old men with equally withered genitals who wear women’s Sunday church hats in a symbolic scene that more than speaks for itself. In combining iconic figures from German expressionist cinema and classical opera with images of grand grotesquery, including large and in charge au naturel amazonian women goose-stepping for $1 bills, screaming punk rockers in tattered clothing, and a little boy dragging a decapitated pig’s head with a string, Ottinger ironically gives resonance to her bitter-sweet Svengali character Dr. Mabuse’s words, “art is anachronism...ridiculous rollie.” A stringently semiotic work of immense scale, Ulrike Ottinger’s Dorian Gray meets and greets technocratic globalized media in a strikingly sardonic and socio-politically sharp cinema effort of clever and keen kitsch meets high operatic art about an ambiguous (in more ways than one) character who the viewer never really gets despite his highly publicized and personalized appearances throughout the film. In a 1997 interview with Austrian writer Sissi Tax, Ottinger stated of her Brummel-esque protagonist: “It remains undecidable whether (Dorian Gray) doesn’t also fall in love with himself, with the performance, with the mirror in the frame...,” but if one thing is for sure about the frisky fellow – an individual who survives the human sewage of subterranean sodomite hell, desolate deserts with a morbid mix of mammal corpses and human and furry four-legged hyenas, and his sadomasochistic sexual activities being exposed for the world to see – he is an individual with a strong sense of self-preservation, so much so that after the fat lady literally sings, he literally crashes his own funeral in his blood red Mercedes Benz sports car. The final culmination of a rich and fruitful collaboration that resulted in countless photographic collaborations, two short featurette, and three feature length films, Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press also marked the final collaboration between Ottinger and Blumenschein, so it is only befitting that the character Andamana (played by Blumenschein) states, “On this path you must continue alone,” which are indubitably poetically symbolic works that would mark a break in the German auteuress’ oeuvre. Of course, as Dr. Mabuse states at her manipulated man-muse’s funeral: “Dorian, for me you live on.”

JOHANNA D'ARC OF MONGOLIA

Ulrike Ottinger (1989)

After finishing her "Berlin trilogy" (Ticket of No Return, Freak Orlando, Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press), German Sapphic auteur Ulrike Ottinger decided to venture outside of her native Germany and outside the restraints of both narrative fiction/documentary with her postmodern Trans-Siberian epic Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia (1989) aka Joan of Arc of Mongolia. Essentially like Ottinger's first feature-length work Madame X: An Absolute Ruler (1978) except with Mongolian lesbos of the seemingly sexually-repressed sort instead of a wild assortment of pussy-plundering female pirates, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia is quirky yet relatively restrained and sentimental for an Ulrike Ottinger celluloid saga in that it depicts the lighter side of a cultural clash between two strikingly different groups: 'Western' women (including a European ethnographer and her young 'companion,' a trio of three Jewish klemzer, a naïve German teacher/tourist) and barbarian nomadic Mongols. Described in the past as a "lesbian Lawrence of Arabia," Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia is indeed one of Ottinger's most truly 'epic' and professionally executed and directed works, but with a glaring lack of freak worship (which is replaced with philo-semitism and Mongol-mania) and the subversive idiosyncrasy that drive her previous efforts. In turn, the film also happens to be one of Ottinger's most accessible works as the sort of film a 7-year-old girl could watch and enjoy, at least in the superficial literal sense. Mixing 19th and 20th century American and European Jewish Yiddish culture with ancient Mongolian traditions and rituals performed by authentic modern day nomadic Mongols, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia also lacks – probably in part due to the severance of her relationship with her long-time lover/collaborator Tabea Blumenschein – the sadomasochistic abberosexual essence that dominates her previous works (although to be fair, Ottinger is half Jewish, through her mother, and her trans-continental epic would be the first time the female director would portray overtly Judaic themes in her films). Part neo-Yiddish musical and part Mongol-philic action-adventure romance flick, Joan of Arc of Mongolia – despite its aesthetic and thematic weakness – is just another example as to why Ulrike Ottinger is the greatest and most strikingly singular female German auteur of her generation.

Starring Delphine Seyrig as the ambiguous lesbian and cultured ethnologist Lady Windermere in her last Ottinger film (preceding Freak Orlando and Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press) and last screen appearance before her premature death from lung cancer at the age of 58 in 1990, as well as Fassbinder graduates Irm Hermann as a secondary-school teacher named Fräulein Mueller-Vohwinkel and Austrian Peter Kern as an affluent Jewish fat cat and Yiddish neo-vaudevillian tenor/entertainer, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia brings the stars of European arthouse and Neuer Deutscher Film to strikingly strange scenery – sort of in the spirit of Christoph Schlingensiefel's Tunguska - Die Kisten sind da (1984), except less sardonic – where very few filmmakers and actors dare to tread. Set on the Trans-Siberian Railroad, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia begins as an eccentric Yiddish musical of sorts, with the introduction of a merry cast of Fellini-esque characters, including Lady Windermere (Delphine Seyrig), Ms. Mueller-Vohwinkel (Irm Hermann), a beautiful peasant girl named Giovanni (later called Johanna) played by Spanish actress Inés Sástre, a 1930/1940s style musical star named Fanny Ziegfeld (Gillian Scalici), the Kalinka Sisters which Ottinger described in an interview as being “like a traveling Yiddish version of the Andrew Sisters,” Mickey Katz (Peter Kern), and a Soviet Russian officer (Nugzar Sharia) who is a direct descendent of collectivist anarchist philosopher Mikhail Bakunin and his young attaché (Christoph Eichhorn). Of course, like most of Ottinger's films, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia is fundamentally a femme fling flick where women (this time against their own will) fulfill their wildest fantasies.

A wealthy quasi-Victorian aristocrat of immense independent wealth, Lady Windermere travels in her own private and lavishly furnished train boxcar and seems like she suffers from Aspergers syndrome due to her incessant and patently pedantic rambling off of facts regarding Mongolian nomads. Resembling Marlene Dietrich in her androgynous explorer outfit, Windermere takes a special liking to Giovanni and lets her join her private boxcar. After having some fun by playing a number of Yiddish musical hits, including performances by the Kalinka Sisters and the morbidly obese Mickey Katz, the train riders' diversion comes to an abrupt end in Mongolia when the train's passage is halted by a Mongolian princess and her henchwomen, who have strategically deposited a large hill of sand in its tracks, bringing the train to a complete stop. Led by Princess Ulun Iga (played by Xu Re Huar), the she-warriors demand that all female members of the train get off and be taken hostage, thus ushering in the sheltered western women's wild and wonderful journey. From here on, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia more resembles a documentary with slight shades of action and romance as opposed to the semi-surreal and intentionally artificial first chapter set on the aesthetically anachronistic train (which was filmed in a singular and strikingly stylized studio set reminiscent of Ottinger's short “Superbia - The Pride” contributed to the feature-length feminist film anthology Seven Women, Seven Sins (1986)). Princess Ulun Iga is a greatly feared woman among Mongols everywhere who has conquered and destroyed various male Mongolian tribes, so much so that a diplomat from an enemy tribe begs the stoic she-beast not to destroy their terror-ridden tribe. The western women seem barely phased by the fact they are taken hostage by the medieval-like Mongol hordes as if suffering from an acute case of Stockholm syndrome. Luckily for the passive ladies of the Trans-Siberian express, the Mongol princess, despite her apparent ferocity, takes a keen liking to her captives, especially Giovanni and eventually makes the Mediterranean peasant girl her princess in plundering and pillaging, thus renaming her Princess Johanna, hence the title of the film Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia.

Admittedly, aesthetically and thematically, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia was not my celluloid cup of tea, as old school Yid mu-sick and Mongolian barbarian kultur is not exactly something that I digest well. Personal preferences aside, there are many 'disconnects' in the film, most glaringly the shift between the inside of the postmodern high-kitsch of the inside of the Trans-Siberian train and the ethnographic realism of the Mongolian nomadic scenes. Assuredly a softcore work of semi-subversive cinema for Ulrike Ottinger, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia ultimately feels like campy children's fairy tale meets National Geographic; a sentiment that both my girlfriend – who is hopelessly obsessed with the German auteuress' Madame X: An Absolute Ruler and Freak Orlando – and I could not deny. Despite its rather sentimental and playful tone, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia does feature a brutal real goat killing set to traditional Mongolian musical that is equally as disturbing and disgusting as the slaughterhouse scene from Rainer Werner Fassbinder's In a Year of Thirteen Moons (1978); a film that Ottinger apparently found quite "interesting." Personally, my favorite scene in the film is when the Mongolian princess grabs the genitals of a horse and is kicked to the ground. Apparently, certain politically correct film critics took offense to Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia due to its supposedly offensive depiction of certain Jewish stereotypes, especially in regard to the large and in charge Mickey Katz; a pompously plump and bodacious braggart of immense wealth who is essentially harmless aside from his repellant character and physique. Ottinger would follow-up Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia with the exceedingly epic 500-minute ethnological documentary on Mongols entitled Taiga (1992), which the director described as being, "like a fairy tale." Although not as gripping and tragic as the tale of the real "The Maid of Orléans," Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia is a superlatively symptomatic work that could have only been directed by Ulrike Ottinger, thus making it at least worth seeing for fan of the dandysette explorer auteur.

COUNTDOWN

Ulrike Ottinger (1990)

Without question, Ulrike Ottinger (Freak Orlando, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia) is one of the most innately idiosyncratic and adventurous female auteur filmmakers working today and quite arguably the greatest lady director since Leni Riefenstahl, be it in Germany or elsewhere, especially in terms of the epic essence of her work as a rare 'hands-on' type of woman who is not afraid to get her hands dirty and trek around the globe to create truly singular celluloid works. Indeed, in that regard, Ottinger is sort of like a lesbian Werner Herzog, albeit of ½ Jewish instead of ½ Croatian extraction. Indeed, while a mischling Jew, Ottinger certainly takes after her Aryan side as her father Ulrich Ottinger, who hid the filmmaker and her Jewish mother during the Second World War, was an artist-painter who belonged to a circle of artists that included German expressionist Otto Dix. Undoubtedly, up until her sexually anarchistic love letter to Oscar Wilde and German expressionism, Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press, and before her breakup with her longtime girlfriend/muse Tabea Blumenschein (who starred in virtually all the filmmaker's works between 1975 and 1984), Ottinger's films had a distinctly Teutonic essence, albeit of the post-empire Weimar-esque and largely sadomasochistic camp-ridden sort, but somewhere along the way the filmmaker became a pathological orientalist with a special interest in the Jewish Diaspora, with her seemingly new-found affinity for the historical legacy of German Jewry being quite apparent in her 3+ hour documentary Countdown (1990). An exceedingly long chronological document in ten parts set in Berlin during the ten days leading to the reunification of German currencies (aka 'the first stage of German reunification') on July 1, 1990, Countdown ultimately portrays a rundown metropolis plagued by cultural and social decay as opposed to a magical place on the brink of a long-time-coming revolutionary 'family reunion.' Instead of focusing on interviewing indigenous Berliners on their thoughts on the reunification, Ottinger opts for dwelling on Hebraic ghosts and the general cultural/racial outsider, beginning by focusing on the 'Einsteinurm' aka 'Einstein Tower' (an astrophysical observatory built by German Jewish architect Erich Mendelsohn to test Albert Einstein's relativity theory) in Potsdam and the Jewish Cemetery Weißensee (the second largest Jewish cemetery in Europe that has been rarely used since 1955) and focusing on foreign gypsy peddlers hanging out at the Bahnhof Zoo on the third day. Essentially seeming like a multiculturalist tourist diary shot by an individual who forgot they turned on the 'record' button and kept filming for way too long, Countdown is far from Ottinger's greatest work (in fact, I would argue it is her worst) as a documentary that aesthetically murders the subversively glamorous movie magic and mystique the filmmaker brought to Berlin with Bildnis Einer Trinkerin-Aller Jamais Re- tour (1979) aka Ticket of No Return.

A couple years ago, my girlfriend went on vacation in Germany and she described her two-day stay in Berlin as the biggest disappointment of her trip because, aside from a couple old monuments and ancient architecture that was not destroyed in the Second World War, she found the city to be not all that different from a degenerate American urban cesspool due to its influx of immigrants from the global south and McDonald's fast food restaurant on every corner. Undoubtedly, the Berlin of Ottinger's Countdown seems even worse than what my girlfriend described. With the GDR thankfully becoming history, swarthy Slavs peddle commie kraut relics in the form of badges, uniforms, and hats for virtually nothing to blonde teenage boys who want to use these now-worthless items as quirky souvenirs. Young boys also work eagerly to destroy remnants of the wall, though it is dubious whether or not they are doing it for any political reason because, like many young men, they probably get a kick out of destroying stuff, especially things that symbolize authority. In one particularly allegorical scenario, a man in a wheelchair sits next to a young boy holding a tricolor 'Bundesflagge und Handelsflagge' flag of Germany in a ruined section of East Berlin that seems like it has yet to be repaired after the ravaging of the Second World War. Meanwhile, a synagogue that seems to have seen better days on the other side of Berlin seems to act as an uneasy metaphor for the disastrous relationship between Germans and Jews in the post-Auschwitz years. Instead of Jews as its outsiders, Berlin now has the luxury of hosting impoverished Sinti, Roma, and Poles, who beg for money while hanging at the virtual human zoo that is the Bahnhof Zoo station. Undoubtedly, the only solacing scenes of Countdown take place in scenic parks that act in stark contrast to the seemingly epidemic urban decay that has spread around the city like Wotan's wildfire. Anticipating Ottinger's more recent documentary Prater (2007)—a truly 'carnavalesque' work about the Würstelprater amusement park in Vienna, Austria that was destroyed in the Second World War but subsequently rebuilt after the war—Countdown also features footage at a Berlin amusement park, which includes shots of a rather cool looking haunted house rides, among other things. Ultimately, the documentary concludes with footage of Germans, both young and old, relaxing at a placid lake located in southeast Berlin (Treptow) next to a glaringly ugly factory emitting toxic fumes in a scene that reminds me of the Oswald Spengler quote, "Now the giant city sucks the country dry, insatiably and incessantly demanding and devouring fresh streams of men, until it wearies and dies in the midst of an almost uninhabited waste of country."

Aside from director Ulrike Ottinger's curious choice of locations for shooting, Countdown is undoubtedly an objectively directed work with nil narration nor discernible political messages, yet at the same time, the documentary cannot help but depict post-Cold War Berlin as a decidedly dreary place inhabited by people who, for the most part aside from collectively smashing the Berlin Wall, never smile and go about their business in an almost zombie-like fashion as if they were victims of prison rape. In fact, I find it rather ironic that the only person that stuck out in my mind smiling for an extended period of time in the doc was a somewhat creepy gypsy dude who was peddling worthless junk on the street as a foreign man who came from a foreign land who can afford to smirk as he has taken full advantage of post-Nazi Germany's lack of community and increasing deracination, not to mention very generous brown-baby-funding social welfare system. Undoubtedly, a glaring sign of Germany's undying ethnomasochism is the fact that Karl-Marx-Allee—a monumental 'socialist boulevard' that was originally named 'Stinallee' (until, of course, the 'man of steel' went out of fashion as so many commie dictators do) featured in the final section of Countdown that was built by the GDR between 1952 and 1960—has yet to be de-marxized despite the fact that it bears the name of arguably the most deleterious thinker of German history and a man whose dubious ideas left East Germany (not to mention every other country east of the Fatherland) under virtual slavery for nearly half a century.

In his puffery-plagued work Ulrike Ottinger: The Autobiography of Art Cinema (2008), Frankfurt school-lobotomized American shabbos goy intellectual Laurence A. Rickels wrote regarding Countdown: "What comes out in the wash or watch of this document of reunification is both the viewing of the spectral Jewish cemetery and the return of Sinti and Roma minorities. This return is marked by the phobic static already or still on the lines of their reception but also set aside, as the film closes with portrayals of everyday life in the outpost-towns of the former GDR. We are offered glimpses of an existence that will, for a historical change, be passed over and allowed to survive," thus demonstrating the sort of petty hatred the documentary inspires in mainstream hack intellectuals who make a living out of reviving the already maliciously molested ghosts of Germany's past (it should be noted that Rickels is probably best known for writing a three volume piece of Freudian pseudo-history entitled Nazi Psychoanalysis). Demonstrating his 'humanistic' insistence that Germany still needs constant reminders that its forefathers were big bad Aryan butchers who got what they deserved for not loving the saintly untermenschen, Rickels also stated regarding what he believes is most important regarding Countdown: "The allegorical status of the divided city, of what was once upon a time in the recent past the circumcised, displaced, cosmopolitan, ghostly capital of old Europe, was being functionalized literally with a vengeance, with a revenge Nietzsche defined as directed "against the 'It was' of time." That no sizable portion of the wall—one of the great monuments in history—was left standing speaks volumes about the official plan for reunified Berlin, against which Ottinger's document can be seen to offer a stay of execution." The retarded remarks of neo-commie-Freudian cultural cuckolds aside, Countdown does offer a sometimes insightful and even poetic, if not incessantly meandering, depiction of Deutschland's somewhat aborted rebirth in 1990. In many ways, Countdown is like like Dutch alpha-documentarian Johan van der Keuken's 245-minute doc Amsterdam Global Village (1996) because, aside from both being exceedingly long and whimsical yet minimalistic works, both documentaries demonstrate how major European capital cities have so drastically degenerated since the Second World War, with the metropolises suffering from similar distinctly European social sicknesses (i.e. multiculturalism, social and cultural deracination, social alienation, increasing overpopulation yet dying out of the indigenous populations, etc.). Indeed, I do not know how much Berlin has changed since the release of Countdown over two decades ago, but if I ever take a trip to the Fatherland, it will probably be to Bavaria instead.

CODE BLUE
CODE BLUE

Urszula Antoniak (2011)

Out of all of the people I have known in my life, the most discernibly hopelessly dejected one I can think of was a middle-aged unmarried barren woman who lived life vicariously through her sisters and sisters' children, who would become the closest thing she ever had to children of her own. To an extent, I can understand this because a woman has to be a true failure to lack children and a husband, even if feminist-brainwashing has taught the ostensible fairer sex that they don't need either to live a happy life. It is not often spoke of but naturally 'old maids' have made for some of the most conspicuously creepy yet paradoxically tragic characters in cinema history as demonstrated by works ranging from Robert Altman's underrated early classic That Cold Day in the Park (1969) starring Sandy Dennis to the rarely-seen short William Faulkner adaptation A Rose for Emily (1983) starring Anjelica Huston to Michael Haneke's The Piano Teacher (2001) starring Isabelle Huppert to the minimalistic Lars von Trier co-produced Dutch arthouse work Het zuiden (2004) aka South directed by Martin Koolhoven to countless campy hagsploitation flicks. Indeed, there is certainly something distinctly unnerving about an unhinged old maid who has nothing else to do in this world except to rot away in both the mind and body. The other day I masochistically subjected myself to what might be described as the ultimate work of 'old maid-mania' in celluloid form and I can honestly say that I cannot remember the last time a film made me feel so superlatively sick to my stomach. Indeed, the Dutch-Danish coproduction Code Blue (2011) directed by Polish-Dutch female auteur Urszula Antoniak (Nothing Personal, Nude Area) is such a uniquely and incontestably unsettling piece of arthouse aberrance that a warning sign reading "Some scenes may hurt the audience feelings" was posted outside its screening room when it premiered at the 2011 Cannes Film Festival Directors' Fortnight. A work that both revolves around and connects sex and death, Antoniak's anti-romantic piece of morbidly erotic angst tells the progressively perturbing tale of a skeletal Dutch middle-aged nurse of the desperately and ultimately deathly lonely sort who works at the terminally ill quarter of a hospital and has an almost fetishistic obsession with her most sickly patients that involves putting said sickly patients out of their misery, even sometimes against their will (or lack of). Ultimately, the 'protagonist' (or some might say 'anti-heroine') is irrevocably connected to a violently narcissistic young kraut after the two are united by happenstance (or what others might call 'fate') via an instance of sadomasochistic voyeurism revolving around a small gang-rape, thus erupting in a fierce 'romantic' fling that throws the somewhat loony lead over the edge and into a personal pandemonium of no return. A work with obvious Polish influences like Krzysztof Kieslowski, Andrzej Zulawski, and Jerzy Skolimowski, but also popular contemporary arthouse filmmakers like von Trier and Haneke, as well as a work with a morbid approach to eroticism that is vaguely in the spirit of the beautifully odious oeuvre of Teutonic aberrant-garde auteur Jörg Buttgerit, Code Blue is a cold and cruel celluloid dance with death that is guaranteed to deject, distress, and disturb any viewer whose heart is still beating. Indeed, forget the work of Catherine Breillat, Lucile Hadžihalilović, and Chantal Akerman, Antoniak is the real deal in terms of a dame director that dares to depict the brutality of life, namely female life.

In her own pathetic yet empathetic way, Marian (Belgian actress Bien de Moor of Henri Xhonneux's bizarre de Sade adaptation Marquis (1989)) lives for death as a perennially lonely nurse in the terminal ward of a sickeningly sterile Dutch hospital who somewhat eagerly euthanizes patients, thus giving her a sense of power and importance that her personal life lacks. Although she tells coworkers that she has a daughter and provides evidence in the form of a vintage photograph that is probably of herself as a little girl, Marian is a barren woman who gets depressed merely by seeing footage of penguins laying eggs as it reminds her that her time is up in terms of being a mother, thus she must live a forsaken non-existence of the largely inward sort. Morbidly lonely and exceedingly sexually repressed, Marian likes to sit around her apartment naked while fondling a tiny inch-long pencil, as if she is so desperate for cock that she is willing to accept a minuscule needle dick so long as she receives some sort of male member, no matter how mediocre. While riding on a public bus, it is quite obvious that Marian would just love to start sucking the protruding fuck muscle of a man whose nether-region is only inches away from her face. When the man randomly walks away, Marian even gets out of her seat and looks for him at the back of the bus, as if she is suffering the delusion that she somehow missed out on an imaginary erotic encounter of sorts. After the sexually tense bus ride, Marian heads to a local video store when she spots a marginally handsome young German man named Konrad (Lars Eidinger), who she spies on while hanging around the Orson Welles section of the business, with copies of Touch of Evil (1958), The Trial (1962), and F For Fake (1973) being in plain view on the shelf, thus revealing some of auteuress Antoniak's assumed favorite films. Marian does not know it yet but Konrad lives in the same apartment building as her and the two will eventually come together in a most decidedly disgustingly disharmonious way.

Marian's favorite movie is David Lean's overrated epic Doctor Zhivago (1965) and while at the video store she rents a DVD copy of that and a random porno flick, which somewhat puzzles the man working at the counter, who passively heckles her. That night, Marian first watches Doctor Zhivago (1965) and then turns on the fuck flick, though she does not actually watch it as she lets it play while she paints her door blood red, as if to save her from the Angel of Death, who she seems to sense that she has an upcoming date with. The next day, Marian helps a patient by giving him an injection that ends his life and when another nurse asks her if she tended to the dead dude, she totally denies it. A somewhat passive-aggressive and seemingly jealous old boot of a broad, Marian starts a senseless scene of sorts at a grocery store because she is overcharged a mere 80 cents. The girl at the register is a somewhat attractive young lady that Marian is plainly jealous of as demonstrated by her bitchy attitude to her despite the fact that she is extra nice to the store's handsome young male manager. Since Marian has no life and seemingly no relatives, she has seen it fit to keep little tokens and knickknacks from her patients/victims like brush with hair on it and a small cracked mirror, which she stores in a special cabinet in her apartment. The only person Marian seems to connect with his an elderly old woman that she just befriended who lives in the same apartment building as her named 'Willie' (Annemarie Prins), who she seems to respect due to her shared loneliness and refreshing openness, especially regarding sexuality, despite being an old fart. Indeed, when Marian asks her if she is afraid someone might break into her apartment due to the fact that she has a key to her apartment barely hidden right outside her front door, wild Willie responds, "If it were a young, handsome man, I would not mind." Willie also seems to sense Marian's sad and lonely life as demonstrated by her half-joking remark to her, "I don't know who is more tired, you or me." Of course, like with everyone else, Marian cannot help but lie to Willie by telling her she has a "tender" lover. When Marian goes to euthanize an elderly fellow that she has been giving somewhat sensual sponge bathes everyday and the rotting old-timer responds rather aggressively by busting up her face and causing her to bleed all over her face, she confesses her guilt to Willie and the old woman attempts to console her by telling her "I forgive you," even though she has no clue that the protagonist is in the business of offing old folks just like herself. When Willie randomly commits suicide, Marian finds her corpse, caresses it in a creepy fashion, and eerily stares into the dead woman's eyes as if she is longing for the same thing.

When Marian looks out her apartment window one night and accidentally sees two masked men gang-rape a chick, her life ultimately takes a dramatic change. While watching the violent vaginal pillaging, Marian is spotted via an apartment window nearby by the young German man Konrad that she saw at the video store. As it turns out, Konrad lives in the same apartment building as Marian and also seems somewhat 'aroused' by the rape. Since both of them seem to derive voyeuristic pleasure from the attack and neither of them bothers to call the police, Marian and Konrad both seem to intuitively realize that they are kindred carnal spirits of sorts, or so it seems at first. The next day, Marian visits the rape site where she finds a used condom that one of the rapists senselessly left behind. In a rather revealing scene that demonstrates that Marian unequivocally has more than a few screws loose, the uniquely unhinged protagonist empties the dubious semen from the used rubber onto her vagina and begins masturbating with it. During the same scene, it becomes apparent that Marian has some other serious issues as reflected by all the various scars on her thighs, thus hinting that she is a 'cutter.' Naturally, Marian develops a deep, dark, and disturbing obsession with Konrad that involves her cutting a tiny hole in her blinds so that she can regularly spy on him without him knowing it. As demonstrated by the fact that he is constantly standing at his window, Konrad seems to sense that Marian is always watching him and wallows in such attention. When Konrad randomly calls up to Marian's apartment and begs, "I'm lonely. I'M LONELY!" and "I'm so lonely. I want to help you. Please," the protagonist is too afraid to respond and walks always from the call-box. Ultimately, Marian will be forced to encounter Konrad by chance at a party. Indeed, after breaking down to a young coworker named Anne (Sophie van Winden) and confiding to her that she is afraid that there is "something approach her," Marian is told, "You have to be good to yourself. If you aren't good to yourself...you can't be good to others either" and is subsequently invited to a party.

Like Konrad, Marian is invited to the same party by a "friend of a friend" and when they bump into one another, they mention nothing of their shared witnessing of the rape. Of course, Konrad acts totally charming and tries to flatter Marian by telling her she looks "like an actress" instead of a nurse. Konrad is a stage manager and, somewhat curiously, he informs Marian that his favorite movie is also Doctor Zhivago, henceforth making it clear that he is attempting to prey on her emotions. Needless to say, Marian and Konrad soon go back to the former's apartment to passionately fuck, but in the middle of making out, the young kraut curiously randomly stops and states, "I'm sorry...I think I'll leave," which inspires the protagonist to desperately yell, "No, you can't" like a disappointed child and try anything she can to convince her male suitor to stay. When Konrad heads for the door, Marian literally jumps on his cock and starts fiddling with it, but that does not last long. Indeed, Konrad begins fiercely masturbating and won't let Marian touch his member, but instead demands the protagonist "watch me," adding when he becomes disappointed with her gazing, "Just watch me. Watch me. Not my face, stupid bitch, my dick. Watch it." Naturally, when Konrad demands that Marian "talk dirty" to him and she says things like "come to me my love," he becomes extremely annoyed and bitch slaps her. At this point, Marian becomes pathetically desperate to get fucked by seeming psychopath Konrad, who is so narcissistic that he is only interested in fucking himself, that she strips off all of her clothes in an extremely fashion fashion and attempts to more or less jump on his cock, but he responds by beating the shit out of her. While lying on the floor naked and bloody, Marian looks more physically and metaphysically dead than one of the patients from the terminal ward. In the end, while Konrad lies in bed with a soulless expression on his face, Marian frantically slits her wrist in a purposeful fashion.

Notably, in an interview at cineuropa.org, auteuress Antoniak stated regarding the significance of Code Blue protagonist Marian's various questionable acts of euthanasia, “Marian’s patients are terminally ill and she wants to include herself in their death. Which is more what many families do for their loved ones. One patient allows her to inject him, another resists and fights. In the first case she is “Death according to Heidegger,” the experience we are consciously approaching. In the second one she is “Death according to Levinas,” a murderer approaching at night. The second experience leaves Marian in doubts. It’s the beginning of her becoming human.” While Antoniak can philosophize all she wants regarding her protagonist’s actions, when it comes down to it, the protagonist is a decidedly deranged dame whose psychological decay only seems transcended by the deterioration of her antiquated reproductive system. Of course, the fact remains that, like the protagonist of the film, a good percentage of female serial killers were either nurses and/or used poison as their inconspicuous method of murder, thus bringing new meaning to the phrase ‘feminine touch.’ While the protagonist of Code Blue is certainly, at least to some extent, empathetic towards her patients/victims, her actions are those of a warped woman with a death wish who ‘lives’ vicariously through the elderly folks that she carefully exterminates. As reflected by the fact that her husband Jacek ‘Luter’ Lenartowicz—a musician turned screenwriter that founded the popular Polish punk rock bands Deadlock and Tilt—died in 2004 after a long and painful struggle with brain cancer, director Antoniak was certainly personally obsessed with death, hence the malignant yet strangely eroticized melancholy dripping from Code Blue, which is without question one of the most hysterically hopeless and fiercely forlorn films I have ever seen. In fact, in her interview with Cineuropa she admitted the film was inspired by the death of a loved one, stating when she was asked when she started working on the work, “It starts for me with an experience that gets into my system and gives me stuff for reflection. In the case of CODE BLUE, it was death of someone I loved. As a director you climb the mountain again with each film. But with CODE BLUE I consciously took more risk by choosing the taboo subject of death. NOTHING PERSONAL was lyrical, CODE BLUE is challenging, controversial.” While the film managed to win the ‘Golden Calf’—the Dutch equivalent to an Oscar—for “Best Cinematography” and “Best Sound Design” at the 2011 Netherlands Film Festival, Code Blue, quite unlike Antoniak’s much lauded and largely life-affirming first feature Nothing Personal, seems to have severely offended the majority of candy ass mainstream film critics, which is certainly a good sign, but it is certainly no surprise considering that the flick is rather politically incorrect and, whether intentional on the director’s part or not, is a feminist’s worst nightmare as it exposes many fears and weakness of women in a uniquely uncompromising way, thereupon indicating that Antoniak is a serious and genuine artist and not someone that is attempting to win a popularity contest. Indeed, Code Blue is the film that the critics wish Michael Haneke’s overrated work Amour (2012) was, as a work that, for better or worse, fully and unsentimentally embraces death and never looks back.

HEART OF AMERICA

Uwe Boll (2002) I'll start off by saying that I don't hold a grudge against Uwe Boll. Hell, I find his video game adaptations to be hilarious. People don't put in perspective, that if Uwe didn't direct them, hype would be present, and the let-down would be incredibly severe. Uwe Boll's name is a warning label for film. Little know, that before the critically acclaimed release of House of the Dead, he made many "serious" films, one of which is about a school shooting. I was hoping for Boll to wise up. With his promise of it not focusing on video games and rock music, he loses his New Year's resolution quickly and embodies the rock aspect. When our young troubled pre-pubescent angst-y teen wakes up to his heavy metal music. He gets a phone call. He tells them to hold on, puts the phone down, and takes a long exaggerated yet exasperated sigh of emotion. Boll lost most of his audience right there. The opening credits are lined with techno-metal tracks that for the most part. Issues fair warnings that kids are time-bombs. They then bombard the screen with pointless title card statistics on the amount of deaths that correlate to some random incident that no one cares about. This boy then logs onto his instant messaging device. The screen name which I am not quoting goes along these lines (vAMPIREmETAL6669) Already, Boll has incorporated that he is a satanist, or damn well wishes he was. After using his password "metal" and discussing today's events with much mystique, he ventures out to begin his day. The common suburbia is the easiest setting for a film. If you use it right, it can even provide instant "depth" and "allegory's" to your film. Boll needs to learn something from cinema's masters of expressionism. His scenes are quaint and have total disregard for any substance. This suburbia does include the following; joggers, skateboarders, paper boys, white picket fences, and the beautifully trimmed grass. After we meet several characters, we meet one named Dara. Dara is the one who lives in the biggest house on the block, but she is what as known are "Gothics" Her mom is never there so she must rebel against the world in any way she can, which may or may not include whoring herself out to jocks at gas stations. I think this scene was the only scene that really had emotion or even grabbed my attention. Boll makes his attentions clear that Heart of America is presumptively an anti-drug film. Dara buys some drugs from local dealer Wex. When Wex gets caught, he tells his counselor "Hey! What's the worst that can happen?!" Cut to the scene of Dara standing on top of the school. She looks as if she is contemplating suicide and is doing so by copying poses that make her look as if she watched The Crow too much. The whole "medicated angst" theme is recurrent in most 90's films, such as Heathers and Girl, Interrupted. I could imagine what Boll wanted from this film but it all falls flat. Heart of America is that one film that has nothing in it to even give it credit as an auteur's work. It is bland, full with inane dialogue, and manages to bring nothing new to the school shooting phenomenon. Maybe if Boll stopped creating much-maligned cinema, kids wouldn't lash out against their peers.

FAR CRY

Uwe Boll (2008)

Uwe Boll is without a doubt the Ed Wood* of our time. He creates video game film after video game film and legions of furious fans retaliate with lewd, crude comments towards his film making. The real kicker is that none of these "horrible" adaptations are based on good games so we're not missing anything really. The House of the Dead was a terrible, repetitive game and same with the film but for the films sake, reloading wasn't tiring, in fact, reloading never happened. We just popped the DVD in and let the rest unfold. Bloodrayne is an annoying and also repetitive vampire 3rd person action game. I'd rather waste my time on Soul Reaver. This was also an intolerable film. Far Cry marks one of the first quality video game renderings he has done and you know what? It's actually insanely dim-witted but charming to a point of excellence. This made me realize his vision of adaptations was a true and reflective vision of said piece. No one else can bring something of this caliber to film making and keep it legit. A true auteur. Now Far Cry came as a surprise to me, of all people. I'd seen the poster and the protagonist playing Jack Carver looked similar to Kim Sørderholm so I just assumed it was him. Upon viewing it, a very similar nasally voice exploded out of Jack Carver's mouth and it was then that I realized it was the very same Til Schweiger who had a part in SLC Punk in which he infamously screamed "Sink you fool!!" He has recently been cast to appear in Tarantino's unrelated "remake" of Inglourious Basterds. I can only assume he appears as an evil Nazi that gets his head smashed in by some Jew with a corny nickname that borders "Bear Jew." It was Schweiger and Schweiger alone that carried this film to B-movie greatness. While he doesn't portray the "badass" as well as should have been, he makes the film quirky, eventful, and overall fun as shit. I'd played Far Cry a bit and it was built off impressive graphics and streamless landscaping. Now the film doesn't actually scope out these attributes but features an entirely Germanic atmosphere (something not seen in recent cinema) and exhilarating action sequences, which is unheard of for an Uwe Boll movie. No matter how hard the gun play tries, nothing can hold this film up like the lead casting role of Til does. His snarky one-liners and mediocre action scenes (normally involving a handgun) draw in a questionable amount of humorous ethics each bounding to a certain subject; sex, romance, scientific experimentation, stereotypical "wrong place/wrong time" character developments, and an outrageous sense of right and wrong. Sealing this film's Teutonic credo is the antagonist casting of Udo Kier who, of course, plays the egomaniacal tortured artist who spreads his vision of recreating human nature in the form of genetically altered super soldiers, rabid paintings, and genetic mischief. Fuck Bruce Campbell. Long live Til Schweiger. If you haven't played Far Cry, the plot goes as such. Jack Carver, an alcoholic boatman ex-special ops agent, gets hired to bring a reporter to an island known for conspiracy theories based on genetic engineering. He soon finds himself in a heap of trouble. That's the basic of basic right there. With a cast of "Oh, I've seen them before" characters, Far Cry provides endless fun at no additional cost. For an Uwe Boll film, the result is actually hearteningly tacky. It's obvious that he has been honing his skill down into a dire form of get-money produce-quality film making but even this post-processed slice of B-movie cheese is beyond my comprehension. Far Cry is home to very funny times with some scenes with decent choreography. As I said, without Til Schweiger this film would have died on the operating table but somehow, a proverbial phoenix rises from the ashes to bring us one of the biggest surprise hits of our time. And I use "hit" very, very loosely.

Uwe Boll (2009)

I have had many aggressively nihilistic friends over the years, young men who have a hellish fireball of hatred towards modern America and everything that it stands for. Of course, what young white man with a set of testicles and two functional eyes would not be repelled by seeing the land their forefather conquered be turned into a de-industrialized third world that is looted by parasitic diaspora tribes from around the globe. Take that in consideration with all the violent action films Hollywood is pumping out and one won't be surprised to realize there is essentially an underground unorganized army of very pissed off white men. Most of these young men unfortunately use their pent up unharnessed hatred towards their own self-destruction. A friend of mine once blew up a bomb in the parking lot of Wal-Mart only to find himself sharing a jail shower with a group of Negroes. Why couldn't he have been more creative? German Ed Wood Uwe Boll seems to have some hope for these young men in his new action-packed trash masterpiece Rampage, a film that holds no hostages and offers no condolence to America's happy Hollywood-ending loving audiences. All of Uwe Boll's improperly channeled hatred for America and Hollywood has been finally appropriately expressed in his film Rampage. The victims of Rampage are the American majority philistine population, the majority of people that will watch it, the film letting the audience know that not everything is alright at Starbucks or the hair salon. The lead "anti-hero" Bill is a young psychopath with a grudge against society that won't be vaporized merely by taking a massive bong-toke. It is apparent from the get go that Billy boy has a secondary manifesting character that is begging to be unleashed on the society as the film progresses. By the end of the film, one realizes that Bill is a lone wolf that only sees himself as a fellow comrade. In a society where alienating anyone that does not believe in the fantastic myth of a multicultural Utopia and the fallacy of world peace, deranged individuals like Bill are only growing exponentially everyday. The question is who is to blame culturally: Eli Wiesel and Oprah Winfrey or David Duke and Minister King Samir Shabazz? Despite his slight mental instability, Travis Bickle, the Anti-hero of Martin Scorsese's masterpiece The Taxi-Driver, saw some hope for the world. Even saving a young teen prostitute from a weaselly pimp was at least a virtuous deed. Flash forward a couple decades later and most of that urban vigilante hope is now at the level of the bowels of a New York City sewer. Bill of Rampage is not interested in helping anyone, he's just in it for the money. In America, one can make millions by putting a taser to their testicles on TV for the viewing pleasure of America's barbaric programmed audiences. If a jackass like Johnny Knoxville can become rich and famous by degrading himself (as well as degrading his audience), why not just take the money and run whilst unloading bullets? Rampage has a very stupid and generic metal soundtrack that accentu-ates the films overall feeling of unrelenting pathological hatred. The Taxi-Driver had a beautiful Jazz score (and I hate Jazz) that was able to touch more than one nerve. One only has to follow the historical emotional degeneration of film (from The Taxi-Driver to Rampage) to see the overall deluge of American 'kultur.' Is Rampage a work of anti-social action-packed art or a capitalist German Anti-American's most repulsive cinematic fart? The film is merely what it is at face value, an aggressive emotional response to an uncertain occidental world. I have no doubt in my mind that Rampage will set some idiot off on a killing Rampage and I would not be surprised if that was one of Uwe Boll's intentions with the film. The world is no longer feeling sorry for the United States, a country that prides itself on unwarranted arrogance and hating any place/people that prides itself on its cultural achievements. I almost fear that Rampage is an expression of more hideous things to come in America, for there is no evidence to the contrary. Since Hollywood is not interested in expressing American truths (but more interested in covering them up), leave it to an honest hack like Uwe Boll to so glaringly reveal them.

AUSCHWITZ

Uwe Boll (2011)

When I saw the minute longish trailer for Uwe Boll's upcoming film Auschwitz – a B-grade cinematic work that portrays death camp death via Zyklon B and postmortem incineration via unkosher oven – I was more than a little bit intrigued. In the trailer, Uwe Boll can be seen dressed up in SS garb while guarding the gas chamber door in an unintentionally hilarious manner. Upon first watching the trailer, I thought Auschwitz was an exploitation film as the deaths are portrayed in a manner that would probably bring a tear to Spielberg's Asiatic eyes and incite unrelenting ecstasy in the blackest of hearts (especially members of the Black Israelites). In reality, Auschwitz is a docudrama that was supposedly designed to spark fear in the souls of thoroughly desensitized American audiences, as well as sinister historical revisionists. In various interviews, Boll has remarked that films like Schindler's List are no longer emotionally and aesthetically potent enough to leave a powerful mark on modern moviegoing audiences, thus, the German director thought it was his duty as a good German to make a film that would provoke fear, sympathy, and historical knowledge in common apathetic folks and demonic anti-Semites alike. Boll has summed up his cinematic mission with Auschwitz as follows, "The movie is made for the people who deny or don't know enough about the holocaust. It will possibly be tough for survivors to watch that movie, but I think they will agree that the movie is important." Showing his true commitment to historical authenticity, Boll even went as far as hiring a real holocaust survivor to play an extra in the film, stating "We actually had a survivor in the gas chamber, and he was overwhelmed with the situation. If you see the movie, he is the old man just standing there while everybody was flipping out." Auschwitz is divided into separate parts; a dramatic portrayal of the Teutonic murder mills and a segment where Boll interviews German high school students to find out how well versed they are in Holocaust trivia; no doubt a deranged dichotomy. Unfortunately, these two separate segments are from seamlessly interconnected; thus, the film sometimes feels like a jumble mix of anti-pornographic Jew-slaughtering and abandoned footage from an aborted after school special. During the beginning of Auschwitz, Boll makes the questionable claim that various academic professors have congratulated him on being "German" due to his Fatherland's history of Jewocide. Of course, anyone who has ever had the misfortune of being involved with the modern academic world knows that such views can only result in career suicide, so I am somewhat dubious of Boll's claims. Additionally, I doubt many people will buy Boll's purported empathy for the Jews while watching Auschwitz as he seems to have made the film for the sole purpose of stirring sensationalism that sells. I certainly cannot think of another film where naked prepubescent corpses are run through an easy-incinerate oven. I honestly would not be surprised if Boll viewed Agustí Villaronga's sicko masterpiece In a Glass Cage (1987) religiously for inspiration throughout the production of the Auschwitz. The fact that Auschwitz, like Boll's politically incorrect satire Blubberella, was made with the leftover set from BloodRayne 3: The Third Reich, only makes the film seem all the more insincere yet, at the same time, strangely charming.

One mustn't forget that Uwe Boll is infamously known for heckling and baiting three of the biggest Jewish filmmakers in Hollywood: Steven Spielberg, Michael Bay, and Eli Roth. Of course, most liberally inclined individuals, especially modern cosmopolitan members of the self-loathing post-Holocaust Germanic race, tend to refrain from verbally assaulting members of the Judaic persuasion yet bodacious Boll has publicly bullied members of God's chosen race like a jubilant SA brownshirt who got lost at a Hebraic wedding. In short, Uwe Boll's empathy for his subjects in Auschwitz seems about as honest as Spielberg's emotions would be had he directed a film about the Anglo-American firebombing of Dresden, Germany (aka the "German" Holocaust) during World War II. Although Boll may be less than honest in regard to his condemnation of Germany's infamous past, that does not mean that Auschwitz is a film that is totally devoid of historical accuracy. In fact (and unsurprisingly), most viewer will learn more about the Holocaust and National Socialism watching Boll's B-grade death camp flick than by watching Spielberg's Shoah epic; Schindler's List. Although post-World war II German youth may have had their brains lobotomized via Americanization of the Fatherland just like American adolescents do, they are certainly more proficient in history than their former "freedom loving" occupiers. Aside from the non-Aryan (aka Ausländer) German high school students featured in Auschwitz, most of the ethnic German teens featured in the film seem to know quite a bit about Das Dritte Reich. For example, a goofy hippie Aryan teen discusses Austrian rune-master Guido von List's occult influence on National Socialist ideology; a subject that is no doubt unknown to your average American history professor. Of course, films like Schindler's List are designed to stir the emotions of goys and god's special girls and boys alike, thus, one cannot criticize Spielberg for directing a film that is nothing more than big budget and expertly disguised agitprop. When it comes down to it (and this is very low, I might add!), Auschwitz is one of the most bold and uncompromising looks at everyone's favorite death camp. After all, what other German director would have the glorious gall to include himself in a film about Auschwitz as a German guard who is "just following orders." I don't think I am the only one that would agree that Boll has a striking resemblance to Rudolf Höss; the real-life first commandant of Auschwitz concentration camp. I certainly would not complain if Boll decided to direct and play the lead role in a biopic about Höss; der todesking of the Holocaust. After all, it is the duty of every good German citizen to honor the legacy of their ancestors.

AUSCHWITZ

At the beginning of his filmmaking career, and while still a thoroughly confused work in progress, Uwe Boll directed Amoklauf (1994); a pretentious artsy farty serial killer flick that attempted (but failed) to steal the psychopathic cinematic brilliance of films directed by fellow Aryan auteur filmmakers Michael Haneke, Gerald Kargl, and Jörg Buttgereit. Of course, Dr. Boll soon realized that if he ever wanted to have a financially successful career in filmmaking, he would have to make films that could further wet the lips of drooling American buffoons, therefore, making Auschwitz was only the next logical step in his somewhat successful and equally notorious filmmaking career. The name of the game when working in Hollywood is prostitution and Uwe Boll has certainly proven to be quite the ghetto gigolo yet unlike most individuals working the streets of Sunset Boulevard, he has been able to maintain some dignity due to the dubious ambiguity and subversive subtexts of his films. It is pretty much a given that most audiences will find the production line murder featured in Auschwitz to be a glaring exercise in mores-shattering bad taste, but it is also the most rewarding and memorable aspect of the film. I think that Uwe Boll might want to consider creating a director's cut of Auschwitz by exterminating the high school interview segments from the film. At the very least, Auschwitz is worth viewing just for the trip down Heaven's Street. Some film critics have already described the film as a work of "torture porn" but Auschwitz – with its assortment of ghastly nude bodies of every age and size; which are more horrifying than the actual Nazi gassings – lacks even the slightest inkling of eroticism (unless you have some sort of bizarre pedophile/necrophiliac dual-fetish). If Boll was aiming for all-encompassing ugliness with Auschwitz, he most certainly achieved it. Of course, as one finds out while watching the film, Mr. Boll certainly did not lose his appetite while standing around nude and supremely emaciated death camp slaves. Now I just wish I could hear Steven Spielberg's thoughts on Auschwitz.

If there is any modern day film director who has a special talent for bullying the American-public-hating cynics that run and make films in Hollywood, it is Aryan schlockmeister auteur Uwe Boll. In his 2011 film Blubberella, Boll once again displays his venomous yet jestful hatred for Tinseltown swindlers by parodying their film parodies. The German director humbly summed up the synopsis of his film as follows, "The first female fat superhero ... She will kick major ass - with her major ass ... All the BLOODRAYNE fans will love that movie!" Blubberella takes its title from the obese and obscenely repellent American ½ vampire-½ human protagonist of the film who lusts after food more than she lusts after blood. Blubberella's rapist psychiatrist (whose name is Dr. Freud) believes that she substitutes food for sex, but that doesn't stop her from trying to manhandle any swinging dick that has the misfortune of passing through her rather large general radius. Like most obese white chicks, Blubberella was voted in high school as the girl most likely to fornicate with black boyz. In the 70 + year tradition of endless anti-Aryan Hollywood films, Blubberella is a film about a protagonist who is on a mission to exterminate as many Nazis as possible, especially those that won't share their extra-meaty foot-long subs. Although it may seem far-fetched that an extremely large and equally slow white girl is able to kill entire squads of Nazis, it is no more improbable than Quentin Tarantino's Inglourious Basterds (2009); a film with such an absurd premise that it portrays a group of Judaic mensch as SS-crushing-super-commandos. In between killing American and British actors portraying Nazis (another Hollywood favorite Boll pokes fun at), Blubberella unsuccessfully attempts to pick up Jewish perverts on a dating website (no doubt, poking fun at Friedberg and Seltzer's Date Movie). Boll's inclusion of modern technology in a film that is set in the Nazi era is indubitably his way of mocking the fact that Hollywood is obsessed with keeping the fear and evil of the long-dead Nazis alive, thus Blubberella could be best described as Boll's noble attempt at creating an anti-Inglourious Basterds (like the Jewish Basterd's in Tarantino's film, Blubberella cites "killing Nazis" as one her favorite hobbies). To describe Blubberella as a ridiculously retarded movie would be an understatement, but that doesn't mean that Uwe Boll failed to assemble the ultimate cinematic attack against Hollywood and loathsome audience-denigrating hack filmmakers like Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer.

Like most retrograde Hollywood satires, Blubberella playfully assaults the usual subjects: Nazis, Hitler, gays, blacks, charming gentlemen, and everything else Americans are supposed to be concerned with. Of course, Uwe Boll's portrayal and execution of these subjects is quite different when compared to post-modern Hollywood satires, as Blubberella is far from politically incorrect and ultimately a big German, "Fuck you!" to neo-vaudevillian Hollywood. In one especially reflexive and self-conscious scene, a Nazi officer retorts to Blubberella the blimp that Germans do have a sense of humor, thus mocking Hollywood's portrayal of Germans (especially Nazi officers) as uncomical authoritarian buffoons. Boll is well known in the cinema world for challenging various Hollywood blockbuster directors and film critics to boxing matches, but – being the girly men that they are – have all declined to partake in the German Ed Wood's challenge. Instead, Boll features a film critic in Blubberella – who also happens to be a rat-like vampire that somewhat resembles Count Orlok from F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922) – being cruelly experimented on by an enthusiastic Nazi doctor. Boll also refrains from exhibiting the sort of Negrophilia that is typical of a Hollywood director. Throughout Blubberella, various white actors appear in blackface (an early trade of Jewish Vaudevillian performers and Hollywood actors) and act like harlequin tools with chips on their shoulders. In a nightmarish dream sequence in the film, Brendan Fletcher (who is in blackface) – the star of Boll's Rampage (2009) – aggressively mumbles about how many times he has been shot (while speaking to Claus von Stauffenberg) as if it is some sort of honor. The wee blackface man also states (after a white man mentions the Congo; possibly the most crime ridden nation in the world), “why you gotzta always be talkin bout da Congo?” I can only assume that Boll was lampooning the way Hollywood filmmakers often portray black characters as domineering, thus causing nervous laughter and fear in white American audiences via unconscious sublimation. Boll also had the wonderful gall to satirize the quasi-blaxploitation drama Precious (2009). During this exceedingly grotesque scene, a white man in blackface portrays Blubberella's heckling and sadistically abusive mother (the inverse of the Hollywood trash comedy White Chicks). After watching Blubberella, it will be apparent to the viewer that Germans do have a sense of humor, for in Boll's world, Hollywood-invented America rightfully becomes the central butt of the joke.

Although I expected Blubberella to be at least mildly humorous, it far exceeded my relatively slim expectations. It is not often that a filmmaker successfully satires the unsaintly satire saints of Hollywood, thus beating them at their own cynical game. Of course, Boll has been one of the greatest international rivals of Hollywood since the beginning. With his 2003 piece-of-celluloid-excrement House of the Dead, Boll managed to make a pretty penny at virtually no cost to himself via German government funding and virtually nonexistent production values that rival the goofy splatter flicks of Herschell Gordon Lewis. For Blubberella and Auschwitz (2011), Boll merely recycled the sets from his film Bloodrayne: The Third Reich (2010), henceforth, proving his keen business sense. Although Boll's cameo in Blubberella as an unconventionally blissful and mirthful Adolf Hitler might seem a tad offensive to certain viewers, his appearance in Auschwitz as an SS guard who tends the Jew-incinerating ovens at everyone's favorite death camp will certainly cause heads to explode. If you're looking to see a severely retarded comedy where political correctness has been disposed of in a Nazi-era urinal, Blubberella is bound to provide you with a splendid and farcical post-postmodern time. I suspect that Auschwitz may turn out to be Boll's masterpiece, but until then, watch Blubberella; a film that lets sentimental American audiences know that fat girls need love too.

I LOVE YOU, I KILL YOU
I LOVE YOU, I KILL YOU

Uwe Brandner (1971)

In describing the pseudo-sci-fi dystopian anti-Heimat film I Love You, I Kill You (1971) aka Ich liebe dich, ich töte dich directed by unfortunately forgotten German New Cinema auteur Uwe Brandner (Blinker, 50/50 aka Halbe-Halbe), Austrian-born Jewish-American cineaste Amos Vogel wrote in his magnum opus Film as a Subversive Art (1974), "Through stylized acting, mysterious silences, disrupted sentences and frozen action, an atmosphere of alienation and stagnation permeates what the director ironically calls "a picture-book story of our Vaterland -- a vicious satire of the sentimental German "Heimat" films of the past." Personally, I think Vogel is at least half-wrong and merely spurred by his hatred of Teutons and the fact he was forced to flee Austria as a teenager due to Uncle Adolf's Anschluss in 1938, as I Love You, I Kill You is less a satire than a conspicuously culturally pessimistic depiction of the Fatherland's deluge as a result of the Second World War as directed by a filmmaker who, like so many of his generation, was kicked out his hometown (Brandner was born on May 23, 1941 in Reichenberg, Sudetenland, Germany, which was later turned into Liberec, Czech Republic after Stalin expelled all the Germans) at a young age and forced to accept Americanized West Germany as his new home. Ironically, the Heimatfilm ("homeland-film") genre—a sentimentalist film style that was popular from the late-1940s to early-1970s that promoted healthy rural living, family, clean morality, and traditionalism—was largely made for the 12 million Germans (known as "Vertriebene"), like director Brandner's family, who were kicked out of their homes located in former eastern territories of the Third Reich and were longing for a sense of kinship and community in their new adopted hometowns in the West. With I Love You, I Kill You, I felt little, if any, sense of satire and more of an apocalyptic depiction of a 'fascistic' village imploding from within, as if director Brandner was attempting to create a post-Nazi Heimat flick that allegorically depicts the fall of the Sudetenland as a result of National Socialism tendencies, but strategically disguising the work as counter-culture-themed anti-Heimat flick so as to appeal to cinematic trends of that time. The völkisch yet simultaneously anti-völkisch tale of an effeminate teacher who comes to a small rural village to teach and who starts a homoerotic romantic relationship with a masculine hunter, only to be betrayed by said hunter, I Love You, I Kill You was once described by Time Out magazine as a "L'Age d'Or for the valium generation" and "a rural version of Performance," but such descriptions betray the film's distinctly and innately Teutonic roots and thematic complexity. A sort of less reductionist-driven take on Peter Fleischmann's 'classic' anti-Heimat flick Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdszenen aus Niederbayern meets The Wicker Man (1973) and The Hamburg Syndrome (1979) aka Die Hamburger Krankheit, I Love You, I Kill You is a darkly romantic Heimat flick that falls somewhere in between rural kraut homo Heaven and Hell.

I Love You, I Kill You begins in an atmospheric Bavarian field where a fellow simply known as the 'Hunter' (Rolf Becker, the super Aryan blond father of popular Mischling Jewish actors Ben and Meret Becker) has just shot a man dead with his shotgun in a film somewhat sardonically described in its opening credits as "Eine Bildergeschichte aus der Heimat" (aka "a pictorial story from the homelands"). A handsome blond man with a beautiful blonde girlfriend that he enjoys making sweet love to in the scenic countryside, the Hunter's world is ultimately turned upside down when a swarthy and effeminate Teacher (Hannes Fuchs, who only starred in two other films, Fassbinder's Beware of a Holy Whore (1971) and Ulli Lommel and Peter Moland's Haytabo - Falscher Verdacht (1971)) who looks sort of like a gay wop Jim Morrison comes to town to teach grade school children. Apparently, the Teacher has come to the town to replace the nameless/faceless dead man featured at the beginning of I Love You, I Kill You. As the film vaguely hints, the Hunter, whose job is to kill wild wolves and wolf dogs before they prey on wild game, is plagued by a vicious circle of sexual confusion where he befriends, falls in love, and ultimately kills each teacher that comes to town and only at the end of I Love You, I Kill You does he find a perverse form of redemption. Upon first seeing the Teacher, the Hunter whistles at him as if he were a hot chick with big tits and a voluptuous ass. Total opposites (the Hunter is masculine, fair-skinned, and blond, while the Teacher is rather effete, tan, and dark-haired), the Hunter and Teacher seem to compliment one another perfectly as if they are the gay yin-yang of the Bavarian countryside, but things take a turn for the worst when the former teaches the latter to hunt, thus disturbing the natural order of things in the curiously quaint community. Indeed, only the Hunter is allowed to hunt and for whatever inexplicable reason, he teaches the Teacher—a 'progressive' man who has a complete and utter incapacity for following orders and obeying timeless laws—to hunt despite the fact that it is illegal for him to do so. Ironically, it is not homo-sex but hunting that ultimately leads to the Teacher's annihilation.

Ruled over rather ruthlessly by two half-crazed Gestapo-esque cops in fascistic black leather uniforms, the people of the village are kept in check in a Brave New World fashion by being force fed dubious prescription drugs in a manner that has become startlingly common in the contemporary Occident. When an old man who forgot to take his meds declares, "I'm going to kill all of you. I'm so full of anger!" the police simply give him some drugs and he is back to 'normal,' even apologizing to the men in blue for his verbal transgressions. Unfortunately, many of the people in the town seem like retarded robots due to the drugs, as demonstrated by the fact two local men incessantly repeat, "How do you do?" in a seemingly passive-aggressive and somewhat Lynch-esque manner after bumping into the Teacher. While teaching the Teacher how to hunt, the Hunter demonstrates how brainwashed by the state he is by giving the following speech to his new friend: "The government loves our woods. And they show us their appreciation. That's why we have to keep the wolves and wild dogs in line. We can't use poison. The game would perish as well. And then, no more government help. And we wouldn't know what to do." In a rather prophetic scene, a town elder writes, "Maybe someday, we will run out of medicine. That will be the Last Judgment. We have obeyed the laws and need not fear any judge." Of course, Judgment Day comes sooner than expected when the Teacher decides to disobey the rules and rebelliously hunts wild beasts on his own, thus ultimately turning the novice hunter into the hunted when his boyfriend finds out. Despite his steamy sodomite love affair with the Teacher, the Hunter decides to betray his lover and turns him over to the authorities where he is nonsensically machine-gunned down like a rabid dog. Despite betraying his lover in a manner that led to his death, the Hunter flips out and kills the two cops in cold blood immediately after they execute the Teacher, thus concluding I Love You, I Kill You in a rather explosive and anarchistic fashion that more than hints at a dubious future for not only the Hunter, but the entire village as well. Indeed, the Hunter may have finally found the 'redemption' he was looking for, but not before killing at least two of his boy toys and destroying order in the town in the process.

Despite being one of the first films of German New Cinema to receive a commercial international release, I Love You, I Kill You is all but totally unknown today anywhere outside of the German-speaking world and has yet to be released in any home media format in the United States, thus succumbing to the same sad fate as a good portion of the masterpieces of the Teutonic New Wave. Interestingly, despite seeming like the work of a master, I Love You, I Kill You was the first feature directed by auteur Uwe Brandner, who was chiefly a science fiction writer (though he previously worked as a journalist and jazz musician), ever directed and it is nothing short of a shame that his filmmaking career essentially fizzled out before it ever really started. Concluding in a 'redneck lynch mob' fashion not unlike Hunting Scenes from Bavaria, I Love You, I Kill You ultimately iconoclastically breaks with anti-Heimat film convention (the films typically conclude with the loony lynch mob winning) during the final couple moments, thus ending with a rather revolutionary, if not nihilistic, message that begs the viewer to break with outmoded traditions before it is too late and you have killed you beloved sod soul-mate. Indeed, despite its cynical portrayal of the village, I Love You, I Kill You is, at least aesthetically speaking, one of the most poetic, atmospheric, and metaphysical 'Heimat' films I have ever seen as a sort of more coherent but no less mystifying take on what Werner Herzog would later try with Heart of Glass (1976) aka Herz aus Glas. Featuring ethereal country landscapes that are immaculately accented by the sounds of unseen wind chimes and totally silent village buildings and rooms that capture the foreboding calmness of the village, I Love You, I Kill You sincerely attempts to capture the distinct aura of rural Bavaria instead of simply maliciously parodying it like in Hunting Scenes from Bavaria. Interestingly, Thomas Elsaesser wrote in his landmark work New German Cinema: A History (1989) regarding I Love You, I Kill You that it is “a bold attempt to bring the existentialism of Kafka’s Castle to bear on the setting of the Heimat film. The very self-conscious and literary use of genre makes the film chiefly interesting for the way it introduces the figure of the Double, and with it a play on identification and otherness which may have influenced Fassbinder in the conception of Despair (1978).” Personally, as a full-fledged Fassbinder fanatic, I would rather re-watch Brandner’s I Love You, I Kill You over Despair any day.

Indeed, more than anything, I Love You, I Kill You seemed to me like a schizophrenic take on the Heimat film with a dichotomous love-hate relationship for the kraut country directed by a man who was uprooted from his Eastern hometown by force while just a little lad. While the character of the Hunter is a sort of symbol of traditional man (masculine, lawful, stoic, adventurous, etc.), the Teacher is a symbol of decadent modern man (effeminate, disorderly, unkempt, hysterical, etc.), so naturally when the two men unite it results in complete and utter catastrophe, thus I Love You, I Kill You expresses a sort of obvious counter-culture message that the ‘old Germany’ and ‘new Germany’ cannot live together peacefully and that the geographically butchered nation is destined for a cataclysmic future (which would soon arrive in the form of far-left terrorist groups like the Baader-Meinhof Group not long after the film was released). Indeed, I Love You, I Kill You might have an anti-authoritarian message, but it also has no real answers, thus (unwittingly) hinting that a Germany without traditional culture and tradition has no future at all, which the present-day German film industry pretty much confirms, at least culturally speaking. A rather reluctant parable about freedom against fascism, I Love You, I Kill You ultimately made me question what sort of film Uwe Brandner would have directed had Uncle Adolf won the war and had his family not been expelled from the Sudetenland, as the director’s ‘anti-Heimat’ flick may cast a critical eye on the kraut countryside, but it is also a work that longs for and worships the natural beauty of rural Teutonia. A contradictory love-hate depiction of a land where the ‘blood and soil’ has been despoiled by a completely catastrophic Second World War, I Love You, I Kill You is probably the most thematically complex and conflicted ‘anti-Heimat’ flick ever made, thus making it mandatory for anyone interested in the particular Teutonic zeitgeist when it was made. Of course, in its dystopian depiction of a people that have to be ritualistically drugged so they do not run amok, I Love You, I Kill You, like any decent work of classic science fiction, will seem strikingly and frighteningly prophetic to American viewers.

THE END OF THE RAINBOW
THE END OF THE RAINBOW

Uwe Frießner (1979)

Before seemingly half-autistic American queer auteur Gus van Sant (Drugstore Cowboy, Elephant) managed to coerce teenage heartthrobs River Phoenix and Keanu Reeves into playing down-and-out prick-peddlers with his pseudo-Shakespearean hustler flick My Own Private Idaho (1991), a totally unknown German TV director named Uwe Frießner (Baby, Der Drücker) directed a Teutonic teen hustler flick of the truly realist sort with mostly non-actors entitled The End of the Rainbow (1979) aka Das Ende des Regenbogens that depicted late-1970s Berlin as a post-industrial wasteland inhabited by forsaken human scavengers with nasty nihilistic attitudes. Indeed, sort of the real Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) as a gritty 'kid leather' work that does not make the major mistake of sensationally wandering into exploitation territory, The End of the Rainbow managed to snag the film award in silver for "Outstanding Feature Film" ("Beste Spielfilm") at the 1980 Deutscher Filmpreis (German Film Awards) and despite being a non-actor in his first film role, lead actor Thomas Kufahl won the film award in gold for "Best Performance by an Actor in a Leading Role" ("Beste darstellerische Leistung - Männliche Hauptrolle"). Despite its initial critical and commercial success, The End of the Rainbow—not unlike so many great German flicks of its era—is all but totally forgotten today as a work that, rather unfortunately, might be best described today as piece of kraut celluloid cultural debris. Directed by a seemingly cultivated fellow who studied geology, philosophy, and literature and worked as a roofer and deep sea fisherman before studying film at the German Film and Television Academy (DFFB) and becoming a marginally successful filmmaker, The End of the Rainbow is a genuine proletarian picture and not some sort of phony leftist filmic polemic disguised as sophisticated arthouse work. Dedicated to the wasted unlife of a born loser who committed suicide at the ripe age of 18 after "years of trying in vain to master his own life," The End of the Rainbow is not a film that follows in the tradition of German New Cinema but has more aesthetically in common with pathologically gritty anti-intellectual/anti-arthouse works like Klaus Lemke's Rocker (1972), Roland Klick's Bübchen (1968) and Supermarkt (1974), and the 'hard ghetto' West German films of Iranian auteur Sohrab Shahid Sales (Reifezeit aka Time of Maturity, Tagebuch eines Liebenden aka Diary of a Lover). An ambitiously aimless cinéma vérité-like depiction of an aimless and equally snotty teen hustler rebel without a cause, The End of the Rainbow is a rare rent boy flick without a single scene of gratuitous sold sodomite sex, yet it still manages to be a visceral celluloid experience that gets to the bottom of a young fellow's forlorn soul.

As depicted in the first couple minutes of The End of the Rainbow, long haired 17-year-old teen rebel Jimmi (Thomas Kufahl) makes a meager living peddling his prick and conning people out of their cash. Put in a youth home while just a still wee lad after his prole papa routinely brutally beat him, Jimmi graduated on to thieving from department stores at age 13 and breaking into cars and stealing car radios at the age of 15. Innately antisocial and no less self-destructive, Jimmi has a complete and utter incapacity for empathy and developing genuine relationships with other human beings despite the fact that he has older adult friends who support and encourage him to better his loser life. When not engaging in petty crime with his swarthy Turk-like twink friend Bernie (Henry Lutze), Jimmi takes sanctuary at the apartment of his ambiguously gay friend Dieter (played by Udo Samel of Reinhard Hauff's Knife in the Head (1978) and Michael Haneke's The Seventh Continent (1989)), his partner Monika (Sabine Beck-Baruth), and their mutual artist friend Jörg (Heinz Hoenig), who bares a striking resemblance to Bavarian filmmaker Herbert Achternbusch. On top of providing Jimmi with free food and shelter, Dieter tries in vain to get his young hustler friend to speak and dress properly and seek gainful employment opportunities, but the hapless hustler fails time and time again as he lacks the confidence, self-control, and common sense to do simple things that most people take for granted. Ostensibly gay-for-pay, Jimmi eventually begins a romantic relationship with an equally aimless and lazy Slavic teen named Gabi (Slavica Rankovic) who, among other things, is a drug addict (with valium being her choice high) who once made a failed attempt at suicide by swallowing an entire bottle of sleeping pills. Jimmi and Gabi's relationship officially starts after the two get it on doggy style in an abandoned warehouse and the hustler romantically asks the little lady, "Are we a couple now?" as if that is the sole determinant for ushering in a love affair. Not long after, Jimmi manages to secure a real job doing menial labor at a small factory, thus his life actually begins to derive some meaning and security but it is only short-lived. After losing his job on his second day of work due to pathological laziness and complaining, Jimmi's relationship with Gabi also begins to crumble as she is too high all the time to give a fuck. With the help of his less than loyal buddy Bernie, Jimmi goes to the apartment of Gabi's grandmother (Johanna Karl-Lory) to steal some things, but things go wrong when granny catches them redhanded in the cowardly act of thievery. A quick witted fellow, Bernie punches granny in the face and assumedly kills her. In the end, Jimmi and Bernie run out of dead granny's apartment with the stolen property. Ultimately, The End of the Rainbow concludes with the following depressing epilogue: "This film is dedicated to Andy. After years of trying in vain to master his own life, as an 18 year old, he decided to master at least his own death. With a carefully thought out plan, succeeding for the first time in his life after weeks of preparations, he ended his life between the 15th and the 18th of February 1976." Indeed, Jimmi/Andy finally made it to the end of the teen rebel rainbow and what he found on the other side was a perennial void.

A work that, whether intentional or not, totally demystifies the retarded romance associated with teen rebellion, The End of the Rainbow acts as sort of strikingly somber celluloid antidote to pseudo-zany kiddy-criminal-saluting Hollywood youth rebellion flicks like Over the Edge (1979) starring Matt Dillon. Of course, while auteur Uwe Frießner was more discreet and subtle in handling such depictions, the protagonist of The End of the Rainbow is undoubtedly eroticized in a sort of semi-cryptic way like Dillon in Over the Edge, albeit in a more 'tasteful' fashion. In its depiction of ostensible 'good guy' Dieter as a fellow that helps antihero Jimmi but also wants to get in his pants (even though he never does, even if Jimmi does his damndest to lead him on), The End of the Rainbow ultimately portrays a decidedly dismal and dejecting post-Wirtschaftswunder world where no one is innocent and where everyone can be bought and sold. Additionally, in its portrayal of an old woman being escorted off a train by the police for not having a ticket, The End of the Rainbow presents the German Federal Republic as a dreary dystopian nightmare of the nonsensically bureaucratic sort that, although managing to routinely bust normal citizens for petty indiscretions, cannot even manage to put a single dent in a major epidemic of teenage homelessness, drug addiction, and prostitution. Luckily, The End of the Rainbow does not pretend to offer any answers to said epidemics, but merely presents such nationally unflattering societal problems in a uniquely objective fashion without the glaring pain of a superlatively shallow leftist message. Indeed, in terms of its social realism, Frießner's flick is like the 'Bicycle Thieves (1948) aka Ladri di biciclette of German Queer Cinema,' only all the more relevant and modern in its essence. Unlike similarly themed German films like Peter Kern's Gossenkind (1992) aka Street Kid, The End of the Rainbow does not seem like it was directed by a depraved degenerate drooling over spoiled youth and is thus a work that transcends the ghettoized label of 'queer cinema.' Indeed, forget the heroin-packed David Bowie fan worship of Christiane F., The End of the Rainbow is the real Teutonic teen flesh-peddling deal and the sparingly used soundtrack is not bad either.

KANAKERBRAUT

Who gives a shit about the white working-class? Certainly not the white bourgeoisie nor the rich, but especially not members of the white working-class itself as demonstrated by their plague-like tendency for mixing with other untermensch races, alcoholism and drug addiction, prideful ignorance, etc., or at least someone would assume so much after watching a cinematic work so decidedly depressing as Kanakerbraut (1984) aka White Trash directed by rather unsung German auteur Uwe Schrader (Sierra Leone, Mau Mau). Shot on Super 16mm film stock, White Trash is the 56-minute tale of a desperate and drunk unemployed member of the alcoholic Berlin working-class whose wife has left him and who must find a number of pathetically creative ways to obtain money so as to not starve to death, or at least not suffer from alcohol withdrawal. Following in the anti-German New Cinema tradition, White Trash is a sort of urban-decay-driven work in the 'no bullshit' kraut celluloid spirit of Roland Klick (Bübchen, Supermarkt), Klaus Lemke (Rocker, Arabian Nights), Uwe Frießner (The End of the Rainbow aka Das Ende des Regenbogens, Baby), Canadian-Austrian John Cook (Artischocke, Ich Schaff's Einfach Nimmer), and Iranian exile Sohrab Shahid Saless (Ordnung aka Order, Utopia). Indeed, like Italian neorealism minus the Mediterranean sentimentalism, White Trash is the sort of film that stands against everything Hollywood is all about as a work of gritty anti-fantasy that forces the viewer to dwell in the despair of the Aryan ghetto to the point of virtual suffocation in what amounts to a somewhat short film that has more genuine emotion and truth than all three films in the entire The Lord of the Rings (2001-2003) trilogy directed by Peter Jackson. A daunting depiction of late Cold War era West Deutschland where illiterate Turks get more Teutonic pussy than the average proletarian Aryan and the only escape from the misery of their lives is beer and bratwurst, White Trash is ultimately a work that makes Uncle Adolf's Beer Hall Putsch seem like a beauteous memory of the good old days by comparison. Indeed, White Trash is the social realist equivalent to the infamous drunk krauts of Reeperbahn Strasse, Hamburg scene featured in Mondo cane (1962), albeit minus most of the dark humor (not that Schrader's film is not humorous in its own way).

Berlin-based out-of-work Teutonic everyman Paul (Peter Franke) is watching porn loops but he is too melancholy to really give a shit. A 40-year-old man with far too much alcohol in his blood (or too much blood in his alcohol), Paul has always been a degenerate dipsomaniac but it was not until he lost his job that his beloved wife Babs left him and, in turn, left him in the sorry state he is in today. Still convinced she will come back one day, Paul sends her a card for their anniversary in which he wrote his estranged beloved the following pathetic words: "Yesterday I saw Eva and your mother. I was standing behind a hedge and watched my own daughter like a criminal. When I think about the way things used to be, then, it tears my heart apart.” Paul’s best friend is an unreliable petty criminal named Guenther (Alfred Raschke) who likes naïve underage girls and is prone to being arrested by the police at the most random moments (indeed, the first scene in which Paul’s friend is introduced, he is also soon arrested). One day, Paul goes to the same bar he always frequents and decides to talk to an old used-up slag named Lisa (Brigitte Janner) who is depressed because her towelhead Turk boyfriend has left her and is now doing dangerous work somewhere in Sudan. In defense of her pathological miscegenation, Lisa states regarding her raunchy love of Turks, “they still have this emotion, you know,” as if Deutschland is inhabited by dead souls. While one would assume their mutual lovelorn loneliness should bring them together, Paul is too negative and depressed and Lisa is too bitchy and slutty for the two develop anything resembling a mutual love (or even friendship) for one another. While hanging out with one another in a bar, Lisa cuckolds Paul by getting with a fat businessman (Nikolaus Dutsch), who she states of, “Oh, so there are still nice people in this country of ours.” All three end up taking a taxi back to the businessman’s apartment and on the way Lisa hypocritically states while channeling Travis Bickle, “One should take a giant hose and wash all the scum off the streets,” as if she was not a STD-ridden skank. Of course, Lisa and the Businessman begin making repulsive lard ass love, but the former decides to take a break to verbally berate Paul about his wife leaving him. Not unsurprisingly, Paul calls Lisa a “slut” and “floozy” and she retorts by saying he, “will end up at the salvation army in the antisocial division.” Of course, Lisa and the businessman finally tell Paul to “piss off” as they want to screw, so he leaves. More desperate than ever, Paul makes a failed attempt at a robbery with a toy gun and donates blood to make some money. In the end, Paul once again drowns his sorrow in alcohol, but manages to shed a smile after being given a free drink by a Turkish man celebrating the marriage of a relative. Indeed, it seems that Paul learns that multiculturalism has at least one advantage.

Advertised as “a really big little film,” White Trash would ultimately win auteur Uwe Schrader the ‘Film Award in Gold’ for “Best Direction” at the German Film Awards (aka Deutscher Filmpreis) in 1984 and would also be nominated for “Best Feature” at the Chicago International Film Festival the same year, but the work seems to have fallen into obscurity ever since. Although, aesthetically speaking, White Trash is not exactly anything special, the film does manage to communicate the misery of the working-class in a seemingly sincere fashion that an intellectually pedantic and emotionally vapid cappuccino communist like Alexander Kluge could only dream of. Additionally, compared to similarly themed works of its time, White Trash is far from politically correct as demonstrated by a scene in the film where the protagonist is listening to a comedian who proudly states, “UN...In German that’s the ‘Unorganized Nations.' They want to help underdeveloped countries, those that just aren't that far yet, through advice and action. And you have to say those Negroes are good at taking. Everything, really. And they keep developing. And how! And they're grateful, those Utschebbses [racial slur]." Indeed, it certainly says something about a nation when it cannot help its own working-class, yet feels the need to help some melanin-rich, food-poor AIDS-addled untermensch from the third world so as to prove they are cuckolded to America and prove that their country no longer has any evil Hitlerite ideals, especially those that might benefit the white proletarian majority. Of course, White Trash is just as much, if not more so, about America as it is about Germany. After all, on top of the fact that the majority of America's white working-class has either succumbed to alcoholism and/or drug addiction, miscegenation has also become quite trendy among the fatherless white whores from this background. That being said, the main difference between the protagonist of White Trash and his contemporary equivalent is that the latter would be an illiterate negrophiliac wigger who has never had gainful employment in his entire life but probably has a bastard kid or two, while the former was at least at one time gainfully employed and married to the mother of his daughter. The white trash of White Trash seem a lot more tolerable than the fat ass, rap-blasting, mud-dipping white negroes of today. Celluloid sociology by a cynic with a heart (albeit, a somewhat dark one), White Trash is a film that one might suspect Jim Goad (ANSWER Me!, The Redneck Manifesto) would direct if he was a kraut instead of mere bottom-of-the-barrel Irish-American white trash.

SIERRA LEONE

Uwe Schrader (1987)

Undoubtedly, one of the best-kept secrets of post-Fassbinder German cinema is the so-called 'Proletarian Trilogy' of kraut auteur Uwe Schrader. For whatever reason, aside from an obscure short entitled Phantom (1979), the documentary Kein Mord, kein Totschlag (1985), and a couple other mysterious works that have been neglected to be added to imdb, Schrader is only responsible for directing the three films in his trilogy—Kanakerbraut (1984) aka White Trash, Sierra Leone (1987) aka Seeking a Purpose – Sierra Leone, and Mau Mau (1992)—yet these little 'social realist' works pretty much unequivocally prove that this almost criminally underrated auteur is one of the most important celluloid cultural critics of his post-kultur zeitgeist. In fact, auteur Wim Wenders (Wings of Desire, Paris, Texas) once described Schrader as a filmmaker in the tradition of Fassbinder who managed to carry the revolutionary, socially scathing spirit of German cinema of the 1970s into the 1990s. Indeed, with his second film in the trilogy, Sierra Leone, Schrader demonstrates that Teutonia is a post-industrialist technocratic nightmarish of the culturally and spiritually vacant, socially alienating, and prole-hating sort where, to quote the neofolk outfit Death In June, "It Is The Fate Of Our Age That We Fight In Isolation." Centering around a wandering working-class Teuton who moves back to his decidedly depressing urban hometown in West Germany after spending three years working in an exotic land in West Africa, Sierra Leone keenly depicts the lapsed Fatherland as what neo-Wagnerite Hans-Jürgen Syberberg once described as being, "spiritually disinherited and dispossessed... a country without a homeland, without 'Heimat'," where Weltschmerz has spread like the plague, Fräulein-fucking mongrel soldiers from an ex-colony still occupy the nation a number of decades after the Second World War, man and woman have become irreparably alienated from one another, and the nuclear family has become a pastiche memory from a time when people still had a desire to live and even reproduce. Despite being a conspicuously pessimistic work that seems like it could have been directed by Teutonic prophet of decline Oswald Spengler's culturally disinherited grandson, Sierra Leone does not wallow in melancholy and self-pity but instead takes a stoic approach to social sickness in the Heimat that is bound to act as a sort of celluloid torture for those filmgoers that find themselves able to get lost in Spielberg's superlatively superficial celluloid dream worlds.

Baldheaded yet hardheaded Aryan lumpenprole Fred (Christian Redl, who is probably best known for portraying Generaloberst Alfred Jodl in Oliver Hirschbiegel's Downfall (2004) aka Der Untergang)—a mostly miserable and unemotional man described by one of his girlfriends as having "no faith in human nature"—has spent the last three years doing field installation work in the West African nation of Sierra Leone and after saving up a nice sum of money for his efforts, he heads back to his hometown on the outskirts of an unnamed and increasingly de-industrialized West German city to reacquaint himself with the life he, for whatever irrational reason, left behind on a whim. Little does Fred realize that his confrontation with his old life will prove to be a real-life nightmare as he bears witness to the discernible degeneration of his city and the disillusionment with life among his friends and ex-girlfriends. The first person Fred meets upon arriving back in Germany is his ex-wife Rita (Constanze Engelbrecht, who bears a striking resemblance to German-American Hollywood star Katherine Heigl), who he left 3 years ago without notice or subsequent contact, though he was at least responsible enough to wire his unloved beloved money each month. Quite naturally, Fred's ex-wife rules out any potential prospect of ever getting back together (after all, she has moved on by hooking up with the enemy, an American GI), so he goes on his merry way and checks into a sleazy hotel run by a semi-trashy young chick named Alma (Ann-Gisel Glass, who got her start in film acting playing the eponymous role in the French-Italian exploitation rip-off of Christiane F. (1981), Hanna D.: The Girl from Vondel Park (1984)). Alma is supported by a rather grotesque and abusive sugar daddy with male breasts (aka 'bitch tits') who is old enough to be her father and owns the hotel she works at, but she will ultimately find a new 'love' prospect in the form of Fred. Meanwhile, Fred hooks up with his ex-girlfriend and true 'great love' Vera (Rita Russek, who starred in Ingmar Bergman's underrated West German flick From the Life of the Marionettes (1980)), but all that comes out of their reuniting is rough sex that inspires the lady to yell, "are you insane?...Ouch...You're hurting me!" in discernible discomfort. As he reveals to Vera, Fred has mixed feelings about being back in Germany, confessing, "It's crazy. When you're here, you want to be somewhere else. And once you're gone, you long for this place." While on what will ultimately be his final date with Vera at a bar, Fred follows an American GI, who is the new boy toy of his ex-wife Rita, into a bathroom and channels all his pent up hatred on the soldier, beating the unwitting soldier while he is taking a leak in what is easily the most blatantly emotional scene of Sierra Leone, a film where hatred and bitterness are the only real forms of visceral passion.

Feeling nostalgic, Fred also decides to visit his old job at a factory, where the foreman states regarding 'changes' around the company that there are, "more and more machines...Fewer and fewer people. They've just fired some more. You can be happy that you made it out of here. Things aren't too rosy here anymore." When Fred goes to his favorite bar to hangout with all his old friends, he is in for further disappointment after one of his 'friends' insults him by stating, "You always thought you were better. You asshole." The same friend also remarks regarding Fred's self-imposed exile on the Dark Continent, "AF-RI-KA...That's where they sent the ones who weren't right in the head." And, of course, there is certainly something missing in Fred, but it seems to be more related to his soul. Indeed, Fred must admit to himself that in terms of being back in his homeland, "So much has become strange," and he himself has become all the more stranger as a sort of living and breathing corpse walking amongst fellow zombies who just haven't realized they are dead yet. Another friend gives Fred some support by offering the following insight: "Shit always floats on top...I don't talk like that to offend you. You know that. But if you ask me, people around here don't like you...They've suppressed how miserable they are," and, indeed, while it is often said misery loves company, the protagonist of Sierra Leone has tapped into some meta-misery that would even put kraut liberals suffering from ethno-masochism and post-Auschwitz angst to shame. Ultimately, Fred starts an affair with young dumb Fräulein Alma who, on top of having a tat of her criminal ex-boyfriend's on one of her tiny tits, also reveals that she was forced to give up her sole child to the authorities after her ex-beau was busted by the police. While Fred and Alma seem to get along great at first and decide to leave the city to start a new life together, the drifting prole eventually comes to the ominous realization that he is destined to be alone after observing the misery of an elderly married bartender and ditches his new lover by hitching a ride with a trucker to nowhere land, thus repeating his vicious circle of alienation, deracination, and aimlessness that is his forsaken non-life.

In its unwaveringly unsentimental depiction of Germany as a post-industrial, post-cultural, post-happiness, post-Heimat hellhole, Sierra Leone is indubitably one of the most important, if not almost entirely culturally unflattering, Teutonic cinematic works of its zeitgeist. Indeed, like Werner Schroeter's neo-neorealist urban epic Palermo oder Wolfsburg (1980), Sierra Leone depicts post-WWII 'democratic' Germany as a half-dead technocratic monster with a broken computer that devours the hopes, dreams, and aspirations of its inhabitants, namely its working-class population, while also depriving them of gainful employment and thus driving its citizens to alcoholism and race-hate, among other things. Thankfully, unlike an Alexander Kluge or Helke Sander flick, Sierra Leone is not a pedantic leftist masturbation piece created by a person who has probably never done a day's physical labor in their entire lives, but a gritty no-bullshit flick that seems like it was actually directed by one of the 'working-class heroes' it so candidly depicts. Undoubtedly, protagonist Fred is an angsty, sometimes arrogant and even sometimes unlikeable character and that is exactly what makes him so interesting and strangely sympathetic, albeit not in a superficial sentimental fashion typical of similarly themed films that insincerely attempt to side with the struggle of the ever degenerating Lumpenproletariat. Indeed, in the sole English language review I could find on Sierra Leone, the reviewer described the film as a 'the German answer to Five Easy Pieces (1970)', but I think it would be a disservice to Schrader's film to compare to an unrealistic and, in my opinion, rather overrated Jack Nicholson flick. Unless you're a Fassbinder and/or Herzog fan, or like the gritty non-German New Cinema works of more obscure 'hard ghetto' auteur filmmakers like Iranian exile Sohrab Shaheed Salles, Uwe Frießner, Roland Klick, Klaus Lemke, and John Cook, Sierra Leone will probably prove to be a reasonably painful and disconcerting experience for you, sort of like a spiritual root canal. After all, not many people like seeing their nation being portrayed in a less flattering light than that of a West African slum, but of course, Sierra Leone is not escapist entertainment but an innately insensitive celluloid 'wakeup call' that the German populous clearly did not take heed of. Indeed, when future historians and anthropologists are trying to figure out why Germany committed suicide and disappeared into history with not even a whimper, Sierra Leone would certainly help them fill in some blanks. A filmic journey into the fall of the rank-and-Faustian man, Sierra Leone ultimately does for post-GNC cinema what Spengler's short work Man and Technology: A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life (1931) did for critiquing technology, but as contemporary history has demonstrated, very few people have listened to either the filmmaker or the philosopher.

MAU MAU
MAU MAU

If someone reworked and updated Rainer Werner Fassbinder's masterful Sirkian melodrama Angst essen Seele auf (1974) aka Ali: Fear Eats the Soul about two decades later and completely extinguished the film of all hope, beauty, dignity, and true romance, it would probably resemble Mau Mau (1992) directed by underrated German auteur Uwe Schrader. The third and final chapter in Schrader's 'Proletarian Trilogy' (following Kanakerbraut (1984) aka White Trash and Sierra Leone (1987)), Mau Mau not only features a brown Islamic 'Gastarbeiter' named Ali with a stereotypical weakness for white women, but also conspicuously unflattering lower-middle class krauts that would even make Fassbinder himself cringe in abject disgust. Indeed, while the previous two films in Schrader's trilogy might be exceedingly disconcerting and unwaveringly culturally pessimistic in their own right, Mau Mau seems to take the moldy cake in terms of being the director's most eclectically melancholy-inducing work, yet at the same it is also his funniest and most accessible to date. Unfortunately, Mau Mau is also Schrader's swansong thus making it a sort of cinematic eulogy for auteurism in Deutschland as a work in the spirit of the great films of German New Cinema, as well as a work that quite fittingly depicts the Fatherland as a drunk and senile cultural, spiritual, and emotional void of a nation with no hope, let alone a future. Starring Peter Franke, who previously played the lead in the first film of the director's trilogy, Mau Mau demonstrates that the vicious circle of poverty, alcoholism, loveless sex, spiritual retardation, American trash culture worship, multiculturalism-based race-hate, and melancholy have only become all the more malignant since the eight years when the director first debuted his archetypical 'everyman' working-class kraut hero via White Trash. A revolting social realist work about revolting people doing revolting things and not thinking twice about doing them, Mau Mau—a work centering around a sleazy strip club that is facing being shut down permanently due to poor business—is the sort of authentic and unflattering yet truly 'humanistic' proletarian cinema that commie and neo-commie agitpropagandists ranging from Dziga Vertov to Helke Sander were too disingenuous to cinematically portray. In other words, Mau Mau is a loving (anti)tribute to all the hard working people who drink, fight, and fuck like they won't live to drink, fight, and fuck the next day.

Heinz (Peter Franke) is an emotionally beaten down man who has never gotten over the fact that his career as a professional soccer player ended prematurely after he suffered a complex fracture of his leg a couple decades back. At the same time he injured his leg, his girlfriend Inge (Marlen Diekhoff) left him, thus adding insult to injury and also ruining his perspective on love and romance. Flash forward decades later, Heinz is now in a 'complicated' relationship with Inge, who owns a titty bar named 'Mau Mau' that she blows a good amount of her ex-soccer star boyfriend's money on. The strip club has certainly seen better days and Inge hopes to save her failing business by glamouring an elderly and rather repulsive religious man named Kowalik (Henryk Bišta), who follows a charlatan South American preacher named Brother Miguel and has a fancy flashing crucifix light at his apartment, into giving her all his money. Heinz is friends with a rather repulsive pug-nosed conman named Ferdi (Peter Gavajda) who, in between scamming old acquaintances out of money and nasty slags out of their panties, is busy getting his best friend beat up by people he owes money to. Aside from strippers with itty bitty titties, Inge's foremost employee at Mau Mau is a swarthy skank named Rosa (Catrin Striebeck) who, being a dirty gutter queen who is willing to give her body to anyone, dates an abusive Arab who everyone calls 'Ali' and who is fully committed to debasing white women as demonstrated by his remark regarding a lady of his own race, "You're better off dead than with one like her." When Ali ends up beating Rosa one too many times (a black eye is a big 'no, no' in regard to her profession), the lecherous lady decides to start screwing Heinz, but, as can be expected when in a seedy environment where alcohol is drunk as freely as water and romantic attachment and monogamy are virtually nonexistent, the affair is short-lived. Meanwhile, one of Ferdi's friends parades around his Thai prostitute girlfriend, 'Honey', like a true slave of jungle fever like so many weak-minded white men do nowadays. When Ferdi remarks regarding the Asian quasi-hooker, "Imported, after all... They still obey at least," her sub-Aryan sugar daddy replies that oriental chicks are not a submissive as he thinks, stating of his relationship with his girlfriend, "No money, no honey!" as if it is an honorable thing to be a pseudo-high-class hooker. Like all stupid chicks who are attracted to physically abusive guys, Rosa attempts to get back with Ali, but he has already found himself another desperate white woman, so she bashes out her bastard ex-beau's apartment windows and tries to hook up with a rich Dutch degenerate with a pansy ponytail who firmly believes, "Italy is dirty." As a woman who lives by the sophisticated, bitter bitch Weltanschauung "fuck all men," Inge decides to sell her body and soul to old man Kowalik by marrying him, thus saving her strip club from going out of the business. In the end, Heinz tries to kiss and grope Inge in front of elderly cuck Kowalik and hundreds of other people and he almost gets the beating of a lifetime from a gang of untermenschen bouncers as a result. Still, Heinz goes back to Inge, though whether she lets him back in her apartment again or not remains to be seen.

A sort of post-Fassbinder anti-Cheers from Teutonic prole drunkard pandemonium featuring arguably the most physically and mentally repugnant kraut characters in German cinema history, Mau Mau ultimately makes early-1990s metropolitan Deutschland seem like a post-industrial ghetto on the brink of becoming a third world nation, hence its thriving Negro and Turk populations. Indeed, as reprehensible as he is, darkie Ali is no that different from most of the white characters of Mau Mau, aside from the fact he moronically punches women in the face as opposed to merely smacking them around like gutter-level conman Ferdi (who, not suprisingly, later hires Ali to help him steal goods from other whites). Additionally, aside from hapless antihero Heinz, not a single character is fair-skinned and blond-haired, let alone resembling archetypical Aryan beauty, which probably has to do with the fact that many of the characters in the film are played by Slavic actors. Of course, Mau Mau is not total unwavering ugliness, as the film features a punk rendition of “My Way” in German by East German mischling Nina Hagen that sounds a lot like musically retarded junky Sid Vicious’ cover of the song, albeit slightly less goofy. Unfortunately, the semi-good music ends there as the film features a number of American pop rock hits that one would expect to hear at any blue collar bar in the United States, thus demonstrating that postmodern rebbe Karl Marx might have been on to something when he described how the workers of the world had a lot in common, though the failed bourgeois philosopher seems to be wrong about them actually uniting as the characters of Mau Mau would not rebel against their overlords if their lives depended on it, as they much rather get thoroughly inebriated and date rape some sub-homely married chick with genital warts.

Undoubtedly, as a person who has always despised drunks and the barroom lifestyle (I once worked as a bouncer and despite the ease of the job and relatively decent pay, I would never do it again), I found Mau Mau to be my worst nightmare come to life and the fact that it is set in Germany—a nation I regard as being the most culturally rich place in Europe, at least as far as the last couple of centuries are concerned—made it all the more of a dirty and unsettling experience, as if witnessing post-sanity Nietzsche staring into space and smiling moronically while laying in his hospital as his nurse takes hits of rum from a flask. Indeed, Mau Mau is Deutschland stripped away of all kultur and dignity, where the lumpenproles and untermenschen have become one after being thrown into an American-made multicultural blender mixed with cheap booze and Cyndi Lauper mix-tapes. Aside from depicting the long-term consequences for the German working-class as a result of the nation’s defeat during the Second World War nearly half a century later, Mau Mau is also a misery-ridden melodrama about the slow and painful death that is aging, as demonstrated by such lines as titty bar owner Inge’s remark to her on-and-off-again boyfriend Heinz, “My god, you used to be such a hunk. I was proud of you. You had such a spring in your step. What happened to it? What happened to us?...” If I were to guess, I would assumed the used-up, downtrodden, and decidedly degenerate characters just got out of a Soviet gulag, but they are merely the victims of their own failure, inaction, and addictions. In what is indubitably one of the most important scenes of Mau Mau, Heinz visits his father, who pleads to his son, “I want an anonymous burial. No flowers, no gravestone. That only costs money. Bury the urn in the yard. No cemetery maintenance for you. You don’t have time for that anyway,” as if he wants all evidence of his existence erased from history like he is too ashamed of his misspent life that he will somehow feel shame even when he is dead. Of course, as a nation of people that is incessantly reminded by Hollywood and the rest of the world that an Austrian peasant with a Charlie Chaplin mustache led them into wasting six million Jews (and quite a bit more Russians, though they do not seem as resentful about it), it is easy to see why Heinz's papi would express such an extreme wish. Personally, I cannot possibly see how the Germany depicted in Mau Mau is superior to that of the Third Reich, but then again I think Steven Spielberg is autistic asshole.

MARK OF THE DEVIL
MARK OF THE DEVIL

Val Guest (1984)

Undoubtedly, you know a movie is a tasteless piece of trash when it was promoted with the marvelously moronic gimmick of handing out vomit bags to viewers at movie theater screenings upon its release and such is certainly the case in regard to the West German exploitation flick Mark of the Devil (1970) aka Hexen bis aufs Blut gequält aka Witches Are Tortured To Death aka Burn, Witch, Burn aka Satan aka Austria 1700 aka Hexen ostensibly directed by British auteur Michael Armstrong (Horror House, Screamtime) and ghost-directed by one-time Fassbinder actor Adrian Hoven (World on a Wire, Fox and His Friend), who also acted as producer, actor, and production manager of the film, among other things. Admittedly, the sole reason why I decided to watch Mark of the Devil is because I recently saw director Armstrong's first film The Image (1967)—an excellent avant-garde horror short that has the distinction of being the first film David Bowie ever appeared in—which I was so impressed with that I decided to dig up the filmmaker's entire oeuvre. Rather unfortunately, I discovered that not only was The Image the best film Armstrong ever directed, but also that his role as 'auteur' of Mark of the Devil was dubious at best, as producer Adrian Hoven pulled a David O. Selznick and made the film his own by secretly directing scenes on his own with his friend cinematographer Ernst W. Kalinke without the official director's permission, as well as canning the original ending of the film. To Hoven's credit, he was originally attached to direct Mark of the Devil (rumored to having been originally titled "The Witch Hunter - Dr. Dracula"), but the financiers of the film wanted a British director so they could easily distribute the film in England, so they hired Armstrong, who wrote a new script that was also eventually bastardized by the producer. Made to cash in on the success of Witchfinder General (1968) directed by Michael Reeves, Mark of the Devil is a proto-torture-porn period piece of sorts set during the 18-century featuring conventions typical of the WiP (Women in Prison) subgenre about a motley maniac crew of severely sadomasochistic witch-hunters of the pseudo-Christian sort who falsely denounced people as heretics, witches, and sorcerers so they can appease their unquenchable thirst for both blood and money. An awe-inspiringly morally retarded work that seems like it was directed by a pathological psychopath with ADHD, Mark of the Devil is plagued by gratuitous sex and violence, poor dubbing (which sounds like British people attempting to speak with American accents), shockingly artificial emotionality, and carelessly cliché anti-Christian and left-wing preaching, among countless other glaring problems, though I will give it credit for utilizing an authentic ancient Austria castle (which was actually a museum full of authentic furniture and tools that were utilized for the film). Indeed, a sort of Ken Russell's The Devil (1971) for deranged philistines, Mark of the Devil is ultimately a reminder that exploitation cinema tends to be a cracked mirror image of the shady anti-artistic business practices of Hollywood.

Opening with a group of virginal nuns being brutally raped by wayward witchfinders, Mark of the Devil instantly lets the viewer know that it is a piece of totally tasteless, tactless, and sensationalized celluloid trash of the history-raping sort. Of course, the nuns are falsely denounced as evil witches and are subsequently ritualistically burned at the stake by self-righteous witch-rapists and following inter-titles appear immediately afterward declaring, "In Europe, between the 15th and 19th centuries, it is estimated nearly eight million people were convicted of heresy and executed by fanatical witch hunters, in order to save their souls," as if the viewer is supposed to take the film seriously as a work of historical social commentary. Eventually, twink-like witch-hunter hero Count Christian von Meruh (Udo Kier), who is waiting for the arrival of his father-like teacher Lord Cumberland (Herbert Lom), arrives at a small ancient Aryan town and he discovers the lead witch-hunter of the village, Albino (played by Austrian actor, Reggie Nalder, who is unforgettable due to his literally disfigured chin with glaring burns/scars covering his face), is a bloodthirsty butcher who falsely denounces people as witches just so he can torture and murder them. After a wop-like barmaid beauty named Vanessa (Olivera Katarina) is denounced by witch-hunter Albino as having had "illicit intercourse with the devil" and putting a curse on local men to render them impotent, Christian comes to her defense and the two begin a 'romance' that was ultimately never meant to be. When Lord Cumberland arrives, it becomes quite apparent that he is a holier-than-thou type who uses his pernicious power to murder people and steal their money, including a young aristocrat Baron Daumer (Michael Maien), and unlike Albino, who accepts the fact he is a sadistic scumbag, the Lord truly believes he is a devout Christian who is carrying out the work of the real Lord. Meanwhile, the local witch-hunters arrest an entire noble family (with the family patriarch being played by producer Adrian Hoven) for putting on 'satanic' puppet shows, which ultimately results in the father of the family having to endure Chinese water torture in what is easily one of the most memorable scenes in the entire film. Eventually, Christian loses his faith in both his religion and charlatan father-figure after witnessing Lord Cumberland strangling to death Albino after the fellow threatens to blackmail him by telling everyone that he is sexually impotent. Indeed, in typical Judaic Freudian fashion, violence and brutality are associated with impotence and sexual frustration in Mark of the Devil. Naturally, Christian decides to rebel against the 'Lord's work' and proceeds to help save Vanessa and the other prisoners. Ultimately, Mark of the Devil ends in a strikingly cynical fashion after Vanessa, who escapes her imprisonment, hypocritically leads her own Bolshevik-esque witch-hunt against the witch-hunters that ironically results in the brutal and bloody death of her best beau Christian, who becomes the most prized victim of a savage peasant lynch mob that his lover formed. Quite notably, director Mark Armstrong originally intended to conclude Mark of the Devil in a seemingly nonsensical manner featuring zombie heretics (i.e. the victims of the witchfinders) arising from the ground and pulling Udo Kier down with them, but luckily producer Adrian Hoven stopped him.

Undoubtedly, I think star Udo Kier best summed up the importance and intrinsic value of Mark of the Devil in the documentary featurette Fear and Loathing in Austria (2004) when he stated of the work and its troubled production history with the following insightful words: "With producers it's always about money. How much do I invest? How much will it make in the end? It's always been this way. Probably not with Lars von Trier and Fassbinder, because for them, film is art. But MARK OF THE DEVIL is a commercial movie and what's important is how much money it makes." Personally, I never expected Adrian Hoven to be a money-grubbing parasite as he had the gall to portray a Jew-gassing Nazi drag queen in the Fassbinder penned arthouse masterpiece Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel directed by Daniel Schmid, but then again, he also starred in Jess Franco films. Rather humorously, Udo also stated regarding Mark of the Devil in the same short 2004 doc: "I always thought that my close-ups were the single most attractive thing in the movie, with all the blood just adding up. Regarding the torture scenes, tongue tearing and all that, you knew before, this was strong stuff which would generate publicity." Udo's charming narcissism aside, Mark of the Devil certainly seems like an outmoded work of old hat trash sensationalism nowadays, especially considering mainstream Hollywood horror films go to even greater extremes in their artless depiction of soulless aesthetic savagery nowadays. In retrospect, Mark of the Devil proved to be a popular enough work as it produced one official sequel, Mark of the Devil Part II (1973) aka Hexen geschändet und zu Tode gequält, which was also produced (and this time officially directed) by Hoven, as well as countless pseudo-sequel rip-offs, including a couple of the chapters from Amando de Ossorio's Blind Dead series. More recently, the popular FX channel horror television series American Horror Story paid tribute to Mark of the Devil by naming the fifth episode of the third season "Burn, Witch. Burn!" (which is one of the various alternate titles of the film). Indeed, with its gratuitous violence, sexual perversity, and less than flattering depiction of witchfinders, American Horror Story: Coven (2013-2014) certainly follows in the trashy tradition of Mark of the Devil, although at least the contemporary TV series has wit and character. While I cannot pay any great compliments to Mark of the Devil beyond saying it was a sometimes entertaining way to waste 90+ minutes or so, I certainly thought it was better than Witchfinder General, but then again, I have always had an aversion to left-wing revisionist history and effete rapists wearing campy 18th-century clothing. Hell, even Ulli Lommel made a more sophisticated leftist revisionist witch-hunter flick during his post-arthouse years with his feminist-themed work The Devonsville Terror (1983), a work that portrays ancient New England witchfinders and their contemporary ancestors as self-righteous sadists of the murderously misogynistic sort. Of course, the only thing more repellant than leftist horror-comedies is preachy leftist exploitation flicks, so maybe I can understand why they handed out vomit bags for Mark of the Devil after all.

MONIQUE

Valérie Guignabodet (2002)

If some sadomasochistic sodomite like Andy Milligan, except slightly more technically gifted as an auteur, remade Alfred Hitchcock's Marnie (1964) and set it in the leather-fag metropolitan netherworld of Cruising (1980) directed by William Friedkin, it might resemble Monique (1978) aka New York After Midnight aka Flashing Lights directed by French art-sploitation auteur/gay pornographer Jacques Scandelari (Macédoine, Homologues ou La soif du male aka Man's Country). A superlatively sordid, maliciously melodramatic, and absurdly anti-romantic celluloid work based on a real-life case history reported in the April 1974 publication of 'Le Journal de l'Association des Psychologistes (Lyon, France), Monique is a seemingly totally trashy yet totally serious film about a 35-year-old French spinster who is rather desperate to get married and conceive a child, but the problem is that she is slightly insane due to a repressed childhood memory and when she does end up meeting up with a seemingly marvelous man, he turns out to be as straight as a circle as a gold-digging, butt-darting schemer who has nil interest in producing kin folk, thus resulting in serious trouble of the homo-homiciding sort. Starring sub-diva Florence Giorgetti of Marco Ferreri's La Grande Bouffe (1973) in the title role, Monique is essentially a rather restrained hodgepodge of director Jacques Scandelari 'greatest' films. Featuring the disco and S&M faggotry of his NYC hardcore leather-fag celluloid magnum opus New York City Inferno (1978) aka Cock Tales, the grotesque Hans Bellmer-esque baby doll art featured in La philosophie dans le boudoir (1971) aka Beyond Love and Evil, and the dark and shadowy noirish sexual sadism of Vice Squad (1978) aka Brigade mondaine, Monique is a rare work of considerably competently assembled exploitation cinema that actually takes itself seriously, even if the 'true story' the film is apparently based on seems like the subplot of some sort of subpar Troma direct-to-video garbage. Misleadingly advertised as a generic slasher flick under a number of dubious titles, Monique follows in the trend of Roman Polanski's Repulsion (1965), which was also attempted later by Ulli Lommel of all people via Olivia (1983) aka A Taste of Sin and countless other less successful filmmakers, in depicting a beautiful yet deranged debutante who suffered a childhood trauma and cannot help herself from killing men, especially those she is romantically involved with. Featuring gay porn star turned disco singer turned AIDS victim Wade Nichols (aka Dennis Parker) giving a Village People-esque performance of his deplorable disco song "Like an Eagle" and a number of female-perpetrated disco bloodbaths, Monique is what happens when highbrow celluloid trash meets crappy cocksucker kitsch.

Monique Raymond (Florence Giorgetti) is a relatively successful 35-year-old French professional with a trust fund who lives in relative luxury in New York City and even has a second home in Long Island, but her personal life is a sad joke, or at least she constantly tells her bitchy Jew-y therapist Dr. Charles Mandel (Barry Woloski). Feeling like an old spinster who has no chance of ever getting married, Monique is more than ready for Prince Charming to roll by, but more than anything, she wants a baby of her own. Indeed, a certain Prince Charming does arrive for Monique in the form of a hack artist named Richard Lewis (John Ferris) who constructs infantile 'infant art' (or what he calls 'erotic art' as if deformed babies have some sort of sexual appeal) that, as a rival/ex-lover reminds him, is a total rip-off of German degenerate artist Hans Bellmer's pubescent female doll work, but he is a little too charming and his motivations seemed to be rather dubious to say the least, especially considering he is much younger and less rich than his professional trust-fund babe. Believing she has met the more than marvelous man of her dreams, Monique does not think twice about marrying Richard on a random and semi-secret whim Las Vegas-style, but problems soon arise when Richard decides he would rather spend his spare time creating vulgar art, exploiting and leading on his hyper horny manager/mentor Helen Kahn (Robyn Peterson) to further his career, hanging out at hip gay discos at night, and having an affair with someone else—another man and an exceedingly effete one at that. On top of the fact her husband is a two-faced twink of the terribly temper-tantrum-throwing sort, Monique regularly has debilitating childhood flashbacks of when her mother was killed right before her weary eyes as a fragile froggy toddler, so before she knows it, she is wandering the semen-soaked streets of NYC and slaughtering salacious sodomites left and right, and only her prissy therapist has enough insight to stop her. When a jealous ex-lover of Richard's—a pole-smoking poof of a polak named Karl Zebrowski (Rayner Wallwork)—reveals to Monique that her hubby is a well known player on the pink team, and even—rather inexplicably—attempts to rape her, she bludgeons him in the gut with a butcher knife in a Norman Bates-esque fashion. Of course, when Richard has the audacity to bring his secret boyfriend to their scenic beach house in Long Island for Christmas, Monique gives him a bit of a fatal fag-bashing that he will never forget. Apparently, Monique's French father is also a fag, thus proving like husband like father-in-law. Monique's mother was accidentally killed in a scuffle with her father and his handsome male lover, so it was only natural that the French girl would grow up to be an anti-gay serial killer of sorts, thus eliciting metaphysical vengeance for her dear mère. In the end, Monique spends 8 years in a facility for the criminally insane for her murderous acts of involuntary homophobia, but later devotes her life to teaching Yoga in what is a semi-happy conclusion to an unhappy, childless life.

A rare work of 'fag noir' with a sort of 'gay male femme fatale,' Monique is like William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) for fag hags minus the cop drama. To be quite honest, I would not be surprised if director Jacques Scandolari did the casting for Monique at a sleazy NYC leather-fag bar as virtually every single male character, including the ostensibly heterosexual therapists, looks virtually the same as they are all skinny, tall white men with Village People-esque mustaches that seem like extras from the director's homo hardcore flick New York City Inferno, albeit minus the leather and fetishistic cop uniforms. Although not Jacques Scandelari's greatest flick, Monique is a consistently entertaining, if not sometimes unintentionally so, prototype for the sleazy and seedy artsy exploitation flicks Abel Ferrara would later specialize in. The fact that the protagonist is a woman who kills male homos as opposed to heterosexual rapists like in Ferrara's Ms. 45 (1981) makes Scandelari's Monique all the more sweetly scandalous, especially considering the politically correct climate of today where any negative portrayal of a limp-wristed fairy is considered a virtual sin. A debauched depiction of what Rainer Werner Fassbinder's most dreaded nightmare might have been like with an aesthetically disgusting Discotheque backdrop in a pre-AIDS time before hysteria and death hit the gay world with the force of two fists to the ass, Monique is indubitably from an era best left forgotten, but thankfully it is full of blood and bitterness. Of course, Monique also brings murder, melancholy, and mayhem to the world of the NYC bourgeois and Dorian love discos, which is worthy of any exploitation fan's time, though I would not recommend the film to mothers-to-be or sad French spinsters suffering from childhood traumas. Probably the only film ever made where a gay group of disco-delighting leather-fags attempt to gang rape a nearly-middle-aged woman, Monique is a piece of morally retarded cinema with style and an inkling of substance that reminds one why everyone needs a dose of trash celluloid in their lives.

BLACK JESUS

Valerio Zurlini (1968)

When it comes to Blaxploitation cinema, I tend to only like the serious and mostly negro-directed films that do not actually belong to the subgenre, but are labelled as such for the sake of convenience. Indeed, despite being Afro-centric black power works with vague 'arthouse' pretenses that were made "for us, by us," Melvin Van Peebles' pioneering work Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971) and Bill Gunn's semi-experimental metaphysical negro vampire flick Ganja & Hess (1973) are labeled Blaxploitation flicks simply because they are politically incorrect and provide the viewer with a taste of the 'exotic primitive.' Of course, Blaxploitation cinema only became mainstream after Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song became an unexpected success and inspired the Hebrews in Hollywood, along with exploitation hacks like Roger Corman, to capitalize off of the phenomenon and begin churning out works that ultimately negatively affected Afro-America by perpetrating negative stereotypes and glorifying criminality, lechery, and debauchery. As far as I can tell, the only non-white filmmakers of the late-1960s/early-1970s that attempted to give any sort of authentic voice to the black world were the Italians and French, with Jean-Luc Godard's Rolling Stones documentary Sympathy for the Devil (1968) aka One Plus One and great Guido artsploitation auteur Alberto Cavallone's debut feature Le salamandre (1969)—an iconoclastic Frantz Fanon-inspired agit-prop piece disguised as a sexploitation flick featuring a ménage-à-trois between a Swedish-American blond bombshell, a black model, and a middle-aged French psychoanalyst—being more notable representations of this largely forgotten about and rather 'idiosyncratic' phenomenon. Unquestionably, one of the most bizarre and seemingly unbelievable examples of Italian style black power is the epic filmic fable Black Jesus (1968) aka Seduto alla sua destra aka Out of Darkness aka Seated at His Right aka Super Brother directed by Valerio Zurlini (La ragazza con la valigia aka Girl with a Suitcase, Il deserto dei tartari aka The Desert of the Tartars). Advertised in the United States with majorly misleading tag lines like, "BLACK JESUS has black power!" and "he who ain't with me—is AGAINST me," Zurlini's Black Jesus is an excellent example of the superlatively sleazy talent of American exploitation film distributors to try to pass off serious cinematic art as mindlessly entertaining fuming filmic feces.

Originally intended as a segment of the Italian-French omnibus film Amore e rabbia (1969) aka Love and Anger—a somewhat uneven work featuring segments directed by Pasolini, Godard, Bertolucci, and Bellocchio, among others—Zurlini's film was eventually expanded into a brutal biblical depiction of the torture and execution of Congolese independence leader and pan-African revolutionary Patrice Lumumba, a man described by Malcolm X as "the greatest black man who ever walked the African continent" and who was the first democratically elected Prime Minister of the Republic of the Congo, only to be deposed twelve weeks later during the Congo Crisis and executed a little over four months after that. Directed by a man who was described as “the Poet of Melancholy,” and who mostly directed relatively apolitical melodramas, the film is indubitably an oddity in Zurlini’s oeuvre and certainly in more ways than one, as a serious film that bombed at the box-office and was re-released in America during the 1970s in ‘grindhouse’ theaters under titles like ‘Black Jesus’ and ‘Super Brother’ and marketed as a sensationally violent and racially-charged exploitation flick to capitalize off of the popularity of Blaxploitation films. Starring black American decathlete/football star turned Hollywood actor Woody Strode (Spartacus, The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance) as the Christ-like Lumumba figure and sub-proletarian Pasolini actor Franco Citti (Accattone, The Godfather) as a meek thief who befriends and comforts the protagonist when the two end up sharing a cell in a hellish-like prison that more resembles a medieval torture chamber, Black Jesus is sort of like an ‘arthouse-BlaxploItalian’ precursor to Mel Gibson’s The Passion of the Christ (2004) in terms of its ultra-violent emphasis on the eponymous lead’s gruesome martyrdom. Part quasi-Marxist hagiography, part pioneering torture-porn flick, part ‘arthouse’ fable, part prison-based chamber piece, and part dichotomous meditation on love and hatred, Black Jesus is what you might expect if the bastard progeny of Gillo Pontecorvo and Luchino Visconti was hired to shoot a biblical epic in the holy land about the crucifixion of Christ, but instead decided to travel further south to the Dark Continent and make a pseudo-Fanonian war-melodrama hybrid about Lumumba instead.

Maurice Lalubi aka ‘Black Jesus’ (Woody Strode) is a perennially wandering Christlike pan-African revolutionary who moves from town to town spreading the gospel of African liberation and, as such, the new ostensibly black-run government wants to have him liquidated immediately. Lalubi is confident that he will survive as he cannot imagine one of his loyal peasant followers selling him out to the white man, but he does not realize that he has a scheming Judas among his leadership. Indeed, for whatever reason (his motivations are never explained), this Black Judas tells the ‘Colonel’ (Belgian actor Jean Servais of Jules Dassin’s Rififi (1955) and the Darryl F. Zanuck produced 1962 WWII epic The Longest Day)—a Dutchman hired by the Congolese government to hunt down the revolutionary—the whereabouts of Lalubi and even provides him with a map of the entire area, but he is not awarded with any money in return. When negro Judas refuses to tell the Colonel why he has decided to betray his leader, the military commander becomes so enraged that he states, “this is a country of liars...you lie when you baptize your children.” Of course, Lalubi is soon captured and he does not even bother to resist arrest, but not before the white soldiers kill all the villagers in their area and senselessly burn down their homes. Upon being brought to a local prison, which is really just a makeshift torture chamber that is run by thugs and sadists, Lalubi gives a knowing smirk to a white prisoner named 'Oreste' (Franco Citti), who has been arrested for stealing an army truck and selling it to some of Black Jesus' revolutionary disciples. While Lalubi is a relatively famous and powerful black man, Oreste is quite the opposite as a loser white lumpenprole who dropped out of school at age 9 and has done a variety of degrading jobs, including "rough trade for homos" and "even served mass," among other things. As two men that are routinely tortured by boorish Belgian thugs and who face the very real prospect of death, Lalubi and Oreste will become extremely close over the next day or so.

Not long after arriving at the prison, Lalubi is sent to the office of the Colonel who attempts to pick the negro revolutionary's brain to see what makes him tick and to judge the true quality of his character. Lalubi pleads in a discernibly worried fashion, "Let me go, Colonel...I have a feeling that something serious is about to happen to me," to which the commander replies, "that depends on how you answer my questions." When the Colonel asks the revolutionary to reveal information on his black nationalist comrades, Lalubi denies he has any and explains that he merely gives speeches to people and these people in turn spread these ideas from village to village. In fact, Lalubi goes so far as describing himself as a "pacifist," adding, "I'm not a man of war and I hate violence." Lalubi also has no sympathy for the white victims of his political ideas, callously remarking when the Colonel mentions that a group of his disciples tortured, skinned, and killed two of his soldiers, "you can tell their mothers that they died here and not in Belgium," thus reflecting his belief that not a single cracker should be in Africa. The Colonel is so offended by Lalubi's rather cavalier remark that he responds in an equally ruthless manner by stating, "You mean we should have remained at home? When white men abandon these countries, what happens? I'll tell you... They shed enough blood to overflow the rivers of the Congo." After revealing that he is neither Belgian or French, but an old Dutchman who feels lost, tired, and homesick for his home city of Amsterdam, the Colonel offers to spare Lalubi's life if he merely signs a document ordering his followers to put down their arms and give up their murderous attempts at revolt, but the pan-African messiah refuses to even read it, let alone sign it. After that, the Colonel gives Lalubi an hour to think it over, or else he will face immediate torture that night and death the next day. Of course, Lalubi has no intention of signing the document and is merely biding his time until he is executed.

While waiting the 60 minutes that will ultimately result in him being tortured at the hands of young sadistic Belgian soldiers whose only form of solace is torturing and killing the negroes that want to torture and kill them, Lalubi gets to know Oreste who, due to his sorry lot in life and lack of education, is essentially a "white nigger" who is not even worthy of kissing the black power advocate's boots. Needless to say, Oreste is quite taken aback by the fact that another person, especially one who is as famous as Lalubi, would ever want to get to know him. Knowing they are both doomed to an unspeakable fate, Lalubi and Orešte try to make the most of their hour of peace together. At the end of their talk, Orešte somewhat pathetically asks the revolutionary, “say now, when you get important, will you remember me?,” to which Lalubi replies, “I promise you...Orešte...when we get out, we will meet again and we will be a lot happier.” At the end of their talk, Lalubi thanks Orešte with the utmost sincerity for “making that hour go by so quickly.” Of course, after refusing to sign the document when the hour is over, Lalubi is tortured so badly that he can neither walk nor see when the odious ordeal is over. Like J.C., Orešte also has nails driven through his hands. Meanwhile, one of the Belgian soldiers is arrested and put in the jail cell with Orešte, who attempts to make small talk with the new prisoner (Stephen Forsyth), but he acts like a total asshole and says nothing. When broken, beaten, and blind Lalubi is brought back to the cell, Orešte becomes hysterical and tries in vain to comfort his new friend. Hoping to ease Lalubi’s suffering, Orešte calls for a prison guard and offers him ten pornographic photos if he brings him back a mess tin full of oil to treat the revolutionary’s wounds. While Orešte receives the pseudo-medicine, a senseless fight with the seemingly half-deranged soldier prisoner results in the oil being spilled on the floor.

In easily the most subversive and racially-charged segment of Black Jesus, the Colonel has a heated conversation with the puppet leader of the Congo, who is clearly modeled after Belgium-U.S.-backed Congo leader Joseph-Desiré Mobutu that had the real Lumumba liquidated. While the Colonel has second thoughts about having Lalubi executed, the Mobutu character threatens to take away his job while rubbing it in his face that he is now a deracinated man without a nation by remarking regarding his European homeland that it is, “an almost forgotten land...and one that most certainly has forgotten you.” When the Colonel states regarding Lalubi, “Let us make no martyrs...it would be better,” Mobutu remarks that the Christlike leader “has a great deal of charm” but that his people will soon forget him because, “We are not white men. Our people are much more simple and direct. They accept what they see...believe in a man because he is there, not because he was there. Believe me, Colonel, eliminating a black leader is child’s play.” Of course, the Colonel finally gives into Mobutu’s demands when he replies regarding Lalubi’s next day execution, “We ourselves will supply the executioner if that will ease your conscience.” Not surprisingly, the Judas “Uncle Tom” who sold Lalubi out is now one of Mobutu’s aides.

The next morning, the Belgian soldiers put Lalubi, Orešte, and the soldier in a prison truck and drive them to a remote building in ruins. While Orešte pretends that the Belgian soldiers are “nice guys” who mean them no harm, Lalubi has already accepted his death and accepts it stoically. Indeed, Lalubi is marched into the building where he meets a negro with a dagger who drives it into his gut. Seemingly because he is jealous that another black man gets to kill the great black nationalist leader, the main Officer (Pier Paolo Capponi of Francesco Rosi’s classic 1970 WWI flick Uomini contro aka Many Wars Ago and Dario Argento’s 1971 giallo The Cat o' Nine Tails) finishes Lalubi off with a submachine gun. When Orešte hears the gunshot blasts from outside, he manages to escape from the Belgian soldiers after attacking them and runs inside the building where he finds Lalubi's still warm corpse. Of course, it is only a matter of seconds before the Officer catches up with Orešte and liquidates him. Not satisfied with killing Lalubi and his white cuckold, the Officer also kills the soldier prisoner so there will be no witnesses, even though the unlucky fellow is one of his comrades and racial kinsman. While driving back to the prison, the soldiers spot a young negro and the Officer complains, "damn, another prisoner" and commands the lad to come to him but he runs away. Naturally, the soldiers start firing at the boy, but somewhat inexplicably, he manages to get away in an allegorical scene that seems to reflect that director Zurlini was a tad bit too optimistic in regard to the Congo's future.

Despite the film's quasi-Marxist black power message, Black Jesus ultimately depicts a curious character who calls himself a pacifist but whose words of collectivist race-hate and class warfare have resulted in the worst kinds of atrocities, including the skinning and burning of people while still alive, among virtually every other form of 'cheap' torture that is accessible in the third world. Unquestionably, the protagonist's greatest sin is lurking from village to village to spread his message while knowing damn well that these villages will be treated with an extermination-based 'scorched earth' policy. Additionally, the Dutch Colonel character that has the protagonist captured and sentenced is also treated in a somewhat sympathetic fashion, as he is depicted as a troubled old man who suffers major guilt and tries to spare Lalubi's life but cannot because he is merely a pawn in the game and a military bureaucrat who really has no power and can only carry out orders from his superiors like any 'loyal' military man. Notably, star Woody Strode would go on to describe his role in Black Jesus as the most challenging of his career, which is something that spaghetti western maestro Sergio Leone noticed as he subsequently hired the American actor to star in Once Upon a Time in the West (1968). If the 1968 Cannes Film Festival, which Zurlini's film was supposed to compete in, was not cancelled as a result of the so-called 'May 1968 events in France' as carried out by Trotskyites and their fellow far-left allies, Black Jesus might be better known today, which is somewhat ironic considering the political nature of the work. Luckily, despite its somewhat superficial Trotskyite sentiments, Zurlini's flick actually has heart and does not feel like it was directed by some pedantic commie like Godard but rather a halfway sensible fellow who is, at the very least, more honest and objective than ardent crypto-agitprop hacks in Hollywood. Aside from Zurlini's film, black Haitian filmmaker Raoul Peck directed two films about Patrice Lumumba, including the documentary Lumumba: Death of a Prophet (1990) and the melodramatic biopic Lumumba (2000) starring Cameroonian-French negro Eriq Ebouaney as the eponymous lead, but, at least artistically speaking, Black Jesus will probably be the film about the martyrdom of the Congolese pan-African leader that will prove to stand the test of time. A film where only two of the characters have names and none of the characters' backgrounds are really ever disclosed, Black Jesus is ultimately a filmic fable featuring archetypes as opposed to a historically faithful biopic, thus giving the film a more timeless quality than some might suspect. Indeed, as far as black nationalist biopics are concerned, while I don't plan to watch Spike Lee's deceptively mythmaking hagiography Malcolm X (1992) ever again unless I'm feeling terribly masochistic or I'm being forced to do so at gunpoint, I would not mind spending some time with Black Jesus in a couple decades from now.

INVISIBLE ADVERSARIES

Valie Export (1977)

Undoubtedly, arthouse sci-fi-horror flicks of the feminist alien invasion sort are not exactly the most popular subgenre, but if someone were to create such an innately ridiculous work, Uncle Adolf's homeland of Austria would probably be the right place for such a seemingly idiotical and inane idiosyncratic film as the ethno-masochistic birth place of Viennese Actionism and the static and nihilistic anti-völkisch celluloid sermons of German-Austrian Michael Haneke (Time of the Wolf, The White Ribbon). Indeed, Austrian feminist auteur Valie Export (Menschenfrauen, Die Praxis der Liebe aka The Practice of Love) directed such an anti-climatic science fiction work as her debut feature-length film entitled Unsichtbare Gegner (1977) aka Invisible Adversaries, a film about an undainty and somewhat deranged feminist artist suffering from schizophrenia who, on top of facing romance troubles with her equally left-wing yet unloving boyfriend, believes extremely aggressive space aliens known as 'Hyksos' have invaded earth and the bodies of humans in a pernicious plot to destroy the world. Directed by an associate of the Viennese Actionist movement who de-christened herself "Valie Export" in tribute to her favorite cigarettes and in anti-tribute to her father and husband or as she once explained herself, "I did not want to have the name of my father [Lehner] any longer, nor that of my former husband Hollinger. My idea was to export from my 'outside' (heraus) and also export, from that port. The cigarette package was from a design and style that I could use, but it was not the inspiration," Invisible Adversaries is a vaginally-charged celluloid collage utilizing various artistic mediums, including video, still photographs, radio broadcasts, etc. of the fiercely feminized and foully fetishistic variety that is clearly aesthetically and thematically inspired by commie frog Jean-Luc Godard in its minimalism and cliché far-left politics. A woman who thought flashing her own and other women's bushy beavers around in various Actionist-inspired films and public performances (including infamously entering a Munich art cinema wearing crotch-less pants), as well as allowing strangers to touch her breasts through a curtained box which she documented with her 1 minute short Touch Cinema (1968), would prove how absolutely liberated she was from the Aryan patriarchy, Valie Export, much like her Austrian and German feminist compatriots, rather ridiculously thought she could battle the supposed still lingering taint of female complacency of her mother's generation during the Third Reich and with Invisible Adversaries, she seemingly unconsciously associates feminism with mental illness by way of a character whose growing contempt for men and the ghost of National Socialism is only transcended by her mental illness. That being said, Invisible Adversaries only works today as an accidental comedy (although the film does feature some scenes of intentional comedy, but it is just not nearly as effective) of the terribly dry and absurdly pretentious sort due to its

INVISIBLE ADVERSARIES

Godard-esque minimalistic direction and set-design and lack of special effects, as well its innately inane diatribes against authority, patriarchy, Nazism, and the apparently black "Vienna heart." The sort of soulless celluloid work created by dead souls for dead souls from a disenfranchised generation that self-righteously blamed their National Socialist parents for their own cultural disillusionment and self-hatred, Invisible Adversaries is just one of the many cinematic reasons why ethno-masochism and Frankfurt school intellectual swill have degenerated Europa into the uncultivated and cultureless corpse it is today. Indeed, if anything, Invisible Adversaries is a sort of artsy fartsy celluloid suicide note that declares in a rather debauched manner the death of traditional Austrian kultur and community.

As one learns during an off-screen and imaginary broadcast at the beginning of Invisible Adversaries, "An invisible power...An important announcement...Population...As we've just learnt...well-founded suspicion...An invisible adversary...a foreign, perhaps otherworldly power...An invisible enemy occupied the town and transformed people." These supposed 'invisible adversaries' are known as Hyksos and are "hardly distinguishable from real humans" and "anyone could already be a Hyksos," which strikes fear, paranoia, and self-subjected isolation in a female artist suffering from schizophrenia named Anna (played by Susanne Widl, who also starred in Export's Menschenfrauen (1980) and the segment "lust" of the feminist omnibus film Seven Women, Seven Sins (1986)). On top of worry about the anti-human Hyksos threat, Anna and her intellectually pedantic pseudo-revolutionary boyfriend Peter (played by degenerate far-left artist Peter Weibel) obsess over Vienna's ostensibly crypto-Nazi government and authoritarian police who, among others things, masturbate in front of a mirror in public in a scene director auteur Export must have felt was an ingenious and rather arousing allegory for patriarchal narcissism and whatnot. To prove his commitment to the anti-fascist commie cause, Herr Peter senselessly argues with a cop and is issued a citation as he proudly claims to his girlfriend Anna that he is willing to pay anything for "freedom of expression," even if it proves to be a rather impotent, idiotic, and unrewarding display of individualism on his part. When not arguing with Anna via mundane mental masturbation, Peter playfully rubs his head on Anna's vagina and rectum, remarking afterwards that "my hair stinks. I have to wash it."

A postmodern rebel without an organic artistic cause, Anna spends her time defiling traditional European art history by making aesthetically vulgar collages using classic paintings and magazine advertisement clippings, but also by making photocopies of her own vagina and looking at pictures of naked prepubescent boys and deformed children. In a rather vulgar display of penis envy (or what director Export probably absurdly believes is the opposite), Anna also cuts off her pubic hair and glues it to her face so as to create a mustache. Displaying her disgust at the idea of being a domestic housewife, Anna also cuts (or at least imagines so) turtles, beetles (which, to the dismay of modern vegan leftists, were exterminated for the sake of Export's film), fish, and parakeets with a kitchen knife. In a relationship with a girly and bitchy untermensch who, although he shares her anti-authoritarian political beliefs and 'liberated' counter-culture views on sexuality, firmly believes "women are parasites," Anna naturally has a number of fights with boyfriend Peter, which inevitably results in the severance of their sterile and less than steamy love affair of pubic hair sniffing, thus throwing the little lady in a deeper abyss of paranoia and fear of Hyksos, including the belief that an alien doppelganger is trying to snuff her out, but luckily she meets a female video artist and is introduced to the vaginally stimulating films of feminist documentarian Helke Sander (Break the Power of the Manipulators, The Trouble with Love), which gives her a false sense of empowerment in the face of her failed relationship and mental illness. Of course, being constantly blitzkrieged by news about the war in Vietnam, persecution of barbarian towelheads by Israeli Zionists (whose founder Theodor Herzl was inspired by the Jew-hating in Vienna), and Austria's supposed crypto-fascism (unlike the kraut, the Austrians were never 'de-Nazified' by the Allies), Anna is ultimately more a victim of the media than some sort of imaginary alien menace. Personally, I think Anna, like virtually all of the degenerate artists of her disillusioned and born-defeated and guilt-ridden degenerate generation would not be suffering the mental illness that has totally consumed her if her Uncle Adolf won the Second World War. That being said, I do not think it is a stretch to say that Invisible Adversaries is the cultural symptom of a defeated people that is no longer able to take pride in their nation's kultur, so they react relatively ridiculously by destroying said culture and making assholes of themselves by creating ugly films about ugly people doing ugly things.

At various points in Invisible Adversaries, a number of seemingly random yet thematically imperative references are made to Austria's naughty National Socialist past, including in the first couple minutes of the film when a radio announcer states: "Moscow – Vienna. The Soviet News Agency TASS accused the Austrian Radio of serving the goals of fascist propaganda. The fact that former Hitlerite colonel Rudel could appear on T.V. must be seen as Part of the re-activation of neo-Nazi elements and anti-Semitic tendencies. Whilst in a recent T.V. discussion Henriette von Schirach, widow of the former Hitler Youth Leader, was given screen time for fascist propaganda," thus underscoring the pathetic manner in which Austrians were expected to disavow their past history and heroes, which auteur Valie Export does with self-flagellating glee. In fact, Export goes so far as attacking all of mainstream Austrian cinema (as well as the Austrian collective with it), especially the dreaded nostalgic "Heimat-film," with the following nation-negating narration during Invisible Adversaries: "From 1939-45 Austria produced revoltingly sickly, dishonest films, known typically as "Viennese films", and the elite of the Burg Theatre acted them. The same crew produced after the war the popular country and folklore films. This smooth transition from Nazi Austria to the 2nd Republic is typical of the hypocritical mentality of the country.”

Oftentimes described as a sort of feminist version of Invasion of the Body Snatchers, Invisible Adversaries can probably be better seen as the uniquely ugly manifestation of a lost generation of Austrian women who blame Austrian men for both the loss of the Second World War and national dignity and thus have lashed out in a seemingly nonsensical manner of waving their unclad twats as a way to prove they no longer need a mensch to survive in this world. Ironically, protagonist Anna of Invisible Adversaries is most perturbed by her supposed alien doppelganger, thus demonstrating an intrinsic fear of herself, as well as herself being her own worst enemy, a fate that many feminists seem to suffer from, yet ultimately assign men the blame for. Aside from her early shorts like Mann & Frau & Animal (1973) aka Man & Woman & Animal, which features a woman masturbating in a bathtub as well as a nasty case of what seems to be a vaginitis on a putrid pussy and a rather gory case of menstrual blood flowing out of a gash, Invisible Adversaries is indubitably Export's most artistically subversive and least banal work, which I guess does not say much considering the unspectacular nature of her cinematic oeuvre as a whole, but at least the film kept me moderately entertained, if not for all the wrongs reasons, the two times I viewed it. A less than wonderfully wanton window into the post-WWII Austrian female (feminist) psyche, as well as an accidental deconstruction of the Aryan feminist mind in a state of seeming panic, Invisible Adversaries is not only probably the best introduction to Valie Export's art (be it film or otherwise), but also Austrian/German feminist film in general. If nothing else, Invisible Adversaries will make it quite clear there has never been a skyscraper in the shape of a penis flytrap.

PARIS, JE T'AIME

Various (2006)

Paris, je t'aime is an film collaboration between various directors and cast members from around the world. Basically its 18 shorts films that take place in Paris, France and go nowhere. The directors range from Gus van Sant to Wes Craven making for an unfocused and sloppy compilation. Stars such as Elijah Wood and Natalie Wood are used to lure in people who don't usually watch those irritating subtitled foreign films. It's been trendy now for a while for big stars to get token "artistic" roles. France has produced a lot of films that talk about pointless bullshit (existentialism?). Paris, je t'aime is no different. Jean-Paul Sartre's grave even appears in the film to give the film intellectual credibility. The only thing that was missing was testimonials from old French Bolshevik resistance fighters. Paris, je t'aime is about the new multicultural society and it reflects the crumbling on French culture. It is doubtful that France will ever produce another film talent such as Jean Cocteau.

I still can't figure out why Paris, je t'aime was even made. The audience it aims for seems to be those so-called "progressive types" that consider European film ethnocentric. Paris, je t'aime has enough foreigners in it to pass the Globalization multicultural test that Neo-Marxist's also claim their against (global revolutions makes a difference when international trade is involved?). I think Gaspar Noé's Irreversible makes for a better representation of modern day France. Too bad no one in Paris, je t'aime went into the "rectum." Paris, je t'aime can be summed up with "Robert Altman having celluloid diarrhea in Paris." Nothing weaves the scenes together. The segments go together about just as much those the various cultures featured in the film. Experimental films seem to generally fail in their directions. Paris, je t'aime isn't that experimental and it no doubt fails. I would love to see a resurrection of European national cinema. The majority of films that come out of Europe nowadays buy into the same bullshit propaganda as the trash that comes out of the United States. Paris, je t'aime is a dull film that offers nothing new to the viewer. It goes perfect with the German film Good Bye! Lenin directed by Wolfgang Becker.

Veit Harlan (1944)

I hate to admit it, but despite wanting and expecting to discover a rapturous experience with German auteur Veit Harlan's National Socialist arthouse melodrama Opfergang (1944) aka The Great Sacrifice aka Rite of Sacrifice, I merely witnessed what I found to be semi-surreal high-schlock of the superficially sorrowful and surprisingly sybaritic sort and certainly not the neglected Nazi-era cinematic masterpiece I was led to believe it would be by both nazis and anti-nazis alike. Admittedly, I tend to procrastinate when it comes to first seeing films that are regarded as masterpieces, seemingly personal, and/or otherwise significant in some way, in part due to my deep cinephile dread that I will be consumed with chagrin by what was supposed to be 'life-altering' cinematic work and I can honestly say that Opfergang fulfilled all of my fears about the potential of being greatly disappointed by a major motion-picture. With quasi-Nietzschean themes, beautiful blonde beastesses, Nazi 'camp' aesthetics, mystical völkisch imagery, a bizarre Nordic love triangle, and being directed by Veit "the baroque fascist" Harlan – the infamous director of the melodramatic Jew-baiting flick Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß and the homoerotic-themed pro-gay post-war work Different from You and Me (1957) aka Anders als du und ich aka Bewildered Youth – it came as quite a shock to me that not only would I list not Opfergang on a list of my top 100 favorite films, but I would not even regard it as one of the greatest films of German cinema history and apparently I am not alone in that sentiment. In fact, Veit Harlan's own son Thomas Harlan (Torre Bela, Wundkanal) – a filmmaker and author, as well as a rabid anti-Nazi who publicly denounced and denigrated his father throughout his terribly troubled life – described Opfergang as a "kitsch melodrama" that merely succeeded in "creating artificial sentiment and lending it...credibility" in the documentary Harlan – In the Shadow of Jew Süß (2008) directed by Felix Moeller.

Of course, not everyone was disenchanted with the film as Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels – who essentially had total control over what films were made and screened in Germany – regarded Opfergang as a highly personal possession thereupon causing the delay of the film's release, although it did have a limited run in a small selection of movie theaters, in part due to the scarcity and expensiveness of color film stock. In the documentary Christoph Schlingensiefel und seine Filme (2005) aka Christoph Schlingensiefel and His Films, prematurely deceased modern German filmmaker and absurdist Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensiefel (Menu total, The 120 Days of Bottrop) – who created a freeform scatological remake of Harlan's film entitled Mutters Maske (1988) that sardonically satirizes a number of scenes from Harlan's film – also believed that German New Wave master Rainer Werner Fassbinder was more influenced by Opfergang than he was by Danish-German Douglas Sirk's popular 1950s Hollywood melodramas (e.g. All That Heaven Allows, Written on the Wind). Indeed, although an anti-climatic experience for me in general, I would be lying if I did not admit that Opfergang's keen kaleidoscope of calming and chilling colors did not have a nice trance-inducing effect on me, but these moments of ecstasy – not unlike the sort featured in The Red Shoes (1948) directed by Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger and the Crowleyite shorts of cine-magickian Kenneth Anger (Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome, Invocation of My Demon Brother) – were abruptly broken by sand bar characters, redundant dialogue, and the sort of abhorrent aristocratic degeneracy and excess that debauched Italian blueblood auteur Luchino Visconti (The Leopard, The Damned) would do much better and more honestly.

Opfergang centers around a positively posh and prissy protagonist Albrecht Froben (played by Harlan regular Carl Raddatz), the less than homely heir of a wealthy shipping company based in Hamburg, Germany. Honestly, I already knew the film was inherently tainted when introduced to the character of Herr Froben, a man who – despite his wealth and prestige – is certainly no charming gentlemen, hero, nor scholar, let alone a dashing Aryan Übermensch of the racially pure sort but the radically repellant Mr. Raddatz; a rat-faced fellow with a thick little Richard mustache, hence why grisly Goebbels probably could identify with the character. After all, if it were not for their power and prestige, neither of these men would have been able choose from the frisky and foxy Freyja of their wildest, Teutonic dreams. Also, like the little Döktor, fab Froben has a keen weakness for the ladies, especially when it comes to Nordic buxom blondes that look like they could have given him quite the beating, so naturally both men became Aryan adulterers; indubitably a mortal sin in the Fatherland. Despite his rather frail frame, Albrecht is an anti-intellectual and worldly adventurer of sorts who has traveled to the former German Afrikan colonies and Japan, which has given him a new lease on life of ceasing the moment and what-not. Although Froben is married to a seemingly introverted, intelligent, stoic beauty named Octavia (played by Irene von Meyendorff aka Baroness Irene Isabella Margarete Pauline Caecila von Meyendorff) who his oddball orientalist cousin Matthias is semi-secretly madly in love with (he has an out-of-place portrait of the dame in his room of oriental knickknacks) and whose Latin name he finds to be quite annoying, to his dismay but also delight, he discovers that he is really in love with an extroverted Swiss miss of the extraordinarily and similarly extroverted and adventurous sort. Unfortunately for Albrecht, the love of his life is terminally ill, on top of the fact that he has a faithful wife.

In Opfergang, the ill-fated and tediously tangled love triangle is sparked one Sunday afternoon by happenstance while the character Albrecht is visiting his cousin Matthias (Franz Schafheitlin) at his home on the Elbe. Supervised by Octavia's elderly and somewhat nihilistic intellectual father, Senator Froben (Otto Treßler) in what is described by one of the guests as "our spiritual hors d'oeuvre before the Sunday roast,” Albrecht seems quite blasé by the supremely sedentary even which is given a Chopin score by way of Oĉtavia cultivated chops and personal obsession; pianoforte. Albrecht eventually loses it and almost commits the lace curtain sin of ‘verbal assault’ when Senator Froben reads what he describes as “Dionysian dithyramb by Nietzsche” and “Nietzsche’s death premonition, one of the deepest poems ever written,” which – in fact – is an abridged version of the tragic Anti-Christ’s poem The Sun Sinks aka Die Sonnie sinkt. Albrecht agrees with his fellow guests that the poem is “very beautiful,” but also feels that “it’s terrible” as he finds it rather passive, pessimistic, and dreary for his tastes and opens a curtain to a serene and scenic lake outside that almost has a celestial and ethereal essence to it, thereupon asking the rhetorical question of his cultured compatriots, “Can someone tell me why you’re sitting here every Sunday feeling gloomy?” Finally fed up with talking about philosophical matters for three hours on a sunny Sunday and listening to the written words of a tragic German genius who conceived the poem shortly before he went mad, Albrecht – a man of action and few words (and, in turn a spiritual ‘National Socialist’) – decides to practice Carpe diem and subsequently goes rowing in the seemingly sublime lake, henceforth discovering an au naturel Swedish ‘mermaid’ symbolically clinging on to the end of his tiny dinghy, Älskling Flodéen (played by Harlan’s real-life wife Kristina Söderbaum); the woman that will – for better or worse – irrevocably change his life forever.

Although described as a film with various subtle National Socialist themes, most specifically the virtues of selfless death and sacrifice – which is symbolized by Albrecht’s acceptance of Äls’ illness and subsequent death, as well as his commitment to staying with the mismatched wife he does not love – Opfergang is more a cinematic work of curiously creamy and cosmopolitan crème de la crème society than a cinematic work innately equipped with a nasty and nefarious expression of Nazi ideology. In fact, with its prominence of an unfaithful philandering posh protagonist, wealthy yet hedonistic families and bastard children (Äls has a fatherless daughter), colonialist cosmopolitan characters (Albrecht is an active member of German Colonial Association and his cousin Matthias a bookish orientalist), and glaring glorification of the anachronistic German aristocracy (NS was supposedly a vehemently völkisch ‘people’s movement’ glorifying personal merit over inborn and unearned class distinctions), Opfergang hardly seems like the sort of film that would have been enjoyed by the everyday brownshirt Wehrmacht soldier or worker after arriving home from the drudgery of civil service and cracking open a bottle of Krombacher Brauerei, but the sort of cinematic vision that would have been designed for the delight of high-ranking National Socialist party leaders and officials, thus making it no surprise that Joseph Goebbels – who knew the tide of war had changed and his end was very likely near – wanted to keep the film for himself so that no other people aside from the Führer himself could so thoroughly and perceptively identify with the film.

As explained by his elderly children in Harlan – In the Shadow of Jew Süss, Veit Harlan idolized and worshiped his wife Kristina Söderbaum's beauty, even if she was 'sacrificed' in a number of his films, including Opfergang; a work that most certainly seems like a tribute to the lead actress' penetrating pulchritude, if not annoying and seemingly adolescent-like acting. Incidentally, Harlan's first wife, Dora Gerson, a Jewish actress and cabaret singer, perished in Auschwitz with her family, not to mention the fact that two of the filmmaker's daughters would marry Jewish men, one of which converted to the Hebraic faith and inevitably committed suicide in 1989. Harlan's niece Christiane Susanne Harlan would also ironically marry Stanley Kubrick (2001: A Space Odyssey, Eyes Wide Shut); arguably the greatest Jewish filmmaker who ever lived. Thus, it goes without saying that Veit Harlan has a number of Jewish grandchildren and great-grandchildren, among various other non-Aryan ethnicities as depicted in Felix Moeller's documentary. Of course, with the sort of familial degeneracy featured in Opfergang, it seems only fitting that Veit Harlan's family's future turned out the way it did. Needless to say, Harlan ultimately sacrificed his own progeny's ability to lead a normal life with his legacy as a blacklisted filmmaker, most specifically because of Jew Süss, which is a shame because if Opfergang was as half as decent as I expected it would be, it might have been worth it. Of course, not all sacrifices are sanctified.

BEWILDERED YOUTH

Veit Harlan (1957)

Undoubtedly, Post-World War European art, especially from defeated nations like Germany, Austria, and Italy, oftentimes depicted a people who had degenerated to such a curious level that certain artists' work, both in theme and aesthetic, created pieces that barely resembled the kind of work that had previously been created and filmmakers were certainly not exempt from this rule. Out of all of the European films I have seen, probably no other film more exemplifies this peculiar and perturbing problem than Bewildered Youth (1957) aka Anders als du und ich directed by ex-Nazi auteur Veit Harlan (Opfergang, Kolberg), Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels' favorite filmmaker and the man who directed the infamous National Socialist melodrama Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß. Charged with so-called 'crimes against humanity' in 1949 for his part in directing Jew Süß – a work oftentimes considered a superlatively sinister and cacodemonic piece of mayhem-inspiring melodramatic cinema – Harlan was essentially blacklisted in the filmmaking world for his artistic involvement with the Third Reich, but he would direct nine more films between 1950 and 1958 before his death in 1964, with Bewildered Youth; a black-and-white film that caused more controversy in Germany upon its release than Jew Süß, at least before 1945. Using a homosexual emancipation activist named Hans Giese as a 'scientific adviser' for the film, Anders als du und ich was originally intended as a quasi-pro-gay film designed to change public opinion about paragraph §175 of the German Criminal Code, which criminalized homosexual acts between consenting men and was not entirely revoked until 1994 after German reunification, but the original cut of the film was banned and it would go through various different and dramatically conflicting cuts with very different messages because the FSK (Freiwillige Selbstkontrolle; a German movie rating system equivalent to the MPAA) believed Harlan's vision would "foster perversion" and promote "decadent weaklings." Harlan – who decided to tackle the subject of male-on-male buggery in a brazen attempt to rehabilitate his filmmaking career – made his intentions very clear with the film when he sent a letter to the production company regarding the original script by Felix Lützkendorf entitled Eltern klagen an (Parents Accuse) that the film is based on, stating: "I think what's missing in the script is the fact that there are two types of homosexuals - namely those who have been handicapped by nature, and those who criminally violate nature. The latter act based either on innate immorality or for material gain, or because of damnable weakness. The former, however, deserve our complete sympathy. If we want to be a magnanimous people, we must regard their lives as tragic, and the film must not condemn or persecute them based on any narrow-minded viewpoints. We may prosecute them only in the instances when they seduce youngsters whose nature is basically normal." After various scenes were cut, scenes shot, and various voices redubbed, the film was released under the title Anders als du und ich (§175) aka Different from You and Me (§175), but in Austria, the original more 'pro-gay' cut played under the original title The Third Sex aka Das dritte Geschlecht. A dubbed cut of the film more in the spirit of the uncut original Austrian version was also released under the titles Bewildered Youth and The Third Sex in the United States in 1958. Essentially a kraut queer equivalent to the popular teen rebellion flick Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause (1955) minus the warm Warnercolor kaleidoscopic colors and CinemaScope frames, Bewildered Youth is an unintentionally entertaining and flaky footnote from history that reminds one how the Teutonic Fatherland's Übermensch campaign and societal inhibitions sank after losing the Second World War.

17-year-old Klaus Teichmann (Christian Wolff), an excellent student in school, comes from a traditional bourgeois family that has the most pressing concern over their son, so when he befriends an extremely effete fellow named Manfred (Guenther Theil) – the bastard son of a poor single mother who is not exactly the most studious pupil in school, his overprotective family begins to worry. After all, less than manly Manfred loves art and even has one of his girly man poems published in the school newspaper, so naturally trouble starts to stir in suburbia when the Dorian Grayish boy brings Klaus to the exotic house of a middle-aged queen queer and antique dealer named Dr. Boris Winkler (Friedrich Joloff); a super suave sodomite with an unhealthy interest in innocent adolescent boys. A ridiculously refined and cultivated man whose home is a virtual museum of artistic treasures and aesthetic pleasures, uniquely urbane Winkler, a wanton wanker, has unlimited resources when it comes to luring in young boys to add to his personal collection. A man who probably modeled his surely striking life of gay Conservative Revolutionary poet Stefan George – a German guru sage who headed literary circles whose members included philosopher/psychologist Ludwig Klages and would-be-Hitler-assassin Claus von Stauffenberg – Winkler impresses the teenage twinks with his dignified knowledge, masterful manners, proto-Kraftwerk electronic avant-garde music sessions, and ostensibly homoerotic indoor Greek wrestling matches between nearly naked men that would certainly tickle the tummy of Yukio Mishima, but Klaus Teichmann's parents are less than impressed with their son's pseudo-fatherly friend, so after talking to a psychologist who recommends that they save their son from turning into a salacious sodomite, a war of morals begins. Klaus' concerned father Werner (Paul Dahlke) grounds his son, but the rebellious teen escapes through a window. When Werner realizes this, he wanders through the wanton world of abberosexuality, including Winkler's house and a degenerate club featuring a drag show, thereupon leading the concerned father to a feel for filth that he cannot stand. Clearly a spiritually castrated cuckold not unlike James Dean's character's father in Rebel Without a Cause, wobbly wuss Werner (undoubtedly, the direct source of his son's lack of masculinity) is upstaged by his wily wife Christa (Paula Wessely) who has the decisive full-proof plan to recruit the Teichmann family housemaid Gerda (Ingrid Stenn) to seduce her son, thus actively recruiting Klaus to heterosexuality. Of course, mother knows best as beautiful Gerda makes a man out of Klaus, but heated homo Boris Winkler, being an effeminate queen who won't dare allow for one of his beautiful boys to be put under the spell of the female enemy, gets Christa in trouble with the law for her part in conspiring with the housemaid in what is nothing short of middleclass fleshpeddling, but such is the world of Bewildered Youth.

Although tame by today's standards, Bewildered Youth is nothing short of a remarkable, if not ridiculous, revolutionary work for its time and certainly a film that, at least artistically speaking, managed to rehabilitate auteur Veit Harlan to some extent as a filmic artist who is just as competent at directing debauched high-camp National Socialist melodramas as he was at directing aesthetically and thematically provocative teen rebellion flicks, especially when compared to Hollywood films of that time like The Wild One (1953) and even later works like Splendor in the Grass (1961), thus signifying Germany's social decay after the conclusion of the Second World War. A work that depicts the good, the bad, and flamingly faggy of the homosexual underground (when it was still somewhat in the underground), Bewildered Youth features a message that is, at least in part, not all that different from raging rump ranger Rosa von Praunheim's gritty celluloid manifesto It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971), because like the less than genteel gay German New Cinema auteur filmmaker's seedy PSA of politically potent poofdom, Harlan's strangely sound swansong argues against the dangers of narcissistic rich gay men, who with their unlimited funds and cultivated art collections, merely derive a strong superficial satisfaction from buying young boys in a manner no more meaningful than their need acquire worthless knickknacks. Harlan certainly did his job as a filmmaker as it also hard for the viewer to deny the charms of Boris Winkler – a dapperly dressed man of immaculate manners and endless knowledge who is no less suave than Satan himself – because he is easily the most interesting and multifaceted character in Bewildered Youth, so much so that the viewer would like to see him get away with his dastardly deeds, even if he ruined a couple of lives in the process, which he apparently does in the original cut of the film until German censors stepped in, thus denying the film near melodramatic perfection of the majestically absurd lapsed National Socialist sort. Although I found his claim to be a bit dubious upon first hearing it, absurdist Aryan auteur/renege Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensiefel (who directed the 1988 film Mutters Maske; a fiercely facetious freeform remark of Harlan's 1944 melodrama Opfergang) may have been on to something when he stated that German New Cinema master of melodrama Rainer Werner Fassbinder was more influenced by the films of Veit Harlan than the Hollywood melodramas of Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk, as both kraut auteurs were versatile filmmakers who, on top of being accused of anti-semitism for their portrayals of money-grubbing, Shiksa-seducing capitalist Jews and adapting to the changing times, cinematically depicted – for better or worse – an uncompromising celluloid window of the psyche of the German collective that, unlike the majority of Teutonic filmmakers, has stood the test of the time. After all, who else but Veit Harlan has managed to go from a race-mixing Jew lover (his first wife was the Judaic actress/cabaret singer Dora Gerson), to being the hottest filmmaker of the Third Reich and Joseph Goebbels' most prized auteur, to being accused of communist sympathies for Verrat an Deutschland aka Der Fall Dr. Sorge (1954), to creating the first important homosexual-themed film of the post-WWII era. That being said, aside from his sexual proclivities, somehow I think Harlan and Dr. Boris Winkler have a lot in common.

FRUIT OF PARADISE

Věra Chytilová (1970)

With authoritarian communism rearing its ugly culture-distorting redhead in Czechoslovakia with the Soviet invasion of the country in 1968, foremost female Czech New Wave auteur Vera Chytilová (O necem jinem aka Something Different, Kalamita aka Calamity) found her highly creative and insanely idiosyncratic filmmaking career put on hold just at the time it began to both nationally and internationally flourish. After completing her most well known and critically revered work Sedmikrásky (1966) aka Daisies, which was banned upon its initial release in 1966 until 1967 largely due to its gratuitous waste of food (!), Chytilová directed one more film, Ovoce stromů rajských jíme (1970) aka Fruit of Paradise aka We Eat the Fruit of the Trees of Paradise, before she was unofficially blacklisted and was forced to work in the undignified world of television commercials using her husband Jaroslav Kucera's name just so she could make ends meet. Fruit of Paradise was the first Chytilová film I ever saw and in my opinion it is the filmmaker's masterpiece as a uniquely uncompromising and thematically/aesthetically intricate work that even seems to transcend Daisies. Like much of Chytilová's oeuvre, especially Daisies, Fruit of Paradise is often-times incorrectly described as a feminist flick when, in fact, as the auteur has mentioned in various interviews, it is an anti-Soviet parable. An innately anarchistic yet equally operatic reworking of the biblical Adam and Eve story set in a hippie-like outdoors health resort of the exceedingly if not somewhat misleadingly ethereal sort, Fruit of Paradise managed to be entered in competition at the 1970 Cannes Film Festival, but not unsurprisingly, the work was poorly received because apparently nobody could understand it. Indeed, as much as I appreciate anti-communist flicks, Fruit of Paradise succeeds most in its daringly decadent and superlatively self-indulgent aestheticism as a keenly kaleidoscopic work that manages to even rival the high-camp Kulturscheisse films of kraut dandy Werner Schroeter. Not unlike American auteur E. Elias Merhige's rather uneven black-and-white experimental flick Begotten (1990), Fruit of Paradise begins with a positively penetrating 10-minute prologue that is a virtual film in and of itself and could easily work as a stand-alone short, but what really makes Fruit of Paradise is that it is endlessly enthralling as a sort of beautiful lunatic celluloid love child of Kenneth Anger and Gábor Bódy. A work that essentially proves that Chytilová is the only rightful heir to Maya Deren and an anti-communist flick from a leftist that is no less hyper hermetic than the works of Dušan Makavejev, Fruit of Paradise is ultimately a film that reminds the viewer why the devil wears red. And as they say, better dead than red...

For the first 10-minutes or so of Fruit of Paradise, one watches unclad Adam and Eve as they quite angelically tread through a magic, psychedelic forest with ever-changing kaleidoscopic rainbow colors illuminating the flora and fauna. Es-entially, a solacing yet semi-salacious introduction to Chytilová's radical retelling of the Fall of Man, Fruit of Paradise then cuts at about the 10-minute point to the present and introduces protagonist Eva (Jitka Nováková) and her somewhat impotent husband Josef (Karel Novak). After fiddling with a little Satanic snake that looks more like a grotesque worm, Eva makes the mistake of biting into a forbidden piece of fruit, but hubby Josef does not feel like taking bite, though he has a taste for something he cannot describe. Shortly after her date with the apple, Eva climbs a wall out of ostensible paradise and meets a Svengali-like fellow named Robert (Jan Schmid)—a dandy devil and serial killer—after he nearly urinates on her little pug-like head. Eva seems somewhat afraid of but intrigued by Robert and for good reason, so she goes her separate way when the fellow rebuffs her, but it will be far from the last time she meets the mischievous man. Living in a hedonistic fantasy outdoor health resort/spa that is like a sort of naturalist neo-pagan hippie heaven, Eva and Josef surround themselves around equally naïve grown adults who, not unlike the two girly girl antiheroes of Daisies, act like children and have rather voracious appetites when it comes to whimsical pleasure and entertainment. After attempting to plant carrots for her husband, Eva once again bumps into Robert in what seems to be fate, but the little lady blows him off and runs away. Being a Satanic mack daddy, Robert hits on a number of women, including a wheelchair-bound 78-year-old elderly woman, but as a man of refined taste, he rejects other women. One day, Eva and her husband play a game with friends of what seems to be anarchic volleyball with a giant orange balloon and during the game a key falls out of Robert's pocket. Always looking to get deeply involved with something she should not be doing, Eva steals Robert's key and enters his home where she finds a stamp, which she nonsensically stamps her thigh with, thereupon leaving the number 6 permanently imprinted on her leg. As Eva soon learns after reading a newspaper with some friends, a local serial killer has been killing blonde women and stamping their bodies with the number 6. Of course, Eva, who is a blonde, comes to the natural conclusion that Robert is the killer. Not long after that, Robert notices Eva has the number 6 imprinted on her thigh and realizes she knows he is the killer, so naturally he decides he must kill her as well, even if she is not a blonde. Meanwhile, Eva realizes her hubby Josef is a dirty liar and leaves him, as if he is a more deplorable individual than an actual bloodthirsting serial killer. Totally in tune with her own female logic, Eva stupidly decides to go chasing after Robert again. Of course, Eva later goes back to Josef as she seems to have a hard time making up her mind. Later, Robert decides he wants to kill Eva, but she ends up killing him instead and failingly attempts to climb over a wall back to paradise, which she has ultimately eternally lost. In the end, Eva goes back to Josef and they both agree that they do not want to know the truth. Fruit of Paradise concludes with the following words being sung by an unseen fellow with a deep voice: "And both their eyes were opened, and they saw they were naked. And they heard the voice of God walking in paradise in the cool of the day. And the man and the wife hid themselves the presence of the Lord among the fruit trees of paradise.”

Indeed, for all the aimless academic talk about Fruit of Paradise being a feminist flick, the film certainly portrays the female protagonist as a scatterbrained nitwit of the pedomorphic sort who cannot make up her mind about anything and always seems to find herself in deleterious situations, though I would be lying if I did not admit that the work portrays men in no less of an unflattering light. Sort of auteur Vera Chytilová's cinematic equivalent to Fando y Lis (1968) directed by Alejandro Jodorowsky except all the more aesthetically and thematically intriguing, Fruit of Paradise is a rare work that managed to create a new cinematic language, thus making it all the more of an artistic tragedy that the film was lost for some time and Chytilová's filmmaking career dissolved right after the film's release. Of course, like Daisies, Fruit of Paradise features its fair share of Slavic slapstick-like humor, albeit thankfully to a less overwhelming degree. In a somewhat recent interview, Chytilová stated that she created Fruit of Paradise to speak about “the ideological situation of that time” and that the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia was metaphorically told via the biblical story of Adam and Eve. In the same interview, Chytilová described how the Czech people had to “live in a lie” and that they were “violently raped.” Of course, the antagonist of Fruit of Paradise, Robert the Devil, is a perennial liar who attempts to seduce, swindle, and slaughter virtually every lady that passes his warped gaze and he does not support a red outfit for nothing as a seductive symbol of communism who is just as charming as he is cold and callous. Aside from its singular aesthetic majesty and totally tasty idiosyncratic and iconoclastic tableaux, Fruit of Paradise also acts as the perfect antidote to the Marxist fanboyism of films produced in countries like West Germany and France at the same time. While idealistic idiots like Jean-Luc Godard, Jean-Marie Straub, and Alexander Kluge were fetishizing Marxism from the luxury of spoiled capitalist nations where one could certainly afford to wallow in such utopian far-left ideals, Chytilová had to come up with a creative and cryptic way to express the fact that her nation was being senselessly culturally and socially sodomized by the Soviets. Indeed, I would not be surprised if the lousy reception Fruit of Paradise had at the 1970 Cannes Film Festival was more the result of the critics being offended by the film's anti-communist message than their inability to comprehend the film. The closest thing to an anti-communist take on Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970) and a work that proves that Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid (La Paloma, Shadow of Angels) was not the only European filmmaker of his degenerate generation to make timeless aesthetically-pleasing parables bashing the left, Fruit of Paradise is certainly a lost masterpiece ripe for rediscovering for more discerning cinephiles.

JOSHUA

Vic Armstrong (1993) I consider Joshua to be an unofficial sequel to Williamson's Boss Nigger. Apart from having a different name, let alone a name at all, he dons the same clothes and hat to take on the persona of The Black Rider. This film is a film glorifying all that is holy and bad ass about the Hammer. You will watch Fred Williamson sneak through a desert in a very Italian cinema feel for an hour and a half and you will be entertained. Joshua is coming home from servicing in the army and plans to see his mom; a slave owned by a loving and hospitable white family. Before he gets a chance to see her, a group of roughnecks kill his mother and kidnap his mail-order bride and begin raping her constantly throughout the film until she succumbs to a loony case of Stockholm Syndrome. Due to the bleak nothingness that this film's philosophy encompasses, much of the run time of this film will be slow and uneventful but will flourish in a wonderful climax that features a truly heart-breaking final line. This film makes me feel more for elderly colored folk than the entire film of The Color Purple would ever hope to achieve. The most surprising element of Joshua is the rape element. Not graphic or raw, the rape is seriously implied in several scenes. His beautiful innocent bride will be gang-raped in the desert by non-hygienic cowboys and it is very depressing. Shocking to say the least, she eventually mutates into a simple plot device and is soon forgotten about. Joshua is a vessel for Fred Williamson to further his cult status. It works to a degree. While not being a great film, Joshua gets by being entertaining and a wonderful blaxploitation spaghetti western. The only real solid problem I had with this film is the same theme playing consistently through the entire film. You won't not hear it. Joshua is his mother's son, and he is on a quest for revenge.

DEATHWATCH

Vic Morrow (1966)

Long before he and two little Chinese girls were the victims of John Landis' deleterious directing and died tragically after being decapitated by a helicopter rotor during the filming of Twilight Zone: The Movie (1983), Combat! (1962–1967) star Vic Morrow directed an early gay prison flick starring Hebraic mongrel alien Spock. Indeed, believe it or not, in 1966, Morrow adapted flaming fag frog criminal Jean Genet's early play, Deathwatch (1949) aka Haute surveillance, starring Leonard Nimoy, who also co-produced the work, in one of the lead roles. Co-written for the screen by Morrow and his then-wife Barbara Turner (who, with Morrow, produced actress Jennifer Jason Leigh), Deathwatch is based on a predictably prison-fetishizing play that cocksucking ex-con Genet apparently rewrote no less than four times between 1943–1946 (due to this, some argue that it was his first play). A claustrophobic low-budget chamber piece featuring a couple dream-sequences (including one where Nimoy wallows in a one-man pearl necklace orgy of sorts) and depicting a truly bizarre love triangle between three very different colon chokers, the film features not a single scene of bum chum buggery and only suggests the presence of sod sexual savagery through incessant glances, slang lingo, and foreboding sexual tensions. In short, Deathwatch takes a completely different approach from what Genet did with his first and last film, Un Chant d'Amour (1950) aka A Song of Love, which is more or less a pathologically poetic prison-themed porn flick that highly benefited from cine-magician Jean Cocteau's stunning singular cinematography. While it may seem odd that a rampantly heterosexual geezer with a name like 'Vic' would make his directorial debut by adapting a French poof play, it is not so strange when one considers the actor turned auteur, as well as Nimoy, played one of the lead characters when the work first made its theatrical premiere in 1958 at Theatre East in New York City. In fact, in a somewhat recent podcast interview with Nimoy conducted by fatfreefilm.com, the actor (who also starred in the 1963 film version of Jean Genet's play The Balcony starring Shelley Winters and Peter Falk) credited his part in the 1958 theatrical version as being responsible for helping his acting career blossom. Quite comparable to gutter auteur Andy Milligan's sub-avant-garde short Vapors (1965) in terms of its static and dreary colorless aesthetic and rather uncomfortable depiction of malignant maneater melancholy, angst, and weltschmerz, Morrow's little fudge-nudger film is not exactly the sort of wanton work that will inspire a sexually deviant fellow to head to the public restrooms for some raunchy anonymous joy boy buggery, as a work that makes prison seem like a sort of real-life pandemonium of contagious misery that drives people to sexual inversion and even coldblooded murder. Basically, the story of two gay prisoners who are attempting in vain to vie for the fleeting attention of a completely illiterate and majorly macho murderer who is too dumb to even realize that his cocksucker cellmates want to be his sex slaves, Deathwatch is ultimately a dejecting work about intolerable loneliness that ends in senseless tragedy. Indeed, if you are expecting the action-packed ass-reaming of HBO's Oz (1997-2003), Morrow's superlatively stagy work will ultimately prove to be a double downer of sorts.

At the beginning of the film, annoyingly quiet introvert Jules LaFranc (Leonard Nimoy) is herded into prison while wearing shackles and a KKK-esque hood over his face and is forced to do pointless exercises that involve him walking around aimlessly with his co-prisoners in a caged room. One of the prisoners, Emil (played by The Love Boat star Gavin MacLeod), gets so fed up and out-of-breathe from these terribly tedious exercises of physical and psychological torture that he attacks a guard and is thus subsequently repaid for his efforts by having his head decapitated frog-style via guillotine. After Captain Stubing literally loses his head at about the 10 minute mark of the film, the title screen finally appears and the viewer is soon imprisoned in a majorly miserable celluloid ménage à trios between an effete bitch, an antisocial beta, and a barbaric alpha-beast. Indeed, Greeneyes (Michael Forest, who made a name for himself working with Roger Corman) is the baddest brute in the entire prison and he is scheduled for a date with the guillotine as permanent punishment for 'unwittingly' strangling a young girl to death in what some might describe as a crime of passion. While he won't admit it at first, LaFranc is completely infatuated with Greeneyes, but he lacks the social skills and martial prowess to appeal to the rather aggressive alpha-inmate, so he reads and writes letters for him instead to demonstrate his loyalty and sense of respect for the macho murderer. Indeed, Greeneyes is an illiterate, so he makes LaFranc his bitch and has him write letters to his girlfriend for him. Unquestionably, most of the tension in the cell is caused by a queenish fairy named Maurice (played by Paul Mazursky, who previously co-starred with Morrow in Richard Brooks 1955 work Blackboard Jungle), who is proud to call himself Greeneyes' "punk." A perennially jealous man, Greeneyes wants Maurice to kill his girlfriend because if he cannot have her, no one can have ever. Unfortunately for him, Maurice, who would gladly liquidate the little lady as he is jealous of her, will never get the chance to declare his love to Greeneyes by exterminating his girlfriend, as his days are numbered.

Greeneyes is so irrationally paranoid and completely clueless regarding the motivations of his cellmates that he accuses both LaFranc and Maurice of attempting to steal his lady love, even though the two less than manly men are really madly in love with him. Greeneyes has nil respect for either of his colonchoking comrades because they are both in prison for petty pansy offenses, with LaFranc being a failed jewel thief. As Greeneyes declares while in an enraged trance-like state just before attacking his two sissy cellmates, "I am the prison! In thy cells, I guard the convicts...soldiers...plunderers...pimps [...] I am the prison and I stand alone! I'm getting ready for my own execution!" thus demonstrating his deranged mind and lack of sense of reality. Greeneyes is so respected that even the prison guards like him, including one sharply dressed fellow (Robert Ellenstein), who warns LaFranc to stay away from the big men in prison while waving a baton in his face as if it were a cock. When Greeneyes learns that LaFranc has a tattoo on his chest with the word "Avenger," he develops a small degree of respect for the less than intimidating jewel thief, telling him that he must commit, "A genuine murder" if he ever wants to be a top dog in prison as "nothing else will do," when it comes to being a big player in the penitentiary. Of course, Maurice gets jealous and reveals that LaFranc's tattoo is a fake that was drawn with crayon. Needless to say, LaFranc strangles Maurice out of anger for making him look like a pathetic poser, but also to impress Greeneyes. Of course, Greeneyes is unimpressed by LaFranc's murder and berates him for senselessly killing a mere "punk." In his misguided megalomania, LaFranc declares his unwarranted sense of superiority over Greeneyes and his comrade 'Snowball' (who never actually appears in the film) by self-righteously stating, "I understand...I'll never be what you are...but I am stronger than any of you." Indeed, whereas Greeneyes strangled a girl to death on impulse without even realizing it, LaFranc "willed" his murder of Maurice, thus making him feel ostensibly superior. In the end, LaFranc states, "I'm all alone" after realizing his attempt to impress Greeneyes by savagely strangling Maurice failed to pay off and has only made him feel all the more alienated from his comrades.

It should be noted that Deathwatch is not the only adaptation of Genet's play, as undeservedly forgotten French artsploitation auteur Pierre-Alain Jolivet later directed a version of the work under the title Black Mirror (1981) aka Haute surveillance. Judging merely by his previous sadistically salacious cinematic efforts, including his Fernando Arrabal adaptation Le grand cérémonial (1969) aka Weird Weirdo and the S&M-flavored quasi-arthouse flick La punition (1973) aka The Punishment, I am going to have to assume that Jolivet's Haute surveillance adaptation is probably a more subversive and aesthetically superior work, though Morrow's film certainly does make for one of the most strangely interesting and seemingly unbelievable footnotes of Genet-themed cinema history. Essentially, Genet's own film Un Chant D'Amour says virtually everything Deathwatch attempt to say, albeit without words and in a more debasingly direct and exceedingly 'honest' sort of manner where highly expressive crypto-poof prisoners and hyper horny guards feed off each other's sexual energy in a work depicting a decidedly degrading, less than private, and terribly claustrophobic all-male environment where sexual tensions are king and where the social hierarchy is based solely upon a person's masculinity and criminality. Genet was not the only person who romanticized and fetishized his time served in prison, as Canadian playwright John Herbert wrote a play in 1967 entitled Fortune and Men's Eyes, which was based on his experience as a prisoner and was later adapted into a film in 1971 that has a similar essence to Deathwatch due to its glaringly theatric and conspicuously cramped tone. In a somewhat recent interview with star Leonard Nimoy, the actor described Deathwatch as being a “grim, dark movie” that he believes was not warmly accepted up its release due to it being a, “Very tough, very tough film...not cinematic at all...It feels like a filmed stage play.” Indeed, while I can certainly recommend the film to Jean Genet, Leonard Nimoy, and gay prison flick fans, Morrow’s all but forgotten directorial debut is not exactly the sort of film I would even recommend to most cinephiles, even if it does have a somewhat of a Samuel Fuller-esque feel about it. Advertised with the absurdly sensationalized taglines, “The Strangest Triangle Ever Filmed!” and “MIASMA of homosexuality...constantly electrifying!” Deathwatch ultimately reminds the viewer of how much American society has ‘progressed’ over the past half-century or so, as one can now see negroes savagely raping Guido mobsters in a contemporary TV series like Oz.

SEX WISH

Victor Milt (1976)

It seems the golden age of pornography has finally caught up to me this month. What, with all these mid-70s roughies that have found their way of falling directly into my lap. Following Sex Wish was The Intrusion but to discuss that gem would be best saved for another time. Sex Wish was directed by Victor Milt under the pseudonym of Tim McCoy and starred at least two prominent adult stars, Harry Reems (best known for Deep Throat) and Zebedy Colt. What should be quite obvious of Sex Wish is that it is a pornographic rendition of the classic vigilante film Death Wish. What shouldn't be obvious is how of quality the film actually is and the lengths of extremes both male adult stars traverse to prove that they have other talents aside from 'dropping loads'. Opening with a soapy bathtub massage, Ken (Reems) writhes in pleasure under the commissioned hands of a committed fiancée as he discusses his vacation (business and pleasure) when the topic changes to that of geisha girls. "Uhh, yeah! Most everything they say about those geisha girls is true!" A fun fact of Sex Wish's would be that this nod to geisha girls and Ken's trip is later made into its own little adult film tentatively titled Harry and His Geisha Girls. The possibilities of the canon could be endless, if the character reprises a similar past. Whether or not it was an influenced notion or an actual predecessor is unknown to me but fun to imagine, be it as it may. The act of foreplay turns into erotic conquest and then changes locations within the apartment frequently, ending with them on the floor. A charming aspect of Sex Wish isn't the graphic penetration but rather the incredible chemistry the two lovers share. I found it to be a bit odd that I was so interested in the idle banter and pillow talk. Following the course of action required by the title, Ken's exit from the premises rebounds with Zebedy Colt's entrance, severing Ken's happiness. Ideally, Sex Wish could serve as a document to the Night-Walker's intimidation of female sexuality. Being a notable gay adult star, Zebedy Colt is no stranger to depravity and arts considered taboo. Directing the infamous The Farmer's Daughter the same year that Sex Wish saw release, it can be seen as obvious that both lent an air of inspiration to the opposing role. Playing both rapist and father of a daughter in the span of a year, Colt proves vividly that no role can be too above his charisma. Just take Sex Wish in account, where Zebedy Colt channels retardation exquisitely as he coos for mother and punishes women for teaching dirty tricks to her sweet boy.

Whether or not masturbation is your muse, Sex Wish is a marvel of plot-driven pornographic detail. Reems' mourning seems to resonate awfully sound with the male species, if not being a bit too comically poetic. Ken soon slips down the slippery slope of uncommitted sexual encounters realizing that the greatest salve is the anonymous embrace of the common whore (duh). After subsequently taking a drunken crawl from melancholy to bedding down two hookers, Ken begins a sporadic crusade of searching for the man last seen in his complex with a cane and briefcase. Partitioning this with a tender and well-shot and scored scene of lovemaking - Sex Wish then throws something that was never evident in Paul Kersey's world of urban rot - passion. With Ken and his lovely neighbor offering each other both their bodies and a bed (supplied by the latter), the two quickly succumb to one of their most primal instincts. One of the more memorable scenes for certain, Harry Reems' character shows that there is much more to covet than satin sheets or canopies, although the film itself is guilty of utilizing these with a lucid intention. Perhaps it was for a princess effect lost amidst the muck and depravity. Further emphasizing Zebedy Colt's "killer" performance is the use of what sounds to be wailing theremin, creating a suffocating atmosphere, especially when you take in account the obscene ways Colt brutalizes his victims, whether it's using a dildo for a vaginal thermometer or the alleged cut scene of Colt forcing a woman to eat the severed genitals of her lover. Pure speculation though, but I wouldn't be surprised as he is caught castrating a Negro. Moments of fleeting brilliance and a touching and obsessive conclusion are afoot in Sex Wish. It is a must that you see it through to completion, otherwise it's memory will be awash with tedious sexual encounters. This is a porno, after all. Although it was born of this nature, there does exist, behind the curtain, a reason and a means. Sick and twisted? Of course. If you stumbled in on Sex Wish searching for any sense or sort of decency then your disappointment will be your own betrayal, not the film's. For what it is worth, I greatly enjoyed Sex Wish and I cannot wait to track down more featuring Zebedy Colt.

MEAT

Victor Nieuwenhuijs (2010)

With the relocation of controversial avant-garde auteur Aryan Kaganof back to his South African homeland in the late-1990s and the Allah-approved assassination of Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh (Charley, Submission) in 2004 by a crazed Moroccan Islamist whose appearance personifies the timeless Teutonic word ‘untermensch,’ Dutch cinema indubitably received a heavy blow in terms of true cinematic subversion and avant-gardism. Indeed, aside from a couple of somewhat obscure filmmakers like Edwin ‘Dutch Fassbinder’ Brien (Terrorama!, Lebenspornografie) and the husband-wife collaborative team Victor Nieuwenhuijs and Maartje Seyferth—two filmmakers who, for whatever reason, have co-directed a number of films together over the past couple of decades, including the highly eroticized black-and-white Leopold von Sacher-Masoch adaption Venus in Furs (1994), Lulu (2005), Crepuscule (2009), and, most recently, Cat and Mouse (2014)—the Dutch film industry might as well be kaput. While I am not exactly that impressed with Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth’s entire oeuvre, I have not been able to get their absurdist black comedy Vlees (2010) aka Meat out of my mind ever since I first saw it about a year ago. While Meat borrows from David Lynch, Peter Greenaway, and even Luis Buñuel, the film ultimately reminded me of what might happen if experimental Dutch auteur Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento)—a criminally underrated avant-gardist whose wildly idiosyncratic cinematic aesthetic prefigured the deathrock/goth subculture by at least a decade—attempted to make a modernist murder mystery. Indeed, the salacious yet sardonic story of a fat middle-aged butcher who is mysteriously butchered, but not before bugging a little blond babe half his age, Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth’s tragicomic work portrays sex as something that is about as beautiful as a slaughterhouse. A rather original film-within-a-film, the work stars a crazy little blonde girl who enjoys, among other things, filming her coworkers having sex and being molested by a dirty old butcher who, although fat as the pigs he routinely slaughters, has the sexual stamina of a man half his age/size. Also featuring a police detective played by the same actor (Titus Muizelaar, who is a favorite of the directors) as the butcher, Meat also features a provocative doppelgänger theme where two totally different men inevitably become one (or, should I say, one of the men dies and the other takes his identity). A work that somehow manages to make sex and animal slaughtering seem like they are one and the same, Meat depicts an exceedingly emotionally vacant world where people are more or less nothing more than metaphysically dead meat that see other people as nothing more than delectable meat. Featuring the sort of callously comical and innately cynical tone that only the Dutch seem capable of, the work is ultimately like an uniquely unholy celluloid marriage between Tobe Hooper’s The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) and Alain Robbe-Grillet’s Suc- cessive Slidings of Pleasure (1974) aka Glissements progressifs du plaisir, albeit with a hyper-cynical comedic tone that is more venomous, if not less sophisticated, than the films of Hebraic iconoclast Todd Solondz.

A nameless and physically bloated middle-aged Dutch Butcher (Titus Muizelaar) likes to work hard and play hard and he is even good at doing them both at the same time, as demonstrated by the fact he has sex with his girlfriend Tiny (Wilma Bakker) in a walk-in freezer during the middle of work. When the Butcher notices a young blonde coworker named Roxy (portrayed by Nellie Benner, who played the oftentimes nude lead of Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth's previous feature Crepuscule) filming him having sex with Tiny, he begins to routinely sexually assault the young lady by talking dirty to her with crude remarks like, "I'll caress you, lick you 'till you're wet and glistening" and putting his big fat hands over her smooth and silky bodacious body. After discovering his much hated boss Jan (Hugo Metsers of Aryan Kaganof's Wasted! (1996) aka Naar de klote!) has sexually defiled his girlfriend, the Butcher finally gets the gall to seduce Roxy and the two have passionate (and seemingly unstimulated) sex in a shower stall at the slaughterhouse that concludes in a rather messy and ultimately murderous fashion. After sharing cross-generational carnal knowledge, Roxy hovers over the Butcher's rather grotesque unclad body and films herself urinating on him, yet the middle-age pervert barely responds, as if he has somehow become paralyzed. That same night, the Butcher dies in the very same spot and position where Roxy blessed him with a youthful golden shower. Ultimately, a rather lethargic and unhappily married policeman named Inspector Mann (Titus Muizelaar) is in charge of the case relating to the Butcher's death and he will also fall under Roxy's sassy, sensual, and seemingly sinister spell. Indeed, if Meat proves anything, it is that overweight old dudes will do anything to be with a cutesy young girl that is young enough to be their daughter.

A fat slob with a shaggy haircut who seems more or less impotent and who routinely denies his sexually repressed girlfriend love, sex, and affection, Inspector Mann may perfectly resemble the Butcher in general physical appearance, but the two men are total opposites in terms of personalities (with the Butcher being rooted, virile, and extroverted and the cop being deracinated, impotent, and introverted). When the Inspector's cold shoulder proves to be too cold for his much suffering wife, she decides to commit suicide by leaping off her apartment balcony in a rather hilarious fashion. Of course, Herr Mann barely even takes a glance at the still warm corpse of his wife after she falls to her melodramatic death. A perennial loser with the spirit of a Canadian eunuch, Mann is also routinely emasculated by his handicapped mother, who venomously berates her son's lack of literal and figurative testicular fortitude by complaining, "You can't even procreate. You're not a man, you're nothing. You're a total failure." Of course, considering the Inspector's intrinsic impotence, it would probably be a mistake if he decided to reproduce. Needless to say, while investigating the murder of the Butcher, Inspector Mann brings Roxy in for questioning and soon falls madly in love with the mysterious butcher babe. Among other things, Mann learns that Roxy was raped by a nerd wearing a skull mask and has a rather swarthy and violent Turk boyfriend named Mo (Gürkan Küçüksentürk), who suffocates his Aryan girlfriend with her own shirt while hate-fucking her in a racially-charged fashion. When Mann brings in Mo for questioning, he tries to kiss the turd-like Turk's feces-colored ass by patronizingly remarking like the true cultural cuckold that he is, "I sympathize with you guys, unlike others around here." Ultimately, Mo denies being Roxy's girlfriend, as he claims he barely knows her and is planning to get married in Turkey in two months, to which the Inspector replies, "So you're thinking...I'll just dump the Dutch slut?" Towards the conclusion of the film, Mann nonsensically strangles Roxy, who is wearing the same skull mask her rapist wore, in the same forest where the young lady was sexually pillaged. By the end of the film, Mann gets a much needed haircut and looks completely identical to the deceased Butcher. After being told by a coworker that he has been taken off the murder case and is being charged with manslaughter, Mann goes to the slaughterhouse, strips off all his clothes, and slits his own throat with a butcher knife in the same exact place where the Butcher died, with Roxy, who is characteristically unclad, watching the entire scenario play out while sitting on a stainless steel butcher table nearby.

While I am hesitant to describe Meat as a masterpiece of any sort, the somewhat impenetrable film does offer much carnal/carnivorous food-for-thought and is quite comparable to David Lynch's Mulholland Dr. (2001) in terms of being a darkly erotic celluloid puzzle of sorts. Indeed, had the film been made in the 1970s, I sincerely believe that it could have become a minor midnight movie, as it features most, if not all, of the qualities of a cinephile's wet dream as an arcane, absurd, and aberrant yet highly humorous celluloid nightmare. A work featuring seemingly random and pointless scenes like a hot young chick pissing on an over-the-hill slob and a pig taking a whiff of the piss of another urinating pig, Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth's film is also a majorly misanthropic work that associates humans with hogs and treats human tragedy (i.e. rape, murder, suicide, social alienation, etc.) as innately comical, thus making for a severely sardonic film that dares to point out many of the social ills of our age, especially in regard to the undead corpse that is Western Europe. Indeed, a film featuring a compulsively cute girl who can only find borderline obese middle-aged men and swarthy and uniquely ugly Turks as prospective lovers, Meat depicts a spiritually and emotionally bankrupt world of social and sexual dysfunction that reminds one why contemporary Dutch women are so warped that they see having kinky haired and brown-eyed racially mixed bastard babies to be an appealing prospect. While I can only guess the political persuasions of the directors of the film, Meat certainly depicts the 'romantic' relationship between blonde Roxy and Turk Mo as a rather abusive and exploitive one that is even less ideal than that of a relationship between a nubile babe and a grotesque old fart. Indeed, Meat certainly features something to offend virtually everyone, especially the sort of people that are easily offended, including anti-rape activists, vegans, feminists, beta-male men's rights activists, so-called 'guest workers' (aka non-white aliens), postmenopausal women, cuckolds, practicing Calvinists, and countless others, thereupon making for a rare modernist work that deserves to be described as innately iconoclastic. Needless to say, I plan to follow directors Victor Nieuwenhuijs and Maartje Seyferth's careers, though I find it somewhat inexplicable that two different minds could sire a film that is as wildly idiosyncratic as Meat. Indeed, I would not be surprised if Seyferth manipulates Nieuwenhuijs in a similar subtle fashion to how Roxy manipulates the two character played by Titus Muizelaar in the film. Among its various other striking qualities, Meat also features what is probably the most autistic femme fatale in cinema history.

CREPUSCULE

Victor Nieuwenhuijs, Maartje Seyferth (2009)

Female mental illness and hysteria is a subject that is very rarely treated in cinema in a fashion that transcends unintentionally goofy caricatures and banal clichés as epitomized in overrated Hollywood films like Girl, Interrupted (1999) where a real-life bat-shit crazy broad like Angelina Jolie portrays a fictional bat-shit crazy broad in an exceedingly phony fashion. Of course, there are certain European arthouse filmmakers like Ingmar Bergman and Rainer Werner Fassbinder who had a talent for depicting the more mentally deteriorated members of the fairer sex, but they, not unlike American auteur John Cassavetes with A Woman Under the Influence (1974), took a highly theatrical and largely literal approach to the subject. It seems that only a couple exceedingly effete gay male filmmakers like Werner Schroeter have even dared to depict ladylike lunacy in a more visceral, abstract, and esoteric fashion as reflected in the German director's works like Day of the Idiots (1981) and Malina (1991), which no heterosexual man could have ever directed. Probably due to the fact that there are not many female filmmakers, especially genuinely talented ones, there are also hardly any worthwhile films about demented dames directed by dames aside from a couple notable exceptions like Helma Sanders-Brahms' No Mercy, No Future (1981) aka Die Berührte, a couple works by Valie Export (Unsichtbare Gegner aka Invisible Adversaries, Die Praxis der Liebe aka The Practice of Love), and Marina de Van's Dans ma peau (2002) aka In My Skin. Of course, considering most female filmmakers seem to tend to be feminists (including most of the ones I mentioned above), a lot of their works tend to blame men for female mental instability as reflected in the works of Margarethe von Trotta, Helke Sander, Chantal Akerman, Mary Harron, and various others. If there seems to be any female auteur that has cinematically tackled feminine mental illness in a fairly original and hopelessly honest fashion that is devoid of any sort of glaring socio-political bias, be it feminist or otherwise, it is Dutch auteur Maartje Seyferth who, with her real-life partner Victor Nieuwenhuijs, has directed five features over the course of the past two decades or so that oftentimes tap into the darker side of femininity. With their debut feature Venus in Furs (1994)—an adaptation of Austrian writer Leopold von Sacher-Masoch's classic 1870 S&M/BDSM themed novella of the same name—Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth depicted feminine erotic cruelty and the masochistic men that enjoy receiving it, but it was not until their similarly stylized black-and-white feature Crepuscule (2009) aka Twilight that the couple dared to change gears and dive into the deep, dark, arcane, labyrinthine, and seemingly bottomless abyss of a distressed debutante's perturbed psyche. Aside from Nieuwenhuijs co-penning Venus in Furs and Lulu (2005), Seyferth has been the sole writer of the couple's scripts and in none of their works does this seem more apparent than in their carefully cultivated b/w ‘crazy chick flick.’ While Seyferth is undoubtedly the true ‘auteur’ (aka author) of the film in terms of its themes and decidedly dispiriting spirit, Crepuscule, like all of the couple’s works, was shot by Nieuwenhuijs and thus the aesthetic essence and mise-en-scène is more or less his. Notably, Nieuwenhuijs once studied under Dutch avant-garde master auteur Frans Zwartjes (Living, Pentimento) at the Free Academy at The Hague and the teacher’s influence on his student is readily apparent in the film which, like virtually the entire oeuvre of his mentor, is completely free of dialogue and more or less the modern equivalent of a silent film as a work that makes full use of what cinema does best by communicating what cannot be expressed through mere words or photos, but only through the moving image. A sort of female neo-noir Dutch take on Marco Ferreri’s Dillinger è morto (1969) aka Dillinger Is Dead as a work where a hopelessly bored and equally mentally unstable protagonist goes through a sort of bizarre mental transformation after randomly discovering a revolver, Crepuscule undoubtedly features the sort of brazenly ambitious and uncompromising artistic integrity that has rarely been seen in European cinema since the early-1970s, hence why the filmmakers are hardly household names in the homeland of the Netherlands.

A 70-minute one-woman show starring cutesy blonde babe Nellie Benner—an actress that would go on to play a no less demanding role in Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth’s later darkly comedic absurdist work Vlees (2010) aka Meat—in what would be her very first acting role before she went on to star in a series of Dutch TV shows, Crepuscule is a malignantly moody and somehow simultaneously melancholic yet erotic meditation on the slow-burning disintegration of one cracked chick’s fragile mind. In the handful of reviews I could find about the film, the work is described as a literal take on the popular cinephile quote attributed to Jean-Luc Godard, “All you need to make a movie is a girl and a gun” (actually, Godard borrowed this quote from D.W. Griffith) but of course that would like be describing Orson Welles’ Citizen Kane (1941) as a film about an old dying man and a sled or Robert Bresson’s Au hasard Balthazar (1966) as a drama about a girl and a donkey. While the nameless waif in the film never speaks, she is what one might describe as an ‘unreliable narrator’ and ‘non compos mentis’ as a couple things happen in the film that make absolutely no logical sense. Aside from never learning the protagonist’s actual name, one also never learns literally nothing about her background or why she abruptly decides to move to Amsterdam at the very beginning of the film. Indeed, as far as the viewer can tell, the protagonist could be a spoiled rich girl from Sweden who ran away from home, or a failed American academic who just got out of drug rehab, though it seems more likely that she is a victim of sexual violence that needed to get away from a scary place that reminded her of an unfortunate past life. Despite the lack of background information in regard to the young heroine’s life, the viewer will get closer to her in a way that reminded me of great Viennese

Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger's words: "No men who really think deeply about women retain a high opinion of them; men either despise women or they have never thought seriously about them." Insensitive remarks about womanhood aside, Crepuscule is certainly a work that forces male viewers to confront aspects of femininity that they would probably be better off not knowing. While it is true that the film's protagonist does not act as a representative of all of womankind, her mental derangement is discernibly and incontestably female.

If there is one thing that one immediately notices about the nameless protagonist of Crepuscule, it is that she is a deleteriously introverted young lady who mostly lives inside her somewhat unhinged head and only feels comfortable when she is in her apartment by herself as demonstrated by the fact that she is almost always completely stark-naked whilst all by her lonesome. Indeed, the cutesy girl strategically dresses like a sloppy tomboy in public and constantly tugs at the hood of her hoodie in vain to cover as much of her face and hair as possible, as if to disguise the fact that she is a beautiful blonde babe that most men in the world would happily defile. Of course, as the film reveals as it progresses and the protagonist's mind further deteriorates, she is indeed hopelessly afraid of men to the point of hysteria, as if she was the victim of a brutal gang-rape or some similarly brutal sex crime. After moving to a small dimly lit one-room studio apartment in Amsterdam that is furnished with a large dirty mirror, large rug, and electric organ, the leading lady takes a rather unladylike dead-end job at a gas station where she pumps peoples' gas and washes their cars while looking discernibly miserable. Stereotypically Dutch in her pathological frugality, the girl digs through trash to find new furniture for her apartment and creates coat-racks by merely nailing hammers into the wall. Later in the film, the protagonist also nails wooden boards over her windows to make sure that no one can get in from the outside and potentially sexually ravage her. When the protagonist meets a less than charming and rather rotund middle-aged man (played Titus Muizelaar, who also starred in Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth's Lulu and Meat) while washing his minivan at work, she becomes rather unnerved by his seemingly harmless presence and based on no evidence whatsoever, assumes he is a sinister stalker and soon develops a progressive pathological obsession with believing that she is being routinely stalked by the portly fellow. That night while sleeping, a random hand mysteriously place a revolver on the heroine's pillow and while in a somnambulist state, she picks up the weapon and masturbates with it in a superlatively sensual fashion as if it is a vibrator. After playing with the revolver in a thoroughly intrigued and equally aroused fashion as if she is a horny teenage virgin who got to fiddle with a throbbing cock for the first time in her entire life, the protagonist points the weapon at the viewer in what is easily one of the most erotically enticing gun scenes in all of cinema history. With the gun, the heroine obtains a pseudo-phallic of sorts that will empower her enough to where she can conjure up a darker yet more confident and intimidating alter-ego, as if she has suffered a schizophrenic split in her mind that was created so her superlatively sensitive psyche would not altogether crumble as a result of the recent overwhelming stress, paranoia, and melancholy she has suffered as a petrified girl in a cold, dark, and merciless neo-noir world.

After receiving the gun, the heroine begins developing a new nocturnal persona which she compliments by buying a dark wig and a pair of high-heels that give her a more amorous yet predatorial appearance that screams “fuck me but don’t fuck with me.” While looking confident and even domineering for the first time in the film, the protagonist stands in front of her mirror while wearing nothing but her wig and high-heels and while fondling her revolver in a rather risqué fashion that makes it quite clear that she has an eroticized view of violence. With her new ‘femme fatale’ alter-ego, the heroine decides to have a drink at a local outdoor café where she even shouts “Pow! Pow!” (notably, the single two ‘words’ of dialogue in the entire film) while pointing her finger in the air and pretending to shoot an imaginary gun, as if she has finally gained enough confidence to confront society but is incapable of actually properly expressing said confidence. Of course, this film-inspired brand of contrived confidence is fairly short lived. After senselessly smashing a glass of champagne at the café as if to exercise her newfound self-esteem and to temporarily break the tedium of her strikingly dull life, the heroine heads to a local bar but leaves abruptly as soon as she sees the fat man that she absurdly believes is her stalker. While taking a bus ride home, the protagonist once again sees her imagined stalker, so when she gets back to apartment and someone knocks on her door, she decides to answer the door with a revolver, but no one is there.

As symbolically depicted in a Fassbinder-esque shot where the protagonist gives off the appearance of having two head because her face is next to a mirror, the lonely little lady seems to be suffering from a split-personality. With her femme fatale alter-ego being an abject failure, the protagonist decides to take things one step further by dressing in drag and sporting a drawn-on Adolf Hitler/Charlie Chaplin mustache and then once again proceeds to brave Amsterdam during the late night, but this midnight excursion ultimately has psychologically tragic consequences and throws the female lead further into a penetrating psychodramatic nightmare where paranoid obsession gets the best of the socially alienated blonde beauty. Indeed, while walking down the road dressed like a man, the heroine is grabbed by her supposed stalker and pulled down a stairway, though the viewer hears no screams or sounds that might indicate she is being physically and/or sexually savaged. When the heroine finally emerges from the stairway after half a minute or so, she begins running back to her apartment and on the way she becomes so startled upon seeing a cyclist that she takes cover behind a tree and impotently fires a couple of shots from her revolver into a nearby bush. When the mentally perturbed protagonist finally gets back to her apartment, she pathetically beats her bed with a pole and begins waving her gun in the air as if to defend herself against an army of imaginary adversaries. In the end, the heroine takes a midnight stroll to a local pier and puts her revolver-cum-dildo in one of her fleshy orifices, though one never knows if she ever got the gall to pull the trigger.

In the various negative reviews that I have read on Crepuscule, it is claimed that the film is nothing more than a sort of sophomoric film school rip-off of the early works of Godard, but aside from the black-and-white cinematography and the whole “a girl and a gun” deal, the comparisons simply end there. Indeed, if anything, the film is anti-Godardian to the core as a work that, aside from being refreshingly apolitical, portrays the fairer sex at its most hopelessly scared, weak, vulnerable, unstable, erratic, waywardly whimsical, and emotionally destroyed whereas the work of the famed frog commie filmmaker portrays women as oftentimes strong, hypnotic, and deleteriously alluring femme fatales and seductresses who merely need to flaunt their bodies to mentally enslave an alpha-male type. While the female lead of Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth’s work may flaunt her bare derriere in a fashion not unlike Brigitte Bardot at the beginning of Contempt (1963) aka Le Mépris, she does it for the complete opposite reason as she feels most safe and secure while unclad all by herself and immersed in her own hermetic inward world and she certainly does not do it to beguile a man like the character played by the busty blonde French babe. Instead of using her body as an empowering tool like in Contempt where Bardot’s character strokes her own ego by asking her hubby things that she already knows the answer to like “Do you like my ass? Do you like my breasts?,” the cracked chick of Crepuscule feels completely scared and vulnerable because of her wholly and delectably body and the way it makes men salivate, hence her strange proclivity towards wearing over-sized hoodies and bulky jackets in public. Of course, as a film, Crepuscule, much like the films of co-director Nieuwenhuijs’ mentor Frans Zwartjes, is not a highly self-conscious work that was made with the intention of appealing to trendy pedantic left-wing intellectuals like Godard’s films, but instead it is a visceral and uncompromising artistic expression that hits you at the gut-level and never resorts to banal outmoded political ideologies or barely veiled subtextual sermonizing. Like Zwartjes’ work, the film is also not the sort of thing you would screen in a feminist film class, as it is far too enigmatic and ambiguous for it not to cause certain misguided misandrist types to suffer from cognitive dissonance as a result of its intricate and esoteric depiction of a haunted female psyche. Of course, the film’s strikingly flattering depiction of the unclad female form might also incite rage in certain ugly and resentful hags. A work that takes its title from an old fashioned 14th century word for “twilight,” Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth’s celluloid psychodrama ultimately depicts modern Occidental femininity at its most literally and figuratively stripped and bare in what can be seen as a sort of Götterdämmerung of the European female collective unconscious as personified by one particularly damaged dame who is scared of the ‘light’ and ultimately succumbs to the 'dark' (or what Jung described as the "shadow aspect"), only to fall further into an all-consuming abyss of self-obliterating whimsical hysteria, paranoia, dejection, and confusion.

Victor Salva (1989)

Hollywood is full of perverts, degenerates, and antichrists. I can only imagine Steven Spielberg dressed in a messianic cloak surrounded by such satanic showmen as Michael Bay, James Cameron, and Jerry Bruckheimer. Their chore boy would be Clownhouse director Victor Salva. During the filming of Clownhouse, Salva thought it would be ok to molest 12 year star Nathan Forrest Winters. I always thought the random shot of Winters ass in the film was out place and slightly disturbing. Victor Salva left his dirty stamp on it. It has also been rumored that during the filming of Apocalypse Now, Francis Ford Coppola and Victor Salva would have sex with a 14 year old prostitute from the Philippines. That's probably the reason it took so much money and time to finish Apocalypse Now. All the excitement may have even given the heartache Coppola suffered during the films shoot. Love is a heartbreaker. Clownhouse is a somewhat awkward film. Three undesirables escape from a mental institution and decide to put on clown outfits. The clowns decide they want to kill a couple kids. Clownhouse has the feeling of a kids film gone wrong. Bad brothers get the punishment they deserve. Director Victor Salva is a man that has values! He know how to differentiate between good guys and bad guys. Nathan Forrest Winters is the young boy on the far right. Clownhouse is nothing new. The film was obviously the work of a textbook film school technician. Clownhouse has the same contrived and calculated feel as John Carpenter's Halloween (which I am still a fan of). The only real appeal of the film is if you know the dark behind the scenes story surrounding the film. Hollywood has confirmed that it is pro-pedophilia. Despite what Victor Salva did, he still continues to work in Hollywood. He is most famous for Powder (Nathan Forrest Winters tried to start a boycott at it's release) and the Jeepers Creepers franchise. Hollywood could easily get thousands of different other "director for hire" filmmakers. Instead they choose to keep giving Salva work. It's not the most pleasant thing to think about when considering that Hollywood virtually sets the moral codes for America.

THE PHANTOM CARRIAGE

Victor Sjöström (1921)

While I would not exactly call myself a silent cinema connoisseur and I tend to only be willing to sample the best that the pre-sound era has to offer, I have to admit that the greatest of these films has a singular hypnotic quality that sound cinema seems to somehow lack. Apparently, actor turned one-time-auteur Charles Laughton believed this too and was heavily inspired by both the great cinematic works of film pioneer D.W. Griffith and German expressionist films of the 1920s when creating his directorial debut The Night of the Hunter (1955). Undoubtedly, my initial viewings of Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), Carl Th. Dreyer's The Passion of Joan of Arc (1928), Jean Cocteau's Le sang d'un poète (1930) aka The Blood of a Poet, and F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922) and especially Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) proved to be such profound cinematic experiences for me to the degree that I found myself questioning the power of a cinema and ultimately coming to the natural conclusion that it is an artistic medium that is truly unrivaled when it comes to pleasurable imprisoning the subconscious and putting the viewer in a waking trance of sorts. Hell, even a largely forgotten silent short like Das Wolkenphänomen von Maloja (1924) aka Cloud Phenomena of Majola directed by Teutonic mountain film maestro Arnold Fanck has a certain exceptional ethereal quality that seems impossible to reproduce nowadays. While it had been a number of years since I had a comparable experience with silent cinema, a somewhat recent first time viewing of the fairly influential Swedish horror masterpiece The Phantom Carriage (1921) aka Körkarlen aka The Phantom Chariot aka The Stroke of Midnight aka Thy Soul Shall Bear Witness directed by and starring early silent maestro Victor Sjöström (The Outlaw and His Wife, He Who Gets Slapped) reminded me of the singular power and pulchritude of pre-talkie cinema. Like a virtual Nordic Gothic antithesis (and virtual prototype) to Frank Capra's classic It's a Wonderful Life (1946), the film tells the surprisingly darkly morose and unwaveringly grim yet ultimately moral tale of a belligerent wino learning the hard way that life is worth living after a serious brush with death that involves a scythe-wielding Grim Reaper figure in a hooded black cloak teaching lessons as opposed to a lovably jolly, if not seemingly semi-autistic, angel without wings named Clarence like in the Hollywood flick. More a dysfunctional family drama about the perennial homewrecker known as alcohol than any sort of 'pure' horror flick featuring cheap scares and banally enigmatic monsters, The Phantom Carriage is not only one of the greatest silent films ever made but also one of the greatest, if not the greatest, film on the subject of alcoholism and its deleterious effects on friends and families.

Indeed, as much as I hate being around drunkards (aside from having various friends that degenerated into alcoholics, I was once a bouncer), I would be lying if I did not admit that some of my favorite films, including John Huston's underrated Malcolm Lowry adaptation Under the Volcano (1984), are about the perils of dipsomania, and I would certainly argue that Sjöström's film is unequivocally the best of the best despite being one of the first films to seriously tackle the subject. In fact, what makes The Phantom Carriage so effortlessly brilliant and striking is that it manages to relatively seamlessly merge the metaphysical horrors of alcohol with conventions of the horror genre in a fashion that is more or less timeless, hence why it is still one of the very few films of its era that still packs a pleasantly pernicious punch. Surely, Sjöström's flick is Häxan (1922) tier as far as silent Nordic horror is concerned, albeit with a more innately important message. Based on the novel Körkarlen (1912) aka Thy Soul Shall Bear Witness! written by Nobel prize-winning Swedish author Selma Lagerlöf whose works auteur Sjöström had already cinematically adapted three times previously, the film is like a gothic proto-psychedelic fable on acid-laced steroids where the good, the bad, and the ugly of humanity is depicted and where human frailty in the face of both addiction and disease is handled with a refreshing lack of sentimentalism, at least in comparison to other films from that era. Among other things, the viewer is exposed to suicide, deadly drunken brawls, deathbed hysteria, deadbeat dad style family dysfunction, and a decidedly dark climax involving an extremely lonely and desperate mother getting ready to execute a filicide-suicide scenario while her unwitting children sleep nearby with baby dolls with cracked plastic heads in their beds. A fairly preternatural morality tale about redemption with a surprisingly non-linear structure involving a number of flashbacks (and even flashbacks-within-flashbacks) that depicts a literal daunting date with death that a drunkard must take on one rather auspicious New Year's Eve to learn the error of his way so that he can reform and, in turn, save his family before it is too late, Sjöström's penetratingly phantasmagorical flick is probably the only ghost story where man in his natural habitat is more horrifying than the gothic supernatural elements. Additionally, you will not find a more effortlessly artful or aesthetically refined cinematic depiction of alcoholism and I say that as one of the few people that has probably seen Ermanno Olmi's underrated alcoholic odyssey La leggenda del santo bevitore (1988) aka The Legend of the Holy Drinker starring Rutger Hauer.

Undoubtedly, one of the most poignant things that I personally took away from The Phantom Carriage is that it made me become more aware of the fact that I have been, mostly subconsciously, haunted by alcoholics for almost my entire life. Indeed, while I have thankfully never had the misfortune of having alcoholic parents, the three most important women in my life were the daughters of pathetic boozers. While I have met two of these men, it is, somewhat ironically, the one that I have never met that has haunted me the most, so naturally I was somewhat startled when I first watched Sjöström's film and discovered that the quasi-antihero bears a striking resemblance to this man in both appearance and character. A smart and charismatic yet oftentimes savagely sadistic bastard that prefers hanging out with his wino buddies at a sleazy bar to spending time with his family, the lead character's behavior so closely mirrors the description that the woman in my life constantly gave of her own father to such a startling degree that it almost felt like the film was an occult form of déjà vu and specially made for me as a form of esoteric art therapy. Undoubtedly, watching Sjöström's cinematic masterpiece is probably the closest I will ever come to meeting the miserable man that unleashed so much senseless trauma on the woman I loved. In that sense, I found the film's hopeful conclusion to be somewhat contrived and its greatest weakness, as the abusive alcoholic can never make up for all the pain and suffering he has caused, even if he has accomplished the seemingly impossible task of getting completely sober as internal scars are forever. Naturally, as a film with an alcoholic lead, one of the major themes of The Phantom Carriage is how an unrepentant drunkard negatively affects his friends and family. In short, I have never felt so haunted by a film, especially one that oftentimes takes place in haunts where dipsomaniacs act like boorish buffoons and beat the shit out of each other for the most trivial reasons. While the film was made nearly a century ago, it ultimately makes a relatively modern alcoholic film like Leaving Las Vegas (1995) directed by Mike Figgis seem like a slapstick comedy by comparison in terms of sincerely expressing the spiritual sickness, emotional decrepitude, and psychological depravity that comes with alcoholism. Likewise, the short American 'silent sermon' from around the same era, Episodes In The Life Of A Gin Bottle (1925) directed by Bela von Block, seems like something on par with Louis J. Gasnier's Reefer Madness (1936) in terms of being an unintentional joke at the expense of its anti-substance-abuse message. Of course, one expects a certain degree of singular artistic prowess from a film that was such a huge influence on a master auteur like Ingmar Bergman that he hired its star-auteur to star in his own films. In fact, Bergman was so obsessed with The Phantom Carriage that he directed a TV-movie entitled Bildmakarna (2000) aka The Image Makers based on auteur Sjöström and writer Selma Lagerlöf's collaboration on the film.

Despite technically being a 'horror' film, The Phantom Carriage—a cinematic work that is certainly not a slave to genre conventions—begins in a somewhat melodramatic, if not downright histrionic, fashion on a somewhat morbid New Year's Eve night with a tragically beautiful Salvation Army sister, 'Edit' (Astrid Holm), pleading on her deathbed to her fellow Sister Maria (Lisa Lundholm) that she receive one final wish involving a final meeting with a drunken bum named David Holm (Victor Sjöström), who is not even worthy of shining the gorgeous god gal's shoes. Indeed, as depicted later in the film in a flashback, Sister Edit made David promise to meet her on the following New Year's Eve in the somewhat spiritually delusional hope that he would have a "good year" despite his self-destructive alcoholic ways. Although the year is technically not over yet, David—a belligerent bastard that has a nasty knack for making everyone around him just as miserable as he is—has had a rather horrendous 364 days of self-induced misery and depravity as a result of his rather aggressive alcoholism, which has destroyed his entire family and left him a lonely gutter-dwelling bum who is only tolerated by other similarly hopelessly debauched gutter-dwelling bums. Unbeknownst to daftly dickhead David, he is unwittingly responsible for Sister Edit being on her deathbed as she contracted tuberculosis last New Year's Eve as a result of committing the selfless act of touching his dirty jacket so as to clean and repair it. Indeed, while David was sleeping at the local Salvation Army center the year before, Sister Edit took it upon herself to mend the jacket for the protagonist and he repaid her kindness by destroying her fine stitch work right in front of her face and then stating in a sadistically sarcastic fashion, "It's a shame you went to all that trouble, Miss, but I'm used to have it like this." Although David ultimately agreed to visit Edit the next New Year's Eve, he had less than savory reasons, or as he snidely remarked to the poor sister, "Oh, I'll be there. I'll come to show you God didn't give a fig for you or your twaddle." Of course, being a typical unreliable drunkard that cannot even bother to remember to take a daily shower, David fails to show up and when Edit's colleague Gustafsson (Tor Weijden) goes out looking for him and finally finds him, the prick protagonist refuses to honor the poor sister's last dying wish and instead focuses on getting all the more hammered with his friends in a spooky graveyard. Somewhat ironically, it is only when David himself comes face to face with death that very same night that he desperately wants to speak to Edit and atone for his past wrongs.

While Edit is praying for his arrival as she slowly but surely succumbs to her sickness, David is getting wasted with his friends in a graveyard and telling them about a local legend that was once told to him by an old scholar friend named Georges (Tore Svennberg) who was deathly afraid of being the last person to die on New Year's Eve because he believed his own story that the person in question would be foredoomed to drive Death's ghostly carriage and collect the souls of every single individual that dies the following year. Rather ironically, Georges was the last person to die the previous year and David soon discovers that his old comrade has taken up the unwanted supernatural position of the local Grim Reaper. In fact, not long after telling the story, David is accidentally killed just before the clock strikes twelve after one of his boozier buddies hits him over the head with a bottle during a heated drunken brawl. Indeed, when David wakes up from the deadly blow, he is somewhat baffled to discover that his soul has exited his body and that he is being confronted by Georges and the phantom carriage. With the creepily dispassionate help of his ghostly friend, David is forced to confront all the evil that he has sired during his mostly pathetic lifetime in a series of pivotal flashback scenes. While originally a happy and loving family man with a decent job at a local sawmill who spent his free time joyously playing with his children in the scenic countryside, David more or less completely destroyed his entire life overnight after becoming a full-time drunkard, which eventually led to the loss of both his job and family. Naturally, David caused much familial collateral damage in the process, though he was mostly too drunk to notice. Developing an almost demonically depraved alter-ego as a result of his dipsomania, David eventually began to derive an almost sadistic glee from abusing his family, hence why his wife Ann (Hilda Borgström) eventually absconded to another town to get away from her aggressively assholeish hubby. Needless to say, like most bitterly resentful drunk bastards with nothing left to lose, David refused to take responsibility for his own actions and thus was not about to let his wife get away freely.

Notably, the final straw that inspired Ann to leave was David turning his own younger brother into such a bad drunkard that he accidentally killed someone during a brawl. Needless to say, David is wholly deserving of the karmic fate of eventually dying the same way as his brother's victim, but luckily for the protagonist, The Phantom Carriage, quite unlike Rainer Werner Fassbinder's early Sirkian masterpiece Händler der vier Jahreszeiten (1971) aka The Merchant of Four Seasons, is a strangely optimistic film about the power of redemption where it is argued that even the most devilishly debauched of haunt-haunting troglodytes can embrace teetotalism and dedicate their lives to wholesome good instead of gutter-level beer-chugging bacchanalian buffoonery. Indeed, it is only when David hits literal rock bottom in the form of an ancient tomb where his lifeless body collapses after being fatally struck with a bottle that he begins to see the error of his ways. Thankfully for David, his suicidal wife is masochistic enough to give him one more final chance in the end. Rather revealingly, David—a man that has already been given a number of recklessly misspent second chances—is only able to convince his wife of his sincerity in regard to wanting to change because he sobs hysterically during a moment of sort of transcendental meekness, or as Ann states to him herself, "It is hard to believe, David, but I do believe you. Your tears convinced me. I won't truly be happy until my sorrow is drained." Repeating something his undead friend Georges said to him earlier in the film during a philosophically insightful supernatural carriage ride, David concludes the film by stating while his wife Ann is lovingly resting her head in his lap, "Lord, please let my soul come to maturity before it is reaped," thus underscoring one of the most important themes of the entire film. Just as the great Swiss psychoanalyst Carl Gustav Jung theorized after decades of dealing with numerous hopeless alcoholics, the film ultimately reveals that alcoholism is more of a spiritual sickness than a social or biological disease, hence the importance of David's date with death.

Notably, Aryan Christ Jung was an important philosophical influence on the formation of Alcoholics Anonymous (A.A.) due his promotion of theory that certain hardcore alcoholics would never be able to completely quit the booze unless they had a life-changing “spiritual experience,” as he believed that the addiction had more to do with a certain void in the soul than a simpler hopeless thirst for alcohol. Indeed, as Jung wrote in a 1961 letter to Alcoholic Anonymous co-founder Bill Wilson, “You see, alcohol in Latin is spiritus and you use the same word for the highest religious experience as well as the most depraving poison. The helpful formula therefore is: spiritus contra spiritum.” Notably, Avon Products heir Conrad Rooks was only able to get over his terrible alcoholism and substance abuse via a sort of spiritual reawakening, which he would depict in his hermetic counterculture flick Chappaqua (1967). Undoubtedly, judging by his masterpiece The Phantom Carriage, Victor Sjöström seems to have a similar theory to Jung in regard to the metaphysical roots of alcoholism. In that sense, supernatural horror is in many ways the perfect genre for tackling the subject of the misery of methomania. Aside from his masterful direction, Sjöström’s performance as the extremely emotionally erratic alcoholic lead is among the greatest, if not the greatest, in cinema history, especially when compared to unintentionally hilarious displays of demented dipsomania like Nicholas Cage in Leaving Las Vegas. Undoubtedly, Figgis’ film seems like Bobcat Goldthwait’s decidedly dumb Shakes the Clown (1991) in terms of depicting the nuances of dipsomania when compared to the brilliance of Sjöström’s silent masterwork. In terms of sheer pathos and sensitivity towards the drunkenly insensitive, I can only really compare Sjöström’s film to Paul Schrader’s fairly underrated Affliction (1997). Notably, in the essay Phantom Forms: The Phantom Carriage by screenwriter and Nicholas Roeg collaborator Paul Mayersberg (The Man Who Fell to Earth, Croupier) speculates that Sjöström’s performance was influenced by his own much despised womanizer and defrauder father Olof Adolf Sjöström who he apparently closely resembled in physical appearance. Indeed, the film might have been based on a work by Selma Lagerlöf, who Sjöström apparently constantly quarreled with during the production, but it has an undeniable highly personalized quality to it, as if the auteur used his performance to perform a sort of personal exorcism from all the metaphysical pain and suffering that his prick padre caused him. Throughout the film, Sjöström seems possessed by an almost demonic drunken rage that is quite disturbing in its seeming authenticity, so I do not doubt the auteur was using the role as personal therapy for past traumas.

I think it is safe to say that Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman, who would cast his cinematic hero Sjöström in both his early work Till glädje (1950) aka To Joy and masterpiece Smultronstället (1957) aka Wild Strawberries, probably paid the film and its auteur-cum-star its greatest compliment when he stated in the documentary Victor Sjöström: A Portrait (1981) directed by Gösta Werner, “My encounters with Victor Sjöström—at first, by way of his films, and later on, when I met him in person—these encounters affected me deeply. THE PHANTOM CARRIAGE was an early encounter. It completely overwhelmed me. I was shaken to the core by the movie. Not necessarily because I understood it, but quite simply, it affected me . . . by way of its incredible cinematic power. For me, it was an all-encompassing emotional experience. Certain sequences and images have left an indelible impression." Undoubtedly, anyone familiar with Bergman's singular oeuvre can easily see how Sjöström's film had such an imperative influence on the younger filmmaker. Indeed, the influence is so great that it is comparable to Douglas Sirk's influence on Rainer Werner Fassbinder or Alfred Hitchcock's on Brian De Palma in terms of the latter's films being somewhat unimaginable without the influence of the former. From the obsession with iconic "sculpted close-ups" to signature depictions of Death personified, Bergman can certainly be described as a hopeless Sjöströmian who, rather deservedly, eventually transcended his master in terms of fame and influence. Rather absurdly yet not altogether surprisingly considering the oftentimes hyper self-critical nature of many great artists, Sjöström apparently thought little of his own great cinematic masterpieces, or as Bergman recounted in The Magic Lantern: An Autobiography (1987), "He had never thought GIVE US THIS DAY, THE PHANTOM CARRIAGE or HE WHO GETS SLAPPED were especially remarkable. He mostly saw the failings and was annoyed by his own sloppiness and lack of skill." Incidentally, in the same book, Bergman explains how he filled Sjöström with "senile anger" during the shooting of Wild Strawberries for failing to provide him whisky that he had promised. Aside from Bergman, The Phantom Carriage seems to have also been a crucial influence on Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980), most obviously in regard to the famous scene where a demented Jack Nicholson breaks down a door with an axe in a manner quite like Sjöström's character in his silent horror masterpiece.

Notably, in his classic novel The Long Goodbye (1953)—a work that Robert Altman wonderfully cinematically adapted in 1973—Raymond Chandler, himself a terrible drunk, wrote, "A man who drinks too much on occasion is still the same man as he was sober. An alcoholic, a real alcoholic, is not the same man at all. You can't predict anything about him for sure except that he will be someone you never met before." Undoubtedly, The Phantom Carriage certainly expresses Chandler's sentiment in its depiction of the unpredictably unhinged behavior of the protagonist while he is drunk. Even more relevant to the film than Chandler's quote is an excerpt from the anti-alcoholic Alcoholics Anonymous tome The Big Book by Bill Wilson that reads, "As we became subjects of King Alcohol, shivering denizens of his mad realm, the chilling vapor that is loneliness settled down. It thickened, ever becoming blacker. Some of us sought out sordid places, hoping to find understanding companionship and approval. Momentarily we did—then would come oblivion and the awful awakening to face the hideous Four Horsemen—Terror, Bewilderment, Frustration, Despair." Indeed, The Phantom Carriage not only offers a delectably hallucinatory cinematic cocktail of terror, bewilderment, frustration, and despair, but also a stoically humanistic depiction of alcoholism that does not seem like it was created by some self-important 'self-help' leftist phony. In that sense, the film is like a Nordic arthouse proto-The Twilight Zone on Gothic Dickensian LSD in terms of being a phantasmagoric horror movie with a moral ending. Undoubtedly, when poet and avant-garde filmmaker James Broughton wrote his collection of cinema aphorisms Some Fruits of Experience, he was perfectly describing the aesthetic prowess and importance of a film like Sjöström's as indicated by words of cinematic wisdom like, "Cinema is a lie which makes us realize a truth" and "Movie images are dim reflections of the beauty and ferocity in mankind." After all, The Phantom Carriage forced me to confront dipsomaniacal phantoms that have, in various ways, haunted my own life yet it also managed to provide me with a deceptively narcotizing experience that reminded me of the singularity of cinema as an artform. To go back to Broughton, his poetical film book Making Light of It (1992) features a quote from the pseudonymous Early German Romantic poet, mystic, and philosopher Novalis that reads, "The seat of the soul is where the outer and inner worlds meet." Of course, the titular ghostly carriage in Sjöström's film is undoubtedly a morbid poetic symbolic reflection of the "seat of the soul" that Novalis spoke of. While he would have never admitted it himself, Sjöström was not only a great actor and auteur, but also a closet poet as indicated by The Phantom Carriage—the ultimate cinematic marriage between methomania and the macabre—and great later works like the fairly idiosyncratic silent western The Wind (1928) starring Lillian Gish. I certainly like to think Sjöström's masterpiece is set in a world that Edgar Allan Poe might have dreamed up (and/or inhabited), as I can certainly see Death's carriage strolling the streets of Baltimore for him on the night of October 7, 1849 after he died a dubious alcohol-related death.

THE SINFUL DWARF

"The Mother of all 'Dwarfsploitation' films!" is what is pasted across the DVD sleeve. The new Severin release of The Sinful Dwarf marks a title that isn't Jess Franco and isn't entirely sexploitation (roughly). This film's release has been significant to most of us cult film fans as its controversy with midget coalitions has spread outwards in a blazing hail out backwards promotion. Or so we thought. With a short interview on the Severin disc, we get inside the shallow mindset of a "genre fan" who did too many drugs and watched this film in some summer of some year but this story nonetheless equates with him and his friend being traumatized by a film that presents nothing but absurdity, not terror, but we'll get into that later. The LPA [Little People of America] must be shitting bricks about now. The plot of The Sinful Dwarf is unrelated insanity. "Unrelated to what?" you ask. The theory of being, my friends. For the sake of entertainment value, I'd like to construe the ridiculousness with choice words from the tag line. "Young Bride," "Lewd Passions," and "Evil Dwarf" are the most eloquent of quote grabs I could find. Of course, I only excluded six words from the entire quote to join this stringy bit of meat known as a "blurb." What we get is a ubiquitous XXX version of Being Captured, regardless of the predated 10 year difference. Props must be transmitted to Being Captured for one upping The Sinful Dwarf by including a midget in a sailors costume cause as well all know, sailors outfits "look pretty damn gay." In a way, Torben is commensurable to a canine, better yet, a mutt. Brought in from the hazardous eye of society and a hazardous environment, this mutt will most likely take full advantage of the blessing he has received and soon will diminish the need for appreciation towards his saving grace. Given his obedience to the scar-lady, the difference is not much. With his physical and quite literal stature attributing to the likely metamorphosis into beast, It's really no wonder that dwarfs are revolting against this release. Even I'm a bit disgusted by a sadistic "little person" with a sneering grin that could burn stone. Too bad the world is on stilts and no one's likely to hear their little voices from down there. Though Torben is hailed as a Jack Black lookalike I find his appearance to fit more of a Chucky from Child's Play schematic. In fact, the joint visage is uncanny as they are both short, have medium length similar hair color, and that damned demented grin that devours souls faster than the Negaturkey [not really.] As perfectly evidenced here, rape is a charitable service to the progressive societal structure, cinematically and at times, present reality. Further more, it even acts as another weight for that aforementioned balance of good/evil. Danish(?) darling Anne Sparrow's first and only screen appearance was in The Sinful Dwarf. Reasons unknown but the culprit has been declared as The Sinful Dwarf by trash fanatics screaming at the "evil legacy" of this film that prevailed over the indomitable beauty. [SPOILERS] From the get-go, we knew Sparrow's (Mary) character was doomed. After all, she was the only soul to notice the scratchings at night and the weird sounds that enclosed her paranoia. Even though our vantage to Mary is through a celestial viewpoint and as much as we love her, we still yearn to see her trembling body uncovered in her god-given beauty. I'm sure Sugar & Spice has tribute to give Anne Sparrow and it's everything nice. Degradation is imminent and the countdown is suffered through by infantile squeaks of many toys littering the dank wood flooring the attic. We underestimate just exactly how much she will suffer that it dawns on us. I couldn't believe my eyes. A heroine is supposed to revolt causing a panic and disarray just in time to hold her lover by quarrels end, but alas, this never comes. We watch her get drugged and raped by a stranger whose face is never realized on camera. As stunned as I was, this experience proved to be erotically soothing. While my instincts are bewildered with thoughts - something akin to a flower being obliterated by an atom bomb. This demonstration of a feminine holocaust is an attack on unapparent promiscuities at the core. The Sinful Dwarf has an impact and it relied solely on the rape of Anne Sparrow. Call me evil and perverted but you're watching The Sinful Dwarf for the same reasons. [/SPOILERS] For a EuroCult title the direction is astounding and visually arresting. The opening credits has title cards with such vibrancy that it revokes memories of the early workings of Technicolor and revolves around motorized toys galloping about, squeaking exhaustively, all to a cherubic track of childhood noise. Meanwhile, we witness a teenager playing hop-scotch. We see Olaf (Torben) lead her to his abode of evil with promises of toys in his attic. As you'd have it, he quickly hits her over the head and subjects her to constant rape and drugs. If this isn't a classic case example of the perversion of the innocent then I don't know what is. Maybe I'm blind to the cultural significance of The Sinful Dwarf or maybe I've lost my perpetual taste. The answer is neither nor. The Sinful Dwarf built up as a passable excursion in Euro sleaze with handicapped dementia but soon soared into a whole new light, unveiling this as more of a morbid curio shot with carny aesthetics. Nihilism in tow, this film will drag you down with disturbing thematics with just the right portioning of tragedy and comedy; If not for the haunting portrayal of midgets then surely for the pseudo-Joan Crawford/Mommie Dearest visions of an ex-starlet past her prime running a sexual slavery business in her attic. A funny look at the complex and barbaric nature of man but sensationalized with a seedy eroticism. A hopeless masturbatory fantasy of lucid film stock cured by a neurotic dwarf. What better way to spend a rainy day?

Vince Roth (1999)

I won't jerk your chain around one bit, this film is awful. In the opening shot, we have a faux trailer for a film that was never made. With a provocative title like Don't Go in the Fucking Woods, how could you go wrong? That is a promising title and alone might show what's to come. With this trailer, you see admiration in their work and the ability to slack around on camera, with Nekro, they take it too seriously. You might be asking "How can making a film be too serious?" Well, when the homicidal maniac does nothing but growl and scream while his voice is altered into death metal shrieks for around 15 minutes straight, you begin to look for the strongest Ibuprofen lying around. Vince Roth intended to create a contender for such classic art films documenting necrophilia and in attempting, succeeded in dumbing down the morbid act of love. (All of this is incorrect and lacking punctuation. The only truth is that the plot is simple) Nekro is an exploitation film at its worst. I subscribe wholeheartedly to the idea of creating a piece of Super 8 trash which fits in the quality niche of German splatter, but I'm sorry to say that Nekro is a disappointing short. Nekro involves a Cradle of Filth fan dragging a pudgy woman up the stairs. He screams some and hits walls. He stabs her over 30 times and has sex with her in the missionary position. Insert mayonnaise squishing sounds Insert implausible Shyamalan twist ending SCENE Nekro is graphic, violent, and throttled with sex with a gored body. This doesn't make it good. In fact, I'm rather glad that Don't Go into the Fucking Woods was never created. I'm sure you can only tolerate a single dose of voice distortion that is prescribed in Nekro. The plot is a metaphor for the entire film. You may be able to fuck what is dead, doesn't mean it will be satisfying. Nekro is a dead film that didn't make me cum.

BUFFALO '66
BUFFALO '66

Vincent Gallo (1998)

Vincent Gallo is an extremely sensitive man. He's not sensitive like little bitch Clay Aiken, but sensitive like, say Adolf Hitler. Vincent Gallo's film Buffalo '66 is the director's most sensitive of portraits. Gallo's character in the film Billy Brown, like Gallo himself, is an extremely neurotic narcissist who has traded in rationality for whatever his warped impulse demands. Despite being a kidnapper and overall prick, you grow to love Billy Brown as Buffalo '66 progresses. Billy Brown has just been released from prison and now wants revenge in the form of killing some "has been" football player who now owns a strip joint. Billy's parents have no emotions for Billy and his only friend is a semi-retarded man who goes by the name of Goon. Billy Brown makes his best life decision when he decides to kidnap a voluptuous blonde ballerina named Layla. Layla seems to take an immediate liking to Billy but he is unaware as he is too neurotic and depressed to accept it. Buffalo '66 is a semi-autobiographical film that tells the demons of an artist's emotions instead of an exact portrayal of his life. Billy Brown makes it clear that he doesn't like faggots looking at his dick while he pisses. After telling an overweight male ballerina to stop checking out his privates (they are both using urinals), the marshmallow boy states, "but it's so big." Billy Brown violently throws the tubby ballerina out of the bathroom thereafter. The real-life Vincent Gallo has some shame in his earlier years as gay bar go-go dancer and has been arrested various times in his younger years for indecent exposure. The awkward bathroom scene seems to mark a low point in Gallo's real life. Billy Brown kidnaps the girl Layla so he can show her off to his parents as his girl. Billy's parents are the most emotionally cold and unloving parents a boy could ever have. In many interviews, Vincent Gallo has made it very clear his contempt for his parents. Despite being kidnapped and just meeting Billy, Layla shows the most concern for Billy. Billy's father is an old wop pervert who brags about singing at the same joint as Frank Sinatra in his younger years. This old dirty dego makes sure to grab all over Layla every chance he gets. He's the type of fellow that is unintentionally hilarious but not funny to poor Billy Brown. It is obvious in Buffalo '66 that Billy has lost (or never had) his father's approval a very long time ago. Billy's Mother loves the stupidest game around, American football. She tells Billy that she wishes he was never born because he caused her to miss an important game. Billy's mother also has no clue about any of Billy's interests and life in general. One has to give respect to Vincent Gallo for his unflattering and embarrassing portrait of his cold family. No wonder Vincent Gallo gave discounts on his own sperm on his merchandise website to women "who can prove she has naturally blonde hair and blue eyes" and "anyone who can prove a direct family link to any of the German soldiers of the mid-century." Vincent Gallo has made it clear that he is one self-loathing Sicilian. Buffalo '66 features various experimental montages and surreal scenes. I especially liked the vintage and dreamlike solo singing performance from father Brown. One also has to take note of Layla's tap dancing solo at a grungy bowling alley. Vincent Gallo did an excellent job inserting surreal scenes that are seamless and relevant to the overall feeling of the film. Billy Brown is a lonely and depressed man, but he still has an urge to love. In Buffalo '66, Vincent Gallo reveals more of his complex personality than your typical American filmmakers. Despite being American born, Gallo's heart seems to be in Europe. Vincent Gallo has revered such filmmakers as Pier Paolo Pasolini and Robert Bresson. He has also showed his love for the Italian futurists. I believe that Vincent Gallo is capable of being a legendary auteur filmmaker but his narcissism may not allow it as The Brown Bunny proved. Whatever the future holds for Gallo, Buffalo '66 is still an American art house masterpiece.

THE BROWN BUNNY

Vincent Gallo (2004)

Maybe it was because he was a staunch and groveling Spielberg apologist or perhaps because he was the man responsible for co-penning Russ Meyer's pseudo-sexy, scatological satire Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970) thus lacking a serious appreciation for cinema as an art form, but the late and less than great film critic Roger Ebert must have been suffering from serious cases of both penis and artistic envy after initially smearing Sicilian-American Renaissance man Vincent Gallo's second feature-length film The Brown Bunny (2003) by describing it as the worst film in the history of the Cannes Film Festival. Of course, it would take a cancer hex put on Ebert, who inevitably died from the disease after a long and miserable battle that forever silenced his catty voice, for the rather rotund (or as Gallo himself described him, a "fat pig with the physique of a slave trader") film critic to drastically change his opinion of The Brown Bunny, which had been reedited (cutting 26 minutes of what was originally a 118-minute film), ultimately giving it 3 out of 4 stars and a "thumbs up" rating despite his ongoing war of words with the film's director. While I never had the opportunity to see the infamous Cannes cut (which was apparently an uncompleted workprint that Gallo's Japanese producers forced him to screen) of The Brown Bunny, I did recently watch the film for a second time (my initial viewing was around the time of the original DVD release) and can safely say it was no less a harrowing yet hypnotic experience than my initial viewing of the film about a decade ago or so and I can see the work being regarded as an unsung masterpiece in decades to come. Although most (in)famous for its doubly climatic conclusion featuring writer/director/editor/producer/star Vincent Gallo—a misunderstood man who, despite his rather unflattering reputation, is undoubtedly one of America's few great artistic polymaths—receiving an unsimulated blowjob from his real-life ex-'lover' Chloë Sevigny (who Gallo claims was never actually his girlfriend, but they did previously date/fornicate), The Brown Bunny is about as far from erotic as films come as a maliciously melancholy 'fever nightmare' that slowly but surely gets under one's skin and eventually tears at one's psyche via the director's startlingly naked reflection of his own terribly tormented and undeniably provocative soul. Featuring many cryptic autobiographic nuances from Gallo's own life, including scenes shot in the small Pennsylvania town where the director's mother grew up (but which the director never visited previously), authentic footage of the auteur doing his own 'stunts' on his motorcycle (Gallo was a professional Gran Prix motorcycle racer in the 1980s), and graphic sexual acts between an ex-partner, The Brown Bunny is nothing less than indisputable proof of the validity of the auteur theory. Indeed, Gallo may be a neurotic 'narcissist' with delusions of grandeur as is oftentimes libeled against him by his mostly jealous detractors, but such seemingly negative qualities make for unwaveringly uncompromising filmmakers who bend the knees for no one, especially in regard to people—namely left-leaning American and British film critics, as well as the majority of the American populous—who have no respect for the medium of film as an art form, but instead see it as the modern equivalent of a peasant circus. The superlatively somber and dispiriting cinematic tale of a motorcycle racer who carries around conspicuously crippling memories of a great love perennially lost due to tragedy, chance, and—most importantly of all—inaction on the protagonist's part during a moment of emotionally-charged self-doubt and disgust, The Brown Bunny is the American heterosexual equivalent of what German auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder cinematically achieved in regards to sensitively depicting the emotional torment and cognitive dissonance of women, homosexuals, and transsexuals in a manner that mere words cannot express.

Bud Clay (Vincent Gallo) has just lost a motorcycle race in New Hampshire and is headed on a one-man road trip to Los Angeles, California to compete in another race, which also happens to be near where he once shared a small home with his lost great love Daisy (Chloë Sevigny). A lost soul grudgingly treading through life, Bud will do anything to relieve his inner torment, which includes approaching three random female strangers on his trip in what will prove to be futile attempts to fill the gaping metaphysical wound that was left by his oh-so dear Daisy. Like Daisy, all three of these women superficially share flowery names, hence Bud's initial yet self-deceiving interest in them. Bud's first victim/sexless fling is a 'homely' (Gallo himself described this girl that way) gal named Violet (non-actor Anna Vareschi), who the melancholy motorcyclist meets at a New Hampshire gas station and convinces to join him on his road trip to California. Upon dropping Violet off at her house so she can collect her belongings for what was suppose to be a romantic road trip between two strangers, Bud coldly drives off and leaves her behind without looking back. Positively possessed by mostly bittersweet memories, Bud makes the mistake of visiting Daisy's parents' home, where he grew up in the house next door, but he is in for a rather awkward surprise when he learns that his great love's mother does not remember him at all, but at least he gets to see her pet brown bunny. After the visit with his could-of-been parents-in-law, Bud goes to a animal shelter and learns from the clerk that bunny rabbits only have a life expectancy of 5-6 years, thus realizing even the cutest of creatures eventually perish and that when Daisy's brown bunny dies the last physical remnant of their relationship will disappear. While making a brief pitstop at a public bathroom, Bud seems magnetized by the glaring misery of a blonde milf named Lilly (played by veteran model-turned-actress Cheryl Tiegs) and proceeds to comfort and kiss the crying stranger, which causes him to cry and leave abruptly, never looking back again. After racing at Bonneville Speedway in a scene that looks like a man fading into a beauteous abyss of nothingness that recalls the hopeless yet breathtaking atmosphere of Philippe Garrel's The Inner Scar (1972) aka La cicatrice intérieure, Bud drives through a seedy Las Vegas ghetto and picks up a seemingly untainted streetwalker named Rose (played by real-life working girl Elizabeth Blake) due to his fondness for her flowery name (which she wears proudly on a necklace), but the miserable motorcyclist wastes no time in kicking her out of his van a couple seconds later. Undoubtedly, Daisy's ghostly presence has damned the sad speed-racer to a lonely life of romantic disconnections and miscommunications as she has become the irreplaceable model for which Bud will judge all future prospective lovers.

After dropping his motorcycle off at a LA garage, Bud heads to Daisy's small suburban home, which is clearly abandoned, and hangs a letter on the front door. Bud spends some time in her driveway reminiscing about kissing Daisy and subsequently checks into a hotel in a hapless manner as if he has finally accepted defeat. While lying around depressed all by his lonesome, Bud is magically visited by the seemingly elusive Daisy and the source of the melodramatic motorcyclist's paralyzing misery finally begins to unravel in a dreadful fashion akin to a mortician's scalpel cutting through a rotting corpse during an autopsy. After nervously running into the bathroom and taking a couple hits from a crack pipe, Daisy asks Bud if he wants to get some beer, which he flatly turns down because he does not drink anymore due to 'what happened' the last time they were together. Daisy professes her undying love to Bud, but he starts an argument with her for supposedly "kissing other boys" in the past. Bud proceeds to undress Daisy and she passionately fellates him, even sensually swallowing he seed, but he flips out upon climax and verbally assaults her by stating, "You're a fucking whore. You're a whore... You fucked them. You fucking asshole. I hate you so much. I hate you so much." Bud then starts an argument with Daisy accusing her of having sex with other men at a druggy hipster party the last night they saw one another. Daisy tells Bud that the men seemed friendly and they offered her some bud to smoke, but that she had no intention of sharing carnal knowledge with them. Bud accuses Daisy of killing their unborn child due to her drug use and drinking at the party, but things are much more complicated than he wants to remember. Apparently, what really happened, which is revealed in a series of stomach-churning flashback sequences, was that Daisy passed out at the party and the men took her into a bedroom against her own will, stripped off her clothes, and took turns raping her while she was unconscious. Although Bud walked in on the rape, he figured the worse and did not intervene, but instead left the party, only to discover Daisy's dead corpse being hauled into an ambulance when he returned. It is revealed that Daisy was DOA before she was ever raped after she choked on her own vomit (thus making her rapists unconscious necrophiliacs) and that she never really appeared in Bud's hotel room and his nasty night with her was merely a figment of his imagination as a man who carries a crippling burden of guilt for not only failing to save the love of his life, but also that of his unborn child and sole progeny.

Describing the film as being 'in the tradition' of classic 'adult cinema' like

Last Tango in Paris (1972) and Midnight Cowboy (1969), Vincent Gallo certainly achieved something much more honest, visceral, and stripped down with The Brown Bunny than Bertolucci and Schlesinger did with their respective Hollywood-star-driven films. Not only does The Brown Bunny display deep aesthetic influences from European arthouse films of the 1970s, but it also shares similar aesthetic/thematic similarities with obscure Italian art-sploitation films, especially the lurid libertine tragedies of Alberto Cavallone (Quickly, spari e baci a colazione, Blue Movie), whose wickedly wanton and patently forlorn work Zelda (1974) centers around a suicidal motorcycle racer whose weakness for women ultimately leads to his downfall. The Brown Bunny, which features blatant aesthetic influence from the films of Paul Morrissey/Andy Warhol (the trailer for The Brown Bunny featured a split-screen technique like Warhol's Chelsea Girls (1966)), also seems innately influenced by the European period films of Italian-American actor/Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro, especially Walerian Borowczyk's titillating yet terribly tragic erotic arthouse flick The Streetwalker (1976) aka La marge and Aldo Lado's homoerotic motorcycled-themed crime flick Born Winner (1976) aka L'ultima volta. Indeed, as an auteur piece with the artistic integrity of the great works of old school European arthouse cinema, The Brown Bunny was bound to repel not only a good percentage of the American film-going audience, but also pathetic perverts looking to see a cheap smut flick featuring a famous diva devouring a dick. By combining an unsimulated sex scene with merciless melodrama between two ill-starred and irrevocably severed lovers, The Brown Bunny, not unlike the films of Paul Morrissey, is more anti-pornographic than pornographic, because the last thing a porn addict wants to see during a strikingly sordid and steamy sex scene is a wounded man moan in lovelorn agony like a dying animal while having his manhood mouthed. As Gallo stated himself regarding the scene in an old interview with Rebecca Murray at About.com, "Matthew McConaughey does 600 pushups before he does his shirtless scene. I haven't even worked with a fucking make-up person in films. You think I made myself look great? Do you think it's fun to show your cock in a film for ten billion to scrutinize for eternity? Do you think I get off on that? I was interested in the film for the purpose of the film, and I moved past my insecurities, my self-doubt, my self-hate, my incredible privacy that I value. I pushed that aside to achieve the goals that I had in the movie. And I think they're very clear in the film. I think if you see that film, it's clear that my intentions were to create disturbing effects around intimacies – both metaphysical and personal intimacies with this character's life." An amazing mirthless metaphysical melodrama and allegorical 'ghost story' that is like a healthy medium between Monte Hellman's Two-Lane Blacktop (1971), Philippe Garrel's The Inner Scar (1972) aka La cicatrice intérieure, Wim Wenders' Paris, Texas (1984), and Serge Gainsbourg's Je t'aime moi non plus (1976) aka I Love You, I Don't, and Cavallone's Zelda, yet totally idiosyncratic and tragically transcendental in its own right, The Brown Bunny is a positively pinning yet crippling celluloid road trip to purgatory directed by one of America's few true auteur filmmakers. As Gallo stated in an audio commentary track for the Japanese DVD release of The Brown Bunny, he "didn't spend 3 ½ years making a movie to get a blowjob from Chloë," despite what beta-male and fecund-free feminist film critics want to believe. Unlike most films, The Brown Bunny has a heart and soul, but also a famous chick choking on a self-described right-winger's cock, which makes for an irreconcilable combo when it comes to Hollywood liberal types, sexually repressed feminists, Wes Anderson and Sofia Coppola fans, and other culture-distorting rabble.

Vincent Perez (2007)

The Secret is a so-called "thriller" directed by actor Vincent Perez. The film stars David Duchovny in a role that the actor has yet to have since the X-Files. The film also stars the horrifying Lili Taylor and new talent Olivia Thirlby. The Secret is a film about a family's heartbreaking yet somehow confusing loss. A teenager and her mother end up critically injured in the hospital after a car accident. Both Mother and Daughter end up dying in the hospital. Miraculously, the teenage girl becomes alive again and survives the hospital ordeal. The problem is that the Mother of the teenager has entered the girls body. The father (played by Duchovny) has had enough agony and won't accept that his wife is trapped inside of his daughters body. When the father finally accepts this unfortunate "supernatural" situation, he becomes even more irrational. Actress Olivia Thirlby does a wonderful job mimicking the grotesque attitude of Lili Taylor. I found it a good idea to "kill off" Taylor's role in the film during the beginning as she has a face only an inebriated father could love. David Duchovny also does a great job as the Father who has to resist having sex with his own daughter's body. Maybe this situation had something to do with Duchovny recently checking himself into a rehabilitation clinic for being too much of a Sex Addict. As I mentioned before, the acting performances in The Secret are nothing short of engrossing. Seeing as an actor directed the film, it really benefited the performances of the actors. The Secret could have been easily a piece of garbage if the film had been ended up in the wrong hands. The film is surely a family affair. I just hope Hollywood realizes that David Duchovny has much more acting in him (as The Secret proves) than his character Fox Mulder.

Vincent Sherman (1950)

Films that are abrasive to the retina's are to come by. We have Gary Oldman's debut, Nil By Mouth, which is as explosive and corrosive as you'd be led to believe by looking at some of his roles. Just as a great actor released a brutal film that never compromises quality, Kim Sønnerholm has done the same. Craig is a film chronicling the spiral descent of a man who is very much like many of us. Craig's parents were killed in a house fire that left his sister comatose. Unable to cope with the weight of the world, people begin to abuse Craig's kindness till he falls into withdrawal madness. Craig is relatable to most. Being frequently cast out of society, women use every attempt to walk all over him which leads to much sexual frustration and confusion. Craig is a film that surprises, scene after scene. Craig rises above the norms of a drama and incorporates surrealism, black humor, and chronic drug use & addiction. Every film now-a-day's has a cameo from Lloyd Kaufman, and Craig makes good use of the goofy Jew by using him as his subconscious weatherman. A distinguishable feature in Craig is the shared emotions. These horrible things committed to Craig, only drive you into fits of panic and frustration. Our anti-hero Craig, can be noted as a socially inept version of the Butcher from I Stand Alone, except for the vulgarity. Craig could be seen as misogynistic, due to it's blatant attacks on women. This would be a preconceived notion upon reading the summary, but if you look at "the big picture", It's used in a poetic context. On a technical note, Craig features wonderful cinematography that is occasionally disrupted with an increasingly edited drug binge scene. The score is a pulsing beat that takes on it's own flesh form and the soundtrack is enough to make any industrial fan or foreign metal fan squeal. The soundtrack resonates youth, which is something that is not awarded often. With Kim Sønnerholm proving his worth as being an incredible method actor, it's congenial to see him being successful as a director. At scenes, his face contorts into a diabolical expression worthy of Lou Ferigno's role as The Incredible Hulk (Circa 80's.) Craig is raw; purely nihilistic and devoid of a single positive emotion. We live in a hostile world and Sønnerholm's Craig is a testament to that.

Vincenzo Natali (1996)

Elevated marks the first production directed by Vincenzo Natali, director of Nothing and Cube. Working tidily with minimalism and many restrictions, Elevated masterfully holsters tension in a convenient manner while letting it build up. The result is an entirely collected glimpse at true terror. With David Hewlett looking oddly like a neurotic, blood-soaked Devon Sawa, his performance elevates Elevated into the heavyweight championship of extremely tense and claustrophobic short films. Think about it this way, Elevated is the "Road Warrior" of unknown-horror short films and it's obvious to see the cinematic equivalent of photosynthesis for Natali's career in sizable horror phobias.

Ellen is on her way to the bottom floor of an unknown building. Along the way, a discomforting man named Ben tags along for the ride, mumbling guttural sounds. Soon, a security guard named Hank charges and screams into the elevator and insists on going to the top floor as so the "creatures" don't get them. From there on, it's an implied roller coaster ride into short endeavors and brief character development as we see who we should really fear; man or beast. Only after beginning to explain the nourished plot does the entire debacle of detail seem extraordinary. Elevated doesn't need to be narrated to be understood, in fact, quite the opposite. Elevated will unravel precisely aided only by time - 17 minutes to be near exact.

To reveal more claustro-horror shorts, might I recall memories of the terrifying and manic-depressive La Cabina which left me in awe at the surprising cleanliness of the whole unexplained ordeal. As you will witness here, Elevated will not answer questions. You could mope and complain, whinging on the lack of questions answered but by the end mark you'll be begging for more questions to be proposed. Elevated is short, to the point, uncomfortable, and entirely mad-cap with its performances of the three key characters; Hank, Ben, and Ellen. Elevated keeps it short, sweet, and utterly simple and that's how I want to present my review, except for the blue monochromatic light. Don't listen to me, watch it for yourself above. Thanks to his incredible filmography, I'm officially excited for his new film - Splice.

SPLICE

"Species" you might be joking, science fiction film it is, skin-romp hybrid thriller this isn't. Splice comes from the mind of Vincenzo Natali, the minimalist director behind the voracious paranoia of Cube and the ideological wit of Nothing. Splice is his newest foray into films that chronicle the broad aspect of science. Cube didn't so much tackle the theme of science as it was more of an ambiguous and unseen threat whereas Splice hosts Dren who is both worldly and terrifying. Capturing the star power of Adrien Brody as the awkward Clive and Sarah Polley as Elsa, Splice already has two things going for it. Fresh off the high that Predators left me frantically searching for in other studio pictures, it was nice to rewind to him with hair, and emotion. Natali has come along way from his oddball films with singular ideas and it glows transparently as Splice harnesses too many ideas leaving the film with a slight attitude of a bewildered newborn. That is, until the second part of the film. Starting out, Splice jumps right ship into the fairly mundane zone of the film and normally every motion picture has these, whether they are necessary or not. If judgment came down to brass tacks then I'd choose to be wowed in the end than in the beginning. Being the pessimist that I am, I find more comfort in closings. After the science terminologies are passed around rather fervidly between the married couple, Elsa projects this crazy idea for moving onto the next phase by incorporating human DNA into their "The Mist" inspired flesh beasts with unsurprising results. Viola! The "mistake" is created in an artificial chamber that sports very creative imagery of artificial birthings and goopy sound effects. Once they discover a mutating age ratio amongst the beastchild, the consequential happenstances come out to bite them in the ass. Dren, named after the company for whom they are employed under (N.E.R.D. but backwards), begins to evolve at an incredible rate and becomes increasingly more feminine and borderline aggressive. As far as the tale of Splice goes, lets just say I'm glad this bat-out-of-hell never hits menopause. Once the fire of passionate yet pretentious storytelling fades, the sinister and wondrous special effects of Splice take heed as the sole proprietor of the audiences attention and will remain so until the controversial copulation scene that had me wincing and feeling like a psychosexual deviant for not turning away. Not only does the CGI of the older Dren look so disgustingly fleshy but her body has been paid strict attention to detail, even so far as down to the terrestrial breasts on her unnatural body. All this was led up to with very critical scenes of masterful suspense and banal foreshadowing which is why Splice hit me as hard as it did, excusing the latter. Had I not cared about this creature or its rotating affection for either Clive or Elsa, I wouldn't have been so damned creeped out by its juvenile affections towards either surrogate. Just watching it spell words with Scrabble letters had me urging to break out of the trance I had been placed in to do something more productive than watching some flustered equality-of-sexes-my-ass motion picture encompassing that awkward "alien" sexuality that the Species series is so known for. Speaking of psychotic women in film, Splice is one of the more recent contenders. Not only are Elsa's intentions not as they appear, she splits mid-film into a baby crazy bitch whose mind and matter are both disproportionate to what they were at the beginning of Splice. Which is not to say that the ending of Splice came as a surprise, which it did, but could have easily been presumed and predicted well before the finale of this film. Splice is that film that if you venture in with an elitist nit-picking attitude trying to discern true science behind a quasi-creature feature then you'd be sorely mistaken. While not breaking any new ground with the monster mash near the end that invokes memories of Jeepers Creepers 2, however this time with no racial purging, Splice does many things right and these are all brave grounds that Species didn't penetrate. While the seduction was in place, Natasha Henstridge could never compete with Delphine Chanéac's harrowing and childlike sexual demeanor. The problem with Splice isn't so much within the film itself but in the audience. While I admit I wanted to hate this film for its melancholy and disastrous ending, I found this to be the reason why I enjoyed this film so much. It's an affable piece of genetic destruction if I'd ever seen one and it was directed by someone with talent; a fleeting feat indeed. Just don't expect a sing-song ultraviolent masterpiece with this one.

THE GARDEN OF THE FINZI-CONTINIS

Vittorio De Sica (1970)

I never thought I would say it, but recently I saw a holocaust film that I found to be rather aesthetically alluring and traditionally beautiful to the point where I watched it no less than three times in one week to make sure that I was not hallucinating. Of course, leave it to Italy—a country that has somehow managed to elevate sleazy horror, western, and action genre trash to the level of art—to be responsible for such an inordinate cinematic work that seems like it was made with more intent than to simply spread the gospel of the (anti)Occidental post-religion of holocaustianity. Indeed, Il giardino dei Finzi-Contini (1970) aka The Garden of the Finzi-Continis directed by Italian neorealist maestro Vittorio De Sica (Bicycle Thieves, Umberto D.) is an excellent example of what happens when a real artist projects his own humanity onto the plight and suffering of an alien people that could not have done a better job on their own, but of course it was naturally produced by chosenites, including Arthur Cohn, Gianni Hecht Lucari, and Artur Brauner. The first film that the auteur directed after becoming estranged from his regular screenwriter Cesare Zavattini, De Sica's strangely delectable feature is based on the semi-autobiographical novel of the same name by Ferrarese Jew Giorgio Bassani, who notoriously loathed the film adaptation. On top of being uniquely unkosher in its direction and overall execution, the film features the patently absurd novelty of featuring highly attractive (and mostly blond) Aryans with mostly noble demeanors portraying rich spoiled Jews that are just too decadent and terminally introverted to sense the rise of fascist antisemitism. In short, the film was clearly made to cater to tendencies of a naive all-goy audience, as if it would be too much of an aesthetic risk to feature real live Jews portraying Jews (at the very least, they could have cast handsome half-heeb Vittorio Gassman). In fact, while the film features characters sporting Star of David necklaces, synagogues, and various references to the growing tide of Hitler-inspired Italian fascist antisemitism, I was never able to truly able to embrace complete suspension of disbelief and sincerely feel that I was watching a movie about the holocaust, thus underscoring De Sica's innate dedication to humanism and cinematic art. In short, I was somehow able to rather enjoy the film in spite of its Hebraic holocaust theme.

Winner of various coveted awards, including the Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film in 1972 and the Golden Bear at the 21st Berlin International Film Festival in 1971, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis was indubitably a comeback film of sorts for auteur Vittorio De Sica, who had not had a hit since Matrimonio all'italiana (1964) aka Marriage Italian Style and spent a number of years directing mostly worthless mainstream comedies after long abandoning his neorealist roots due to commercial success. While it would be an exaggeration to say that the film is as good as his previous masterpieces like Ladri di biciclette (1948) aka Bicycle Thieves, Miracolo a Milano (1951) aka Miracle in Milan, and Umberto D. (1952), it is arguably De Sica's last great film, though some less kind critics were not that at all impressed, including David Thomson, who argued in The New Biographical Dictionary of Film (1975), "But his work in the 1960s was slick and tasteless. The pictorial grace and the emotional severity were both abandoned in a series of concocted comedies about sexual hypocrisy. THE GARDEN OF THE FINZI-CONTINIS was a regeneration only in that it was a serious, literary subject that de Sica transcribed with rather hollow rectitude. He stands now as a minor director." To Thomson's credit, the film does seem a bit flaccid and pathos-poor when compared to the auteur's masterpieces, but there is not denying its great enrapturing pulchritude and somewhat provocative depiction of Italian Jewry, which are certainly the main reasons I enjoyed it. Indeed, forget the sappy sentimentalism and silly humor of Roberto Benigni's Life Is Beautiful (1997), De Sica's film thankfully never feels like a gross exercise in emotional manipulation as the Dead Sea Pedestrians are depicted with great sensitivity to character flaws, warts and all.

It has been speculated that the 15th-century Italian noblewoman Simonetta Vespucci—a blonde beauty that tragically died at the mere age of 22 who was regarded as the most beautiful woman in Northern Italy during her time—acted as the inspiration for a number of famous paintings, probably most notably The Birth of Venus (1484-1486) by Sandro Botticelli. Undoubtedly, French fashion model turned actress Dominique Sanda was a sort of equivalent to Vespucci in terms of late-1960s/1970s European arthouse cinema as the always stunning star of such important cinematic works as Robert Bresson's Une femme douce (1969) aka A Gentle Woman, Bernardo Bertolucci's Il conformista (1970) aka The Conformist and Novecento (1976) aka 1900, and Fred Haines' underrated Hermann Hesse adaptation Steppenwolf (1974), among various other examples. Simply due to her sheer beauty, Sanda even manages to virtually steal the entire show in her all too brief uncredited cameo in Luchino Visconti's late era anti-jet-set flick Gruppo di famiglia in un interno (1974) aka Conversation Piece. Undoubtedly, if Sanda demonstrated any great talent, it was portraying a deceptively elegant, slightly venomous, and strangely sophisticated cocktease, which she does to great effect in de Sica's film as a terminally spoiled and deceptively frigid wealthy young Jewess who ultimately rejects the romantic propositions of her lifelong Judaic friend for a much more masculine and aggressive guido of the hopelessly hairy goyish commie sort. Indeed, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis—a film set on the eve of the Second World War in 1938 Ferrara, Italy—is the beautifully bittersweet story of a young lovelorn Jewish writer who faces the dually degrading experience of being repeatedly rejected by the woman he loves while he and his people face discrimination from the increasingly counter-kosher fascist government. Oftentimes feeling more like a strangely warm dystopian romance as directed by the wop grandpa of John Hughes than the typical Spielbergian cellu-loid shoah showcase, the film ultimately succeeds where most holocaust movies fail in that the Jewish characters, who are all conspicuously flawed, do not seem like an exotic 'other' that the viewer is expected to virtually worship in a mystical fashion. On top of successfully humanizing the eternal Hebrew, the film thankfully does not dwell on depicting dagos as dastardly demons worthy of eternal damnation, but I guess one should not expect anything less from a filmmaker that got his start during the fascist era. If the film has a villain, it is not an individual but instead collective fear and apathy, which of course are universal emotions.

Naturally, as a (quite regrettably) college-educated American, virtually every true blue Israelite that I have ever encountered was relatively rich and spoiled. Indeed, the denigrative weaponized label "white privilege" that is oftentimes used by Judaic cultural Marxist types that pretend to be white like Tim Wise, Noel Ignatiev, and their spiritually castrated shabbos goy lackeys would certainly be an apt description for the average American Jew. While the characters in The Garden of the Finzi-Continis are also plagued with an inordinate degree of kosher privilege, they are not nearly as repellent or loathsome as the various American tribesmen that I have had the grand misfortune of meeting. For example, instead of shitting on European culture, these characters mostly embrace it to the point where some of them, including the male protagonist's father, are fascist party members. Of course, these characters represent the last generation of true European Jewry before the holocaust and mass immigration of Jews to the United States more or less completely destroyed the culturally schizophrenic peoples. In that sense, the film acts as a virtual collective epitaph for European Jewry, most specifically Italian Jewry, hence why the film concludes with a dreamlike montage of all the characters that have perished. Actually set in Europa instead of some annoyingly fake Hollywood set, the film also radiates a certain authenticity despite its very specific stylization and cast of aesthetically gifted Aryans portraying rather rich Red Sea Pedestrians. In fact, even auteur De Sica felt the film was too beautiful, or as he stated in an interview with Charles Thomas Samuels, "That's right. The second half shouldn't be so beautiful. I should have made it grey or reversed THE LAST JUDGEMENT and made the first part color and the second black and white. That's a good idea. I wanted to achieve effects like those in Huston's REFLECTIONS IN A GOLDEN EYE, but my cameraman was incapable." Apparently De Sica was unable to completely realize his entire aesthetic vision due to a lack of time and money, thereupon resulting in the most glaringly gorgeous holocaust film ever made. Needless to say, such a film would never be made today.

After beginning with an immediately strikingly blood-warm autumnal opening credit sequence that sets the film's aesthetic tone of diffused delectability and soft-focus melancholy, the viewer encounters a couple bourgeois tennis dorks in all-white on bicycles as they approach gates of the large estate of the wealthy Jewish Finzi-Contini family, with one of the friends half-jokingly declaring that, "...the Finzi-Continis never leave their kingdom." When the group finally enters the estate, they are greeted with an otherworldly Edenic paradise of sorts, though communist Malnate (Fabio Testi)—a masculine gey boy that boasts to his Judaic comrade in regard to his fetish for class warfare, "But the middle class I don't care for. They're all of them more or less fascists. Except for you Jews...understandably...considering—but at least the works at my place...are almost all antifascist"—acts less than impressed. A friend of the family's sole son Alberto (Helmut Berger)—a sickly and painfully introverted blond chap who doesn't like leaving home because, as he states, "I always felt I was being spied on...envied"—Malnate soon develops a romantic interest upon meeting his pal's sole sister Micòl (Dominique Sanda), who is somewhat rightly described by a Hebraic comrade as, "Very beautiful: tall, blond...but unpredictable." To make matters more romantically complicated, the film's Jewish protagonist Giorgio (Lino Capolicchio) falls in love with Micòl, who also happens to be his childhood friend as both are members of respected local Jewish families. While Micòl gives Giorgio the perfect opportunity to fuck her in her family's automobile as her nipples can be seen through her wet white shirt after the two seek shelter from the rain, it is ultimately the notably more masculine Malnate that manages to mate with her right before being drafted into the Italian army and being killed in combat in Russia. Although Giorgio fails miserably in terms of attempting to get his virginal shylock cock wet by dipping into Micòl's premium grade kosher cunt, he is the only one of his tennis friends to survive the ordeal and escape Italy before being herded into a cramped cattle car. Undoubtedly, the great irony of Giorgio's young life is that, despite succumbing to a crippling degree of lovelorn dejection, he will live on while the woman that he believes he loves will die and eventually become nothing more to him than a fading bittersweet memory of unrequited love during a chaotic war torn period in what is ultimately a sort of Jewish Götterdämmerung.

Although pathologically preoccupied due to being terribly lovesick, Giorgio seems to be one of the only characters in the film that is acutely aware that an ominous fate awaits the Jews. Indeed, even Giorgio father's (Romolo Valli)—a fascist supporter with ties to the local government—seems to be in denial about the situation as demonstrated by his preposterous attempts to rationalize anti-Jewish laws. When Giorgio accuses his padre of having a "pet mania" and believing that, "That our Mussolini is better than Hitler...our fascism better than Nazism!," his father replies, "Well, it's true!," and then subsequently argues without even the slightest hint of irony that it is ok that they are, "Third-class, if you will, but still a citizen who can...enjoy his basic rights." The only other Jew that seems totally horrified by the anti-kosher climate of Italy is Micòl's insufferably introverted Alberto, who seems to be so deeply metaphysically plagued by the growing counter-kosherism in the air that he eventually becomes terribly sick and eventually dies of the antisemitic storm, or so the film makes it seem. Aside from repeatedly dispassionately rebuffing Giorgio's various meek and largely pathetic romantic advances, Micòl cannot even be bothered to say goodbye to her brother Alberto, who she seems to have incestuous feelings for, when he is on his deathbed. Although she declares to Giorgio before a failed half-hearted attempt at seducing him, "I like to feel I'm a woman," Micòl's words are clearly those of wishful thinking as she is such a hopelessly spoiled brat that she cannot be bothered to suffer the grand indignity of stepping outside the innately internal fantasy realm she has created on her family estate, hence why it becomes all the more disturbing yet strangely fitting when the goombah Gestapo finally arrives at her less than humble abode to take her and her family away. A clear victim of bourgeois decadence and the apathy it inspires, Micòl does not bother to even attempt to put up a fight when her black-clad persecutors arrive. Indeed, she seems like she would agree with Rimbaud's words, "I found I could extinguish all human hope from my soul." Undoubtedly, Micòl seems to suffer from a certain unspoken self-loathing due to her particularly privileged background, which explains her disgust for a fellow wealthy Jew like Giorgio and sexual interest in a good masculine guido gentile like Malnate. In fact, she more or less expresses as much when Giorgio declares he loves her and Micòl angrily responds, "But I don't love you! Lovers have a drive to overwhelm one another. But the way we are, alike as two drops of water...how could we ever overwhelm or tear each other to pieces? It would be like making love with a brother. Like with Alberto. You and I are not normal people. For the two of us...what counts more than the possession of things—how shall I put it?—is the remembrance of things...the memory of things." Of course, the brutal irony is that if Micòl had hooked up with Giorgio and fled Italy with him, she would not have joined the supposed six million in the Endlösung.

To some extent, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis is a 'message' film and Vittorio De Sica manages to more or less outline most of its central themes in a single scene at the end where protagonist Giorgio's father—a man that seems to realize his life is over—reconciles with his son and gives him the following fatherly words of advice, "If I may say so...as families go, the Finzi-Continis are not for us. They're not our sort. They're different. They don't even seem Jewish. Micol—Maybe that's what attracted you to her. That she's superior to you socially. It'll pass. You'll get over it. And a lot sooner than you think. I can imagine what you're feeling now. Yet, in a way, I rather envy you. In life, in order to understand...to really understand the world...you must die at least once. So it's better to die young, when there's still time left...to recover and live again. When you're old, it's much worse. Why is that? There's no time to start over from zero. And our generation has made so many, many mistakes. A few months and it will seem as if none of this had ever happened to you. You may even end up being glad. You'll feel richer, one might say. More mature." As if he predicted the future (or was committing a sort of passive suicide), Giorgio's father is rounded up by the fascists just like the Finzi-Continis, though he manages to send his family away to safety. Although a Jewish fascist that supported a political party that persecuted his own people, Giorgio's father ultimately comes off in the end as seeming like the most honorable character in the entire film.

While surely entertaining and aesthetically delectable to a certain degree, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis cannot be fully appreciated without a certain understanding of the history of Italian Jewry and its relationship to Italian fascism, which is a bit more complicated and dubious than that of German Jewry to the Third Reich. For example, Giorgio's father—a man that seems to be just as proud of being Italian as he is Jewish—seems to be symbolic of the Turin banker Ettore Ovazza, who was not only a diehard fascist from the very beginning, but he also bankrolled Mussolini and his movement. Not unlike Giorgio's father, Ovazza seemed to have been at least partially in denial when it came to growing fascist antisemitism, which he and his family ultimately paid for with their lives with after the Schutzstaffel caught up with them in late-1943 near the Swiss border. As depicted in the rather flaccid and banal TV miniseries Benito: The Rise and Fall of Mussolini (1993) starring Antonio Banderas as the eponymous lead, Mussolini was the sexual and political protégé of communist Jewess Margherita Sarfatti, who acted as an imperative propaganda adviser of the National Fascist Party as well as Il Duce's biographer. Notably, fascist General and war hero Italo Balbo, who was from Ferrara just like the characters in the film, was strongly opposed to anti-Jewish laws due to his own favorable personal experiences with the long assimilated Ferrarese Jews. Although the film makes it seem as if every single Italian Jew was rounded up and exterminated in a concentration camp, only ninety-six of Ferrara's 300 Jews were actually deported, hence how the film's source writer Giorgio Bassani was able to survive the war despite being an active resistance fighter. Of course, considering their oftentimes similar phenotypic traits, especially in the south, it was probably easier for Jews to hide among Italians than among Germans. As far as Hebraic guidos and tennis are concerned, Trieste-born Jewish tennis star Uberto De Morpurgo—a somewhat handsome fellow of aristocratic stock that would certainly be at home with the characters of De Sica's film—was named Italian Commissioner of Tennis by Benito Mussolini in 1929.

Due to their pathetic passivity and seeming complete and utter disinterest in even leaving home, the titular family of The Garden of the Finzi-Continis almost seems to long for death, as if they have been waiting their entire lives for a one-way ticket to Auschwitz. Notably, this seems especially true of the young intellectual Alberto, who has the luxury of kicking the bucket before ever getting into nazi hands and thus dying a slightly more dignified death. Indeed, thinking about Alberto, I could not help but reminded of the tragic Italian Jewish philosopher Carlo Michelstaedter, who killed himself by shooting himself with a pistol only hours after completing his sole book Persuasion and Rhetoric—a doctoral thesis that, not unlike American Jew Mitchell Heisman's Suicide Note (2010), reads like a hermetic philosophical suicide note—at the mere age of 23 in 1910. Like his Viennese Jewish counterpart Otto Weininger, who killed himself at the same exact age on the same exact month almost seven years before, Michelstaedter was, despite being descended from rabbis, a totally deracinated irreligious Jew that had adopted a completely Occidental cultural and intellectual perspective as a student of Plato and Aristotle. Although just speculation, but I think Michelstaedter was probably like how Oswald Spengler described Weininger in that he was a sort of post-religious Jewish mystic of late religious consciousness destroyed in the agony of a sort of schizophrenic Magian dualism as a result of being a racial/spiritual alien with a carefully cultivated European sensibility. As Daniela Bini noted in Carlo Michelstaedter and the Failure of Language (1992), “Twelve years after his death his close friend Vladimiro Arangio Ruiz developed an interpretation along a more philosophical line. In speaking of Carlo's suicide Arangio Ruiz used the very words Carlo himself had written in his autobiographical pages: that he had died ‘for overwhelming abundance of life.’ He emphasized the great demands Carlo had made upon himself, that he had elevated his own being to a height and expected from himself a perfection that cannot exist in human life. He was made of the same stuff of which heroes and saints are made. In this view emphasis was also placed on Carlo's youth, when idealism reigns uncompromised.” Of course, it can also be argued that the film's titular family—decadent intellectuals that are even looked at as virtual aristocrats by other Jews due to their wealth and lack of stereotypical Jewish characteristics—also succumbed to ‘overwhelming abundance of life,’ as their bloated opulence and detachment from the struggle of life and survival leads to accepting a horrific fate that is right in front of their faces. Quite notably, both Weininger and Michelstaedter were a major intellectual influence on self-described ‘superfascist’ Julius Evola, who received financial backing from Mussolini to start a racialist journal entitled Sangue e Spirito aka Blood and Spirit that featured a distinctly ‘Roman’ (as opposed to German) view of race that blended Sorelianism with a Mussolinian eugenic ideal. Somewhat ironically, despite his influence on Evola and other fascist thinkers, Michelstaedter's entire family, including his mother and elder sister, died in the holocaust. Of course, had Michelstaedter not killed himself, he probably would have also ended up at Auschwitz.

At the beginning of his magnum opus Persuasion and Rhetoric, Michelstaedter arguably provides another insight into the titular family of the film when he writes, “Nor is any life ever satisfied to live in any present, for insofar as it is life it continues, and it continues into the future to the degree that it lacks life. If it were to possess itself completely here and now and be in want of nothing—if it awaited nothing in the future—it would not continue: it would cease to be life. So many things attract us in the future, but in vain do we want to possess them in the present.” Throughout the family, most of the members of the Finzi-Contini family seem to be living completely in the present, as if they, quite unlike protagonist Giorgio, have nil interest in a future and have thus accepted a sort foreboding self-obliteration via passive contentment that ironically leads to their deaths. While Michelstaedter certainly could have not predicated the holocaust, it as if he understood the sort of hopelessly fragile Jewish bourgeois mindset that would make its implementation possible. Not unlike Czar Nicholas II of Russia, who was executed under the command of Jewish Bolshevik thug Yakov Yurovsky, the Finzi-Contini family is simply too spoiled, weak, and out of touch with reality to deal with a glaring threat that would ultimately completely engulf them. Of course, the sort of self-slaughter committed by Michelstaedter is certainly more honorable than being another statistic in the shoah, as it at least demonstrates a certain will power.

While Vittorio De Sica was not exactly a politically correct guy in some respects (when asked in an interview why he did not develop a scene of homoerotic love in his film Shoeshine (1946), he simply replied, “Because it revolted me”), he did seem to suffer from a certain ethno-masochism when it came to fascism, or as he stated in an interview with Charles Thomas Samuels featured in Vittorio De Sica: Contemporary Perspectives in regard to The Garden of the Finzi-Continis, “After the disaster of SUNFLOWER I wanted to make a true De Sica film, made just as I wanted it. I accepted this subject because I intimately feel the Jewish problem. I myself feel shame because we are guilty of the death of millions of Jews. Why were they killed? Because a criminal, a lunatic wanted that. But the Italian Fascists are also guilty. So am I. I wasn’t a fascist, but I belong to the country that collaborated with Hitler. I wanted, out of conscience, to make this film, and I am glad I made it.” Judging simply by his comments, De Sica—a mensch that freely admitted that he was inspired to direct the ‘fascist’ film La porta del cielo (1945) aka The Gates of Heaven because, “it was a film made only to save me from the Fascists”—seems to have failed in his artistic intentions with the film. Indeed, instead of being the stereotypical holocaust agitprop piece, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis is a film that dares to reveal Jewish-fascist collaboration and at least partly blame the Jews for their own downfall. On top of that, the film—a sort of contra Shoah (1985) in virtually every way imaginable—is just too patently aesthetically pulchritudinous, seraphic, and luscious to inspire the doom and gloom of gas chambers and dubious things like Herr Doktor Joseph Mengele’s supposed twin fetish. Of course, exploiting the holocaust and the Third Reich for monetary and/or aesthetic reasons is a great legacy of Italian cinema history as demonstrated by everything from Guido Arthouse films like Liliana Cavani’s The Night Porter (1974) to Corrado Farina’s comic book adaptation Baba Yaga (1973) to the the countless films of the mostly worthless Nazisploitation (sub)genre like Sergio Garrone's SS Experiment Camp (1976). For me, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis is less a melodrama about the holocaust than a sort of celluloid death poem for European Jewry; or, more specifically a thoroughly Europeanized Jewry that no longer exists but once produced people like Michelstaedter, Weininger, Karl Kraus, Edmund Husserl, and Egon Friedell, among others. Indeed, I am far from a philosemite, but I think the film does pay respectable tribute to European Jewry, even if it fails in its holocaust agenda. As to why the film was superior to many of the filmmaker's many previous artistic failures, De Sica probably said it best when he stated in an interview, "I am happy that I made it because it brought me back to my old noble intentions. Because, you see, I have been ruined by lack of money. All my good films, which I financed by myself, made nothing. Only my bad films made money. Money has been my ruin."

YOUNG TÖRLESS

Volker Schlöndorff (1966)

Love him or loathe him, German auteur Volker Schlöndorff (The Tin Drum, Swann in Love) almost singlehandedly rebooted Teutonic cinema during the post-WWII era with his debut feature Young Törless (1966) aka Der junge Törless starring a young teenage Mathieu Carrière (who had attended the same Jesuit boarding school in France that the director previously attended) in the eponymous lead role. Indeed, along with Alexander Kluge's Yesterday Girl (1966) aka Abschied von gestern and Ulrich Schamoni's It (1966) aka Es, Young Törless was such a striking cinematic revelation among the West German public that it was dubbed by the media as something totally new, 'Young German Cinema,' which would eventually become New German Cinema. Learning the cinematic craft from working as an assistant director for French New Wave auteur filmmakers like Louis Malle and Alain Resnais and desiring to make a sort of celluloid bridge between his zeitgeist and that of the great Germanic filmmakers of the silent era like F.W. Murnau and Fritz Lang, Schlöndorff assembled the somber black-and-white coming-of-age flick Young Törless, which was adapted from Austrian writer Robert Musil's 1906 literary debut The Confusions of Young Törless (1906) aka Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törleß. Indeed, impressed by the writer's unfinished two-volume magnum opus Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften aka The Man Without Qualities (1930–43), Schlöndorff decided to checkout and ultimately cinematically adapt and update Musil's prophetic novel Young Törless, which not only interested the auteur because he attended a boarding school like the protagonist of the book (albeit, a French Jesuit one as opposed to an Austrian military one), but also because, as the director described in the featurette A German Movie: "The other thing that attracted me in Musil's novel is that it seemed like a metaphor for what happened much later in German history, meaning the dictatorship of the Nazis and the abuse and the holocaust." Heavily influenced by Fritz Lang's late era expressionist masterpiece M (1931), Young Törless, which is set during the pre-WWI era at a military boarding school located in a remote rural region of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, follows an inquisitive teenage protagonist with a 'beyond good and evil' mentality who watches passively as his new friends and classmates routinely physically, sexually, and emotionally torture a weak and cowardly student who was caught stealing by one of his cornholing comrades. Casting a real Jew named Marian Seidowsky (who would later star alongside Fassbinder in Schlöndorff's 1970 adaptation of Baal) whose Polish Jewish family managed to survive the Second World War in the role of the victim Anselm von Basini in a performance modeled after Peter Lorre's pathetic pedophilic serial killer character Hans Beckert from Fritz Lang's M, Schlöndorff's cinematic debut is a vaguely S&M-themed political parable that allegorically depicts via a small military academy microcosm how the German bourgeoisie (as represented by protagonist Thomas Törless) watched passively during the National Socialist takeover and the discrimination of Jews. A work that proved that Teutonic filmmakers still had testicular fortitude (although, the director would eventually lose this testicular fortitude), Young Törless was such a subversive work upon its release that it caused the West German counselor in Paris to walk-out during its screening at the 1966 Cannes Film Festival, where it won the FIPRESCI Prize, and slam the door while shouting, “This is not a German movie.” Young Törless is also the first film where Schlöndorff would attempt to establish a dubious link between fascism and faggotry, thereupon making it a work that might offend more weak-minded LGBT-lobotomized viewers.

Teenage intellectual Thomas Törless (Mathieu Carrière) is a young man who has probably misread too much Nietzsche (notably, Musil was heavily influenced by the “philosopher of the hammer”) and believes himself to be above ‘good and evil.’ Törless’ father believes his son is too indecisive and asks a more militaristic and conservative student named Beineberg (Bernd Tischer)—an ideologue and master race type of the old school Prussian sort—to watch over his progeny when he drops him off at the military academy. A born iconoclast of sorts, Törless is punished during his first day of school for mocking the banal nature of his teacher’s lecturing techniques and is thus forced to copy out Horace’s sixth ode by the next day. Meanwhile, the most pathetic and cowardly student in the entire military academy, Anselm von Basini (Marian Seidowsky)—the stereotypically Jewish acting/looking son of an impoverished widow—is threatened by a nasty young man named Reiting (Fred Dietz) who demands that the degenerate aristocrat pay him back money that he owes him by the next day, or else he will become his personal slave. Needless to say, Basini makes the desperate mistake of stealing money from alpha-male Beineberg’s drawer to payback Reiting. When Reiting accuses Basini of theft, the meek boy, who clearly suffers from a persecution complex of sorts, reacts in a stereotypically Hebraic manner by retorting, “How dare you say that! What a nasty thing to say! That’s vile slander! You’re just picking on me because I’m weaker.” After much arguing, Basini eventually confesses to the crime, but absurdly claims that he did not steal the money, but “only borrowed it in secret.” Meanwhile, Beineberg takes Törless to meet a single-mother prostitute with a bastard baby named Bozena (played by English Gothic horror actress Barbara Steele, who starred in Mario Bava’s Black Sunday (1960) and Corman’s Poe adaptation The Pit and the Pendulum (1961), among countless other classics of the genre), who hates the Austrian bourgeoisie, especially the Viennese (her baby is the unwanted product of an affair she had with a Viennese bourgeois gentleman). Bozena can sense the young student’s unease and seeming sense of superiority, so she remarks to Törless while making out with Beineberg, “You don’t like me talking about your mother? You people always think you’re better than us. You don’t think your mother and I are alike, huh? [...] You're wrong...terribly wrong. I know your families better than that. I spent enough time in Vienna. I know what goes on there." Bozena also tells the boys that they are just like their parents as, "hypocrites, cowards and liars" who pretend to be respectable and dignified, but act quite differently behind closed doors. As Törless will soon find out, Bozena is quite right. Bozena also alludes to the fact that certain young military cadets are involved in homosexuality by stating in defense of the fleshy 'goods' that she has to peddle: "It is better than what you do in your dorms." Indeed, Törless will also learn that sadomasochistic sodomy is a timeless secret tradition at seemingly benign Austrian military schools.

During the night, a hermetic world comes to life in an attic at the Austro-Hungarian military academy where an unofficial secret society of students smoke from hookahs like proto-beatniks, dream of taking pilgrimages to India in an Hermann Hesse-esque fashion, discuss sex and look at pornography, and—most importantly—make future cryptic metapolitical plans for their school and classmates, with Beineberg being the uncontested Führer of the group. During one of their nightly attic meetings, Reiting discusses how "a lot of pleasure can be had from him" regarding criminal Basini, but idealist Beineberg wants the thief formerly exposed and kicked out of the school, as he has a more conservative view regarding crime and punishment. Ultimately, the conspiring friends agree to have their fun with Basini, whose thieving hand they whip the next day. On top of being physically assaulted, Basini is told by Reiting and his crew that they have decided not to squeal to the school authorities regarding his crimes, but that he will now have to live the lonely life of a virtual slave and plaything who's every action with other classmates will be the subject of their consent and whose expenses and income will be strictly scrutinized. When Beineberg discovers that Reiting has been looking at pornography and engaging in violent gay sex with Basini in the attic, he becomes enraged and decides he wants to also take part in torturing the pathetic slave, stating, "What I've got in mind is pure asceticism. To rise above this world, you must kill off everything that enslaves you to it." While fondling a knife in a fetishistic fashion, Beineberg declares he must "kill off" all the supposed "superfluous emotions" (aka pity, empathy, forgiveness, etc.) that he has for Basini and become hard like a true Aryan Übermensch. In a scene modeled after the underworld trial scene at the conclusion of Fritz Lang's M, Beineberg, who resembles one of Erich von Stroheim's various portrayals of Prussian villains that sport fancy gloves and super spiffy uniforms, presides over a secret show trial in the attic against Basini where he is charged with committing a break-in, stealing money, acting on his own against his comrades expressed wishes, attempting to set comrades against one another, and placing himself in the sexual servitude of a dimwitted degenerate like Reiting. For his crimes, Basini is beaten and tortured, and Törless even gets in on the action at point, forcing the slave to say, "I'm a thief," but the protagonist will ultimately slowly but surely come to realize he has become a silent perpetrator in a sick game.

Of course, later Törless realizes the severity of the brutality he has engaged in and writes in his journal, "I muß be sick, insane. Why else would things that others find normal disgust me?" That night, Törless takes Basini to the attic where the slave immediately begins taking off his clothes, as if he expects to be sexually manhandled by the rampantly heterosexual protagonist (of course, in Musil's novel, the protagonist does get involved with homosexuality). After yelling at Basini for undressing, Törless berates the bitch boy for subjecting himself to Beineberg and Reitling's brutality. Törless also becomes disgusted by Basini's lack of guilt when it comes to stealing and engaging in aberrant sexual servitude. Undoubtedly, Basini is a hard person to feel sorry for yet his treatment at the violent hands of young authoritarian homos is also unjustifiable, hence Törless' moral and philosophical dilemma regarding the entire situation. Naturally, Beineberg's thirst for torturing Basini only grows with each passing day, so he decides to see how far he can take it by hypnotizing the boy and stabbing him with a needle. When Basini falls over while being tortured under hypnosis, Beineberg accuses him of faking it and has his friends beat him to a bloody pulp. The next day, Basini begs for Törless' help and Reitling witnesses the interaction and accuses them of having a secret alliance. Of course, Törless tells the truth regarding his relationship with Basini and when Reitling demands that he also get in on the sexually sadomasochistic action, he refuses to as he finds the whole situation boring, stating, "Things just happen. Anything's possible. There's not an evil world and a good world. They exist together in the same world. That's the whole truth." Later that day, Beineberg threatens Törless by telling him that if he does not get involved with torturing Basini, he will tell everyone at the school that he is the thief's accomplice. While Törless attempts to warn Basini that night that he is in for a world of hurt, the cowardly thief is not prepared for the lynch mob style torture he will suffer the next day. Indeed, after some students block off all the doors and exits of the school gymnasium so as to prevent any teachers from interrupting their acts of mob-mentality-based collective torture, all the pupils of the school gang up on Basini and Beineberg, who leads the mob, mocks his widow mother by reading out a pathetic letter she has written regarding the family's dire monetary situation. When Basini makes a fruitless attempt at fighting back for the first time in his entire life, he is beaten up by all the boys and hanged upside down in a mock lynching of sorts in a perniciously playful scenario that one of the teachers at the school describes as "downright diabolical." While Törless attempted to save Basini during the attack, his efforts are ultimately too little and too late. Shaken up by the whole situation, Törless runs away from the school and seeks solace in prostitute Bozena. When Törless finally goes back to the school, he explains his actions to the school's headmasters by going on a pretentious speech about his reasoning for never tattling on Basini and how he has learned from the entire experience that good and evil are natural everyday events that one must be on guard for. After giving his little philosophical spiel and abruptly leaving the room, the main headmaster declares, "This young man is under such emotional strain that this school is no longer the place for him. His intellectual nourishment must be monitored more carefully than we can do here." In the end, Törless happily leaves the school after his loving mother picks him up in a horse and carriage. If the protagonist learns anything by the end of the film, it is that one cannot be a passive spectator to human brutality, as it leads to dictatorships, atrocities, and whatnot.

Interestingly, while Schlöndorff portrays the Basini character in Young Törless as a victim who suffers unnecessary punishment at the hands of sadistic proto-fascist crypto-homos, the character is also depicted as a morally retarded thief and groveling coward who more or less welcomed his poof punishment, thus hinting that the director thought that certain Jews were indeed guilty of certain crimes after World War I, though they did not deserve the punishment they ultimately received. As the director explained in the featurette A German Movie, he had some reservations about casting a real Jew for the role of Basini, explaining regarding his eventual decision to cast Marian Seidowsky (who had been introduced to the director by his classmates): "And, of course, what could I say? I mean, these were 15-year-old boys in the middle of the 60s who came and brought to me, as the victim, a Jewish boy living in their school. I was, first, too scared to use him...I thought that we were getting too close to the metaphor here...and, on the other hand, I had taken such a liking to him and he was so eager to do the part that I started working with him." Apparently, the other teenage cast members, who were also non-actors (except for Mathieu Carrière, who previously appeared in Rolf Thiele's 1964 Thomas Man adaptation Tonio Kröger), told Schlöndorff that Seidowsky would be perfect for the part because he was a real-life crybaby who epitomized the character of Basini. While Seidowsky would go on to star in two more of Schlöndorff films, including Baal (1970) and Morals of Ruth Halbfass (1972) aka Die Moral der Ruth Halbfass, as well as the early Fassbinder flicks Gods of the Plague (1970) and The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971), he developed cancer at the premature age of 29 and subsequently committed suicide by shooting himself at a hospital in Munich (or so Schlöndorff would describe in his autobiography Licht, Schatten und Bewegung). Of course, Young Törless was not the last film Schlöndorff directed that followed in the anti-Teutonic spirit of quack Hebrew psychoanalyst Wilhelm Reich by depicting militarists/fascists as sadomasochistic sodomites, as he would later portray German Freikorps soldiers as cold-hearted misogynistic homos in Coup de Grâce (1976) and would even include a boy-buggering SA Brownshirt pederast in his Academy Award winning work The Tin Drum (1979) aka Die Blechtrommel. Indeed, Schlöndorff was not the only promoter of this ethno-masochistic, if not homo-hating, trend of attempting to depict Prussianism and fascism as sort of proto-leather-fag subcultures, as German leftist sociologist Klaus Theweleit released a two volume Reich-inspired work in 1977 entitled Männerphantasien (which was later translated into English in 1987 under the title Male Fantasies) that attempted to portray masculine Freikorps soldiers and National Socialists as sick and sexually sadistic sodomites who derived sexual pleasure from torturing and killing people. Whatever I may think of Schlöndorff's hopelessly cliché post-WWII 68er-Bewegung-esque politics, I cannot deny that Young Törless is a revolutionary work of Teutonic cinema that helped sire one of the greatest and most important film movements in German history, not to mention the fact that the work would surely be considered ostensibly 'homophobic' by today's prissy PC standards, thus demonstrating how out of hand politically correct authoritarianism and the Pink Gestapo has gotten.

A DEGREE OF MURDER

Volker Schlöndorff (1967)

Undoubtedly, statuesque German-Italian junky model/actress Anita Pallenberg (Barbarella, Dillinger Is Dead aka Dillinger è morto) is one of the most, if not the most, deadly groupie/muses of counter-culture generation, as a wild and wanton woman whose child and lovers/ex-lovers randomly died from tragic and oftentimes dubious circumstances, including her 17-year-old male concubine Scott Cantrell, who shot himself in the head with a gun owned by Keith Richards (the model's lover at the time) in what some suspect was a game of Russian roulette gone awry and which resulted in the bad girl being arrested for manslaughter (which she was ultimately cleared of). Before her loved ones started dropping dead under rather bizarre circumstances, Pallenberg starred in the somewhat strangely prophetic kraut counter-culture work Mord und Totschlag (1968) aka A Degree of Murder where she plays a moronic anti-heroine who 'accidentally' kills her boyfriend and subsequently cuckolds two equally moronic men (who can now be seen as stand-ins for Brian Jones and Keith Richards) into helping her dispose of her belated beau's dead body. The second feature directed by Volker Schlöndorff (The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum, The Tin Drum) following his award-winning Robert Musil adaptation Young Törless (1966), A Degree of Murder was spoken highly of in a 1974 interview with Rainer Werner Fassbinder, which the authors of Volker Schlöndorff's Cinema: Adaptation, Politics, and the Movie-Appropriate (2002) speculated was for the following reasons: "Given his sense of rebellion, the young Fassbinder probably liked how A Degree of Murder broke with the past. Schlöndorff used the success of Young Törless as a springboard to introduce, with his second film, a new element of pop culture visual splashiness into the German film." A big hit upon its release among Swinging Sixties types, which is largely due to the fact that the Rolling Stones founder/Pallenberg's-then-boyfriend Brian Jones composed a shockingly good original soundtrack for the film that would be the sole solo album of the tragic musician's career (though Jimmy Page and various other musicians would also play on the album), A Degree of Murder has essentially fallen into the ash heap of celluloid history, which largely has to do with the fact that neither the film nor soundtrack have ever been released in any official home media formats. For better or worse, a work heavily influenced by auteur Schlöndorff's experience work during the early 1960s as an assistant director on films directed by top directors of the French New Wave (Louis Malle gave him his first job and he would go on to work with Alain Resnais and Jean-Pierre Melville), A Degree of Murder is indubitably one of the most important and revolutionary works of early German New Cinema as a sort of Teutonic counter-culture take on François Truffaut's Jules and Jim (1962) meets Jean-Luc Godard's Bande à part (1964) aka Band of Outsiders, albeit much more nihilistic and pessimistic as a work that wallows in the pathological alienation of post-WWII Germany.

Munich-based waitress Jean (Anita Pallenberg) is not exactly the most intelligent girl in the world and her vapid personality, apathetic attitude, and annoying ditzy yet bitchy demeanor do not exactly help her case in terms of being a woman that men would want to be around, yet she is reasonably beautiful and statuesque in appearance, so she has no problem attracting men, especially of the passive cuckold sort. One day, Jean's ex-boyfriend Günther (Hans Peter Hallwachs) shows up to her apartment to collect his personal belongings and while the dumb dame initially refuses him entry, she eventually lets him in after he appeals to her narcissism regarding the perfume she is wearing. A reasonable fellow, Günther wants to have sex with Jean one more time before they leave each other's lives forever, but the erratic ex-girlfriend disagrees. Annoyed at Jean's refusal to partake in breakup sex, Günther begins to get physical and the little lady pulls out a revolver, which the ex-boyfriend ironically gave to her for her birthday, and points it at her ex-beau. While Jean finally calms down, Günther becomes enraged that she would try to pull on a gun at him, so he attempts to hurl a wine bottle at her and she logically returns fire with a bullet. A self-absorbed bitch that only cares about herself and her already dubious reputation, Jean refuses wounded Günther's pleas to take him to the hospital and she even yells at him for making noise that the neighbors might hear. After Jean halfheartedly claims her innocence by stating, "I didn't really mean to do it, honestly" and acting pseudo-maternally by saying, "Come on, I'll put you to bed" as opposed to taking her critically wounded ex to the hospital like a normal person, Günther naturally drops dead. Although she is borderline half-retarded, Jean is at least wise enough to know not to call 911 at this point and instead opts for playing female fatale. Indeed, Jean gets all dolled up, puts on a pair of sunglasses to ostensibly hide her identity, and goes to a local bar where she meets a dude named Hans (Werner Enke) who she offers $500 to "do something easy" (aka help dispose the body of Günther). Although a bit hesitant at first, Hans is ultimately convinced after Jean attempts to flatter him, stating BS to him like, "The minute I saw you come in, I said to myself, 'That is a man you can depend on'." After going back to the waitress' apartment, Jean and Hans have naughty sex next to Günther's bloody corpse. Since they do not have a driver to transport the corpse in, Hans borrows a car from his work and recruits his friend Fritz (Manfred Fischbeck) to drive.

After wrapping up the corpse in a fancy rug and getting past a nosey neighbor sporting a traditional Bavarian hat, Fritz drives Jean, Hans, and Günther's deteriorating body to the country but, of course, on the way, their car breaks down. After reaching a gas station and getting their car fixed, A Degree of Murders turns into an anti-Heimat/road trip hybrid of sorts. Ultimately, the ménage à trios dumps Günther's corpse at a road construction site on the Autobahn and Jean says, "so long" to her dead boy toy. After dropping the dead dude, the three hapless proto-hippies hang out at Fritz's aunt's country home. After talking with a good-humored hillbilly he knows and seeing a farmer finger picking wax out of his ears while riding on his tractor, city boy Fritz complains regarding his kin-folk, "I'll never understand how they stand it here...get fat and work and sleep." On their way back to Munich, Hans throws the murder weapon out the window of the car and the three degenerates subsequently almost get in a car crash after Fritz tailgates a dump truck full of gravel. In the process of almost dying via car crash, their windshield is partly knocked out and they bump into another car on the road in the process, thereupon causing scratch on some anally retentive snob's car. Of course, Fritz pulls off the road and he confronts the bourgeois family whose car they barely grazed and pays them for their troubles. Jean gets in a bitch fight with the posh woman in the car, who states, "You should have children but your kind will do anything to avoid it," to which the murderess replies, "with a face like that you're lucky you even found a man." After Fritz smashes out the rest of the car windshield, Hans has a hissy fit and the two get into a sissy fight involving smacking and, in the pointless skirmish, they lose the money Jean has given them for helping to dispose of the corpse, thereupon being accessories to murder for nothing. Of course, Hans and Fritz soon make up and agree regarding their philosophy to life, "Just keep on going...live fast, die young, and have a good looking corpse." When the three get back to Munich, they stop by Jean's place first and say their goodbyes. Although Jean tells Fritz that she has feelings for him, he is not interested and gives the following excuse, "Yeah, you're alright too, but there's no point in it. I'm kind of restless, you know? I've gotta' keep trying something different." In the end, A Degree of Murder concludes with Jean smiling like a ditz at a bar while flirting with ugly losers, along with a darkly humorous shot of a crane carrying Günther's bullet-ridden body.

Although auteur Volker Schlöndorff would describe A Degree of Murder as being influenced by "American action movies of the thirties," albeit with "no great dramatic conflicts," the film is ultimately a multi-genre-convention-breaking work of intentionally lackluster celluloid hipsterdom, or as the director himself stated regarding his intent, "I was interested in the discontinuity. At first, there is a murder, then there's laughing again. The basic idea is the surprise assault against traditional biases. There no longer is a five-week mourning period." Indeed, like many early French New Wave flicks and the early films of Fassbinder, A Degree of Murder feels like a playful piece of cinephile diletantism directed by a then-semi-subversive auteur who had yet to become the Hollywoodized artisan that his later superlatively superficial and intolerably formulaic works would demonstrate. Although certainly no masterpiece, A Degree of Murder is easily one of Schlöndorff's most iconoclastic works, though Baal (1970) certainly goes a bit further in terms of cinematic experimentation and anarchistic themes. Aside from inspiring Fassbinder, A Degree of Murder—with its 'alienation nation' themes, crude counter-culture aesthetics, and deconstruction of the genre—would go on to inspire a number of German filmmakers, most notably Klaus Lemke (48 Stunden bis Acapulco aka 48 Hours to Acapulco, Paul) and Rudolf Thome's cult flicks Detektive (1969) and Rote Sonne (1970) aka Red Sun, as well as possibly Eckhart Schmidt's first feature Jet Generation - Wie Mädchen heute Männer lieben (1968), which was released the same year. In its damning depiction of everyday Germans throwing the corpses of their loved ones away as if they were rancid maggot-infested trash, A Degree of Murder also brings to mind lone-wolf auteur Roland Klick's early masterpiece aka Bübchen (1968) aka Der kleine Vampir aka The Little Vampire. Of course, A Degree of Murder would also sire a much more famous and superior British brother film entitled Performance (1970) co-directed by Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg which, on top of featuring Anita Pallenberg as a wild and wanton woman who manipulates men with her flesh, also features members of the Rolling Stones, albeit this time Mick Jagger (who was apparently screwing Keith Richard's girlfriend Pallenberg at the time, thus aborting what was originally suppose to be a soundtrack by all the members of The Rolling Stones). While I would argue that Performance is the ultimate counter-culture flick and a cinematic masterpiece of sorts, A Degree of Murder is more of a nice little celluloid novelty and footnote of German cinema history, though I must admit that I much preferred Brian Jones' score to the one created by Jagger from Cammell's dark masterpiece.

In an interview with director Volker Schlöndorff, the filmmaker described his collaboration with Brian Jones on A Degree of Murder as follows: "When the editing was done, Brian came back to Munich and sat in the editing room with me as we discussed, just as with any other professional movie composer, where to put music and what kind of music. It was just the true story of a girl who accidentally kills her boyfriend with his own gun, but instead of going to the police she hires two men for a few hundred marks to drive the corpse to the country where they bury him in the construction site of an autobahn. No moral implications, no guilt trips. It's more like an outing on a beautiful autumn day. Brian's score then was to provide a reflection of those rather callous feelings, while somehow managing to hint that of course she was mourning her boyfriend's death." Indeed, Jones' score is undoubtedly one of the film's greatest attributes as a combination of jubilant and upbeat instrumental jingles with a tinge of melancholy and dissonance thrown in good for measure, thus being quite reflective of its warped zeitgeist where peace and free love lingered on the outside but with a dark rotting heart at the center of things. A postmodern pastiche piece in the counter-culture spirit featuring Hitchcock's dark humor (especially Rope (1948) and The Trouble with Harry (1955)), French Nouvelle Vague-inspired nods to Hollywood film noir/crime flicks, aesthetic and thematic influences from Michelangelo Antonioni's Blow-Up (1966), and small elements of the anti-Heimat films that would become trendy during the late-1960s/early-1970s (with director Schlöndorff directing a couple of these films, with the most ambitious being Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach (1971) aka The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach), A Degree of Murder was certainly upon its release, “in every respect the youngest of all Young German cinema films,” as it was once described by a film critic. Essentially one big mockery of counter-culture crud that was ironically made for said counter-culture crud, A Degree of Murder depicts a nation in the early stage of being on the brink of a cultural civil war, with the 68er-Bewegung student movement and later far-left groups like the Baader-Meinhof Gang appearing after the film was released. Indeed, director Volker Schlöndorff may be a misguided leftist idealist but A Degree of Murder demonstrates that he understood the German youth of his age were morally retarded nincompoops who would nihilistically kill and gladly follow stupid chicks with nice tits to slaughterhouses.

Volker Schlöndorff (1970)

I have never been much of a Volker Schlöndorff (The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum, The Handmaid's Tale) fan nor his mostly superficial and obscenely sentimental quasi-communist consumer-g geared films, but one of his films, Baal (1970)—a modern reworking of kraut commie Bertolt Brecht's 1923 play of the same name set in late-1960s Munich and starring a rather young leather-clad Rainer Werner Fassbinder as the eponymous antihero—has been at the top of my mental list of most-wanted films for some time. Rather unfortunately, Baal had been out of circulation for over 40 years because Bertolt Brecht's kosher cunt of a widow Helene Weigel, who owned the rights to her dead shegetz hubby's work, found Fassbinder's performance "dreadful" and had the film immediately banned. In fact, Weigel had the gall to state of Fassbinder's performance, "If he thinks that a leather jacket and a cigarette dangling from the corner of his mouth makes him like Brecht...!", as if her bolshy beau Bert was some sort of handsome rebel as opposed to an archetypical pencil-necked, four-eyed Dinaric dork. Indeed, catching the premiere of Baal when it was screened for the first (and ultimately last) time on April 21, 1970 on West German television, Weigel wasted no time in calling the proper authorities on the very same night and used her legal authority to have the film stashed away in a vault indefinitely, as if the film had been adapted by naughty National Socialist Veit Harlan. While Weigel dropped dead the next year, it would not be until her daughter Barbara Schall-Brecht, who took over the rights to father's work, came to the conclusion that Fassbinder is probably now more popular than her father and sent an e-mail to Juliane Lorenz—head of the Fassbinder's Foundation—in 2011 reading, "The reputation of W. Fassbinder is indeed very big. I would now allow the film to be released on DVD." Flash forward to March 2014 and Baal—the virtual 'Holy Grail of German New Cinema'—has finally been released to the general public, at least in Germany. Created when Fassbinder was only 24 and his first feature-length film Love Is Colder Than Death (1969) had just received a less than outstanding ovation at the Berlinale (sneering audience members accused Fassbinder and star Ulli Lommel of being "dilettantes") Baal is, at least in my less than humble opinion, a true lost masterpiece and quite arguably the greatest and most artistically ambitious film Herr Schlöndorff ever directed. Indeed, shot for television on a meager budget of 160,000 German marks (which was less than half of what was typically spent on TV productions back then), Baal is a visceral vice-ridden piece of decidedly decadent avant-garde delirium where Brecht meets counter-culture meets anti-Heimat that demonstrates for once and all that Schlöndorff has more artistic integrity than most of his post-The Tin Drum (1969) works would indicate. A sort of artistic rebellion on Schlöndorff's part, or as he described in Fassbinder's memorial essay It Doesn't Pay To Be Nice: "I had just failed in MICHAEL KOHLHAAS with a large American production and wanted out of the structures of the movie industry. In protest, I filmed Baal with a 16mm handheld camera, almost entirely with nonprofessionals, without well-known actors," Baal is a wildly poetic and even wicked work that manages to capture everything that was 'great' about the counter-culture generation, namely its supposed individualism and dedication to artistic experimentation. Starring Fassbinder as the eponymous lead in a role based on a play that his Danish filmmaker friend Christian Braad Thomsen summed up as being as follows, "Brecht's portrait... is an astonishingly accurate picture of Fassbinder. Baal is a celebrated poet who does not feel at ease in polite society. He's a loner, a wandering troubadour who prefers bars and the open sky to literary salons. He is strangely attractive to both men and women, who commit suicide because of him. His honesty can be brutal and cold and yet people like his company," Baal is an eerily prophetic work featuring the Teutonic wunderkind in a pre-fame performance as a sort of demonic dandy (hence the title of the film!) who, like the actor/auteur himself, died a lonely death that was nothing if not inevitable.

A late-expressionist work heavily influenced by the proto-Romantic Teutonic Sturm und Drang literary tradition, Brecht's Baal (which was written in 1918 but did not make its theatrical debut until 1923) is notable for not only being the playwright's first feature-length play but also a work created before the communist theatre practitioner developed the dramaturgical techniques of epic theatre that he is best known for, thus ultimately making for a more apolitical and intriguing work. Of course, Schlöndorff's Baal is innately political as a penetrating piece of thematically and aesthetically subversive counter-culture iconoclasm that features everything from a mockery of Warhol's Campbell's soup cans and proto-Nazisploitation elements (in one scene a topless stripper dances on stage while wearing a Nazi officer's hat), but luckily it does not resort to the sentimental Hollywoodized leftist celluloid twaddle that would plague most of the director's subsequent films. Shot by the director on a handheld 16mm camera with a foggy Maddin-esque lens (thus giving the film an ethereal and even otherworldly feel), Baal looks like no other Schlöndorff film that I have ever seen, as an avant-garde work with an ideally idiosyncratic aesthetic that falls somewhere between Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964), Dennis Hopper's Easy Rider (1969), and Fassbinder's very own Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980). Despite Schlöndorff's surprisingly raw and striking direction, Fassbinder is undoubtedly the 'secondary auteur' of Baal, as his absurdist Artaudian acting antics are just as an important ingredient as the spacey camera work and quasi-oneiric tableaux.

Beginning with Fassbinder as Baal strolling down a dirt trail with a sort of discernible defiant swag that tells you he does not give a shit about anyone as a The Doors-esque psychedelic rock song composed by Klaus Doldinger (Das Boot, The Neverending Story) with lyrics like, "To the bloated vultures Baal squints up, as they circle high above a corpse called Baal, sometimes Baal plays dead, vultures land to eat, Baal dines in silence on vulture meat” plays triumphantly in the background, Baal immediately lets the viewer know they are in store for unadulterated kraut counter-counter angst and anarchy. Baal is a born anarchist and sexual outlaw who proudly proclaims the following personal Weltanschauung, “You have to let out the beast, let him out into the sunlight.” In a scene that looks sort of like it could have been taken from Stanley Kubrick’s A Clockwork Orange (1971), Baal goes to a bourgeois party at an art salon in tribute to his poetry, but he has nil interest in being published and is just there to eat the fine cuisine, even telling admirers that he lives on ‘64 Sewer Street’ (he actually lives in an ancient attic that looks like something out of a Slavic horror film) and couldn’t care less about being published. With kitschy modern art in the form of an Adolf Hitler stamp collage and crappy Warhol-esque Campbell’s soup can paintings on the wall, Baal is not exactly digging the vibe of the place and when a rather rotund gentleman (Walter Sedlmayr) patronizingly remarks, “Ladies and gentlemen, I admit I am shocked to find such a man living in such modest circumstances. I discovered this maestro as an employee in my office. I’m not scared to say it’s a scandal for our town, to have such luminaries working for a daily wage.” After being told by some young dork that his poetry is ‘Homeric’ and that he is a “precursor of the European poetry messiah,” Baal proceeds to hit on a chick named Emilie (Miriam Spoerri), who also happens to be the wife of Mech (Günther Neutze), the owner of the art salon and the man who planned to publish the impoverished poet’s work. Needless to say Baal ruins his chances of getting published, but as tells the character played by Sedlmayr, “I can’t help it if you ply me with wine. Must I swallow your nonsense so I can fill my belly?” and at least Emilie comes to see him later that night at his favorite seedy bar where he reads degenerate scatological poetry to truckers. Indeed, with a certain deranged glee, Baal reads the following grotesque lines to his prole follows: “Orge said to me the dearest place on Earth for him was always the latrine. A place where one is content with stars above, and dung below. A place of humility, where you realize that you’re just a man who can’t keep anything. There you recognize what you are, a man who’s munching on the latrine.” A born sadist who worships sexual deviance, Baal tortures Emilie by forcing her to kiss a Negro trucker (played by Günther Kaufmann, whom Fassbinder first met on the set of Baal and with whom he soon started a torrid one-sided romance) and when his young friend Johannes (Marian Seidowsky) brings his 17-year-old virgin girlfriend Johanna (Irmgard Paulis) to the bar, the poet begins persecuting the unsuspecting young girl. Naturally, being a proud defiler, Baal, who previously told his friend to not take away the virginity of his young girlfriend, steals Johanna from Johannes and deflowers the naïve young girl. The next day Baal learns from two chicks that he is about to have a threesome with that Johanna committed suicide by jumping into a river. Not one to cry over spilt milk, Baal soon acquires a new sex object named Sophie (Margarethe von Trotta) who he actually professes his love to and soon impregnates. Of course, being a debauched bisexual, Baal eventually throws her away for a man.

Reasonably impoverished, Baal ironically begins working as a woodcutter, going from a man whose words could have been printed on paper derived from the very same wood he cuts down had he not intentionally burned all his bridges and screwed up his publishing deal with Mech. One day while reasonably drunk on Schnapps (which is the dipsomaniac antihero's drug of choice) and a nasty dose of narcissism, Baal rather rudely plays with the corpse of a man named Teddy who was killed after a tree ostensibly fell on him, though the other woodcutters have their suspicions and the pernicious poet is soon out of his job. Now joined by his Jesus-like comrade Ekart (played by Sigi Graue, who previously starred in films directed by Kluge and Syberberg), Baal ditches pregnant Sophie, who is still in love with the sadistic scribbler despite his physically and emotionally abusive behavior against her. Ekart offers to help Sophie, but Baal ultimately rules, thus leaving the little lady in the lurch. Like two drunk pervert prophets, Ekart and Baal, who are a sort of a Teutonic Rimbaud and Verlaine, roam the countryside, with the latter eventually raping the girlfriend (played by Werner Schroeter superstar Carla Egerer). Later, when Baal and Ekart go back to their favorite bar where Sophie now works as a waitress, things take a terribly tragic turn for the worst. After catching Ekart and Sophie kissing, Baal attacks his comrade as he declares his quasi-homoerotic love (with Ekart proclaiming, "am I not your lover?"). Needless to say, jealous Baal kills Ekart by cowardly stabbing him in the gut just before Sophie attempts to break the two men apart. A fugitive murderer with his best friend's blood covering his clothes, Baal once again heads to the woods where he falls ill from what seems to be a metaphysical affliction. While dying a dubious and pathetic death, Baal is mocked by the prole woodcutters he once worked with. When the woodcutters find Baal's corpse in a bush outside, one states, "Gone to the dogs. That's really something. Going out to die like that. Hats off!" in a scene of pure tragicomedy.

In his Fassbinder memorial essay It Doesn't Pay to Be Nice, Volker Schlöndorff wrote regarding the star of Baal: "It isn't easy for me to write about RWF, because he always was a challenge to me. Even physically. I eat and drink in moderation, never took drugs, and before writing this, I climbed over the fence of a sports field to run my 4000 meters. We could not have been more different from one another." Indeed, while watching Baal, you can easily see that Fassbinder's domineering attitude and brazen persona have hijacked Herr Schlöndorff's production. Ironically, despite Fassbinder's clear physical and spiritual dominance over Baal, the actor/director partly agreed to star in the film as a means to learn how to direct, as well as to teach the members of his Anti-Theater (antiteater) to learn how to work on a film set, or as Schlöndorff wrote: "Almost all the supporting parts were played by people of his group. I took over his cameraman, Dietrich Lohmann, and even a few members of his crew. He wanted to turn them into professionals and asked me to hire them. As paid help, so to speak. Now I understood much better what he had in mind, for most of them didn't have a clue, not about acting or about filmmaking." Although Fassbinder would later have a small role in Schlöndorff's made-for-TV anti-Heimat film Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach (1971) aka The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach, the two would not work together again until nearly ten years later when they both collaborated on the omnibus film Deutschland im Herbst (1978) aka Germany in Autumn, with the elder director stating of his experience working with real-life Baal on the terrorism-themed film: "Together with Margarethe, I had been the one who had visited prisons, joined Red Help and committees on solitary confinement, etc. But it was he who felt persecuted and acted it out in the movie. At the time, I found this rather unpolitical and egocentric. Later I understood that having spent ten years living on the edge of German law, he knew more about persecution and antisocial behavior in the sense of Genet than I did with my highly respectable protest attitude." Indeed, despite the ostensibly 'edgy' and 'revolutionary' nature of most of Schlöndorff's German films, I have always found most of them rather tame, conspicuously contrived, and calculatingly formulaic, hence why he went on to work in Hollywood. As a hopeless hater of dork Bolshevik Brecht and a sometimes detractor of Schlöndorff, I can say without the slightest bit of hesitation that I think Baal is a lost masterpiece that is actually deserving of its reputation, but I must admit that I think Fassbinder is owed the greatest debt in terms of the spirit and overall integrity of the work. A film that makes the perfect double feature along with Kamikaze 1989 (1982), which featured the auteur in his last screen appearance in which he put on more than a little bit of weight, Baal is a sort of announcement of Fassbinder's belligerent blitzkrieg-like arrival in the cinema world and just like the eponymous antihero, the filmmaker would leave this world just as abruptly as he arrived, but not without leaving a couple bodies behind (to Fassbinder's credit, while Baal only inspired one suicide, he inspired at least two). Featuring countless highly quotable lines like, "Jesus loved evil" and "I see the world in a mild light. It is the excrement of dear God," as spoken by Fassbinder's girlish lips, Baal is Brecht with an actual soul, which is certainly no small achievement. Indeed, compare Fassbinder's performance to that of David Bowie in Alan Clarke's BBC-produced Baal (1982) and you will witness the difference between visceral untamed genius and carefully choreographed neo-dandy dilettantism. While Fassbinder might be long dead, the world is just catching up with his work and there is probably no better introduction to the auteur's marvelous and seductive, if not unflattering, persona than in Baal—the greatest film you have never seen and easily one of the most important works of German New Cinema.

THE SUDDEN WEALTH OF THE POOR PEOPLE OF KOMBACH

Volker Schlöndorff (1971)

In his revolutionary cineaste book Film as a Subversive Art (1974), American film critic Amos Vogel wrote regarding West German auteur Volker Schlöndorff's subversive TV Movie The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach (1971) aka Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach, "An excellent example of a particularly interesting new genre of young German cinema; bizarre, deadly serious variations on the reactionary German "Heimat" films of yore – those insufferable, sentimental "kitsch" prosodies to Fatherland, Soil, and Family. This fully realized work effectively upsets this tradition by recounting a tale of oppressed 19th-century German peasants who become rebels against the state out of poverty, revealing (instead of romanticizing) the brutal degradation of German rural life at the time. Particularly audacious is the presence of an itinerant Jew peddler as mastermind (!) of the conspiracy, predictably leading to (unfounded) charges of anti-semitism against a young director who has dared to reintroduce the Jew into German dramaturgy." Indeed, being a Viennese-born Jew himself who got the hell of Austria after the Nazi Anschluss in 1938, Vogel most certainly had a special sensitivity regarding all things Jewish and German and his remark about the nationalistic Heimat film speaks loud and clear regarding his feelings toward Teutonic unity, so it should be no surprise that the films of Volker Schlöndorff (Young Törless, The Tin Drum)—an ethno-masochistic kraut and flagrant Francophile who has spent a good portion of his filmmaking career promoting feminism and far-left politics, as well as cinematically denigrating his own nation and people—would catch his fancy. Following in the anti-Heimat trend popular among West German far-leftist filmmakers, which began with Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdszenen aus Niederbayern directed by Peter Fleischmann and including works like Nachtschatten (1972) aka Nightshade directed by Niklaus Schilling and Heart of Glass (1976) aka Herz aus Glas directed by Werner Herzog, The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach essentially demystifies German history from a materialistic quasi-Marxist angle, depicting nineteenth-century Teutonic peasant life as innately miserable, hard work as evil (a false assumption undoubtedly inspired by Marx's Jewish background as recognized by Oswald Spengler), and government and the state as being ruled by slave-driving proto-fascist sadists. Starring a number of important auteur filmmakers of German New Cinema, including Rainer Werner Fassbinder (The Marriage of Maria Braun, Querelle), Margarethe von Trotta (Rosa Luxemburg, Hannah Arendt), Reinhard Hauff (Knife in the Head, Stammheim - Die Baader-Meinhof-Gruppe vor Gericht), The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach features an outmoded stoner-inspired Krautrock-like score, whiny men with horrendous hippie haircuts, and a cookie-cutter 68er-Bewegung message that was certainly made to appeal to even the most braindead of drug-addled degenerates belonging to the kraut counter-culture movement. The story of a junk-peddling Jew of the proto-Bolshevik variety who concocts a clever criminal conspiracy to rob a government carriage containing tax money in the forests of the Hessian hinterland and convinces a bunch of uneducated German peasant farmers, laborers, and soldiers to help him do the majority of the dirty work as any sensible chosenite would, The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach is a sort of allegorical Trotskyite fairytale loosely based on a true story that ends in tragedy where the Germans ultimately die by the sword due to their affinity for Teutonic land and incapacity for deracinating themselves, but the rootless cosmopolitan Judaic manages to get away scot-free and make his way to America.

It is Fall 1821 and while cutting the grass for some rich portly fellow and minding his own business, blond Aryan superman Jacob Geiz (Karl-Josef Cramer) is approached by a religious Jewish peddler named David Briel (Wolfgang Bächler) who calculatedly states, "Jacob, I know a way to help both of us if we can get some trusty people" and, like the devil himself, tells him of his criminal plot to rob a carriage carrying tax money through the Hessian forests. Jacob agrees and gets his farmer father Hans-Jacob (Georg Lehn), brother Heinrich (far-left filmmaker Reinhard Hauff), farmer friend Johannes Soldan (Harald Müller), as well as two laborers Ludwig Acker (Harry Owen) and Jošt Wege and a soldier to join the outfit. While all men are poor and need the money, especially due to a rise in taxes, many of them have their own personal reasons for joining. For example, Heinrich Geiz had a baby out of wedlock with a gal named Sophie (Margarethe von Trotta), but cannot afford to pay for a wedding and the soldier is in a similar boat. The Geiz family is also more broke than usual due to a bad season for crops. As narrated by an off-screen Marxist-trained female narrator, the peasants "kept ignorant throughout the centuries, and they were unable to see the cause of their misery. Only emigration to the New World, poaching, or treasure hunting were seen as a way out of poverty," and sophisticated Semite David Briel gives them hope by reading them a letter from a Jewish friend in America that absurdly reads, "America is the land of milk and honey. The cows are grazing on evergreen meadows. You find honey in hollow trees. You can have as many cattle as you want. You don't have to get food from them, only in the winter. And the land is so good, you don't need any fertilizer. You can grow anything every year after plowing it up, that's enough. And it's not like in Germany where they take away what little you've got in taxes and whatnot. Here the farmer is his own master. We eat more meat than you eat bread, and drink coffee and wine like you drink water. Milwaukee, 1821." Of course, as time will tell, unlike the wandering Jew, the kraut proletarians have an innate incapacity from uprooting themselves from their land and immigrating to the lovely land of milk and honey.

The conspirators make their first attempt at robbing the tax carriage on Christmas night 1821, but the snow causes them to fail. The men fail/abort attempting to pull off the robbery a number of other times as well, including after coming to the realization that there is no money inside the carriage, after spotting too many soldiers guarding the carriage, and getting stuck in a thick mist that blinds their vision, etc. Eventually, everyone decides to abandon the master plan, but they decide to give it another retry and finally succeed, acting rather humanely in the process, making the mistake of sparing the lives of the soldiers and the man driving the carriage. Much more clever than his goy kraut criminal compatriots, David Briel warns the German peasants not to go around spending the money right away as it will look suspicious to the authorities being that poor men do not have money to purchase expensive things, poetically preaching, "How beautiful is the world. So they built a house, put in chairs and tables, and a kitchen with a fireplace where you can find coffee, milk and sugar and beautiful plates, and that's all of it for us! It's just like a fairytale. Just you beware. Think of the golden ass!", but they naturally do not take heed of the Hebrew's wise words. Heinrich has a large wedding with a grand feast, which makes everyone in Kombach suspicious. A Gestapo-esque judge named Richter Danz (Wilhelm Grasshoff) is brought in to solve the mystery of the tax carriage robbery and immediately assumes it was committed by peasants and puts a look out for any poor person spending big bucks. Danz also offers an award of 300 guilders to anyone who provides evidence leading to an arrest and after Jacob Geiz makes the inevitably fatal mistake of giving a couple coins to a starving elderly man, the old man pays back him back by immediately going to the judge for the award money and tattles on the young altruistic farmer. Eventually Jacob and his brother and father are arrested, but admit nothing to Danz. A perennial coward in the face of fear, Ludwig Acker soon turns himself in and confesses everything, thereupon incriminating all his comrades in the process. Before they can be tried and convicted, two of the men commit the unpardonable sin of suicide, one by hanging and the other by firearm. In order to end their lives with the last rites, repentant and in a state of grace, the men also confess where the bank robbery money is hidden, except for Heinrich, who fights with his brother and father, who attempt to get him to repent. Heinrich also physically assaults the judge during the trial after being sentenced to death while cowardly friends and family watch in an exceedingly impotent fashion. When his wife Sophie tries to get him to repent, Heinrich proclaims like a true Marxist martyr that he refuses to because, "That's how they break you." In the end, the men are executed by being decapitated via sword, but before he "dies like a man" (as indicated by the narrator), Heinrich states, "Like my life will be torn, so must you be torn," thereupon figuratively spitting in the faces of his executioners.

Out of all the characters featured in The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach, only Jewish conman David Briel gets away, concluding regarding the whole ordeal, "The money made me free. The farmers couldn't use the money because they only knew their land. When they touch the land, they know if it's good for potatoes or corn. But when they touch money, they don't know how to handle it. They can't show it, because a poor man with money is suspect. And a farmer can't go to another place, because his land won't follow him and he fears what he doesn't know. But I am free. I have no home or land to hold me. I got where I want to go. The New World is waiting for me. New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Mississippi, New Orleans, Florida, Buffalo, Arizona, Ohio, Texas, Arkansas..." Undoubtedly, judging by the character of David Briel, it would not be a stretch to conclude that Volker Schlöndorff is a groveling philo-Semite who seems to believe that Jews make the ultimate political revolutionaries due to their innate rootlessness and lack of attachment to German soil and culture, which is at least one thing I can agree with him on. Of course, it is easy to see why some critics found Schlöndorff and his work The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach to be anti-Semitic as the film essentially makes the same argument as the Nazis regarding the subversive/criminal nature of Jews and their treachery towards host nations, the difference being that the director respects them for this as opposed to hating them. As Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who ironically has a cameo in The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach, once infamously stated, "philosemitism is anti-Semites who loves Jews," which can certainly be said of Volker Schlöndorff and his ex-wife Margarethe von Trotta, whose works Rosa Luxemburg (1986), Rosenstrasse (2003), and Hannah Arendt (2012) are easily some of the most shabby goy-esque cinematic works ever made.

As mentioned in The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach, about 1/10 of the Hessian population left Germany in the nineteenth-century, a good percentage of which immigrated to the United States and shed their Teutonic identities forever. In fact, despite not being common knowledge, according to 2009 census studies, 50 million Americans (17.1% of the American population), myself included, are of German extraction, thus making them the largest ancestry group in the country, even ahead of the Scots-Irish. The fact that despite being the majority population, German Americans have fully assimilated into America and have all but totally disappeared in the white population just goes to show the deracinating power of the United States, thus one can argue that there is something distinctly Jewish about America, which is hinted at in The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach and is further supported by the fact that America has the largest Hebraic population in the world and is the largest supporter of Israel. Of course, America is essentially a cultureless and materialistic nation with a mostly peasant collective. With The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach, director Volker Schlöndorff, who undoubtedly has a materialistic Marxist view of history, reduces nationhood and religion to nothing more than slavery, presenting it as a sort of figurative ball-and-chain, completely ignoring the beauty of blood and soil, but also culture and tradition.

In fact, The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Korbach depicts religious people as moronic and superstitious untermensch, on top of portraying peasants as savage wife-beaters and rapists. Of course, America has never produced a Martin Luther, Goethe, Nietzsche, Beethoven, Murnau, or even Herzog, as such a mongrelized 'multicultural' country lacks organic culture material to sire such greatness. As the Great Sicilian Baron Julius Evola once write, "America ... has created a 'civilization' that represents an exact contradiction of the ancient European tradition. It has introduced the religion of praxis and productivity; it has put the quest for profit, great industrial production, and mechanical, visible, and quantitative achievements over any other interest. It has generated a soulless greatness of a purely technological and collective nature, lacking any background of transcendence, inner light, and true spirituality. America has [built a society where] man becomes a mere instrument of production and material productivity within a conformist social conglomerate." Taking the magical Baron's quote into consideration, the greatest irony regarding Volker Schlöndorff and his film-making career is that, despite his worship of materialism and lifelong cinematic denigration of his German Fatherland, he could never have made a film like The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Korbach outside of Europe. Maybe it's my partial peasant blood talking, but it is also very doubtful that a peasant would direct a film like The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Korbach where their entire existence is reduced to miserable serfdom. After all, it is usually members of the bourgeois like Karl Marx himself, who never worked a single day in his life, that treats work as an unholy sin. A sort of insipidly idealistic 'red Robin Hood and his less than Merry Marxist Men' in the bleeding heart anti-Heimat vein, The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Korbach is undoubtedly well crafted and even engrossing, if not for all the wrong reasons as a work that incriminates the Jew in its flagrant philo-Semitism, thus making it interesting to rightists as well as leftists. If one learns anything from The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Korbach, it is that following the lead of a subversive Hebrew might lead to your destruction.

Volker Schlöndorff (1972)

In 1970, German auteur Volker Schlöndorff (Young Törless, The Tin Drum) directed would-be-actress Margarethe von Trotta in his masterful Baal adaptation starring Rainer Werner Fassbinder and a year later he would marry her, thus ultimately cuckolding himself as both a man and a filmmaker. Indeed, after the auteur directed his made-for-TV spaghetti western inspired anti-Heimat film The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach (1970), virtually all of his films from then on until the mid-1970s revolved around his wife, with their last major work together being the pro-bolshevik period piece Coup de Grâce (1976). By giving von Trotta the opportunity to co-direct The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum (1975), which was the first big mainstream hit for both the directors and German New Cinema in general, Schlöndorff enabled his wife to establish herself as a filmmaker, thus she, as a proud feminist, no longer needed her hubby to further her career. Out of all the films the two collaborated on together, none better epitomizes Schlöndorff's innate emasculation and artistic cuckoldry than A Free Woman (1972) aka Strohfeuer aka Summer Lightning, which is quite ironic considering it is one of the director's most unconventional and least literary oriented works. Co-written by and starring von Trotta in a semi-autobiographical work loosely based on the ugly aftermath of her first failed marriage, A Free Woman is a hopelessly bourgeois feminist flick that might as well have been directed by the star herself as it resembles her early mundane melodramas. Luckily, due to her reasonably good looks and seemingly authentic portrayal of a disgruntled dame, A Free Woman does not reach the intolerable level of 'broad power' banality that plagues most of the actress-turned-director's works. Of course, the film also seems less phony and ethno-masochistic because, unlike films like Rosa Luxemburg (1986), Rosenstrasse (2003), and Hannah Arendt (2012) where the director preposterously attempted to put herself in the Hebraic shoes of Jewesses, A Free Woman is a discernibly honest expression of von Trotta's vulnerability and not a dubious piece of heavy-handed humanistic posturing. Undoubtedly, the film will seem rather ridiculous to many modern viewers, as the prospect of a woman ending up on the losing side of divorce nowadays seems about as likely as the Congo turning into a world power or Ireland colonizing Europe. Shot in a naturalistic and sometimes even documentary-like style typical of early works by kraut feminist filmmakers like Helma Sanders-Brahms and Helke Sander, albeit minus most of the agitprop elements, A Free Woman is undoubtedly one of the most softcore feminist films ever made, thus making it an all-around less repugnant work that seems like it was created by semi-reasonable people. Indeed, if one were to compare all the problems von Trotta's character in the film faces to the reality of how the legal system favors women today; one would think the feminist dream has been fully realized. After all, how else could one explain how a director as consistently banal and vapid has gone on to become one of the most famous directors in Germany, as well as one of the most revered female auteur filmmakers in the entire world, yet one of the major themes of A Free Woman is how artistic institutions are purportedly male-dominated.

As demonstrated by the fact that she peddles to divorce court on a bicycle while wearing high heels and ultimately arrives late as a result, Elisabeth Junker (Margarethe von Trotta) does not exactly make the most sensible of decisions. As she admits herself, Elisabeth's first mistake was marrying when she was far too young. While testifying in court, she confesses that her divorce from her husband Hans-Helmut (Friedhelm Ptok) was solely of her own free will and has nothing to do with abuse or anything of that sort. In fact, while pregnant with her son Niki, Elisabeth temporarily left her husband and began sleeping and living with a swarthy hippie musician named Wolfgang, thus demonstrating Hans-Helmut's humiliating long-standing cuckoldry. Despite everything, Hans-Helmut is still in love with Elisabeth and even after they have officially divorced, he still tries in vain to get her back. Educated as a foreign language correspondence clerk, Elisabeth has not worked since she has been married and basically has to start from scratch in terms of a career. Immediately after her divorce trial, she buys a red wig as a sort of symbolic act of her 'new life' as an ostensibly free woman and begins dating a fairly nice, handsome, and charming red-haired chap named Oskar (Martin Lüttge) who looks like an Aryan lumberjack and makes a reasonably decent living as a civil engineer, yet she suffers from nausea and random barf attacks due to various anxieties, namely relating to the custody of her young son. Elisabeth also suffers the wraith of her mother, who is mad that her daughter made the decision to get a divorce for seemingly no reason. Not exactly the most puritanical of mothers, Elisabeth has no problem talking about sex arguing with her ex-husband, who blames her for ruining his writing career (indeed, before marrying her, he aspired to be a great novelist, but now he is a mere editor), in front of her preschooler son. Due to her lack of experience and dubious work history, Elisabeth first attempts to be a tourist guide for Japanese businessmen but she is not cutout for it and does not like taking photos with strange Jap dudes, so she is forced to take a lowly job as an entry level sales associate at a fancy fur shop run by an annoying queen of a fellow (played by gay Bavarian character actor Walter Sedlmayr, who was violently murdered by two half-brothers in 1990) where she befriends a young homo who writes pornographic stories (a sample of his writing reads as follows: "Now the vagina raped through the gates of hell and primly spread its handle-ends") and has a nasty fur fetish, hence his choice of employment. Meanwhile, Elisabeth takes singing and dancing lessons, as she dreams of starring in a Hollywood musical. In a bizarre black-and-white dream-sequence that is quite unbecoming for a Schlöndorff film that resembles the Swinging Sixties aesthetic meets an Italian Giallo flick (minus the murder, of course), Elisabeth sings the following childish lyrics while a literally colorful troupe of multicultural female shoppers dances around her: “Man is man. But woman is not woman. Woman is vamp. Or she is a house wife. Woman is bed bunny. Or she is a rascal. If she’s elegant, then she’s called lady. [...] A woman is never a woman. Only man is man. I don’t want to be a vamp. And certainly no Cinderella. Neither a bed bunny nor a rascal. And a lady I don’t want to be either. I just want to be a woman such as a man can be a man. I just want to be woman.”

While she does not seem to have that great of a relationship with her son, Elisabeth stresses a lot over the fact that Niki lives with her ex-husband. When she discovers a loophole in the law that prevents a man from taking custody of a child that is not biologically his, Elisabeth attempts to talk her ex-boyfriend into lying by making a declaration upon oath that Niki is his son, thus demonstrating her complete and utter lack of morality, as if she is a psychopathic child who will go to any unsavory extreme to get whatever she wants. Meanwhile, Elisabeth and her overweight friend begin frequenting Alte Pinakothek art museum in Munich where they receive free lessons from a rather rotund Leninist feminist art historian (played by real-life Marxist art historian Konrad Farner, who once defended kraut commie playwright Bertolt Brecht due to his support of Stalin) about the historically misogynistic character of western art. For example, Farner uses a late Gothic masterpiece by Masolini of baby Jesus and Mother Mary to prove that “woman is basically a nothing” and that “she has to always remain in the house,” as well as a work by Flemish master Rogier van der Weyden of a woman breastfeeding to prove the ‘passivity in extension’ that women have supposedly suffered under European Christendom. Additionally, Farner shows the women an eponymous 1752 painting by François Boucher of Louis XV of France’s young mistress/baby-momma Marie-Louise O’Murphy and when Elisabeth remarks the subject of the painting, who is totally unclad with her derriere being the most prominent aspect of the painting, has a “dull-witted face,” the art historian replies, “Yes, one could say her face doesn’t really look intelligent, but her bottom was famous. They envied Ludwig XV for this bottom. And all of Paris admired it in the parlor,” thus highlighting the singular semi-cryptic power that women, even of the proletarian pussy-peddling sort, have always wielded over men. Somewhat hilariously, Farner trashes a print created by degenerate French feminist modern artist Niki de Saint Phalle (who once co-directed the film Daddy (1973) with Peter Whitehead where she demonstrated her hateful, if not insanely incestuous, feelings for her father) by describing it as a parody of female emancipation. With the help of her ex-husband, Elisabeth manages to get a new job that she actually somewhat enjoys working as a translator at an art gallery. When she goes on a trip with an overweight art dealer named Schmollinger (Austrian-born actor/director Georg Marischka) who, being brainwashed by the whacked writings of Jewish psychoanalyst Wilhelm Reich, believes he has the god-given right screw any and every woman he wants to despite being married, Elisabeth faces unwanted sexual advances from the foul fat fellow. On top of her career looking brighter, Elisabeth is also treated to a romantic vacation to Italy from her boyfriend Oskar, whose undying love for her is unquestionable. Ultimately, Elisabeth's ex-husband uses the fact that she is constantly away on trips for work (not to mention the fact she confessed to the law that she was living and sleeping with another man when she was pregnant) as a means to take custody of Niki. To further add salt to Elisabeth's internal wounds, Hans-Helmut is also getting remarried to a kindergarten teacher who the social workers in charge of their case see as an ideal stepmother. In the end, Elisabeth gets married to Oskar, though whether or not the marriage is successful is dubious at best. After all, Schlöndorff and von Trotta's marriage did not last.

Ironically, while auteur Volker Schlöndorff was such an empathetic (aka cuckolded) husband that he directed an entire film dedicated to his wife's pain and struggles during divorce, Margarethe von Trotta would also divorce him a little less than two decades after A Free Woman was released. Keeping that in mind, one can only assume that it is probably a film the filmmaker regrets directing, though, I for one, would not mind seeing a sequel, as it would give Schlöndorff the opportunity to direct an artistically authentic work that does not seem like another mere phony literary adaptation like most of his films, especially the more recent ones. The virtual kraut Brechtian feminist equivalent to Kramer vs. Kramer (1979), albeit vaguely more tolerable since von Trotta was more aesthetically pleasing than Meryl Streep was at the time, A Free Woman is also, quite strangely, Schlöndorff's closest attempt at directing a Bergman-esque work, which largely has to do with the fact that the film was shot by Swedish master cinematographer Sven Nykvist. It should also be noted that not all the feminists were satisfied with the film, with Hebraic journalist/film critic Marjorie Rosen (author of Popcorn Venus: Women, Movies, & the American Dream) complaining regarding protagonist Elisabeth's decision to get married again at the end of the film: "by marrying again she makes a peculiar trade—surrendering her independence, her most precious freedom, out of disproportionate concern for friends' momentary discomfort. This suggests that her passivity is simply due to ambivalence, or that at bottom she never wanted the burden of freedom in the first place," as if marriage does not afford many women a rare form of freedom totally unknown to most men where they do not have to waste their greatest years slaving away at a soul-sucking job, among countless other benefits. As for von Trotta's consistent failure with marriage, it probably has to do with the fact that her painter father Alfred Roloff never married her mother (whose aristocratic surname she adopted), thus giving her an 'unconventional' perspective on male-female companionship and marriage. Indeed, as Hans Bernhard Moeller and George L. Lellis wrote in their book Volker Schlöndorff's Cinema: Adaptation, Politics, and the "Movie-Appropriate" (2002) regarding the lessons commie feminist art historian Konrad Farnert gives Elisabeth in A Free Woman: “The art historian suggests, perhaps, von Trotta’s own father, who was a painter. Indeed, at one point Elisabeth affectionately tells him that she would love to have had a father like him (a statement that takes on added resonance if one is aware that von Trotta’s father never married her mother).” In my mind, von Trotta’s adoption of feminism as a lifelong Weltanschauung and her propensity for getting involved with failed marriages with weak men seems to mostly have to do with the fact that she had a negligent father and not because of some sort of all-powerful institutional patriarchy. In other words, it is not powerful men that made the filmmaker resent men, but feeble fellows who failed to live up to their responsibilities as both husbands and fathers. Indeed, aside from some lady lemmings who go to college and get brainwashed by some dyke professor with a bone to pick with men, how many women who are satisfied with their boyfriends/husbands actually end up becoming frigid feminists?! Indeed, as Otto Weininger theorized well over a century ago, feminism and so-called female emancipation has more to do with societal decadence, male emasculation, and the feminization of the workforce (i.e. office work) than any sort of phantom patriarchy. After all, the naughty Nazi government, which put a premium on having a collective father figure known as the Führer rule over the Fatherland, did not prevent Leni Riefenstahl from becoming the greatest female filmmaker who has ever lived, as a woman whose literal artistic adventures make the von Trottas and Valie Export of the world seem like bitter bourgeois housewives by comparison.

THE LOST HONOR OF KATHARINA BLUM

Volker Schlöndorff (1975)

Being a child of his time, German auteur Volker Schlöndorff (Baal, The Tin Drum) was more or less a supporter of far-left German terrorist groups and felt that West Germans were living under a sort of kraut McCarthyism and were plagued by American “Konsumterror,” which the director would go to great pains to depict in his hit Hollywood-like agitprop flick The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum, or: How Violence Develops and Where it Can Lead (1975) aka Die verlorene Ehre der Katharina Blum oder: Wie Gewalt entstehen und wohin sie führen kann. Co-directed/co-written by Schlöndorff’s then-wife Margarethe von Trotta (Rosa Luxemburg, Rosenstrasse) and based on the 1974 anti-propaganda propaganda novel of the same name (a work that Schlöndorff once described as being, “not really a novel, almost like a pamphlet”) written by Nobel prize winner Heinrich Böll (an ex-Wehrmacht soldier who became a sort of father figure for the far-left 68er-Bewegung student movement), The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum is typically considered the first big hit/crossover flick of German New Cinema, thereupon demonstrating how many young Teutons sympathized with radical far-left terrorism during the 1970s. A sort of arthouse political crime thriller without the thrills and any serious discussion of politics, the film essentially follows a naïve, frigid, and even bitchy young broad whose life is turned upside down after she has a one-night stand with a supposedly violent bank-robbing terrorist and subsequently becomes the object of police and media scrutiny. Unlike Fassbinder’s two feature films on the same subject, Mother Küsters’ Trip to Heaven (1975) and The Third Generation (1970), The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum makes no attempts to criticize the terrorists themselves, but instead features a superlatively superficial and one-dimensional attack on the West German police and media, as well as the supposed patriarchy (indeed, virtually every male character in the film, aside from the terrorist, is depicted as a crypto-fascist pig). In fact, the film makes no attempts to pretend it is even remotely objective, as it concludes with the following disclaimer that was also featured at the beginning of Böll’s source novel: “The characters and action in this story are purely fictitious. Should the description of certain journalistic practices result in a resemblance to the practices of Bild-Zeitung, such resemblance is neither intentional, nor fortuitous, but unavoidable,” with Bild-Zeitung being a popular German tabloid newspaper comparable to the National Enquirer in terms of trashiness (but also USA Today in terms of circulation) that is notable for featuring photos of topless women. In a survey conducted in 1971 by the Allensbach Institute of Public Opinion, it was revealed that one out of every twenty West German citizens agreed that they would be willing to commit a major crime by harboring a far-left terrorist fugitive (i.e. Ulrike Meinhof, Gudrun Ensslin, etc.) for the night. In protestant northern Germany, the figure was even higher with one out of every ten citizens agreeing that they would hide a terrorist in their home, thus demonstrating the seemingly unbelievable amount of Germans who saw members of the Baader-Meinhof gang and related groups as heroes. In fact, in September 1976 auteur Schlöndorff was rightfully described as a “Baader-Meinhof-Sympathisant” in the Axel Springer (a sort of West German William Randolph Hearst, who owned Bild-Zeitung and was hated by the German left) flagship daily Die Welt, so it should be no surprise that when the director’s Böll adaptation was released, it was described by Die Welt film critic Hans Habe as follows: “Schlöndorff’s Katharina Blum-Film belongs to the most evil propaganda reels of the present. . . .A leftist Jew Süß.” Personally, I consider Habe’s remark an insult to Veit Harlan’s 1940 National Socialist melodrama, as The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum is not even remotely as nuanced or thoughtful as the Nazi propaganda flick (after all, unlike the cops/journalists in Schlöndorff’s film, Jew Süß at least has some likeable traits), but is instead, a mostly mindless neo-Bolshevik political thriller with vomit-worthy feminist overtones that acts as a virtual prototype for contemporary Hollywood political thrillers and action films, so it should be no surprise that the film was shot by German cinematographer Jošt Vacano (Total Recall, Starship Troopers).

It is February 5, 1975 and a military deserter turned terrorist named Ludwig Götten (Jürgen Prochnow of Das Boot (1981) and The English Patient (1996)) is on the run and being monitored 24/7 by the cops. While at her aunt Else Woltersheim’s (Regine Lutz) Mardi Gras party, a young divorced maid named Katharina Blum (played by Angela Winkler, who starred in a number of Schlöndorff and von Trotta’s films) meets and essentially falls in love with terrorist Ludwig at first sight. Needless to say, the two have a one-night stand and the next morning Katharina finds her apartment raided by the police, who are portrayed as a sort of moronic neo-Gestapo (one of the cops accidentally fires his weapon, which scares the shit out of the other cops). After her apartment is searched (they find “typically bourgeois literature” like shitty romance novels) and a female cop examines her naughty bits for potential hidden weapons, Katharina is taken into a police station for questioning where she faces the ‘brute’ verbal tactics of a superficially misogynistic anti-leftist cop named Kommissar Beizmenne (portrayed by perennial screen villain Mario Adorf). Like a naïve little girl who has just fallen in love for the first time, Katharina childishly refuses to talk to Beizmenne as if he is some sort of pestering stepfather she hates. A girl that is described as shy and introverted by his friends, Katharina is asked by Beizmenne why she, as someone with the nickname the “Nun,” would have a one-night stand with an outlaw terrorist, but she has no answers and demands that she be placed in a jail cell and, of course, the Kommissar is happy to oblige her. The first thing Katharina does upon entering the jail cell is cleaning what looks like feces and vomit off the toilet located in her little cage (this scene is totally pointless and seems to have been inserted in the film to ostensibly demonstrate how 'hellish' German prison cells are). Meanwhile, a superlatively sleazy 'right-wing' journalist named Werner Tötges (played by Dieter Laser of The Human Centipede (First Sequence) (2009) fame) swoops by Katharina's place with flowers and begins asking neighbors questions about the girl and soon learns that her father came back from WWII to die and her brother is in prison. From her employer Dr. Hubert Blorna (Heinz Bennent), it is revealed that Katharina is "stiff as a board" and is "too square and too shy" to allow someone to "pinch her ass." It is also revealed that her ex-husband divorced her on grounds of desertion. Personally, I cannot see why any self-respecting mensch would tolerate her mousy bitch bullshit.

When Katharina is released from prison, she begins receiving pseudo-misogynistic prank calls asking about her "pussy" and threatening letters are also left at her front door by anonymous neighbors. After being asked to meet with her minister, Father Urbanus (Walter Gontermann), at his church, Katharina soon realizes it is a trap setup by her old admirer/lover, Alois Sträubleder (Karl Heinz Vosgerau)—a wealthy industrialist that is well into his 50s—who offers to help her, but she is not interested in his help, as she is hiding something that she does not want him to find out. In fact, Sträubleder's only interest in helping Katharina is that he does not want his name connected to terrorism via Katharina, as he is a powerful man who cannot afford to have a bad reputation. When Svegnali-like yellow journalist Tötges sneaks into a hospital wearing doctor scrubs and bombards Katharina's terminally ill mother with sensitive questions about her daughter, it ultimately causes the old woman to drop dead from stress, with the grieving daughter later complaining to her mother's doctor regarding the press, "These people are murderers. All of them! It's their very business to rob innocent people of their honor, often to take their lives. Otherwise nobody would buy their papers." To make things worse, Katharina begins receiving tons of hate mail with messages like, "where Stalin didn't succeed, you won't either" and "commie's whore," thus inspiring rage in the young lady that provokes her to wreck her own apartment.

Meanwhile, Alois Sträubleder confides in Dr. Blorna, who also happens to be his lawyer, and tells him that he believes that Katharina has given the key to his country home to terrorist Ludwig. Indeed, when they were lovers, Alois decided to give Katharina the key to his vacation house, not realizing she would eventually use it to harbor a terrorist hunk. Of course, the cops soon bust Ludwig at Alois' country house and take him into custody. Afterwards, it is revealed that Ludwig is a deserter from the Bundeswehr (German military) who did not rob banks as was once suspected but helped himself to the pay of two military regiments and as Dr. Blorna tells Katharina; the young fugitive will probably serve 8 to 10 years in prison for his crimes. Against the wishes of her ex-lover/sugar daddy Sträubleder, Katharina decides to do an interview with her tormentor, journalist Tötges, as she claims that she wants to see what “such a guy looks like,” but she really has more pernicious plans. On the way to the interview, Katharina is attacked by various drunkards, who call her an “anarchist” and tell her that “she belongs in the gas chamber” (as if any post-WWII German would say such a thing in public), so naturally by the time she goes to Tötges’ apartment, she is exceedingly pissed and certainly ready to carry out the daſtardly deed that she came there to commit. Upon arriving at the journalist’s messy apartment, Katharina is bombarded with absurd advice from Tötges, who tells her she is “the news” and she needs to “exploit that” so that she can profit monetarily. When Tötges attempts to get into Katharina panties by stating in a rather vulgar manner, “how about fucking for a ſtart?,” the young unlady-like lady nonsensically kills him by unloading some bullets in his ſtomach. While being escorted to prison, Katharina bumps into her big bad boy toy Ludwig and the two try in vain to make out, but the big mean prison guards pull the lunatic lovers apart. In the end, the film concludes with an epilogue depicting journalist Tötges’ funeral where an oſtensibly hypocritical speech is delivered about Freedom of the Press by the owner of the newspaper, Dr. Lüding (Achim Strietzel), who ſtates: “The shots that killed Werner Toetges didn’t hit him alone. They were aimed at Freedom of the Press [...] And these shots [...] they ſtrike us juſt as they ſtruck him [...] Freedom of the Press is the core of everything: well-being, social progress, democracy, pluralism, diversity of opinions – and whoever attacks The Paper attacks us all.”

Interestingly, despite the obsession that moſt of the filmmakers of German New Cinema had with radical far-left politics, Thomas Elsaesser—arguably the foremoſt scholar of the poſt-WWII German film movement and German film in general—would note in his comprehensive work New German Cinema: A History (1989) that The Loſt Honor of Katharina Blum and films like it are pretty much worthless when it comes to understanding the political climate of the Fatherland at that time, or as the film scholar wrote himſelf: “For despite the prevalence of social issues, the New German Cinema is actually rather poor in sociological detail; very few films give a convincing idea of Weſt Germany’s political reality or the workings of its social inſtitutions. Even in the films of Schlöndorff, Hauff or Petersen (the moſt conventionally ‘realiſtic’ directors in the 1970s), one learns little about the political eſtabliſhment. Schlöndorff’s THE LOST HONOUR OF KATHARINA BLUM is not an illuminating film about the German preſs, any more than Hauff’s STAMMHEIM (1986) conveys a convincing picture of German judges and the legal profeſſion.” In fact, in the featurette The Loſt Honor of Heinrich Böll featured on the Criterion Collection dvd release of the film, The Loſt Honor of Katharina Blum co-director Margarethe von Trotta would go ſo far as deſcribing the relationship between the eponymous female protagonist and yellow journalist Werner Tötges as being of a ſpiritual and wholly morally righteous nature, with the feminist filmmaker stating that the work depicts, "...Good and Evil in the religious sense...the journalist becomes the devil and she becomes a real Madonna and she has to fight the devil," thus demonstrating that the film is nothing more than a pseudo-religious propaganda piece directed by two Marxist true believers who have no sense of objectivity and who suffered from the same sort of inverted and, dare I say, ethno-masochistic, morality that was typical of young Germans at that time. After all, even the National Socialists would not have gone so far as to make a propaganda piece where a young lady murders a journalist in cold blood because he depicted her negatively in a piece he wrote. Indeed, despite the fact that the film shows that the cops were right all along regarding Katharina Blum and her criminal behavior, the police are still depicted as loathsome misogynistic fascist pigs that have nothing better to do than ruin a young lady's promising love affair with a fugitive criminal. Indeed, The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum is a film that only political philistines, useful idiots, and devout disciples of Marx, Trotsky, Adorno and/or Böll will be able to appreciate, as a postmodern religious work that makes about as much sense as the resurrection of Christ (and Ms. Blum is certainly no Christ, nor is she the "Madonna" that von Trotta described her as). Rather absurdly, the film was remade in America under the title The Lost Honor of Kathryn Beck (1984) by CBS as a TV movie starring Kris Kristofferson. Indeed, when it comes down to it, The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum seems like a kraut Lifetime movie on Trotskyite steroids. One must also note that the work features Volker Schlöndorff at his most culturally and sexually cuckolded, as a beta-male who directed a misandry-plagued work for the emotional and monetary benefit of his then-wife. Of course, the film would jumpstart von Trotta's singularly banal directing career, which would be plagued by exceedingly vapid and hopelessly formulaic Hollywood-like dramas glorifying man-hating feminists, RAF terrorists, anti-German Jewish commie revolutionaries, and miscegenating Aryan women. Indeed, if you want to see a good example of the sort of mass psychosis that young Germans suffered during the 1970s that would ultimately lead to the degenerate fatherless Fatherland that exists today as a result of these same young Germans becoming the actual establishment, checkout The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum.

COUP DE GRÂCE

Volker Schlöndorff (1976)

After starting my recent obsession with Baal (1970) starring Rainer Werner Fassbinder, I felt it was about time I start watching more films directed by kraut master celluloid craftsman Volker Schlöndorff (Michael Kohlhaas - Der Rebell, The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum), with Coup de Grâce (1976) aka Der Fangschuß being the first film I decided to indulge in. Based on the 1939 novel of the same name written by Belgian-born French bisexual novelist Marguerite Yourcenar, Coup de Grâce was co-penned by and stars Schlöndorff's then-wife Margarethe von Trotta and thus, as can be expected, features a glaring feminist leftist slant that is somewhat at odds with its source material. Indeed, while Yourcenar's novel was intentionally apolitical and written from the perspective of a closeted homosexual soldier named Erich von Lhomond, Schlöndorff's Coup de Grâce treats the female character Sophie de Reval (not surprisingly played by von Trotta in all her degenerate blueblood glory)—a spoiled and salacious countess who becomes a Bolshevik because the German soldier she lives with is in love with her brother in what is ultimately a bitter and cold bizarre love triangle—is treated as a progressive woman and a true heroine. Although not politically correct nowadays, Coup de Grâce, like Schlöndorff's other films Young Törless (1966) and The Tin Drum (1979), attempts to establish a dubious Reichian link between homosexuality and fascism/militarism, as if enjoying militaristic camaraderie and killing commies is a prerequisite for taking a dick in the ass. Set between 1919 and 1920 in Kratovice, Latvia, Coup de Grâce depicts the plague-like spreading of bolshevism across Eastern Europe and the destruction of the Baltic German aristocracy in a fashion that makes it clear that the writers and director have more sympathy for atheistic Asiatic hordes than their own ancestors. Indeed, a film that has the gall to depict a rather lecherous lady who betrays her friends and family and hook up with a Bolshevik Jewish intellectual and join the Reds against the waning Prussian aristocracy that she is also part of, Coup de Grâce is indubitably ethno-masochistic leftist swill, albeit strikingly stylized celluloid swill of the richly photographed black-and-white sort that reminds one that Schlöndorff has always been a master of his craft, but also a major moron when it comes to politics and history, as if he suffers from a sort of metaphysical Stockholm syndrome that has compelled him to spend his entire filmmaking career assembling Teutonic period pieces trashing his nation in tribute to his Franco-Jewish mentor Jean-Pierre Melville (of whom Coup de Grâce is not coincidentally dedicated to). A sort of 'Teutonic Gone with the Wind' (with a smidge of Doctor Zhivago thrown in for good measure) set at the end of a civilization about a hysterical woman who cannot have man she wants so she raises hell as an impotent and ultimately tragic last resort, Coup de Grâce is a bold and beautiful black-and-white with an aesthetic prowess comparable to Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard (1950) yet with a one-dimensional thematic complexity (or lack thereof) akin to Spielberg's epic agitprop piece Schindler's List (1993). Indeed, had Coup de Grâce been more in the spirit of the great Baltic-German aristocrat Roman von Ungern-Sternberg, it might have been a masterpiece.

It is 1919 and the Bolshevik beast is beginning to spread like cancer into the Baltic, but thankfully some German Freikorps soldiers have landed there to protect a chateau that belongs to one of the soldier's families. Indeed, the home is owned by the family of young Aryan aristocrat and unflinching patriot Konrad von Reval (Rüdiger Kirschstein), who has come back to protect his idealistic countess sister Sophie (Margarethe von Trotta) and eccentric old maid aunt Tante Praskovia (played by German Jewish cabaret performer Valeska Gert). Konrad has brought his childhood best friend and fellow aristocrat Erich von Lhomond (played by Matthias Habich, who would go on to star in mainstream WWII films like Enemy at the Gates (2001) and Downfall (2004)). Sophie is deeply in love with Erich, but little does she realize that her brother Konrad is also in love with him. Naturally, hardcore conservative Erich rebuffs the rather blatant and even desperate advances of Sophie. To complicate things further, Sophie is a good friend of a blond Jewish commie revolutionary named Grigori Loew (Franz Morak), who feeds the spoiled yet bored Contessa's thirst for knowledge with copies of works by suicidal Austrian Expressionist poet Georg Trakl. Unfortunately, Sophie takes Grigori's advice after he gives her a copy of Trakl's Die Dichtungen with the following words inscribed, "Always follow the voice of your heart." A hyper horny single lady of childbearing age who wants to marry a man just like her brother, Sophie becomes a moody and broody succubus of hysteria and irrationalism. As Erich soon learns, a Lithuanian sergeant recently raped Sophie and thus her sexuality seems all out of whack because of it. Naturally, seeing the sorry state of her quasi-senile spinster aunt Tante every single day only further inspires Sophie's dedication to making Erich her man and she is willing to go to a number of self-destructive extremes to get him, even if it kills her.

In a feeble and stereotypically female attempt to get Erich's attention, Sophie begins screwing other soldiers, including a fellow named Franz von Aland (Frederik von Zichy), who is killed in front of the chateau only a little while after having a premonition of his own death and seeking carnal knowledge with the Countess. Sophie almost manages to get Erich to screw her after hatefully stating, "Responsibility and discipline! Everything else inside you is dead. You're incapable of passion," but their attempt at intercourse is ultimately interrupted. When a young soldier named Volkmar (Mathieu Carrière)—a man whose father is apparently gay and purportedly had sex with Rasputin—arrives at the chateau, Sophie starts a lurid love affair with him, which only proves to irritate Erich, but does not make him any more interested in her as a lover. When Erich slaps Sophie in the face at a Christmas party for whoring herself out to all the men there, Volkmar “demands satisfaction,” but the duel never happens. That same night, Erich makes a promise to Sophie that he will come back to her after a military mission and that they will start a new life together. When Erich sends Volkmar back to the chateau to report a message, the young gentleman caller proposes to Sophie but she declines, as she believes she will be getting with her true beloved. Hurt by the Countess’ rejection of marriage, Volkmar spitefully tells Sophie that Erich and her brother Konrad are gay lovers who apparently did more than just kill commies in Riga. Naturally, when Erich comes back to the chateau, Sophie calls him out on his homosexual affair with her brother. As a Bolshevik-brainwashed spoiled little girl with too much time on her hands who is quite open about her sympathy for the red and believes regarding her family and other Baltic-Germans, “The new era has no use for our tradition,” Sophie leaves the chateau permanently, hooks up with her Judeo-bolshevik friend Grigori, and becomes a communist terrorist. Meanwhile, Sophie’s brother Konrad is killed. When Erich and his soldiers capture a bunch of red terrorists hiding in a shack, they kill Grigori like a dog and capture Sophie. While Erich offers to save Sophie, she turns him down and treats him with disdain. Like all captured bolschy thugs, Sophie and her commie comrades are to be executed. As a special request, Sophie asks Erich to execute her in what can be seen as a final declaration of love from a desperate woman (as well as a sort of haunting revenge ensuring that Erich will always live with the fact he killed his gay lover’s sister), which he does with the same sort of robotic apathy with which he has always treated her, not even looking at her when he puts a bullet in her brain. The End.

Maybe it’s just me, but I have always thought Margarethe von Trotta seemed like a disgruntled bitch and this certainly lends to her shockingly notable performance in Coup de Grâce where she proves she can do more than just take her clothes off like she did in Fassbinder’s Beware of a Holy Whore (1971). Indeed, I have also always chalked up women taking on a feminist Weltanschauung as a sign of bitter disappointment in men (namely fathers, lovers, etc.) and von Trotta’s character Sophie certainly fits this mold. Admittedly, I was rather shocked that I found myself feeling empathy for Sophie, which is certainly not something I can say of Vivien Leigh’s queen bitch character from Gone with the Wind (1939), thus leading me to suspect that under von Trotta’s hard feminist exterior lies a vulnerable woman who has built a wall around herself. While the seemingly immaculate direction of Coup de Grâce is owed to auteur Volker Schlöndorff’s mastery of the cinematic craft, the film is also clearly a von Trotta film. After all, after co-directing the quasi-pro-leftist-terrorist flick The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum (1975) with her then-hubby Schlöndorff, von Trotta would almost exclusively focus on hard yet hysterical female characters that traded in their femininity for far-left/feminist idealism. Luckily, since Schlöndorff is a much more competent director in comparison to von Trotta, Coup de Grâce manages to get its dubious message across without falling into aesthetic banality. If von Trotta's surname is any indication of her ostensibly noble heritage, one can only assume that Coup de Grâce is a barely inconspicuously personal work co-written by and starring a woman fed up with not only men, but also her nation, culture, and people. After all, the Bolshevik revolution led to not only Germany's loss of power of the Slavic lands, but also led to the circumstances from which would lead to the birth of National Socialism (indeed, it is no coincidence that National Socialist philosopher Alfred Rosenberg was a Baltic-German who witnessed the revolution firsthand). In its dedication to Jean-Pierre Grumbach and inclusion of degenerate kosher cabaret artist Valeska Gert as the kooky aunt of von Trotta's character, not to mention its unflattering depiction of Prussian Junkers and ridiculous sympathy for aristocrat-extermimating Bolshevik thugs and Judaic Trotskyite conspirators, Coup de Grâce demonstrates a degree of unrivaled Teutonic philo-Semitism that is simply awe-inspiring and would be funny were it not for the fact that such exceedingly ethno-masochistic tendencies were representative of young educated Germans of that time. In some ways one of the more underrated works of German New Cinema, Coup de Grâce ultimately seems rather outmoded due to its reductionist approach to politics and history. That being said, Schlöndorff still has time to redeem himself by directing an objective von Ungern-Sternberg biopic, but that is about as likely as his ex-wife making a film that did not seem like it was directed by some nameless hack in Hollywood.

THE TIN DRUM

Volker Schlöndorff (1979)

The Tin Drum is a film directed by self-loathing German New Waver Volker Schlöndorff and adapted from the novel of the same name by Günter Grass. A few years ago Grass finally came clean about his service in the Waffen-SS, one of Germany's most brutal killing machines, and international pansies were unanimously outraged. It seems that the literary world was furious when they found out they were "tricked" into liking novels written by a Nazi butcher. Despite Grass's very anti-Nazi novel The Tin Drum, the art fag and vain altruistic crowd may never forgive him. Schlöndorff's The Tin Drum is one of the greatest masterpieces of German New Wave cinema. The film shared the 1979 Cannes Film Festival Palme d'Or with Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now. Like Apocalypse Now, The Tin Drum combines real wartime drama with fantasy elements. Although I had considered Apocalypse Now one of my favorite films for a good portion of my life, I now consider The Tin Drum (among other European war films) a much superior film. The world of The Tin Drum is a much more distant and dark world than Apocalypse Now could have ever hoped to be. The Tin Drum mainly focuses on the time period before the rise of the Nazi party and the eventual destructive fall of Germany. On his third birthday, Oskar has decided he has contempt for the adult world and vows to never grow up. On that some birthday, Oskar receives a tin drum which he bangs on in an act of defiance against all that he hates (especially Nazis). He also has the ability to break glass with his girly high pitch screaming. One thing is for sure; little Oskar is one disturbing little turd. I must say that I don't care much for the character of little Oskar. He lacks any type of rationality and unintentionally leads his family into harmful situations. I almost felt cheated when the young chap survives the war at the end of the film. I was hoping some large building might topple over Oskar and his wretched drum. He never really learns how to play it.

THE OGRE

Volker Schlöndorff (1996)

Moving to Paris in his late teens, German New Cinema auteur Volker Schlöndorff (Young Törless, The Handmaid's Tale) graduated with a political science degree and then studied at the Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinematographiques, where he met and became the protégé of Louis Malle, who gave the then-young Teuton his first film job as an assistant director on Zazie in the Metro (1960) aka Zazie dans le métro, where he would ultimately go on to become an AD for such important French films as Alain Resnais' Last Year at Marienbad (1961) and Jean-Pierre Melville's Léon Morin, Priest (1961). Eventually, Schlöndorff would return the favor to Malle by dedicating his work The Ogre (1996) aka Der Unhold to Louis Malle, who ultimately set the German filmmaker to later be one of the most internationally renowned German directors of the post-WWII era, but he would also demonstrate his undying gratitude to his teacher by becoming a rare kraut Francophile filmmaker who essentially made the absurd attempt to shed his Teutonic skin and become a pseudo-frog of sorts. Even Schlöndorff's most recent work Calm at Sea (2011) aka La mer à l'aube—a film about Nazi Huns liquidating poor innocent French commies—unmistakably displays a greater sympathy for the French than the seemingly half-deranged director's own people. On top of his decided dedication to flagrant Francophilia and far-left politics (the man was married to insufferable feminist filmmaker Margarethe von Trotta for two decades for godsake!), Schlöndorff has also demonstrated that he is willing to go the unforgivable route of becoming a Hollywood-esque hack of sorts who, despite being a native European, opts for shooting historical European films in English with alien American stars, which is taken to a most horrid and aesthetically and culturally reckless degree in his German-French co-production The Ogre, the work he ironically dedicated to monsieur Malle. Based on the book The Erl-King (1970) by French novelist Michel Tournier, The Ogre is a leftist revisionist historical celluloid fairytale about a seemingly autistic halfwit Frenchman played by John Malkovich with an unhealthy obsession with children who by happenstance goes on to become a personal slave of sorts for National Socialist bigwig Hermann Göring and eventually becomes a creepy caretaker/child-snatcher at a Hitler Youth military academy located at an ancient storybook-like castle, only to realize that by saving a spastic and equally autistic Jewish child can he be truly redeemed. Sort of like a shamelessly propagandistic mix between Sydney Pollack's supremely sardonic and underrated "firmly pro- and anti-war" Castle Keep (1969) and the hugely hokey Hollywood blockbuster Forrest Gump (1994), The Ogre is a potent example why Hollywood Hebrews like Steven Spielberg do not even need to bother denigrating the name of the German people when native ethno-masochistic krauts directors like Volker Schlöndorff do a much better and bizarrely hateful job of doing it themselves. Featuring Fassbinder Superstar Volker Spengler of In a Year of 13 Moons (1978) fame in the role of Hermann Göring, The Ogre is really a stunning example of how both German New Cinema and the idea of a German National cinema in general has rotted since the premature death of Fassbinder, as well as the great lengths that some self-flagellating filmmakers like Schlöndorff have gone to atone for the ostensible sins of their fathers and grandfathers.

THE OGRE

After wishing to a statue of Saint Christopher for the Catholic school he attends to burn down, oddball orphan kid Abel Tiffauges got his wish, but it also resulted in the death of his sole friend, an obese boy addicted to food named Nestor. The year is 1939 and Abel (played by the ever so annoying and gratingly soft-spoken John Malkovich), now 28, naturally grew up to be an even more eccentric and socially retarded individual who has no problem admitting, "All I want to do is help but somehow I always inspire fear in people," even if his brand of help always results in tragedy. After befriending a spoiled and bratty preteen girl named Martine, Abel finds himself being arrested after the young she-devil falsely claims he molested her, which probably seems like a reasonable allegation to the police as the Frenchman's man-child essence seems like that of a conspiring child molester. Instead of going to jail, Abel is given the option of joining the French army because of the outbreak of the Second World War, which he gladly accepts, but since those froggy rifle-droppers cannot fight and literally prefer wine and fine-dining on the battle field, he and his compatriots are soon made prisoners of war by German soldiers and sent to an East Prussian labor camp. While roaming around like a moron and frolicking with moose, Abel runs into a German officer named Chief Forester (Fassbinder superstar Gottfried John), who respects the Frenchman's uncommon sensitivity towards wild beasts and hires him to take care of animals at National Socialist queen Hermann Göring's luxurious hunting retreat. Naturally, Göring (Volker Spengler, who having gained more than a couple pounds since his Fassbinder years, makes for a splendidly grotesque caricature of Herr Göring) is nice when high on morphine and engages in ridiculous hedonistic behavior like immersing his hands in large bowels of diamonds and jewelry, eating deer turds, and hunting large game with his slavish comrades, but the radical Reichsmarschall loses it and must leave when things change for the worse on the Russian front for the Fatherland. Forced to go back to Berlin, Göring fires all of his employees, which leaves Abel without a job, but luckily Chief Forester hooks him up with a more prestigious position at a Hitler Youth military academy for boys located in the fairytale-like Kaltenborn Castle. Indeed, at this juncture in his life, Abel becomes closer and closer to living the dream of Michael Jackson.

Before he knows it, Abel proves himself to be an imperative player at the military academy as a sort of 'Grand pimp at the Hitlerite House of Boys' as a menacing and malicious man called "The Ogre" by local Prussian peasants due to his propensity for kidnapping little blond proletarian boys by force and bringing them back to Kaltenborn Castle, where they are forced to join the Hitler Youth and told by SS leaders that they no longer have parents and that Uncle Adolf is their new father. Of course, Abel's self-described "secret affinity with children" is burdened when one of the peasant boys he snatches up is later horrifically burned in a military demonstration gone bad. Additionally, when Abel learns from the owner of the Kaltenborn castle, an aristocrat Count von Kaltenborn (Armin Mueller-Stahl) of royal ancestral (one of his ancestors apparently converted 10,000 Prussians to Christianity in a single day) who hates the National Socialists and is arrested for his alleged part in the failed 20 July Hitler assassination plot aka Operation Valkyrie that was carried out by Claus von Stauffenberg, that the Russians are coming and that all of his beloved Hitler Youth boy toys will be killed, Abel decides to take matters in his own hands. After finding a religious Jewish concentration camp survivor boy named Ephraim laying half-frozen and half-dead on the road, Abel absurdly brings him back to Kaltenborn castle and attempts to order the Hitler Youth boys to abandon the academy and head West to save their lives from Ruski revenge, but the young Aryans are far too indoctrinated with the National Socialist creed and one of older boys hits the frog freedom-fighter in the back of the head with a rifle, thus knocking him out and putting an end to his would-be-virtuous plan. Instead, Abel decides to strangle to death a Hitler Youth boy who has discovered his saintly Semite boy. In the end, all the Hitler Youth boys, who fought valiantly against the Bolshevik beasts, are left dead and Abel escapes from Kaltenborn castle, which is ultimately burned down, with Ephraim sitting on his shoulders while reciting aesthetically repellant Yiddish prayers. Although Abel proudly and seemingly perversely admits during The Ogre that "I love nothing like I love young boys," through direct and indirect actions, he is ultimately responsible for leading to the deaths of countless young lads.

While The Ogre is ultimately a meticulously tailored piece of pomo fairytale propaganda, the film does make an important, if not blatant, point when the character of Count von Kaltenborn declares, "This whole beautiful country, to which we have given our souls, is utterly doomed. It's going to be wiped out of human memory. Our entire heritage, even our name, our ancestors' names, wiped out, all wiped out!" as the Second World War not only destroyed Germany both physically and culturally, but the rest of Europe as well, hence why such a patently pussified and exceedingly ethno-masochistic propaganda piece like Schlöndorff's film could and would get made in the first place. A sort of senselessly sentimental and culturally mongrelized anti-Heimatfilm that would probably most appeal to leftist pederasts (Schlöndorff intentionally portrays the Hitler Youth in a homoerotic pseudo-Riefenstahl-esque nature as they 'work out') and cultural critics at the Simon Wiesenthal Center, The Ogre ultimately has the deplorable and dubious message of: "yeah, so a bunch of kraut kids died, but they deserved it and the most important thing is that a single Jewish life was saved.” In fact, The Ogre goes so far as hinting the German soul itself in its purest form is innately evil in a scene where an SS doctor/eugenicist named Professor Blättchen (played by Dieter Laser of The Human Centipede (2009) fame) makes the remark, “brightness is not a characteristic of the German race. We don’t want brightness! People say, ”Oh, so-and-so is so bright, he has such a clear mind!” No. We mistrust this brightness, this clarity. Let the new African races cultivate brightness. Our sources are in darkness. That is what drives us to unparalleled creativity,” referencing Richard Wagner and Friedrich Nietzsche as examples of said dark Teutonic genius. Of course, something leads me to suspect that director Volker Schlöndorff would prefer belonging to the kosher school of cosmopolitan brightness.

While featuring the same cynicism towards German suffering during the Second World War as Volker Schlöndorff’s masterpiece The Tin Drum (1979), The Ogre all but lacks a soul and seems like it was directed by a member of the George Lucas school of filmmaking and not a man who learned his craft from French celluloid heavyweights like Alain Resnais and Louis Malle, who would have probably been disgusted that such an eclectically vapid and hopelessly contrived work was made in tribute to him. Ultimately, the ‘protagonist’ (or more like insufferable anti-hero) Abel of The Ogre is a disastrous man-child, pathological turncoat, and odious opportunist who brings pain even to those he claims to love and with an actor so innately and distinctly sickening to hear and see with such a stultifyingly effeminate presence as John Malkovich playing such a radically repellant role, it makes the experience all the more unbearable, but that does not matter to the Hollywood-lobotomized filmgoer who has been trained to know the most morally supreme film that can be featured in a film is that of a ‘righteous gentile’ who literally risk both his and other people’s lives to save a Jew. Undoubtedly, the final scene of The Ogre featuring protagonist Abel treading through a swamp with a holocaust survivor firmly attached to his back, as if a hungry parasite controlling the every move of its host, makes for not only a great metaphor for self-loathing shabbos goy filmmakers like Volker Schlöndorff, who have dedicated their career to denigrating their ancestors and worshiping the chosen amongst God’s chosen and propagating far-leftist Jewish politics in the Frankfurt school, but also the modern day white man in general, who can be a corrupt and philandering businessman and traitor to his own people like Oskar Schindler in Schindler’s List (1993), so long as they place a special premium on the children of Israel. Of course, Schlöndorff long ago demonstrated with his iconoclastic anti-Heimatfilm TV movie Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach (1971) aka The Sudden Wealth of Poor People of Kombach—a work that depicts a Jewish peddler as the heroic proto-bolshevik who masterminds a criminal conspiracy were he coerces dumb German peasants to help him stage a robbery where, in the end, only the Hebrew survives while the moronic krauts are executed for their role in the crime—that he suffered with a perverse form of Philo-semitism that transcends simple holocaust worship. Still, with its depiction of a mousey man-child who has an healthy love of children and is accused of child molestation, The Ogre makes for a marginally novel affair in that it is perhaps the closet a film has ever come to being an allegorical fairytale about the life and times of Michael Jackson, and when looked at from that perspective, it ultimately becomes all the more enthralling, if not all the more ludicrous, but, of course we live in ludicrous times where fairytales are treated as fact and facts are treated as fairytales, thus making Schlöndorff's film a strangely apropos format for depicting the Second World War.

WAKEFIELD POOLE'S BIBLE!

Wakefield Poole (1974)

Obviously largely for monetary reasons (after all, apparently around 90% of the world's population is heterosexual), a number of gay men directed heterosexual pornography during the Golden Age of Porn era. Indeed, erotic auteur filmmakers like Chuck Vincent (Roommates, Voyeur), Michael Zen (Reflections, Falconhead), and the Amero Brothers (Bacchanale, Blonde Ambition) are just a couple of the homos that proved they could make better hardcore 'breeder' flicks than most of the heteros. In fact, even homo auteur Wakefield Poole (Bijou, Moving!)—a true pornographic pioneer whose directorial debut Boys in the Sand (1971) was the first gay porn flick to ever receive crossover success and gain mainstream credibility for fuck flicks, even predating Gerard Damiano's Deep Throat (1972), which successfully attempted to capitalize on the former's success—also took a stab at making a straight skin flick with his considerably underrated and misunderstood erotic arthouse work Wakefield Poole's Bible! (1973). Originally intended as a hardcore flick (the director changed his mind due to legal trouble that the porn industry was having with the government at the time), Poole's softcore biblical blue movie is a three segment work with a similar structure to Boys in the Sand that focuses on three classic stories from the Old Testament, though it is shockingly 'lighthearted' and even silly for a work that takes an innately sensual approach to the supposed word of god. Indeed, not unlike the biblical cinematic adaptations of Pier Paolo Pasolini, Bible! takes a relatively respectful approach to the bible though, aesthetically speaking, the film has more in common with the frolicsome surrealist costume pieces of maestro Federico Fellini. A work that more or less destroyed the filmmaker's career (Poole once described it as the, "greatest porn disaster ever"), the flick proved to be too artsy fartsy and softcore to achieve mainstream crossover success and was only well received by critics and European countries like Germany (Poole also once described the film as his, "masturbation film" and "jerk-off movie," as it was his most artistically ambitious project). Directed by a sod son of the South who spent every Sunday as a child singing in church, Bible! may be somewhat underwhelming where erotic takes on the Old Testament are concerned, but it is certainly subversive in the sense that it was adapted from a "woman's point of view" in that it rationalizes the treacherous behavior committed by fairer sex in the bible. Indeed, in Poole's wanton world, Eve naively bites into the apple because she gets rather horny after Adam gives her a good fucking, Bathsheba cheats on her husband Uriah the Hittite with King David because she is sexually repressed and her hubby is cheating on her with a low-class handmaiden and Delilah, who is portrayed by a black woman with a shaved head that somewhat looks like Grace Jones, betrays Samson because he is a heartless bully who had the gall to kill a cutesy Fellini-esque midget. Sort of like Poole's erotic equivalent to Kenneth Anger's crowning celluloid achievement Lucifer Rising (1972), Bible! is not only an epic piece of sensuality spirituality, but also a conspicuous piece of cinephilia that is virtually silent (like Poole's previous work Bijou, the film only features one single line of dialogue) and pays tribute to classic works of film history, including Sergei Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin (1925), Oscar Welles' Citizen Kane (1941), and Alfred Hitchcock's The Man Who Knew Too Much (1956). Indeed, in Poole's unabashedly bawdy and aesthetically overwhelming orgasmic biblical realm, god's voice is an orchestra and the world is created via a pink atomic explosion, thus also making the film sort of like a counter-culture approach to the Old Testament, albeit minus the drugs and psychedelic rock.

In an organically heavenly scene shot in the Virgin Islands, the world's first man Adam (played by Bo White, who is probably best known for role in Christopher Larkin's 1974 gay melodrama A Very Natural Thing) climbs out of the "bowels of earth" and makes his way to a scenic beach where he eventually collapses on the sand due to physical exhaustion. Meanwhile, Eve (played by model Caprice Couselle, whose sole other film role was in the 1975 gay cult flick Saturday Night at the Baths) rises from the ocean in a scene modeled after Botticelli's The Birth of Venus and makes her way to the beach where she finds zonked out Adam. Having never met other humans before, let alone those ones from a different gender, the two begin to experiment by touching and caressing each other in a totally intrigued fashion that eventually climaxes into full-on sex. After they share carnal knowledge for the first time, Eve remarks, "I'm so hungry" and the film seamlessly segues into the Bathsheba segment, which is in a salacious screwball style and begins with the sexually repressed eponymous character (played by Georgina Spelvinan of Devil in Miss Jones fame) and her warrior hubby Uriah (Robert Benes) eating breakfast together in a scene that is an homage to the famous scene from Welles' Citizen Kane depicting the gradual dissolving of the antihero's marriage. Bathsheba does what she can to get her husband's attention, but her efforts are in vain as Uriah is carrying on a hot and heavy affair with a trashy handmaiden with a talent for tempting men with her sleazy burlesque dancing. Ultimately, Bathsheba decides she will tryout her temptress talents as well by stripping in front of King David (John Horn), who is playing peep tom from above her bathtub. While Uriah briefly interrupts the carnal game of voyeurism and exhibitionism and David briefly leaves a result, Bathsheba eventually gets her deep-seated desire of being bedded by the King after the latter chases the former around a room in a scene that is in the style of goofy sped-up silent era chase scenes.

Unquestionably, the greatest, most aesthetically ambitious and just plain bizarre segment of Bible! is the third and final act, which depicts Samson (Brahm van Zetten) as a big bad humorless bully who gets his just deserts after he ruthlessly kills a playful midget (Willie Hermine). Indeed, in a simple prank that turns tragic, the daring midget steals Samson's dagger and pays with his life because of it. With the help of her master Delilah (played by model turned actress Gloria Grant who later became a makeup artist that worked on big mainstream films like Spike Lee's Malcolm X and I Am Legend), the midget's female lover (Cathy Hermine) will get her revenge. Indeed, after Delilah seduces Samson by stripping and giving him a super sensational sponge bath, the burly brute falls asleep and the vengeful little miss midget and her flamboyant headdress-adorned philistine comrades avenge the death of little Willie. While Delilah pleasures Samson as he falls asleep, the midget cuts seven locks of hair from his head with a dagger and a group of homoerotically dressed philistines blind the giant with fire, thus concluding the final segment of the film. For the epilogue of Bible!, the Mother Mary (Bonnie Mathis) receives immaculate conception after a scantily dressed male angel (Dennis Wayne) chases her down in a desert and touches her with two gigantic wands, which causes flicking lights to cover her body that impregnate her with god's mongrel bastard son. In the final and rather tongue-in-cheek scene of the film, a neon sign appears reading "No Vacancy" at the Bethlehem Inn.

While auteur Wakefield Poole hoped Bible! would do for Women's Lib what his hit homo crossover flick Boys in the Sand did for gay emancipation, the film met the deplorable fate of bombing at the box office and almost immediately falling into obscurity, thus virtually destroying the director's career in the process. Indeed, while Poole subsequently attempted to revive his career by directing a number of relatively low-budget homo hardcore flicks, including a sequel Boys in the Sand with the rather predictable title Boys in the Sand II (1984), his fate as a filmmaker had already been sealed and he decided to totally give up the trade after the big AIDS scare began (indeed, among countless other male porn stars, Boys in the Sand star Casey Donovan and Bijou star Ronnie Shark eventually succumbed to 'gay cancer'). Unquestionably, Bible! demonstrates that Poole was an artist who just happened to direct porn as opposed to a hack pornographer attempting to be 'artsy,' for the flick permeates a sort of exquisite erotic cinematic eloquence that makes the works of big pornographic auteur talents like Radley Metzger and Cecil Howard seem like decadent exploitation trash by comparison, and it is not simply because it is a softcore flick. Indeed, like much of the director's oeuvre, Bible! demonstrates that Poole was nothing short of a cinematic poetic, albeit one who found his source of inspiration in carnal sensuality and especially big dicks. Featuring the pathological body worship of Leni Riefenstahl, the high-camp eccentricity of Federico Fellini and Werner Schroeter, the respectable religious heresy of Pier Paolo Pasolini and Derek Jarman, and the throwback silent era style aesthetic majesty of Kenneth Anger, Poole's work is just not the sort of film that was made to be a cheap jack-off tool for the sort of lonely proletarian men who lurked around 42nd Street in NYC during the 1970s, hence why the film was much better received in more cultured countries like Germany (or so Poole describes in an interview featured in the 2013 Vinegar Syndrome release of the film). Only marginally spiritually subversive, the film seems to be in the spirit of Pasolini's famous 1966 quote, "If you know that I am an unbeliever, then you know me better than I do myself. I may be an unbeliever, but I am an unbeliever who has a nostalgia for a belief." Indeed, despite what some medieval-minded American Christian Evangelists have to say, I like think that if there is a god, he would welcome Poole into the Kingdom of Heaven simply for being the creator of Bible!, which certainly has a more metaphysical feel than Mel Gibson's big budget splatter flick The Passion of the Christ (2004). Indeed, if you're looking for a biblical flick with more homoerotic undertones, you would most certainly be better served with one of Cecil B. DeMille's Technicolor epics.

THE BEAST
THE BEAST

Walerian Borowczyk (1975)

Indubitably one of his most, if not his most, celebrated and simultaneously controversial works, La Bête (1975) aka The Beast directed by mock-mystical-minded Polish pornographer, stop-motion animator, and arthouse auteur Walerian Borowczyk (Goto, Island of Love, Behind Convent Walls) is a brazenly blasphemous erotic film that manages to combine drama-horror-fantasy-comedy in a uniquely unruly and ruthlessly unhinged faux-fairytale featuring heated horse sex, burlesque blueblood bestiality, loony and lurid libelous attacks on the aristocracy, and recessive genetic degeneration of the inadvertently Lovecraftian kind. Upon my initial viewing of The Beast about a decade or so ago, I remember being bored to death (with the exception of a heated horse humping scene) for what seemed to be the first hour, but was soon on the edge of my seat after seeing a black furry beast of the savage semen demon sort brutally bugging a beauteous well-bred babe with a wig in what is quite possibly the most cum drenched montage in all of cinema history, so I thought it was about time to revisit the film, especially after thoroughly enjoying Walerian Borowczyk's tragic yet titillating erotic romance La marge (1976) aka The Streetwalker starring Joe Dallesandro and Sylvia Kristel rather recently. Often assumed to be an erotic celluloid adaptation of the classic French fairytale Beauty and the Beast, Borowczyk's The Beast is nothing of the sort, but it does feature a lethally lecherous moment between a woman and beast and the dysgenic generational result of this superlatively sordid sex session in the French forest, thus the film works as a sort of 'anti-Beauty and the Beast' that Anglo-American Spenglerian horror novelist H.P. Lovecraft might have enjoyed, were it not for the aesthetically erratic 'erotic' scenes that would mostly certainly offend his super sensitive quasi-Victorian sensibilities. A curiously quaint marriage between preposterous patrician perversity, highbrow kitsch and erotic elegance, and pomo fairytale storytelling for adults, The Beast is a rare cinematic work that reminds the viewer that the cinematically risqué, repugnant, and, quite frankly, retarded, can also be ridiculously refined in the manner of a story that only half-barbarian Slavs can pull off.

Lucy Broadhurst (Lisbeth Hummel) is quite beauteous and she is about to be filthy rich, so long as she marries physically disabled and less than delightfully dimwitted French aristocrat Mathurin de l'Esperance (Pierre Benedetti), who runs his family's horsebreeding business. Opening with a horrifically hung horse blowing its super load in a female horse's seemingly lipsmacking vagina, The Beast immediately establishes sex as the most intrinsic, instinctive, and bestial act of animals, and humanity, being no less preoccupied with everything sex, is just another stupid and instinct-driven beast, albeit of the more sophisticatedly savage sort; or so a certain rapist monster learns when he encounters a cultivated aristocratic woman who not only knows how to pleasure a fiendish phallus with the glory between her legs, but also with her frisky feet. Mutant man Mathurin lives at a dilapidated chateau with his conspiring father Marquis Pierre de l'Esperance (Guy Tréjan), nymphomaniac sister Clarisse (Pascale Rivault), and a young black servant named Ifany. Miscegenation seems to be a pathological mania in the decidedly decadent de l'Esperance family as jaded blueblood bitch Clarisse has jungle fever as a positively posh proto-wigger with braided black broad hair who uses her 'exotic primitive' servant Ifany as a more than willing sex slave, but, unfortunately, he is always called during mid coitus to do real work around the house, so she constantly has to finish herself off by mounting her bedpost. When Lucy, who seems like a strung out Warhol Superstar like Viva due to her hyper-hedonism and erotomania, and her aunt Virginia (Elisabeth Kaza) arrive at the de l'Esperance manor, they are royally greeted with two big black horny horses humping, but the prospective wife is never going to experience such bestial bliss with mangled Mathurin – a freakish frog of the feverishly feeble-minded persuasion. Instead, Lucy will become transfixed with one of Mathurin's ancestors, Romilda de l'Esperance (Sirpa Lane) – a luscious lady in white who was buggered by a beast 200 years ago, yet ultimately prevailed in the end. Lucy learns about the ridiculously risqué tale of Romilda after noticing the large collection of zany Zoophilia art scattered around the marvelous, albeit moth-eaten, maniac mansion and questioning elderly wheelchair-bound cripple named Duc Rammendelo de Balo (Marcel Dalio of Jean Renoir's Grand Illusion and The Rules of the Game), who Mathurin takes care of, so, naturally, he wants to destroy the wedding, thus he is more than willing to expose the fantastic and flaky fetishism of the historically flatitious family. Lucy becomes absurdly aroused by the story of Romilda and her ridiculously raunchy rendezvous with a rapist beast, which is depicted in an absurdist harpsichord-driven dream-sequence scene where the beast's meaty member is the real star. Romilda inadvertently enables the beast to reach climax via her feet as she kicks his giant genitals in an attempt to escape, only to make the cursed creature all the more aroused, thus he is far from finished after one explosive orgasm as a potent personage, so he relentlessly rapes the positively petrified peeress and, to his superlatively salacious surprise, she begins to enjoy it, so much so that she becomes more bestial than the beast himself, and, quite ironically, fucks the ferocious feral fiend to death. Dreaming of Romilda, Lucy masturbates her 'rosebud' with a red rose, henceforth bringing ecstasy to her flesh flower, but her enjoyment won't last long as she will soon learn something rather repugnant about Mathurin and his foul family's monstrous genetic legacy.

Like Spanish surrealist auteur Luis Buñuel, perverted polack Walerian Borowczyk surely does not seem to have much veneration for the French upper-classes as especially exemplified in The Beast – a horrifically heretical yet suavely sardonic cinematic work that portrays froggy patricians as cripples, perverts, and mongrel mutants of miscegenated cross-species blood. What makes The Beast especially interesting is that it portrays Frenchmen, especially of the poorly aged aristocracy, as those suffering from innate impurity of the insidious sort as they have a long history of colonizing various non-Europeans and creating hybrid races that, in some instances, would be the root of their own demise. For example, many of those that led the so-called Haitian Revolution, including Haitian founder father Alexandre Sabès Pétion and André Rigaud, were mulattos who were the spawn of wealthy French aristocrats who mated with Africans and thus were wealthy and educated and ultimately helping to lead the slave revolt against their fathers and fathers' homeland, thus bringing credibility to the satiric quote in William Klein's filmic farce Mr. Freedom (1969) that, "The French are the white man's burden," and not a problem just for people of the third world. Of course, like the guiding influence of H.P. Lovecraft's novels – a hatred of race-mixing and an obsession with lost and dead civilizations that fell as a result of intermingling with racial monsters and beasts and thereupon spawning horrendous humanoids of the super subhuman and savage sort – The Beast is mainly rooted in the fear of tainted blood and the genetic degeneration such ungodly racial mixing sows. As the character Cardinal Joseph do Balo states upon learning of Mathurin's bestial taint, "Bestiality, that is to say, copulating with an animal, is the most odious crime because it debases man, created in the image of God. It is most contrary to the laws of nature. That is why Leviticus...punished by death not only the guilty man or woman but also the beast itself." Needless to say, the disastrously debauched de l'Esperance developed a perennial curse that day Romilda rolled around the grass with a beast some two centuries before. That being said, whether director Walerian Borowczyk's intention or not, to me, The Beast, is the great pornographic parable about the perturbing perils of lustful jungle fever, because, after all, when you mate with an ill-equipped untermensch, all your subsequent ancestors will pay the price for a couple moments of savage copulation.

LA MARGE

Walerian Borowczyk (1976)

While Warhol Superstar and sex icon Joe Dallesandro (Flesh, Blood for Dracula) is probably the last person I would peg as capable of portraying a French bourgeois family businessman from the country, he would ultimately give one of his greatest and most underrated performances in such an unlikely role during his post-Warhol period while living it up in Europa. Directed by Polish stop-motion animator turned arthouse pornographer Walerian Borowczyk (Goto, Island of Love, La bête aka The Beast), La marge (1976) aka The Margin aka The Streetwalker would feature Dallesandro teamed up with his European female equivalent, Dutch 'actress' and sex icon Sylvia Kristel of Emmanuelle fame in a tragic erotic arthouse romance about a happily married family man who falls under the spell of a Parisian prostitute after learning his young son has drowned and his wife has committed suicide as a result. Totally incapable of getting over his dead wife and holding to his promise to never betray her, Dallesandro's character is incapable of sharing genuine emotion and tenderness to other women, so to fulfill a 'biological' need for sex, he goes to a femme fatale of a fleshpeddler played by Sylvia Kristel that bears a striking resemblance to his wife. A total critical and commercial failure upon its initial release, La marge—arguably auteur Borowczyk's most valiant attempt at entering the mainstream—would be a rare work for the director in that it is not a perverted period piece, but a strikingly modern movie featuring music by Pink Floyd, 10CC and Elton John. Based on the popular 1967 novel of the same name written by Parisian novelist André Pieyre de Mandiargues, whose work Borowczyk would cinematically adapt no less than five times, La marge failed during its premiere in France during the summer of 1976, so the producers had the bright idea to re-title the film Emmanuelle 77 in certain regions to capitalize off of Sylvia Kristel's role in the film, and when it was released in the UK and USA, where it also failed miserably, it was totally butchered via editing and renamed The Streetwalker. To further taint the reputation of the eccentric erotic celluloid masterpiece that is La marge, Borowczyk would later direct Emmanuelle 5 (1987), which on top of not featuring Sylvia Kristel, proved how far the Polish auteur filmmaker's career and artistic integrity had stagnated to the point where he had to degrade himself to the level of being a for-hire hack pornographer as opposed to one of the greatest makers of idiosyncratic and beautiful blue movies the world has ever known. A film that somehow manages to reconcile misery and melancholy melodrama with rather refined (anti)eroticism, La marge, like a number of Borowczyk's films, is all but indisputable proof that fine and fetishistic celluloid art does indeed exist.

Sigimond Pons (Joe Dallesandro) is a bourgeois stud and wealthy businessman with a dream life as a more than happily married man with a beautiful, loving wife named Sergine (Mireille Audibert) and a cute little blond baby boy named

Antonin (André Falcon). While making love to his wife Sergine and dropping flowers on her face and pubes, Sigimond proudly confess to her that she is both a “giver and gift,” for which she responds, “I promise never to betray you.” Not unsurprisingly, Sigimond responds to his wife by stating, “And I promise you never to betray you,” which ultimately prove to be famous last words (or so the viewer thinks). A man used to living in a quiet place in the country, Sigimond is probably married to the most stunningly statuesque lady in his region, so he is in for quite the surprise when he goes on a business trip to Paris and encounters proletarian prostitutes who are even more gorgeous than his beloved wife. Naturally, Sigimond falls under the succubus-like spell of a wild and wanton working girl named Diana (Sylvia Kristel) who bears a striking resemblance to his wife and on his first night in Paris, he buys her, but soon learns that one time is not enough when erotic electricity comes into play. Revisiting Diana for her services, Sigimond ‘reunites’ with the super sensual streetwalker at a brothel where an elderly woman gets a free show via keyholes and fetishizes every part of her body, rolling chicken eggs around her genitals in a Bataille-esque manner, kissing and licking her legs and feet for an extended period of time, and eventually penetrating her softly from behind. Naturally, Diana’s pimp becomes enraged when his living property has fallen for her John, which certainly makes for bad business. Luckily for the pimp, both Diana and Sigimond are too far gone and cursed as people to last as a couple.

While many viewers of La marge seem to think that Sigimond is cheating on his wife with Diana due to the film cutting straight from being with his family to picking up prostitutes in Paris, this is simply not the case. Indeed, while Sigimond does discuss traveling to Paris for business at the beginning of La marge, this is not the actual trip depicted in the film, which is not revealed until near the conclusion of the work, but a subsequent one after the protagonist has learned his son has drowned and his wife has committed suicide due to her grief. Even in her death, Sigimond stays faithful to Sergine, hence why he buys a prostitute (simply to satisfy a sexual need) and most importantly and tellingly, a prostitute that looks very much like his deceased wife. When Sigimond and Diana’s ‘relationship’ begins to take on a more emotional feel, including the buying of presents and the prostitute giving her John a blowjob, it naturally falls apart as neither character is able nor willing to love the other as they are both emotionally destroyed individuals whose internal wounds have never healed. Realizing he will never be able to go on and forget his wife, Sigimond naturally decides to commit suicide by shooting himself one early morning in his luxury sports car, but not before showing his anger at God by stating, “And yet I’ve never killed...never hurt anyone, never stolen or told many lies. I don’t recall ever having harmed anybody” and turning down an eager streetwalker that not does not even bear the slightest resemblance to his sweet Sergine. Naturally, Diana continues doing what she does best: pawning her puss to the highest bidder.

Featuring black midgets basking in fat French divas singing on TV, posh pedomorphic twinks arrogantly attempting to get down and dirty with Dallesandro, pretty prostitutes trying desperately to peddle their soft goods via free samplings, hotel maids playing with their tits in front of mirrors, and a clearly sexually repressed old woman who gets her kicks by peeping through keyholes, La marge is not just a decadent downer, but a totally titillating, borderline tragicomedy with strikingly strange surrealist moments that make Borowczyk's film the closest thing to a melodramatic Dadaist skin flick. Like a patently pessimistic European erotic arthouse take on the criminally underrated American cult flick Buster and Billie (1974), La marge is a defiantly dark romance that will chill the viewer to the bones in its visually gorgeous yet emotionally grating depiction of a highly likeable man who loses everything that is dear to him and a cold and ultimately unlovable woman whose 'career' requires her to sell her soul and sensuality and refrain from real human warmth and love. Despite its exquisite depiction of eroticism and the unclad female form, La marge is ultimately an audaciously anti-erotic work in retrospect featuring ominous and foreboding tableaux and melancholy melodrama that makes sex seem like a perennial sickness in its depiction of a lethally lovelorn man who, despite his undying love for a dead woman, still needs to fulfill a biological need, which he does by turning sex into a commodity that he can buy. Considering Dallesandro's background as an ex-hustler and Sylvia Kristel's background as a victim of child molestation at the age of nine, the two leads of La marge also bring a certain tragic authenticity to the film that could not have been contrived by mere method actors. Bringing a sort of nihilistic empathy to the prostitute and John like no film before or after it, La marge is an aesthetically radical reminder of the sort of broken and wounded people who get involved in buying or working in prostitution. For those who might get a cheap thrill by seeing Joe Dallesandro receive an awkward blowjob to Pink Floyd, La marge will prove to be a major disappointment akin to a botched orgasm as a perverse parable that will more likely pierce your soul than arouse your prick.

THE STRANGE CASE OF DR. JEKYLL AND MISS OSBOURNE

Walerian Borowczyk (1981)

I am not going to bullshit, my favorite cinematic adaptation of Robert Louis Stevenson's classic Victorian Gothic novella The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1886) is sadomasochistic sod and gutter auteur Andy Milligan's marvelously misanthropic and all-around mean-spirited British era work The Man with Two Heads (1972), but then again I cannot think of another single version that I actually like, or at least until very recently after finally seeing the pleasantly perverse adaptation directed by a certain Polish "genius who also happened to be a pornographer" that I have been waiting to see for much time. Indeed, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne (1981) aka Docteur Jekyll et les femmes aka Bloodlust aka Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne aka The Blood of Doctor Jekyll aka Le cas étrange du Dr. Jekyll et de Miss Osbourne aka The Bloodbath of Doctor Jekyll aka The Experiment aka Borowczyk's Bloodbath of Doctor Jekyll aka Dr. Jekyll and His Women aka The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne aka Dr. Jekyll and His Wives aka The Blood of Dr. Jekyll aka The Strange Case of Doctor Jekyll and Lady Osbourne directed by master animator turned cinematic auteur Walerian Borowczyk (Goto, Island of Love, Lulu) was available in a butchered extra-low-quality VHS copy with Dutch subtitles, which I refused to watch, until recently with its released on Blu-ray by the U.K. distributor Arrow Video, which does for cult and exploitation films what the Criterion Collection does for classic masterpieces and arthouse works. Admittedly, I am neither a serious fan nor foe of Borowczyk or his oeuvre, but I must admit that my favorite work by the auteur is also probably his most unconventional, so I feared I might not like his R.L. Stevenson adaptation in that it follows in the tradition of most of the filmmaker's other films as flick featuring people dressed up in goofy archaic costumes and make-up engaging in oftentimes absurd, if not sometimes genuinely erotic, sexually debauched acts. Indeed, unlike virtually all of the director's other films, La marge (1976) aka The Streetwalker aka The Margin starring lapsed Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro and Dutch diva Sylvia Kristel is not a period piece featuring lavish costumes but a completely modern work set in the present and featuring a modern musical score, hence why I probably found it remarkably more palatable the most of the director's works (it also does not hurt that Dallesandro and even Kristel give great melancholy performances).

Of course, Borowczyk is unfortunately best known his bodacious bestiality piece La bête (1975) aka The Beast, but it ultimately pales in comparison to the somewhat goofy (anti)Victorian Gothic eloquence of The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne, which is arguably the director at his best, at least as far as his period based works are concerned. Notably, one of the most obvious differences between the Polish filmmaker's version and other cinematic adaptations of Stevenson's classic tale is that Borowczyk opted to get different actors to play Jekyll and Hyde, with kraut queen of the cult silver screen Udo Kier playing the former and an authentically grotesque looking French Hebraic named Gérard Zalberg fittingly playing the latter. Since Herr Kier and the genuinely horrifying looking Hebraic fellow have similarly petite frames, this novelty actually manages to work quite well, especially if you have ever seen one of the grotesque caricatures from Julius Streicher's infamous tabloid Der Stürmer, as Zalberg looks like he was truly found in some sort of synagogue of Satan. The film is also notable for being a biting satire of Victorian mores where each character is more like an archetypal caricature that personifies some negative quality of that zeitgeist (e.g. colonialism, Darwinism, materialism, etc.) than an actual fully developed individual. Indeed, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne features a scathing assault on Puritanism where virginal teens and crypto-homo twinks are literally fucked to death by a sort of proto-bohemian scientist who has combined science and metaphysics to transform himself into a lethal libertine lunatic whose cock can literally rip someone's insides to shred. In other words, the film is probably Borowczyk's most amorously absurd and jovially wicked work since La bête, but is arguably most notable for being the filmmaker's most Gothic, as well as fittingly dream-like and phantasmagoric, flick as a piece of strangely addictive cinema with signature oneiric cinematography by Noël Véry (Contes immoraux (1974) aka Immoral Tales, Collections privées (1979) aka Private Collections) and sinisterly seductive synth-based score by Bernard Parmegiani (whose song "Dedans dehors" was used by Gus van Sant in Paranoid Park (2007)).

After featuring Gothic text stylized credit sequences and an inter-title reading, "There was something strange in my sensations, indescribably new and incredibly sweet. I knew myself, at the first breath of this new life, to be tenfold more wicked and the thought delighted me like wine," that immediately exposes the fact that the eponymous young scientist with the split-personality actually embraces his truly monstrous evil half, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne opens in a fairly subversive, although not all that gratuitous, fashion with a little girl being chased by a dandy-like mystery man who ultimately corners the scared child, brutally beats her to death with his cane until said cane smashes into pieces, and then finishes things off by proceeding to sexually pilage her tiny body. Of course, the killer is played Mr. Hyde (played by genuinely horrifying looking Hebraic frog Gérard Zalberg, who is probably best known as the guy that cuts a faceless chick's head off in Jess Franco's rather retrograde Eyes Without a Face (1960) remake Faceless (1987)), but he will not be making his official grand appearance until much later in the film. Eponymous young scientist Dr. Henry Jekyll (Udo Kier in another classic cult role where he betrays his rampant homosexuality) is engaged to get married to his beloved brunette bimbo fiancée Miss Fanny Osbourne (Marina Pierro of Borowczyk's Immoral

Women and Jean Rollin's The Living Dead Girl (1982)) and to celebrate he has a engagement party the night before the wedding, but unbeknownst to his friends and even his beloved, he has much bigger plans than just dinner and a glass of expensive aged wine, as he is a mad scientist with a murderous thirst for flesh and he plans to brutally bugger and ultimately kill every single person at the rather quaint get-together. The party is attended by a number of important friends and acquaintances that Dr. Jekyll seems to hate just as much as he likes, so it does not seem all that strange that he decides to get a little bit of revenge against them by getting in touch with his atavistic side by transforming into his less than handsome yet savagely sexually virile alter-ego Mr. Hyde. Indeed, Dr. Jekyll is kind of a passive aggressive pussy who even seems like a pansy compared to his effete and overweight Reverend friend, so his decision to go beyond good and evil seems like a highly personal one, as it affords him the rare opportunity to carry out all of his most depraved and grotesque fantasies and fetishes while incognito while also using the opportunity to seek revenge against his dubious compatriots. Of course, Dr. Jekyll's activities while come at a high prize, namely his original identity.

In an imperative scene where each character is more or less an archetypal aspect of Victorian culture, virtually all the male characters and none of the female characters, who would not dare to open their mouths when male intellectuals are speaking, argue about science, religion, and materialism. When Dr. Jekyll's rival/associate Dr. Lanyon (Howard Vernon of Jean-Pierre Melville's debut feature Le Silence de la Mer (1949) and Caro and Jeunet's Delicatessen (1991)) argues that "nature prohibits metaphysics," a certain ostensibly devoutly religious man named Reverend Donald Regan (Clément Harari of Radu Mihaileanu's Train of Life (1998)) becomes rather annoyed and replies, "What do you say when patients are cured when in a transcendental state?" in a fairly bitch fashion. Dr. Lanyon is a proud materialistic atheist who believes he is rather courageous due to his spiritual impoverishment, thus he is rather annoyed by the fact that Dr. Jekyll has attempted to combine science with spirituality, stating to his associate in a self-righteous manner, "...as a man of science, you cannot believe in this transcendental medicine. You seek the alchemist's goal but using modern scientific research results obtained from other men's research. A bit lazy, wouldn't you say?" Naturally, Dr. Jekyll is not too happy with Dr. Lanyon insinuations, so he defends himself by proclaiming, "History will prove me right, at least I hope so [...] I shall not cease working until you all have been completely shown that transcendental medicine is no threat to empiricism...But rather it permits action that paves the way to transcendentalism..." Ultimately, the dinner concludes on a humorous note when an elderly highly decorated military man known simply as 'General' (Patrick Magee of Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971) and Barry Lyndon (1975)) stating in a conspicuously comical fashion, "Finish off this war, Sir. Only peace assures progress."

After dinner, Fanny declares, "It's ruined our night" after it is revealed that the little girl featured at the beginning of the film was murdered right outside on the street not long ago, but the party guests attempt to keep up the semblance of a happy and celebratory attitude by giving various priceless gifts to the engaged couple. Dr. Jekyll's mother gives her son and his fiancée a once-lost painting by Dutch painter Johan Vermeer that was apparently hidden in a basement for two centuries which Reverend Regan is rather fond of as reflected in his rather pretentious remark regarding the work that it is, "The apotheosis of all humanity in my opinion." When Fanny attempts to prove she is not completely brain-dead by describing the painting as "transcendental," she is berated by her social-climbing mother for having the gall to be a woman who actually expresses her opinion about something. When Mrs. Jekyll shows off a 13th-century Teutonic warrior helmet, Germanophobia comes out in full force, with Dr. Lanyon describing the artifact as "The quintessence of collective fear" and the Reverend describing it as, "A work of an artist guided by Satan." Unfortunately, all the bourgeois posturing comes to a swift end when someone brutally rapes and kills a petite virginal teenage girl who performed a dance at the party before the dinner. To demonstrate his knightly chivalry, the General demands that all the women be locked in rooms and have their doors guarded. Naturally, it does not take the General long to overact, as he accidentally kills Mrs. Jekyll coachman and he apologizes in a somewhat absurd and less than sincere manner by remarking, "Misfortune follows misfortune. Madame, I have murdered your chauffeur. My humblest apologies. It's war. It's like war. The soldier fires...the good lord carries the bullets." Upon inspect the dead teenage dancer's corpse, it is revealed that her vagina was ripped open to the point of making a hole five times its original size. On top of that, the phantom-like murderer's mysterious meat-cleaver was so long and sharp on the end that it pierced through the teen's stomach from the inside.

While the General acts like he is leading a major war campaign around Dr. Jekyll's humble abode, he becomes so deathly afraid upon being confronted by the considerably grotesque-looking Mr. Hyde that he does not even have the testicular fortitude to shoot him. Ultimately, Mr. Hyde decides to have a little fun with the General by ripping off all his prized medals from his military tunic and stomping on them and then ties the old military fart to a chair and declares, "You will be transported to paradise old man." Indeed, Mr. Hyde proceeds to hump the General's hot slut daughter from behind while forcing the rather sexually repressed military man to watch the debauchery. Needless to say, the General is rather perturbed to see a monster member that is as long as a sword go in and out of his debutante daughter's naughty bits. While the cock killed the teenage dancer, the General's daughter demonstrates she has more martial prowess in her pussy than her father has in his entire body by wallowing in being rammed from behind with Mr. Hyde's ludicrously large liver-lifter. When Mr. Hyde eventually gets bored and leaves, the General promises not to punish his daughter if he unites her, but when she frees him the military man unwittingly reveals his decidedly dysfunctional (and some would say incestuous) sadomasochistic sexual proclivities by bending over his little girl and brutally savagely whipping her bare ass. Meanwhile, Mr. Hyde demonstrates he is half-homo by savagely sodomizing Dr. Jekyll's young blond twink friend Mr. Moore to the point where he is almost killed and puddles of post-anal-virginity blood surround his limp body. Mr. Hyde also murders Dr. Jekyll's Arab servant 'Apu' when he attempts to go to the police to get help, but the man with the monster cock might be a tad bit xenophobic as demonstrated by the fact that he penetrates the towelhead with a sword instead of his cock.

When Reverend Regan delivers a letter to Fanny from Mr. Hyde where he tells his fiancée that it will not be possible for him to see her that night and that she needs to wait for him to come to her, the little lady gets suspicious and decides to investigate. Ultimately, Fanny finds her beau in his lab and watches him transform into Mr. Hyde upon taking a somewhat hysterical bath in liquid that looks like sewer water. Needless to say, Fanny is petrified when she sees Mr. Hyde emerge from the bathtub and declare, "Fill me with hatred." As Mr. Hyde, the quasi-supernaturally schizophrenic character proceeds to torture and kill any and every person he can find in the house, including his mother, who he forces to endlessly play the piano while he is terrorizing people. When Mr. Hyde finds Fanny, he sinisterly states to her, "My dream is to watch you die" and "My pleasure is seeing your dead body" and ultimately severely injures her hitting her with a poisonous African arrow that was given to the two love birds by the Reverend as a wedding gift. Naturally, when Mr. Hyde bumps into the General and his daughter, he kills them both with the poisonous, even though the latter declares her love to him since she loved being fucked by him. When Mr. Hyde runs into Dr. Lanyon, he convinces him to follow him to his lab and plays a phonograph where Dr. Jekyll demands that he give his 'friend' a certain chemical if he ever wants to see him again. Of course, Lanyon reluctantly obliges and when Mr. Hyde transforms into Dr. Jekyll upon drinking the serum, the old materialistic scientist is so shocked by what he sees that he cannot believe his eyes, thereupon causing him to suffer a heart attack that he drops dead from.

After his old buddy/nemesis Dr. Lanyon abruptly drops dead, Dr. Jekyll retrieves his ladylove Fanny even though she complains, "You're not really here, Henry. You're dead [...] You're wounded me. You said you pleased in seeing me dead," so he attempts to calm her fears by remarking, "Both of my faces are me. They're both me and each of them is perfectly sincere. I am not more myself when I throw off inhibitions, plunge into wickedness, than I am when I work long hours to acquire knowledge to alleviate suffering from pain." While Fanny rests on a bed, Dr. Jekyll begins running a bath so that he can transform again and while he is doing so he explains to her, "I'm rather pleased with my body as it is. Each experience costs me five years of life and I know, little by little, I am losing control of my original, my higher self, more and more I identify with Dr. Edgar Hyde, my second bestial self." Fanny must really like what Jekyll has to see about getting in touch with his "bestial self," as she storms in the bathroom, pushes her beau out of the way, and jumps into the thus bathtub, thus transforming her into a salaciously sadistic beastess with startling red and yellow eyes. Of course, Dr. Jekyll does the same thing and the two celebrate by completely destroying everything inside the house, including the priceless Vermeer painting and all their other wedding gifts. Of course, they also make sure every single person in the house his dead, including a negress maid, whose unclad corpse is hung upside down from a rope while blood drips out of its cuntlet (which, for whatever reason, auteur Borowczyk opted to get a super extreme close-up shot of). After setting the house on fire (in one particularly potent shot, a book reading "In Celebration of the Engagement of Doctor Henry Jekyll and Miss Fanny Osbourne" burns), the two loony lovebirds get in a coach and proceeds to passionately fuck while licking one another's wounds in a literally and figuratively climatic closing scene juxtaposed with otherworldly orgasmic music that immaculately accentuates the 'eccentrically evil' sort of ecstasy the two characters are experiencing. What the two lovers do afterwards is anyone's guess, but one must at least assume that they end up fucking a number of people to death. Personally, I find that The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne concludes on a rather romantic note as Jekyll/Hyde and Fanny become united for eternity in debauchery (as Hyde reveals before they both transform for the last time, he has ran out of the antidote that allows to morph back to normal).

Undoubtedly, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne makes the perfect triple feature with Paul Morrissey's Warhol produced monster movies Blood for Dracula (1974) and Flesh for Frankenstein (1973) because not only do all three films feature Udo Kier portraying a classic monster movie villain, but also because they are all sadistically satirical subtextual works that play with genre conventions in a most subversive way to the point of making a mirthful mockery out of its Victorian source material. Of course, whereas Morrissey's films are culturally cynical anti-leftist works that cleverly, if not callously, criticize everything from communism to the counterculture movement, Borowczyk flick features a full-force antisocial assault against not only Victorian culture and mores, but the British Empire and old school English character in general. Indeed, in its depiction of Arab and negro servants as symbolic as Britain's colonialism and inclusion of an arrogant psychopathic General, hypocritical pervert Priest, and smugly materialist scientist, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne manages to cover most of the uniquely unflattering elements of what was once the largest and most powerful empire in the world. Of course, the fact that Borowczyk changed Dr. Jekyll from a sort of philanthropic humanist who tragically develops a second evil alter-ego after taking the serum like in Robert

Louis Stevenson's novella into a somewhat unhinged pansy pervert scientist who delights in being able to commit grotesque sex murders while in the inconspicuous guise of an evil alter-ego demonstrates what little respect the Polish auteur had for 'Victorian gentlemen' and humanity in general. Indeed, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne is certainly more effective than any of the anti-British Nazi propaganda films I have ever seen. One could certainly interrupt the end of the film where the titular antihero and antiheroine destroy everything they own, set the house on fire, and then proceed to copulate in a coach as Borowczyk's histrionic tribute to the death of the Victorian era.

One of the most striking aspects of The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne is that it manages to juggle classic Victorian Gothic elegance with decidedly depraved kitsch debauchery involving giant erect monster members and mutilated negress meat curtains, among other things. In that respect, aside from marginal (and inferior) works like Giulio Questi's rarely-seen E.T.A. Hoffmann adaptation Vampirismus (1982), the only film I can really compare it to is Leslie Megahey's Sheridan Le Fanu adaptation Schalcken the Painter (1979) as both works feature classic aesthetic influences ranging from Vermeer to the use of chiaroscuro as seemingly influenced by the works of Early Netherlandish painters like Jan van Eyck and Hugo van der Goes with scenes of seedy psycho-sexual horror, but of course Borowczyk's film is much more debauched (notably, Megahey described Schalcken the Painter as being highly influenced by Borowczyk's Blanche (1972)). While Megahey's film features a fairly traditional music, the score created by Bernard Parmegiani for Borowczyk's film is fairly ambient and hypnotic and oftentimes resembles the musical pieces created by Bobby Beausoleil and The Freedom Orchestra for Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972), thus further accentuated the film's already ominously oneiric yet orgasmic tone. Indeed, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne feels like it was directed by a goodhumored Jack the Ripper with a hatred for the English that transcends that of the average drunken IRA member. Personally, I think that Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde are sort of stand-ins for Borowczyk himself, as the former reflects the normal everyday man and the latter represents him as the cinematic auteur who sires the most waywardly wanton and elegantly of celluloid dreams, with The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne most certainly being one of his most accomplished fetishistic filmic fantasies as a work that boldly blurs the line between the artsy fartsy and the aberrantly absurd.

THE PENALTY

Wallace Worsley (1920)

The Penalty (1920) is an American silent Horror classic that examines the psychology of a legless American gangster by the name of "Blizzard." This gangster has become full of hatred due to the accidental amputation of his legs as a young child. Blizzard's ultimate sinister plans are to take the legs of the surgeon's (the one that cut off his legs) daughter's fiancé and start an anarchic uprising in the city of San Francisco. Only a man with such repressed hatred could conspire such plans against his fellow man. Lon "The Man of a Thousand Faces" Chaney was appropriately cast as the gangster Blizzard who is bent on misanthropic revenge.

The surgeon's daughter also sculpts a statue of Blizzard in the form of Satan. Blizzard is proud to be immortalized in the rock form of the prince of darkness. He is a man that is well aware of his hatred and his obsession with destroying the lives of others. Blizzard's lack of legs is a constant reminder to himself that he can only do the devil's work. He rabidly laughs in hatred when plotting and discussing destruction. Lon Chaney does a superb job expressing the maniacal laughter of this legless madman. But what is "The Penalty" of a man who has made his life's goal to destroy the lives of others? The price that Blizzard pays is honestly honorable and admirable. Blizzard confronts a fate that has been handed to him by his own actions. Fate unfortunately caused Blizzard to become legless as a child. When Blizzard became older he consciously decided to act cruel and heartless. The reality is that many hateful men like Blizzard die richly without confronting one of their sins. But then again, who knows what is really going on those men's minds. Do they really have the courage to confront who they really are? The Penalty is without doubt one of the finest American silent horror films. My taste in silent horror generally stays in the realm of the masters of German expressionism. The Penalty utilizes psychology horror in a similar way to the German silent masters (I.e. F.W. Murnau's The Last Laugh) yet lacks the intricate set designs. The real wealth of The Penalty lies in Lon Chaney's performance as the sadistic gangster. I honestly haven't divulged too much into his acting career. It is about time that I do.

Wally Koz (1988)

555 is a 1980s shot-on-video horror flick that appeared before the age of digital video. One of the best things about the old days of horror films was that not just anyone could go out and make garbage. Garbage that has now flooded the independent horror world. Until recently, you at least needed a decent chunk of change to create even the lowest quality gore fest. 555 is in the same wretched boat with shot-on-video horror movies like Crazy Fat Ethel 2 and Redneck Zombies. Although these films are complete pieces of zombie shit, they at least offer the viewer something to be entertained by. The most brutal scene in 555 is featured on the direct-to-video VHS release cover. It features a young man's head in the hand of the killer that just decapitated him. The truth is, 555 is low on gore and high on horribly contrived dialogue. For some reason a group of cops are convinced that a Vietnam vet and former POW is a psycho killer that dresses up like a pussy hippy. They are more interested in getting the guy locked up (or more likely killed) than actually providing evidence that incriminates the ex soldier. The pathetic bickering between the cops, an ugly whorish news reporter, and some other clowns takes up most of 555.

The killer resembles something between a homosexual Charles Manson and Rasputin in drag. This lame and fragile looking killer is funnier than he is scary (actually he's not scary at all). Every time this turd popped up on screen I couldn't help but laugh and even feel relieved. The killer's massacring of young couples adds relief from having to hear the genius cops act tough amongst one another. The killer also carries a dagger/knife that looks like a child's toy. The blade on the dagger has a phallic shape that looks like it could be similar in shape to Lucifer's special hot poker. 555 director Wally Koz recently died and apparently he also had a job as a miner/gold inspector. Unsurprisingly he had no film making experience prior to directing 555, which he made with the help of his friends and family. I got the feeling that 555 was more of a "labor of love" than a serious effort in horror film making. The film is something that can be put on when watching with drunk and/or stoned friends. If you don't feel like watching the movie but want to see the handful of killings, forward toward the end of the film as all they killings are recapped. Maybe Wally Koz was trying to help horror fans out with the ending.

THE INHERITORS

Walter Bannert (1983)

When the typical sub-literate American hears the words “German” or “Germany,” Nazi is most likely the first thing to cross the American public school indoctrinated citizen’s thoughtful mind. You can graduate an American high school without ever actually reading a book but you will no doubt know about “the holocaust” and the evils committed by the Teutonic devils during the second World War. For some reason, even Germans of today are held responsible for the deeds of their grandparents and great-grandparents. That being said, one has to be 100% hateful and anti-Social to be a German Neo-Nazi. This is what makes the 1982 German film The Inheritors directed by Walter Bannert so entertaining.

Despite being from Germany, The Inheritors has the same typical cheesy Hollywood productive values so prevalent during the 1980s. The film features long haired Nazis and young men wearing jeans that would look more appropriate on a trailer park Grandma. The Inheritors features very few Aryan looking Germans. In fact, one may even mistake some of these New Wave National Socialist lads as Kosher boys. I like to think that just maybe The Inheritors was a huge hit in the tiny state of Israel. Nothing fuels the homicidal energy of an IDF soldier than thinking about how poor Jews were led like sheep to the gas chambers. With the quality of the Neo-Nazi recruits in The Inheritors, however, one shouldn’t expect a second holocaust. The Inheritors feature two troubled and lonely young men as they pick up the hobby of goose stepping and holocaust denying for fun. The boys are from very different social backgrounds, but they come together for their love of the Fatherland and hatred of their parents. The rich young man featured in The Inheritors has a bitch of mom who can’t help but belittle her son every chance she gets. At least with fatherly Neo-Nazi leaders, the boy seems to have people that care about him. Not only does he have a big group of social misfit friends of all ages, but he also gets to wear a cool red armband. Probably the most offensive scene in The Inheritors is when one of the young and stoic Neo-Nazi teenagers sports an SS regalia uniform minus wearing pants or a shirt. He then forces a willing girl to perform fellatio on him in dedication to the fuehrer (or at least one can only assume). A boy also fucks a girl who couldn’t care less if her suitor is a Nazi. Later the German patriot finds out that the girl used him merely for fun and she now has another man. Neo-Nazi Germany will have no tolerance for sluts that are just in it for the sex and are unwilling to produce Aryan superbabies for the good of the Teutonic race. Despite being about Neo-Nazis, The Inheritors unfortunately does not feature much hate driven political rhetoric or minority beatings. The group is portrayed for the most part as a fringe group that takes photos of anti-patriot German traitors then later beats them to a bloody pulp. The Inheritors kind of reminded me of a John Hughes film without intentional comedy and whiny spoiled American teens. At the end of The Inheritors I felt something truly hateful was missing, but it was a good way to waste 80 minutes or so.

THE CALIFORNIA REICH

Walter F. Parkes (1975)

Whenever the mainstream media documents a group of neo-nazis, they always look for the most impotent and pathetic racist rabble they can find. The prerequisite for a neo-nazi to be on television is homemade swastika armbands, inarticulate philistine idealism, and the blind worship of Adolf Hitler as an invincible Christ-like figure. In the 1975 documentary The California Reich, a group of neo-brownshits hilariously bastardize the American pledge of allegiance with the following catchy jingle, "I pledge of allegiance to Adolf Hitler, the immortal leader of our race and to the new order for which he stands. One great cause, sacred and invincible, the hope and future for all Aryan men. Heil Hitler!" The subjects featured in The California Reich look a little different from the typical modern day media image of bald-headed-albino-neo-nazi-baboons roaming for lone minorities to drag from their beat up Japanese junker trucks as many of the neo-nazi troops featured in the documentary seem like hippies that had a bad trip on acid and forgot about the brilliant metaphysical philosophy of karma. The neo-nazis that do not look like lost Jerry Garcia fans seem like early comic book fans that took the ideology of Superman too seriously and decided to save the world from the reign of Tschandala. In fact, the neo-nazis featured in The California Reich make most of the white nationalists featured in the 1991 documentary Blood in the Face seem like an elite Aryan aristocracy.

In 1966, Garrity exposed the Canadian Jewish Congress's role in organizing Neo-Nazis

While watching most of these neo-nazi SS-schlock-fest documentaries, I always wonder how these gangs of misfit untermensch ever get organized in the first place. One leader of a 1970s era neo-nazi party, Frank Collins, was discovered to have been born Jewish in Dachau concentration camp. In 1979, Collins was arrested for molesting one of the members of his Hitler's Youth group. Despite being a holocaust survivor himself, Collins planned to march his crew of nazi neurotics through Skokie, Illinois, an area that had the most concentrated Jewish population in the United States during that time. Despite winning a landmark legal battle (which gave him undeserved media coverage) to march through Skokie (an area that had a large holocaust survivor population as well), Collins decided to call the march off. It is without question that like his Talmudic brothers, Collins had an instinctive knack for marketing and exploiting legality. Recently, it was revealed by Jewish neo-conservative author Ezra Levant in his latest book, Shakedown, that the Canadian Jewish Congress paid an ex-cop (John Garrity) to infiltrate a Neo-Nazi organization. Garrity was used to build up the membership of the neo-nazi group and professionally organize them so that they would at least be worthy of sensational media coverage. The ultimate goal of the Canadian Jewish Congress was to give to the appearance of a perceived neo-nazi threat so that Canadian freedom of speech would be partly demolished (eventually resulting in Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act) to satisfy the conspiring Judaic organization's desire to criminalize criticism against Canadian Jewry. Knowing this cryptic propaganda war led by a prominent Jewish organization, it is not hard for me to question who funded and organized the group of degenerate fan-boy-fascists featured in The California Reich. In fact, the American Nazi party unit commander in Los Angeles, California was at one time a Jewish homosexual named Leonard Holstein, a fact that American Nazi Party leader George Lincoln Rockwell (whose father was a Vaudevillian comedian that was friends with Jewish propagandist Walter Winchell and Groucho Marx) was well aware of. Crypto-Jew Daniel Burros, the man that was the inspiration for Henry Bean's engaging film The Believer, was also the American Nazi Party's greatest propagandist.

Aside from a couple of the sapless stormtroopers, none of the neo-nazi leaders featured in The California Reich seem to be of the chosen race. Neo-nazi leader of the San Francisco movement, Allen Vincent, is clearly a schizoid individual who openly admits that he developed a second personality while being detained in various reform schools and prisons. Facts like these make The California Reich an often unintentionally hilarious documentary, certainly not a production capable of recruiting functioning individuals for the neo-Hitlerite movement. I especially enjoyed a scene in the documentary where a man wearing a swastika Santa Clause costume comes into nazi headquarters and gives out presents to good little Aryan boys and girls. Easily, the individual with the most martial prowess and discipline featured in The California Reich is Ken McAllister, a factory worker and former small arms instructor for the marines. The most delusional (but seemingly harmless) neo-nazi featured in the documentary is Paul Raymond, a good ol' boy who lives in a small town (only a square mile in size) and drives around in his brother's intimidating military truck (with a swastika on the door). Raymond brags about how not many towns can claim they have an active neo-nazi movement, proving that even rural Americans have wild dreams. What all of the neo-nazi leaders featured in The California Reich have in common is that they have no idea how impotent their situation is and no matter how many times they pray to their homemade altars of Adolf Hitler, nothing will change their hopeless cause.

The only thing that slightly disturbed me about The California Reich is the behavior of the neo-nazi's children in the documentary. One parent asks his 5 year old child what he wants to be when he grows up and he replies, "Police-man." When the parent asks the child why he wants to be a policeman, he simply replies, "Kill Niggers." It is one thing for the neo-nazis to teach their children racist views but another to ingrain them at an early age with such barbaric and pointless racial slurs that only further compound the social problems that are bound to come about revolving around their 'unconventional' upbringing. I would actually like to see a documentary featuring the children of The California Reich as they are now. I doubt they haven adopted the esoteric Hitlerism occult philosophies of Savitri Devi and Miguel Serrano as it is doubtful their parents ever took the time to read (let alone understand) Mein Kampf. It would be no surprise to me if these children grew up to be crackheads and enthusiastic participants in miscegenation. After all, if any racial pride should exist in white folks, it should be in European kultur, honest work, and cultural achievement, not in the materialistic obsession with the lack of melanin in ones skin (something that afrocentric types always obsess over). The Third Reich may have only lasted 12 years but the California Reich never existed. Modern day California could be best described as reconquista-California-wreck.

Walter Grauman (1974)

I would be lying if I did not confess that, despite my lifelong interest in true crime and dark subjects in general, I oftentimes get an instantaneous sense of guttural disgust every time I hear about films that—whether intentionally or unintentionally—superficially depict and/or glorify serial killers like David Fincher’s SE7EN (1995) and most of the Hannibal Lecter franchise flicks, so it comes as somewhat of a slightly dark irony that Manhunter (1986) directed by Michael Mann (The Last of the Mohicans, Heat) is, at least in some ways, one of my favorite films of all-time, but, then again, I love it more because of its style and mise-en-scène than its savage subject matter. Indeed, while I also have some nostalgic affection for Jonathan Demme’s The Silence of the Lambs (1991)—the second and certainly most popular cinematic adaptation of Thomas Harris’ ‘Hannibal the Cannibal’ novels—Mann’s inordinately corpse cold yet cool and visually mystifying movie is certainly the one I find myself coming back to most often as a serial killer flick that manages to be more stylistically slick than it is thematically sick as if directed by a super sophisticated extraterrestrial with a detached perspective of Lustmord and human emotions and behavior in general. Once described favorably by a reviewer from the Financial Times as, “If Dostoevsky had been hired to script an episode of MIAMI VICE,” the film was actually (but, somehow, unsurprisingly) a commercial bomb that achieved more successful in Europe than the United States and would not achieve the cult status it has today until years of cable TV syndication and various home video releases and of course the great commercial and critical success of The Silence of the Lambs.

Originally filmed under the same name as Harris’ source novel Red Dragon (1981), Manhunter was, to the chagrin of auteur Mann, rechristened at the behest of Dino De Laurentiis as the (in)famous Italian producer did not want the film to be confused with Michael Cimino’s shockingly underrated and rather racially based box office bomb Year of the Dragon (1985). Needless to say, the title of the film is not the only thing that De Laurentiis defiled as the same producer, who previously reedited both John Milius’ Conan the Barbarian (1982) and David Lynch’s Dune (1984), also had Mann’s movie cut for time yet luckily the standard cut is arguably more immaculate than the director’s cut (which is less than ten minutes longer) as it flows better and has a more otherworldly alien vibe due to missing various exposition scenes. Apparently heavily visually influenced by the ‘high style’ of great production designer Ferdinando Scarfiotti, who was behind such great works as Bernardo Bertolucci’s The Conformist (1970) and Luchino Visconti’s Death in Venice (1971), around the time he started Miami Vice (1984-1990), Mann had certainly yet to develop his signature aesthetic when he directed his first (made-for-TV) movie The Jericho Mile (1979), but his first two theatrical releases Thief (1981) and The Keep (1983) unequivocally demonstrate a singular visual worthy of an old master that feels like a sort of Kubrick-meets-Friedkin neo-expressionist chic (incidentally, according to Friedkin biographer Nat Segaloff, Mann originally wanted the fellow Chicago Jewish filmmaker to play Hannibal).

While the novels of source writer Thomas Harris are clearly based on real-life serial killers to the point of gross cliché, Manhunter is completely contra John McNaughton's Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer (1986) when it comes to aesthetic refinement. Indeed, as Mann once stated himself in regard to his special school of serial killer filmmaking, "I get bored if I treat the events realistically. I'd rather try to conceptualize them. The torments of the human mind included. I think that I express the fantasies in an expressionist way, which always brings me to the fantastic." For example, instead of depicting the serial killer's more aberrant ritualistic/fetishistic behavior like ejaculating at the site of his less than festive family slaughters and placing glass in women's vaginas like in Harris' source novel, Mann's morosely mad Francis Dollarhyde has a super chic new wave bachelor pad where he blasts Iron Butterfly's "In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida" while attempting to blow bullets into the boys-in-blue during the film's semi-surreal climax. Additionally, whereas The Silence of the Lambs—a film that is, somewhat ironically, undoubtedly Demme's most critically and commercially success work yet arguably intentionally least overtly 'Demme-esque'—is a coldly clinical yet surprisingly 'light' serial killer flick that feels like it could have been directed by its serial killer 'antihero' Hannibal (after all, he is the true hero of the film), Mann's movie is marvelously Mann-esque in the best sense as a singularly stylish cinematic work where, unlike the auteur's previous unfortunately uneven gothic-horror-holocaust hybrid The Keep (1983), the auteur seamlessly assimilates his style to its source novel (though Harris apparently does not feel the same and apparently only had positive things to say about Scottish actor Brian Cox's performance as Hannibal). While it might be fair to describe Manhunter as virtual audiovisual porn for hopelessly 1980s nostalgic aesthetes, it is also one highly memorable movie that, arguably quite unlike the arguably contrived, cold, and calculated The Silence of the Lambs, rewards the viewer on subsequent viewings. In short, Manhunter is, contrary to bien pensant film dorks and lamestream film critics alike, the most idiosyncratic and masterful of the 'Hannibal Lecter' (or, in this case, Hannibal Lecktor) films and it is also, somewhat ironically, the least faithful to its source novel (not surprisingly, Hannibal Rising (2007) is the only film that Harris penned the screenplay for and it is indubitably the worst film in the uniquely uneven franchise), not to mention the fact that it does not even feature Sir Philip Anthony Hopkins (who seemed to want to blot out fellow Brit Brian Cox's Hannibal from cinema history when he cynically opted to appear in zio-hack Brett Ratner's patently pointless 2002 'remake' Red Dragon).

MANHUNTER

I have to confess that it is probably Demme's The Silence of the Lambs and its inclusion of songs like "Alone" by Colin Newman and "Goodbye Horses" by Q Lazzarus (which was later covered in a Buffalo Bill-esque fashion by the Tollund Men) that sparked my initial interest in goth, deathrock, and darkwave music. and thus I see it as a sort of early formative film in my life as a cinephilic aesthete but I also simply cannot deny that Manhunter—a film with its own similarly crucial and potent (yet sometimes admittedly goofy) soundtrack—is, for me, the stronger, more immaculate, and idiosyncratically aesthetically satisfying film in almost every single way. Also, Mann's movie does not have the unintentionally campy cartoon antics of Anthony Hopkins to throw one out of the film. Indeed, while he might not be much more than a creepy cipher, I have to confess that I am more of a Buffalo Bill bro than a Lecter lover (Of course, the same could be more or less said for Cox's Lecter and Francis 'The Tooth Fairy' Dollarhyde, though Cox never becomes cartoonish). Whereas Demme's film is a slick adaptation of Harris' novel that features just enough artistic flourishes and 'pop pathos' to make it memorable and satisfying enough to be a highly re-watchable classic, Manhunter is a film that is, not unlike like Stanley Kubrick's horror classic The Shining (1980), an exemplary example of an auteur totally transcending the source material and creating something great in spite of its obscenely overrated source writer. In short, Manhunter feels like a stand-alone film and certainly not the forgotten first film of an increasingly sociopathic and sleazy film-cum-TV franchise that, at least in thematic and aesthetic terms, seems rather ironically committed to spiritual cannibalism. Still fresh after forty years (whereas Rat(n)er's remake is hopelessly and painfully typical of the 2000s in every single way, including its absurd casting of perennially hokey human dildo Ed Norton as Will Graham), Mann's movie might as well be the creation of an extraterrestrial entity as it has a look and feel the screams uncanny utopia despite technically diving deep into dark hearts and demented delirium. Indeed, somehow Manhunter manages to put scenic oceanic sunsets on the same aesthetic, and in turn, emotional, plane as serial killer bachelor pads without seeming too schlocky or silly and this is exactly one of the reasons the film is so great.

While certainly a rare film where the style almost creates the substance, Manhunter still has an interesting storyline that touches on some aberrantly compelling themes. Indeed, the story of an (ex)FBI profiler named Will Graham (William Petersen) who reluctantly gets back in the game to catch a super sick family-slaughtering serial killer simply known as the 'The Tooth Fairy' (Tom Noonan) and, even more reluctantly, seeks the professional criminal profiling advice of another serial killer by the name of Dr. Hannibal Lecter (Brian Cox) who was responsible for causing him to abscond to a heavenly Florida beach from his prestigious G-man position due to a mental breakdown caused by a near deadly altercation while apprehending said homicidal Herr Döktor, the film largely successfully manages to juggle both the internal struggles of the protagonist and the killer he is trying to catch whilst wowing the viewer with an aesthetic package that is no less meticulous than a Kubrick flick. As the film's title, which undoubtedly has a dual meaning referencing both protagonist Graham and the Tooth Fairy, certainly indicates, Manhunter is also a film about the soul-draining psychological struggle of the hunt, albeit in a somewhat less obvious way than say the 1932 pre-Code classic The Most Dangerous Game (notably surprisingly, David Fincher would make reference to the film in his uneven Zodiac (2007)). Notably, the film also confirms Georges Bataille's words, "Sacrifice though, while like war a suspension of the commandment not to kill, is the religious act above all others," albeit in a somewhat sick ironical way where the serial killer's preternatural self-stylized religious views result in pretty much the opposite of his intent. While featuring content that is less sexually subversive (for example, the Tooth Fairy is a virtual necrophile in the book and a "secretor" that, among other things, wedges a piece of glass in a female victim's labia) and an ending that is certainly happier than its source novel, Mann's movie is only superficially normie-friendly, hence its somewhat fitting relegation to the cult realm.

Due to SE7EN and various numerous The Silence of the Lambs-inspired virtual crappy carbon-copy clones and cons like Hebraic hack Jon Amiel's feminist filmic feces Copycat (1995) and Dominic Sena's conspicuously anti-Southern/anti-white trash-masquerading-as-art Kalifornia (1993), the serial killer (sub)genre has largely become an all-around artistically bankrupt trend and the singular stylistic majesty of a film like Manhunter in comparison to such frivolous filth really underscores that (a great example of the nadir of the (sub)genre is the Gary Busey vehicle Rough Draft (1998) aka Diary of a Serial Killer). Indeed, I recently watched The Golden Glove (2019) aka Der Goldene Handschuh—a film based on the excremental escapades of Hamburg-based dipsomaniacal serial-whore-killer Fritz Honka—and it is not simply because of its tiresome Turkmite auteur Fatih Akin's glaringly grotesque anti-kraut angle that the film is so painfully insufferable (after all, Iranian auteur Sohrab Shaheed Salles' epic morbid whorehouse (anti)melodrama Utopia (1983) is hardly Teutonophile-friendly yet it is a virtual unsung masterpiece of sorts). While The Golden Glove is surely a sick and repulsive film that does not inspire one's faith in humanity, it is also a rather redundant piece of cinematic rehash that owes absolutely everything to German Lustmord cinema history of the past ranging from Fritz Lang's M (1931) to Robert Siodmak's The Devil Strikes at Night (1957) aka Nachts wenn der Teufel kam to Ulli Lommel's The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe to Jörg Buttgerit's Schramm (1993). Likewise, Austrian one-time auteur Gerald Kargl's Angst (1983)—a film that, among other things, heavily informed Argentinean-French auteur Gaspar Noé's entire style and practically single-handedly reinvented the serial killer (sub)genre (though few people noticed aside from Noé and Buttgereit)—makes The Golden Glove seem like primitive child's play by comparison in terms of its seemingly immaculate combination of enterprising technique and viscerally grotesque subject matter, but I digress. Of course, the serial killer subject matter of Manhunter almost feels secondary, if not irrelevant, as the film is an exercise in pure unmitigated style, which becomes apparent when one watches director Mann's previous different genre works like Thief and The Keep.

While The Silence of the Lambs is noted for being a crucial influence on The X-Files (1993–2018), especially before the show turned into a bad (and oftentimes unintentional) joke (incidentally, Tom 'The Tooth Fairy' Noonan would also appear as a serial killer in the great fourth season The X-Files episode 'Paper Hearts,' albeit of the all the more putrid pederastic sort), few seem to recognize the imperative aesthetic and thematic influence that Manhunter had on the show's creator Chris Carter's following series Millennium (1996–1999). Described by some as a sort of 'The Thinking Man's The X-Files,' the show is decidedly darker and more esoteric than Carter's hit extraterrestrial-centered excursion and, not unlike Manhunter, centers on a moody and broody (ex)FBI agent that has a special talent for entering the oftentimes highly hermetic minds of serial killers, though it comes at the hefty metaphysically-draining price of destroying both his mental health and family life (indeed, as Harris describes the character of Will Graham in his novel, "He viewed his own mentality as grotesque but useful, like a chair made of antlers."). Of course, both Manhunter and William Friedkin's similarly aesthetically potent and idiosyncratic To Live and Die in L.A. (1985) would lead actor William Petersen to a lifelong career as a fictional cop, most notably (but unfortunately) the almost lethally lame CBS drama series CSI: Crime Scene Investigation (2000–2015). While it is a damn shame that Petersen later opted for such light and lame roles in shit shows that are made to further pacify braindead boomers, he apparently had his reasons, or as he once claimed in regard to symbolically committing character hara-kiri, "After MANHUNTER, I had to actually kill off the character. I cut off most of my hair and dyed it blond. I changed my whole look just to get rid of him." Aside from television, Manhunter apparently had some influence in the English neofolk scene as Tony Wakeford's main musical outfit Sol Invictus (in collaboration with Evil Twin) sampled dialogue from Brian Cox's Hannibal Lecter for the epic 15-minute song "A Palace Of Worms."

Not unlike his fellow working-class kosher Chicagoan William Friedkin, Mann stands out among the stereotypical Hebraic Hollywood filmmaker in terms of his complete and utter lack of bullshit, sharp yet fair cynicism, and unwavering commitment to certain streetwise truths. For example, Mann's underrated NBC series Crime Story (1986-1988)—a dark and gritty show that depicts a virtual anti-romance between an destructively obsessive wop cop and his guido gangster 'other-half'—depicts, among other things, Judaic leftist lawyers, Hebraic hoods and gangsters (notably, Ted 'Buffalo Bill' Levine even portrays a proudly koserh thug that literally moonlights as a lounge singer) and the auteur-cum-producer even had the gall to allow Abel Ferrara to direct the show's feature-length pilot episode. In Manhunter, Mann also cleverly cast Stephen Lang as degenerate tabloid journalist 'Freddy Lounds' in a pitch perfect performance worthy of Der Stürmer that totally blows away Philip Seymour Hoffman's lazy lame duck performance as the same character in rat-boy Ratner's patently pointless 're-make' Red Dragon. Needless to say, it is no small surprise as to why Manhunter received its greatest initial success in Europa where hubristic phoniness is more frowned upon and where the film was described by some as a masterpiece and favorably compared to Dostoevsky at a time when mindless and/or childish big budget blockbusters were vogue and escapism was the norm.

Speaking of Miami Vice, the hit NBC show touched on the theme of the thin line between art and criminality with its excellent fourth season episode 'Death and the Lady' where a pretentious art-porn auteur named Milton Glantz virtually anticipates Teutonic artsploitation auteur Marian Dora by making an artsy fartsy pornographic snuff film. Of course, Manhunter's Francis 'The Tooth Fairy' Dollarhyde is an aberrant avant-garde artist of sorts that, as inspired by his warped quasi-spiritual metapolitical influence from William Blake—a genius that Camille Paglia once somewhat rightly described, especially in the context of the film, as, "...the British Sade, as Emily Dickinson is the American Sade"—leaves behind ambitious artistic creations in the form of his grisly crime scenes (notably, Scottish auteur Donald Cammell touched on similar themes in a more overt way with his underrated third and ultimately penultimate film White of the Eye (1987)). Undoubtedly, what makes Manhunter different from all the other Hannibal Lec(k)tor films is that it makes art out of the socially aberrant phenomenon of Lußtmord while recognizing the (failed) transcendental potential of Lußtmord. Indeed, while the Tooth Fairy believes that, as Hannibal explains, "if one does what God does enough times, one will become as God is," he is left dead in the end lying on his back with worthless 'wings' of blood instead of achieving the beautifully brutal Blakeian Red Dragon of his deep dark dreams. As Mann himself explained himself in regard to the sort of person that degenerates into a serial killer, "...when people are not human anymore, they become bits... of matter." Had the Tooth Fairy not degenerated into a virtual black void of a man that finds it hard to even maintain a successful romantic relationship with an overly eager blind chick that is completely willing to overlook his social retardation, he might he became an artist worthy of making something in the vein of a great cinematic work like Michael Powell's Peeping Tom (1960)—a film that features a filmmaker ‘antihero’ of sorts that, not unlike Dollarhyde, enjoys shooting footage of his victims—instead of wasting his life on senselessly wasting other people. In fact, I would not be surprised if Mann’s films—most of which feature some sorts of criminal antihero—were the direct result of some pathological therapeutic need to express some criminal tendency. Also, I am pretty sure that there are tons of morons out there that consider films like Thief, Manhunter, L.A. Takedown (1989), Heat (1995), Collateral (2004), and Public Enemies (2009) to be more obscene than actual criminal acts.

As has been more than obviously alluded to throughout this review, the serial killer film has become a mostly banal ghetto genre that provides the mindless masses with an appeal to their more base instincts while simultaneously conveniently offering them an alibi for their darkest desires via disgustingly disingenuous pseudo-moralistic sermonizing, hence the importance of a film like Kargl’s Angst where, quite unlike Fincher’s SE7EN—a film that depicts its ‘John Doe’ character portrayed by Kevin Spacey as having virtual godlike powers in terms of keen intelligent and ascetic devotion—the killer is revealed to be not much more sophisticated than a drooling retard in terms of his thoughts and social skills. Undoubtedly, the genius of Manhunter is its equal distribution of aesthetic refinement, entertainment value, and moral integrity as a rather revolutionary serial killer flick that transcends the genre ghetto while somehow simultaneously paying tribute to it. In that sense, Mann’s movie anticipates the first season of True Detective (2014), though it provides you with a completely different aesthetic experience as a film that, despite its dark and dejecting true crime-inspired subject matter, is an absolute narcotizing joy in terms of sheer audiovisual prowess. Indeed, in that sense, Francis Dollarhyde might as well be Mann speaking to the filmgoer in regard to Manhunter when he defiantly declares: “It is in your nature to do one thing correctly: Tremble.”

Indeed, while that might sound like it is plagued with puffery, I dare anyone else to name another film where the filmmaker somehow gets away with depicting a superlatively sexually dysfunctional and atypically autistic creep as the sort of Beau Brummell of serial killers. Additionally, Mann’s movie certainly passes Paglia’s test in terms of genre as demonstrated by her words, “Gothic horror must be moderated by Apollonian discipline, or it turns into gross buffoonery. The run-of-the-mill horror film is anti-aesthetic and anti-idealizing. Its theme is sparagmos, the form-pulverizing energies of Dionysus. Horror films unleash the forces repressed by Christianity—evil and the barbarism of nature. Horror films are rituals of pagan worship.” Of course, Manhunter is both an expression and cautionary tale about such expressions of atavistic pagan worship where a damaged serial killer dudes self-destructive under the weight of his own increasing Dionysian drunkenness. Admittedly, Mann’s movie is similar to most serial killer films (aside from, say, Zodiac) in the sense that it demonstrates that is only a matter of time before a serial killer fucks up. Unfortunately, the same can also be said of Mann's post-Heat career. After all, Manhunter may seem like a rather bleak film for the 1980s as an era that personified feel-good escapism and pie-in-the-sky utopias, but it seems rather uplifting compared to something like his Miami Vice (2006) movie reboot and his dreary Dillinger Gang flick Public Enemies. Undoubtedly, Mann's serial killer film is pure 1980s in the best sort of way as the auteur arguably exemplified the zeitgeist more than any other American filmmaker, so it almost seems like an artistic sin that he would work past the 1990s, let alone well into the 2010s, hence the steady drastic decline of his work.

THE LAUGHING MAN - CONFESSIONS OF A MURDERER

Walter Heynowski (1966)

If there was ever a German soldier whose life vaguely resembled that of the character of Colonel Walter E. Kurtz played by Marlon Brando in Apocalypse Now (1979), it is most unequivocally Siegfried Müller aka "Kongo" Müller; a veteran of the Wehrmacht who emigrated to the Republic of South Africa in 1962 and became a lethal Lieutenant for "Mad" Mike Hoare's mercenary outfit during the Congo Crisis in 1964. Although Müller never developed the murderous mania that would propel the character of Kurtz into acting as a virtual God for psychotic Southeastern Asian savages and revolting against his own country, the Teutonic trooper did wallow in a world of alcohol-fueled murder and souvenir skull collecting, thus leading some to believe he hit the terminal Third World nation with a tidal wave of Teuton terror. After being first featured in the documentary Kommando 52 (1965), Müller – a supposed 'alive and well Nazi' hunting wild buck Negroes in the Congo – become an easy (with his Nazi medals and all) yet dubious icon of Western 'neo-colonialism.' Cinephiles might remember Kongo Müller and his death's-head obsessed mercenaries from Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi's Mondo masterpiece Africa Addio (1966); a devastating yet delightful documentary of discourteous death chronicling the bitter and brutal end of the colonial era in Africa. Müller was also the inspiration for the character of Henlein (Peter Carsten) from the underrated mercenary war-action flick Dark of the Sun (1968) aka The Mercenaries directed by Jack Cardiff, but unlike the fictional character created in anti-tribute to the German soldier, the real-life warrior was far from a pompous psychopath who attempted to slaughter his own multicultural compatriots as a true soldier's soldier who took care of all his men despite their continent of origin. In the East German documentary Der Lachende Mann - Bekenntnisse eines Mörders (1966) aka The Laughing Man - Confessions of a Murderer directed by Walter Heynowski and Gerhard Scheumann, one is treated to a focused face-to-face interview with Siegfried Müller about his strikingly singular life as one of only a handful of men who fought on both the Eastern Front during the Second World War and saw the African colonies crumble before his vivacious eyes. Condemned as an out-and-out Nazi who never severed his relationship with the swastika due to his insistence on proudly wearing the Iron Cross 1st Class he earned from the Third Reich during the Second World War despite now siding with the United States, Müller is treated like a born-again Aryan assassin in The Laughing Man by the completely compromised East Germany communist directors, but in the end, the charismatic career soldier would have the last laugh.

Beginning the production under determinedly dubious and totally false pretense by posing as a West German TV production team, deluded documentarians Walter Heynowski and Gerhard Scheumann lost any sense of journalistic objectivity before even beginning to shoot a single frame of film for The Laughing Man, but I guess one should not expect anything less from corrupted kraut commies who masterfully massage the Slavic hands that feed them. Aptly titled The Laughing Man due to Kongo Müller's seemingly permanent smirk, it probably would not be an exaggeration to say that the German mercenary has a grin that would cause Conrad Veidt's character Gwynplaine in The Man Who Laughs (1928) to curtail his razor sharp Comprachico-constructed grimace. The son of a Lieutenant colonel in the German Wehrmacht (army), Prussian commando Siegfried Müller was born for war and, indeed, he waged it like a rebel warrior from the postcolonial era long before the European colonies ever capitulated. As someone who fought on the Eastern Front for the better part of the Second World War, Müller disguised himself as a Polish peasant by day, thus utilizing guerrilla rebellion tactics of 'undercover war' before desperate yellow, black, and brown people ever had the chance to murder their masters. Müller had his "Baptism of Fire" during the outbreak of World War II in 1939 on the Silesian-Polish frontier, earned the rank of 'First Lieutenant' on Hitler's birthday, and would conclude with war in 1945 by being partially lamed via a bullet in the backbone at the time of the Fatherland's apocalyptic defeat. After managing to escape from the East and becoming an American POW, Müller served with the Americans in the so-called Industrial police for two years, served with NATO in German units during the Korean war, and worked as an assistant manager at a hotel and restaurant (especially focusing on the bar as he likes a "good drink"), but the Congo was calling and he heroically answered as a European commando on permanent vacation in Africa with a special self-proclaimed interest in "revolutionary war." In the communist eyes of Heynowski and Scheumann, Kongo Müller is nothing more than a rare live killer Nazi on the loose who is bringing the same devastation to African negroes as he purportedly did to Eastern European Hebrews and their Slav compatriots. As for Müller, he believes his campaign in Africa is only similar to his tours of Europe in one manner: anti-bolshevism. Indeed, Müller makes no lie that he and his men, "are fighting in Africa for Europe" and that he it would be a "great pleasure" for him to join a Vietnam Legion and battle the Viet Cong. As a matter-of-fact kind of guy, especially when drinking his favorite alcoholic beverage (apparently, he adopted his affinity for firewater due to the "stagnant water" in Africa), Kongo Müller states quite proudly that it was, "necessary to show the blacks that white men were there, since the whites still have a fantastic name in Africa." Aside from discussing his bloody battles against rebels and his hobby of head-hunting and totenkopf trophy-collecting, Müller also discusses his strong relationship with the Goethe-Institut (aka Goethe Institute) and the need to spread Teutonic kultur around the world. Needless to say, killer cool commando Kongo Müller is a proud kraut through and through who brought carnage and charisma to the decidedly dark continent.

THE LAUGHING MAN - CONFESSIONS OF A MURDERER

Originally banned in West Germany for a number of years, The Laughing Man was quite hard to track down for many years for obvious reasons, but with the fall of the Berlin wall and 1990 German reunification, the documentary is nothing more than a curious piece of celluloid history. Essentially, directors Walter Heynowski and Gerhard Scheumann use Kongo Müller as propaganda 'proof' that West Germany, its master the United States, and its allies were run by crypto-fascists/capitalist-pigs with the career soldier – a man who proudly sports his Nazi Iron Cross – acting as sadist symbol of this worldwide 'Fourth Reich' of the free world. Inter-splicing photographs of mutilated Mandingo men and white men carrying white African skulls, the directors of The Laughing Man make it more than clear that Commie propaganda is all about Freudian projection as Müller's battles against rebels only deserve a feeble footnote when compared to Holodomor (a man-made Bolshevik-led famine that killed upwards of 7 million Ukrainians between 1932 and 1933), Maoist famines (which killed no less than 30 million between 1958 and 1961), and the countless communist campaigns of carnage that have raged throughout the African continent during the second half of the twentieth century. Now a cult film of sorts due to influential cineaste Amos Vogel's inclusion of the documentary in his revolutionary film history book Film as a Subversive Art (1972), The Laughing Man is now guaranteed a cinematic legacy of sorts, but, of course, being a politically radical Viennese Jew who was involved with early socialist Zionist groups as a youth and fled Austria during the National Socialist Anschluss in 1938, the film critic probably had his own personal reasons for including the documentary in his movie manual magnum opus. While Kongo Müller must have been Vogel's most daunting daytime nightmare in documentary form, I found the infamous mercenary mini-Führer to be an engaging relic of the past that is no longer relevant in the contemporary world. A micro-statured yet marvelously murderous man's man who found himself ill-equipped to live the civilian life after spending every single year of the Second World War battling Bolsheviks, only to see his beloved nation experience defeat, Kongo Müller naturally resumed his anti-rebel activities as a career mercenary in the Congo. If one thing is for sure, it is that Müller had marvelous taste in movies as indicated by his remark that Gualtiero Jacopetti – a man surely of greater artistic cinematic talent than Heynowski and Scheumann – is a "good director." Still, The Laughing Man is a must-see for history buffs and it certainly features more than a couple of laughs. After all, Kongo Müller manages to finish a bottle of Pernod by the end of the documentary as a bodacious blond beast who brought the antidote to the bolshevik bug in Africa. Unfortunately, diseases travel rather quickly in the Third World.

THE WARRIORS

Walter Hill (1979)

I must be slacking in regards to Hollywood philistine cinema because until the other night I had yet to see The Warriors. Going into the film, I did not have any serious expectations as far as quality cinema goes. Now after watching The Warriors, I must admit it is a fun barbaric flick full of cheesy gang romanticism. Essentially, The Warriors is the perfect film for those people that can only tolerate the first 1/3 of Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange. The Warriors has all the ultra-violence minus the intellectual pessimism that most Americans do not seem to be too fond of. Sure, The Warriors maybe a dystopian gang war film set sometime in the near future but I find such a world ideal. After all, there is no diversity in the modern world (most gangs taking their "cultural" cues from the American Negro) but the world that the Warriors battle in is as colorful as a rainbow on fire.

Like A Clockwork Orange before it, The Warriors immediately influenced vandalism (and even death) when it was initially screened in theaters for American audiences. Any film that influences violence and death is certainly doing something right for all great cinema has the ability to change reality. In a way, The Warriors director Walter Hill is a postmodern magician, an individual who through the power of cinema has manipulated reality with his own auteur vision. Of course, there is nothing brilliant or intellectually exceptional about the film itself. The Warriors is like a drug that brings excitement and potent entertainment from beginning to end, certainly positive cinematic qualities few films hold.

One of the most interesting aspects of The Warriors is that each gang has their own distinct wardrobe. Sure, most of these urban warfare uniforms look quite tacky nowadays but they certainly beat the jungle "uniforms" most modern gangs wear. After all, for all the talk of diversity in America, this country is becoming quite homogenized and mongrelized. The world of The Warriors features wild boy homo Dingos, effeminate Negro pimpz, baseball clowns, and multicultural skinheads. The protagonist gang, the Warriors, wear a humble yet masculine uniform of leather. The Rogues, the enemy gang of the Warriors, would have been better described as The Scorpio Rising gang in tribute to the Kenneth Anger film of the same name. The Rogues is led by a little loudmouthed turd by the name of Luther (played by David Patrick Kelly of Twin Peaks infamy) who is easily the most memorable yet despicable character in the film.

Another positive aspect of The Warriors, strangely enough, is the "love interest" Mercy. Unfortunately for Mercy, she is from a part of town where the loser gang the Orphans reside. When the Warriors walk through Orphan territory, Mercy makes sure to check out every swinging dick, finally catching her lovely eyes on alpha-warrior Swan. Like a lost kitten, Mercy stalks the the Warriors even after they attempt to throw her away various times like a used condom. Mercy is like a femme fatale minus the brains for her only desire is sex with an alpha and possibly a better life, certainly a girl that does not aspire to be much aside from living in the moment. Angelic (but not angel) Mercy is the kind of woman all feminists should aspire to be.

Apparently, hack action director Tony Scott is planning a loose remake of The Warriors set in Los Angeles. Scott hopes to use real gang members in his dubious remake of the 1979 classic. With all the vintage character of The Warriors, a remake only seems like it could be at best a rotten piece of stillborn cinema, a film that should have never be born and that should be soon forgotten. Of course, with the solely monetary-driven businessmen at Hollywood any remake guarantees an audience (and financial success). It will surely be a dark day for cinema when some Hollywood producer has the audacity to remake A Clockwork Orange. On a more positive note, at least we still have the originals as I will surely be re-watching The Warriors sometime again this year.

UNDISPUTED

Walter Hill (2002) As a rabid fan of cinema, my knowledge of film knows no bounds. I watch at least 1 film a day, regardless if I'm even at work. In my frequent studies, I have generated an endless repertoire of cinema related know-hows and likings. What started as a lust for arthouse films and avant-garde oddities soon expanded into the undying action genre, not just any action, but black action. Undisputed is a contender for heavyweight action film of the world. It's one of those films that have no limits on entertainment or career-turning performances. Undisputed is that one popular film amongst urban audiences that hasn't generated much publicity and bombed in the box office thanks to Shyamalan's Signs. In the year 2006, a DTV sequel was released which I had no interest at viewing and purposely avoided like the plague. Undisputed is a simple structured film based on the legacy of reputation. The plot in a few sentences: Ving Rhames is the heavyweight champion of the world, gets convicted of date rape and is sent to Sweetwater prison. There, he gets in a prison match with former champion and undefeated Monroe (Snipes). This film is, at heart, a boxing film strategically forged to please action fans. Walter Hill (The Warriors) has created a film that not only entertains me, but also moves me. You might be oblivious to the emotions behind this film, but I'm not. The melancholy that is always apparent within Monroe is only an addition to his fighter spirit. Undisputed owes a lot to similar film In Hell starring Van Damme. Both of these are worthy prison fighting films but In Hell is a much darker experience. Undisputed is a sucker punch in the face for anyone who expects any less. This is a film that throws in various makeshift elements in order to diversify the film, the only difference is that it works. Wesley Snipes plays a spiritual fighter who builds toothpick structures and Ving Rhames plays the bad ass douche bag, and together they create the greatest boxing film ever.

THE WALL MAN
THE WALL MAN

Wataru Hayakawa (2007)

There's something entirely fascinating with watching absurdities and surreal ideas being transposed to the format of film. A strange necessity of awkwardness makes the experience a bizarre one; one that can't be mimicked by another format unless you're passionate enough. Such is the experience I had with watching The Wall Man. I'd attempted to watch it several times over the course of a night but always blacked out. This film doesn't really get interesting till 20 minutes or so in. The visual tirade known simply as The Wall Man does one thing flawlessly; it successfully alienates the audience in a way that can only be described as an out-of-body experience. Imagine the general idea that Lynch has always aimed for but with an Asiatic mentality. The statuesque figures of wrinkled old men are replaced with Japanese men that photograph blank walls endlessly. If a film could ever bare the title of "Lynchian", this would be a definitive case. The Wall Man is a work reflecting what's great about David Lynch. The execution might not be top-notch but the atmosphere is dense; so dense that you could slice it with a knife. The only real blame could be laid on the wacky acting performance by lead actress Mayumi Ono. Her enthusiasm is the same illness that plagues many of the more aspirational Asian actor/ress. A script this intense and thought out couldn't have been birthed directly as a script. If you must know, the original source data is derived from a short piece of Japanese manga, like most absurd stories. While the legendary Hideshi Hino mainly adapts tales of macabre grotesque horror, The Wall Man is more of an avant-garde psyche piece of supernatural fiction. A reporter for a rumor tabloid program receives a postcard telling the short, but sweet story of the Wall Man; an entity living in the walls that watches everything. The level of fiction is surpassed involuntarily on several occasions as the leads play off on many visual metaphors, many of which seem to proclaim us, the viewers, as the Wall Men. After all, we do watch their charades endlessly and we are everything. Apart from the depth that at times feels contrived, The Wall Man is an excellent piece of bizzarro fiction. Again, the film is not without its flaws but the latter can be overlooked effortlessly as long as "slow" films don't overload your minuscule attention span. If you enjoy arthouse films, this deserves an immediate viewing. He's captured the general idea that Lynch has been chasing for years. Think the insanity of Inland Empire but honed to an earnest execution that amiably entertains while nourishing. The Wall Man is often unnerving and always mysterious. You might not get it and you never will. Art is rare and fallible. You must look past what you don't appreciate and scope it out from a different vantage. After all, who could really enjoy Begotten? That film serves more as lure for sexy "indie" females than a generous film experience.

A JOURNEY INTO BLISS

Wenzel Storch (2004)

After being introduced to the films of Wenzel Storch by Nekromantik producer Manfred Jelinski, I immediately hunted down the three feature-length works that were lovingly created by the German avant-garde auteur. If you ever wondered what a German mind would be like on LSD, the rainbow-colored surrealist fantasy films of Mr. Storch will no doubt provide you with such a seemingly bizarre, yet heavenly combination. Wenzel Storch – an acid-freak Aryan auteur – is a man of eclectic interests with an impeccable knack for homogenizing his obsessions and melding them into totally original cinematic works. Storch's favorite song is "Paranoid" by revolutionary doom metal group Black Sabbath, but he also holds a special love for the delinquent freestyle rapping antics of world famous American wigger Eminem, and the sinister lounge music of Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey. When it comes to inspirational works of cinema, Herr Storch has equally eclectic favorites; citing both Münchhausen (1943) – a fantasy-comedy epic directed by Josef von Baky that was commissioned by Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels for the 25th anniversary of UFA studios – and the ultra-trashy exploitation flick The Last House on the Left (1972) – an extremely loose remake of Ingmar Bergman's pagan revenge film The Virgin Spring (1960) that was directed by a very young Wes Craven – as two of his top-ten favorite films. In Wenzel Storch's third feature A Journey Into Bliss (2004) – the final chapter in the director's "Jürgen Hühne (the star actor of all three films) trilogy" – one, indeed, takes a glorious odyssey through the mystical world featured in the eccentric German filmmaker's expertly crafted flick, a work that was unsurprisingly written under the influence of LSD. Although A Journey Into Bliss is a dreamy rainbow of austerely assembled colors, the film – featuring excessively crude imagery and perverted dialogue – lacks the sort of auteur pretensions that is often associated with such an original and inventively elaborate work. A Journey Into Bliss manages to mix elements of popular American stop-motion animated Christmas specials from the 1960s (Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer, Frosty the Snowman) with aesthetic/thematic qualities featured in popular phantasmagorical fantasy films (from Münchhausen to Willy Wonka & The Chocolate Factory). To top it off, A Journey Into Bliss features a musically-inclined tribe of black-face primitives that give famous degenerate Jazz singer Al Jolson a run for his money. Despite its ridiculous and raunchy material, A Journey Into Bliss is the kind of film a young child would love to get lost in, as it is a totally imaginative work that includes witty talking animals, time-traveling, excessive gross-out humor, grownups acting like buffoons, and a family of clever children (who are quite good film critics). Naturally, A Journey Into Bliss – a totally chimerical work of (oftentimes lowbrow) celluloid absurdity – is not a film that everyone will admire, yet it unrelentingly assaults

A JOURNEY INTO BLISS

According to his equally bizarre website, German auteur Wenzel Storch was supposed to be a country star, but was born on the wrong continent, hence his unconventional career as Germany's most bizarre filmmaker. In Storch's A Journey Into Bliss, a husky captain named Gustav lands his snailship - which also carries his eccentric wife Eva, their many small progeny, primitive musicians ("believed to be extinct by scientists") from the Congo, his first mate (a grumpy, but kind hearted talking grizzly bear), various animal lackeys, and two ministers of propaganda suffering from bladder problems - on a mysterious island in the hope that it will make for a relaxing and luxurious retirement spot. Unfortunately for Gustav and friends/family, the exotic island they have landed on is ruled by evil King Knuffi, an inbred and royally degenerated megalomaniac who rules from beneath the flag of a carpet-beater. Being a member of a decadent royal family, King Knuffi has a loyal mini-army of erotomaniac grandmas. Indeed, sexual perversion is somewhat prevalent on the mysterious island featured in A Journey Into Bliss, thus it is no surprise that German necrophile auteur Jörg Buttgerreit (Nekromantik, Der Todesking, Schramm) and members of his film crew (composed of Michael Romahn and Marcel Caspers) created the psychedelic special effects for Storch's fantasy freak-out flick. In fact, Buttgerreit has a small, yet notable cameo in A Journey Into Bliss as an effeminate curly-haired nobleman whose head explodes after he eats quail. Of course, all gross-out and perverted scenes featured in the film are of an absurdist and ultimately comical nature. Wenzel Storch is like a German Guy Maddin, as both directors tend to concoct postmodern worlds of nonsensical immorality where the most tragic of scenarios are portrayed in a unconventionally humorous light. After all, I can't think of another film where two long-haired ministers of propaganda piss on a group of child to get their attention. Nor can I think of any other German that so wickedly satires the history of the Third Reich. In A Journey Into Bliss, the two hippie-like (both in character and dress) ministers of propaganda show their dubious support of the Nazi party (while wearing stylistically out-of-place swastika armbands) by stating to the evil king, "real far out party boss. A day and night party" and "They're really cooking with gas.....They're into some serious shit." Indeed, Wenzel Storch is a German auteur who has the splendid gall to poke fun at the holocaust and for that alone, he should be unanimously commemorated in the underground sinema world. Of course, Storch's wicked Teutonic humor is only a small part of the director's unique vision as a filmmaker.

Jörg Buttgerreit before his head explodes

"Acid House" Aryan Auteur Wenzel Storch

Like all great fairy tales, the evil king featured in A Journey Into Bliss is defeated by the protagonist of the film, yet this is not the true climax of the film. Instead, a totally deranged scene in A Journey Into Bliss where a certain snail becomes sexually aroused by a church (and does the unthinkable) seems to be the true climax of the film. Indeed, Wenzel Storch – an ex-altar boy for his local Catholic Church – playfully attacks religion in a most clever, yet wild manner, henceforth not seeming like a humorless atheist who is out to destroy the faith of all true believers. From beginning to end, A Journey Into Bliss is a truly jovial cinematic affair that is worthy of its title. After all, Wenzel Storch seems to be (judging from his photographs and films) quite a jubilant individual with a slightly dark side (no doubt, the unfortunate result of growing up in post-WW2 Germany). By comparison, A Journey Into Bliss makes the 1984 surrealist family film The Hotel New Hampshire (based on a novel by John Irving) – which shares a lot of similarities (both feature a peculiar, yet playful family and an extraordinary bear) with Storch's film - seem like a work of sterile Victorian manners. Hell, A Journey Into Bliss even makes Italian maestro Federico Fellini's fantastic work of decadent sea-fare, And the Ship Sails On (1983), seem relatively sane and mild-mannered. If you have a desire to feel like an excited kid again (minus ignorance towards sex and drugs), A Journey Into Bliss is mandatory viewing. Of course, that is not the only reason why the film is worthy viewing, as A Journey Into Bliss is an exotic delicacy for the eyes. Cinephiles who appreciate works that feature an intricate Mise-en-scène – typical of films directed by directors like Kenneth Anger, Sergei Paradjanov, and Federico Fellini – will indubitably find comfort in the cinema of Wenzel Storch. I don't think it would be an exaggeration to say that debauched auteur Wenzel Storch is very possibly the most flamboyant German filmmaker (both in character and aesthetic) that ever lived.

SIGNS OF LIFE

Werner Herzog (1968)

As a longtime appreciator of Bavarian auteur Werner Herzog's idiosyncratic cinematic oeuvre, I felt it was about time that I watch his first feature-length film Signs of Life (1968) aka Lebenszeichen, a breakthrough work that also proved to be the director's first critical and commercial success, even earning him the Silver Bear Extraordinary Prize of the Jury at the 18th Berlin International Film Festival. Admittedly, I was more interested in seeing Signs of Life because it is the director's sole work set during the Second World War than because it is Herzog's first flick, but rather unfortunately, as the director stated himself, "The film is set during the Nazi occupation of Greece, and inevitably some people will want to suggest that the film is something like a 'historical drama'. Of course, it is nothing of the sort." Indeed, Signs of Life is far from a conventional 'war film' as it depicts soldiers of National Socialist Germany, even mentally deranged ones, with an uncommon degree of humanity, or as Herzog explained himself, "How often do you see German soldiers acting as decently as this in a war film? I think that using the war as a backdrop enables the audience to see the absurdity and total violence of what went on during the Second World War in a different light, one we are not used to seeing. It is not a metaphor, but like Invincible which is set just before the era of the Third Reich, Signs of Life uses the absurdity of this situation – showing the interactions between an occupying army and the locals – to make what is a more 'existential' point." Indeed, aside from humanizing the horrendous homicidal Hun, Signs of Life, although loosely based on the story Der tolle Invalide auf dem Fort Ratonneau (1818) aka The Mad Invalid at Fort Rattoneau written by Prussian Romantic poet Ludwig Achim von Arnim, was an extremely personal work for Herzog as the film is set at a real 14th-century fortress built by the Knights Hospitaller where the director's grandfather Rudolf Herzog, who apparently went mad later on in life, worked as an archaeologist for a number of years publishing translations of ancient Greek engravings, which even appear in the film.

A fairly conventional and even sometimes mundane flick for the first hour or so, Signs of Life ultimately turns into a positively penetrating psychodrama during the last 30 minutes when the anti-hero Stroszek goes berserk and runs amok in a most pathetic manner. A sort of German New Cinema equivalent to Stephen King's The Shining, Signs of Life depicts the wonderful whimsicalness that occurs when a boyish beta-male who can only dream of being an Aryan alpha finds himself with a screw or two loose and believes he has debts to pay to invisible adversaries, thereupon futilely attacking everyone in his path. Far from seeming like a formative work, Signs of Life is hopelessly Herzogian to the cracked kraut core as a work that features the hallucinatory physical and metaphysical madness of Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972), the bold black-and-white insect fetishism and exotic island eccentricity of Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970), the charming chicken hypnotism of The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974), the breathtaking windmill landscapes of The Wild Blue Yonder (2005), and the wacked out war weariness of Rescue Dawn (2007), not to mention the fact that the lead protagonist's name is Stroszek, the same name as the protagonist of Herzog's Amero-kraut masterpiece Stroszek (1977), both of which were named in tribute to a classmate that helped the director cheat on a test while he still was a underage student. The absurd story of a man with the intensity to exterminate an entire army, but is far too impotent and only manages to kill a mere donkey in the end, Signs of Life is a celluloid parable of sorts about the insane impotence that ensues when a spiritual cuckold forgets his place in society and ultimately loses everything, especially his sanity, in the process.

It is the Second World War and an injured paratrooper named Stroszek (tightrope walker Peter Brogle) is sent to the ancient Greek city of Kos with his foreign Greek wife Nora (Athina Zacharopoulou) where two other injured Teutonic soldiers, Meinhard (Wolfgang Reichmann) and Becker (Wolfgang von Ungern-Sternberg) are also temporarily residing to recover from their injuries. Basically, the men do nothing aside from pretending to protect a stone fortress that they are not even worthy of setting foot on. While Becker helps translate ancient Greek inscriptions, Meinhard creates a somewhat dubious yet effective makeshift cockroach trap. Somewhat controversially married to a non-Aryan woman of swarthy Mediterranean stock, Stroszek is weaker than his wife, who helps him take precious gunpowder from grenades to make Roman candles and other fireworks. In one especially foreshadowing scene, Stroszek seems immensely disturbed by a young blond Aryan (played by Herzog longtime musical collaborator of Florian Fricke of Popol Vuh), who describes "Chopin as evil," while playing Chopin on his piano, thus suffering a minor mental breakdown, but the best is yet to come. While Nora attempts to refine her German, Stroszek, who seems to suffer from both boredom and an unwavering feeling of impotency, complains to his commanding officer and is reassigned to guarding the countryside where, after spotting a virtual army of windmills, he loses what is left of his sanity. Later that day while eating a lovely dinner with his wife, as well as his comrades Becker and Meinhard, Stroszek accuses them all of being secret spies out to get him and haphazardly chases them with his rifle, failing to injure any of them in the process. While Stroszek's behavior is wildly whimsical and uniquely unpredictable, if one thing is for sure, it is that he has an incapacity for doing any real damage to anyone. In fact, in the end Stroszek only manages to kill a donkey. For all the horror stories regarding the German military during the Second World War, Stroszek is treated rather respectfully by National Socialist commanders during his standoff, where he literally states, "I don't know what duty is." In the end, Signs of Life concludes with the following words, "His rebellion had set something colossal in motion, and his adversary was much more powerful than he was. So, like many others before him, he had failed miserably,” which may or may not be a thinly disguised reference to Uncle Adolf.

While not exactly Werner Herzog's greatest accomplishment as a filmmaker, Signs of Life is certainly no small debut cinematic effort, but a positively penetrating celluloid psychodrama that, at least in my mind, depicts how the director might have acted were he forced to fight for the Fatherland in the Second World War. Indeed, Herzog could not have chosen a more diacritic setting and context for a WWII war film as Signs of Life seems like another universe that is equal parts paradise and pandemonium. In terms of a first feature from the great director of German New Cinema, Herzog's Signs of Life certainly beats Alexander Kluge's Yesterday Girl (1966), Wim Wenders' Summer in the City (1970), and even Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Love Is Colder Than Death (1969) as a work with an audacious auteur signature that has not been dated by anachronistic far-left politics nor aesthetic influences from the French New Wave (thankfully, unlike his contemporaries, Herzog was never inspired by Godard). As for what Signs of Life means for Herzog himself, he stated the following in an interview, “One thing to say about Signs of life – and maybe other filmmakers felt this way about their first films – is that I have always had the very strong feeling that it was made somehow as if there was no history of film preceding it. As such it is my only really innocent film. Something like this happens only once in your lifetime because, once this innocence has been lost, it can never be recovered.” Undoubtedly, compared to a monolithic mainstream artistic work like Invincible (2001)—a film that is easily the director's most artistically compromised and phony cinematic one to date—it does indeed seem like Herzog has certainly lost a bit of innocence since Signs of Life, but he would also go on to direct a number of masterpieces of world cinema, including (but certainly not limited to) Stroszek (1977), Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979), Fitzcarraldo (1982). The perfect work to deprogram oneself from both the anti-German WWII propaganda and formulaic aesthetic vapidness of Hollywood, Signs of Life—with its crazed cocktail of gypsy conmen who claim to be kings, a pathetic platoon of National Socialist nerds and nihilists, a creepy cameo from the musical mastermind of Popol Vuh, and an odd appearance from an old Turkish man that was the last surviving worker from Rudolf Herzog's archaeological project—is just one of the many reasons why Werner Herzog is not only one of the greatest filmmakers of German New Cinema, but cinema history in general.

EVEN DWARFS STARTED SMALL

Werner Herzog (1970)

While my appreciation for Bavarian auteur Werner Herzog (Nosferatu the Vampyre, My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done?) has somewhat waned in recent years, I still revere him for being a man who has directed some of my absolute favorite films and documentaries and with the possible exception of the wildly idiosyncratic celluloid portrait of Teutonized Americana, Stroszek (1977), his aberrant absurdist black-horror-comedy dystopian flick Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) aka Auch Zwerge haben klein angefangen is the reason why the adventurer auteur will always have my respect. In fact, I would go so far as saying that next to Even Dwarfs Started Small, Herzog's most popular works like Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972), The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974), and Fitzcarraldo (1982) seem like slightly above-average action flicks for jaded hippie stoners who listened to one too many overly long krautrock songs. Not unsurprisingly (at least to me), Herzog himself admitted that compared to Even Dwarfs Started Small, his work Aguirre "looks like kindergarten," even if the former film features grown adults who are for the most part shorter than kindergarteners. A gritty and sometimes grating Cinéma vérité-like black-and-white flick filmed on the Canary Islands, at Lanzarote, a desolate and seemingly dead area that was deforested and turned into an island desert of sorts by various volcanoes throughout the 1700s and 1800s, Even Dwarfs Started Small follows a motley crew of crazed kraut midgets who escape an institution and wreak havoc and start a nonsensical rebellion against the director and guard of the institution, stirring a micro-apocalypse of sorts that results in dead pigs and chickens, the torture of blind midgets with goggles, and the destruction of every organic and manmade object in sight. Apparently banned upon its release in West Germany, Even Dwarfs Started Small also apparently inspired death threats from supposed 'white supremacists' (or at least that is how Herzog described them), but the director ultimately faced the most hatred from members of the far-left, namely the 1968 German student movement (aka 68er-Bewegung), or as Herzog described it himself, "Some of the fiercest opposition I had against this film was from the dogmatic left, which believed that this film depicted...was somehow ridiculing and depicting the world revolution, which was failing and which was ending in destruction and catastrophes...and they were the fiercest opponents and at the same time racists." Additionally, Even Dwarfs Started Small also proved that Herzog was not willing to play nice as a representative of German New Cinema and refused to utilize cinema to disseminate Trotskyite/Marxist like far-left propagandist like Alexander Kluge, Volker Schlöndorff, Helma Sanders-Brahms, and Margarethe von Trotta, whose oftentimes politically pedantic films are bound to inspire banality in those who do not subscribe to such outmoded and intrinsically idealistic politics. As Thomas Elsaesser wrote in his comprehensive work New German Cinema: A History (1989): “Not all film-makers agree with this interpretation of a film’s function. Even Dwarfs Started Small, for instance, was Herzog’s way of representing his isolation after the 1960 Oberhausen Festival. The film issued a challenge to the German Left about what Herzog saw as the impossibility of combining political revolution with radical subjectivity.” In other words, Herzog was an uncompromising individualist and lone wolf among calculating cultural collectivists and red-flag-wavers and Even Dwarfs Started Small was proof that he was, with the exception of fellow Bavarian auteur Herbert Achternbusch (whose story Herzog adapted into the film Heart of Glass (1976) aka Herz aus Glas), quite possibly the most intrinsically iconoclastic kraut filmmaker of his generation.

EVEN DWARFS STARTED SMALL

With its entire cast of German midgets, it should be no surprise that Even Dwarfs Started Small was heavily influenced by the truly carnivalesque American Pre-Code horror flick Freaks (1932), but as Werner Herzog stated himself, he found Todd Browning’s depiction of malevolent and malicious midgets to be a tad bit politically correct in its seemingly reluctant use of little people (to Browning’s credit, Freaks ultimately ruined his filmmaking career). Essentially plotless in structure, the film follows an agitated army of deleterious and sometimes deadly dwarves that, assumedly due to much time spent locked up in a dubious institution, go unrelentingly wild and reckless once unleashed, ultimately becoming more barbaric and inhumane toward their former captors, thus demonstrating the truism that a slave is oftentimes much more cruel than his master once the tables are turned. Although lacking in leadership structure, one could argue that the leader of the rebel runts is a micro-man around 2 ½ feet tall named Hombré (Helmut Döring, who later appeared in Herzog’s 1974 film The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser), a fendishly funny fellow whose smile is more sinister than that of Conrad Veidt in the Hollywood silent masterpiece The Man Who Laughs (1928). Of course, as demonstrated by a scene where he fails to climb up a bed to have sex with a female dwarf that bears a striking resemblance to Anne Frank, the other dwarves have a hard time respecting Hombré’s authority because, after all, he is the smallest member and most mentally unhinged of his rebel group. Not unsurprisingly considering his failure with real-life erotic pursuits, Hombré also has a problem keeping his eyes off of 1930s Spanish pornography, stating to himself pathologically whilst looking at the nubile Latin babes, “Yeah, yeah, pretty girl!...Lovely tits!” The archenemy of the deranged dwarves as a fellow named ‘The President’ (played by Pepi Hermine, who also played the president in Robert Downey Sr.’s supremely sardonic sociopolitical satire Putney Swope (1969)), who has traded roles with his patients/prisoners and has been locked inside the institution by the rebels and has another dwarf named Pepi (Gerd Gickel) bound to a chair. The President makes serious threats of killing Pepi if he is not let free, but his pleas and threats are met upon deaf ears by the innately irrational rebels, who only increase their tedious terror and cold carnage. One of the larger dwarfs, a film noir mobster-like fellow named 'Territory' (Gerhard Maerz) rides around the institution on a motorcycle and eventually rigs a truck to run around tediously in circles while his compatriots use it as a makeshift playground of sorts. After having a mock religious feast, the midgets start smashing plates, including hurling them at the spinning truck. Meanwhile, the rebels kill a gigantic pig and torture blind midgets with futuristic goggles, who are assumedly employees of the President. Like mad berserkers attempting a sort of anarchic baptism by fire, the rebels also set a number of potted plants on fire and attack them, thus demonstrating with each violent attack, their ecstasy for chaos and destruction only grows larger. Amongst all the needless destruction of flowers and trees, the instincts of farm animals are subverted by man's destruction, including baby piglets who attempt to nurse from their dead mother and chickens who try to cannibalize each other. With his pint-sized pals following behind him, Territory mocks Christ's crucifixion by walking around with a cross with a live monkey tied to it. In the end, Hombré almost laughs himself to death while watching a large camel defecating. When the President finally escapes from the institution, he is so wacked out of his own mind that he attempts to bark orders at an inanimate tree, thus demonstrating that all forms of order and structure have been subverted and turned meaningless.

In its depiction of literal midgets with a need to overthrow authority despite having an incapacity for establishing order themselves and who become more senselessly sadistic than their captors, Even Dwarfs Started Small, whether auteur Herzog's intention or not, ultimately acts as an audacious absurdist allegory for the 1968 German student movement who, while attempting in vain to create a commie utopia of sorts, almost plunged West Germany into chaos and spawned moronic terrorist groups like Baader-Meinhof Group. Indeed, as Herzog's film demonstrates, these spoiled and self-absorbed 'mental midgets' of the far-left were not inspired by serious societal reform, but senseless and nihilistic destruction, as well as a petty and pernicious desire for power that they were willing to achieve through any means possible. Considering the public outcry to Even Dwarfs Started Small from the supposed 'progressive' German far-left, it seems that Herzog was totally on point in his depiction of political rebels as small savages with an innate incapacity for self-control and discipline whose actions reflected a certain derangement of the post-WWII German mind and a visceral and irrational chaos in the Teutonic collective unconscious. Sociopolitical considerations aside, Even Dwarfs Started Small is a merrily macabre masterpiece in terms of aesthetics alone, as a nightmarishly surreal piece of chilling yet comical celluloid slapstick and a foully flavorsome fever dream from post-Hitler Hades where reality has become more deranging and devastating than any dream. It should be noted that director Werner Herzog has stated often that he rarely dreams during sleep and felt a strong fear that his nation would plunge into chaos, thus one could argue that, with the Sapphic cinematic freak shows of Ulrike Ottinger like Freak Orlando (1981) and Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press (1984), Even Dwarfs Started Small acts as the most unpleasantly pure and audacious unadulterated depiction of post-WWII Aryan neurosis and nihilism ever captured on celluloid. Going on to influence American aberrant-garde art-house flicks like Harmony Korine's Gummo (1997) and Crispin Glover's What Is It? (2005), Even Dwarfs Started Small inevitably foretold the apocalyptic atmosphere that would eventually reach not only the rest of the Occident, but also the United States and the rest of the extra-European ex-colonies. Indeed, if there ever was a film that was made to prepare one for a very tangible doomsday and laugh in the process, it is undoubtedly Even Dwarfs Started Small, a work which director Werner Herzog even had to admit, "Yes it is, but it's the darkest of comedies you can imagine...yeah, I find it very funny...something of it is very, very funny, but at the same time, I feel my stomach ache when I start to laugh." As a work that was only his second fictional feature-length work, Even Dwarfs Started Small which he directed while in his late-20s, Herzog was somehow able to reconcile barren and brutal yet breathtaking landscapes that fall somewhere in between the world of Michelangelo Antonioni (L'Avventura, Eclipse) and Dutch Renaissance painters Hieronymus Bosch and Pieter Bruegel the Elder with a cast of characters too weird and sinister for Fellini's Satyricon (1969), as well as deranged diacritic artfulness that totally transcends Browning's Freaks (1932) and a surreal satirical tone that would probably even shock Luis Buñuel, so I will always have a special affection for the wacky Bavarian auteur, even if he is, rather inexplicably, a staunch Steven Spielberg apologist.

AGUIRRE, THE WRATH OF GOD

Werner Herzog (1972)

Shot on a 35mm film camera Bavarian auteur Werner Herzog stole from a Munich film school, and based on a screenplay the director wrote in a mere 2 ½ days after reading a book he borrowed from a friend about historical adventurers, Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972) aka Aguirre, der Zorn Gottes is oftentimes considered one of the greatest films of German New Cinema, as well as film history in general, even making Time magazine's "All Time 100 Best Films," yet I have never felt it was nearly as interesting as the director's more idiosyncratic non-period pieces like Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) and Stroszek (1977), and I am certainly not the only person. My girlfriend, who also enjoys much of Herzog's work, tried in vain to watch Aguirre, the Wrath of God twice, ultimately concluding "This is a poorly put together period piece about a bunch of assorted, boorish redneck seeming guys and noble non-whites fucking around doing nonsensical shit in a jungle," which is hard to deny for anyone who has tried to watching the film in a mere sitting. Featuring an atmospheric soundtrack by Herzog's favorite German krautrock band Popol Vuh, and a cast comprised of effete, obese adventurers with mullets, mulatto slave philosophers, and other curiously racially mongrelized characters, Aguirre, the Wrath of God certainly has a somewhat anachronistic feel and its pacifistic anti-colonist counter-culture message only makes it feel all the more dated as a work of its time. Even so, Herzog still must be commended for becoming a fierce Faustian adventurer auteur for shooting on location in the Peruvian rainforest on the Amazon River during a clearly hectic five-week period utilizing a meager budget of $370,000 (a third of which paid for deranged star Klaus Kinski's salary). An imperative influence on Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now (1979), as well as the films of the Italian exploitation subgenre, including Cannibal Holocaust (1980) and Cannibal Ferox (1981), Aguirre, the Wrath of God, whether one enjoys it or not, is an undeniably important and groundbreaking work of film history. Although based on the real-life 16th century Spanish Basque Spanish conquistador Lope de Aguirre, a minor official who inevitably mutinied and become the murderous megalomaniac leader of an expedition to find the mythical El Dorado ("Lost City of Gold"), Herzog has admitted virtually all of Aguirre, the Wrath of God is based on his fabrications and throughout the film it certainly shows as an anti-"bergfilme" ("mountain film") in the anarcho-mystical spirit of Herbert Achternbusch (whose original story Herzog later adapted into the 1976 work Heart of Glass) minus the humor that replaces uncompromising Aryan mysticism of movie mountaineer works by filmmakers like Leni Riefenstahl and Arnold Fanck with a sort of negating nihilism and negativity that associates Occidental man's will-to-power and instinct to conquer as something akin to demonic possession, hence why the director cast his self-described "best fiend"

AGUIRRE, THE WRATH OF GOD

Herr Kinski, a man he once described as having a “great demonic intensity,” in the lead role.

The year is 1650 and a brutal band of Spanish conquistadors, who have just wasted a bunch of Inca Indians and their backward empire and have taken a number as injun slaves, are marching down the Andes mountains en route to the mythical El Dorado in search of gold under the leadership of commander Gonzalo Pizarro (Alejandro Repullés). For whatever reason, in spite of rampant obesity among the troupe’s members, and the unimaginably oppressive heat and humidity of the tropical climate, it seems inexplicably sensible for the conquistadors to wear heavy armor, including chain mail and helmets, and to haul around canons, horses, and dainty women down the thickly forested mountains and through turbulent rivers. Although originally being comprised of a thousand men, Pizarro concludes that it will be much easier to send a party of forty men down the river in four rafts, including Don Pedro de Ursúa (Ruy Guerra) as the commander, Don Lope de Aguirre (Klaus Kinski) as his second-in-command, grotesquely overweight aristocrat Don Fernando de Guzmán (Fassbinder actor Peter Berling) representing The Royal House of Spain, and corrupt Catholic brother Gaspar de Carvajal (Del Negro) as a record keeper who keeps a matter-of-fact diary of the trip. Although Pizarro has enough common sense to argue against it, Ursúa’s mistress, Doña Inéz (Helena Rojo) and Aguirre’s young daughter, Florés (Cecilia Rivera, in her first and only film role, which is no surprise as a master of monotone expression) also go on the expedition in search of the “Lost City of Gold.” Not long after starting their expedition, one of the rafts is lost in a wicked whirlpool and is never found, while the entire group on another raft is mysteriously exterminated at night by what is probably a naked army of wild savages. A Catholic ‘true believer,’ Ursúa argues that the dead men should be given proper Christian burials, but Aguirre understands the bigger picture and realizes such a superstitious act will only waste more time so he fires a cannon at the raft of dead inquisitors thus finishing the conquistador corpses for good and everyone goes on their merry way. Naturally, everything goes to hell on the trip, including the destruction of the remaining rafts and the disappearing of supplies, so Ursúa orders the men to give up on their expedition and go back to the main group, which propels the power-hungry Aguirre to declare mutiny against the leader. Ultimately, Ursúa and loyal soldier are shot and Aguirre talks the rest of the men into electing fat ass aristocrat Don Fernando de Guzman—a debauched degenerate who eats large feasts while his men starve around him—as the leader and even declares him “Emperor in the New World.” Ursúa is given a bolshevik-style show trial, but lardo wuss Fernando offers the fallen leader mercy. Aguirre becomes a fanatical proto-fascist leader who kills everyone that disagrees with him, aside from Ursúa’s mistress Inéz, who has the soldier’s sympathy. The insanity of the Catholic church is also displayed when the monk of the raft orders an Indian and his wife be killed for the blasphemous acting of claiming that the bible “doesn’t talk” (in reference to the brother’s remark that it is “the word of god”). Starving to death and suffering from hallucinations, someone kills fat fuck Fernando for being a glutton via strangulation, thus Aguirre proclaims himself the Führer and finally has Ursúa executed via jungle lynching as his first act as raft king. Not long after, the starving Spaniards and their equally emaciated minions burn down an Indian village but tons of their men also die in the process after natives shoot them down with arrows and Inéz, clearly distraught by her man’s death, disappears into the woods for eternity. Aguirre also decapitates a traitor who whispers he rather “join the Indians” than fight him for him and magically the head without a body speaks upon hitting the ground. After seeing an eerie premonition in the form a ship smashed to bits in a tree, the Indians launch a rainforest Blitzkrieg that kills all the remaining inquisitors, except Aguirre, who is even more of a megalomaniac and valiantly declares to a group of tiny monks, “I, the Wrath of God...will marry my own daughter...and with her I will found the purest dynasty...the earth has ever seen...together...we shall rule this entire continent...We will endure...I am the Wrath of God...Who else is with me?”

An extremely minimalistic micro-epic celluloid work with a good percentage of unrehearsed and improvised scenes (one of which resulting in the continuity error of a rather blatant appearance from Herzog’s hand), Aguirre, the Wrath of God owes most of its cinematic potency due to real-life psychopath Klaus Kinski portraying a “true homicidal megalomaniac,” as well as mountain man Werner Herzog’s daring utilization of the Amazon river and its surroundings, thus lending a certain ‘authenticity’ to the film that not a single Hollywood film has. One must also give Herzog credit for threatening to kill Kinski and then turn the gun on himself after the demented Polish-German actor threatened to quit the production of Aguirre, the Wrath of God as the average Hollywood director would probably quit working a production due to the positively terrible threat of bad food catering or a minor monetary return. Undoubtedly, an allegorical depiction of Werner Herzog’s thoughts on Adolf Hitler and the Third Reich in its hallucinatory depiction of a monomaniac of a mad man who manages to bring his people to total ruin as savages from every angle attack them on their raft, Aguirre, the Wrath of God is assuredly the director’s greatest expression of his own ethno-masochism, which would take on more patently pathetic forms in his stupendously stupid and sentimental anti-Nazi flick Invincible (2001) and his rather absurdly groveling vocal support of Steven “the showman of the shoah” Spielberg. Unfortunately, while Aguirre, the Wrath of God is a film that I would love to love, it has grown on me very little over the past decade or so when I first saw it, yet Herzog films like Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) and Stroszek (1977) have only become all the more important for me. Its now rather redundant and curiously cliché message of “colonialism = evil” and “savages = noble” only strips the celluloid work of its authenticity and integrity because, after all, you would never see one of the Indians featured in Aguirre, the Wrath of God directing a film about how their ancestors were cannibals that practiced sick sexual ritual, as ethno-masochism seems to be a distinctly European affliction. Considering Herzog was born “Werner Herzog Stipetić” to a Slavic Croatian mother (an untermensch in National Socialist eyes) and a German father he despised as he abandoned his family, his hatred of Nazism seems more visceral and personal than that of his celluloid compatriots in German New Cinema, especially considering he is a less political and intellectual filmmaker who never exhibited the sort of pedantic leftist politics of quasi-Marxist types like Alexander Kluge and Helma Sanders-Brahms. A horribly humorless indictment of the ‘evils’ of European colonialism and the Catholic church, Aguirre, the Wrath of God is celluloid cuckoldry at its finest and most esoteric, thus putting it miles away from the pop-Frankfurt school swill of Herzog’s self-loathing kraut contemporaries, but also leaving it with the undeniable stench of slave-morality senselessness from a man with enough testicular fortitude to climb mountains and travel down rivers to direct films yet inexplicably ashamed of the fact that his ancestor’s conquered the world and did it with great gusto. Indeed, while I consider colonialism to be one of the worst decisions Faustian man ever made as it has inevitably resulted in his own indigenous nations transforming into multicultural third worlds with the degenerating phenomenon of miscegenation, among countless other ungodly things, there is no need to cry over spilled Incan blood as Herr Herzog does in Aguirre, the Wrath of God, a film where the director displayed his solidarity with the savage cause by literally casting a mentally retarded Indian playing a toy-like musical instrument in a rather noticeable role as Kinski’s pet injun.

THE ENIGMA OF KASPAR HAUSER

Werner Herzog (1974)

If I had to pick a least favorite Werner Herzog classic, it would most certainly be The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974) aka Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle aka Every Man for Himself and God Against All, even if I still consider it an unrivaled masterpiece in its own right as a revolutionary and standout work of German New Cinema. Of course, next to my favorite Herzog flicks like Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970), Stroszek (1977), Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979), and Woyzeck (1979), The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser just seems too tame and old hat. A work that won Herzog 'The Special Jury' Prize (aka 'Silver Palm') at the Cannes Film Festival, The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser also has the distinction of being the first Herzog film to feature 'outsider artist' Bruno S. (real name Bruno Schleinstein), a mentally ill forklift operator and street musician who was born a bastard to an abusive prostitute (who beat him so badly at the age of 3 that he temporarily went deaf) and spent most of his childhood in mental institutions. Based on the eponymous real-life figure Kaspar Hauser—a feral teenager who randomly appeared on the streets of Nuremberg on 26 May 1828 who claimed to have been brought up in total isolation in a dark cell and who was mysteriously murdered on 17 December 1833 after being stabbed by an unidentified killer (though some speculate he did it to himself for attention)—The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser is most interesting in its rather unconventional 'realism' due to its sometimes daunting depiction of a real-life feral man depicting a feral man (in fact, Herzog originally thought about titling the film The Story of Bruno Hauser). As can be assumed, Herzog caught a lot of flak from leftist do-gooder types for casting real-life wild man Bruno S. to play Hauser, not to mention the fact that the middle-aged (non)actor absurdly portrayed a 16-year-old (notably, when an interviewer asked Herzog about the age discrepancy, he replied: "But Bruno looks like a sixteen-year-old, Goddammit!"). Although there are countless books on the Hauser case, Herzog opted for doing little research, proudly stating in an interview with Paul Cronin: "The Kaspar Hauser archives are in Ansbach, the town where he was killed, but I never went there. There are about a thousand books and more than ten thousand articles and research papers that have been written about Kaspar, but I asked myself whether I really needed to get involved with such extraneous scholarship." Indeed, like his subsequent feature Heart of Glass (1976) aka Herz aus Glas, Herzog attempted to find 'ecstatic truths' with The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser; a work that creates its own post-WWII Teutonic (anti)Heimat mythos. A tragic depiction of a wild bastard boy who is unwittingly coerced into becoming a son of the Fatherland and forced into being integrated in German bourgeois society, The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser is an audaciously anarchistic avant-garde period piece that Herzog himself described as his own celluloid equivalent to Carl Th. Dreyer's silent masterpiece

THE ENIGMA OF KASPAR HAUSER

The Passion of Joan of Arc (1928). Of course, more importantly, The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser is one of the few authentic films about a mensch who has been forced to live a life lower than that of a beast.

Feral man Kaspar Hauser (Bruno Schleinstein) lives in a dark dungeon cellar and for whatever reason unbeknownst to the world to this very day, his Master—a dubious fellow who sports a Svengali-like overcoat and top-hat and thus somewhat resembles Dr. Calgari—has decided to let him go free in Nuremberg. Before being introduced to sunlight and the world in general, Kaspar spent his imprisoned days playing with a toy horse and being spoon like a baby by his Master. Before letting him go, the Master teaches Kaspar how to walk and a couple phrases, but none of these things can prepare the wild man for the absurdity of civilization and its anti-organic idiosyncrasies. At first, Kaspar seems to learn best from child after entering Nuremberg and being introduced to its populous, but his journey will cause him to run into various curious characters, including prominent members of the aristocracy, church, and academia as they all seem him as an entertaining novelty. After it is decided that he must pay his own way as all men should, Kaspar becomes an exotic exhibit in an exceedingly eccentric freak show, which includes a midget named 'The Little King' (played by Helmut Döring, who starred in Even Dwarfs Started Small) and a catatonic blond boy named 'Young Mozart' (Andi Gottwald). Eventually, Kaspar is rescued by a kindly and highly patient fellow named Professor Daumer (Andi Gottwald), who tries his damndest to make the feral man into a respectable member of bourgeois. Indeed, Kaspar goes from being a 'noble savage' to a novelty member of the nobility after a gay gaunt English aristocrat named Lord Stanhope (Michael Kroecher) temporarily adopts him, but the now-cultivated feral man ultimately feels like a perennial outsider and gets tired of being paraded around like a glorified sideshow freak. Eventually, Kaspar develops into a sort of 'outsider Renaissance man' and forms idiosyncratic theories on philosophy, metaphysics, and music, with the latter of which being his true great love. Of course, all good things must come to an end and after Kaspar is attacked and brutally beaten by the same mystery man that originally brought him to Nuremberg, his days seem to be numbered. And, indeed, the man comes back and fatally stabs Kaspar in the chest, but not without leaving a note stating: "Hauser can tell you exactly what I look like and where I come from. To save him the trouble I'll tell you myself where I come from and even what my name is. M.L.O." In the end, Kaspar has splendid visions of nomadic Berbers in the Sahara Desert while lying on his death bed. After Kaspar dies, an autopsy is done that reveals that the strange feral man had deformities in both his liver and brain.

The preternaturally romantic antidote to senseless Hollywood sentimentalist schlock like Forrest Gump (1994) and Radio (2003), The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser actually manages to bring true personality and individuality to a 'mental invalid,' demonstrating that such a freak can develop a unique Weltanschauung due to his singular perspective. Indeed, one of the most 'humorous' scenes of the film is when a professor played by kraut character actor Alfred Edel (Supermarkt, Hitler: A Film from Germany) asks Kaspar Hauser a philosophical question and the stoic feral man responds in a strangely sophisticated manner that is instantly rejected by the 'properly educated' prof as being not a conventional enough answer. Indeed, in many ways, the character of Kaspar Hauser seems like a stand-in for Herzog, as the director has always styled himself as a semi-civilized mountain man who for most of his career has rejected any sort of 'proper' and 'formal' brand of filmmaking, which is also quite clear in The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser, especially in his utilization of super-8 film stock footage shot by his brother Lucki Stipetic and experimental filmmaker Klaus Wyborny. As Thomas Elsaesser wrote in his comprehensive study New German Cinema: A History (1989): "The fact that the dream visions of the dying Kaspar Hauser are actually super-footage shot by Klaus Wyborny and commissioned by Herzog for his film can be seen as the acknowledgement of a debt, rather like that of Fassbinder to Schroeter. Had he not achieved international success with Aguirre, Herzog might well have concentrated his career more on making fantastic-surreal documentaries like Land of Silence and Darkness (Land des Schweigens und der Dunkelheit, 1971), or visionary films like Fata Morgana (1974), whose vicinity to the romantic traditions of the American avant-garde is more in evidence."

As for the "Unknown Soldier of Cinema" (Herzog's loving nickname name for Bruno S.), the money he earned from starring in The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser enabled him to become economically independent and obtain an apartment (the very same apartment of his character in Stroszek), piano, and become a celebrity of sorts in Berlin. Ultimately, Bruno S. would only star in one more Herzog film, Stroszek (1977), which in my opinion is one of Herzog's greatest and most important masterpieces. After his fame started to fade away, Bruno would go on to complain that "Everybody threw him away" and he took up painting and continued playing music, though he would star in a couple more films before he died of a condition relating to heart trouble on August 11, 2010. Shortly after Bruno S. died, Herzog paid him the greatest compliment a filmmaker could give to a (non)actor by commenting, "in all my films, and with all the great actors with whom I have worked, he was the best. There is no one who comes close to him. I mean in his humanity, and the depth of his performance, there is no one like him." Indeed, while I hate when people throw around word 'humanity', it is certainly undeniable that Bruno S. demonstrated a certain singular authenticity in his performances that not even the most talented of method actor could reproduce. While not my favorite Herzog film, The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser is an undeniable masterpiece that has no contemporaries. For German New Cinema fanatics and Teutophiles, the film is also notable for featuring cameos from German auteur filmmakers Herbert Achternbusch (The Last Hole, Heilt Hitler!) and Reinhard Hauff (Knife in the Head, Stammheim - Die Baader-Meinhof- Gruppe vor Gericht), as well as performances by Fassbinder superstar Brigitte Mira (Ali: Fear Eats the Soul, Fox and His Friends) and krautrocker Florian Fricke of the avant-garde electronic project Popol Vuh. Indeed, among other things, The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser is nothing less than a celluloid treasure trove of post-WWII cracked kraut kultur.

THE ENIGMA OF KASPAR HAUSER

THE GREAT ECSTASY OF WOODCARVER STEINER

Werner Herzog (1974)

Werner Herzog is probably best known for his ability to find unconventional individuals and capture them on film, whether it be a documentary or a work of fiction. Herzog has quite possibly introduced more extraordinary characters for the world to see than anyone else. The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner (1974) is one of Herzog's first documentaries and it captures a daring individual that is searching for more in life than the average person. The film follows Swiss ski-jumper Walter Steiner as he attempts to set a world record as a ski-jumper. First, I would like to state that I get fairly bored watching sports, especially team sports. Football and the NFL are the most mindless forms of entertainment one can watch. Unfortunately, Americans are obsessed with football thus resulting in the "sports mentality" that most Americans have. This sports mentality is probably the main cause for the average American adult having the contemporary political science knowledge of an elementary school student. Most Americans care more about the NFL than they do about the endless war going on in the middle east. I bring all this up because I want to compare it with my respect for individualist sportsman Walter Steiner. Walter Steiner is an individual that has personal goals. He is a ski-jumper first and foremost for himself. Steiner has an extra ball of energy that forces him to do what he does. As revealed in The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner, Steiner has always been a dreamer. As a student Steiner would constantly daydream in class, unaware of what was going on around him. At a young age, it was obvious that Steiner would be destined to do something different with his life. He would become a ski-jumper world record breaker! A very young Werner Herzog narrates and appears in The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner. Of course, Herzog is completely serious in the insane way that you can expect from the odd Bavarian. Herzog almost seems as concerned with Walter Steiner's success as Steiner is. One can't help but be consumed by Herzog's enthusiasm. Werner Herzog is one of the few documentary filmmakers that makes the documentary more interesting. The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner features atmospheric and highly appropriate music by German kraut rock band Popol Vuh. Werner Herzog has used music from Popol Vuh for a variety of his masterpieces so you know that you can expect a great soundtrack for The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner. Scenes become especially beautiful when slow-motion shots of Walter Steiner during his gigantic ski-jumps are combined with the emotional soundtrack. Werner Herzog knows how to truly construct a film like no other. Like Werner Herzog, Walter Steiner is a man on a mission. It's not a question of why these men do what they do. These men do what they do because they have to. Both Herzog and Steiner have a drive in them that makes them go the extra distance in life. The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner concludes on an endnote that sums up the entire documentary. Walter Steiner is an influence to all that are looking for something more to life.

HEART OF GLASS

Werner Herzog (1976)

Heart of Glass (1976) aka Herz aus Glas was the second Werner Herzog (Even Dwarfs Started Small, Stroszek) film I ever saw and I must admit it was a decidedly disappointing experience that caused me to feel reluctant in regard to watching any more films directed by the Bavarian auteur, but over a decade after my initial viewing of the film, I can certainly say my opinion has changed rather dramatically, even if the film is a fundamentally flawed work. Loosely based on a chapter from the novel The Hour of Death written by Bavarian Anarcho-mystic auteur Herbert Achternbusch (Das Gespenst aka The Ghost, Wohin?), which was, in turn, based on an old Bavarian folk legend about a Nostradamus-like southern kraut prophet named Mühlhiasl (who may have been legendary Bavarian cow herder/seer Matthias Stormberger (1752-?)), who predicted the end of the world, Heart of Glass depicts the cultural chaos that occurs in a small town that thrives on ruby glass when the master glassblower dies and the mysterious secret to creating the glass is lost, thus sending its peasant populous into a sort of mass hypnosis of the somewhat homicidal yet also somewhat humorous sort. Utilizing what some might describe as a dubious gimmick, director Werner Herzog claims to have hypnotized virtually every actor (except the lead and some professional glassblowers), and directed them as such during the entire production of Heart of Glass, thus making for a strikingly strange celluloid work of the slightly oneiric, strangely ominous and atmospheric, and morbidly frolicsome variety where the characters move around like possessed somnambulists walking slowly but surely to their decided doom. Probably the most flagrantly 'völkisch' flick the director ever created, Heart of Glass is essentially Herzog's outsider answer to the once-trendy anti-Heimatfilm subgenre of German New Cinema as a work that somewhat reluctantly follows in the tradition of Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) directed by Peter Fleischmann, The Niklashausen Journey (1970) co-directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Michael Fengler, The Sudden Wealth of Poor People of Korbach (1971) directed by Volker Schlöndorff, and Bierkampf (1977) aka Beer Chase directed by Herbert Achternbusch. In reference to the film's title, Herzog stated of Heart of Glass, "It seems to mean for me an extremely sensitive and fragile inner state, with a kind of transparent glacial quality to it," which certainly describes the peasant characters of the film who, after losing their livelihood (i.e. ruby glass), degenerate into a sinister and savage-like state, killing each other and turning their quaint Bavarian town into mere ruins, thus presenting an assumed allegory of sorts of both World Wars.

Set in a late-18th-century Bavarian town, Heart of Glass begins with a perturbing premonition from a Bavarian peasant prophet named Hias (Josef Bierbichler)—a discernibly melancholy yet stoic and half-crazy man who carries the curse of being able to foresee the future—who states towards the beginning of the film,

"I look into the distance, to the end of the world. Before the day is over, the end will come. First, time will tumble, and then the earth. The clouds will begin to race...the earth boils over; this is the sign. This is the beginning of the end..." and proceeds to haunt the townspeople with his poetic prophecies. As soon as a fellow named Mühlbeck—the foreman of the town glass factory—suddenly dies without warning, the secret of the ruby glass is lost forever as the glassblowing artisan has ultimately brought the secret behind its creation with him to his grave. Immediately, the townspeople start acting insane, as their 'hearts of glass' are easy to shatter, which first reaches its most disturbing breaking point when two friends drinking some brewskis at a Bavarian bar together attack one another, one smashing a glass over the head of another and the other retaliating by pouring beer on his head. Of course, not long after, one of the men is dead after his comrade smothers him to death. A young broad with a shaved head who resembles and has the quirky mannerisms of a sort of 'holocaust survivor mime' has trouble keeping her clothes on as she has a peculiar propensity for standing on tables and stripping while in a sleepwalking state. The town is run by a young Master who is the most profoundly affected by the loss of the Ruby glass secret, declaring in a foreboding fashion "Now what will protect me now from the Evil of the universe?" while in a most melancholy state. The young Master essentially worships the glass, declaring while praying in church, "Glass has a fragile soul. It is unstained. A crack is the sin; after the Sin, there is no sound," thus the disappearance of the Ruby glassmaking secret is essentially the death of God for the young aristocrat. At the Master's side is his eccentric elderly servant Adalbert (played by early Herzog regular Clemens Scheitz, who also appeared in The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974), Stroszek (1977) and Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979)), whose mental deterioration already seemed well underway before the town's mass psychosis.

Desperate to find the Ruby glass secret, the Master does a number of insane things in desperation in the hope of finding the formula for the glass, including having plans for foreman Mühlbeck's house to be demolished and eventually burning down the glass factory, thereupon totally destroying any chance of ever producing the Ruby glass ever again. The young Master even considers having Mühlbeck's body dug up and his brain examined by Hias. In fact, the Master offers Hias the job of replacing Mühlbeck if he can figure out the formula for the Ruby glass, declaring to the prophet, "I need a glass to contain my blood, or it will trickle away." Hias attempts to warn the Master's female servant Ludmilla (Sonja Skiba) to leave the town before the madness swallows her up, but she does not abide his wise words and ultimately pays with her life after the mad Master pierces a dagger into her neck, declaring of her Ruby red blood, "That is the pure ingredient" as if he is a vampire. Declaring, "Hias has wished this calamity on us" and "he has Devil's eyes, he has the Evil Eye. Lock him up!", the deranged townspeople imprison the Bavarian prophet not long after the Master burns down the glass factory. While in prison, Hias loses his prophetic prowess as the cell is much too dark and the woods are what speaks to his soul, but luckily the Master comes by and declares to the prophet, "I like you. You have a heart of glass" and the Bavarian prophet is finally able to go on his merry way, where he goes to a cave and wrestles and stabs an imaginary bear, later 'roasting' the said imaginary bear in what amounts to a biblical cliché. In his late vision, Hias sees a small rocky island far out in the sea where forgotten men live who, due to their remoteness, do not know that the earth is round and think it is flat, so they decide to "risk the ultimate" and set sail on a small boat to "reach the edge of the world, to see if there is really an abyss," assumedly sailing to their deaths. Heart of Glass closes with the quote, "It may have seemed like a sign of hope...that the birds followed them out into the vastness of the sea..." thus demonstrating the absurdity of superstitious thinking yet its undeniable power in influencing the human will.

In his work New German Cinema: A History (1989), German film scholar Thomas Elsaesser wrote, "Heart of Glass was Herzog's attempt to find the strangeness of myth and legend in the heartland of the Heimat film. Based on a story by Achternbusch, it shows (between these two at first sight very similar 'folklorists') a radical difference of perception of the genre. Not one of Herzog's successes, the film might have been better had it been written by its director or directed by its writer. Heart of Glass never seems to be able to resolve whether it is a Heimat film turned inside out, showing the bigotry and rivalries in inbred communities, or whether it celebrates harmony and a oneness-with-nature of the elect. Herzog's tendency to distance his characters at all costs, even if it means fashioning for them a halo of mystical remoteness (apparently achieved by hypnotizing the cast) runs counter to Achternbusch's drastic debunking." Indeed, unlike most anti-Heimat films, Heart of Glass, although critical of the peasantry and its ostensibly 'outmoded' lifestyles and customs, demonstrates a much greater sympathy for its characters, namely Hias (who is somewhat of a stand-in for Herzog), and their way of life as opposed to 'moralistically' depicting Bavarian peasants as a group of rabid redneck racists of the lynch-mob-oriented sort like in Hunting Scenes from Bavaria. Additionally, while Achternbusch tends to portray Bavarian peasants as inbreeding alcoholic morons of the politically and religiously retarded sort in films like Bierkampf (1977) aka Beer Chase and Heilt Hitler! (1986) aka Heal Hitler!, Herzog simply portrays them as simple folk whose entire world can be destroyed after one small part of their daily life disappears, which is a trait that can be said of all of humanity, not just a bunch of hillbilly Aryans from the south. Seeing as Herzog shot the film not far from the area of Bavaria he grew up in, has incessantly stated throughout his career that he has a deep affinity for the Bavarian landscape, and was brought up on the sort of Teutonic mystical folk stories told in the film, Heart of Glass is ultimately more of a modern apolitical Heimatfilm as opposed to a leftist lynch mob anti-

HEART OF GLASS

Heimatfilm, thereupon making it a strikingly singular work in the subgenre that breaks with convention. Another attempt by Herzog to find the “ecstatic truth,” Heart of Glass is a ‘hypnotic’ tragicomedic work of the Germanic quasi-mystical persuasion featuring Caspar David Friedrich-esque like romantic imagery that, while it may not be the director’s greatest film by any means, surely makes for one of his most impenetrable, on top of being one of the most mystifying and aesthetically alluring ‘heimat’ films of the post-WWII era. Intentionally using a musical score by his longtime krautrock collaborator Popol Vuh in the hope of further achieving his objective of hypnotizing his viewer, Werner Herzog may have been attempting a cheap gimmick via Heart of Glass, but regardless, the celestial celluloid work still has a titan Teutonic cinematic heart that is quite indicative of what separates the Bavarian auteur not only from his countryman and collaborator Herbert Achternbusch, but also every other filmmaker in cinema history.

Werner Herzog (1977)

Originally intending to cast Bruno Schleinstein (better known as Bruno S.) – the feral-like forklift-driver-musician-turned-actor and star of his previous cinematic work The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974) – as the lead in his planned adaptation of German dramatist Georg Büchner's Woyzeck, Bavarian auteur Werner Herzog eventually realized the role was better suited for Klaus Kinski and put the production of the film on hold for a couple years. Out of shame and embarrassment, Herzog decided on the spot seconds after giving Bruno S. the bad news on the phone that he would make it up to the outsider artist by making a rather different film with him as the lead. This film inevitably became Stroszek (1977), which Werner Herzog wrote in a mere 4 days specifically for Bruno S., including the use of his real flat, music and musical instruments, and his time spent in prisons and mental institutions. The bastard son of a prostitute, the Bruno S. was institutionalized at the age of 3 in an asylum for mentally retarded and insane children because he suddenly stopped talking as a toddler because his mother beat him so much. Spending 23 years of his life in a mental institution – a traumatizing event that further drove the actor into social isolation and a pathological distrust of other people – Bruno S. was eventually released from prison at the age of 26. That being said, the actor essentially plays himself in Stroszek as an intensely introverted and idiosyncratic individual whose utter mistrust for his fellow man bleeds through onto the screen in a manner that is simultaneously chilling, confounding, and captivating. Also starring in Stroszek is Fassbinder graduate Eva Mattes (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, Wildwechsel, Effi Briest and In a Year of 13 Moons) – who Herzog later had a daughter with – as a somewhat sad but ultimately callous and calculating Berlin prostitute, and the quasi-insane elderly man Clemens Scheitz who, like Bruno S., starred previously in The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser and two other Herzog films (Heart of Glass, Nosferatu the Vampyre). Set in contemporary times and in two different counties (Germany and the United States), Stroszek was a notable departure from Werner Herzog's previous films, most of which were exotic period pieces. Incidentally, the film would be regarded as one of the director's greatest masterpieces. Often described as 'anti-American' and an astute critique of capitalism, Herzog denies these claims, stating in an interview for the book Herzog on Herzog (2003) that, "The film does not criticize the country; it is almost a eulogy to the place. For me Stroszek is about shattered hopes." And indeed, although quite mirthful in a curiously quirky way, Stroszek is ultimately a most disheartening and dejecting cinematic work, so much so that Ian Curtis – the epileptic frontman of the post-punk group Joy Division – committed suicide on the eve of his band's first American tour shortly after watching the film as depicted in 24 Hour Party People (2002) directed by Michael Winterbottom and Control (2007) directed by Anton Corbijn.

During the beginning of Stroszek, protagonist Bruno S. is released from prison, assuring a skeptical social worker with his “great Hungarian word of honor” that he won’t drink alcohol (the source of his random and belligerent criminality) and that he will make an effort to keep his pants zipper zipped and keep his general appearance kempt, all of these of course being things he will inevitably fail to do. Soon after leaving prison, Bruno meets prostitute Eva (who has a penchant for sexually servicing swarthy Turkish men at deep dick discount prices) at his favorite bar and tries to console her after her pimps (the more domineering of the two is played by Wilhelm von Homburg, best known for his performance as Vigo the Carpathian in the film Ghostbusters II) abuse her. Before long, the oversexed Eva begins a relationship with the empathic Bruno, which is of the seemingly sexless sort as Herzog made nil attempts to portray the odd couple in an intimate light. After Bruno is humiliated and virtually tortured, Eva is repeatedly beaten by the pernicious and pugnacious pimps, they decide that moving to America is their best prospect for avoiding further degradation and starting a better life, thereupon making a desperate and naive attempt at the so-called ‘American dream.’ Bruno’s elderly and exceedingly eccentric friend Scheitz (Clemens Scheitz) – a talented piano player with a number of obscure scientific theories – was already planning to move to Wisconsin to live with his American nephew Clayton, so the street musician and his ex-streetwalker sweetheart decide to accompany him. When the now-merry Teutonic trio arrive to America, they are happy as can be as they now have their own very mobile home – a true dream to the post-war German according to Werner Herzog, despite seeming like quite the cynical joke to the average American – but the protagonists’ dreams dissolve quickly once they must face the reality of a mortgage, low wages resulting in Eva’s once again adopting the lifestyle of a prostitute, and the social isolation that eventually explodes into violent madness when both Bruno and Scheitz become convinced that there is a conspiracy being waged against them. These actions become all the more eerie when one realizes that the location of Bruno’s trailer is at the spot of Plainfield, Wisconsin where infamous German-American serial killer Ed Gein carried out some of his necrophile nights. During one of his drunken but poignant trailer-park ramblings, Bruno S. states quite belligerently, “I thought America would be different, and we could get rich quick,” but inevitably the distress incurred growing up in an institution in Nazi Germany was less vicious and vexatious because they “hurt you openly back then” yet in the United States they do it with a smile, causing a sort of “spiritual pain.”

One thing that seems quite absurd in Stroszek to many viewers, including myself, is that one is supposed to believe that tall Nordic redneck Clayton (played by Clayton Szalpinski) – an intrinsically unintellectual extrovert of the proud American peasant sort – is the nephew of tiny heterodox dilettante genius Scheitz;

an effortlessly effete fellow that looks like he could be the surviving member of German poet Stefan George's literary circle 'George-Kreis.' But then again, America seems to have that deracinating power, especially in regard to Northern/Western European immigrants and their progeny. Personally, I have known people who were the direct descendants of European aristocrats who were sub-literate wiggers and skinheads whose daily activities revolved around bong hits, beer chugging, and siring bastard babies, but I guess such is the degenerating effect of a culturally and racially mongrelized nation with American Indians that exhibit the pantomimes of hillbillies and secluded areas with a population of 480 that spawn five serial killers/murders as depicted in Herzog's Stroszek. Featuring Wisconsin mechanics who pull their teeth out via automotive pliers, territorial farmers who battle over a small plot of land while brandishing loaded shotguns on tractors like modern-day medieval knights, spasmodic and surreal yet authentic vocally proficient auctioneers (Herzog describes the auctioneer words as the last form of poetry; the "poetry of capitalism"), dancing chickens and piano-playing rabbits, and diner truckstops that act as underground prostitution rings, Stroszek is a flavorsome piece of American cinematic apple pie imported from krautland.

Admittedly, since the first time I discovered his cinematic works about a decade ago or so, I have been somewhat disillusioned with Werner Herzog, not least of all because of sentimentalist, ethno-masochistic films like Invincible (2001) and the patently pretentious, curiously contrived and absolutely awful experimental film like The Wild Blue Yonder (2005), not to mention his seemingly groveling puffery of Steven Spielberg of all innately capitalistic, global homogenizing, anti-kultur filmmakers, yet I have to admit that Stroszek – which I hadn't seen in over 5 years – only gets better with each subsequent viewing and still stands as one of the filmmaker's greatest films to date. My girlfriend was also quite smitten with the film, so much so that she literally fell on the floor and almost threw-up laughing at the film's anomalous and terribly tragicomic ending. Although Herzog is quite adamant that Stroszek, "is not one of those movies trying to make Americans look bad," it would probably be hard for most U.S. viewers to think otherwise in a work where the country is depicted as the land of the feral and the economically enslaved. Still, one gets the feeling that Herzog truly enjoys the company of the mostly non-actors that star in the film and he even remarked that the best Americans are from the Midwest citing Marlon Brando, Ernest Hemingway, and Bob Dylan as notable examples. As for Bruno S., although he delighted in some minor fame for his performances in Herzog's films, he would later state that he felt, "everybody threw him away." Shortly after Bruno S.'s death on August 11, 2010 due to a failing heart, Herzog paid the belated 'actor' the deepest display of posthumous respect, stating, "in all my films, and with all the great actors with whom I have worked, he was the best. There is no one who comes close to him. I mean in his humanity, and the depth of his performance, there is no one like him," which is quite the compliment to pay to a formerly institutionalized non-actor from a director who has worked with Klaus Kinski, Bruno Ganz, Udo Kier, and Michael Shannon, among many of the best actors that the world has to offer.

I hate playing favorites, especially when it comes to films by my favorite (and formerly favorite) directors, but Stroszek is without question my favorite Herzog film, not least of all because it may be the only film that manages to do the seemingly impossible by seamlessly capturing the essence of two distinct subcultures from two very different nations; one that I have an unhealthy obsession with and another that I grew up in and (somewhat reluctantly) call home. Although a self-described "crazy kraut" who grew up in an isolated area in the mountains of Bavaria, with Stroszek Herzog was able to channel the 'essence' of America, albeit a marginal and oftentimes maligned (especially by Hollywood) segment, which has been rarely portrayed on the silver screen before or after, thus it was of little surprise that the German filmmaker would remark regarding Hollywood-actor-turned-trash-art-auteur Giuseppe Andrews's feature Trailer Town (2003), "This place, this trailer park, I have a feeling that this is the real America." After all, Herzog mobilized the magical and mystical qualities of the mobile-home first via Stroszek; his most majestic yet mystifying and merry yet melancholy cinematic postcard from America.

NOSFERATU THE VAMPIRE

Werner Herzog (1979)

The German expressionist masterpiece Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922) aka Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror directed by F.W. Murnau will always remain permanently impressed upon my soul, not least of all because it was both the first silent film and first German film I had ever seen, but also because the film features what I consider to be the most physically grotesque yet strikingly iconic creature in film history. Needless to say, the idea of a remake of Nosferatu sounded like an interesting yet ridiculous prospect to me when I first came to this realization after seeing Murnau's film while still just a preteen, even if the film itself was illegally adapted from Bram Stoker's gothic horror masterpiece Dracula (1897) and has been adapted in various, less impressive, and oftentimes more ridiculous forms from the blaxploitation Blacula (1972) to Paul Morrissey's anti-communist satire Blood for Dracula (1974), yet the Bavarian filmmaker belonging to German New Cinema by the name of Werner Herzog (Even Dwarfs Started Small, Stroszek) managed to breath new life into the classic undead German expressionist flick. Indeed, Werner Herzog's version, entitled Nosferatu the Vampire (1979) aka Nosferatu: Phantom der Nacht aka Nosferatu: Phantom of the Night, is not so much a remake of Murnau's Nosferatu as it is an idiosyncratic adaption and tribute, or as the crazy old Southern kraut stated himself, "I never thought of my film Nosferatu as being a remake. It stands on its own feet as an entirely new version. It is like both Dreyer and Bresson, who made films about Joan of Arc: one is not a remake of the other. My nosferatu has a different context, different figures and a somewhat different story. It is a very clear declaration of my connection to the very best of German cinema..." And, indeed, Nosferatu the Vampire—a work released more than half a century after Murnau's version—is the closest thing to a postmodern neo-völkisch horror flick that, unlike most of the films and filmmakers of German New Cinema, takes pride in its cinematic ancestral heritage, whilst adding new ingredients, including krautrock music by Herzog favorite Popol Vuh, a perversely post-Spenglerian message that makes Nosferatu (1922) seem like a feel-good fairytale, and actors of mixed Germanic racial stock, including Klaus Kinski (of Polish descent via his father), Isabelle Adjani (of Algerian and Bavarian blood), and Bruno Ganz (of German-Swiss and Northern Italian stock). As Herzog stated in an interview, "I have said many times that as children growing up in post-war Germany we had grandfathers but no fathers to learn from. Many men had been killed in the war or were in captivity. My own father was alive but not around for much of the time, and Fassbinder's father abandoned his family very early on. As filmmakers coming of age in the early and mid-1960s, we were the first real post-war generation, young Germans with no one around who could give us points of reference," thus he looked toward the grandfather generation, which was led by F.W. Murnau and Fritz Lang, deciding to cinematically adapt the former's most popular film Nosferatu (1922), stating of the work, "For me, Nosferatu is the greatest of all German films, and feeling as strongly as I did that I needed to connect to this 'legitimate' German culture in order to find my roots as a filmmaker, I chose to concentrate on Murnau's masterpiece, knowing full well it would be impossible to better the original." Indeed, while I concur with Herzog that no one could top Murnau's Nosferatu, it is hard to think of a 'remake' as respectful to the original while also authentic in its own right, yet immaculately tailored for the post-Hitler zeitgeist where there are no happy endings, but only the strangely hypnotic stench of death and destruction.

Beginning with eerie footage of real-life mummies on display at the Guanajuato museum in Guanajuato, Mexico that were victims of a 1833 cholera epidemic that director Werner Herzog personally took out of their glass display cases and propped against the wall, Nosferatu the Vampyre immediately establishes itself as a gorgeously grotesque work that unflinchingly wallows in death, decay, and madness. Set in Wismar, Germany (it was actually shot in Delft, Netherlands, but Herzog pays tribute to the original 1922 Murnau flick, if in name only, which was filmed in Wismar, though set in the fictional city of Wisborg), Nosferatu the Vampyre initially centers on the protagonist Jonathan Harker (Bruno Ganz), a gentlemanly real estate agent who loves his wife Lucy Harker (Isabelle Adjani) so much that he takes a dubious offer from his exceedingly eccentric boss Renfield (French-Jewish artist/writer Roland Topor, a founder of the Panic Movement) to travel eastward over the Carpathian mountains to Transylvania (although Herzog shot the scenes in what was then Czechoslovakia because the Ceaușescu regime prevent Herzog from filming in Romania proper) to meet with a seemingly nefarious nobleman named Count Dracula (Klaus Kinski) who wants to buy property in Wismar. Showing no inkling of fear for "wolves, bandits, and ghosts," Harker makes his way east with his pack of deeds and documents that will be ostensibly used for Dracula to buy a house and on the way, the eager beaver estate agent stops at a village full of medieval-like gypsies, who warn him not to go to the Count's apparently cursed castle. Indeed, it says a lot about a person and place when gypsies see it as horrifically evil, but Harker is no superstitious untermensch, so he makes his way to Count Dracula's ruined yet lavishly decorated castle. Undoubtedly, Dracula—a pale as a ghost and greatly grotesque rodent-like being who seems perennially lonely and macabrely melancholy—makes Harker feel rather uneasy, especially after the Count sucks blood from his finger after the real estate agent cuts himself while eating, but luckily the aberrant aristocrat instantly decides to buy the home in Wismar, especially after realizing the Harkers will live next door (the Count seems especially interested after seeing a small portrait of the ethereal, lovely lady Lucy in Jonathan's locket). During the night, Harker suffers a number of perturbing phantasmagorical encounters with the Count, while simultaneously, all the way back in Wismar, Lucy is plagued by fierce and foreboding night terrors of the penetratingly prophetic fashion. When the sun rises, Harker goes to investigate around the Gothic castle and finds Count Dracula sleeping in a ruined coffin, thereupon confirming he is a vampire. Meanwhile, Renfield is unsurprisingly committed to a mental institution after biting a cow and attempting to attack a guard, all the while spouting nonsense like “blood is life” in between rampant bursts of maniacal laughter. At night, Count Dracula packs a bunch of black coffins with cursed dirt, rats, and himself and makes his way to Wismar via ship, thus siring in the pernicious plague that will ultimately obliterate the small Teutonic town.

Weakened by his stay at the horrifying home of the bloodsucking blueblood Dracula, Jonathan Harker feebly attempts to leave the castle but realizes he is locked in, so he creates a makeshift rope via bedsheets and attempts to climb out a window, but severely injures himself in the process, thus leading to the beginning of the end of his sanity. While sailing to Wismar, Dracula kills the entire crew of sailors manning the ship, making it seem as if the deaths are merely the result of the plague, but as the captain (Jacques Dufilho) notes regarding the dubious deaths in his ship log, “A rumor of a mysterious stranger on board scares everyone to death.” When the plagued ship of the dead finally arrives in Wismar with no one aboard aside from the corpse of the captain who has tied himself to the helm in a manner not unlike Stoker’s source novel, Renfield announces from his cell that “the master has arrived” and a couple doctors, including vampire hunter Abraham Van Helsing (Walter Ladengast), decide to investigate the curious fate of the ghost ship, finding a ship-log in the process that reveals clues in regard to the dead sailors’ fate. On top of bringing death in the form of Count ‘The Lord of the Rats’ Dracula, the ghost ship has also brought an ugly underground army of rodents that totally occupy Wismar, at which point darkness and destruction totally consume the town, killing virtually all of the unsuspecting inhabitants in no time. Meanwhile, Harker, who has a rather nightmarish stay in a Transylvania hospital, finally arrives in Wismar, but he is now deathly pale and his mind seems to have been replaced with that of a babbling old man with Alzheimer’s disease. Seeming to suffer from amnesia, Harker no longer recognizes his wife Lucy, but Count Dracula certainly does and attempts to get some from the little lady, absurdly commanding to her, “Give me some of your love which you give Jonathan,” but she respectfully declines, stating, “I never will. I won’t even give that love to God,” for she is a woman that knows all too well the purity and faithfulness encompassed in true love, especially among soul mates such as herself and her now unfortunately brain-damaged hubby. Horrified by the Count’s sinister presence, Lucy suspects that Dracula might be involved with the deaths in Wismar and tries in vain to warn the townspeople, who pay her no mind as the mayor and all the government officials are dead and the rest of the people are more interested in burying the ostensibly diseased corpses and dining on fine wine in what they suspect to be their last feast as their very probable fate with the grim-reaper awaits. Probably the most selfless femme fatale who has ever lived, Lucy states to herself: "And if a pure hearted woman, diverts his attention from the cry of the cock...the first light of day will obliterate him" in regard to what she needs to do to rid the world of the vile vampire. Making good on her statement, she lures Count Dracula into her bedroom and hopes to distract him until his undead immortality can be vanquished at dawn, but in the process, she sacrifices her own life when the creature drains her blood. Though dead, Lucy is victorious as the first beam of light of the day causes Count Dracula to collapse to his death and not long after, Van Helsing drives a stake through his cold black heart just to make sure atrocious aristocrat is dead. On his way out of the house, Van Helsing is stopped by Jonathan Harker, who has the good doctor arrested. Jonathan Harker is now a vampire himself, stating to himself "I have much to do. Now!" and leaves Wismar in a hasty manner on horseback to assumedly continue his master and maker Count Dracula's work.

Rather ironically, out of all the films I have ever seen featuring Klaus Kinski, never has the infamously lunatic actor appear so subdued, sensitive, and sympathetic as his role in Nosferatu the Vampire, even if it is portraying a ghastly bloodsucking humanoid parasite who resembles a rat-like death camp survivor, as it seems the sadistic star, who was indubitably a 'psychic vampire' in real-life, felt right at home as a conspiring creature of the night who drains people of their vital fluid at their most vulnerable moments. That being said, what largely thematically differentiates Herzog's Nosferatu from Murnau's original 1922 film is that Nosferatu the Vampire 'humanizes' the vampire, portraying him as not merely soulless and insensitive but as an accursed walking corpse of sorts who, as he states himself, suffers in the following manner, "Time is an abyss... profound as a thousand nights... Centuries come and go... To be unable to grow old is terrible... Death is not the worst... Can you imagine enduring centuries, experiencing each day the same futilities?.." and is naturally willing to do anything to overcome his undying loneliness as an ancient aristocrat who has not had sun and sex in centuries. At the same time, Nosferatu the Vampire also shows how a good man, Jonathan Harker, can degenerate into a brutal beast of pure, pernicious evil, thereupon making Herzog's work a more thematically intricate film that is ultimately fittingly updated and more reflective of our more nihilistic and uncertain times, where parasitic 'blood-sucking' behavior is a given in the innately materialistic and capitalistic Occident. Of course, more than anything and most importantly, Nosferatu the Vampire is a grand aesthetic achievement that, in the rather seemingly simple form of a hallucinatory horror film, manages to combine the best elements of Teutonic art and culture from the past couple centuries or so, including the music of darkly romantic compositions of Richard Wagner and celestial krautrock outfit Popol Vuh, a seamlessly hybridized hodge-podge of cinematic ingredients from German expressionist and mountain films by the likes of Arnold Fanck and Leni Riefenstahl of the 1920s/30s, but also the anti-heimatfilm of German New Cinema (which Herzog himself previously contributed to with his work Heart of Glass (1976) aka Herz aus Glas), and ethereal landscapes scenes echoing the paintings of German romantic painter Caspar David Friedrich and the dark otherworldly völkisch mysticism of symbolist painters like Karl Wilhelm Diefenbach, so it should be no surprise that director Herzog stated of his objective with the film, “What I really sought to do was connect my Nosferatu with our true German cultural heritage, the silent films of the Weimar era and Murnau’s work in particular. If his Nosferatu is a genre film then mine inevitably is one too. In many ways, for me, this film was the final chapter of the vital process of ‘re-legitimization’ of German culture that had been going on for some years.”

Undoubtedly, one of the great ironies of the career of Werner Herzog—a filmmaker who has always blurred the line between fiction and nonfiction and documentary and narrative cinema, and rarely acknowledges genres—is that one of the greatest and most iconic, if not the most iconic, films of his career, Nosferatu the Vampyre is a classic horror genre flick, yet still manages to be pure Herzogian in its ominous oneiric yet rapturously romantic essence as a cinematic work that could have only been realized by a man with a deep connection to nature as a radical Bavarian peasant artist who would become one of the most important German filmmakers of the post-WWII era. Herzog’s Nosferatu the Vampyre was followed up with an in-name-only sequel entitled Vampire in Venice (1988) aka Nosferatu a Venezia aka Nosferatu in Venice, which was also based on F.W. Murnau’s Nosferatu and starred Klaus Kinski, but the Italian production went through many directors (producer Augusto Caminito took over after director Mario Caiano quit due to being rather tired of Kinski’s insults and belligerent behavior) and is ultimately a mess that is just as aesthetically troubled as the film’s production itself. Indeed, as he proved with not only Nosferatu the Vampyre, but also Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972), Woyzeck (1979), Fitzcarraldo (1982), and Cobra Verde (1987), Herzog was the only one that had what it takes to tame the blond polack beast Kinski. Undoubtedly, with the obvious exception of Murnau’s Nosferatu, Nosferatu the Vampyre is indubitably the greatest cinematic adaptation of Bram Stoker’s Dracula ever made, even making the immortally iconic Dracula (1931) directed by Tod Browning and starring Bela Lugosi seem rather tame, banal, and contrived by comparison, but especially exposing Bram Stoker’s Dracula (1992) directed by Francis Ford Coppola for the phony and truly ‘soulless’ pseudo-Victorian joke that it is. In his rat-like appearance and propensity for bringing the ‘plague’ (Jews were blamed for poisoning wells and spreading the plague in medieval times) from the semi-Asiatic east, it is no surprise the film theorists time and time again have recognized Nosferatu/Dracula as a sort of Jewish figure, so it seems a great irony that a Hebraic Hollywood director was never able to concoct the ultimate Dracula flick, but rather two very different krauts did so instead. Of course, after Nosferatu the Vampyre, it seems pointless for anyone to attempt Stoker's Dracula ever again, especially considering the sorry state of German cinema today.

Werner Herzog (1979)

When I first discovered the cinematic oeuvre of Bavarian adventurist auteur Werner Herzog (Even Dwarfs Started Small, My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done?) about a decade ago, I could not get enough and made a point of seeing all of the director's classic films immediately and out of all of these films, the only one of these films that did not really impress me too much was Woyzeck (1979) starring Klaus Kinski and Eva Mattes. Since it has been about a good ten years since I initially viewed the film, I recently decided to give Woyzeck another chance and while I enjoyed it much more than before, I can safely say it is not one of Herzog's finest Teutonic masterpieces but a secondary work and minimalistic minor masterpiece from a filmmaker who can afford to make a flawed flick or two. Indeed, knowing the background history of the film, one would think it was inevitable that the film would have been a short and sweet but somewhat sloppy work from the Bavarian celluloid Duke. Starting shooting a mere five days after Herzog completed Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979), Kinski (who replaced Bruno S. of The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974) after Herzog decided Kinski would be better suited for the role) and the rest of the film crew were naturally exhausted when they began working on Woyzeck, yet as the auteur explained during an interview with Paul Cronin, the film completed shooting in 17 days (most scenes were filmed in a single take!) and it only took another five days for the work to be edited, as the director wanted to take advantage of his time in Czechoslovakia (Herzog shot Nosferatu there and instead of seeking new film permits, he began to shoot Woyzeck but gave the false impression that he was still working on the vampire flick). Based on an unfinished 'working-class tragedy' of the same name written by German playwright/revolutionary Georg Büchner that was written in 1837 but not first published until 1879 after it been bastardized and heavily reworked by assimilated Austrian Sephardic Jewish novelist Karl Emil Franzos, Woyzeck is very much a Herzogian work in that, like the director's very first feature Signs of Life (1968) aka Lebenszeichen, it centers around a disillusioned Teutonic soldier suffering from debilitating weltschmerz and social alienation who slowly but surely mentally deteriorates until the point where he must seek a sort of visceral and innately irrational revenge against society.

A dark and patently culturally pessimistic sort of urban anti-Heimat flick, Woyzeck has been described by Herzog as his most intrinsically Germanic film, stating in an interview: "My film of Georg Büchner's Woyzeck is probably my simplest connection to what is the best of my own culture, more so than Nosferatu, which was more an explicit connection to a world of cinema. Though I have always worked within German culture, making a film of Woyzeck meant to reach out to Germany's most significant cultural history, and for this reason there is something in the film that is beyond me. It touches the very golden heights of German culture and because of this the film sparkles. Yet all I did was reach up and touch these heights." And, indeed, while I am more than hesitant to describe Woyzeck as an immaculate masterpiece, it still easily ranks up with Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Effi Briest (1974) and Bolwieser (1977) aka The Stationmaster's Wife and Helma Sanders-Brahms' Heinrich (1977) in terms of German New Cinema period pieces that pay tribute to great Teutonic literary works/figures of the past. Featuring dipsomaniac kraut barroom philosophers going on pessimistic quasi-existentialists rants that would put Schopenhauer to shame, a Jewish merchant who firmly believes "death should be cheap" and sells a cheap knife to a deranged soldier so he can bludgeon to death his wife, and a soldier antihero who shares about as much solidarity with the Prussian military ideal as a philo-Semitic commie like Berthold Brecht, Woyzeck features a cinematic portrait of old Germania that is about as romantic as the rape of Berlin by Soviet Asiatic hordes.

No-rank German soldier Franz Woyzeck (Klaus Kinski) suffers from a 'fever' that both his 'friends' and employers seemed rather concerned about, but no one seems to acknowledge the fact that the man does not suffer from a virus, but a foreboding mental illness that signals the fellow might murderously explode at any time. For starters, Woyzeck is a cowardly cuckold with a whorish mistress named Maria (Eva Mattes) with whom he has a bastard child. Woyzeck's main source of employment is doing degrading jobs for a military Captain (Wolfgang Reichmann), who berates his discernibly meek employee for having a child out of wedlock and lacking a strong moral compass. As the Captain rightfully, if not patronizingly, tells the Woyzeck, "you always have that hunted look in your eye. A good man doesn't have that. A good man has a clear conscience," and whereas the Captain professes to have "only joined the war to affirm my love for life," the life of a soldier has only confirmed Woyzeck's growing hatred for life and humanity. To supplement his meager income and support his impoverished family, Woyzeck is also the slavish guinea pig of a quack Doctor (Willy Semmelrogge) who severely scolds the soldier for routinely urinating in public and pays him poorly to try out an eccentric experiment where he only can eat of diet of peas and nothing else. Meanwhile, Woyzeck's lecherous mistress Maria spends her days voyeuristically drooling at the sight of handsome soldiers and eventually begins having an affair with a handsome and masculine Drum Major (Josef Bierbichler) who is everything that her hapless cuck baby-daddy is not. When Woyzeck confronts Marie about her slutty behavior and goes to strike her for her lack of remorse, she responds with the utmost contempt by stating, "Hit me, Franz! I'd rather have a knife in my body than your hand on me," which prove to be rather prophetic words on the unclean maiden's part. When Woyzeck makes a feeble attempt to confront the Drum Major, he is first verbally assaulted with the remark "I'll knock your nose up your ass!" and eventually beaten by the man in a rather dehumanizing manner. While holding Woyzeck in a headlock, the Drum Major sadiſtically quips to him, “Should I leave you enough air for a grandma’s fart?,” thus further adding to the ſoldier’s abjeſt humiliation. After bizarrely declaring to himſelf “Today I am 40 years old...7 months and 12 days” and giving ſome of his belongings to a friend, Woyzeck goes to a Jewish ſhop owner to buy a weapon and ſince he lack the funds to buy a gun, he opts for a knife. Rather humorouſly yet ſtrangely poetically, the all-wiſe old Jewish peddler (Wolfgang Bächler) ſtates to Woyzeck regarding the knife, “I give it to you as cheap as the next. Death ſhould be cheap, but not for free! You ſhould have an economical death.” When Woyzeck leaves, the old Jew mumbles to himſelf, “There! Like it was nothing, and yet it’s money. The dog!” Ultimately, Woyzeck takes Marie to a ſcenic lake and when ſhe rebuffs his warm yet pathetic embrace, the ſoldier ſtates “How hot your lips are. Hot...whore breath. And yet I’d give heaven to kiſs them one more time...” and proceeds to brutally and viſcerally ſtab his miſtreſs as if uſing the knife as a ſubſtitute for his neglected member.

Conſidering Georg Büchner died prematurely at the mere age of 23 from typhus before he could complete Woyzeck, Herzog decided to piece together the fragments of the play in a manner he ſaw fit, or as he ſtated in an interview: “I had wanted to make a film of Woyzeck for ſome time. For me there is no greater drama in the German language. It is of ſuch ſtunning actuality. There are no really good English translations of Woyzeck, nothing really completely ſatisfying. The drama is a fragment, and there has been a very high-calibre debate within academic circles as to which order the looſe, unpaginated ſheets ſhould go in. I uſed an arrangement of ſcenes that made the moſt ſenſe as a continuous ſtory and I think moſt theatrical productions uſe this ſame ſhape.” Indeed, deſpite the paſſages that are loſt-in-translation with English ſubtitling, Woyzeck has a number of deeply poetic excerpts, with the following ſpeech from a drunken vagrant-like fellow being one of the moſt marvelouſly miſanthropic: “But...when a wanderer, leaning againſt the ſtream of time...or answering to himſelf with divine wiſdom...is ſaying to himſelf, why does man exiſt? Why does man exiſt? But honeſtly, I’ll tell you...how would the farmer, the cobbler, the doctor live...if God hadn’t created man? How the ſoldier, if he waſn’t endowed with the deſire...the deſire...the deſire to kill his own kind? Therefore, doubt not. All things of this world are evil. Even money decays. Finally, dear congregation...let’s piſs croſſway ſo a Jew dies!” Of courſe, in Woyzeck, no Jew dies, but inſtead merely provides the weapon for a lovelorn lunatic to kill his unfaithful lover.

In terms of acting, Woyzeck features eaſily one of, if not the moſt, patently pathetic performances ever given by Klaus Kinski. Apparently, Herzog exploited Kinski’s exhaustion from ſhooting Nosferatu the Vampyre previously to get the infamous egomaniacal actor to give the kraut cuckold performance of a lifetime, which he certainly did. Like his character Woyzeck in the film, Kinski ſeems to have loſt all control of himſelf and has been denigrated to the level of a poſſeſſed demonic being who only has the capacity for erratically reacting without thought. In terms of anti-völkisch hallucinatory psycho-dramatic horrors, Woyzeck can only really be compared to Uwe Brandner's brutal anti-Heimat sci-fi flick I Love You, I Kill You (1971) aka Ich liebe dich, ich töte dich, though Herzog's film lacks even the most meager glimmer of hope and redemption. If I did not know better, I would assume that Herzog was living vicariously through the character of Woyzeck, as he gets to psychosexually slaughter Eva Mattes, who was the director's real-life mistress and baby-mama (Herzog and Mattes are the parents of photographer Hanna Mattes). Regardless of whatever influences went into the making of Woyzeck, it is undoubtedly one of the most darkly poetic and pathologically perturbing films of German New Cinema as the sort of work a sterile and glacial filmmaker like Michael Haneke, who somehow manages to make cinematic murder seem about as interesting as a vacuum cleaner commercial, wishes he had directed. In Woyzeck, passionate murder is of Wagnerian proportions, or as the film's closing inter-title reads: "A good murder, a real murder, a beautiful murder; as beautiful, as any man can hope to see. We haven't had one like this in ages."

COBRA VERDE

Werner Herzog (1987)

The fifth and final cinematic collaboration between what is easily one of the greatest, if not mutually deleterious, actor-director partnerships in film history, Cobra Verde (1987) aka Slave Coast directed by Werner Herzog (The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser, Fitzcarraldo) starring Klaus Kinski (Zoo Zéro, Nosferatu the Vampyre) also happens to be one of the weirdest and mystifying films about the African slave trade, making it sort of a nice arthouse epic companion piece to Goodbye Uncle Tom (1971) aka Addio Zio Tom directed by marvelous Mondo Cane maestros Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi. A doomed film production from the get go, Cobra Verde marked the height of the already well known hostility and hatred between Herzog and Kinski, who was more interested in his own pet project Kinski Paganini (1989), which would ultimately be both the actor's directorial debut and the last film he starred in before his death via heart attack at the age of 65 in 1991. In fact, as Herzog described in his documentary My Best Fiend (1999) aka Mein liebster Feind - Klaus Kinski, Kinski wanted the Bavarian auteur to direct Paganini (but Herzog ultimately found the script to be "unfilmable"). Herzog felt that Kinski's obsession with the Paganini project was so all-consuming that it caused him to have an "alien air," which affected his performance in Cobra Verde. Based on the novel The Viceroy of Ouidah (1980) by British writer Bruce Chatwin and filmed in Africa, Brazil and Colombia, Cobra Verde was so acutely accursed by Kinski's menacing and megalomaniacal wrath that original cinematographer Thomas Mauch, who previously shot Herzog classics like Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) and Stroszek (1977), quit the project after facing too much abuse from the pathologically petty and pissed Polish-German actor and was replaced with Czech cinematographer Viktor Růžička. Herzog himself was no less disillusioned with the project, stating regarding Cobra Verde, "the production was, simply, the worst in my life and I publicly swore after filming that I would never again work with Kinski. At the time I thought to myself, 'Will somebody please step in and carry on the work with this man? I have had enough,' There was something about Kinski's presence in the film that meant a foreign stink – his stink – pervaded the work we did together there, and Cobra Verde suffers somewhat because of this." An unwaveringly unflattering look at the white man, black man, and humanity in general, Cobra Verde is essentially the dark continent equivalent to Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972), albeit nowhere as ethereal and hallucinatory but certainly more depraved and (unintentionally) hilarious in its depiction of such unsavory things as an unpleasantly plump Portuguese plantation owners who defile African slaves and collect mulatto progeny, Catholic priests that pimp out Negro preteens, and savagely sadistic African kings of the tribal sort who exterminate every single man who has the same name as him as he wants to be the 'one and only' with

Featuring 'trout pout' lipped crazed kraut Kinski in the role of a degenerate and deadly Brazilian bandit who literally makes women, children, and priests scatter with his mere presence, I, for one, think that the actor's real-life mental derangement contributed greatly to his uniquely unsettling and intimidating performance as a curious career criminal of the loony lone-wolf sort who is the only white man willing to physically work with Negroes doing degrading slave labor. Francisco Manoel da Silva aka "Cobra Verde" aka "Green Snake" (Klaus Kinski) is best at being a bloodthirsty bandit in the Brazilian sertão so when he makes the mistake of performing honest work for a gold-mining company and is not paid by the foreman, he kills said foreman and goes on his merry maniac way. After screwing a random aristocratic Negress he spots while wandering to seemingly nowhere, Cobra Verde subdues a runaway slave by his mere penetrating glance and poetic words, which impresses a lardo sugar baron named Don Octavio Coutinho (José Lewgoy) so much that he gives the bandit a job overseeing the slaves on his 600-negro strong plantation. While Don Coutinho loves banging black broads himself as demonstrated by the fact he has three young mulatto daughters, he does not tolerate Cobra Verde's mania for miscegenation after the bandit gets all three of the Don's half-caste debutantes pregnant. After confessing that he not only impregnated all three of Don Coutinho's high yellow honies but that he is also the infamous Cobra Verde, the bandit is sent on a suicidal mission to attempt to re-open the slave trade in Dahomey, West Africa, where a killer tribal king named Bossa Ahadee (real-life African king Nana Agyefi Kwame II) rules who had previously exterminated the entire white population. When Cobra Verde arrives in Africa, he states, "Thus far, Africa's quite a disappointment" and soon runs into the only white man, bloated and debauched Catholic priest Bernabé (Peter Berling), who gives holy communion to goats and pagan Negroes that wear devil horns and who moonlights as a pimp of nubile African girls. Cobra Verde befriends a black ex-soldier named Taparica (King Ampaw, who previously worked with Wim Wenders and Ulli Lommel), who sets the bandit up in a ruined Portuguese castle (shot at Elmina Castle in Ghana) and who helps him gather slaves by trading guns to King Bossa via a middleman.

To his enemies' surprise, Cobra Verde manages to make slavery profitable and successful again, but on his second mission, the bandit and his pal Taparica are captured by the King Bossa's men for the unsubstantiated crime of greyhound-poisoning, which they will assumedly be executed for as expressed by the wishes of the maniac monarch. Cobra Verde is put in blackface by his captors as a white man can apparently only be decapitated while looking like Al Jolson and King Bossa, who dually rules with an imaginary yet pampered fellow named the 'Bush King,' taunts the defeated bandit with the remark, "The devil is white. The devil is white. All whites are ½ dead." Luckily, King Bossa's bug-eyed renegade nephew saves Cobra Verde and Taparica at night before they can be executed as the young buck wants the bandit to lead a revolution against his unhinged uncle and the two make a multicultural blood alliance to demonstrate solidarity. Cobra Verde absurdly trains a giant army of topless female warriors with spears and ultimately topples King Bossa, whose personal concubines ritualistically strangle him after being defeated by a white devil. Bossa's nephew initially gives Cobra Verde a noble title and makes him rich with the slave trade, but the bandit eventually falls out of favor with the new king, who one day sends the white men polio-stricken cripples as opposed to the healthy black bucks he typically sends him to sell. Somewhat surprisingly, Cobra Verde is given a shade of hope after the Portuguese outlaw slavery and seize his assets, and the British put a price on his head, as it gives the bandit a chance at a new beginning of sorts, remarking "Finally something's happened." As for his disillusionment with his life in West Africa, Cobra Verde writes, "I cannot begin to describe this cretinous existence of mine. Nor how lonely it is to be without family or friends. The only white man in this country...perhaps on this whole continent. Meanwhile I have become the father of sixty-two children...but this gives me no satisfaction. Perhaps next year I shall come back and marry. I would live in the lands of ice and snow...anywhere to be away from here...The heat here is mean and inescapable. It courses through the bodies of the people like a fever – and yet my heart grows colder and colder." In the end, Cobra Verde attempts to leave Africa in a small boat to start a new life, but collapses and dies in the process. As a man who states quite un sentimentally of the Africa, "In this place, the dead are more alive than the living," Cobra Verde's unexpected death is nothing short of a blessing. After an abhorrently allegorical scene of a disfigured native who apparently was stricken with polio as a child as he crawls on all fours across the beach and a group of nude nubile native nun women chanting some silly song, Cobra Verde concludes with the quote, "The slaves will sell their masters and grow wings."

In one particularly symbolic scene featured in Cobra Verde, the bandit's business partner gives a toast to human bondage, stating, "To slavery...the greatest misunderstanding in the history of mankind." Indeed, if Cobra Verde depicts something new in cinema history that Hollywood has gone to great measures to consciously ignore and totally obfuscate, it is the fact that black Africans played an imperative and central role in the African slave trades and without their help, the capturing, enslaving, and importing/exporting of blacks around the world could have never have run so smoothly. In another particularly telling scene in the film, Cobra Verde remarks, "Slavery is an element of the human heart... To our ruin!" thus reflecting not only the innate greed and inhumanity of humanity, but also the fact that slavery did no favors for the white world in the long run as demonstrated by the racial chaos that pervades today not only in Africa, but also the Occident, where every European nation is facing a sort of reverse-colonialism where people from the Third World are illegally immigrating to and slowly but surely turning first world nations into crime-ridden multicultural hellholes. In the film's depiction of real-life African tribe kingdoms where the king himself is adorned in gold-chains and other 'bling' like a pimp and the tribesmen are engaged in a sort of pompous savage-like pageantry, including 'twerking', that is typical of modern day rap 'music' videos, Cobra Verde also demonstrates that wherever they may be—be it in rural West Africa or once prosperous European cities like London or Paris—blacks display the same sort of behavior just as the age-old saying goes, "you can take the African out of the jungle but you can never take the jungle out of the African." Notably, while demonstrating a deep respect for them and their culture, director Werner Herzog even goes so far as describing the Africans featured in his film as "savages" in the audio commentary for the Anchor Bay DVD release of the film.

In the interview book Herzog on Herzog (2002), Werner Herzog stated in reference to Cobra Verde and the African slave trades, "The fact is that in Ghana, where we filmed, slavery is still something of a taboo subject, unlike colonialism. In the United States and the Caribbean there is much debate about slavery, in Brazil too, but in many places in Africa the wound of slavery is so deep and painful that hardly anyone speaks about it in public. It is an almost untouched subject. I have always suspected that one reason for this is the well-established fact that African kingdoms were involved in the slave trade almost as much as the white traders. There was also a great deal of slave trading between the Arab world and black Africa, and even within African nations themselves." While thought of by many people, including fanatical fans of the Bavarian auteur, as the least impressive film of the five cinematic collaborations between Herzog-Kinski, I would argue that it is the most overlooked and underrated and certainly an immensely superior work to Woyzeck (1979). Undoubtedly, compared to Herzog's sentimentalist Zionist propaganda flick Invincible (2001), Cobra Verde seems like an unsung masterpiece and certainly one of the most honest cinematic depictions of the African slaves trades ever made. With Hollywood constantly pumping out black-inciting films like 12 Years a Slave (2013) directed by Steve McQueen, Cobra Verde is undoubtedly a rare voice of reason and relative objectivity in a Semitic sea of pseudo-suavely stylized 'slavery porn' of the stupidly sentimental Spielberg-esque persuasion. Like a Spaghetti Western (in fact, Sergio Leone's stuntman Benito Stefanelli acted as a stunt coordinator for the film) meets an Italian cannibal exploitation flick meets Africa Blaxploitation as if created by Leni Riefenstahl for National Geographic but with a Mondo Cane flair for not pandering to the pussified and pathetically politically correct, Cobra Verde reminds the viewer that not all 'magical negroes' are nice and not every cracker slave trader gets a kick out of selling, buying, or blasphemously boning negresses. Undoubtedly, engaging in slavery and colonialism was one of the biggest mistakes Europeans ever made that led to the cultural chaos that plagues the Occidental world today and even though Werner Herzog stated, “Cobra Verde is about great fantasies and follies of the human spirit, no colonialism,” the film does a better job than any Hollywood film I can think of, especially when compared to Spielberg’s agitprop fantasy flick Amistad (1997), of portraying the macabre beginnings of the multicultural virus that has proliferated so strongly and so brutally ravaged the world in which we live today.

INVINCIBLE

Werner Herzog (2001)

Undoubtedly, even great filmmakers can make an astonishingly bad cinematic failure from time to time, yet I cannot think of a film more unwaveringly revolting, sentimentally reprehensible and phony, aesthetically asinine, culturally and historically dishonest, intellectually insipid, and eclectically shallow and unrewarding from a world-class filmmaker than Invincible (2001) aka Unbesiegt directed by Bavarian auteur Werner Herzog (Aguirre, the Wrath of God, Nosferatu the Vampyre). Essentially a Zionist propaganda flick made to be palatable to the most naive of children directed by a shabbos goy in the guise of fairytale-like historical fiction, Invincible is a film centering around two very different real-life European Jewish showmen from the early twentieth-century—Polish Hebrew strongman and Jewish folk hero Zische Breitbart and Moravian Jewish clairvoyant/hypnotist and National Socialist supporter Erik Jan Hanussen (born Hermann Steinschneider)—Invincible establishes a dichotomy between the “good Jew” and the “bad Jew” in the Israeli Zionist sense. Of course, the good Hebrew is a strong man with a deep sense of loyalty to his own racial kin and the bad Hebrew is a weak and ostensibly self-loathing Jew who hides his identity and supports the enemy of his people for personal gain as so shallowly and soulless depicted in Invincible. Considering that Werner Herzog is German and directed a film that denigrates his own people and works as a propaganda piece for an alien race that was undoubtedly made for his own personal gain, one could easily argue that the Bavarian auteur is not much different from the villain Erik Jan Hanussen he portrays in Invincible, the sort of exceedingly ethno-masochistic work that could have only been directed by a post-WWII European. While Invincible was not exactly a monetarily successful work, it certainly helped get Werner Herzog in Hollywood as the director went on to direct somewhat mainstream (and thankfully superior) works like Rescue Dawn (2007), The Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans (2009), and My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? (2009). Culturally cuckolding himself to the level of depicting his own people as crazed krauts of the quasi-demonic sort that is no less caricature-ridden than Schindler's List (1993), Invincible is essentially the celluloid equivalent of Herzog self-castrating himself and personally handing his Wienerschnitzel to Steven Spielberg in a feeble attempt at atoning for the holocaust. A film that in no way, shape, or form seems like it was directed by the man behind Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) and Fitzcarraldo (1982), Invincible is the film that made me do the once seemingly unthinkable act of second guessing Werner Herzog's integrity as a filmmaker and a man. An English language UK-German-Irish-American co-production filmed all around the world featuring Brits playing Krauts and gentiles playing Jews, Invincible is also a calculatingly marketed and manufactured celluloid cultural mongrel that was meant as a sort of big comeback film for Werner Herzog, but ultimately signaled the wild Bavarian auteur had very possibly sold his semi-Slavic soul to some devil in Hollywood.

Zische Breitbart (played by gentile Finnish strongman Jouko Ahola, who hardly seems 'Jewish' in any sense of the word) is a rather rare Orthodox Jewish blacksmith with a low IQ but immense physical strength who lives in a Jewish medieval-like Shtetl in rural Eastern Poland and after a couple of cliché 'white nigger' anti-Semites pick on him and his weakling genius 9-year-old brother Benjamin (played by the rather Aryan-looking one-time actor Jacob Wein) at a restaurant, the super sensitive Semite superman wrecks the eatery during a idiotic brawl and is forced to work as a strongman in a carnival to make up for the damage he has done. A talent agent spots Zische at one of his performances, and before he knows it, the strong and stoic yet sensitive Hebrew is walking all the way to Berlin, Germany to seek his fortune as a celebrated showman and on the way groups of fellow Jews follow him playing music as if members of some Teutonized Zionist Wandervogel group. When Zische reaches Berlin, he is assigned against his own will to work with carny conman mystic/hypnotist/mentalist Eric Jan Hanussen (Tim Roth), a superficially suave egomaniac who owns a luxurious cabaret-like building called Palace of the Occult and styles himself as a Danish aristocrat but is in fact secretly a Moravian Jew named Hermann Steinschneider whose father is a lowly caretaker of a synagogue. Hanussen lets Zische know from the get go that "No Jew should be as strong as you are" and "we will Aryanize you." After all, most of Hanussen's greatest fans and friends are members of the Sturmabteilung (SA) brownshirts, so Zische is forced to take on the Aryan persona of dragon-slaying Germanic hero Siegfried, by wearing a ridiculously Marilyn Monroe-esque wig topped with an old Norse Viking helmet. In no time, Zische is soppily and slavishly swooning over Hanussen's melancholy mistress Marta Farra (Russian classical pianist Anna Gourari, who resembles Herzog's baby-momma Eva Mattes), who is constantly physically and emotionally degraded by the naughty Jewish Nazi mystic, which saddens the saintly Jewish strongman.

After Zische's mother and little brother Benjamin, who is disheartened by his brother hiding his Judaic background and not being proud of being a member of God's chosen tribe, visits him in Berlin, the strongman has a random freakout on stage during a performance, takes off his Aryan gear, and admits he is not Aryan and calls himself the new Jewish Samson, which rather pisses off both Hanussen and the nefarious Nazis in the crowd. Naturally, Zische's absurdly executed act of Hebraic defiance makes major headlines and proud Jews begin to flock to Hanussen's mostly Nazi-occupied Palace of the Occult, thereupon making an absurd audience that is half kosher and half kraut, which naturally erupts into a full-on brawl of the pre- Kristallnacht sort. Despite being Jewish, Hanussen's ultimate aim is to be the "Minister of Occult" for Uncle Adolf, so when he takes National Socialist bigwigs Heinrich Himmler and Joseph Goebbels on a yachting trip and Zische gets peeved when the mystic tries to whore out Mara to the future Nazi Minister of Propaganda, things get a bit ugly. Although initially intending to shoot Zische on the spot after the Jewish strongman calls him a fraud, the Nazis convince the counterfeit mystic that it will be best if they take such libelous matters to court. During the trial, it is revealed that Hanussen is not only a fraud, but a Czech Jew who has gone under a number of false aliases and fake professions during his conman career. Inevitably, Hanussen is taken away by a couple boorish brownshirts and soon executed and his mangled corpse, which has been partially eaten by wild boars, is identified by Zische for the police. In the end, Zische goes back to Poland and tries to convince his fellow Jews to get strong as he foresees a holocaust of sorts, preaching, "We have to get strong. We shall need a thousand Samsons," but unfortunately the Jewish strongman dies shortly after in a rather ironic and weak manner after getting an infection from a rusty nail. In a rather retarded Spielberg-esque dream-sequence that concludes Invincible, Zische's picks his brother Benjamin up by the shirt and hurdles him in the air, whereupon the kosher kid literally flies away in the air as if allegorically escaping from the wrath of the Shoah or whatever.

Despite concluding with an inter-title that states that Zische died on January 28, 1933, two days before Hitler took power in 1933, the real-life New Samson died in October 1925, not to mention the fact he died and was buried in Berlin (but not before obtaining American citizenship) as opposed to his home-shtetl in East Poland. However, the real Zische Breitbart and Hanussen were indeed real-life rivals of sorts that took each other to court for 'slander' and other stereotypically Hebraic things (contrary to being in love him, Farra filed a slander suit against Zische after the Jewish strongman did the same to Hanussen), but contrary to the romantic depiction featured in Invincible, the two men inevitably reconciled their differences. As for Breitbart, his greatest contribution to his people was providing his services to various Zionist fundraising groups, which Herzog conveniently left out of Invincible, not to mention the fact that he was hardly the Hebrew Hulk Hogan depicted in the film, or as American theater professor/Weimar Scholar Mel Gordon wrote in his his book Erik Jan Hanussen: Hitler's Jewish Clairvoyant (2001) regarding the Semitic strongman, "Breitbart projected something gentle, almost feminine, in his sunny stage persona and was often compared with the silent film star, Rudolph Valentino. Moreover, Zische's proud and unassimilated espousal of his Mosaic faith (through his scenic characterizations of Goliath, Samson, and Hebrew gladiators, together with his Zionist proclamations in Yiddish) represented a fresh archetype: the twentieth-century Jew as noble savage." Undoubtedly, judging by the fact that only the historically-inclined Jew would know about Zische Breitbart's true accomplishments as a propagandistic son of Zion who was supporting the state of Israel before it even existed, which Invincible does not even touch on but instead portrays the man as a unwitting dullard, it seems like Werner Herzog made the film to send a special message regarding his commitment as a shabbos goy.

As depicted in Invincible, Hanussen was indeed “Hitler’s Nostradamus” and the “Prophet of the Third Reich” as he successfully predicted Uncle Adolf’s takeover in Germany in an August 1932 edition of his popular astrology weekly. Ironically buried in a Catholic graveyard in Stahnsdorf, Hanussen’s Jewish identity was ultimately revealed by communist tabloid journalists, whose claims meant the beginning of the end for the rather popular seer. As Dr. Walter C. Langer—an America psychoanalyst who worked for the Office of Strategic Services, which was a predecessor to the CIA—wrote in a psychoanalytic study of the Fuhrer in 1943 for the OSS, “... during the early 1920’s Hitler took regular lessons in speaking and in mass psychology from a man named Hanussen who was also a practicing astrologer and fortune-teller. He was an extremely clever individual who taught Hitler a great deal concerning the importance of staging meetings to obtain the greatest dramatic effect,” which, if true, makes for a great irony of human history considering the world’s top anti-Semite was taught his political craft by a self-loathing Jewish swindler. Undoubtedly, Hanussen’s greatest feat as a kosher clairvoyant was predicting the Reichstag fire, which enabled then-Chancellor of Germany Adolf Hitler to seize absolute power in 1933 and completely secure the Nazi takeover of Deutschland. Some rather dubious evidence also points to the fact that Hanussen may have been involved with the Reichstag fire and had hypnotized Marinus van der Lubbe, the half-retarded Dutch pyromaniac/communist who was convicted and executed for the crime. Of course, the facts of Hanussen’s life as Germany’s Hitlerite Houdini are much stranger than Herzog’s celluloid fiction. Two biopics including, Hanussen (1955) directed by O. W. Fischer and Georg Marischka and Hanussen (1988) directed by István Szabó, as well as the anti-Goebbels propaganda film Enemy of Women (1944) directed by Alfred Zeisler, preceded Invincible in depicting Hanussen and all of these films are infinitely more interesting than Herzog’s positively putrid piece of philo-Semitic puffery. A hopelessly hokey and aesthetically horrendous celluloid Zishe Breitbart hagiography that attempts to depict the eccentric essences of two of the oddest German-based Semitic showmen of the early twentieth-century and falls miserably on both accounts, Invincible is so shockingly abominable that I still have a hard time believing to this day after initially watching the film over a decade ago that it was directed by the same man that tamed blond beast Klaus Kinski and had a steamship pulled over a hill without special effects in his film Fitzcarraldo (1982).

BAD LIEUTENANT: PORT OF CALL NEW ORLEANS
BAD LIEUTENANT: PORT OF CALL NEW ORLEANS

Werner Herzog (2009)

No better place for an American Bad Lieutenant to be committing crimes and smashing skulls than New Orleans. Not only does this Bad Lieutenant lurk in the shadows of America's wet bastard little France, but he stalks post-Hurricane Katrina New Orleans, right after god flushed his bowels for the benefit of humanity. Despite the toilet being flushed, it seems that New Orleans still has a bunch of Creole turds floating around. The Bad Lieutenant in Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans is investigating the execution-style murder of a poor Senegalese Negro family who seem to have gotten caught up in heroin sales. This is pure luck for the Bad Lieutenant, for he loves nothing more than drugs, especially cocaine and heroin.

Nicholas Cage is my kind of cop, a little bit deranged but more importantly he is fucking hilarious. Anyone who has had to wait for a prescription at a pharmacy can get a tad annoyed by the slowness and unwarranted arrogance of the pharmacists. Luckily, a Bad Lieutenant played by an extra anxiety-filled Nicholas Cage has zero-tolerance for waiting for his Vicodin and takes action by going behind the counter with his extra big handgun. If this country had more cops that did what was needed to be done like the Bad Lieutenant, the streets would at least be a little cleaner. Unfortunately, one of the Bad Lieutenant's co-worker cops is played by a very sloppy and disheveled Val Kilmer. I believe that Mr. Kilmer can no longer pass for Jim Morrison.

Apparently, Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans is not a remake nor is it a sequel to Abel Ferrara's Bad Lieutenant. It is obvious however that Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans takes more than a couple cues from the original Bad Lieutenant. Mr. Ferrara did not take too kindly to the idea that someone was making a film similar to his own and stated: "As far as remakes go, ... I wish these people die in Hell. I hope they're all in the same streetcar, and it blows up." In his kind Bavarian heart, legendary auteur Werner Herzog and Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans director made the gentlemanly response: "I would like to meet the man," and "I have a feeling that if we met and talked, over a bottle of whisky, I should add, I think we could straighten everything out." Personally, I would not mind attending the whisky talk between the two legendary auteurs if the talk were to actually occur.

Mr. Cage and Mr. Herzog

With Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans, Werner Herzog once again proves he can do "Hollywood" if need be. Although for the most part in standard Hollywood cop film form, Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans features a couple Herzog-esque shots such as a shot from the perspective of a real live alligator staring at a fellow alligator who has become roadkill. I also enjoyed a scene involving a group of mafia-wops that get blasted away by a bunch of fancy crack-dealing Negroes. After killing all the woparellis, the Bad Lieutenant hallucinates seeing the soul of one of the mafia men break dancing, a scene surreal in a manner that only Werner Herzog could successfully execute.

After seeing Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans, I wouldn't mind seeing additional Bad Lieutenant films made. In fact, it might be interesting to see a Bad Lieutenant Television series, as long as it is put in the hands of the right people. Of course, like the first two Bad Lieutenant films, any new films in the unofficial series should be directed by a fellow unique and true auteur. Harmony Korine could direct Bad Lieutenant: Tennessee Trailer Town and Vincent Gallo could direct Bad Lieutenant: Buffalo New York Ripper, for these films would be some of the best cops films ever directed, keeping in trend with the two earlier Bad Lieutenant films.

MY SON, MY SON, WHAT HAVE YE DONE?
MY SON, MY SON, WHAT HAVE YE DONE?

Werner Herzog (2009)

While a cinematic marriage between Bavarian adventurer auteur Werner Herzog and American celluloid surrealist David Lynch sounds like one of the most prestigious prospects for a film made in 'arthouse auteur heaven,' I must admit that I initially had my reservations for such a film, especially when considering my disillusionment with both directors' most recent work. While Herr Herzog has been churning out curious subpar cinematic works for about a decade now or so as a crazy kraut who has finally been accepted in Hebraic Hollywood (I guess all those years inexplicably kissing Spielberg's kosher ass finally paid off), loony Lynch seems more interested in promoting signature coffee beans and pseudo-spiritual meditative swill; two absurdly priced products that do not even equal the most nonsensical of episodes from the second season of Twin Peaks in terms of quality. Of course, when I learned that the Herzog directed and Lynch produced film My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? (2009) featured the charming yet seemingly cracked character actor Michael Shannon (Shotgun Stories, Herzog's Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans) as a maniac 'anti-hero' and celebrated German cult film poof Udi Kier (Blood for Dracula, Ego-mania - Insel ohne Hoffnung) in a more dignified role, as well as Willem Dafoe, Chloë Sevigny, Grace Zabriskie, and Brad Dourif, I could not help but anticipate the film. Although I initially saw My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? around the time it was first released, I decided to digest it and watch it a couple more times before writing on it, not least of all because I wanted to make sure I was not hallucinating what I found to be a fairly enthralling, eccentric, and – whether intentional or not – sadistically side-splitting film. Described by Herzog himself as, "a horror film without the blood, chainsaws and gore, but with a strange, anonymous fear creeping up in you," My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? fully exceeded my admittedly conflicting expectations, even if it does not even deserve to be described as a "masterpiece," but more like an audacious dramatic anti-thriller riddled with mostly excusable flaws that features a stunning and artistically subversive look at one severely sinking son's schizzo psyche as a curiously comical character study that ultimately brings up more questions than it actually answers, thereupon acting in complete contradiction to the typical Hollywood film of this sort.

Loosely based on the real-life story of a mentally ill fellow named Mark Yavorsky – a high school basketball star, scholar, and talented graduate student in drama – who on June 10, 1979, at the age of 34, stabbed to death his mother with a three-foot-long antique saber sword in a scenario strikingly reminiscent of the Greek tragedy "Orestes," My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? is a film that was long in the making before reaching Herzog's aesthetically heretical hands that began as a script by classics scholar Herbert Golder – a fellow heavily inspired by Jules Dassin's A Dream of Passion (1978) – who began a somewhat personal relationship with the troubled fellow who committed matricide in an act that probably can best be described as the aberrant behavior of a maniac with an overwhelming anti-oedipal complex. After taking Werner Herzog to meet Yavorsky in 1995 for what would be one of his last meetings with the gifted maniac, as the Bavarian auteur found the mommy-slayer to be quite "argumentative" (not to mention the fact the filmmaker was quite perturbed to learn that the funny fellow had made a shrine in his mobile home in dedication to his film Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972)), Golder and the German auteur shopped around for producers but it would be until well over a decade later before the two conversed with David Lynch; a filmmaker that could most certainly relate to their artistic predicament. Agreeing that the film would be, thankfully, "a return to essential filmmaking," My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? was eventually sired by two of the world cinema's most sacred and subversive sons of cinema and the rest is film history.

A self-loathing white policeman who derives pleasure verbally bashing 'crackers cops' to his Hispanic compatriot Vargas (Michael Peña) as the sort of idiosyncratic half-intelligent/half-idiot you would expect from a Herzog film, Detective Hank Havenhurst (Willem Dafoe) has some serious identity issues, but they pale in comparison to Brad McCullum's (Michael Shannon) all-consuming cognitive dissonance. Unbeknownst to Havenhurst, mommy murdering maniac McCullum walks right by him in the chaos of a crime scene after fleeing the home of the black Aunt Jemima-esque neighbor where he just slaughtered the ostensibly overbearing woman that gave birth to him some 30+ years before. A burdened bastard boy who never knew his father (and refuses to reference him as such), Brad McCullum was still virtually attached to the umbilical cord of his perversely pampering and odiously overprotective mother until he literally 'cut her off' as one learns as My Son, What Have Ye Done? progresses. The sole survivor of a kayaking trip in Peru (filmed at a favorite spot of Herzog's where he filmed scenes for Aguirre, the Wrath of God and Fitzcarraldo) due to a penetrating premonition from God himself that he should stay behind and not go in the water, McCullum morphed into a megalomaniac with a messiah complex who saw images of the holy one on the front of Quaker Oats oatmeal containers, which he wastes no time in showing to the less than intrigued police officers and SWAT team members that have surrounded the home where he purportedly has taken two people hostage. Lee Meyers (Udo Kier) – Brad's theatre teacher – also lets Havenhurst know that his student started beginning to be unable to distinguish between fantasy and reality during practice sessions for the Greek tragedy he was supposed to star in, but was taken out of due to his exceedingly erratic and borderline violent behavior. Of course, in Brad's mind, the show must go on and he opts for more realistic options that are only all the more inspired when his half-crazy, homo-hating Uncle Ted (Brad Dourif) hooks him up with a fancy antique sword. Aside from Lee, Ingrid (Chloë Sevigny) – the unconventionally menacing mommy mangler’s finance – knows Brad the most intimately and is thus best equipped to describe to detective Havenhurst the perturbing process of her beserk’s beau’s brazen and belligerent break with reality. When it comes down to it and when everything is said and done, Brad seems most concerned about his “eagles in drag” aka pink flamingos than the fact he has just killed his mother and will most likely be staying in prison for a very long time with nefarious negroes who have very little tolerance for white weirdo witlessness. Needless to say, Detective Hank Havenhurst is certainly not interested in honkey nonsensicalness and thus deals with batty bad boy Brad accordingly. Told in a series of flagrant and frolicsome yet certainly serious and sometimes semi-surreal flashbacks, My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? has an undeniable classic hallucinatory Herzog feel to it, except set in the seemingly unlikely place of sunny Los Angeles, California; a region where David Lynch exercised phantasmagorical cinematic psychodramas time and time again via Loſt Highway (1997), Mulholland Drive (2001), and Inland Empire (2006), thereupon making the Bavarian auteur filmmaker’s minacious murder mystery – whether a conscious decision or not – a tribute of sorts to the absurdiſt American auteur who brought true celluloid kultur to the ſtagnant and soulless City of Angels.

Herzog may have finally went ‘Hollywood,’ but as he explained in the audio commentary for the Anchor Bay DVD release of Stroszek (1977), he seriously feels that all the best Americans are from the Midwest, thus it should be no surprise that the Los Angeles, California featured in My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? seems more like a ſterile lunatic asylum that sows sadiſtic mother-sacrificing sons and policemen prone to self-flagellation than a place of marvelous mystique and intrigue as most films set in Tinseltown would lead one to believe. It should also be noted that for anti-hero Brad, it is visiting exotic places like the jungles of Peru (as well as Machu Picchu), City of Calgary, and Kashgar, China that prove to be life-changing religious experiences of sorts – something Herzog can oddly relate to considering his largely international cinematic oeuvre – that only inflame his hatred for the contrived suburban life that his smothering mother has made for him. As real-life mommy-slayer Yavorsky’s USD English professor Dick Peacock stated of his perplexing pupil: “He always seemed to have a classic, dramatic sense of life. He was an excellent writer and poet. Not rhymes about sunsets, but in the real, classic tradition of poetry. He wrote a lot about his father who had died, whom he had never known.” In My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done?, Brad refuses to recognize the man who spawned him as his father (because he, “never knew the man”), but one can easily see that the displacement of his paternal progenitor had the most dire of consequences because like the forsaken son in the play “Oreſtes,” which he originally starred in before being booted out of for his belligerent behavior, he killed his mother in revenge for the death of his father. Yavorsky died in 2003, but his diſturbed spirit lives on in My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done?, even if, "About 70 percent of the script is false ... loosely made up" as Werner Herzog stated regarding the film. Nearly four decades before, Herzog released Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) aka Auch Zwerge haben klein angefangen – a stunningly surreal and startlingly subversive film that would have surely been described as a work of "degenerate art" by Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels about a group of deranged little people who escape from an asylum and wreck havoc upon the prison and its overseers – and with My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done?, the German filmmaker returned to form and brought a similar cinematic controlled chaos to the suburbs of LA in a most palatable way for quasi-mainstream audiences and for that alone, he must be commended. Thankfully, unlike two of his previous more recent films, Invincible (2001) and The Wild Blue Yonder (2005), My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done? did not cause me to think to myself regarding the now-elderly Bavarian director: "What Have Ye Done?"

Werner Nekes (1982)

In my humble opinion, experimental filmmakers, especially the sort involved with extreme manipulation of celluloid via scratching and painting directly onto it, spasitic speedy editing, and working almost exclusively on short, nonlinear films (cine-magickian Kenneth Anger excluded) like Stan Brakhage (Dog Star Man series, Sartre's Nausea) and to a lesser extent Marie Menken (Eye Music in Red Major, Go Go Go) are somewhat akin to modern guitar virtuosos like Joe Satriani and Steve Vai in that although they have mastered their respective artistic mediums in a technical and highly sophisticated sense, thereupon entering creative territories explored by so very few, it seems nearly impossible for them to create a lasting and aesthetically gratifying work that would appeal to or impress anyone aside from people in the same field. Admittedly, I have had some minor enjoyment engaging in works created by technically revolutionary experimental filmmakers like Dziga Vertov (Man with a Movie Camera, Three Songs About Lenin) and Godfrey Reggio (Koyaanisqatsi: Life Out of Balance, Powaqqatsi: Life in Transformation), but I typically rather watch the latest low-kitsch production from Aryan untermensch auteur Uwe Boll (Rampage, Auschwitz) or Ulli Lommel (Absolute Evil - Final Exit, D.C. Sniper) than endure 90-minutes of enervating and seemingly endless exercises in egotistical experimental excrement. That being said, I was quite reluctant about watching the innately impenetrable cinematic works of experimental German auteur Werner Nekes (Amalgam I-IV, Johnny Flash) – an avid collector of everything relating to pre/early film history who describes his approach to filmmaking as "light-theatre" – but I eventually gave in as the filmmaker would act as a mentor to fellow German filmmaker-turned-prestigious-polymath Christoph Schlingensief (Mutter's Maske, The German Chainsaw-Massacre), who worked as his assistant for a number of years, thereupon rationalizing to myself that the elder's filmmakers films can't be all that bad. After watching a number of Nekes' informative yet emotionally vacant, documentaries on pre-cinema technology like Film Before Film (1986) aka Was geschah wirklich zwischen den Bildern? and Media Magica I-V (1996), I figured it was about time that I watch one of his more experimental and ambitious works, eventually viewing Uliissee (1982); a sophisticatedly stylized but seeming schizophrenic nonlinear, quasi-Homeric odyssey through the 'history of film' that takes elements from James Joyce's Ulysses and Homer's The Odyssey and somewhat oddly, psychedelic poet/playwright Neil Oram's The Warp.

Part experimental film extravaganza, part ultra-vulgar neo-vaudevillian comedy, part slick skinflick, part kraut post-hippie hysterics, part particularly peculiar philo-semitic romp, and part fanatic fan-boy exposé of Neke's big boy pre-film toys, I would be lying if I did not admit that Uliissee (apparently a pun on

'it's Uli', Uli the photographer from the Ruhr, supposed grandson to protagonist Leopold Bloom of Joyce's Ulysses) was a work of cinematic genius, albeit of the 'mad scientist auteur' on LSD-addled masturbatory sort. All but totally incoherent in structure, one is best off looking at Uliissee as a collection of loosely and – in many cases – loonily related "petites vignettes" that ultimately make an "oddball odyssey" (or more like a torrid trip) dealing with quasi-counter-culture ideas relating to philosophy, religion, and social matters, albeit of the patently 'progressive' aka retrogressive sort that was oftentimes satirized by Paul Morrissey (Trash, Madame Wang's). That being said, it should be noted that Werner Nekes had the gall to describe his protégé Christoph Schlingensiefel's early feature-length work Menu Total (1986) aka Meat, Your Parents – a surreal scatological work featuring less than glamorous Nazis engaged in rape and murder, among other deplorable yet droll behavior – as "fascistic" despite every innate indication that expresses the counter to that positively preposterous perspective. In Uliissee, Nekes takes scornful and satirical blows at authority figures (a group of cops invade the genitals of a hostile hippie chick), Turkish Muslims (a religious Turk in full towel-head regalia is portrayed as an anti-Semitic baboon who states, "newspapers are run by Jews...very bad people"), and Hindi gurus (a guru with what seems to be fuming feces on his face is described as a "psychic fascist"), among various others, with most of these sardonic scenarios being corresponding postmodern interpretations of Homeric adventures. Thankfully, Werner Nekes saves the best for last with various spasmodic collages and montages of lavish lipstick lesbian Tabea Blumenschein (as Penelope/Molly) – Sapphic surrealist auteur Ulrike Ottinger's onetime lover/collaborator (Madame X: An Absolute Ruler, Ticket of No Return) and punk prostitute character featured in the kraut cocksucker classic Taxi zum Klo (1981) directed by Frank Ripploh – featured in various garmentless and somewhat compromising scenarios. The concluding scenes with voluptuous bimbo (or at least that's how she seems to be portrayed) Blumenschein are indubitably the most brilliant and bewitching scenes in Uliissee, as Nekes managed to incorporate images of the lovely lezzy with some of the most aesthetically enchanting yet eccentric experimental editing sequences in a lecherous 'Lighterature' (a word for the filmmaker's signature style of filmmaking) climax.

Although Christoph Schlingensiefel would later credit Nekes for helping to catch the "experimental bug," the Terror 2000 director would later parody his former mentor's eccentric experimental cine-mania in Tunguska - The Crates are delivered (1984); the final film in the late, great filmmaker's "Trilogy of Film Criticism - Film as Neurosis" (Phantabus Go Home and What happened to Magdalena Jung? being the first two films) about three decidedly deranged 'avant-garde researchers' (all of whom apparently being cryptic and not-so-cryptic stand-ins for Nekes) on the road to the North Pole to expose Eskimos to their films. Schlingensiefel once remarked regarding the inspiration behind Tunguska, "I thought, why should I become Nekes? What's with all this crap?...I wanted to separate myself (from him) and then I made the film... Tunguska - The Crates are delivered." If one would have to choose any certain Nekes film that encompasses the sort of cinematically-deranged mindset exhibited in the characters of Tunguska, Uliissee would undoubtedly be the most obvious work. As expressed in his farcical filmography, Schlingensiefel would eventually cite the Germans films of Herbert Achternbusch (Das Gespenst, Wohin?), Werner Herzog (Heart of Glass, Stroszek), and Rainer Werner Fassbinder (Fox and His Friends, Satan's Brew), as well as the independent American films of Kenneth Anger (Fireworks, Scorpio Rising) and John Waters (Pink Flamingos, Desperate Living), as being a greater influence on him than his experience with Nekes. Indeed, the experimental cinematic works of Werner Nekes, most notably Uliissee, are certainly worth seeing, especially for committed cinephiles, as the aggressively avant-garde filmmaker is certainly a master of manipulation when it comes to the celluloid medium, yet his work only offers an inkling of the endless entertainment and replay value, wonderfully wretched wit, curious 'carnal' charm, and reflexively and conscious "German" persuasion, of his former protégé Schlingensiefel; a one-man revolutionary filmmaker who not only eclipsed his former master, but also the entire medium of film itself. As for Werner Nekes, since Uliissee, he has almost exclusively stayed in the rather redundant realm of creating TV-documentaries about his proto-cinema toys.

Werner Schroeter° (1969)

If there ever was a small and palatable sample of the aesthetic Weltanschauung of high-camp excess, preternatural divas, and discordant audio/visual kitsch that was the cinematic realm of German New Cinema dandy auteur Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Malina) that is perfect for the uninitiated, it is most certainly the filmmaker's 30+ minute Warhol-inspired featurette Argila (1968), a keenly kaleidoscopic double-projection work that makes sense of what is essentially a short but sweet Teutonic take on the largely asinine aesthetic gimmickry Chelsea Girls (1966), albeit with an oppressive operatic lovelorn tone. A darkly romantic work that reminds one why Schroeter was the most aesthetically decadent drama queen of not just German New Cinema, but European arthouse cinema in general, Argila, like virtually all of the director's cinematic works, is indubitably a raw and rapturous byproduct of the filmmaker's failed love affairs, albeit with his muses standing in for himself. Starring Schroeter's main muse Magdalena Montezuma (Willow Springs, Freak Orlando), as well as Carla Egerer (Gods of the Plague, Der Bomberpilot), who was married at one point to rampantly homosexual auteur Rosa von Praunheim (one-time a lover of Schroeter who once infamously publicly mocked his ex-lover in a scathing article), and then-middle-aged veteran theater actress Gisela Trowe, Argila is a virtual poetic obituary of the filmmaker's romantic relationship(s) clearly created by someone who has yet to get over the past as if haunted by a ghost. Made before Schroeter ever got involved with feature film directing (the director abandoned/never completed his first feature film Nicaragua (1969), which is now considered lost), Argila is decadent and dissident cinematic diletantism at its most refined, assembled by a filmmaker who had yet to create his avant-garde arthouse feature-length masterpieces like Eika Katappa (1969), Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran, and The Rose King (1986) aka Der Rosenkönig, but had already codified the innately idiosyncratic auteur signature style that he would be remembered for. Utilizing the black-and-white/color double-projection technique that Paul Morrissey employed for Chelsea Girls in a manner that actually makes aesthetic sense, Argila tells the emotionally distraught, psycho-romantic story of a tormented twosome of two very different ladies whose hearts still yearn for their Aryan twink ex-lover Hans, a stoic chap with a statuesque physique who seems to not give two damns for the various ladies he has dropped by the wayside like yesterday's trash.

After opening with Carla Egerer singing out-of-sync to some awful American pop music, Argila segues to a bizarre love triangle broiling between young Amazonian Aryaness Magdalena Montezuma, mature redhead Gisela Trowe, and a seemingly apathetic hunk named Hans (Sigurd Salto). As Ms. Montezuma states dozens upon dozens upon dozens of times during the film regarding Hans,

ARGILA

“You want me to die. You take no pity on me. You have no pity for me, I, who so worshiped you,” or so the not so little lady states while in an unwavering state of hysteria. Being a little older, Ms. Trowe is slightly less hysterical but no less melodramatic in her feelings regarding Hans, writing “Dear Hans, I love you, but differently now, and much more intimately. Now I understand you, and everything. Until recently I failed to realize that you embody death, for me at least. It is my destiny...I don’t know if I should be happy or sad, but I know what needs to happen.” Although Montezuma and Trowe are enemies of sorts in their undying obsession with the same Nordic dandy, they are in the same lovelorn boat, which is about to sink in a rough sea of abject misery and melancholy. In fact, as Trowe states, “Before the evening is through, a misfortune will hurl all three of us into the sea.” As Trowe tells Montezuma regarding her passionate yet deleterious romance with Hans and her eventual depression realization, “Then all I could see were stones. Red-hot, hard cobble stones. An endless path that blinded me. Then I knew I did not know him. That was the truth. He stands before me as he will again, and I will know over and over again that I do not know him. I will never know him. And the worst part is, and will always be that for a while I thought I knew him, and that we were one. The shock of this realization made me reel for a moment. It was as if I was caught in a suffocating grasp.” As for Hans, the viewer never knows what is going on his mind as if he is a mere handsome mannequin with a nasty knack for putting spells over women who did not nearly mean as much to him as he did to them. In the end, Hans lays, assumedly allegorically, dead on train tracks while both Ms. Montezuma and Ms. Trowe mourn for him, but finally seem to accept their loss.

Much like his friend Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s Beware of a Holy Whore (1971), which the director and his muse Magdalena Montezuma had small acting roles in, Werner Schroeter’s Argila certainly features a strong aesthetic influence from Andy Warhol/Paul Morrissey, but naturally, the Teutonic dandy would take his celluloid Kulturscheisse to much more elegant and excessive extremes. Of course, while Chelsea Girls merely features a collection of human trash babbling about nothing while attempting to look glamorous, Argila is clearly a deeply personal work directed by a man who used cinema as an artistic medium to mourn his past failed romances, hence why he once created a documentary called Love’s Debris (1996) aka Poussières d’amour - Abfallprodukte der Liebe. Of course, seeing as it is one of Schroeter’s early works, Argila is certainly not as macabre nor hermetic in its ‘mourning’ of love than in the director’s later works like Day of the Idiots (1981) aka Tag der Idioten, where a woman makes false claims accusing her neighbors of being terrorists so she can be locked up in a mental institution because she cannot handle the lack of love and affection her boyfriend gives her, or Malina (1991), where a foredoomed woman burns herself up in her apartment. A man whose childhood lover committed suicide when he was only a teenage as he revealed in the documentary Mondo Lux - Die Bilderwelten des Werner Schroeter (2011) aka Mondo Lux : The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter, which he also cinematically depicted in his autobiographical lesbian flick Deux (2002) aka Two, Schroeter was certainly a strange and sad man who found a sense of security in sorrow and in his alter-egos in the form of anachronistic divas. A sort of aesthetically sacrilegious cinematic waltz through the director's womanish Weltschmerz, Argila is probably the best bet for Werner Schroeter novices to get through one of the filmmaker's films rather unscathed without thoughts of slitting one's wrists and/or wishing death on Teutonic divas everywhere.

DER BOMBERPILOT

Werner Schroeter° (1970)

If anything remotely resembling a Nazisploitation flick was ever sired by a filmmaker of German New Cinema, it is most certainly dandy auteur Werner Schroeter's salacious yet satirical exercise in swastika excess, Der Bomberpilot (1970) aka The Bomber Pilot—a wanton work about three exceedingly eccentric revue divas that make up a National Socialist cabaret that has about as much respect for historical reality as Ilsa, She Wolf of the SS (1974) and The Gestapo's Last Orgy (1977). Of course, unlike the average, rather worthless and aesthetically nauseating Nazisploitation flick, Der Bomberpilot is a bawdy piece of high-camp celluloid that, not unlike naughty Nazi-themed arthouse flicks like The Damned (1969) directed by Luchino Visconti and Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974), albeit to a more heightened degree, wallows in aesthetic indulgence and kinky yet cultivated kitsch, and contains a certain perverse passion for misery and tragedy that would put National Socialist auteur Veit Harlan to shame. A decadent and disconcerting work that features a titillating trio of sensual yet scatterbrained Nazi cabaret performers who face personal struggle and crisis after the annihilation of the Third Reich and decide to see how they will fair in the racially mongrelized USA, Der Bomberpilot is a rare Nazi-themed film that quite literally makes nil mention of concentration camps, Jews, or Nazi war crimes, but instead acts as a sort of apolitical and operatic, tableau-ridden equivalent to works like The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) or Germany, Pale Mother (1980) in its depiction of the Nazi wartime and Adenauer eras. An audaciously anarchistic and anachronistic cinematic work featuring a variety of eclectic songs from Verdi, Strauss, the musical West Side Story, Bruckner, Sibelius, Elvis, Richard Wagner, and various German and American pop songs of the 1960s, Der Bomberpilot is a wonderfully vexing variegation of discordant and oftentimes disposed of aesthetic ingredients from the post-holocaust ash heap of history that makes no excuses for completely ignoring the less flattering yet most infamous facts of German mid-twentieth century history all together. For example, one of the female protagonists of Der Bomberpilot sings a version of the racially charged Johann Strauss II waltz "Wiener Blut" ('Viennese Blood' or 'Viennese Spirit'), yet Schroeter's intentionally tainted version of the song is all the more 'nazified' and concludes with the rather telling line: "What's done is done...The past is past...One doesn't discuss it..." A ridiculously wayward piece of campy celluloid revisionist history of the thankfully quite reprehensible sort, Der Bomberpilot is Werner Schroeter at his best and most blatant as a work, not unlike most of his oeuvre, that stresses aesthetic refinement of both high and low-brow kultur over 'official' historical reality, as well as kitschy tableau over a linear storyline. Forget a bunch of pedantic professors and jailed and elderly historical revisionists like Ernst Zündel, Der Bomberpilot—with its rather ridiculous and raunchy Nazi revue girls that are in stark comparison to what everyone thinks they know about the Third Reich—is the real road for Germans and other Europeans to take back their history as an exaggerated anti-tribute to National Socialist kitsch and the culture-less American conquerors who destroyed it and replaced it with piss poor pseudo-Kulturscheisse.

As three beautiful yet erotically bodacious ladies who salute the swastika flag in a totally disorderly and narcissistic, half-nude fashion in devilish black and red corsets and black fishnet stockings, it is amazing the lewd and lecherous ladies of Der Bomberpilot have yet to be detained indefinitely in a concentration camp for their less than Aryanness-like ways. When wild child Mascha (played Mascha Rabben of Roland Klick's Deadlock (1970), Robert van Ackeren's Harlis (1972), and Fassbinder's World on a Wire (1973))—a feisty redhead who likes to get buck naked in the woods as a sort of nymphomaniac Nazi fairy who is far too untamed to belong to any official Wandervogel group, let alone be a member of the League of German Maidens—has a heated nervous breakdown that seems more like a childish temper tantrum of the superlatively selfish sort, the three hot and hedonistic divas have to quit their dream jobs as campy cabaret girls and go somewhat 'underground' in Nazi Germany. The other two luxurious ladies of the three person risqué Reich are Magdalena (Schroeter's muse Magdalena Montezuma)—the aunt of Mascha and the most 'professional' and mature one in the group—and Carla (early Schroeter regular Carla Egerer of Eika Katappa (1969) and Fassbinder's Pioneers in Ingolstadt (1971)), who is a tiny blonde beastess who is constantly plagued by personal tragedy and heartbreak due to her weakness for Viennese choirboys. While Mascha and Magdalena receive jobs as 'church restorers' who paint religious temples with Fidus-esque völkisch kitsch art, Carla splits off from the group and goes to Sopot to star in a Viennese tragedy and work at a pastry shop, where she faces personal tragedy after a gentleman caller (played by Schroeter himself) commits suicide after she blows him off. After Magdalena hears on the radio that "Our Fuehrer, Adolf Hitler, has fallen in war," she attempts suicide via drowning herself in a lake, but by happenstance, her nubile, nature-loving niece Mascha spots her in the act and saves her life as a hilarious song plays in the background, with the lyrics, "...that an angel can be black? Many small negroes look pleadingly at you. Whether we are rich or poor we will all die. That shows that we're all the same when we stand at heaven's door." Indubitably, the strangely seductive song lyrics seem to be a premonition of sorts, as the erotic enfant terrible trio eventually decide to go to the multicultural United States of America and try their lot at racial integration mixed with Teutonism after smoking a filtered marijuana cigarette.

After the Second World War, the three gals take jobs as stenographers and attend a Bruckner concert where they debate a possible move to America, but Carla, "can only think back to the successes of 1943, to the Viennese operetta, with the choir boys." Carla's statement is especially telling as it shows her total ignorance to history because during the beginning of February 1943, the German army was defeated during the Battle of Stalingrad and the 6th Army had completely capitulated, thus marking the beginning of the end for the Third Reich. Young Mascha is convinced that women's liberation, writing manifestos, and America are the way of the future, stating to her friends, "We three, who went through so much in Adolf Hitler's Reich, we could certainly formulate a manifesto and as a lecture series at a college or an American university, for the concept of Germanism...combined with racial integration...and recreate it for ourselves." Of course, the three have clearly never seen Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977) and as Carla states, "in sheer desperation, after breakfast we smoked a filtered marijuana cigarette and saw the possibilities of racial integration in a new light" and thus decided to immigrate to the Negrophiliac USA as visiting teachers to "stake their claim." Although initially suspected of being communists as many foreigners in the U.S. were at that time, the group's "credibility was undermined" after a German-American cook gave Nazi era pictures of the wild women during their "best days" to the American media, but it is ultimately "Mascha's affair with a bomber pilot" that puts an end to their residence permit. Due to their rejection in the 'land of the free' and philistines, the girls decide to embrace their past and get back into the cabaret act at an American officers' club in Landshut, albeit for the exploitative pleasure of American occupying forces, where Carla performs opera solos with filmmaker Daniel Schmid (Tonight or Never, La Paloma)—the one-time lover and lifelong friend of Werner Schroeter who also acted as the assistant director for Der Bomberpilot—on piano and another one as a transsexual sailor in the style of Genet's Querelle, Magalena does a topless and seemingly possessed 'snake dance,' and the three do kitschy avant-garde cabaret acts with mannequins. Unfortunately, all good things come to end and after Mascha's Amerikkkan bomber pilot boyfriend does the unthinkable by boning Carla, thereupon getting her pregnant which ends in a miscarriage that plagues her with a bad hip, the cabaret trio is tragicomedically crushed, thus signaling the total end for naughty Nazi revue girls everywhere in a world now dominated by American hegemony and the cult of multiculturalism.

Assuredly one of Werner Schroeter's most accessible, if not typically aesthetically and thematically discordant, works, Der Bomberpilot also happens to be one of his most distinctly 'German,' if rather reluctantly so, as well as (a)political works, as a carnal and campy kitsch piece that contradicts the Allies' version of history (as well as the Nazi version) through the exaggeratedly wacky and wanton antics of three politically ignorant girls whose sole passion is being highly desirable divas in spite of what regime happens to reign where they live. After one of the girls confesses after their failed attempt of freedom in the land of the free, "Our past also proved unfortunate during the legal proceedings, in which we were accused of almost everything. An auto-da-fé," thus demonstrating the unmentioned social repression Germans faced due to the fact that they have Aryan blood (or in Carla's case, "Viennese Blood"). Indeed, the girls, especially Carla, cannot get over their nostalgia for the Nazi era, but not because of the slaughtering of Jews or their experiences as former Bund Deutscher Mädel (BDM) girls, but because they found personal happiness via past romantic flings. A trio of tragic philistines, the three women, being self-centered exhibitionists at stark contrast with the martial order of the Third Reich, are nothing more than mere victims of circumstances who, despite their decided decadence and hyper hedonism, ironically face more persecution from the 'peace-spreading' Americans than the authoritarian Aryans, thus acting in antagonistic contradiction, albeit in a cleverly campy form, to the 'official' history of the Second World War, thus making Schroeter's Der Bomberpilot, aside from the Wagernian celluloid epics of Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King, Hitler: A Film from Germany), one of the most politically subversive works of German New Cinema as a film that makes nil groveling apologies for the infamous legacy of the Third Reich, but, instead, seeks to discredit history altogether via preposterous personalization of through three women who care more about their hair than how many Jews Uncle Adolf had liquidated in Auschwitz.

Originally made for television, Der Bomberpilot was apparently a huge hit among kraut leftists, but director Werner Schroeter, who was not a huge fan of the film himself, was rather apathetic by the positive response to his subversive Nazi revue girl flick, even if it stands, at least in my opinion, as one of the most underrated and relatively unconventional films in the filmmaker's cinematic oeuvre as an incendiary indictment of America's fond memory of turning the Fatherland into its cuckold bitch boy. Indeed, it's no coincidence that an American bomber pilot sexually defiles two of the girls in Der Bomberpilot, even symbolically severely injuring one of the girl's wombs after suffering a miscarriage caused by the alien seed of what would have been a racial bastard of a baby, as America has yet to recognize its never discussed war crimes of firebombing the cities of Dresden and Hamburg—an act with no military objective that was done solely to kill large percentages of the German civilian population—which like the holocaust, Schroeter makes no mention of in the film. Indeed, it is no coincidence that towards the end of his career that Schroeter would direct the documentary Die Königin - Marianne Hoppe (2000) aka The Queen—a documentary about the bisexual German actress Marianne Hoppe who was quite popular during the Third Reich due to her perceived Nordic beauty—as the subject of the film, not unlike the protagonists of Der Bomberpilot, was a victim of circumstance and her own genetic pulchritude who, despite her personal disdain for the Third Reich and lecherous libertine lifestyle and affinity for degenerate art, would always be remembered as a 'Nazi actress,' just as Schroeter would suffer the undesirable fate of being regarded as a post-Nazi 'German director.' In fact, Schroeter even once went so far as stating, "I have no intention whatsoever of playing a leading part [in the New German Cinema], and submit to the expectations of producing Kulturscheisse [literally, Cultureshit], even if it may be true that I carry around with me and into my films the past of this Kulturscheisse,” and no other film in his oeuvre better expresses this ambivalent attitude than Der Bomberpilot—the director’s first and final statement on the National Socialist question and how such historical infamy has weighed down heavily on every German, not just filmmaker’s, lives. As the girls of Der Bomberpilot learned, no matter how ‘American’ they tried to be (something Schroeter’s cinematic compatriot Wim Wenders spent his entire life trying to achieve but ultimately failed doing), the average American still sees a Nazi in every kraut. After all, who can differentiate between a German and a Nazi after watching a Mel Brooks film like The Producers (1968) or a Steven Spielberg flick like Raiders of the Lost Ark (1981) or Saving Private Ryan (1998)?!

EIKA KATAPPA

Werner Schroeter° (1971)

An aesthetically audacious and asynchronous cinematic symphony of the positively plush and perversely prestigious sort, Eika Katappa (1969) directed by dandy auteur Werner Schroeter (Der Bomberpilot, Malina) is indubitably one of the landmark works of New German Cinema. An innately and intentionally anachronistic and allegorical work combining high camp and cleverly concocted kitsch with seemingly discordant opera and pop rock music, as well as thematically schizophrenic audio-visual synchronization, including a superlatively monomaniacal and somewhat mystical tribute to world renowned opera singer Maria Callas and delightfully degenerate takes on Norse mythology, Eika Katappa would ultimately win the decidedly dapper director the Joseph von Sternberg prize for “the most idiosyncratic film” at the 1969 Mannheim Film Festival, which is no small achievement considering it was Schroeter’s first feature-length film. At 144 minutes in length, Eika Katappa is also a work of eccentrically epic proportions. A terribly torrid, tragic, trying, and sometimes even titillating collection of theatrical tableaux without any stages but the ruins of Europa as a border-less coliseum of effete excess and campy cultural decay, Eika Katappa, like most great cinematic art pieces, is indubitably a strikingly and singularly self-indulgent work by a true auteur filmmaker who clearly cares more about his own ostentatious obsessions than whether or not the viewer can catch up with him. Virtually impossible to see outside of Germany until relatively recently when it was thankfully restored and released by Filmmuseum München (who owned the only copies of the film on 16mm, which were screened only sporadically over the past couple decades in various obscure cinémathèques) in late 2010 with the imperative help of director Werner Schroeter (who passed away shortly before the actual release of the dvd), Eika Katappa is a rare work that managed to redefine and reinvent the artistic medium of cinema in a way not seen since the days of F.W. Murnau and Carl Th. Dreyer. Described by German New Wave master of melodrama Rainer Werner Fassbinder as a film he would have liked to have made in an interview with the German edition of Playboy magazine (April 1978, 53-68), as well as one of “the most beautiful” films of its post-WWII Teutonic zeitgeist, Eika Katappa would also inspire Schroeter’s film director friend to borrow his aesthetic and his muse Magdalena Montezuma for The Niklashausen Journey (1970), albeit with a patently political twist (Schroeter, like his friend/ex-lover Daniel Schmid and unlike most filmmakers of his era, rejected politics and escaped in aestheticism). Of course, as Fassbinder soon learned, it is most impossible to imitate Schroeter’s somber and supremely sagacious cinematic soul. A poesy pictorial of Schroeter’s inner pandemonium of lingering lost loves, nagging ghosts, and nauseating and sometimes nefarious nostalgia, Eika Katappa – a cinematic work not without its fair share of humorous haunts and hypnotic hells – is the closest thing to a celluloid dirge saga because it not only reminiscences over the byproducts of the director's failed romantic affairs, but also classical European kultur of yesteryear, if only in an aggressively aestheticist fashion of taking a couple ingredients and sacrificing the rest for the best.

If any cinematic artist found his own metaphysical spiritual icon in Saint Sebastian, especially Guido Reni's quasi-homoerotic high-baroque painting of the camp/Christian martyr, more than gentleman Jarman and far-right Japanese nationalist novelist Yukio Mishima, it was mostly certainly Werner Schroeter as ritualistically depicted in a number of sacrificial scenes from Eika Katappa; a sensual celluloid work more in touch with the secret of the soul than the abstract mind. Of course, Schroeter's scantily clad St. Sebastian is an emaciated blond twink who looks more like he died from anorexia than from some royal Roman arrows, but such is the highly personally stylized cinematic world of Werner Schroeter; an auteur filmmaker who authored his own cinematic language of sorts, hence the intrinsically impenetrable essence of his films. As with virtually all of his early films, Schroeter's unmistakable muse Magdalena Montezuma (Day of the Idiots, Freak Orlando) is indisputably the star diva of Eika Katappa as a modern silent screen starlet and a curiously charismatic chameleon of celluloid who, like most of the actors in the film, ceaselessly changes from character-to-character and even different sexes throughout the work, including depicting an extra deranged drag king version of Quasimodo from The Hunchback of Notre-Dame and a Gothic heroin chic take on buxom blonde Brünnhilde from the ancient Germanic Nibelungenlied. In Eika Katappa love, death, sacrifice and tragedy are perennial yet positively preposterously portrayed in a series of absurdly theatrical scenarios, thus many characters act as both morbid merry-makers and martyrs in a tidal wave of operatic tragicomedic allegory set to the intentionally asynchronous sounds of Giuseppe Verdi's La Traviata (1853) and Giacomo Puccini's Tosca (1900). Although never depicted in any sort of literal light, the archetypal homosexual, especially in the context of Schroeter himself, is ultimately portrayed a symbol of eternal martyrdom in Eika Katappa as a Christ-like figure doomed to lifelong unhappiness, heartbreak, and innate social heresy. As Schroeter wrote in a synopsis for the seventh act of Eika Katappa, with the "history of two lovely young men, loving each other desperately," the director brings abstract allegorical meaning to King dandy Oscar Wilde's treacherous boy toy's Lord Alfred Douglas' famous phrase, "the love that dare not speak its name," a theme that was taken to a much darker and serious extreme in Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King where both Saint Sebastian and Jesus Christ act as homoerotic symbols of ostensibly macabre torture and martyrdom. Of course, Greek soprano Maria Callas' spirit weighs heavily on the overall aesthetically erratic essence of Eika Katappa, so much so that Schroeter inserted a still portrait of the diva at various points throughout the film that is most promi-nently displayed at the very conclusion of the overwhelming cinematic work in a gesture that is no doubt a noble tribute from one artist to another as a film that could have never been conceived without the singer's imperative influence on the filmmaker at a young and fragile age. Interestingly, Werner Schroeter himself also appears at the conclusion of Eika Katappa directing his handsome yet melancholy Mediterranean star, thus unveiling the artist behind the highly personal and insanely idiosyncratic piece of celluloid art.

It is worth noting that Schroeter's filmmaker friend Rainer Werner Fassbinder directed a film entitled Gods of the Plague (1970) aka Götter der Pest where a character speaks the line "Life is very precious, even right now," which is spoken repeatedly throughout Eika Katappa; a celluloid collection of shattered fragments from the auteur filmmaker's cinematically self-sanctified soul. Indeed, as Fassbinder once wrote, "Werner Schroeter will one day have a place in the history of film that I would describe in literature as somewhere between Novalis, Lautréamont, and Louis-Ferdinand Céline," as a filmmaker whose vision and need to expression the seemingly inexplicable was always more important to him whether or not his films were even remotely accessible or financially profitable among general audiences, which, as time has proven, they are most certainly not. Similar to his previous but much shorter film Argila (1969) in aesthetic and sentiment, Eika Katappa is a figurative celluloid wound dripping with allegorical memories from beginning to end in the form of penetrating petite vignettes that inordinately obfuscate the personal with anachronistic aesthetic ingredients from both past and present in an intentionally anti-synchronal yet unfamiliarly harmonious manner. A hypnotic yet equally harrowing and humorous hermetic celluloid hybrid of high and low Occidental kultur, Eika Katappa – aside from being a collection of director Werner Schroeter's personal romantic recollections and aesthetic obsessions – is, whether intentional or not on the filmmaker's part, acts as cinematic obsequies for the Occident itself. A chaotic celluloid storm of what was once and will never be again, Eika Katappa is just as reflexive of Europe as a whole as Schroeter's own intimate love affairs. Released at the height of politically motivated peace and love campaigns in the then-wanton West, Eika Katappa stands the test of time because Werner Schroeter – an apolitical indulger in aestheticism – assembled a timeless cinematic work that is just as universal thematically as it is aesthetically, even as an unwaveringly acroamatic arthouse film.

THE DEATH OF MARIA MALIBRAN

Werner Schroeter° (1972)

In the documentary Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense (2010) directed by Pascal Hofmann and Benny Jaberg, Werner Schroeter – the royal queen of New German cinema excess and high-camp hypnotics – has the audacity to describe his friend and one-time lover Daniel Schmid (Shadow of Angels, Hécate), very possibly the greatest post-WWII Swiss filmmaker, in what is probably the one of the most blatant examples of Freudian projection as a “diva addict.” Indeed, diva fetishism is one of the many intoxicating idiosyncratic ingredients one can expect from a Werner “Mad Genius” Schroeter (as Fassbinder once called him) film with his intentionally kitschy yet equally cultivated cinematic effort Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran – an anti-biopic that has little to do with the factual reality of the terribly tragic Spanish-French 19th-century mezzo-soprano opera singer who would go on to be a legendary historical icon after she died onstage at the age of 28 and whose whimsical life the film decadently and discordantly depicts – being one of the dapper film director’s most flagrant and flavorful examples of operatic goddess worship. Starring Schroeter’s towering yet trim Teutonic muse Magdalena Montezuma (Eika Katappa, Der Bomberpilot) in the lead role of Maria Malibran, as well as in transvestite drag as her character’s sadistic father Manuel García, The Death of Maria Malibran features the androgynous avant-garde actress at her finest and most eclectic, displaying the sort of peculiar propensity for playing diverse characters of each gender in the same film, a talent that would arguably reach its zenith in Ulrike Ottinger’s masterpiece of marvelous miscreation Freak Orlando (1981). On top of featuring Ms. Montezuma in a standout role, The Death of Maria Malibran also features Fassbinder’s ex-wife Ingrid Caven (Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King, In a Year with 13 Moons), Warhol Superstar Candy Darling (Flesh, Women in Revolt), Jamie Lee Curtis’ ex-stepmother Christine Kaufmann (Escape from East Berlin, Egon Schiele – Exzess und Bestrafung), and a variety of ludicrous pseudo-lesbian trannies, including an absurdly avoirdupois drag queen of extravagant grotesquery that puts John Waters’ man-muse Divine to shame in terms of terrifying character and aberrant appearance. Comprised of a number of rather random tableaux that were constructed from mostly fictionally contrived points of miserable Malibran’s short but relatively eventful life, The Death of Maria Malibran is mostly a collection of neutral-shot-style moving picture-perfect portraits and operatic solos and duos that reflect why Werner Schroeter was the closest thing to an ‘Arno Breker of camp.’

For Maria Malibran fans, especially those inclined towards faithful depictions of reality, viewing The Death of Maria Malibran will probably prove to be a problematic and even perturbing task, but for people like myself, who have nil interest in the ill-starred opera singer, let alone the authenticity of anecdotal details from her life, the film makes for an extravagant experiment in campy celluloid excess and exceedingly effete eccentricity of the ethereal sort. As a man who made no lie of the fact that his personal yet puzzling cinematic poems were the artistic “byproducts” (Rosa von Praunheim, as an ex-lover and lifelong friend of the director, being one of these ‘byproducts’ of buggery) of past romantic relationships, I think it is safe to say that the Maria Malibran of The Death of Maria Malibran is more of an abstruse alter-ego of the filmmaker than an abiding tribute to the singer. After all, Schroeter’s perplexing penultimate film Deux (2002) aka Two is an ambiguously autobiographical piece in which the director’s life is portrayed by two different women, so it should be no surprise that The Death of Maria Malibran features a similar damning disdain for objective reality. Indeed, Magdalena Montezuma may have adopted a Mediterranean name (her real name was the notably less campy and magnificent ‘Erika Kluge’) that she utilized throughout her acting career, but I would never in a million years mistaken her for an off-white med-frog like the character she depicts in The Death of Maria Malibran due to her Bosch Nordic beauty and her rather aloof, if not exceedingly eccentric Germanic demeanor. In other words, the Maria Malibran of this exorbitant Epicurean epic of excess is indubitably more of a super surreal, superfluously stylish and self-stylized alter-ego of Schroeter living precariously through the beauty of his celluloid Madonna Magdalena Montezuma and for anyone to approach The Death of Maria Malibran from any other angle would be, at best, a misguided mistake, if not an all too common and reasonable one. Considering that Schroeter was always surrounded by death from an early age, especially those of his loved ones, including the suicide of his beloved grandmother, the Polish baroness Elsa von Rotjov, when he was only 13-years-old and the self-slaughter of his first boyhood crush around the same age and which incidentally was also around the same time he discovered his lifelong obsession Maria Callas aka La Divina – the world renowned 20th-century Greek-American soprano – it is only natural that the dismal dandy director would go on to craft a work so innocently and imaginatively tragic as The Death of Maria Malibran; a work that denies the pain of historical truth, if not purportedly based on the truth, for a sort of fantastic escapism and saturnine ecstasy.

As his seemingly unlikely colleague Wim Wenders – who went to film school with Werner Schroeter – explains in the documentary Mondo Lux : The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter (2011) directed by Elfi Mikesch, “Death is the important topic in Werner’s films. “Eika Katappa”... There’s no other film where so many people die... He destroyed them, those storylines, by having people die and go on or die three times or die eternally. It’s obvious that the gesture is important for Werner. And it’s never about narration as such.” Indeed, in the same documentary, Schroeter himself admits, “I drove Rosa, Holger Mischwitzky, crazy with my tragic view of the world. I told Holger, ‘You have to accept it. My picture of the world is tragic.’ And, of course, I laughed about it.” Of course,

THE DEATH OF MARIA MALIBRAN

Schroeter's remark about his relationship with Mr. Rosa von Praunheim is characteristic of his early cinematic oeuvre, especially in regard to The Death of Maria Malibran; an audacious expression of absurdist tongue-in-tranny-cheek tragedy meets merry yet maliciously macabre camp and killer kitsch. For Schroeter, "The search is essentially for art and not the final product. There is no final product. There's a photograph, a picture, a composition. But there is never an aspect that resolves everything. That would be even worse. It would make death obsolete. And since we're all going that way, we'll only find our redemption in death but not in art." Indeed, to call his cinematic works 'self-indulgent' would be a fair assessment, but only so much that Schroeter put his entire being into the search for meaning and the ultimate act of aesthetic sublimity, or at least his idea of a seductive audio/visual solace every second of his films without thinking twice about alienating prospective filmgoers (i.e. the majority of filmgoers), with his oftentimes impenetrable personal idiosyncrasies. That being said, to watch a film like The Death of Maria Malibran or just about any other Werner Schroeter without understanding the filmmaker or the context of the film would be akin to attempting to fly a plane while on mescaline without a single flying lesson or attempting to read William S. Burrough's novel Naked Lunch (1959) because you feel that you shot up enough lethally laced junk into your johnson to feel like a kultur junky. An irrational and ravaging celluloid rendezvous of statuesque female beauties, aesthetically crude drag fags in menacing masks of unflattering make-up, Svengali drag kings, and inconspicuous shemales like Candy Darling who fit in somewhere in between, The Death of Maria Malibran is a ridiculously rhapsodic and rapturous work of keenly kaleidoscopic death worship that personifies the poetic words from the title of the popular Death in June song "Death Is The Martyr Of Beauty." Indeed, Werner Schroeter, Magdalena Montezuma, and Candy Darling may all be tot, but their anomalous aesthetic essence lives on in the guise of The Death of Maria Malibran; a moribund musical that makes for one of the most puissant and pulchritudinous cinematic excursions of what probably can be best described as 'metaphysical necrophilia.'

WILLOW SPRINGS

If German New Cinema dandy Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Palermo oder Wolfsburg) ever came close to making a horror film, albeit with thriller and even western genre conventions, it is most certainly Willow Springs (1973), a work that also has the distinction of being the only film the director shot entirely in the United States. Originally intending to come to the U.S. to do a documentary on a structural analysis of Andy Warhol's Marilyn Monroe prints with a ten-page script treatment he had written, Schroeter wisely decided to ditch the doc and create the "cheapest possible story," or as the auteur stated himself in a 2008 interview: "It was going to be called THE DREAM OF MARILYN MONROE. But instead of pictures of Warhol's work, I came back with this thriller, this western. They were floored. Nobody else has ever done that. And then they called the head of programming, Viehover, because the producers were totally frantic. He watched it and then he said, 'Thank you, Mr. Schroeter, for this extraordinary film.' I said, 'I can imagine.' A film like that for 80,000 marks? I mean, come on!" With a mere 80,000 marks given to him by the West German television channel ZDF that was intended for the doc, Schroeter not only managed to fund the film, but the traveling and living expenses for himself and his diva stars Magdalena Montezuma, Christine Kaufmann and Ila von Hasperg while living in Los Angeles during the two week period that it took him to direct Willow Springs. Aside from making the film, Schroeter also came to Hollywood so that his friend Christine Kaufmann could get back her children that her drug-addled ex-husband, Jewish-American star Tony Curtis (father of Jamie Lee Curtis), had apparently kidnapped from her.

Indeed, while it would be interesting to see what Schroeter thought of weirdo Warhol's dilettante prints, I am glad he opted for directing what is easily one of his darkest and most bizarrely penetrating films and a work Fassbinder apparently described as "an absolute work of art." A meditation on American feminism a decade after Marilyn Monroe's death, as well as a response to the infamous Manson Family murders, Willow Springs takes its name from the small ghost town in the Mojave desert where the film was shot. The unconventionally tragic celluloid tale of an ambiguously Sapphic death cult leader played by Schroeter's marvelously macabre and perennially melancholy muse Magdalena Montezuma who has two meek followers who help her lure men to their dilapidated home and brutally kill them as a sort of unhinged and pseudo-empowering form of feminazi blood sacrifice, Willow Springs is a hallucinatory and haunting film about three haunted women that discover the patriarchy can be much more macabre than the patriarchy. A sort of cine-magic marriage between the freaky female solidarity of Ingmar Bergman's Persona (1966) and Robert Altman's 3 Women (1977), the romantic acid-washed desert nihilism of Roland

Klick's Deadlock (1970), the high-camp lesbian slumber party melancholy of The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), the mystical authoritarian lesbianism of Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973), and the sunny California Oedipal problems of Curtis Harrington's The Killing Kind (1973), Willow Springs is nothing short of a lost masterpiece (apparently, the film has not been screened since 1973 when it was televised by ZDF in 1973) and thankfully the fine folks at Edition Filmmuseum have recently went to the trouble of restoring and releasing it on DVD. Indeed, you will not find a better anti-feminist feminist Manson-esque psychosexual western-horror-thriller than Willow Springs.

At the beginning of Willow Springs, one is given a glaring hint as to the source of lunatic lesbo-feminist cult leader Magdalena's (Magdalena Montezuma) murderous misandry and perturbing psychosis. As depicted in the first scene, Magdalena was brutally attacked and strangled by a swarthy Hells Angels-esque biker. Flash forward five years later, Magda is now a deranged dyke charlatan cunt and sole leader of the nefarious North Star Dhruva cult who derives internal strength from nonsensically killing any man that has the misfortune of passing by her home/bar in the desert and she uses two broken babes to help carry out her dirty deeds. As her underling Christine (Christine Kaufmann) states regarding her rationale for joining the cult, "I prefer to surrender responsibility for my life to Magdalena, because she loves pain and the beauty of her face is the beauty of pain. For the last five years, ever since I've been here, I no longer have any memories. I no longer have any memories. My life has only begun again since I came here." As Christine also states, "I have never loved anyone save for my child that died inside me before it was born. Since then, I know that life is like a wave on which you drift always being careful not to drown, only to die in the end after all," thus demonstrating her disillusionment with life, destroyed personality, incapacity for love and affection, and need to be led in life by someone else. The only other member of the killer carpet-muncher cult is the childlike dame Ila (Ila von Hasperg), who lives in a fantasy world that involves dressing like Marilyn Monroe and befriending kitty cats, which rather annoys Magdalena. In between being served rum and coke by sensual slaves and maliciously murdering men, Magdalena practices Sapphic esoteric rites and preaches to Christine and Ila at her dimly lit bar, where she declares like a true spiritually degenerate and schizophrenic megalomaniac: "I greet you, North Star. I greet you, cry of distant jackal. I greet you, loneliness of ours. Oh, my companions, preserve the purity of your hands that deny lascivious temptation. You possess the purity of those who spill the blood of others. The blood of the people we have killed is our protection. You will never be afraid again. I am the force that led you here. I am helping you. I love you more than I love myself." At mad Magda's demand, Christine and Ila repeat the chant: "She is the force through which we live... She loves us more than she loves herself... She is the force through which we breathe." Rather unfortunately for her, pseudo-messiah Magdalena is unable to provide her girls with the sort of sexual satisfaction that a virile ex-con like Charles Manson was able to glamor gals with.

Of course, trouble arrives in paradise when a young and seemingly autistic momma's boy of the diary-writing and Hawaiian-born sort named "Son" aka "Lord Invader" (Michael O'Daniels) arrives at the North Star Dhruva compound after learning that his beloved mommy (also played by Magdalena Montezuma who in this role gives a Marlene Dietrich-esque performance) was turned down from the clit-hopper cult by Magdalena. While Lord Invader knows all too well that the women of the cult worship murdering men and make a living stealing said murdered men's property, he displays no inkling of fear when facing the ferocious females of North Star Dhruva and they ultimately seem to respect him for that very reason. To Magdalena's dykey dismay, both Christine and Ila take an instant lecherous liking to the strange young man. Upon meeting Lord Invader, Ila falls in love at first sight and states, "You must have been born on Christmas eve" as if he is the second coming of Christ. On top of everything else, Lord Invader challenges Magdalena's authority and Weltanschauung by stating, "but Magdalena, you have to have a reason to kill someone," to which the queen bitch replies, "if you don't get what I'm saying, shut up!" as if the fact he has a penis makes him incapable of understanding the cult leader's murderously matriarchal megalomania. Always lurking around the house and voyeuristically spying on her followers through outside windows, Magdalena loses her cool after walking in on Lord Invader and Ila making passionate love in a manner that she, as a cock-less wench, never could. In one of the especially telling and symbolic scenes, Magdalena strokes her pistol revolver as if it were a cock, thus demonstrating she uses the weapon as a substitute phallus. When Ila attempts to leave with Lord Invader, Magdalena jealously shoots both of the lovers to death out of sexual frustration. With her authority compromised and beloved follower Ila dead, Magdalena acts in classically hysterical female fashion and shoots and kills Christine as well, thus bringing a quick and tragic end to the short-lived, but nonetheless iconic and infamous, North Star Dhruva cult. Interestingly, during Willow Springs, Magdalena prophetically promises her two girls that, "When you are dead, I will be the one to care for you, to carry your bodies to their graves." Indeed, when it came down to it, Magdalena preferred having both Christine and Ila dead rather than happy and in love with a man as a feminist extremist with a pathological case of penis envy.

Undoubtedly one of auteur Werner Schroeter's most accessible and aesthetically delectable works, Willow Springs is haunting high-camp celluloid Americana of the decidedly decadent Teutonic sort. Featuring music ranging from Camille Saint-Saëns and Charles Gounod to Creedence Clearwater Revival and the Doobie Brothers, Willow Springs is certainly a savory celluloid slice of the signature 'Kulturscheisse' ("culture shit") pioneered by Schroeter as a strikingly seamless hodgepodge of high and low kultur as a low-budget work that brings cultivation to a mostly cultureless nation. Made a couple years after the Manson Family murders, Schroeter's film depicts a wayward world where the utopian dreams of the counter-culture generation have deleteriously degenerated into absolutely abhorrent authoritarian gynocentrism of the mensch-exterminating sort. Indeed, I am sure Andy Warhol would have been rather disturbed by Willow Springs as the film seems like an aberrantly allegorical Texas Chain Saw Massacre-esque take on the insane radical lily-licker ideas expressed in the pop-con-artist's failed assassin Valerie Solanas' SCUM Manifesto. An apocalyptic chamber piece from fecund-free post-Monroe/post-Manson pandemonium featuring Miss Montezuma sporting a glittery Grim Reaper-like cloak, Willow Springs is a virtual celluloid epitaph of excess for American feminism as a work that portrays the fairer sex as no more free nor happy under a matriarchal society, but just the opposite. Indeed, like Schroeter's mainstream effort Malina (1991)—a work based on Austrian feminist hero Ingeborg Bachmann's 1971 novel of the same—Willow Springs is a film that is not likely to please feminist idealists as it portrays a 'woman-ruled' society as a decidedly debasing dystopian wasteland where the typical woman is even more subservient and less individualistic than under National Socialist rule, albeit minus the god-given rights of vaginal penetration and sexual reproduction. A sort of equally cynical companion piece to Fassbinder's equally eerie and iconoclastic video film Bremer Freiheit: Frau Geesche Gottfried - Ein bürgerliches Trauerspiel (1972), Willow Springs wallows in the rotting corpse that is women's lib and ironically does it in an ominous operatic style that demonstrates how beautiful deadly women can be.

THE KINGDOM OF NAPLES

Werner Schroeter° (1978)

If one needed to see indisputable evidence that German New Cinema dandy auteur Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Der Rosenkönig aka The Rose King) was more than a morbidly depressed diva addict with an immaculate and wildly idiosyncratic knack for communicating his campy cognitive dissonance on screen in a solely tableau-obsessed manner, one just needs to see his kraut-Guido neoneorealist flick Nel regno di Napoli (1978) aka Neapolitanische Geschichten aka The Reign of Naples aka The Kingdom of Naples—a decidedly decadent yet refined Teutonic look at the Southern Italian proletarian soul over a three decade period created by a German man who spent enough time in the city of Naples as a student to appreciate the most forsaken families of the intrinsically impoverished post-industrial wasteland. Schroeter's first feature shot on 35mm film stock and a work that would earn the filmmaker the 1979 German Film Prize for "Best Direction" in a country that thought of him as a "art cut," The Kingdom of Naples depicts a brother and sister from a poor-as-dirt family from their births at the time of the end of fascism in the city to the equally dystopian early 1970s, otherwise known as the "Bourbon era" of Naples, when it seemed like there was no hope for the hopeless in the spiritually devitalized, increasingly Americanized South Italian metropolis. Essentially beginning where Italian Freudian-Marxist auteur Bernardo Bertolucci's sickeningly sentimental and superficial com-symp epic 1900 (1976) aka Novecento left off, albeit using all Italian actors (both professional and non-professional), The Kingdom of Naples brings a certain 'pessimistic pep' via Schroeter's sharp operatic direction and dandy colorfulness to the seemingly static neorealist genre, thus giving the destitute characters of the film a certain sense of dignity that even eclipses the films of Pier Paolo Pasolini (Mamma Roma, Teorema), but without portraying them in a soulless, idealistic and propagandistic Marxist manner. While German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder found his friend Schroeter's second excursion in quasi-neorealism, Palermo oder Wolfsburg aka (1980) Palermo or Wolfsburg, to be one of the "most disappointing" films of Teutonic cinema, he regarded his celluloid compatriot's flick The Kingdom of Naples as one of the best of the post-WWII Fatherland, even writing a highly flattering essay in tribute to the film and filmmaker behind it. In his 1979 essay "Chin-up, Handstand, Salto Mortale—Firm Footing: On the Film Director Werner Schroeter, Who Achieved What Few, Achieve, with Kingdom of Naples," Fassbinder wrote: "A great and important film. Incredible, after the terrible years of waiting, always on the verge of simply drying up. A film that without hesitation can be classed with Ossessione by Visconti, La Strada by Fellini, Mamma Roma by Pasolini, Rocco and His Brothers by Visconti, Les bonnes femmes by Chabrol, Le diable probablement by Bresson, The Exterminating Angel by

THE KINGDOM OF NAPLES

Buñuel, and others like that.” Indeed, The Kingdom of Naples is indisputable proof that at least one German filmmaker, Werner Schroeter, was able to do the seemingly impossible by getting inside the most miserable pockets of the Mediterranean soul and exposing it for the entire world to see, thus illustrating that the Third World is not the only place where people are literally starving, but also ancient old world Europe.

Although a largely narrative-driven work with a fictional linear plot (albeit based on real-life events director Werner Schroeter personally read in newspapers) told in sixteen episodes, The Kingdom of Naples also acts as a seamless documentary film-within-a-film that chronicles the history of events that took place in Naples from 1943-1972 and that ultimately acts as the chronicled skeleton of the film. Beginning in 1943, the viewer learns that Naples was the first Italian city to be liberated by Italian fascism (apparently, they literally killed German soldiers for food, thus forcing the troops to abandon the city) and, naturally, by 1946 there were virtually nil jobs for men, but that is the least of the people's problems because as a bold and beautiful yet bitchy middle-aged lady named Valeria Cavioli (Liana Trouche) states—thus symbolically illustrating the matriarchal essence of Italian society—to a group of jobless men after the birth of baby named Vittoria Pagano, “What idiots, these men. During the war, all they can make are girls.” Vittoria has an older brother named Massimo and like their parents—the father (Dino Mele) being a fiercely fanatical anti-Catholic and the mother (Renata Zamengo) being a dearly devout Catholic—they are quite the opposites and they will grow further apart in political and social persuasion as they come-of-age in war-torn Southern Europa. Next door lives a callous widow named Valeria and her dainty daughter Rosa (Laura Sodano), whose malicious mother trades her damned daughter's virginity to a chocolate-wielding black U.S. sailor for a mere bag of flour with “U.S.A.” stamped on it, thus irreparably destroying the innocent girl's sense of person dignity for what will be the rest of her miserable life. Indeed, such dehumanizing acts are the norm in the impoverished ghettos of post-WWII Naples, where rich pedophiles conspire to lure in proletarian children with their exotic pet fish and fat cat Catholic priests wallow in their own gluttony as their followers starve in a ghetto right next door to the church. As narrated in The King of Naples, by 1948, “a progressive economic model, which turned out to be extremely reactionary in nature. Free reign for the employer who exploits the workers. Repression and exploitation in the factories... The Pope also prays to the Holy Mother to bring about a miracle, so the people vote for the Christian Democrats.” Of course, the potential “miracle” is not of a Christian Democrat persuasion, but an atheist Marxist sort. Not unsurprisingly, when mother Pagano dies in a martyr-like manner as she allegorically bleeds from her womb, her children inevitably respond to it in rather extreme manners, with Vittoria dreaming of being a nun, while her brother Massimo dreams of being a Marxist revolutionary.

When radical Spanish Marxist refugee and Franco opponent Alessandro Simonetti (Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid's one-time boyfriend Raúl Gimenez)—a student of Italian far-left revolutionary Antonio Gramsci who seems to worship the Italian Marxist martyr and onetime leader of the Communist Party of Italy like a Catholic would worship Christ—arrives in Naples, he inspires hope in the hapless folk in the Guido ghetto, including Massimo, who goes on to work for free at the communist revolutionary's party headquarters, and Valeria, who marries the charismatic would-be-messiah of leftist materialism. Vittoria attempts to be a nun, but her sternly anti-pope pop puts a quick end to that dream. Meanwhile, Massimo finds a surrogate mother figure in a French nurse turned prostitute Rosaria aka "Frenchie" (Pasolini regular Margareth Clémenti)—a family friend who was at the birth of Vittoria—who makes him pay to play with her voluptuous body. Vittoria herself almost becomes a prostitute at the age of 16 when a conspiring redhead bitch named Pupetta Ferrante (Ida Di Benedetto) who looks like a witchy drag-queen and owns a metal factory, hires her under the false pretense of being a cleaner and eventually offers the poor girl to move in her home to better job where she will meet countless "first class people." Desperate and against Marxist Massimo's wishes, Vittoria's father persuades his daughter to move in with Ferrante, but the teenage girl soon learns that she has been hired as a prostitute and thus she flees the nefarious bourgeois bitch's house. An all around con of a cunt, Ferrante refuses to pay her overworked factory laborers, which results in a scuffle that leaves the men dead and the quasi-femme fatale boss a coldblooded murderer. Valeria also attempts to whore out her daughter Rosa to seemingly gay, mama's boy attorney and Christian democratic big wig named Palumbo (Gerardo D'Andrea), but instead she calls her manipulative mother a "whore" and gets extremely sick, eventually pointlessly dying because there are no antibiotics in Naples. Enraged, Valeria blames and kills her failed Marxist revolutionary husband Simonetti for Rosa's premature and easily avoidable death because he promised a glorious Bolshevik worker's utopia, but failed to deliver anything but false promises and cheap charisma. Although Valeria only serves a short prison sentence, she is institutionalized in a mental hospital, where she admits to Massimo and Vittoria that she was gang raped by four men during the Second World War. Although Simonetti is dead, Massimo remains a stern communist and is ultimately arrested for his subversive political affiliations. In year 1970 as the narrator of The Kingdom of Naples states, "We have returned to a climate of uncertainty. Massimo has served his prison sentence. Will he still be a dreamer?" Now a husband and father of meager means who after about two decades of unflinching dedication to Marxism, is no closer to the commie dream, but instead witnesses the death of his beloved Frenchie and his holy sister settling for a career as a flashy flight attendant, Massimo leaves with the words of wisdom, "With so much sulphur in the air, people are destined to die. They dig from morning to evening in this filth. And the work robs you of all joy. What kind of a life is that?"

A nearly immaculate marriage between realist melodrama and documentary collage, The Kingdom of Naples achieves what German New Cinema co-founder Alexander Kluge has been trying to accomplish his entire career, but whose sterile and pedantic Marxist intellectualism, seeming lack of artistic spirit, and pomo posturing have always prevented him from realizing. Indeed, The Kingdom of Naples is a true proletarian flick, yet executed with the sensitivity and nuance of a true maestro and aristocrat of aestheticism with a genuine love and respect for an alien people. Of course, where The Kingdom of Naples is different from the Italian neorealist films, especially those by Pasolini, that inspired it is that Schroeter seems to have no love for communism nor the Catholic church—both of which are portrayed in The Kingdom of Naples as parasitic entities that make endless promises of salvation and an utopian future yet never deliver anything aside from false hope—but only the people of the region, whose survival is totally based on their desperate will to live and nothing more, hence why a mother gives away her virginal daughter away to a Negro American sailor for a mere bag of flour and a young girl grows up to be a stewardess instead of the holy nun she always dream of being. Indeed, The Kingdom of Naples has the sort of uncompromising cultural pessimism that could have only been assembled by a German filmmaker lacking a certain Mediterranean flamboyance and pomposity, so it should be no surprise that the film was not very popular in Italy as it was in Germany, even inspiring Schroeter's friend Fassbinder to state of his cinematic compatriot's first big commercial and critic hit, "So Germany has not only three, or five, or ten film directors to show off; it has now acquired another one who was certainly needed. One with a great deal to say. A great one, to put it simply." And, indeed, Schroeter says as much as an Ausländer can say about a strange foreign land in The Kingdom of Naples, to the point where I asked myself whether or not the poverty plagued population would have been better off with the fascism that once made the trains run on time, or simply being nuked into oblivion as few other films get at the heart of collective misery and tragedy, and stoically and unsentimentally let us know there is not a cure, despite what the communist party or Catholic church promises with their pseudo-altruistic verbal swill. Indeed, the Teutonic king of German celluloid kitsch proved with The Kingdom of Naples that every ghetto has its revolutionaries and divas, but instead of killing wealthy aristocrats and performing for sold-out operas, they are dumping trash into the sea and peddling their pussies for pennies on the dollar. With the economic crisis in Europe hitting the Mediterranean countries the hardest, The Kingdom of Naples might not make for the most inspiring film for contemporary Southern Europeans to watch, but it will certainly make them second guess worthless intellectual abstractions some messianic Marxist demigod is peddling like a glorified whore on a city street corner.

PALERMO ODER WOLFSBURG

Of all films, Palermo oder Wolfsburg (1980) aka Palermo or Wolfsburg – a kraut neo-Neorealist epic by German New Cinema dandy Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Day of the Idiots) – brought me back to my early childhood at a crucial and insightful point in my life when I realized the immense differences between cultures and the inherent impossibility of two very different groups being able to reconcile their innate cultural and ethnic differences. When I was in kindergarten, I started a fairly long friendship that would endure for about a decade (until I moved and rarely saw him again) with a fiery and flamboyant fellow named Phil whose mother was a Spanish-Cuban immigrant and whose father was Sicilian-American. Naturally, being of purely Mediterranean family, Phil had a strong Catholic background, despite the fact that he was basically a born psychopath who learned to unscrupulously lie, cheat, steal and aggressively hit on girls before he learned to tie his shoes. Anyway, although I considered him my best friend and vice versa, I will never forget the time when one of his Cuban friends came to town and immediately turned Phil into a totally different person from who I thought I knew, or at least from the person he always was in the most pure day-to-day form, while in the close company of cultural and racial compatriots. Practically speaking another language and with his break-neck linguistic rhythms and bombastic body language at a speed that would put to shame the gayest of effortlessly effete homo Negros, my friend carried on with his Cuban comrade as if reuniting with his long lost doppelgänger like I was in some real-life science fiction movie, so naturally I was rather enraged, but I inevitably realized at that point in my life that human being tends to get along best with people like themselves and such is certainly the case in Werner Schroeter's Palermo or Wolfsburg; a film about a young Sicilian peasant who moves from Palermo, Sicily to Wolfsburg, West Germany to financially support his impoverished family. Like Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Katzelmacher (1969) and Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974), Helma Sanders-Brahms' TV-movie Shirins Hochzeit (1976) aka Shirin's Wedding, and the German era films of Iranian auteur Sohrab Shaheed Salles (Empfänger unbekannt aka Addressee Unknown, Rosen für Afrika aka Roses for Africa), Palermo or Wolfsburg was one of the first German films to deal with the still-taboo topic of Aryan-Ausländer relations, lost-in-translation communication (or lack thereof), and the oftentimes deleterious effects of culture shock. Despite being only a couple minutes shy of three hours in length (although the original cut was apparently eight hours!), Palermo or Wolfsburg also happens to be Schroeter's most accessible film and would earn the auteur the prestigious Golden Bear at the 30th Berlin International Film Festival, thereupon making him the first actual kraut auteur to win the award. Of course, as someone of partial Polish ancestry (his grandmother was a Polish aristocrat) whose cinematic works tended to be poorly received in his own country, hence one of the major reasons as to why he tended to work and live abroad, Schroeter must have felt a deep sense of satisfaction winning the Golden Bear for Palermo or Wolfsburg; an aesthetically and thematically antagonistic film that depicts the German Fatherland as a gloomy loony bin full of latent racists and softcore slave drivers. Featuring various theatric depictions of Jesus Christ, including iconic scenes of the Last Supper and his inevitable Crucifixion, Palermo or Wolfsburg is an audaciously allegorical tale where a wide-eyed Italian boy becomes a modern day Christ figure in a semi-cryptic cinematic tribute to Italian Renaissance Man Pier Paolo Pasolini (Mamma Roma, The Gospel According to Matthew) from his Slavic-Germanic spiritual son Werner Schroeter.

Like his previous feature-length cinematic effort Neapolitanische Geschichten (1978) aka The Kingdom of Naples, Palermo or Wolfsburg is a narrative-driven melodrama with a subversive socially conscious soul that was shot on 35mm film stock and follows the sad and tragic lives of Southern Italians, specifically that of a simpleminded Sicilian boy named Nicola (played by non-actor Nicola Zarbo in the tradition of Italian Neorealism) with a mustache who bears a striking physical and psychological resemblance to the character Pedro from Napoleon Dynamite (2004). With no work to be found in the Sicilian city of Palermo, and with a belligerent boozier for a father, naïve Nicola has no choice but to move to the young and sparsely populated (the city did not exceed 100,000 people until 1972) German city of Wolfsburg – the headquarters of the Volkswagen AG automobiles – so his family does not starve to death. Despite the overwhelming poverty of the collective populous of Palermo, everyone seems quite happy and has a deep and instinctive attachment to culture, tradition, religion, and – most of all – family in an ancient realm where little boys give singing solos while standing on top of a piano as grownups cheer him on, children are taught about famous Italian opera composers like Vincenzo Bellini, people ritualistically honor their dead ancestors, and the Catholic church plays a major part in their lives. In fact, before going to Germany, Nicola talks to a priest (real-life Catholic holy man Padre Pace) who warns him that German's, "moral standards are not up to ours," that family is the most important thing in a man's life, and to stay out of trouble in the foreign land, especially in regard to women as tragedies based in petty manners are often brought about by the fairer sex. Nicola probably should have taken heed of the padre's wise advice as his immigration to Wolfsburg ultimately results in the total ruin of his life. A long but endlessly enthralling celluloid epic that, not unlike the films of Stanley Kubrick, is separated into three different major parts – Nicola's life in Sicily, his hectic and humiliating life in Germany, and eventual trial for murdering two German boys – Palermo or Wolfsburg is a completely charming and captivating yet tragic tale about one man's personal demise in a strange land where no one understands the meaning of 'la dolce vita.'

Poverty might be a serious problem among the populous of Palermo, but it seems to pale in comparison to the social alienation, cultural degeneracy, and technocratic tyranny of Wolfsburg; a place featuring a number of gigantic and glaring Volkswagen signs that are quite symbolic of the city's reigning corporatism and materialistic post-cultural modernism. Only a couple minutes after getting off the train upon arriving in Wolfsburg, Nicola is immediately hassled by some cops for apparently walking where he should not be, thus ushering a series of cultural mishaps and miscommunications that will lead to irrational murder and mayhem. Not knowing a single word of Deutsch, the Sicilian stranger has a hard time navigating around the city. Nicola plans to stay at his cousin's apartment house and when he actually finds the location after a number of hours aimlessly wandering around, his kinsman's German wife has him thrown out because, after all, none of her relatives leech off of her. Given 20 marks by his cuckold of a cuz, Nicola attempts to find an Italian-run hotel that accepts down-and-out guidos, but gets lost and decides to burn the little money he has for the hell of it in a display of irrational cognitive dissonance and subsequently beds down in a bush. The next day, Nicola discovers love at first sight in the form of a blonde, grey-eyed beauty named Brigitte Hahn (Brigitte Tilg; another non-actor in her sole movie role) – a teenage quasi-tomboy who works as a mechanic – who recommends that the Sicilian boy go to a nearby bar owned by a feisty Italian woman named Giovanna (Ida di Benedetto) who will ultimately act as the lad's Mother (Mary) figure. Of course, it does not take long for Nicola to be hassled by two German lads sporting punk/New Wave threads – the true love interests of Brigitte – who describe the down-and-out Sicilian boy as a “dago” and claim he is, “from Planet of the Apes,” and that “he came with a suitcase full of garlic,” being a dirty Italian and all. Luckily, Nicola also befriends a group of fellow Italians from Sardinia, who describe him as, “another victim” who has come to work and live like a dog as an unwanted guest worker in Deutschland. The Sardinians also warn Nicola about German women, stating, “this German girl had three Italians. She has a baby from each of them, she's very free. Her life is centered on her kids and not her husband...she wants money for the children,” because “she's a free woman” aka welfare queen who leeches off the state and the hard earned cash of poor immigrant workers. After getting a job at Volkswagen, Nicola finally feels like he is moving up in the world as he has money and is in love, but all good things must come to an end and uncontrollable factors, coupled with the Sicilian's childish naiveté, lead the young man to a crime of passion spurred by a broken heart. Naturally, it will be a German woman, as prophesized by Nicola's priest, who will be the source of simple Sicilian's fateful demise.

It becomes quite obvious early on in Palermo or Wolfsburg that Nicola's nefarious love interest Brigitte is a heartless sadist when she smiles in a self-satisfied manner after inspiring a bloody bar fight between Italians Nicola and pub owner Giovanna and the German boys who are vying for her attention, thus foreshadowing the two murders that will occur at the hands of the humble man who made the inauspicious mistake of moving to a foreign land. Of course, more sinister than the German characters in the film is the Volkswagen Corporation – originally founded in 1937 by the Nazi trade union, the German Labour Front (Deutsche Arbeitsfront) – which is portrayed throughout Palermo or Wolfsburg in a ominous manner as a symbol of Germany's National Socialist past that still dominates today. In fact, the VW logo is featured throughout the film as a surrogate for the swastika (a militant drum-driven 'Nazi Death March' even plays whenever the Aryan automobile icon appears) that is presented in an insidious and ill-boding manner akin to how the Nazi symbol is presented in Hollywood anti-Nazi propaganda films, thus making it no coincidence that the protagonist of Palermo or Wolfsburg hails from Italy; a minor power that allied with the Third Reich in a slavish and groveling manner in a master-slave relationship that still continues today via corporate power.

Undoubtedly, the final act of Palermo or Wolfsburg is the most Schroeteresque segment of the entire film as it features dissonant, surrealist, absurdist, and sometimes operatic tableaux, highly hermetic symbolism, an ambiguous ending, and other wildly idiosyncratic elements that one would expect from the renegade New German Cinema auteur. Despite being nearly impossible to follow in some parts, bar owner Giovanna delivers testimony regarding protagonist Nicola that essentially sums up the tone and message of Palermo or Wolfsburg that goes as follows: "Since the day he arrived I have watched over him like my brother. He brought the life of my homeland with him. And I didn't want to see him destroyed in this land without light, without sun, without song and without chatter." Answering the title questions "Palermo or Wolfsburg," it is most apparent that Nicola should have stayed at his hometown, as he may have remained poor, but he still had everything worth living for; friends, family, culture, and religion and would have lived out the rest of his life in happiness and relative freedom. Totally vulnerable in a hostile land where material gain, nonsensically bureaucratic law & order, and corporate security are more valued than family and kultur, and social alienation, especially in regard to foreigners, is the norm, Nicola – a totally unsuspecting and less than intelligent (even, arguably borderline retarded) fellow – was bound to explode, it was just a matter of when and where. As cosmopolitan and worldly as a person could be as someone who spent their childhood attending international schools and living the majority of his life abroad, director Werner Schroeter was someone who truly understood the cultural and racial chaos that is multiculturalism and globalization. Part culturally rich and transcendental Italian neo-Neorealist flick, part gloomy anti-capitalist New German Cinema flick, and part super surrealist Schroeter operatic montage, Palermo or Wolfsburg is an unpretentious yet meticulously assembled arthouse masterpiece that manages to charmingly synthesize all the best elements of post-WWII Occidental cinema in a feverishly foreboding film that warns about the very probable suicide of culturally devitalized Europa via corporate-led globalization, thus making it worthy of any serious lover of culture and/or cinephile's time.

DAY OF THE IDIOTS

Werner Schroeter° (1981)

If there ever was a chick flick for schizophrenics and/or scat-inclined Sapphos, it is most certainly the fittingly titled work Day of the Idiots (1981) aka Tag der Idioten directed by Teutonic dandy Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Der Bomberpilot). While a vocal proponent of Schroeter's work myself, Day of the Idiots is certainly a celluloid work I cannot stomach or so I learned after a second failed viewing of the film. Despite being nominated for a Golden Palm Award at the 1982 Cannes Film Festival and winning "best film" at the 1982 German Film Awards and ultimately being one of Schroeter's most critically successful works, Day of the Idiots disgusts me in a way that can only be described as the metaphysical equivalent of barfing my favorite cuisine as a work that, although directed by one of my favorite directors of high-camp surrealist kitsch and featuring one of my favorite kraut divas (Ingrid Caven), rubs me the wrong way, sort of the way I would expect an autistic Star Wars fan to react after watching a Pasolini marathon. Starring French actress Carole Bouquet, who is probably best known by fans of European cinema for starring in Luis Buñuel's classic surrealist satire That Obscure Object of Desire (1977) and penned by politician/journalist and one-time screenwriter Dana Horaková, who was married to Czech New Wave auteur Pavel Juráček and later apparently became a 'Minister of Culture' for the city of Hamburg from 2002-2004, Day of the Idiots is nauseatingly neurotic celluloid estrogen on overdrive directed by an especially eccentrically effete fellow who, more often than not, was far too in tune with his effeminate side and this celluloid work is certainly the most glaring and grating example of the filmmaker's female soul. The morbidly morose and melancholy psychodramatic tale of a decidedly deranged dame who is so obsessed with getting her boyfriend's love and attention that she decides to call in false allegations denouncing her neighbors as terrorists to authorities so she can be institutionalized, Day of the Idiots is essentially a psychological fantasy flick for emotionally-wrecked women who romantically dream of suicide and/or are into lesbian urolagnia. If you ever wanted to see a Bond Girl (star Carole Bouquet played Bond girl Melina Havelock in For Your Eyes Only (1981) right before Schroeter's flick) fall into in to operatic and phantasmagorical psychodrama at a patently perverse psych-ward before inevitably deciding to commit self-slaughter by running into traffic and being plowed down by a car, Day of the Idiots might be the film for you, but I doubt it, because the film ultimately sounds more cinematically tantalizing than it actually is.

Despite her debilitating depression, crazy 'cutie' Carole Schneider (Carole Bouquet) must love the skin she lives in because she is constantly tearing off her clothes and walking around her flat naked. Unfortunately for her, Carole must also tear off her lazy boyfriend Alexander's (played by Mostefa Djadjam, who looks like a director Werner Schroeter if he were a dirty Arab) clothes off just to get him to share some good old carnal knowledge with him. In fact, Carole fantasizes about cutting out a piece of her boyfriend's skull and placing a little window there so she "can see if he really loves me," or so she says to herself while in some sort of perturbing psychosis. While ostensibly in public, Carole cries out "Alexander must look at me!" in vain as her self-centered boyfriend is nowhere to be found. Unfortunately, her simple demands from her bastard of a boy toy go unanswered, as she later begs for Alexander to "Kill me! Please!," which also proves to be unfruitful. Luckily terrorism is big in Deutschland and Carole comes up with an absolutely brilliant plan to falsely denounce her neighbors to the police as conspiring terrorists, which ultimately gets her locked in a creepily curious and quaint quasi-lesbo loony bin. While in the nightmarish nuthouse, Carole discovers that things are much more interesting than in the 'free' world as she encounters suicide, post-menopausal women playing with dolls, Catholic weddings, imaginary ballroom dancing, amputated legs/feet in glass cases, female-on-female water-sports, collapsing walls, and a variety of others things that might cross the mind of a schizophrenic. With decidedly deranged nurses and doctors, including a certain Dr. Laura (played by Fassbinder's ex-wife/Daniel Schmid's diva Ingrid Caven), who seem hardly distinguishable from the inmates aside from their uniforms, Carole is hardly cured by her experiences in the meta-mental hospital, but only all the more sure that there is no society that she is fit to live in as an alienated modern woman with nothing nor no one to live for. Carole seems to ultimately come to the conclusion that she is not suffering from any serious form of mental illness, but that she cannot simply function in society, be it among the public or among imprisoned perverts, so she to take her future (or lack thereof) into her own hands. When the walls of the loony bin begin to literally fall down, Carole realizes there is nowhere to hide and after being set free by Dr. Laura she decides to commit suicide by running in front of oncoming traffic and being plowed down by a random unfortunate stranger in a small European car. In the end, the melancholy expression on Carole's corpse seems no different than when she was 'alive.'

A sometimes wanton and always wildly weird celluloid tale about a woman under the influence of too much Weltschmerz, Day of the Idiots is, at best, a haunting and hallucinogenic celluloid psychodrama about a hysterical female mind that cannot deal with the dispiriting nature of post-WWII Europa and, at worse, the innately incoherent and discombobulating piece of lavish cinematic angst concocted by a kraut queen auteur who rightfully deserves a place in film history as German New Cinema's foremost miserable sodomite. Though featuring an aesthetically exquisite and idiosyncratically nightmarish hodgepodge of meticulously assembled tableaux, Day of the Idiots ultimately seems like a bad parody of Schroeter's own idiosyncratic brand of hyper-aestheticism as a sort of ugly and slightly retarded celluloid stepsister to the filmmaker's later 'mainstream' effort Malina (1991) starring Isabelle Huppert. Unfortunately, while Day of the Idiots lead Carole Bouquet may have much fuller breasts than her French compatriot Huppert, she has nowhere near the same acting chops, thus making her performance seem not much more nuanced than that of a mannequin, and also making the actress more suitable for Schroeter's early masterpiece Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran, where most of the actresses simply strike simple poses and maintain the same facial expressions. Indeed, there seems to be a potential 'high-camp horror' masterpiece lost somewhere in Day of the Idiots and I personally hold banal babe Bouquet partially responsible for the film's seemingly half-aborted essence. Made in the wake of the far-leftist terrorist era in West Germany that reached its peak in 1977 and was famously seriously commented on with the omnibus film Germany in Autumn (1978) aka Deutschland im Herbst by a number of major directors of German New Cinema, including Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Volker Schlöndorff, and Edgar Reitz, Day of the Idiots ultimately acts as Werner Schroeter's unofficial reaction to the Fatherland in 'fall.' Not unlike Germany in Autumn, Day of the Idiots, though having many of the ingredients to be a unique and unmitigated masterpiece, also feels like a postmodern Teutonic arthouse abortion.

DAY OF THE IDIOTS

THE ROSE KING

Without a doubt one of German New Wave dandy auteur Werner Schroeter's (Eika Katappa, Day of the Idiots) most immaculately stylized and purely poetic works, which says a lot for a filmmaker who forbid the use of subtitles for many of his aesthetically paralyzing multilingual cinematic works, Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King – a flawlessly fragmented cinematic effort about the piercing power of repression, obsession, possession, and the intangibility of aesthetic perfection – also happens to be one of the director's most personal efforts and a virtual epitaph for the film's lead actress Magdalena Montezuma who, knowingly terminally ill with uterine cancer and hoping to depart from the physical world while filming on location in Portugal, instead died a mere two weeks later at the premature age of 41 (all the while refusing morphine) after completing filming for the production. Although always a homophile auteur (despite rejecting politics, be it gay rights or otherwise) who was deeply compelled to create some of the greatest and most self-indulgent high-camp cinematic works ever assembled, Schroeter decided to go full-flaming fairy with the The Rose King, the first film he directed with overtly homosexual themes and imagery, albeit of the poetical semiotic sort the symbolically portrays the sadomasochistic relation between mother and son, as well as between man and man; or master and slave. Dedicated to his longtime muse Magdalena Montezuma (born Erika Kluge and hailing from Bavaria) – who appeared in virtually every one of Schroeter's films, including his early 8 mm shorts and his first feature Eika Katappa (1969), as well as films by fellow queer German New Wave icon filmmakers such as Rainer Werner Fassbinder (Rio das Mortes, Beware of a Holy Whore), Frank Ripploh (Taxi Zum Klo), Rosa von Praunheim (Macbeth Oper von Rosa von Praunheim) and Ulrike Ottinger (Ticket of No Return, Freak Orlando) – The Rose King, despite its lack of linear narrative, has an idiosyncratic essence of foreboding doom and gloom that seems all the more potently perturbing when one realizes that the lead actress longed "to die on the set" as she knew her departure from the world was imminent and that it would be the last time she would be able to express her moody and brooding whimsical beauty on the silver screen. Ironically, upon first viewing The Rose King, I remember distinctly how taken aback I was by her pulchritude despite her age and I certainly did not suspect that I was watching a terminally ill diva on her last dance with death. Indubitably, the greatest "silent actress" of the Neuer Deutscher Film, few screen queens can boast a greater swansong than that of Miss Montezuma in The Rose King.

Co-written by Schroeter and Montezuma, and featuring poetry by Edgar Allan Poe ("The Raven" as narrated by Basil Rathbone), The Rose King is a piece of unrelenting romantic death poetry that is set to a variety of ethnic and dirge-like music (including Strauss, Vangelis, Arabic pop) and a wonderfully wicked work that makes a bucket of blood seem like a beautiful bed of red roses and the violent murder of a kitty cat via shotgun and subsequent crucifying of said pussy resemble a compassionate act of sane sensitivity. In other words, no one could make misery, misanthropy, and murder seem so ravishingly refined and effortlessly elegant than the late, great Herr Schroeter, arguably post-WW2 Germany's single greatest 'filmic artist' and one of few filmmakers to expand a seemingly closed and limited, at least at that point in cinematic history, artistic medium. As can be expected by virtually every film directed by the impenetrable cosmopolitan kraut auteur, The Rose King is a carefully calculated and clandestine work that demands multiple viewings before one can properly appreciate the work, at least if one hopes to get more out of this gorgeous gut-wrenching celluloid poem than just the ostensibly high-camp imagery. The film centers around an opulent and cultivated yet mentally unstable mother and son duo – stoic yet spiritless German Anna (Magdalena Montezuma) and highly emotional yet standoffish Mediterranean Albert (Mostefa Djadjam) whose dull, if not decadent, lives – for better or worse – change drastically with the arrival of handsome young peasant Fernando (played by Antonio Orlando who – among other things – played one of the young victims in Pasolini's celluloid adieu Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975)).

Despite living under the same roof of an extravagant Portuguese estate that neither character wanders too far away from, Anna and Albert rarely speak to one another, aside from disagreeing over parabolic gardening philosophies and the overall aesthetic properties of roses, so when Fernando arrives and takes the plush yet perturbed young man's attention away from attempting to cultivate the most pretty perennial plant, the modest melancholy mother is especially disapproving and jealous of her son's dubious relationship with the blue-collar newcomer, so much so that she tries to buy him off so as to push him away from her sole and highly secretive progeny. Although widow Anna vows to devote herself to son Albert – whose father is deceased, and who she proclaims she does not miss one bit – the “shy” yet “aggressive” young man seems to rigorously resent his mother to the point that he refuses to even make eye contact with her or sit at the dinner table with her and break bread and drink red wine for a meal that she has prepared especially for him. While Albert is the prince of suggestive sass whose sole motivation in life is to 'crown' his "Rose King" while treating his mother as if she is already pushing up daisies, Anna is an absurdly withdrawn woman who befriends a gang of young Portuguese peasant boys – who being swarthy and tan, certainly resemble her sick scion when he was a wee lad during less tumultuous times – in a feeble attempt to fill the unquenchable void that has been left by her emotionally impervious son. As Anna tells him herself, Albert is, to paraphrase, “not a gardener, but a dreamer” who has to “destroy everything that doesn't match his ideal” and needless to say, his relationship with his mother is far from conventional, yet at the same time it fits into the cliché of the overbearing mother – who due to her failed relationship with her husband (Anna admits she does not miss Albert's father) – has subconsciously sought a surrogate spouse in her son, thus pushing the boy to grow up to despise women and develop the insatiable need to find a “daddy,” in this case in the notably more masculine Fernando, in the form of a homosexual lover he is quite hesitant about touching. A deranged dreamer of the day and lover of the night, Albert has put his male compatriot on a pedestal that virtually guarantees that any sex act he might commit with the potent peasant would result in abject disappointment, on top of the fact that he seems rather afraid of authentic human touch, thus he opts for sacrificing the aesthetically sacred just as any good sadomasochistic gardener would in a manner not all that dissimilar from the ill-fated couple of Derek Jarman's The Garden (1990), a work more or less as personal and esoteric as Schroeter's The Rose King.

As Anna constantly reiterates throughout the film, “if two children kiss when they cannot speak, one of them will die,” or so seems the relationship of Albert and Fernando which reaches a bloody and bleak yet bewitching conclusion during the final minutes of The Rose King. Albert – a seemingly emotionally autistic young man – treats his relationship with Fernando as an arcane and sacrosanct one, first imprisoning him and then sacrificing his lover in a manner echoing both the crucifixion of Christ, but especially the martyrdom of Saint Sebastian in the vein of Guido Reni's baroque painting of the martyr, as well as Yukio Mishima (who worshiped Reni's Saint Sebastian) who built himself the perfect body, only to sacrifice it. Although against her own will due to tragic circumstance, high-camp diva Magdalena Montezuma also ultimately made the decision to immortalize and canonize her atypical allure via The Rose King at a time that she reached her peak in grace and glamour of character and exterior body, thereupon marking an irrevocable shift in Werner Schroeter's cinematic oeuvre and a decline in arthouse camp forever. The “Rose King” himself, Antonio Orlando – whose last film role would be as Fernando in The Rose King – would also die prematurely in 1989 and, after enduring cancer for a number of years, Schroeter would also see a similar fate to his marvelous muse dying at the age of 65 in 2010. In the documentary Mondo Lux : The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter (2011) directed by Elfi Mikesch (who also happens to be the cinematographer of The Rose King), Schroeter stated in regard to Montezuma and Orlando, “Perhaps they live on in the pictures through the look they cast.” Personally, I cannot think of a more ‘moving’ – both literally and figuratively – perennial tribute to the memory of Montezuma and Orlando than The Rose King; a masterful cinematic work of fleeting filmic form and forlorn body fetishism.

As for Schroeter – a ceaselessly singular and markedly meticulous modern maestro of mise-en-scène – I think German New Wave König Rainer Werner Fassbinder summed up the morbidly romantic auteur filmmaker's contribution to cinema history when he stated in an interview for the book The Anarchy of the Imagination: Interviews, Essays, Notes (1992): “Werner Schroeter will one day have a place in the history of film that I would describe in literature as somewhere between Novalis, Lautréamont, and Louis-Ferdinand Céline; he was an ‘underground’ director for ten years, and they didn’t want to let him slip out of this role. Werner Schroeter’s grand cinematic scheme of the world was confined, repressed, and at the same time ruthlessly exploited. His films were given the convenient label of ‘underground’, which transforms them in a flash into beautiful but exotic plants that bloomed so unusually and so far away that basically one couldn’t be bothered with them, and therefore wasn’t supposed to bother with them. And that’s precisely as wrong as it is stupid. For Werner Schroeter’s films are not far away; they’re beautiful but not exotic. On the contrary.” Indeed, few films get as personal, albeit allegorically so, than Schroeter’s The Rose King; a majestic motion-picture monument of the miraculously macabre that reminds one that beauty knows no morals, as even the slow and agonizing annihilation of a man via towering fetishistic torture and terror takes on the form of terribly titillating divinity. Bringing morbid melodrama to the Oscar Wilde “art for art’s sake” school of aestheticism, The Rose King lets the viewer know that even the loss of life is worth the price of a commanding work of artistry.

Werner Schroeter° (1991)

If I have noticed any striking similarities in personalities between self-described 'feminists,' it is that the source of their oftentimes hysterical hatred of men is the result of an impenetrable hatred, fear, anxiety, and all-encompassing disdain for their daddy and such is certainly the case regarding Malina (1991) directed by Werner Schroeter – a celluloid psychodrama based on an autobiographical novel of the same name written by tragic Austrian author/poetess and proto-feminist Ingeborg Bachmann – that depicts the mental disintegration of an intrinsically incapacitated, albeit successful, woman who, in between dividing her time among two very contradictory men, is failing at attempting to write a novel she will inevitably never finish. Based on a screenplay written by Austrian feminist-Marxist playwright/novelist Elfriede Jelinek – a woman whose Jewish chemist father provided his services to the Third Reich, thus probably contributing to her dubious relationships with men throughout her life – that was adapted from Bachmann's sole novel Malina (1971), Schroeter's less than literal cinematic adaptation Malina, despite being the first and only film he did not write/co-write the screenplay for, would prove to be denounced as misogynist by feminists for its less than flattering, if not exceedingly empathetic, depiction of a woman in panic on the verge of subconscious suicide, as they felt that the film, as written by Michelle Langford in her work Allegorical Images: Tableau, Time and Gesture in the Cinema of Werner Schroeter (2006), "had reduced a figure of feminist emancipation to a mere stereotype of an intellectual woman suffering a pathological disorder." Like the unnamed character of the film Malina, Bachmann would go out in a literal blaze of (un)glory after apparently unintentionally setting her apartment on fire via a lit cigarette (or so the police assume), which resulted in a three week hospital stay that ended in her demise (some suspect it was the result of drug withdrawal of an undetermined sort as she was a compulsive pill-popper), thus, not unlike Sylvia Plath, earning martyr status among depressed feminist girls everywhere looking for a hero with a sharp intellect and a sad sob story of the seemingly mystifying kind. While the female protagonist of Malina works on a novel with the same name as the one Bachmann was working on before her death, audacious auteur Schroeter, in his typically idiosyncratic high-camp and operatic fashion, created a work that delicately, if not decidedly decadently, deconstructed the film's source material and ultimately sired something intrinsically cinematic all of his own that transcends whatever message the source material may have conveyed and that was further accentuated via an avant-garde musical score by Italian composer Giacomo Manzoni Utilizing aesthetic and thematic techniques he introduced with Day of the Idiots (1981) aka Tag der Idioten and would subsequently develop to the furthestmost degree with his exceedingly eccentric and esoteric 'biopic' Deux

MALINA

(2002), Schroeter explores the dichotomous nature of human nature (i.e. male versus female, rationality versus irrationality, love versus hatred, etc.) with Malina, a cinematic work that can be best summed up in its female lead protagonist's personal confession, "I've never been happy, but I have seen beauty."

The female protagonist (played by Isabelle Huppert) of Malina has some serious problems that revolve around her father (or "vater" as depicted by Fritz Schediwy) that go all the way back to her childhood as depicted in the first scene in the film when the character's papa throws her off of a roof, but luckily her introverted and intellectual beau "Malina" (Mathieu Carrière, star of Young Törless (1966) and Egon Schiele – Exzess und Bestrafung (1980)) – a seemingly sexually sterile fellow with degenerated gray hair that seems to have nil sexual passion nor potency – is there not only to taunt, teach, and tease, but also to comfort her in a completely curious way with his dry wit and dandy persuasion. Although a relatively successful Wittgensteinian scholar and novelist, the protagonist of Malina is a woman on the verge of a total mental breakdown and who has lost touch with her senses and reality, so much so that she has to consciously tell herself, "I must breathe, I must breathe," a number of times throughout the film. Of course, being a phantom-like being who appears during the protagonist's daunting delirious daydreams and nightmares, the sexually ambiguously named Malina does not really seem to be her live-in boyfriend, but her Jungian animus (the word "animus" even being literally used at one point in the film during an extra erotic tableau) – the unconscious of the female that is expressed as a masculine inner personality. As a male-minded intellectual who has all but completely sacrificed her innate femininity for fame and prestige among a mainly male-dominated field – a clearly deep-seated decision inspired by her rejection by a father she cannot remember, but appears in various sinister surrealist forms and guises – the protagonist is overwhelmed by Malina's particularly pedantic and rather rational persona. Only in the masculine Ivan (Can Togay) – a father of young children who inspires fiery passions of the flesh in the seemingly frigid proto-feminist – does the protagonist find her womanhood and a flame to light her dormant female desire, but, like her father, Malina always seems to pop up and throw her further and further into existentialist crisis in a magnificent ménage à trios of misery that is largely of the mind or as the loony lady states herself, "Its always war...A never-ending war." In one especially telling scene, the protagonist states to her phantasmagoric papa, "Father! This time you'll listen to me!...Have you nothing to say?...I know you...He's no father, he's my murderer!," while in the same scene, the seemingly deranged daddy of death goes from wearing a judge's robe to a bloody butcher's apron to a Nazi uniform, thus personifying everything he was to her at one – her judge, executioner, and very literal Nazi (seeing as Bachmann was Austrian, it is likely her real father was a nazi, thus passing on the guilt to his daughter). In a number of scenes, the protagonist's child self is murdered by her father, but neither she nor her mother succeed in saving the little girl, thus making for an audacious allegory for the annihilation of her femininity during her critical early childhood years and a fallen femininity that she pathologically tries to 'pick up the pieces' of and revisit via her fleeting romance with Ivan and her confrontations with her father, but, in the end, she comes to terms with the fact that her fecundity is forever forlorn.

Towards the conclusion of Malina, the female protagonist states, "I'll know how a condemned man feels," and, indeed, she does as a sort of female Nietzsche and ill-fated 'woman within' who suffers from an impenetrable introversion and an animosity-stirring animus who has so thoroughly taken over her personality that she can no longer differentiate between her 'true self' and the foreboding inner male that lives inside of her, hence the inevitable break in her personality and foreordained self-obliteration. Essentially, an inverse of Werner Schroeter himself – an effeminate homosexual and dandy, neo-Uranian – Isabelle Huppert's character in Malina is certainly someone the director could identify as his "anima" of sorts, hence why the director probably decided to cast the actress to depict himself for his avant-garde autobiographical film Deux (2002), which would be the auteur filmmaker's first film in over a decade after adapting the Bachmann novel. Although dividing film critics and most viewers and failing to win when it was entered into the 1991 Cannes Film Festival, Malina managed to win the German Film Award in Gold. Sort of like a Jungian adaptation of Repulsion (1965) as depicted from inside of the mentally perturbed female protagonist's menacing mind, albeit of the failed feminist flavor and minus the man killings, Malina is undoubtedly one of the most ambitious attempts at deconstructing the darkest abysses of the female psyche, thereupon making the cinematic work a celluloid goldmine for psychoanalysts, obsessive cinephiles, and lapsed feminist/born-again females alike, but will probably prove to be distressing to humorless feminazis, naïve women studies majors, Ingeborg Bachmann purists, and those with a general disdain for anything cinematically abstract. During the beginning of Malina, Huppert's character states quite hysterically, "What quirk of fate brought me to this? It can't be a stranger. It mustn't be for no reason. It would be fraud. It mustn't be true," which is sort of how I felt after first viewing the film a couple years ago, but like most of Werner Schroeter's oeuvre, I cannot help but come back and revisit the cinematic work and get lost in a visual universe where beauty and brutality have found common ground amongst controlled chaos.

THIS NIGHT

While his penultimate work Deux (2002), an avant-garde autobiographical work utilizing female twin sisters to depict his life in a most allegorical way, was arguably his most personal effort, German New Cinema dandy Werner Schroeter's cinematic swansong, This Night (2008) aka Nuit de chien aka Diese Nacht based on the novel Para esta noche (1943) aka Tonight by Uruguayan novelist Juan Carlos Onetti, marked a final attempt at creating a highly personal celluloid mythology while on the brink of death. Beginning with the quote, "Of all the wonders that I yet have heard. It seems to me most strange that men should fear; Seeing that death, a necessary end, Will come when it will come," from William Shakespeare's play The Tragedy of Julius Caesar (1599), This Night follows a failed revolutionary hero named Ossorio (played by gay French actor Pascal Greggory) who returns to his home city of Santa María (a fictional city that was filmed on location in Lisbon and Porto, Portugal) one night in the hope of saving his lover Clara; a woman who the protagonist made the mistake of abandoning to fight for an abstract political cause that only sired failure and defeat. While in an apocalyptic city under the control of a terroristic militia led by a murderous mad man, Ossorio only has one night, "this night," to save the woman he loves, but she seems to be nowhere to be found. Assembled by Schroeter when he was facing the deleterious and debilitating effects of malignant cancer, which the director would finally succumb to in 2008, This Night is as unrelentingly bleak and as decidedly dystopian as films come, so it is no surprise that Christiane Peitz would write in the director's obituary that the film was, "a long journey into darkness, a hymn to life in the face of brutality and terror," as death was at every corner for the determinedly damned dandy who created it. With a brief scene in the beginning of the fatalistic film of a pissing sailor that seems like it was taken straight out of the director's previous work Deux (2002) and his aborted dream film of adapting fag frog novelist Jean Genet's novel Querelle de Brest (1953), This Night subsequently announces with its feverishly foreboding atmosphere that the viewer is about to witness a man's dance with death in the name of love; a love that may be already lost. As Schroeter wrote in his posthumously released autobiography, "All my films, including Tonight, bear witness to my quest for a form that communicates vitality, the pleasure of creativity and beauty, which is a gift of our profession. In beauty, in recognition of beauty resides a hope—malgré tout, despite all. It expresses a hope even though the theme of the film deals with the darkest night aspects of existence ... Without pain and a quest for truth there is no beauty," and, indeed, This Night wallows in nocturnal pulchritude, albeit of the particularly perturbing and pessimistic sort, and a coming to terms with personal pain and those destructive forces that serve to only further that perpetual pang. A fiercely foreboding phantasmagorical neo-noir of the dauntingly dystopian, arthouse sort as only Werner Schroeter could have assembled, This Night reminds the viewer that only when a person can transcend a fear of death can they achieve greatness and create beauty, even in a despairing realm of imminent disintegration.

A lot of things have changed in Santa María since 40-year-old doctor-turned-revolutionary Ossorio left his lover Clara behind to fight in a revolution against the system that ended in abject failure. Apparently, a 'hero of the revolution' among those who know of him, but an enemy of the current state, Ossorio is nothing more than a lone soldier in the city of Santa María; a fallen place where treacherous 'friends' will do anything to save their own hysterical hides, including selling out compatriots to a megalomaniacal dictator named Morasan (Bruno Todeschini), who does not think twice of slaughtering people left and right, as his militia has turned the city into a metropolitan graveyard that is about to be leveled to the ground by leaders on the mainland who want to do away with the renegade city. With a cholera outbreak and a trigger-happy militia going around blowing away beautiful babes and hysterical homos on every corner, Santa María is no longer the majestic Mediterranean metropolis its name hints at. 887 boat tickets exist for those lucky individuals who will be able to leave the virtual necropolis before it is blasted into oblivion and Ossorio plans to make sure he and his sweet Clara leave safely via the boat, hence his sole objective when he made the quasi-suicidal decision to return to Santa María in the first place. Unfortunately, Clara made the mistake of writing and publishing articles in sympathy of a counter-revolutionary named Barcala (Sami Frey), who she temporarily had an affair with, in a newspaper that was described by her dictator detractors as, "an insidiously subversive rag," thus being put on a master list of enemies of the militia, thus the possibility of finding her is dubious at best, or so Ossorio learns on his mission for love and redemption in a city where hatred, treachery, and fear reign supreme. On his rather unpredictable journey into the belly of the beast, Ossorio learns that Clara became the mistress of various other men, though she never found the love she lost when he went and fought in a failed revolution for a utopia that was not meant to be, thus also resulting in a love that was also not meant to be. Against his own will by unfortunate circumstances he cannot control, Ossorio's mission takes a different course and he decides to save a little girl, and after receiving a "going away gift" in the form of two boat tickets from paranoid rebel leader Barcala, he is on the way to completing his mission, but in Santa María, men wear many masks and a former comrade can also be a corrupted enemy, or so the failed revolutionary learns. In This Night, the iconic Schroeter 'diva' is nowhere to be found, even if the film is ominously operatic, thus making the film a rare exception in the filmmaker's cinematic oeuvre. Featuring music by Liszt, Mozart, and Rossini, This Night is Werner Schroeter at his most 'butch' and stoic in a cinematic story where the protagonist has one last chance, during one last night, to sacrifice one's life for love while faced with total uncertainty, as well as accepting responsibility for actions of the past that led to one getting in that particular predicament in the first place.

Interestingly, while This Night both begins and ends with the character of Caesar's dialogue from Shakespeare's The Tragedy of Julius Caesar, "Of all the wonders that I yet have heard. It seems to me most strange that men should fear; Seeing that death, a necessary end, Will come when it will come," Schroeter neglected to add the first sentence of the quote, which is, "Cowards die many times before their deaths; The valiant never taste of death but once." That being said, what Schroeter's opted for leaving out of the quote in This Night is more revealing than what he decided to include, because in many of the director's films, especially his earlier works like Argila (1969) and Eika Katappa (1969), characters perish, only to return in subsequent scenes totally unscathed. Whether these characters were "cowards" or not remains to be seen, but if anything is for sure, it was with his cinematic swansong This Night that Werner Schroeter finally accepted the inevitability of death and braved it stoically in the form of fierce filmic fatalism of the delectably dystopian sort that is effective both on a personal and political level. As someone who was born a month and a day before Germany's unconditional surrender during the Second World War, Werner Schroeter virtually came-of-age in the sort of world he depicts in This Night, so it should be no surprise that a little girl, the director's virtual 'inner-child' as a gay man, is thrown into the madness of a metropolis on the verge of apocalypse. Although not his greatest film, This Night was the natural cinematic conclusion to a life of darkness that sought beauty amongst the chaos.

THE DARJEELING LIMITED

Wes Anderson (2007)

The Darjeeling Limited might be one of Wes Anderson's most beautiful works second to The Life Aquatic. This visionary collage of remarkable colors and spiritual extremes is a testament to the bonding of families, no matter how separated they are. The story line involves three brothers who have been separated from each other for years after their father's death. They are taking a life-changing visit on a train dubbed THE DARJEELING LIMITED. Together on this voyage, they will be involved in many hardships that will either strengthen or break them. Unlike most of Wes Anderson's movies, this one has a big heart. In all of his films, I have seen some character shallowness that limits their feelings to only the same dry humor used in every one of his films, this one however, bathes gloriously in its excess. Instead of being too discreet or loaded over with his quirky vision, this one is just right. It has enough of its own self to fully satisfy you. It has its own blend of humor, sadness, faith, and what a family is supposed to mean. The film is visually striking. Colors are immense and profound. It's hard to not be amazed by this film. The film challenges most of his normal film making with the repetitive soundtrack and film making techniques. The dramatic "zoom-ins" are fewer and are of greater impact and most of the film is steadfast in your head while watching it. The comedy is fertile and fresh. Little quips are given here and there, hereditary is of a greater means in this film. Lots of irony is asunder and heartwarming instances of bonding and even sadness make this film all the better. In some ways, I can even relate to the characters. Nothing is off boundaries. I cannot see Anderson making a film better than this, but I will be open for a surprise just in case. Another thing that is nice to see is the new addition to the Wes Anderson roster, Adrien Brody. He really shines in this film and should lead him to more abundant roles. The Darjeeling Limited is a masterpiece in its own regard. Visually appealing and of the most amazing editing I have seen in a recent film. Every movement by the actor's is a fluid device used to propel the film forward in its luke-warm mood. This is enough to make The Darjeeling Limited one of his greatest films and perhaps his most ambitious film. After seeing his mildly pointless films that mainly exploit a character's traits, it's refreshing to see him exploit their personality other than their habits.

THE LAST HOUSE ON THE LEFT

Wes Craven (1972)

Wes Craven's The Last House on the Left (1972) was one of first "exploitation" style horror films I had ever seen so it is a film that has stuck with me over the years. Not that the film is a masterpiece or anything, but the film was brutal for its time. I always get disgusted watching the film and seeing the criminal Krug, played by "good Jewish boy" (his mother's own words) David Hess playing the role of a criminal "leader." Last House on the Left is full of unflattering nudity and less than sexy sex, unnecessary violence, and just plain "bad" stuff that Craven rubs in the viewer's face with the utmost malice. Wes Craven sure made the right decision when he decided to quit his career as a liberal college professor and take up the career of trash filmmaking. After over 25 years since the original release of Last House on the Left, Craven decided to produce the remake of his own "legendary" film. Obviously, I am not a fan of this continuing trend of horror remakes. That being said, I did not have to think hard to realize that the remake of Last House on the Left is my favorite of these "updating" of horror "classics." Let's face it, the original Last House on the Left was a horribly made and pathetically directed (if you can call it that) film. The power of the film lies in its sometimes realism and brutal nature. Naturally, the bigger budget update of Last House on the Left is fine tuned and more solidly constructed. Of course the remake lacks the "realism" of the original film for a cinema experience that is more "easy on the eyes." The biggest flaw for me in the Last House on the Left remake is Krug. No one can beat David Hess in his ability to play a sociopath criminal. I wouldn't be surprised if Hess had the relatives that were in charge of the Gulags in the Soviet Union. Whereas the Krug in the original Last House on the Left is more of a poor intercity criminal Jew type, the Krug in the update is more of a white trash/trailer park type. Although I hated the new Krug and felt joy during his brutal death, nothing beats the hatred I felt for David Hess. All the other characters, although different, were at least as interesting as the original. I just wish Krug's sidekick bull dyke was more of a carpet muncher in the remake. There are very few things more repulsive than a criminally minded lesbian. Unsurprisingly, my viewing of Last House on the Left, courtesy of mad dog mAQ, was packed with snickering colored folk. Once again, they added much more entertainment to the film. I especially enjoyed it when a certain character in Last House on the Left ends up having his head blown off. During this scene, a black brotha in the audience responded with "dats a crackhead." So, was the remake of Last House on the Left a revolutionary piece of filmmaking? Hell no. The film, however, is a good way to waste just under two hours of your spare time if you have it. I bet my boy Negro smiley enjoyed it.

THE LAST HOUSE ON THE LEFT

Wes Craven (1972)

While A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984) is and almost always has been one of my favorite horror films of all time, I cannot say I was too sad to learn its director Wes Craven recently died in late August 2015 because I am not that big of a fan of his mainstream left-wing politics, dubious philosophies, and completely capitalist approach to filmmaking despite having some discernible talent as a filmmaker and fairly decent taste in cinema (for example, the random lamb featured at the very beginning of A Nightmare on Elm Street is an homage to Luis Buñuel), not to mention the fact that he is largely responsible for turning mainstream horror into a sad, overly self-conscious and masturbatory pseudo-intellectual joke as is especially apparent in the Scream franchise. Indeed, whether it be portraying whites as racist inbred psychopaths who enslave poor nonwhites like in The People Under the Stairs (1991), culturally schizophrenic postcolonial white guilt like in The Serpent and the Rainbow (1988), or the decidedly disgusting negrofication of classic European myths like in Vampire in Brooklyn (1995) where colored comedian Eddie Murphy portrays what is arguably the lamest vampire in cinema history, Craven demonstrated that he was not all that different from his horror compatriot George A. Romero in that he was a slave-morality-oriented leftist ideologue who seemed to care more about disseminating dumbed down quasi-Marcusian and crypto-feminist propaganda and making quirky references to his previous films than directing truly innovative films that take horror cinema out of the genre ghetto that they have been confined to ever since the rise of slasher films. In other words, whereas German Expressionist filmmakers like F.W. Murnau contributed to an artistic movement with their 'horror' films that evolved aesthetically over the years, Craven merely contributed to creating a cinematic product model that he would later play around with in postmodern metacinematic works like Wes Craven's New Nightmare (1994) and Scream (1996), as if the creative potential of the genre had already been extinguished and the only thing left was to direct playful porno films where autistic fanboys could feel special about getting all the various cinephile references to the soulless slasher flicks of yesteryear. Arguably Craven's greatest cinematic crime as a filmmaker was remaking Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman's Jungfrukällan (1960) aka The Virgin Spring into an ineptly directed and exceedingly aesthetically grating exploitation piece known as The Last House on the Left (1972) aka Wes Craven's The Last House on the Left aka Krug and Company aka Grim Company aka Night of Vengeance aka Sex Crime of the Century starring various porno stars, pornographers, and sleazy Hebraic musicians.

Of course, I would be lying if I did not admit that it was one of my favorite Craven flicks, as a genuinely mean and brutal as well as superlatively sleazy piece of nihilistic celluloid that demonstrates that the auteur must have undergone some serious sort of spiritual and philosophical transformation as a highly educated man that was raised in a strict Baptist home and briefly taught as both an English and humanities professor yet would go on to direct some of the most infamous and ugly films of his era. Breaking into the film world by working on “many hardcore X-rated films” (or so he states in the doc Inside Deep Throat (2005) in various capacities under various pseudonyms) after quitting teaching, Craven received his first ‘official’ film credit as the producer of the sexploitation flick Together (1971) starring porn diva Marilyn Chambers (of the Mitchell brother’s Behind the Green Door (1972) and David Cronenberg’s Rabid (1977)) and directed by Sean S. Cunningham, who would reverse roles with his comrade by producing his debut feature The Last House on the Left, which was more or less intended as a means for both men to learn how to make a proper film. Indeed, as Craven once stated as revealed in the book Wes Craven’s Last House On The Left: The Making of a Cult Classic (2000) by David Szulkin, “When Sean Cunningham and I made LAST HOUSE ON THE LEFT, our attitude was that we were going to do this tiny little film for a company in Boston, and it was only going to be shown in two or three theaters up there. Nobody was ever going to see it, and nobody was ever going to know that we did it. So we essentially said, ‘Let’s be as bad boys as we can. We’re going to show things that people have never seen before on a movie screen; we’ll pull out all the stops, and just do whatever the hell we want.’ And by doing this, we were basically going to teach ourselves how to make a feature film.” Needless to say, neither Craven nor Cunningham realized that the exploitation film would pave the way for two of the most popular and monetarily successful slasher franchises ever created: Friday the 13th and A Nightmare on Elm Street. Of course, what separates The Last House on the Left from the two horror franchises is that it deals with gritty visceral horror of the almost cinéma-vérité-like sort as opposed to fanciful entertainment featuring some iconic slasher monster with a goofy costume, thus making for an undeniably unforgettable cinematic work that takes the filmgoer well out of their comfort zone and figuratively holds them at gunpoint for about 90-minutes or so.

Featuring one of the most authentically scummy and degenerate gangs of low-class gutter grade criminals ever captured on cheap 16mm celluloid, especially Jewish Elvis Presley songwriter turned exploitation actor David Hess (who composed a grating folk soundtrack for the film that makes it all the more disturbing), The Last House on the Left is an ugly film about ugly people doing ugly things that is plagued by awkward scenes of comic relief (including various contrived pseudo-intellectual references to so-called women’s liberation, the war of the sexes, Sigmund Freud, and Marxist class warfare), a ludicrous subplot featuring an oddball couple of buffoonish bungling country cops, and some rather bizarre casting choices (for example, a fellow Hebrew named Marc Sheffler portrays Hess' son despite looking about the same age as him), yet it remains an undeniably potent film that permanently burns its ugly essence into one's memory like a traumatic event. Personally, the film certainly gave me the impression that Craven derived a sort of sadistic glee out of beating the viewer over the head with long extended scenes of violence and torture under the pretense of 'enlightening' the filmgoer and making them feel culpable for enjoying Hollywood violence. Of course, the irony is that Craven only ended up debasing himself more than any filmgoer by personally directing such a seemingly misanthropic work (apparently, actress Sandra Peabody was so terrified while shooting the film that she once even walked off the set). While the generic label 'torture porn' is oftentimes used to describe moronically gratuitously violent films like those directed by uniquely talentless Zionist psychopath Eli Roth, Craven's film is certainly the real deal as a work that would probably make a nice little masturbation aid for a budding serial killer, so-called 'Syrian migrant,' or Gaza stationed IDF thug. In other words, The Last House on the Left is not exactly an 'enjoyable' film as a work that takes the label 'horror' quite literally and features realistic figurative 'human monsters' as opposed to literal movie monsters of the fantastic sort.

Indubitably, one of the most effective aspects of The Last House on the Left is that it takes full advantage of the fact that it was made a couple years after the counterculture movement and so-called 'sexual revolution' reared their ugly heads and helped to transform America into the nihilistically hedonistic and culturally pre-apocalyptic multicultural sewer that it is today. Indeed, in the film, two bourgeois-bred teenage girls from sheltered backgrounds who have clearly been brainwashed by the three-headed counterculture scam of sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll decide to go to the big city to procure themselves some premium dope, thereupon encountering some uniquely unsavory criminal elements that make the Manson family seem like a merry tribe of hippie folk musicians. While I can only speculate regarding Craven's intentions with certain aspects of the film, The Last House on the Left certainly makes it seem that the auteur has dubious thoughts regarding the counterculture movement and its rotten fruits in a bitingly ironic scene where three of the killers lie in the bed of the would-be-hippie teenage girl they have just murdered while sipping whiskey and bitching about the fancy silverware of their upper-middle class hosts while a silly peace sign featuring a white dove hangs over their heads. Part social criticism of middle class naivety and part commentary on the atavistic murderous impulses lying dormant in even the most deracinated of oh-so proper bourgeois pussies in a work that depicts class warfare via a mundane middleclass microcosm where both the proletariat and bourgeoisie are completely destroyed in the end, the film is certainly indicative of Craven's lifelong cynicism towards man and human nature in general, hence his appreciation of Bergman. Considering that Craven was an intellectual and ex-academic, the nihilistic message he sends in The Last House on the Left becomes all the more chilling as it reflects the pathetic dead-end path that Judaized American intellectuals had taken at that time. Surely, as his first feature clearly reflects, there is no beauty, spirituality, ideals, or redemption in the hopelessly forsaken world of Wes Craven.

All-too-American teen Mari Collingwood (Sandra Cassel, who previously appeared in softcore porn and sexploitation flicks, including Chuck Vincent's Voices of Desire (1972) and Gerri Sedley's Teenage Hitchhikers (1975)) is celebrating her 17th birthday and her rather respectable caring parents, Dr. John Collingwood (Richard Towers aka Gaylord St. James of Andy Milligan's Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1973) and Doris Wishman's Deadly Weapons (1974)) and Estelle Collingwood (Cynthia Carr), are worried about the fact that she will be heading to the big city with a questionable friend named Phyllis Stone (porn star Lucy Grantham, who appeared in Shaun Costello's Loops (1973)) to see some degenerate rock band play. Of course, Mari and her friend also plan to use their trip to the city as an excuse to score some good dope. Needless to say, Mari's parents are also not too happy with the fact that she proudly refuses to wear a bra and that her hard nipples are plainly noticeable to her fairly old fashioned father's eyes. Before leaving, Mari's parents give her a special peace symbol necklace for her birthday that will later play an important role in the film's story line. On the way to the concert, Mari and Phyllis hear an emergency broadcast on the radio about a prison escape involving a blood-lusting sadist named Krug Stillo (David A. Hess), his dopey dopesick bastard junky son Junior Stillo (Marc Sheffler), a suave child-molesting pollack sex criminal named Fred 'Weasel' Podowski (prolific porn star turned pornographer Fred J. Lincoln, who also appeared in Milligan's Fleshpot on 42nd Street), and a savage 'animal-like' bull-dyke named Sadie (Jeramie Rain, who was married to Hollywood star Richard Dreyfuss), though it clearly never crosses the girls' minds that they might actually encounter the fugitives.

While Mari and Phyllis do not think anything of the radio broadcast, they are ultimately kidnapped upon randomly encountering Junior Stillo by happenstance while walking around the seedy side of town, assuming he is a dope dealer due to his sloppy appearance and peculiar heroin-induced mannerisms, and foolishly attempting to buy drugs from him. While Junior is nowhere near as depraved as his father Krug and his misfit minions, he decides to take advantage of the situation because he knows that his father will reward him with heroin for his efforts, so he leads the two unwitting teens back to the gang's apartment by declaring he has "an extra ounce of good stuff" from the exotic South American hellhole of Colombia. Needless to say, the two girls are instantly kidnapped after Junior leads them into the apartment and immediately locks the deadbolt on the door. While Phyllis attempts to reason with the big mean ugly career criminals after making a failed attempt to bolt out of the apartment door, she fails to realize that her contrived middleclass morality and weak and unrealistic hippie Weltanschauung is totally irrelevant to decidedly debauched souls who long ago disposed of any inkling of morality that they might have had left. Ultimately, Phyllis' naive rant results in her being the victim of a bisexual gang-rape that is perpetrated by Krug, Weasel, and Sadie. After the non-consensual orgy, Krug and crew lock their victims in their car trunk and begin driving to the countryside where they unwittingly choose a route that will ultimately get them all killed in the end. Meanwhile, at the wholesome Collingwood home, Mari's mom and dad decorate the house with items in tribute to the teen's birthday.

After Krug and company open the car trunk, Mari soon notices that she is right next to her family home when she sees her mailbox with her name written on the side in tribute to her birthday. A born fighter, Phyllis foolishly bites Krug on the hand when he opens the trunk. When Krug makes the deranged demand to Phyllis, "Piss your pants. I said, piss your pants!" and she fails to comply, they coerce her into soiling herself by stabbing Mari until she does it. At this point, Junior becomes somewhat upset by what he sees and self-righteously states in an unintentionally humorous way while slurring his words like a dime store dope fiend, "You're gonna kill someone if you're not careful! You guys got to be crazy, man!" and then recommends to Krug, "Make them make it with each other." Indeed, following the age old hippie motto "make love, not war" in a somewhat ironic way, the degenerate criminals force Phyllis and Mari to engage in forced dyke degeneracy in what is arguably the most awkward, anti-erotic, and unnerving sex scene ever filmed, which is accented by a grating ballad by Mr. Hess. Naturally, at this point, Mari begins losing her mind, so Phyllis attempts to comfort her while fondling her unclad body by stating, "It's just you and me here; nobody else." After the forced Sapphic sex, Krug leaves Weasel to watch the girls, so Phyllis comes up with the idea to run away so as to create a diversion so that Mari can get to safety and call the police. After Phyllis begins running through the woods while Weasel and Sadie are chasing after her, Mari attempts to ply Junior by giving him her new peace necklace, rechristening him the hippie 'Willow,' and promising to give him methadone that her doctor father supposedly has. Meanwhile, Phyllis manages to evade Sadie by hitting her in the head with a rock and calling her a "stupid dyke," but Krug eventually catches up with her in the fitting location of a graveyard where he and his crazed criminals cut her up with a machete and even go so far as to pull her innards out in a zombie-esque fashion. While Junior aka 'Willow' eventually reluctantly agrees to help Mari escape, Krug and company soon catch up with them. After Krug gleefully informs her that Phyllis did not manage to escape, Mari more or less gives up and accepts her deplorable fate. On top of torturing her by carving up her body and writing his name in her chest, Krug rapes Mari for no more than a minute before pathetically shooting his load. Knowing that she is about to die, Mari proceeds to say a prayer while Krug and his comrades seem genuinely ashamed of the abhorrent crimes that they have just committed together. In what is indubitably one of the most strikingly melancholic murder scenes in horror history, Mari slowly and meekly walks into a lake where Krug proceeds to put a couple bullets in her brain once she is almost fully submerged in the water.

In what is one of the most psychologically satisfying, if not all too convenient and somewhat unlikely, twists of horror cinema history, Krug and his friends unwittingly decide to seek sanctuary in the home of Mari's parents while pretending to be respectable 'plumbing insurance' salesmen whose car broke down. Of course, any moron can see that their cheap suits cannot hide the fact that Krug and his friends are uncultivated lowlifes who seem like they slithered out of some slimy cesspool in Brooklyn. Meanwhile, in a fairly inappropriate and unequally mundane subplot that provides ridiculously cheesy comic relief intermediately throughout the film, a morbidly obese Sheriff (Marshall Anker) and his much younger and dumber Deputy (Martin Kove of Paul Bartel's Death Race 2000 (1975) and The Karate Kid (1984)) try in vain to locate Phyllis and Mari while attempting to hitchhike after they run out of gas while driving their patrol car. While hanging out in Mari's room after being placed there by her parents, Krug soon realizes whose home he is at after finding a couple photos of Mari and jovially remarks to Weasel while seemingly delighted by the revelation that he is exploiting the kindness and generosity of the parents of the girl he has just killed, "I wonder what the odds are on that." Of course, it does not take Mari's parents too long to figure out who they are really harboring in their home. Indeed, when Junior begins vomiting in a bathroom toilet because Krug refuses to give him any dope to cure his drug withdrawal, Mari's mother notices that the absent-minded junky is wearing the same exact peace necklace that she and her husband gave their daughter the day before. To confirm her worst worries, Mari's mother decides to go through her guests' suitcases and discovers soiled clothing with her daughter's blood on it. After discovering the bloody clothing, Dr. Collingwood and his wife run outside and soon find the freshly killed corpse of their daughter near a lake next to their house.

At this point, the devastated parents decide to dispose of their bourgeois moralities and exact revenge on the killers of their daughter. Indeed, after setting up various booby-traps around their house, Estelle manages to easily seduce blatant pervert Weasel while her hubby decides to corner Krug and Sadie in the dark in the room where they're sleeping. After luring Weasel outside under the pretense of fulfilling an ostensible sex fantasy involving giving him a blowjob while his hands are tied behind his back, Estelle first pretends to accidentally get the sex criminal's penis caught in his zipper and then proceeds to suck on his cock, but the oral pleasure does not last long. Indeed, pernicious pervert Weasel, who just previously had a premonition of his own demise in a nightmare where Dr. Collingwood and his wife hammer out his teeth with a chisel, gets his just deserts in the form of fatal fellatio where Estelle bites off his boner and then leaves him to bleed out while he still has his hands tied around his back. Meanwhile, Dr. Collingwood and Krug get in a brawl where the latter eventually begins overpowering the former. When Junior attempts to put a stop to everything by pulling a gun on his father, Krug hatefully states to his son, "I want you to take the gun and put it in your mouth and BLOW YOUR BRAINS OUT." Apparently, father knows best as Krug does indeed convince his son to blow his brains out. Luckily, after a long extended fight scene between the two similarly swarthy dudes, Dr. Collingwood manages to murder Krug with a chainsaw just as the local sheriff arrives. At about the same time her husband slaughters Krug, Estelle manages to slit Sadie's throat with her own knife after she accidentally falls in the family pool. Unlike in Bergman's The Virgin Spring, there is no real sense of redemption at the conclusion of The Last House on the Left as a work where the bad guys might perish in the end, but also where the good guys succumb to savagery and are assumedly ultimately emotionally and spiritually destroyed by their uncharacteristic behavior.

Admittedly, although a lot of the horror films that I cherished as a child and teenager, especially those directed by Craven and his contemporary George A. Romero, really do not do much for me anymore aside from providing a little bit of worthless nostalgia, I have to confess that The Last House on the Left proved to be just as brutal and unpleasant to me on a recent viewing as it did when I first saw it about fifteen years ago. Indeed, I would argue that, for better or worse, Craven's first feature is unequivocally one of the greatest and most important exploitation films ever made, as a work that exposed the inept silliness of a kosher clown like Herschell Gordon Lewis and ultimately proved that films could assault and implicate audience filmgoers by forcing them to wallow in the ugliness of violence, rape, and murder. In fact, this was Craven's intention with the film, or as the auteur stated in his audio commentary track for the 2009 MGM DVD release of The Last House on the Left, "My justification was that I wanted to show something about violence that was...quite nasty and ugly and protracted...That, you know, if you were in an ugly situation of violence in real-life you did not have the benefit of a cutaway or fading to black or anything like that...So these scenes were really designed or approached in a way that you would not cutaway, you would not stop, you would not cut to ten minutes later, you would just have to be there...And, in that sense, the audience was kind of suckered in. They came in thinking they're going to see a scary movie that was entertainment and ended up, in a way, being implicated by being there." While I Spit on Your Grave (1978) feels like a sort of proto-torture-porn flick without a soul where Israeli director Meir Zarchi seemed to derive some sort of sadistic pleasure from the degeneracy he depicted, Craven's film is equipped with a kind of suffocating (anti)humanism where the viewer is forced to feel the pain of both the victim and victimizer, which is not something the average Hollywood-spooned filmgoer was prepared to deal with, hence the outrage the film caused upon its release (on top of being banned several times in the UK and being completely banned in Australia for 32 years, prints of the film were oftentimes sent back to the distributor in pieces as a result of angry outraged theater owners chopping them up).

On top of being one of the greatest exploitation films ever made as a work that truly tested the bounds of cinematic brutality, The Last House on the Left inspired a lot of great, similarly sleazy celluloid due to its unexpected commercial and even critical success (somewhat shockingly, Roger Ebert, who was deeply offended by David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986), gave Craven's film three and a half stars out of four and described it as a "tough, bitter little sleeper of a movie that's about four times as good as you'd expect"). Indeed, Roger Watkins' Last House on Dead End Street (1977), Guerdon Trueblood's The Candy Snatchers (1973), Pasquale Festa Campanile's Hitch-Hike (1977) aka AutoStop rosso sangue starring David Hess, and Ruggero Deodato's The House on the Edge of the Park (1980) aka La casa sperduta nel parco (also starring Hess) are just a couple of the worthwhile exploitation films that would probably not exist were it not for Craven's little pseudo-snuff horror-melodrama, which feels like what might have happened if a more hardcore John Cassavetes attempted to rework Sam Peckinpah's Straw Dogs (1971) using truly grizzled and debauched porn stars for an audience of prison inmates who were being trained to be a special secret Dirlewanger Brigade-esque military unit for the U.S. government. While patently pointless, the 2009 The Last House on the Left remake, which was shamelessly co-produced by Craven and Cunningham, is at least superior to most horror remakes, though it is far too polished and superficial to capture even a tiny inkling of the aesthetically pernicious essence of the original film. As a longtime fan of both Craven's film and its inspiration The Virgin Spring, I like to think each film is symbolic of their respective nation's culture, with The Last House on the Left reflecting the boorish brutality and deracinated post-Faustian cultural retardation of the mongrelized United States and Bergman's film reflecting the height of Swedish (and, in turn, Nordic) high cinema and culture at that particular time (of course, with its influx of barbaric Muslim untermenschen third worlders over the past couple decades, Sweden has become the rape capital of Europe and is thus becoming more in tune with Craven's film, albeit even worse due to the culturally apocalyptic racial dynamic). While The Virgin Spring portrays a somewhat spiritually schizophrenic world where post-viking pagan Europe was beginning to embrace Christianity, Craven's film portrays a nihilistic era of self-destructive collective hedonism where sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll had replaced Christianity. As a lapsed Southern Baptist that was brought up in a strict religious family (apparently, he based 'Krug' on his own father, who he deeply feared and resented, hence his loathing of all things 'patriarchy' and special affinity for creating absurdly strong female characters) who eventually became a left-wing academic and self-loathing pornographer (notably, he refused to ever reveal all the fuck flicks he worked on), Craven seemed to realize the precarious place the world was heading as most obviously reflected in The Last House on the Left and, somewhat curiously, his porn flicks like The Fireworks Woman (1975) aka Angela Is the Fireworks, which he directed under the pseudonym 'Abe Snake' and which features various forms of surreal and allegorical nihilistic (anti)religious iconography. Of course, considering the visceral nihilistic spirit of his debut feature and the later hyper materialism of his filmmaking career as reflected in all the horrendous corporate horror flicks that he directed and/or produced during the last couple decades of his life, I think it is safe to say that Craven never found solace when he died, thereupon making him, at least in some metaphysical ways, not unlike the forsaken villains of The Last House on the Left who went to the grave plagued with guilt and sin.

THE FIREWORKS WOMAN

Probably out of all the film genres, none attracts more whores, pimps, gangsters, crooks, swindlers, shysters, morons, and just plain untalented hacks and frauds than the horror genre and I say that as a lifelong horror fan who is always looking out for a decent or at least somewhat entertaining slice of celluloid fear. While he has directed at least one masterpiece, A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984), as well as various classics like The Last House on the Left (1972), The Hills Have Eyes (1977), The People Under the Stairs (1991), and Wes Craven's New Nightmare (1994), horror auteur Wes Craven has produced even more dumbfounding duds, phony hack pieces, pseudo-intellectual leftist jerk-off-fests, superlatively shallow 'subtextual' satires, and shockingly horrendous 'for-hire' hack works, thus making him a filmmaker that is equally loved and hated by fans of the genre. Of course, Craven's personal life and professional history is ultimately much more curious than the uniquely inexplicable unevenness of his oeuvre lets on. Although raised in a strict Baptist household, Craven, like his contemporary George A. Romero, came of age during the counter-culture era and clearly received a Frankfurt School-approved lobotomy with him even working as an English and Humanities professor after receiving a graduate degree in Philosophy and Writing at John Hopkins University before trying his hand at a potentially lucrative career in horror filmmaking, which eventually became quite a success, but not before dabbling in the then-booming world of celluloid pornography. To Craven's ostensible artistic credit, he managed to employ his newly-found college-induced liberal humanist atheist Weltanschauung in these early works, or as John Kenneth Muir noted in his book Wes Craven: The Art of Horror (2004) regarding the nihilistic nature of Craven's exceedingly loose exploitation remake of Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman's masterpiece The Virgin Spring (1960): "Terrible things happen to innocent people in THE LAST HOUSE ON THE LEFT with regularity and even so-called "good people" such as the Collingwoods easily resort to brutal violence and bloodlust. Although Mari prays to God before she is murdered, in a scene staged in an almost identical fashion to Karin's rape and murder in THE VIRGIN SPRING, there is no salvation for her or redemption for her fallen parents. Unlike the Tores in THE VIRGIN SPRING, the Collingwoods are not enlightened in the finale by the existence of God or an awareness of divine method [...] The camera does not swoop heavenward to give the impression God is watching because in Craven's film. God is dead."

Indeed, on top of defiling a Bergman masterpiece and turning to proto-torture-porn of the savagely sadistic, if not nonetheless undeniably enthralling sort, Craven also proved he had a knack for indoctrinating the viewer with his quasi-existentialist philosophy via cinema's most aesthetically disreputable genre.

What few people realize, aside from horror/exploitation cinephiles, is that despite its already aberrant, sexually graphic and foully fetishistic essence, The Last House on the Left was originally intended as a hardcore porn flick and that Craven began his career in the seedy mafia-ridden porn world, even working in some capacity on Gerard Damiano's crossover 'porn chic'-launching classic Deep Throat (1972). Despite the black cat being out of the bag in regard to his fucked film career, Craven has been quite, well, craven, regarding his early years in the blue movie world, with him only admitting in the doc Inside Deep Throat (2005): "that he had made "many hardcore X-rated films" under various pseudonyms, and luckily at least a few of his filmic excursions into erotica have been positively identified. Indeed, aside from receiving his very first film credit as a co-producer on his early collaborator Sean S. Cunningham's barely soft core pseudo-documentary Together (1971) starring porn diva Marilyn Chambers of Behind the Green Door (1972), Craven co-wrote, edited, directed, and starred in the quite oneiric and vaguely avant-garde incest-themed porn flick The Fireworks Woman (1976) aka Angela Is the Fireworks Woman aka Angela, The Fireworks Woman aka The Fireworks Man under the pseudonym 'Abe Snake.' A fellow with the seemingly pseudonymous Nordic name Hørst Badörties was also responsible for co-penning and acting as the cinematographer for the film. While not exactly a master work, even where pornography is concerned, Craven's piece of unintentionally corny carnal celluloid, which was curiously directed in between Last House on the Left and The Hills Have Eyes, is a sometimes interesting formative piece from a budding auteur who, like Orson Welles protegee Gary Graver with 3 A.M. (1975), somehow thought he could reconcile the heavy philosophical melodramas of Ingmar Bergman with lackluster unsimulated hardcore works featuring homely longhaired hippie-like people, including the auteur himself as the eponymous 'fireworks man' of the film's alternate title. The superlatively sordid and sacrilegious story of an incestuous young girl who, when not being defiled and molested by various people of all ages and both genders, attempts to vie for the love of her brother who is entering the priesthood, The Fireworks Woman is also notable for being Craven's most overtly anti-Christian and, somewhat paradoxically, most experimental work to date (indeed, the film features much heavy-handed symbolism, like a bible being rained on).

Beginning with a post-hippie Dionysian orgy presided over by auteur Wes Craven himself featuring a bunch of debauched beatniks running around waving fireworks and dancing in a seemingly demonic fashion, The Fireworks Woman then introduces pervert protagonist Angela (Jennifer Jordan aka 'Sarah Nicholson', who started in off-off-Broadway productions and would go on to star in Joseph W. Sarno flicks like Misty (1976)), who narrates about how she is deeply in love with her big brother Peter (Eric Edwards) of various porn chic classics, including Bo Derek's husband John Derek's artsy fuck flick Love You! (1979), the Amero Brothers' Blonde Ambition (1981), and various Cecil Howard flicks), who shares his sister's feelings but thinks he's more in love with Mary Magdalene and enters the priesthood. Set in a seaside Bergman-esque landscape that has an almost otherworldly feel that is as ominous as it is orgasmic, Craven's film features an esoterically erotic realm of the ridiculously risqué sort where Catholicism seems to be the only real vice, with the orgasm seemingly the most holy and transcendental of states, as if cumming is the closest way one can get to god. A seemingly Satanic beauty played by auteur Wes Craven, who sports a gothic top hat and resembles a sort of counterculture Edgar Allan Poe (though not as much as gay pornographer Peter De Rome, who incidentally directed a psychedelic homo hardcore horror reworking of Poe's 1839 short story William Wilson under the title The Destroying Angel (1976) the same year as Craven's fuck film was released), seems to be the one that is responsible for Angela's sensually hypnotic powers and he is never that far away from the protagonist. Angela apparently has the ambiguously magical power to sexually attract any person, no matter their gender or sexual persuasion, that has the (mis)fortune of crossing her seemingly erotically magnetic path, hence her brother's reluctant love for her. As Angela states of her and her brother, "we loved each other as children and nothing else matters" and "Nothing mattered to me but our love...it didn't matter to me then and it doesn't matter to me now that we were brother and sister." While Peter would have sex with his sister in the past, he would get angry and violent afterward as depicted in a post-coitus flashback scene where he smacks Angela in the face and indignantly declares, "this is all you're doing Angela...this would have never happened if you did not force yourself upon me. I want you to stay out of my life. And don't you ever try to see me." Of course, that doesn't stop Angela from seeing him, as she shows up at his church and confesses her love for her big brother in the confession booth, who declares her selfless and demands that she "submerge" herself "in serving others," which she subsequently does.

Indeed, Angela goes to work for a wealthy blonde blueblood bitch named Elizabeth Walters (Erica Eaton of the Amero Brothers' Every Inch a Lady (1975) and Gerard Damiano's The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue (1980)) who treats her worse than a dog and introduces her to the masochistic side of bisexual sadomasochism where she is forced to be the pretty little plaything of her boss and said boss' ugly dork friend. In a scene anticipating the blowjob-turned-castration scene in Last House on the Left, Angela smokes a man's pole so hard he screams like a wounded, dying animal. Of course, it does not take long before Angela is trying to blow her brother again and she even tells him to quit the Catholic Church because "they don't want or need you...they're vicious. They're hypocrites," but of course he just gets angry and kicks her out of the confession booth. Looking to escape, Angela sets sail for literal paradise and in a rather heretical dream-sequence, the protagonist is featured naked against the sail of her sailboat in a crucified position with the heavens beaming down on her body, which then dissolves to an otherworldly shot of brother Peter also naked and in a Christ-like position standing in front of a completely white background. Indeed, director Craven seems to be implying the old real heaven is hedonism. While sailing on her somewhat small sailboat 'The Mystique,' Angela falls overboard and almost drowns, but luckily two bourgeois degenerates, Celeste (Helen Madigan of Jonas Middleton's Illusions of a Lady (1974) and Radley Metzger's Naked Came the Stranger (1975)) and her seemingly mute boy toy, salvage her from the water and the three begin a menage a trios involving banal barnyard buggery and communal cocksucking which the protagonist blasphemously describes as "some sort of communion between us." In what is easily the most degenerate scene of the film, Angela is brutally raped by a rather repulsive redneck fisherman credited as 'Fisherman in Red' (Lefty Cooper), who sexually pillages the young lady on ice covered with dead fish (I don't want to give Craven too much credit, but it seems he was attempting a pornographic pun with this scene, thus demonstrating the director's graduate degree came in handy). After raping Angela, the red-coated redneck flicks his cum at her, calls her a "cunt", and then adds insult to injury by asking her, "you liked it, didn't you?"

Of course, even with all the physical, emotional, and sexual trauma she has suffered, Angela still cannot get over her brother and his cock, though she has some pretty perturbing nightmares involving her bro, Ms. Walters, and the redneck fisherman beating her. By simply taking a bath, Angela seems to be cleansed of her trauma and proceeds to diddle herself while thinking about being penetrated by her brother Peter's peter. Meanwhile, Peter suffers a highly sensual nightmare involving his sister giving him a blow job while she is sporting a medieval monk outfit. Eventually, Angela begins being stalked by a sneering and seemingly pernicious cigar-smoking degenerate named Nicholas Burns (director Wes Craven), who has actually been secretly following her around for the entire movie in a top hat, although he is dressed in plain clothes when he approaches the protagonist. To get her brother's attention, Angela decides to hold a party involving the congregation of Peter's church. Of course, the Svengali-like character played by Mr. Craven calls Peter to let him know about his sister's swinging fuck-fest and then laughs afterwards in a maniacal manner not that unlike Freddy Krueger. After seeing his completely unclad sister being communally groped by about a dozen or so equally unclad people (including porn chic's leading Semitic screen psychopath Jamie Gillis), Peter decides to throw away the cloth and sail away to paradise with his sister. In a quite fitting end twist, it is revealed that Peter's fat old priest mentor who partially influenced him to quit the church and get with his sister is really the seemingly demonic character played by Craven.

Undoubtedly, it seems auteur Wes Craven's anti-Catholic Baptism upbringing suited him well when it came to directing a fuck flick that seems to rejoice in mocking Catholicism, but more importantly, it demonstrates that the auteur is a much darker dude than most of his largely horrendous and unintentionally hokey horror films would have us believe. After all, NYC crackhead auteur Abel Ferrara has no problem owning up to the fact that his first feature was the hardcore flick 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy which, unlike Craven's film, features the director engaging in some rather kitschy unsimulated action (not to mention the fact that Ferrara also sports a goofy grey wig). Indeed, as the mensch responsible for such mediocre garbage as Invitation to Hell (1984), The Hills Have Eyes Part II (1985), Vampire in Brooklyn (1995), and My Soul to Take (2010), among other largely worthless and weak mainstream garbage, Craven certainly has nothing to really be ashamed of with The Fireworks Woman, which is essentially a slightly above average and shockingly original and well directed work from the porn chic era. One thing I found particularly interesting about the horror auteur's somewhat idiosyncratic blue movie is that most of the 'adult performers' in the film also worked with the Amero Brothers, whose early experimental psychedelic-gothic fuck flick Bacchanale (1971) starring blonde dime-store diva Uta Erickson, seems to have not only influenced The Fireworks Woman in terms of its central sister-brother incest theme, but also Craven's subsequently surrealist horror works, most specifically A Nightmare on Elm Street, which contains dark and shadowy nightmare realms as haunted by an ominous figure with discernibly dubious motives. Of course, more than anything, Craven's fuck flick proves that superior pornographers like the Amero Brothers and Cecil Howard could just as likely have entered the mainstream had things worked out for them differently. In its own way, The Fireworks Woman is more of an 'auteurist' work, as it reveals more about Craven and his vices, fetishes, religious views, and political views than Scream (1996), thus making it mandatory viewing for both fans and anti-fans alike of mainstream horror cinema's biggest unholy whore. Of course, any fuck flick directed by Wes Craven and featuring Jamie Gillis—the virtual David Hess of the Golden Age of Porn—is also mandatory viewing for any semi-serious subversive cinephile. Certainly, The Fireworks Woman has given me a new found respect for Craven, though I guess that does not say much considering I see the filmmaker as one of the most shamelessly money-motivated men of the horror genre as a clearly talented fellow who has a pathetic propensity for churning out vapid celluloid swill with his name on it despite being responsible for directing some of the most recognizable horror and exploitation films of his zeitgeist.

THE HILLS HAVE EYES

Wes Craven (1977)

I once read in an article on the original film that Craven was considered an "angry" director of his time. Apparently, Wes Craven had a message to show but i don't recall seeing anything of interest in any of his films except the same formula of teenagers dying. Craven has proved over the years, that his films more or less stay exactly the same, just with bigger budgets.1. Contrived dribble and annoying dialogue coming from current generation hipsters (I.E. Last House of the Left, The Hills Have Eyes, and the more recent Scream)2. Vulnerable women being exploited and has some direct connection with the proposed climax victory. (I.E. Most of them)3. Most of them are a spineless attack on Rural America. Whether it be the mildly "redneck"ish Billy from Scream, or the Inbred cannibals from The Hills Have Eyes. Regardless of the context or characters, Craven attempts to make you fear non-residential zones. After seeing the amazing re-vamp of Craven's said-to-be masterpiece, I had to see what all the fuss was about. Upon purchasing the film, I was greeted my Michael Berryman's huge face on the DVD. This shocks me as he is not the main villain, let alone a decently memorable one. If i wanted to watch something awkward run around speaking in tongues, I'd revisit the much better Coneheads. The film had originally been given an X rating. At first i was puzzled because last i checked, this film was less violent than any Saturday morning cartoon. Before you might doubt my opinion due to some notion leading you to the theory that i don't like this film due to the lack of brutality, re-envision this film. Ridiculous and retarded, even Craven didn't fully know how to direct with this film. The burning father scene was laughable at best. The camera placement in front of a fire in order to create the illusion of him "burning alive" gave me explosive diarrhea. Hillbillies bleed tomato soup and girls in shock prove to be less annoying than they used to be. Aja's remake not only bested the original material, but also took the nuclear aspect and in turn, had a better "commentary". I prefer them to blame science than lumberjacks. Wes Craven is not a master of horror (He got lucky with NOES) and it's a shame that most of the films he "Presents" are the better material. All in all, this film has not aged well. It is in dire need of being stripped of its "cult" status. I hope Craven becomes a "human French fry"

A NIGHTMARE ON ELM STREET
A NIGHTMARE ON ELM STREET

Wes Craven (1984)

If I were to only choose one film that has remained as potent as it was when I first saw it during my preschool years, it would undoubtedly be Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984); a surrealist slasher flick with a charismatic killer who – in terms of depth of personality and bloodlust – shreds all of his mass-murdering human-monster buddies to celluloid pieces. Unlike retarded-mute slasher killers like Mikey Myers, Jay Vorhees, and Pleatherface, Freddy Krueger is a mass-murderer who takes prides in his ability to execute a variety of quasi-illusionary psychodramas and phantasmagorical killings. Like in the much anticipated but dreadfully disappointing movie Freddy vs. Jason (2003), Herr Krueger would indubitably manipulate and ultimately enslave his rival slasher killers. But enough with the redundant and totally irrelevant philistine fanboy gibberish, A Nightmare on Elm Street is much more than a great horror/slasher flick; it is a film that holds its own outside the hopelessly formulaic and schlock-based genre. Not since the delightful daydream delirium days of German expressionism has a film given so much mystique to a malevolent monster-man who finds solace amongst the shadows. Whereas German expressionist films turned reality into nightmare, A Nightmare on Elm Street sliced the seams of daytime and dreams in a manner that has brought psychological unrest to generations of moviegoers. To this day, I have fond memories from my childhood of my little sister waking up in the middle of the night and screaming in fear that Freddy K. would swallow her soul. The wonderful thing about dreams is that no matter how horrible they may be, one ultimately rests with the comfort of knowing that they will eventually awake and the subconscious constructed pseudo-reality is no more. What makes A Nightmare on Elm Street so particularly unsettling to the human mind is that self-assured insurance policy of mind-made REM is severed, thus opening a deluge of unimaginable possibilities during the most incapacitated of moments. Of course, as portrayed in A Nightmare on Elm Street (and its various uneven sequels), cunning Krueger creates a variety of scenarios for his physically and psychologically petrified victims, hence the all-around originality of the franchise in general. What makes the original A Nightmare on Elm Street the greatest film in the series is that, unlike the less serious sequels, the horror is less tongue-in-cheek and more finger-knife-in-gut.

Although contrary to mainstream-media-formed public opinion, the baby boomers are easily the most pathetic and hopelessly degenerate generation in all of American history. Of course, subsequent generations of Americans have proven to be even less morally-inclined and spiritually-sound but it was the baby boomer generation that originally deracinated itself from what was considered sacred among the generations before it. The teens featured in A Nightmare on Elm Street are the first lost generation of children from the aimless, morally irresponsible and careless baby boomer crowd. In fact, before being tortured and murdered by his parent comrades, Freddy Krueger was also a baby boomer. Epitomizing the worst qualities of baby boomers to the most pathetic extreme, Mr. Krueger – a man-child in a state of infinite-infantilism and clearly bound only to self-gratification at whatever cost – treated children as his own person playthings that he used and abused before disposing them like a child does to broken toys. The virginal grade school children in white that jump rope to the infamous Freddy nursery rhyme (One, two, Freddy's coming for you...) in A Nightmare on Elm Street and its sequels are ghostly reminders of Freddy's one-entity campaign to destroy the pure and innocent. As explained by Marge, the alcoholic mother of female protagonist Nancy Thompson in the original A Nightmare on Elm Street, Freddy Krueger was murdered by (rightfully) vengeful parents after he was freed on a technicality after killing over 20 children during the late 1960s. The children of this suburban mob would go on to pay for the sins of the father (and mother), so to speak. What I find most interesting and telling about the parents in A Nightmare on Elm Street and its sequels is that no matter how many of their children are sadistically slaughtered, they stay committed to total ignorance and denial as if they all suffer from a permanent blindness of the mind. Nancy's mother is an alcoholic, Tina's mother is a shameless whore, and Rod's parents are nowhere to be found. Wes Craven, a baby boomer with a strict Baptist upbringing who would go on to be a director of hardcore pornography (before his horror filmmaking days), certainly personifies the "loss of innocence" his generation is well known for to a quite notable degree, thus no other person could have been more suitable for the direction of A Nightmare on Elm Street than he.

On top of telling a unique story, A Nightmare on Elm Street features some of the most iconic and marvelous murders ever featured in a horror film. From the first anti-gravity killing of Tina Gray by a seemingly invisible killer to Freddy's bodily dismemberment of Nancy's boyfriend Glen Lantz in his own bed, A Nightmare on Elm Street thankfully ignores all of the clichés of the slasher genre. Of course, A Nightmare on Elm Street writer and director Wes Craven was no comic-book-addicted philistine like his mostly incompetent compatriots as he was an English professor before he ever sat in a director's chair. Craven has acknowledged that the lone sheep featured in the opening dream-sequence of A Nightmare on Elm Street was his tribute to Spanish surrealist auteur Luis Buñuel. I found the killing of Tina to be somewhat reminiscent of the absurdist wall-crawling featured in French poet auteur Jean Cocteau's early work The Blood of a Poet (1930). Before directing A Nightmare on Elm Street, Craven directed an extremely loose remake, Last House on the Left (1972), of Swedish master filmmaker Ingmar Bergman's The Virgin Spring (1960). If future horror filmmakers can learn anything from the early films of Wes Craven, it is that a deep knowledge of film history can go a long way in the concocting of a truly dis-tingt macabre movie. I certainly cannot think of another film aside from Philip Ridley's extremely underrated cinematic gem The Reflecting Skin (1990) that has been created within the past 25+ years that deserves to be compared to A Nightmare on Elm Street (although some could argue that the Candyman of the 1992 film Candyman is the "Negro Freddy Krueger").

Although created nearly three decades ago, A Nightmare on Elm Street still proves to be one of the greatest landmarks in American horror cinema history. The legacy of Freddy Krueger may have been beaten to death by a number of A Nightmare on Elm Street sequels, a tedious TV-series (Freddy's Nightmares) and an endless bombardment of consumer memorabilia (a phenomenon Craven responded to with the reflective 1994 film Wes Craven's New Nightmare) yet the burned phantasm in the red and green sweater still remains one of the greatest and most memorable villains of cinema history. A Nightmare on Elm Street is also probably the only film featuring Johnny Depp where the much celebrated character-actor's performance is one of the less interesting attributes of the film. The distinct cinematic quality of A Nightmare on Elm Street only becomes all the more clear after watching the blatantly blasphemous 2010 remake; a cinematic abomination that makes the remake of Friday the 13th seem like the holy grail of slasher cinema. I just hope the A Nightmare on Elm Street franchise is not bastardized and beaten-to-death to the point where Freddy finds himself fingering Madonna or Lindsay Lohan (with unrestrained and overly "ambitious" fanboy horror hack directors like Rob Zombie, anything is possible). Whatever the future holds for the A Nightmare on Elm Street franchise, nothing can extinguish the uncanny yet strangely comforting hallucinatory horror of the original 1984 movie.

SHOCKER

Wes Craven (1989)

Ostensibly, Shocker is one of Wes Craven's most accessible film on DVD shelves thanks to double feature packs. This of course, is how I came about viewing both The People Under the Stairs and the aforementioned Shocker. Shocker is one of Craven's experimental films, per say. He equips many new tactics in film making, tactics influencing an ability to craft a custom rock soundtrack around the film and present undiscovered film thematics. As far as 80s modern horror goes, Shocker is avant-garde cheese. Craven rejects reality and creates 80s archetypes with their high school football and perfect suburban lives. When a mysterious family-killer slays his family after our he dreams it (Predates the entire beginning of Final Destination), he realizes he has a psychic link to the killer. After identifying him and his execution, he becomes a technological being capable of transferring through air waves and instruments of electricity. Think pre-Ghost in the Machine, but quirkier. A 2009 remake of this film has already been eyed by producers looking to ravage more classic horror films. Hollywood has hit an all-time low. Despite the fact that a pseudo-remake was already released with the title of Fallen starring Denzel Washington with an infinitely similar plot line, the Hollywood machine is forever flawed disgraced with some of the most pitiful directorial talent this side of America. Shocker is forever doomed to be mediocre but has spawned many films based off of Shocker's ideas alone. I approve. The strange ideology that plagues Shocker is the remorseless lead. Our football star hero loses his mother, sister, brother, and girlfriend all within a couple of days. Despite this setback, he continues on as monotonous as usual. Shocker is merciless in it's scenes of graphic brutality. Though present, always implied, never detailed. And that's the only gracious attitude present in Shocker.

For its age, Shocker is an uncompromising amusing horror film. With a climax disguised as an attack on censorship of violence in media, Shocker proves to be more "shocking" than the likes of such films as The Hills Have Eyes and Last House on the Left. An early appearance from Skinner on X-Files is the delectable star power here. Acting as Horace Pinker, Craven created a madman with a limp that will not stop and will kill anything in his path, be it children, women, or police officers. An early incarnation of the ruthless serial killer, Shocker is a film that was ahead of its time and remains a cult classic.

THE PEOPLE UNDER THE STAIRS

Wes Craven (1991)

Wes Craven is known for many films, mostly Nightmare on Elm Street, Scream, The Hills Have Eyes, and Last House on the Left. I admire him for creating many great tales of terror but I feel that many of his films lack of certain quality of horrific enjoyment. All these films have their commentary's but none of which is more evident than in The People Under the Stairs. I remember this film for the gimp suits (later stolen from Tarantino), combat shotguns, and the black lead kid. Other than that, the film was a blur in my head. I have begun treating myself to classics that I recall for that addicting concentration of nostalgia. Truth is, The People Under the Stairs is far from what I remember. Racially, few horror films top the culturally ridiculous situations this film provides. Under the guise of a fairy-tale, this film follows a Black family that is getting evicted all thanks to the evil greedy White family. Kwanzaa enthusiast Leroy (Ving Rhames) finds a treasure map during a liquor store robbery (He would). Enlisting the help of a child, he plans to demonstrate his lack of parenting skills by breaking in the house to find gold coins. Upon entering the evil whitey's house, people are killed and deformed feral creatures exist under the stairs with no exit visible. At the end of the film, the black community collaborates to purge the evil from the only white folks on the block. At first glance, one could skip over the fact that The People Under the Stairs is indeed an urban horror film. It's a bit bizarre for Craven to create a film like this. He's never done anything similar and he has recently talked about an upcoming sequel allegedly concerning an adult Alice. Ideally, a film from that standpoint couldn't be hard to make. Combine elements of May with that of the original script and you got yourself a decent follow-up of depravity. Aside from the racial absurdity, The People Under the Stairs finds itself being an amendable horror effort syncing insanity with fleshy disorders and a magical house of traps akin to a demonic version of Home Alone. This nuclear family from hell creates a true feeling of suspense as our tiny hero hides in labyrinthine crevices in the wall. The set pieces are truly marvelous providing a sense of marvel, mystery, and easily reflective of creating forts as a child. If you could permit a child to watch a single horror film, this would be almost kid tested - mother approved. The People Under the Stairs is a horror film that is easy to swallow and become engrossed in. This surreal fairy-tale of coming-to-age matter is nothing new but never been so starkly shot with such brutality behind it. This is perhaps my favorite Wes Craven film for it being so immersible in its own story. Horror reaches new levels of black comedy (not urban comedy, mind you). Everything ends smoothly if not for the disappointing ending of the C.H.U.D. looking creatures escaping into society with the intent of relaying a pointless message. The People Under the Stairs is Craven's greatest visual accomplishment as well as being a trippy horror film.

SCREAM 4

Wes Craven (2011)

I've caught wind of idle banter dissenting the Scream franchise recently. You won't find Craven's brand of fandom on my person but I know better than to make such groundless accusations claiming Scream "killed the slasher genre." Strong, spiteful words for such a spineless parade venturing away from popular opinion. In order to comprehend the slasher genre, one needn't wrack one's brain to discuss the finer merits. As humbly noted in Scream 4, the slasher began, as an idea, moreover an example, with Michael Powell's Peeping Tom and Hitchcock's Psycho and was later mutated with help from Mario Bava's Twitch of the Death Nerve, arguably the most influential film of the genre. What Mario Bava stoked was an ember of a slasher renaissance that would explode the following decade. Reducing art and applying bloodshed is hardly a fitting form to follow; no big brothers to speak of that don't insist on stalk and kill. Sure, there are gems but even the most unconventional distractions to the slasher film remain hampered by its limited mentality. Perhaps this was Wes Craven's modus operandi to lampoon the slasher genre with his humorous and grim take on teenage psychopathy. Once being a professor in humanities, Wes Craven has indulged himself a spotty career. You could unctuously compare Wes Craven to be that of an American Takashi Miike, whose cinematic endeavors are more likely to be shit than gold. Take last year's horror dead-weight My Soul to Take 3D and enjoy refuting my opinion aloud. Back on topic of the Scream franchise, one thing is consistent in every film - no deadpan delivery of mystery. Ideas can be tossed around, fingers pointed, and speculations rising but when it comes down to it the only thing you can do is sit, stare, and wait patiently. Scream 4 is certainly no exception to this rule of horror and suspense.

With the origins of Scream secured, to continue the canon of stabbing horror would be to continue with the classic cast utilizing the slogan "New decade, new rules". This can attest to Halloween H20 and Halloween: Resurrection, as well as Wes Craven's New Nightmare - basically the effects of the new millennium and the necessary evolution of convolution. What Craven prods at is so unrighteously defended, downtrodden with red excess and a continuing chase to cap last year's inventions in slaughter. This creates one hell of a cliché pile-up. Scream 4 had worlds to make up to, especially after the barbaric sequel Scream 3 - a film so forgettable that I often excuse flashbacks to Scream 2 as Scream 3. Could it be my subconscious battling to forgive and to leave one of Craven's many errors in hindsight? Scream 4 is so preciously wrapped in its satire that to bear a review without the supplied terms "meta" or "tropes" would be to turn cheek to the obvious and if there is one thing I am not, it is oblivious. Scream 4 is crafted as a reboot of the franchise, aimed down the sights at our current gen-X'ers whose horror dangles on the lines of such fodder as The Roommate or Prom Night. It's a tell-all tale of an original cast up to new tricks. This wouldn't be my first time experiencing a similar occasion on film. You could even consider it momentous. A classic line in Scream 4 - "Don't fuck with the originals!". This very same move was made by a blaxploitation picture years earlier. Pardon my train-of-thought taking a detour but I consider Original Gangstas to be an important piece that takes the early innovators of soul power and militancy and aggressively deploys them against their younger incarnates. This is the same chess play that Craven's appointed message of horror used within Scream 4.

All is not well in the infamous town of Woodsboro, whose white picket fences of fiction have harbored countless slayings and serial killers. Filling the need of a capable cinema mind, Scream 4 introduces two cinephiles, thus replacing the need for the previous character of Randy who was tragically killed in the second Scream. One of these characters is even portrayed by a Culkín which adds a field of depth to his suave stature towards film. Returning are the three originals, Sidney Prescott, Gale Weathers, and Dewey Riley. Ten years after the events of Scream 3, Sidney Prescott returns to her quiet hometown on the last stop of her book tour when the murders begin again. With a bevy of beautiful babes, Scream 4 begs for nudity, as well as one of the chief characters, but in good faith, is never delivered. Self-referential to an extreme degree, Scream 4 is a charming sequel, reflexive with its stabs at the Saw franchise and the rise of "torture porn". Craven indeed points and laugh at the current status of horror and in the process, compiles ten years of brainstorming to put a wonderful close(?) to a trilogy because, as we all know, horror pounds past thrice now. The plot of Scream 4 isn't what is so important. Constructed in a formula similar to mad-lib with a camera, I can remind you of every vengeance-ridden plot of slashers past and you can put the pieces together. No, what is important about Scream 4 is how dedicated it is to its trend of trope-smashing while retaining a great deal of violence and humor. For the record, I am also quite partial to this installment as Bruce Willis is referenced and that right there guarantees a reaction out of me.

Opening on a note similar to a game of catch and release, Stab 6 & 7 are looped through whichever dimension being dominant to the canon. Scream 4's opening retreats from a film within a film to a film within a film within, etc. Craven reassures you that he has still paid close mind to the topic at hand. While reprising favor to the original Scream, I also have to add that the first sequel tends to the still-open wounds of the characters. Scream 4 plays medic as well, though I found the lack of Dewey's limp to be disturbing. I suppose physiotherapy could have played a hand in this, as many interpretations suggest. In Scream 4, Craven expands his influences and references. Not just Halloween, Friday the 13th, and Nightmare on Elm Street but Suspiria, Don't Look Now, and the aforementioned Psycho and Peeping Tom. With the broadening of references, Scream 4 also opens doors to new delights and is essentially a remake of the first film with familiarity playing a large role in collecting similar sentiments. This aspect of the film finds Sidney, not experiencing post-traumatic stress but a new woman. No love life here to contemplate guilt towards due to ever-lasting suspicion, Sidney Prescott is reborn. Same goes for Dewey's physical handicap. It has vanished, along with his bumbling rookie nature. Gale Weathers even seems to foster much more "humanity" than before. Scream 4 is essentially a redoing of previous events, which in a strange way, casts out a copycat killer and authenticates the crimes to a formidable foe. To further the surprise, Scream 4's final moments take place in a hospital - a move that many horror films employ. There is something terrifying about a place that promotes both sterility and malaise. Not much of a review but an overview - I simply speak to alert anyone with doubt that the integrity of the Scream franchise is safeguarded by the fourth installment.

Whit Stillman (1990)

When it comes to releasing the masterpieces of world cinema, the Criterion Collection valiantly gets the job done well. However, when it comes to releasing modern films by the cinephile company, the films are usually hit or miss. I am still perplexed by the fact that Criterion Collection found Michael Bay's Armageddon and The Rock worthy of a lavish DVD release. Criterion certainly made the right decision when they chose to release Lars von Trier's Antichrist, a spearheading film that is destined to be revered as one of the greatest masterpieces of the early 2000s. I, however, cannot give praise to Criterion for releasing the mediocre 1990 film Metropolitan directed by Whit Stillman, a filmmaker known for influencing fellow "quirk-loving" auteurs of banality, Wes Anderson and Noah Baumbauch. All three of these filmmakers have a personal love for the slightly wealthy bourgeois; a class that tends to be less interesting than a lonely intercity laundry mat. After watching Metropolitan, a film that follows proletarian Tom Townsend as he reluctantly engages with an impotent pack of bourgeois socialites, I can say that I much rather watch a film portraying Spike Lee's side of town.

The whole tone and feeling of Metropolitan can be summed up in a scene where a young bourgeois named Charlie decries the bourgie-parodying nature of Luis Buñuel's classic The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie. Charlie explains that after hearing the title of Buñuel's film, he was presumptively relieved that a filmmaker had finally documented a film about the charm of the bourgeoisie. Of course, as he explains to his friends, little lily Charlie was far from charmed by Buñuel's sensual surrealism. Not only does Charlie boy prove that he has no appreciation for the art of cinema; he also gives credence to Bunuel's ridiculous cinematic representation of the bourgeoisie. After telling his clique of debutantes and beaus about the horrors of The Discreet Charms of the Bourgeoisie, they all join in a verbal assault against surrealist artists, pretentiously describing them as "social climbers." Of course, the "social climbing" protagonist of Metropolitian, Tom, first finds the "proper" etiquette of his new friends to be rather ostentatious and patently ridiculous. Unfortunately, by the end of the film, Tom has grown fond of debs and begins to shed his political leanings associated with the color red (citing Charles Fourier's as his greatest influence on his political views).

During a scene in Metropolitan featuring Tom sleeping in his bed after a wild night with the urban haute bourgeoisie (Charlie's coined phrase for his group), a volume of Oswald Spengler's magnum opus The Decline of the West can be seen sitting next to an alarm clock. Of course, I could not help but to think of Spengler's theories whilst unenthusiastically viewing Metropolitan. Spengler saw a cultural decline in all classes of Western civilization and the characters of Metropolitan are certainly systemic of it. The closest thing to an antagonist in the film is a young baron that "doesn't like taking things seriously," aside from running a train on some naive teenage patrician (which is obviously not featured in the film, that would be too risqué). Long gone are the days of heroic young aristocrats like the Red Baron (Manfred von Richthofen) and the Bloody White Baron (Roman Ungern von Sternberg), for the baron of Metropolitan is about as threatening as a 7 year old black girl. I can only assume that the director of the film has given an accurate portrayal regarding the slow and monotonous times of the NYC bourgeoisie. After all, Metropolitan director Whit Stillman is the godson of E. Digby Baltzell, the man that popularized the acronym WASP. After suffering through the film, I have come to the conclusion that Karl Marx may not have been such a bad guy after all.

Wieland Speck (1985)

If Michael Stock's Prince in Hell (1993) aka Prinz in Hölleland explicitly and even grotesquely depicts the hardcore homo nihilism and junky hi-jinx that beset Berlin's proletarian gay male population after the Berlin wall came down, Wieland Speck's Westler (1985) aka East of the Wall—a work largely set in post-WWII Alexanderplatz—depicted in a rather lighthearted manner the division of kraut cocksuckers on both sides of the wall. The sappy and sentimental story of a somewhat cynical West Berlin sexual introvert who falls in love with an East Berlin twink with an Uncle Adolf-approved hairdo, Westler sub-melodramatically depicts the trouble the two Teutonic gay boys face with Stasi border control when attempting to carry on a romantic relationship divided by physical, legal, and social barriers. Shot by auteur Speck partly illegally in a guerilla style (Speck pretended to be a tourist shooting footage in East Berlin) and pseudo-documentary manner using a super 8 (it was illegal to record sound, so a number of the outdoor scenes feature no dialogue), Westler is a glaringly amateurish work that owes much of its marginal popularity to its immaculately timed pro-gay/anti-cold war political message and thus seems rather redundant and outmoded in our post-Soviet homophile times, especially compared to the aberrant-garde agitprop flicks of (in)famous butt-darting Berliner Rosa von Praunheim (who is a friend of Wieland as the two once produced 'safe-sex' pornography together). In fact, as director Speck revealed somewhat recently in an interview at the Goethe-Institut website regarding the reason for the film's popularity, "Sometimes a film has the luck to catch a generation at the right moment, just when it's opening its eyes. That was the case with Westler. It's an absolutely gay film in which, however, being gay isn't the main problem. This had a big effect back then. People who had never seen a gay film suddenly wanted to see the two boys in the film get together. I still have letters from young people who had their coming out after seeing the film." Indeed, very much like the mainstream pro-homo flicks churned out by Hollywood, Westler is the sort of sterile 'coming out' inspiring work that sappily sentimentalizes sodomites to such a mundanely melodramatic degree that one would assume it was a vanilla sex heterosexual love story were the main characters not two extremely effeminate twinks. In other words, Westler is essentially the 'Brokeback Mountain of 1980s pseudo-arthouse German flicks' with a complimentary punk/new wave/synthpop soundtrack (which is arguably the best thing about the film!)

Opening with West Berliner Felix (Sigurd Rachman) eating greasy KFC fried chicken while driving around in a vintage red convertible in Los Angeles aka 'smog city' with his rather loquacious American friend Bruce (Andy Lucas), Westler immediately establishes a sense of freedom in the United States that post-WWII Germany—a place ironically ripped apart partially by the USA—lacks, or so one will find out while watching the film. Of course, as many proud American rednecks often state, “Freedom isn’t free” and the injun-annihilating ferocity of the pioneers who gave up their homelands in Europe made this happen. After American Bruce states to his friend Felix, “For an American, the city represents the future...they thrive on growth” the German responds with, “For Europeans, a city signifies the past. That’s the end of America over there,” thus signifying the death of lifeblood in Europa. After going back to West Berlin, American friend Bruce mentions how he would like to visit backwards East Berlin and see how it compares to the decadent West, so the two head there and soon realize it is not like it is depicted in Alfred Hitchcock’s Torn Curtain (1966) and they eventually spot tiny blond beast twink Thomas (Rainer Strecker)—a young waiter who lives in a single room flat courtesy of the communist government—while roaming around the city. Needless to say, Felix and Thomas admittedly start a hot and heavy romantic relationship, but the commie curfew forces the West Berliner to have to return to his humble abode every night, thus making their relationship a pain in the ass. Over time, the East German stasi becomes suspicious of West Berliner Felix, so they begin forcing him to go under evasive procedures, including an inspection of his anal cavity by an anally retentive commie guard who does not take kindly to cynical capitalists. Meanwhile, Thomas is ordered to do manual labor at a Prenzlauer slaughterhouse, which being exceedingly effete, would surely be the emotional death of him, so he plots his escape to the West, but refrains from letting his best beau Felix know about his plans until the last minute. Eventually Thomas gets his Slavic bud Pavel to set him up with an escape route from Hungary to Yugoslavia, but in the end, Westler ends in anticlimactic ambiguity.

Featuring a barely recognizable Fassbinder superstar Harry Baer (Gods of the Plague, Wildwechsel aka Jail Bait) in a meager role as a bastard of a East German stasi border control guard who inspects poof protagonist Felix’s assumedly torn rectum, Westler is really a testament to the fact of how German cinema, especially of the queer oriented sort, totally degenerated with the abrupt death of Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Sort of like a queer kraut equivalent of Letter to Brezhnev (1985) in its synth-addled, very 1980s depiction of impossible love between lovers from rival cold war countries, Westler is not much more than a novelty celluloid time capsule today, especially when compared to other Teutonic queer flicks from around the same era like Frank Ripploh’s Taxi zum Klo (1980) and Michael Stock’s Prince in Hell (1993). Indeed, like Coming Out (1989) directed by Heiner Carow—the first and last overtly gay-themed movie made in East Germany—Westler reveals nil new insights for modern viewers except that GDR drag queens are among the most radically repellant of lady-men in the world and that the West was far more decadent than the East. Not surprisingly a semi-autobiographical work for director Wieland Speck, Westler is a terribly tame gay flick that almost even manages to make heterosexual sex seem subversive. A rare German filmmaker who had the degenerately distinguished opportunity to study film under homo trash auteur George Kuchar and who would go on to become the director of the “Panorama” section at the International Film Festival Berlin (Berlinale), Speck will ultimately be remembered more as a sideler as opposed to a notable auteur, though the filmmaker would go on to direct the docudrama Die Erika und Klaus Mann Story (2000) aka Escape to Life: The Erika and Klaus Mann Story—a work about the lives of German novelist Thomas Mann’s gay anti-Nazi son and daughter—which is ultimately a superior work to Westler, if not a less aesthetically vibrant one. Undoubtedly, if you need proof that German queer-themed works can be as softcore in their sodomy as those delicately defecated out by the shysters of Tinseltown, checkout Westler!

MANDRAGORA

Wiktor Grodecki (1997)

In terms of hallucinatory hustler-sploitation of the quasi-pederaŝt variety, the Czech film Mandragora (1997) directed by controversial Polish auteur Wiktor Grodecki (Him, Insatiability) puts all others to shame in its melodramatic nihilism, slickly stylized Slavo-sleaze, and gratingly blatant, if not valid, anti-globalist/anti-American message. Director Grodecki originally became somewhat revered in the cinema world with his documentaries Not Angels But Angels (1994) and Body Without Soul (1996)—two works that more or less devastatingly, if not exploitatively so, depict the pathetic lives of teenage Prague male prostitutes—and the auteur would use those two docs as inspiration for his narrative feature Mandragora, the story of a rural teen who runs away from home to the big city, only to become the bought bitch boy of wealthy faggots from all around the world literally over night. Sort of like a Breakfast Club from homo Hades, Mandragora tells the story of an ambiguously gay angst-ridden 15-year-old who refuses to become a welder like his macho proletarian father, so he seeks his fortune in Prague and soon finds himself being drugged and anally deflowered by a sort of Slavic Uncle Feŝter, thereupon becoming a poof prostitute by proxy in the process, eventually even enjoying the life, only to fall hard and fast in a very real nightmare of drugs, beatdowns, and STDs. A gut wrenching work of sensationalized melodramatic aesthetic terrorism without hope and redemption, let alone a happy ending, that makes similarly themed works like Midnight Cowboys (1969), Trash (1970), Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981), Forty Deuce (1982), Via Appia (1990), My Own Private Idaho (1991), Street Kid (1992) aka Gossenkind, The Basketball Diaries (1995), and Requiem for a Dream (2000) seem rather tame by comparison, Mandragora is action-packed human depravity and cultural decay in a cheap yet strangely charming post-communist Eastern European package that quite literally depicts how Europa became a diseased gigolo of America and its cuckolded allies. As disturbingly depicted in William E. Jones micro-documentary The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography (1998), with the death of communism in the Slavic countries came the capitalist exploitation of young and rather desperate boys with no values except obtaining money at any cost, including self-degradation and voluntary exploitation. Ultimately winning a number of awards and even being lauded by playwright-turned-politician Václav Havel—the ninth and last president of Czechoslovakia (1989–1992) and the first president of the Czech Republic (1993–2003)—who personally wrote a congratulatory letter to Director Grodecki, Mandragora is what Michael Haneke once described as, “24 lies per second at the service of truth, or at the service of the attempt to find the truth,” albeit of the quasi-NAMBLA variety.

As demonstrated by the Backstreet Boys, Freddy Mercury, and Tom Cruise posters hanging on his wall, 15-year-old Czech twink-in-training Marek (Miroslav Caslavka) is probably gay, thus he has no interest in becoming a blue collar welder like his father, so he runs away from his small village and seeks self-exile in Prague. After blowing all his money at arcades and casinos on his first night in the city, Marek is robbed and beaten by a gang of Slavic wiggers, so when a creepy, swarthy pimp wearing a large leather trenchcoat, with long, greasy curly hair, and a leather-fag mustache named Honza (Pavel Skřípal) offers him a 'job' by saying things like "I could use you... Nice boy... Beautiful boy...", the innocent teen naively takes his seemingly ominous offer as if making some sort of fag Faustian pact with the devil himself. Honza brings Marek to an exceedingly effete fat middle-aged queen's house, who puts roofies in the boys Coca-Cola and the next thing he knows, the teen awakes to the heavyset homo anally deflowering his rectum. After another brutal beating from a gang of barbaric hustlers looking to protect their turf, Marek meets the charming and 'popular' male prostitute David (David Svec), who shows him the ropes of man-pussy-peddling and ultimately helps him to get pimp Honza arrested, thereupon making him a free agent of his own ass. David's personal philosophy for prostitution is, "the most amount of money for the least amount of work," which also involves thieving, especially in regard to drunk Johns. Eventually, David and Marek start their own bordello of boys in a dilapidated communist era hotel. When David sets up Marek on a date with a debauched, wealthy and equally sadomasochistic Englishman of the Caravaggio-obsessed sort, who says of the boy "you don't know it but you are the true creator of art in the world" and reaches orgasm while watching the lad pose unclad with a sword, things get a bit ugly. After deciding Marek's "balls are much too big for a classical sculpture," the Englishman has the boy savagely beaten and mutilated. Bruised, bloody, and barely able to walk, Marek accuses David of being just like parasitic pimps like Honza and the two decide to end their small fuckboy business. To fund a trip back to David's small village, the two would-be-pretty boy prostitutes rob a "Czech-American pig," a rather repulsive Slav pedophile with a gigantic hook-nose who now stylizes himself as a cowboy after obtaining American citizenship and who only comes back to his homeland to blow young boys as such a rare delicacy is much easier to acquire in destitute ex-communist countries.

After drugging and robbing the swarthy Amero-Slav swine of not only his money, but cologne and electric shavers, among other things, Marek and David head to the latter's hometown, where they run into 'homophobia' from proletarian workers at a bar, one of whom says of the lecherous lads, "They suck dicks all week and here pretend to be macho!" which could not be more true. Broke and desperate, Marek and David rob an old lady in a cemetery to get back to Prague and when they reach the Slav sin city, they are warmly greeted by Honza, who is now out of jail and wants revenge, and his gang of boy gigolo soldiers, who almost beat the two to death. Ultimately, Marek and David become sex slaves of Honza again, but no Johns want them anymore as they are sick, washed-up, and far too old for the typical discerning boy bugging buyer. David gets addicted to cocaine/speed and convinces Marek to star in boy porno films made by an egomaniac cokehead family man named Krysa (Kostas Zerdolaglu) that are sold in Germany. While Marek does not want to be in the porn flick, David and Krysa convince him to do it, the latter of which eggs him on by stating, "Faggots are afraid of everything and hide in the corners...while heterosexuals don't care...and always come up with new ideas..." Marek ultimately becomes the star (i.e. guy that acts as the passive bottom) and rather regrets the experience. To make things worse, David, who is in a constant drug-addled stupor, unwittingly goes on a 'date' with the Czech-American pig he and Marek previously robbed and soon finds himself being raped by a pool stick, on top of being sent to jail. Alone, broke, and afraid, Marek begins using drugs and after stealing a large supply of cocaine from the local pornographer Krysa, whose home is raided by the cops, gets high and hallucinates that maggots are crawling on his arm, thus inspiring him to psychotically stab at his arm with a knife and unwittingly kill himself in the process. As he lay dead in the bathroom stall where he got high, Marek's father, who has been looking everywhere for his son, walks in the restroom to use the urinal, not knowing his son's postmortem corpse is only a couple feet away from him. As a prepubescent boy states near the conclusion of Mandragora, "Lot's of sick men around..." especially in this sick little piece of 'cautionary' Slavic hustler-sploitation.

After viewing Wiktor Grodecki's Mandragora a total of two times, I can certainly say without hesitation that it is easily the most depraved and debauched hustler flick I have ever seen as a work that rather nonsensically, at least intellectually speaking, both glamorizes and condemns the boy gigolo way of life. Undoubtedly, Mandragora is certainly a whacked out and wanton enough work to appeal to real-life pederasts as it borders on being a softcore skin flick. Still, one must respect auteur Grodecki for not copping out in the end with a contrived happy ending because, after all, there is typically no true redemption and hope for boy dick-peddlers as drug addiction, STDs and AIDS, and a very early death are almost guaranteed. An unhealthily enthralling portrait of an innocent and naive boy who learns all too soon the wicked ways of post-communist capitalist Prague and ultimately pays for it first with his dignity then his life, Mandragora also portrays a people figuratively and literally raped by America and its cuckolded European allies. Most notably, virtually all of the Johns featured in the film are not Czechs, but Americans, Brits, and Germans, especially leftist types, including a Heidelberg college professor and a Judaic NYC journalist. While watching Mandragora with my girlfriend, she could not believe the film was released in 1997 because the characters—with their mullet haircuts, Motörhead leather-jackets, Robert Smith-esque faggy button-up shirts, starter jackets, and vulgar sweat pants—seemed like they stepped off the set of some mid-1980s direct-to-video NYC-based exploitation flick (and indeed that, coupled with soulless thumping euro techno and intermittent pity party Jewish violin music of the sort typically employed by Spielberg, added all the more to the film's all around grotesque feel). A sort of horrendously hypnotic psychosexual hustler horror flick that is half 'poverty porn' and half anti-American propaganda yet unwaveringly aesthetically unsanitary, Mandragora is probably the closet one can get to the Prague prostitution world without acquiring an STD and/or being robbed, though the film will most certainly hustle you out of your innocence if you still have it with its creepily captivating look at the one of the globalized world's most dirty secrets.

INSATIABILITY

Wiktor Grodecki (2003)

After at least half a dozen futile attempts over the past two years or so, I finally managed to achieve the seemingly impossible by completely finishing watching the decidedly depraved, degenerate, and disgusting Polish dystopian flick Nienasylenie (2003) aka Insatiability directed by Wiktor Grodecki. Indeed, with its largely incoherent and convoluted storyline, incessant spasitic Polish verbal vomit, visual feast of fiercely foul (anti)sexual fetishes, completely kitschy yet simultaneously kaleidoscopic aesthetics, various lead actors playing multiple important characters, and rather retarded dark scat-romp tone, Grodecki's film is like the cinematic equivalent of receiving a root canal with the aid of acid instead of Novocaine. Admittedly, what inspired me to finally finish the film is the fact that it is based on the prophetic 1930 novel of the same name written by Polish artistic Renaissance man Stanisław Ignacy Witkiewicz (aka 'Witkacy'), whose writings have been adapted into various highly worthwhile and idiosyncratic films. A decadent dandy who committed suicide in a manner not unlike one of his fictional characters on September 18, 1939 the day after the Soviet invasion by taking a fatal cocktail of drugs and slitting his wrists, Witkacy had a culturally pessimistic worldview of the quasi-Spenglerian sort that foretold the death of the Occident and this is even fairly apparent in Insatiability, even if Grodecki mostly used the film as a platform to express his own unhinged homophilia. Before daring to direct his uniquely uneven Witkacy adaptation, Grodecki directed 'serious' films on teenage male prick-peddler from Prague like the gritty docs Not Angels But Angels (1994) and Body Without Soul (1996), as well as the curiously eroticized and sleazily stylized feature Mandragora (1997), so the apocalyptic absurdism of Insatiability seemed like a dubious subject for the auteur to tackle, hence his grating over emphasis on the more perverted yet ultimately less important elements of the novel. Undoubtedly Grodecki's film is notable for at least one reason in that it is a post-communist adaptation of a 1930 dystopian novel that somewhat accurately prophesized the butchering and cultural retarding of Poland and it's populous via anti-Occidental bolshevism. Of course, as one can expect from a filmmaker who has dedicated her career to fetishizing swarthy underage hustler twinks with highly deleterious STDs, Insatiability wallows in a sort of innately and hypocritically morally bankrupt Reichian anti-fascism that ultimately depicts Polish nationalists as more sexually depraved and debauched than decadent aristocrats and genocidal commie chinks, thus making it a work that Witkacy would have indubitably disapproved of. A one-note wonder of wayward wantonness that skips over major themes and subplots of the classic source novel (e.g. the mind-controlling drug 'DAVAMESK B 2,' which is only briefly mentioned towards the very end of the film), Insatiability is like 'Witkacy for Retards' as a work that ultimately demonstrates that arthouse filmmakers can created just as bastardized and disrespectful cinematic adaptations as the most monetary-motivated and artistically autistic of Hollywood hacks. Indeed, like Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) as mutated by the witless bastard Polack progeny of John Waters and Pedro Almodóvar, Grodecki's work is fleetingly enjoyable in its own fiercely fucked way, but is certainly not destined to become any sort of cocksucker cult classic. Featuring a superficially handsome blond Aryan specimen as the lead that would have surely been kidnapped by the SS Lebensborn organization had he been a boy during the German occupation of Poland and can hardly be described as the doppelgänger of Witkacy, Grodecki's film is ultimately more of the director's own masturbatory fantasy than an even remotely respectful adaptation of a classic novel.

As narrated at the beginning of the film regarding blond beast protagonist Kapen Genezyp de Vahaz aka 'Zypcio' aka 'Zip' (Michal Lewandowski), "Genezyp Kapen did not tolerate captivity of any kind." As a doctor warned the protagonist's father when he was just a wee lad, "People who love animals often hate their own kind. Zip must be brought up strictly or he'll turn out a monster!" Of course, by the conclusion of Insatiability, Zip will degenerate into a murderously sadomasochistic bisexual barbarian of the absurdly automaton-like sort, but first he has to spend some quality time with decadent artists and/or aristocrats and scatological proto-fascist psychopaths. At age seven, Zip became a reluctant onanist after discovering the pleasures of mutual masturbation with his male cousin Toldzio. To clean his body and soul, Zip would wash his hands with holy water after his jerk-off sessions with his cousin. While Zip would receive a good authoritarian education due to his rather wealthy father, his schooling was abruptly cut short after his school was abolished because the Poles needed new young military officers because, "the avant-garde of the Chinese commies stood at the Urals...one step away from Moscow, drowning in counterrevolutionary bloodbaths." Upon arriving back home at his family mansion at the age of 18 after the closing of his school, young and naïve Zip causes his wealthy father (played by Cezary Pazura, who also plays two other 'fatherly' characters that will ultimately have a deep influence on the protagonist during his formative years) to suffer from a massive heart attack after telling him that he has enrolled in Western Literature at a university and has no interest in going to a technical institute and following in tradition by taking over the family brewery. Indeed, Zip finds beer to be banal and dreams of becoming an important artist, yet his life will ultimately take a more destructive than creative route.

While his father is on his deathbed, Zip decides to have some fun at a local club where he meets a sexually predatorial aristocrat named Princess Ticonderoga Irina Vsievobodovna (Katarzyna Gniewkowska) who provides patronage to decadent avant-garde artists, including a perennially 'misunderstood' hunch-backed poof pedophile composer named Putrycydes Tengler (Cezary Pazura), as well as a soft and exceedingly effete poet with a sickening shit-eating grin named Sturfan Abnol (played by Arkadiusz Jakubik, who also plays one of the other main roles). After proudly stating, “unappreciated artists are my specialty” and asking the protagonist if he is an artist as if to express her interest in ‘sponsoring’ him, Princess Irina makes it quite clear that she wants to unzip Zip’s pants and steal his virginity, but sexually depraved queer composer Tengler ultimately gets to the lad first. After describing artists like himself as slaves and playthings of “the bored and corrupted members of yesterdays elite, but today’s scum, which only in our country miraculously stays afloat,” Tengler attempts to coerce Zip into not becoming an artist, even describing him as “too human” for such a debasing trade. Tengler is no less cynical about politics, stating regarding Poland’s dubious future, “For no matter who wins, our fascism or Chinese communism...not to mention the Western “democracy”...the outcome will be the same: a satisfied machine.” Zip seems to have a hard time comprehending what Tengler says to him as reflected in a rather naive yet impassioned short speech that seems inspired by Heinrich von Kleiſt’s ‘Lebensplan’ where he remarks, “I do care about my life...one of its kind, different and unpredictable...perfect even in its imperfection! If I fail I want it to be the greatest failure ever.” In a strange way, Zip will more or less realize this professed dream, but it will come at the price of his sanity, morality, and innocence, among other things.

After being more or less raped by Tengler at gunpoint and ‘suffering’ an orgasm that causes him to howl at the moon like a wolf, Zip goes to Princess Irina’s mansion and annoys the decadent demoness when he fails to get an erection, so she sticks the boy’s head between head legs and makes him perform cunnilingus on her in a surreal scenario that demonstrates that director Grodecki has a serious fear of pussy. After the particularly perverse princess kicks him out of her bed, Zip symbolically masturbates while staring at himself in a mirror and then goes back to Irina and sexually services her in a rather bestial fashion as if he is some sort of young Polish Tarzan. The next morning, Zip wakes up completely unclad and in the company of Irina’s entire family, including her elderly cuckolded Prince husband and seemingly gay son ‘Scampi’ (Mikolaj Krawczyk), who proudly declares, “Whores and horses...that’s the Polish Tradition.” In between babbling about his nihilistic nympho mother’s rather voracious sexual appetite, Scampi remarks, “The Chinese are fighting a new kind of war. They want to suck the white race out,” thus offering the first prophecy of the ‘Yellow Peril’ short of racial chaos that will soon consume Polackland. After being scared away by the Princess’ particularly perverse family and their strange Laissez-faire to sex and decadence, Zip goes home and literally laughs hysterically upon learning that not only has his father died, but also that his padre did not leave his family a single penny and instead gave it to his worker’s co-op. On top of that, Zip and his mother and sister are told that they must immediately vacate the family mansion and take refuge in the servants’ quarters. When Zip later goes to see his beloved Princess Irina, she tortures him by locking him in a transparent room and forcing him to watch her have sex with his beloved cousin Toldzio Porayski (Miroslav Caslavka). When Zip goes home later that day, he gets the double shock of not only finding his mother in bed with a boorish servant with a bloated beer gut, but also that he has been drafted into the military, thus bringing a swift end to his laidback days of bisexual hedonism before he even had the chance to even cultivate himself into some sort of preposterous posturing art fag.

Upon entering boot camp, Zip is forced to do debauched things like collectively defecating with fellow recruits while being examined by an officer. The Polish military is run by a mad megalomaniac of the hyper-stereotypically 'fascistic' sort named General Kocmoluchowicz (also Cezary Pazura), who enjoys firmly grasping the bare genitals of new recruits while screaming insane pseudo-Nietzschean inspirational slogans in their faces like, "Cumulate power! You'll find the use for it sooner or later." Upon meeting Zip, the General curiously asks him if he has ever heard "Stabat Mater" by neo-Romantic composer Karol Szymanowski (who, between 1922 and 1937, had a 'Nationalist Period' where he incorporated folk music into his compositions) and then states upon realizing who he is, "Your father recommended you to me. In three months you're to report to me, you snotty brat! The worst in life is when you have to wait too long." While Zip and Kocmoluchowicz initially clash as demonstrated by the fact that the latter has the former imprisoned for two weeks for failing to wake up one day, the two will ultimately be united in madness and bloody murder. Meanwhile, Princess Irina, who the protagonist is mad at due to her fiery fuck fest with his cousin, starts a matriarchal group called 'The Syndicate' that seeks to cultivate an army of handsome and strong-willed Übermenschen that is at odds with Kocmoluchowicz's War Party. When Zip discovers that his prole-fucking mother is conspiring with the Princess to get him to become an adjunct of the Syndicate and spy on the War Party for the Chinese, he hatefully states of his progenitor, "This corpse of a dried up whore! To hell with my mother! Disgusting sperm-bag full of proletarian secretions of her lover! He can pour his body into her like into a coffin." Indeed, Zip becomes brainwashed by the irrational collectivist thinking of the General as indicated by his remark, "What a pleasure it is to have somebody to rule over you so you can trust him more than yourself! You're restoring my faith in a spiritual rebirth," but that somewhat changes when both men become pathologically obsessed with a sadomasochistic femme fatale actress named Persy (Weronika Marczuk-Pazura) who actually manages to coerce Kocmoluchowicz into dressing up in a baby outfit and engaging with coprophilia, among other things. Indeed, Persy is a dirty dame that enjoys feces-flavored French kisses and she has the power to tame any man, including raving egomaniacs like Kocmoluchowicz who stylize themselves as the next Napoleon.

While Princess Irina continues to attempt to get Zip to spy for her by stating things to him like, "If we fail, nothing will stop the Chinese, the Yellow Flood and the end of a white race," the protagonist is quite like contemporary deraci-

nated American and Western European whites in that he is more interested in the short-term and chasing after pussy than thinking of the long-term and saving his people from genocide. In fact, Zip is so obsessed with Persy that he finds himself incapable of actually asserting himself upon attempting to rape her and thus cries like a little girl as a result. After a disastrous street battle between the Syndicate and the War Party that leaves the protagonist in the hospital, Zip meets a young nurse with a reasonably rack that he plans to marry, but the love affair does not last long as the young soldier ends up strangling his ladylove to death during a rather impassioned coitus session. Meanwhile, the followers of a yellow devil lover named Djevani begins brainwashing and drugging people, including Princess Irina, who describes herself as being “reborn.” As composer Tengler states regarding the phenomenon, “Djevani has been sent by Murti Bing – the same yellow monkeys who are devouring the whole of Europe! This religion has been invented to fool Great White Morons of the West and to produce a manure out of you...to fertilize yellow masses of the Far East.” When the Chinese finally takeover all of Eastern Europe and invade Poland, General Kocmoluchowicz suffers a completely incapacitating mental breakdown, so Persy has to whip him back into shape by bashing in his genitals with spiked torture devices and pouring hot wax on his body, among various other sadomasochistic methods. While the General has one of his men murdered by Zip after he attempts to convince him not to battle the unconquerable Chinese commie leader Mandarin Wang Tang Tsang (also Arkadiusz Jakubik), he later has an unexpected change of heart and cancels the battle, stating, “long live mankind!” like a true unhinged madman.

After cancelling the battle with Mandarin Wang, General Kocmoluchowicz and his followers are invited to a fancy multicultural breakfast where the Chinese leader declares regarding his masterplan, “You cannot govern yourself and you’re racially exhausted [...] We are exhausted too, not as bad as you, but still...And so we must refresh our race, we must swallow and digest you...and create a new yellow-white variation! And so we are introducing compulsory mixed marriages.” Indeed, the yellow peril wants forced white-yellow miscegenation, not realizing that many Slavs already carry Asian blood, especially of the Mongol sort. Kocmoluchowicz goes along with all of Wang’s demands, including the sanction of his own execution via decapitation. Indeed, after Wang states to him, “As much as I respect you, I must recognize you as a dangerous individualist belonging to a bygone era...And therefore in the name of mankind we must behead you,” Kocmoluchowicz replies, “The Mother of Fuck...What’s a life not lived on the tip of a blade stuck into the unknown? At the height of madness or wisdom” and then proceeds to ‘rape the totality of being’ by violently penetrating Persy doggie style. While banging Persy, the General has his head cut off by Zip with a samurai sword at the behest of Mandarin Wang. Although Persy initially cries over the General’s decapitated head, Zip brings her solace by sav-aging fucking her and Wang pays tribute to the protagonist by describing him as “exemplary mad man.” In a stupid twist ending that makes the entire experience of the film seemingly patently pointless, it is revealed that most of the story was the protagonist’s dream. Indeed, after awaking from his dystopian nightmare, Zip states regarding his absurd and obscene oneiric experiences, “I won’t stand it alone. I won’t” while sporting the same goofy haircut he had before being drafted into the military.

Indubitably, next to the classic Witkacy adaptation Pożegnanie jesieni (1990) aka Farewell to Autumn directed by Mariusz Trelinski, Insatiability seems like a preposterously politically correct celluloid turd stain that was directed by a crypto-pornographer who feels all too unwarrantedly confident in his execution of cinematic humor, eccentricity, and excess. Indeed, ultimately Grodecki’s film seems like it is trying too hard to be weird for weird’s sake while simultaneously hypocritically bending over and taking in the ass from the anti-Occidental gatekeepers of cultural Marxist mania. In the Polish filmmaker’s attempt to ‘sanitize’ Witkacy and make his work palatable for postmodern pansies, Frankfurt School fanboys, and devout Freudians, Grodecki is comparable to Jewish philosopher and translator Walter Kaufmann who attempted to appropriate Friedrich Nietzsche from the Nazis for leftist and/or Jewish intellectuals after the Second World War and portray him as a sort of pathetic philo-Semitic humanist. Indeed, even the Gothic horror flick W starym dworku czyli niepodleglosc trójkątów (1984) aka In an Old Manor House or The Independence of Triangles aka In the Old Manor House, which is based on two of the Polish artist’s plays, is much more faithful to the spirit of Witkacy’s weltanschauung than Grodecki’s film. Of course, if watched as a sort of patently preposterous Polish take on the eccentric excesses of the Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol, Insatiability ultimately offers a much more tolerable experience that rewards the viewer in terms of sheer raunchiness and vulgarity. Like virtually all of the director’s films, Grodecki’s blatantly botched Witkacy adaptation is highly and meticulously stylized trash masquerading as socio-politically revolutionary art. After all, how serious can one take a film featuring a protagonist that looks like Macaulay Culkin had he actually reached puberty, a military man jovially consuming feces while sporting a baby outfit, a monstrous vagina, and a morbidly cynical pedophile with a hunchback getting in a bitch-fest with a debauched diva-like princess with a rivaling fetish for virginal young blond boys, among various other forms of less than dignified debauchery. If Insatiability is considered a serious arthouse work in Poland then I can only assume remarks made by characters in the work like “Mediocre people keep Poland standing!” and “Whores and horses...that’s the Polish Tradition” are completely factually accurate. Of course, I have no doubt in my mind that the homo hunchback character of Putrycydes Tengler was speaking for auteur Grodecki when he states, “Is there anything more horrible than the Polish gentry?! They are infesting everything these days! I prefer the Jews any day and I'd like to see Poland Jewish rather than aristocratic," hence why the Screen Actors Guild of America awarded the director the SAG Best Indie Director Award in 2004. Indeed, there are few things that are more pathetic than a Slavic filmmaker attempting to suck the shriveled and diseased Rebbe-circumcised cock of the Judaized West.

MESSIAH OF EVIL

Willard Huyck (1973)

Bloodthirsty rodent-biting black albino Wagnerites, blind art dealers, walking and talking zombie-vampires, and heterosexual Portuguese-American aristocratic dandies are not exactly the most common of filmic characters, yet they are an innate ingredient of the charmingly creepily and uniquely unsettling celluloid tapestry that is Messiah of Evil (1973) aka Dead People aka Messiah of Evil: The Second Coming aka The Second Coming aka Messiah of the Evil Dead aka Deep Swamp aka Revenge of the Screaming Dead directed by husband and wife time Willard Huyck and Gloria Katz, who are probably best known nowadays for once collaborating with George Lucas by penning American Graffiti (1973) and later bringing the world big budget pseudo-surreal cinematic garbage like Howard the Duck (1986). Sort of like a counter-culture Carnival of Souls (1962) meets a cult horror take on Michelangelo Antonioni's Blow-Up (1966) meets Night of the Living Dead (1968) on kaleidoscopic arthouse acid, Messiah of Evil is an obsessively ominous and oneiric cinematic work with Lovecraftian overtones about a young, bold, and beautiful bourgeois woman who travels to a degenerate beachside Californian village to find her estranged decadent artist father, only to discover the area is controlled by a depraved death-worshipping cult of undead degenerates with an overwhelming need to feed on the living, be it human or otherwise. Featuring art direction by Jack Fisk (Badlands, Mulholland Drive), who would go on to work for David Lynch and Terrence Malick, as well as editing and a cameo acting performance by experimental filmmaker Morgan Fisher (Cue Rolls, Picture and Sound Rushes), Messiah of Evil is also a curious celluloid oddity with a background story that is fittingly strange like the film itself. Originally set to be released under the silly title The Second Coming, Messiah of Evil was actually shot in 1971 and remained unfinished as a quasi-aborted film when the original financiers pulled their money out. Luckily, an opportunistic Frenchman bought the unfinished footage, edited it, and re-titled it Messiah of Evil, thereupon thankfully saving what is easily one of the most intensely idiosyncratic, fiercely foreboding, and sinisterly surreal American horror films ever made. As co-writer/co-director Willard Huyck revealed in the featurette documentary Remembering Messiah of Evil (2009), on top of being inspired by the writings of H.P. Lovecraft and old school Universal monster movies of the 1930s (as opposed to horror flicks of the 1970s, which the director hated), Messiah of Evil was heavily inspired by the films of Jean-Luc Godard and Michelangelo Antonioni as a work with a "strange sort of pretentious art film quality...at the same time it is trying to be a horror film." Indeed, aside from Richard Blackburn's Lovecraftian lesbian vampire flick Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973), Messiah of Evil is a singular arthouse horror flick with infinite replay value that deserves the title of being the most underrated American horror film ever made. A largely incoherent phantasmagorical film that allows the viewer to create their own subtext and meaning, Messiah of Evil has been described by many people as an anti-Vietnam war flick, as well as a feminist flick, yet owing to its imperative influence from Spenglerian horror novelist H.P. Lovecraft, I believe the film works best as a demented depiction of racial, cultural, and spiritual degeneration. After all, few things are more primitively disturbing looking than black albinos.

Beginning with a disconnected prologue featuring filmmaker Walter Hill (The Warriors, Southern Comfort) having his throat slit by a homely young lady, Messiah of Evil segues to a statuesque young beauty Arletty (Marianna Hill)—a character named after the French actress that is probably best known for starring in Children of Paradise (1945)—discussing the horrible events that led to her mental breakdown and inevitable institutionalization in a loony bin with people who regularly urinate on themselves. Flash back in time, Arletty has just arrived in the quaint little oceanside town of Point Dune, California—a place described as a “piss poor little town” that is “deader than hell” by a redneck gas station attendant who seems to know more than he lets on—to find her reclusive father and when she arrives, she discovers his beach house is locked and her daddy in nowhere to be found, so she breaks in. While inside, Arletty discovers a diary written by her father addressed to her where he complains about how darkness is taking over Point Dune, how he is suffering from insomnia and obsessing over the grotesque, and that she should not bother looking for him. Of course, after having spent some time traveling to the California hick hellhole, Arletty is determined to find her father and she does not plan to leave until she does so. Figuring that someone at the local art gallery will probably know where her father is since he’s a notable degenerate and all (he does pretentious pop-art paintings of people like Lee Harvey Oswald), Arletty decides to make her way there, but the people there act rather evasive as if covering up some deep, dark secret. Of course, the art dealer is rather sketchy because, on top of being blind, she denies having ever sold Arletty’s father’s paintings (despite what a certain fellow named Thom has stated), but the arrogant assistant claims a group of people staying at a motel were also looking for him, so she decides to head there. After heading to the motel, Arletty runs into the people she is looking for: a pretentious Portuguese-American aristocrat Thom (gaysploitation actor Michael Greer), who stylizes himself as a sort of counter-culture dandy and wears an ivory 3-piece suit at all times, and his two dimwitted groupie sluts Toni (Joy Bang) and Laura (Anitra Ford). Thom is recording a interview with the town drunk Charlie (Elisha Cook, Jr.), who discusses the dark history of the area (Thom also believes races have their ancient tales and myths, including a backwards place like Point Dune), describing ‘the blood moon’ and ‘the dark stranger’, and how since it is the 100 anniversary of the town plunging into darkness, ‘the dark stranger’ will soon return. Unreliable drunk Charlie tries to get Arletty to avoid her father, who has apparently joined the 'dark side' and is now 'one of them' and cannot be trusted. After letting Arletty know that the mysterious ghouls can only be killed via fire and that he was only able to survive amongst the death cult because they see him a mere harmless drunk, Charlie is killed only moments later, presumably for blabbing his mouth. After being kicked at the motel, Thom and his two gals force themselves into Arletty's father's home and squat there in luxury and lechery. Naturally, strange things occur around the house, including the vampire locals occupying the beach and staring at the moon at night during what is described as 'The Waiting,' where they devour every and any animal or human they can find, be it dead or alive. Meanwhile, Arletty learns from local authorities that her father has been picked up multiple times for wandering around in a deranged state, thus giving the little lady little hope that she will ever see her daddy again, at least as the same person she remembers him.

In one of the most iconic scenes of Messiah of Evil, Thom's groupie Laura, who hitches a ride from a Svengali-like black Albino who is blasting Richard Wagner on his radio while devouring rats, heads to the local supermarket, where she spots the depraved and ghastly locals devouring raw red meat like zombies and when the girl tries to make a run for it, she is captured by the hungry humanoid horde, who eat her in a Night of the Living-esque gore orgy style. In what is arguably the second most famous scene of Messiah of Evil, Toni goes to the local Point Dune movie theater all by her lonesome after Thom kicks her out so he can be all alone with Arletty. While watching a trailer for the garbage western Gone with the West (1975) starring James Caan, Toni is bombarded by a voracious horde of ghoulish vampire-zombies, who she does not even notice sitting right behind her. Although Thom attempts to rescue Toni after realizing she may be in trouble, he is a tad too late and things begin to stir into an all out otherworldly vampire nightmare, including the eventual appearance of the mysterious 'Messiah of Evil' (also played by Michael Greer) who is apparently an ex-minister and Donner Party survivor from the late 19th century who became a true believer of the corpse cause after resorting to cannibalism for survival and who ultimately reigns supreme as the alpha undead vampire-zombie. A creepy charlatan looking to start a sort of commie corpse revolution by spreading his unholy ravenous religion, the Messiah plans to lead the residents of Point Due inland. During all the corpse-addled commotion, Thom has the flesh on his neck ripped out by an undead blonde hag and two cops in riot gear fight a losing battle with a carnivorous collection of walking corpses, ultimately with one becoming a zombie-vampire and the other shooting his partner, whose corpse is feasted upon by the horde. After burning her undead father alive (as he said, he "tried to warn her"), Arletty loses her mind and even stabs Thom when he comes to rescue her. Despite being somewhat convinced she might also be a member of the undead, Arletty is eventually convinced to go to the beach house by Thom. Surrounded by an unhinged army of the dead, Thom and Arletty make the mistake of attempting to make a getaway by swimming in the ocean. Unsurprisingly, Thom drowns and Arletty is captured by the man-meat-eating messiah, but he decides against her being "sacrificed to the Messiah" and lets her go to spread the message about the majesty of the death cult. Not unsurprisingly, Arletty is institutionalized after spreading the gospel and confesses how she dreads the day when the Messiah and his minions come back for her.

Despite the directors never getting to film the last scene (on top of editing it, etc.), which was supposed to be the most climatic scene and explain the whole story, Messiah of Evil somehow managed to develop into the semi-underground cult horror masterpiece it is today, not least of all due to the fact that the film features a sort of demented dream logic that incessantly fiddles with the poor viewer's subconscious. According to director Willard Huyck, Messiah of Evil was originally supposed to end with the 'Messiah of Evil' aka 'Dark Stranger', who as it turns out is really aristocrat Thom (hence why actor Greer played both characters), taking protagonist Arletty as his undead bride, thus ending on a beautifully bittersweet note (after all, the two had chemistry together!) In my somewhat humble opinion, Messiah of Evil is the ultimate piece of arthouse cult horror cinema as a radically refreshing work (despite its age and sometimes outmoded wardrobes) of celluloid eccentricity, aberrant artistry, and marvelous (im)moral waywardness that truly offers a singular experience that only gets better with subsequent viewings. Although featuring marginal gore/violence comparable to Romero's Night of the Living Dead and a nonlinear plot (or lack thereof) comparable to Jess Franco's Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden (1968) aka Succubus, Messiah of Evil is certainly a work that will be more of interest to arthouse fans the philistine gorehounds. While I would be unquestionably committing an act of good old puffery to say that the film is without flaws (especially considering its dubious production history), in its own way, Messiah of Evil is truly immaculate in its eerie idiosyncrasy and relentless ambiguity as a work that can only marginally be compared to other films. After all, what other film features an albino negro who eats rats asking a scared white girl if she likes Wagner (hilariously pronouncing it Wag-ner)?! A delightfully demented yet dreamy depiction of indiscriminately hungry zombie-vampires who are 'clinging on to the old gods' and killing every living creature they see in the process, Messiah of Evil is cultural, racial, and spiritual degeneracy at its most hopelessly haphazardly hallucinatory as a work of macabre movie magic that both mystifies and tantalizes the viewer, ultimately leaving them with a sense of metaphysical dread as well as aesthetic delight in the end.

HOWARD THE DUCK

Willard Huyck (1986)

Howard the Duck presented itself as an avid surrealist experience for me. The film also served as a spiritual holistic medicine that had a very fast affecting rate. I'd always heard internet sites and common folk degrading the film and slamming it constantly. Having half a mind of a child suits me better, as I actually looked forward to watching the most embarrassing moment of George Lucas' career, besides The Phantom Menace. There I was, browsing the VHS selection at a pawn shop looking for exquisite 90s horror titles to review for the festive month of Halloween when my peripheral vision lay claim on a mint VHS of Howard the Duck. Scrambling, I snatched the film without a second glance. Paying for the bundle, I gave my first shot at Howard the Duck, but first I watched the trailer online just to get a glimpse of this "family" film. The future results left me shocked and horrified. Duck tits? This had to be the live-action equivalent of Fritz the Cat. When I was watching the film, It took no time to jump right into a cataclysmic event with no explanation. I found myself visually excited to see duck references to "classic film" with little time to get comfy in his alternate mallard universe. I kept repeating the name Willard Huyck in my head. Suddenly, It hit me that the name Willard Huyck rhymes with Mallard Duck. It's been said that Huyck wrote the script with his wife, Gloria Katz. Perhaps this is a pseudonym created by George Lucas, or a fake name. But I won't hold my breath. As we encounter the interactions between Howard and Beverly, the result is a bit of romantic chemistry between many dwarfs in a costume and a 80s vogue punk rocker. I was amazed with how cutting edge on adult humor this film was. Misplaced references to sex and alcohol are meticulously placed within the elongated running time of the film. Howard the Duck might be 10 minutes under 2 hours, but the film grants the illusion of it being twice as long. A bit near the end, the pacing seems to slowly chug, which ends my only fault with the film. Howard the Duck captures the punk rock scene as well as Return of the Living Dead did. The flashy studded leather jackets and the rebellious hair. You walk outside and you encounter this everywhere. The charm's gone and the novelty is non-existent. Something that was so risqué has become a necessity to become noticed. Howard the Duck was a pretty rad & sarcastic dude for being covered in feathers and only standing 3'something. To even add to the charm that Howard the Duck had, I experienced the film with an amazing person. To relive that childhood feel with someone you care about is a flashback to end all nostalgia. Howard the Duck has accidentally become a film very close to my heart, and not even because of its own aesthetics. There's no doubt that the film can't touch the rudeness of the comic, but what was created in its place was a brash and very mature film for all ages. Children's films don't have many cult classics, and it feels like Howard the Duck was the first.

NIGHT WARNING

William Asher (1981)

Teenager Billy Lynch has some serious problems: a 'homophobic' cop thinks he is a homo-cidal killer and both his hopelessly neurotic/psychotic aunt Cheryl and gay middle-aged gym coach want to fuck him. After his aunt Cheryl impulsively kills a closeted gay man (the longtime lover of coach Tom Landers) who ignores her emotional and sexual needs, Billy boy is suspected of being the prime suspect in a bizarre homo love triangle by an aggressive fag-bashing police detective named Joe Carlson. In the curiously exploitative slasher flick Night Warning (1982) directed by William Asher (who is probably best known for directing silly 'beach party' films like Beach Party and Beach Blanket Bingo), lustful murder, subconscious oedipal complexes, playful pederasty, awkward teenage sex, and virtually every other popular example of Freudian neurosis is assembled in a way that makes this underrated slasher film shine boldly in a subgenre that is well known for its mindless murder-driven mediocrity, and feeble and contrived formless formulas. Although amateurishly directed and devoid of any sort of genuine artistic merit, Night Warning is a film that calculatedly slaughters its mostly forgettable early 1980s contemporaries. Owing more to Alfred Hitchcock's proto-slasher flick Psycho (1960) than an intemperate undead retard in a hockey mask, Night Warning is a schlocky psychosexual romp through the domesticated sidewalk lands of unchecked suburban perversions. Many people have an eccentric, childless and single aunt in their family, thus Night Warning hits close to home as it exaggerates this relatively common phenomenon to a most pestiferous and ambiguously politically incorrect degree. For those that fancy sexually confused and erotically deviant quasi-slasher flicks like Paul Bartel's Private Parts (1972) and A Nightmare on Elm Street Part 2: Freddy's Revenge (a film that seems to borrow liberally from Night Warning), Night Warning makes for a pleasantly perverted family affair.

Apparently, Night Warning is a bastardized adaptation of the 1981 novel Butcher, Baker, Nightmare Maker (a title that is one of many alternative names in which the film was released under) written by Joseph Burgo and Richard Natale; a somewhat obscure literary item that, unsurprisingly, features more secondary characters, subplots, and crucial character back-stories than the simply structured, but audaciously themed film. Night Warning also has the distinction and horror fiend honor of being one of the original UK Video Nasty films on the DPP 72 list. Unlike a lot of the Video Nasty flicks (e.g. Blood Feast, The Burning), which are usually nothing more than plot-less platitudes with the occasional unwarranted murder of a scantily clad whore, Night Warning is one of the few works on this dubious, outmoded list that deserves its reputation as a veraciously coldhearted expression of vulgarity and debauchery as the film is an intransigent assault on society itself, especially the sheltered middle-class; the segment of society that is most often ideally portrayed in lighthearted, sentimentalist sitcoms. Billy, being a literal bastard and the unconscious desire of two divergently perverted minds, is an unwanted abstraction in suburbia, even if he is a nice chap. Additionally, in a traditional middle-class societies of the past, few individuals were considered more pathetic and repellant than a childless old maid past her aesthetic prime, aside from maybe a childless middle-aged homosexual. In Night Warning, all of these socially undesirable (but increasingly more common) ingredients are mingled in a slasher work that was surely prophetic of things to come in postmodern Levittown.

Following in the grand cult cinema tradition of neurotic female murderers, criminals, and sadists prevalent throughout the wonderful works of Poe-possessed auteur Curtis Harrington (What's the Matter with Helen?, Whoever Slew Auntie Roo?), Night Warning is a film where sexual repression leads to insensible and wholly cockamamie malevolence of the killing kind. Behind the translucent façade of Aunt Cheryl's pseudo-motherly persona lies an aberrant mind fit for a lobotomy. Unlike most slasher films, Night Warning features pop-psychoanalytic reasoning as to why a seemingly normal woman of the suburbs is more fitted for being an unflinching murderer than a warm mother. One could argue that Night Warning is ultimately an early work of homo-philia with misogynistic undertones. While the killer is a man-hating suburban wench who literally prays to an altar of failed male conquests, the detective also acts as a sub-antagonist who sees all societal problems as the direct result of sadistic sodomy. Undoubtedly, the most sympathetic character in Night Warning is coach Tom; a man who acts as both Billy's surrogate mother and father. While little Bill's abusive aunt wants to keep him imprisoned for life in her provincial madhouse, coach Tom becomes a crucial mentor for the boy and, to the dismay of aunt Cheryl, even attempts to get the lonely lad a college scholarship. Whether Tom is an active member of NAMBLA or not remains to be seen, but what Night Warning adds up to is one gutsily outlandish and fortuitously worthwhile slasher flick that has unequivocally left a number of desensitized gorehounds in a startled stupor of perplexed emotions, and delayed and equally muddled responses. Although nominated for the Saturn Award for the Best Horror Movie of 1982 by the Academy of Science Fiction, Fantasy, and Horror, Night Warning failed to earn the prize. Naturally, this does not surprise me as subversive works like Night Warning are bound to rub a number of people the wrong way, especially the sort of slasher fan pedigree (I have personally met a number of these people) who fantasizes about being the masked (and often mentally deficient) killer. Of course, I doubt many people can relate to an incestuous middle-aged bird with a childlike fondness for 'playing house' in a real house, but she sure does know how to treat a guest.

SHANKS

William Castle (1974)

A couple years ago, I recall an ex-girlfriend and I having a merry conversation about how many holocaust stories—in their innate improbable absurdity—oftentimes resemble Grimms' Fairy Tales, as if Jews were trying to exploit the childhood fears of Germans (and whites in general) against them while injecting them with a sort of 'reverse of blood libel' via the shoah mythos (after all, as history surely demonstrates, world Jewry certainly knows a thing or two about blood libel accusations). In that sense, I was somewhat intrigued when I discovered that a corny kosher conman like William Castle (House on Haunted Hill, 13 Ghosts)—a sort of poor Hebrew huckster's Hitchcock—concluded his film directing career with a bizarre Grimm-esque filmic fairy tale. Indeed, Castle's shockingly unforgettable and strikingly singular swansong Shanks (1974)—a film that, not all that surprisingly, was nearly impossible to find for decades until it was released on DVD by OliveFilms in 2013—is arguably the most covertly kosher fairy tale film ever made, as if the auteur was projecting his own perverted (im)moral perspective on the goyim via the timeless myths of the goyim. Indeed, hinting at heeb-on-shiksa pederasty worthy of Der Stürmer and turning the goyim into a sort of herd of morbidly mechanical cattle-cum-golems, the film might be PG-rated but it is unequivocally fucked up and a true testament to Castle's creepy kosher psyche, which is thankfully not camouflaged by too many tasteless gimmicks. With that being said, I still find it to be Castle's most rewarding and unforgettable film, if not for oftentimes seemingly unintentional reasons. A clever hack with an unquestionable talent for successful promotions and gimmicks that got people into theaters to watch films that very few sane people actually wanted to endure, Castle not surprisingly had his greatest hit as producer and not as an 'auteur.' Indeed, Rosemary's Baby (1968), which features the director-turned-producer in a Hitchcockian cameo, is undoubtedly the most noteworthy film that Castle ever worked on and he was thankfully smart enough to get fellow Israelite Roman Polanski to direct it. Of course, as a film based on a novel by fellow tribesman Ira Levin with both covert and overt Jewish satantists tricking some dumb young shiksa broad into being raped by the Devil and ultimately getting impregnated with the bastard son of Satan as a sort of anti-Mother Mary figure, Rosemary's Baby ultimately exposed Castle's sense of racial loyalty and playful contempt for the dumb goyim, albeit in a slightly more sinister fashion than the countless largely worthless schlock films that he actually directed. With Shanks, Castle not only revealed certain racial hostilities, but also some rather odd, if not downright odious, personal obsessions.

Undoubtedly, it is symbolic of Castle's talent-for-promotion-over-art and strong Judaic identity that he created publicity for a fake German play entitled Das ist nicht für Kinder (aka Not For Children) ostensibly penned by a fake aristocratic

Jewish playwright named Ludwig von Herschfeld (also Castle's invention) starring self-loathing krautess Ellen Schwanneke (who apparently fled Germany after Uncle Adolf invaded Czechoslovakia) by vandalizing the outside of Stony Creek Theatre, which he just leased from none other than Orson Welles, with painted swastikas to make it seem as if he was being attacked by bloodthirsty National Socialists. In short, not unlike some ADL lawyer, Castle had a seemingly instinctual knack for exploiting persecution for profit, albeit in a vaguely artistic fashion. Apparently, swastika graffiti charade was a great formative experience for Castle as it taught him the power of publicity and even led to him being hired by much hated Hebraic studio head Harry Cohn of Columbia Pictures where he eventually had the honor of working as an associate producer on his old pal Orson Welles' classic film noir The Lady from Shanghai (1947). Aside from his early work in theater and brief collaboration with Welles, Castle would not dare to dabble with something resembling real art again until the very end of his career when he produced Rosemary's Baby and directed Shanks. While I think very little of most of his work, these two films alone warrant Castle being remembered as a notable figure of American cinema. Needless to say, Castle's final film, which naturally features Judaic stars, deals with themes of persecution and radiates a certain (slightly hermetic) Hebraic essence. According to Castle in his own memoir Step Right Up!: I'm Gonna Scare the Pants off America (1976), he initially had no intention to direct Shanks and only decided to when the film's exceedingly eccentric star Marcel Marceau—a French-Jewish mime famous for his 'Bip the Clown' stage persona—talked him into it. Apparently wanting total control over the production, Marceau must have seen Castle as a weak director and exploited him thusly, hence why the film seems quite different from most of the other various entries in the director's fairly large and eclectic oeuvre (while best known for horror, the director worked in virtually every single genre while working as a for-hire studio hack before going independent in the late-1950s). Still, the film is pure and unadulterated Castle in terms of its shameless semitic schlock factor. Indeed, there is certainly a reason that John Waters has an eternal hard-on for Castle. Either way, Shanks features Castle's most Jewy character as a nebbish schlemiel and pathetic putz of the super schmendrick sort as portrayed by a literal kosher clown with a wild and wiry Jewfro.

In his book Artists of the Right: Resisting Decadence (2012), kiwi political scholar and esotericist Kerry Bolton notes in regard to the metapolitical Weltanschauung of the great American horror writer H.P. Lovecraft that he, "...saw Jewish representation in the arts as responsible for what Francis Parker Yockey would call 'culture distortion.' New York City had been 'completely Semiticized' and lost to the 'national fabric.' The Semitic influence in literature, drama, finance, and advertising created an artificial culture and ideology 'radically hostile to the virile American attitude.'" Undoubtedly, as both a horror fan and someone that can surely relate to Lovecraft, I must say that Shanks is a somewhat more esoteric expression of semitic culture distortion in celluloid form, so naturally it should be no surprise that it is also the sort of film that Freud might see as a mild masturbation aid due to its odd oneiric wet dream tone and focus on the complete and utter manipulation of other people as puppets. Indeed, if there is any film that more clearly depicts the stereotypical Judaic fantasy of completely controlling and manipulating the goyim like puppets, it is Castle's curiously, if not creepily, captivating swansong. While featuring outwardly Occidental story conventions of Grimms' Fairy Tales, the film is unequivocally covertly kosher in terms of its dubious sentiments/message and (lack of) morality, which of course is one of the main (yet less obvious) reasons as to why the film is so particularly anomalous. Aside from the film's strong covertly kosher character, it is also a sort of aesthetically schizophrenic cinematic artifact that might be best described as seeming like what might happen if the brain-damaged bastard son of Jacques Tati and Vampira directed a playful zombie film sans blood and guts. While the film technically does not feature what is conventionally called zombies, it does include undead beings of the reanimated corpse variety and they can kill. In fact, one might assume by reading the film's promotional material that it was a pro-zombie affair as indicated by the curious description of the film as, "a new concept in the macabre in which the Good come out of the grave and the Evil are sent to fill the vacancy." From a Hebraic horror angle, these sort of mechanized corpses certainly be seen as a twisted post-religious twist on the Jewish folklore tale of the Kabbalistic anthropomorphic 'golem' being (which, of course, is a story that has influenced a variety of films ranging from the German Expressionist classic The Golem: How He Came Into the World (1920) directed by Carl Boese and Paul Wegener to the mostly mediocre Roddy McDowell vehicle It! (1967), among countless other examples). While star Marceau attempted to make Castle promise that Shanks would not be a horror movie like most of his famous films, the film clearly straddles a refreshingly blurry line between horror and fantasy, which is undoubtedly one of its more positive attributes. In fact, it is easily the eeriest and most unsettling Castle film that I have ever seen (which I guess isn't saying much). Likewise, it is also the artiest and most idiosyncratic Castle movie that I have ever seen, as if the filmmaker just caught a Georges Franju marathon and forgot he wanted to be the hokey heeb Hitchcock for a second. In short, Shanks is something resembling art from someone I thought was incapable of art, but then again star Marceau (who notably plays two very different roles), screenwriter Randal Graham, and Academy Award-winning cinematographer Joseph Biroc (It's a Wonderful Life, Ulzana's Raid) also made serious creative contributions to the film. Interestingly, despite not even being well known when it was released, the film's musical score by Jewish composer Alex North (A Streetcar Named Desire, Spartacus), which incorporates motifs that were originally commissioned for (but notoriously rejected by Stanley Kubrick) for 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968), was actually nominated for Best Music, Original Dramatic Score for the 47th Academy Awards in 1975.

Set in a world that, somewhat paradoxically, seems simultaneously anachronistic yet timeless, childish yet senile and perverse yet wholesome, Shanks is somewhat of an admirable failure that has much to interest cinephiles beyond its strange collection of collaborators. Indeed, aside from featuring elements of a trashed Kubrick score and notable performances like a very young and virile Don Calfa of The Return of the Living Dead (1985) fame as a sadistic biker bro, the film seems to be Castle's curious attempt at making a sort of silent film, which makes sense considering it stars a famous mime in the almost-too-fitting role of a simple-minded deaf-mute. While the film does feature some sparse dialogue, the story is told with the help of simplistic silent era style title cards and the film even features a sepia tone sequence in what is arguably the most 'darkly poetic' moment of the entire film. While Castle reveals very little respect for the actual art of filmmaking in his memoir, it seems like he actually had fun making Shanks, as if he knew it would never be any sort of hit and simply used the opportunity to do what he always wanted to do. Although just speculation, I cannot help but think the film was also largely inspired by Castle's nostalgia for the silent era films of his youth. After all, in 1963 Castle took the artistic risk of directing a subpar remake of James Whale's pre-Code horror-comedy The Old Dark House (1932). While directed by legendary gay Englishman Whale, the screenplay was actually penned by British Jewish playwright turned politician and Zionist activist Benn W. Levy, hence the kosher character of the humor that probably appealed to Castle.

As if he assumes the audience are retarded children (his lifelong career of cinematic gimmicks certainly hints at this), Shanks begins with a rather literal intertitle that reads, "William Castle PRESENTS A Grim Fairy Tale." Of course, the film is certainly Castle's equivalent to Curtis Harrington's Whoever Slew Auntie Roo? (1971) in terms of its Grimm-esque adult fairy tale quality (also, both films are inhabited by quirky Judaic stars). At the very beginning of the film, deaf-mute puppeteer Malcolm Shanks (Marcel Marceau)—an expert lip reader with the spirit of a child who is surely an idiotic savant of sorts—is depicted giving a puppet show using marionettes modeled after friends and family members to happy kids while his beautiful blonde love interest Celia (Cindy Eilbacher) and an eccentric old inventor-cum-dandy named 'Old Walker' (also Marceau) watch on in ecstatic delight. While his sadistic sister Mrs. Barton (Jerusalem-born Belgian Jewess Tsilla Chelton, who was part of Marceau's troupe) and alcoholic brother-in-law Mr. Barton (Philippe Clay, who was also part of the troupe) see Malcolm as a loser and mock his peculiar puppeteer talents, Old Walker is so delighted with his puppet show that he takes him under his wing as a lab assistant at his rather quaint gothic mansion where he does morally dubious yet ultimately successful scientific experiments involving the use of electricity to reanimate dead animals, including frogs and chickens. Naturally, when Old Walker unexpectedly croaks, Malcolm decides to use the reanimating method on him, thereupon symbolically becoming the master of the dead master (after all, Malcolm was Old Walker's protege). As a proud puppet-master, it is not hard for Malcolm to make the transition from fiddling with marionettes to the undead, though it is somewhat creepy how much unexpected joy it brings to his initially rather bleak and stagnant life. Of course, Old Walker is not the only corpse that Malcolm decides to reanimate as simple bad luck among certain fearsome family members eventually provides him with an entire troupe of completely subservient undead human-puppets.

As the sole breadwinner of his decidedly dysfunctional family, Malcolm naturally comes into trouble when he dares to withhold some money from his savagely stupid dipsomaniacal brother-in-law, who is such a mean-spirited bully bastard that he smashes an Old Walker puppet that hapless protagonist was in the process of making. Luckily, Malcolm gets revenge by (somewhat unintentionally) killing Mr. Barton with a surprisingly deadly zombie chicken in what proves to be an absurdly stupid Castle-esque death scene. Thankfully, Malcolm's luck doesn't run out that day as his similarly abusive sister is killed in a ludicrously lackluster suburban hit-in-run accident while she is, rather ironically, attempting to prevent her reanimated husband from getting hit by a car. While Malcolm eventually buries the corpse of Old Walker out of respect for his generous mentor, he takes great joy in cavorting around town with his reanimated sister and brother-in-law while completely controlling them just as they once controlled him. Not longer a violence dysfunctional family that trades punches and kicks for hugs and kisses, Malcolm even seems to have a lot of fun simply watching TV with his personality-less family members, which was not a privilege he was afforded when they were officially still alive. For whatever reason, Malcolm even thinks it is a good idea to flagrantly flaunt his undead family members and their odd (read: completely unnatural) body contortions to his childlike love interest Celia. Quite predictably, Celia—a seemingly underage little lass that practically radiates virginal purity and untarnished goodness—gets a little freaked out when she eventually realizes that the Bartons are literal dead meat, but she is also extremely excited about a birthday party that Malcolm has planned for her and, like women tend to do, is willing to overlook the dubious complexities of the undead family dynamic. For Celia's present birthday, Malcolm is preparing a cute marionette modeled after her. Unfortunately, she will not live long enough to properly enjoy it.

For her big birthday celebration, Malcolm prepares Celia a sort of lavish Victorian dinner where the guest of honor sports a beautiful white gown that was owned by Old Walker's assumedly-long-dead wife and the zombie Bartons act as both the servants and entertainment. Unfortunately, all good things must come to an end and the fun and games come to a swift and ugly conclusion when the mansion is quite unexpectedly invaded by a small gang of bikers led by a big buff buffoon named Goliath (Biff Manard). While the bikers initially entered the mansion in a desperate attempt to revive their leader Beethoven (Phil Adams) after he fatally crashed his motorcycle on a road nearby the estate, the outlaws soon forget their dead leader and immediately begin following the lead of Goliath as he encourages them to fulfill stereotypical negative biker stereotypes like raping, pillaging, and even killing. Indeed, despite a noble attempt made by his haggard old lady 'Mata Hair' (Helena Kallianiotis) to stop him, Goliath decides to rape assumed virgin Celia. Meanwhile, a biker with the somewhat fitting name 'Einstein' (Don Calfa) plays around with Old Walker's experiments after Malcolm is beaten and tied up. When Malcolm eventually escapes from his bondage, he is greatly dismayed to discover Celia's corpse lying outside in the yard. While the bikers further demonstrate their affinity for mindless sadism by playing around with the undead Bartons using Malcolm's remote control, the vengeful protagonist opts to unearth Old Walker and uses him to execute a murderous revenge campaign against the savage biker outlaws. After zombie Old Walker strangles and drowns most of the bikers, Malcolm gets in an epic Rocky-esque fistfight with Goliath on top of the roof of the mansion that eventually results in the latter falling to his death. In a display of poetic necrophilia, Malcolm then reanimates Celia's corpse and the two begin to dance romantically in what is a literal Danse Macabre moment. Somewhat unfortunately, the film does not end there, but instead comes full-circle and returns to the very beginning, thereupon ultimately revealing that the entire story is bogus and was nothing more than the protagonist's sick twisted fantasy. In the end, the film concludes with a quote from the great British satirist William Makepeace Thackeray that reads: "Come... let us shut up the box and the puppets = for our play is played out." Interestingly, while Castle certainly did not know it at the time as he "felt 1975 would be a big year" for him as a filmmaker and he certainly did not plan for Shanks to be his swansong, Thackeray's quote ultimately proved to be a fitting coda to his filmmaking career.

Notably, in his memoir, Castle claims that Marcel Marceau, who was naively hoping that Shanks would "play forever," once asked after they finished the film: "Be truthful with me, Bill. Do you think that SHANKS will be better than ROSEMARY'S BABY?" It seems that Castle had a pretty good idea of his talents (or lack thereof) as a filmmaker and was not exactly satisfied with the final result of his film as he apparently replied to Marceau by stating, "I don't know, Marcel. You were great, but I think I might have failed you. Your world of mime and my world of horror may not mix. Only the audience will tell us." Unfortunately, after more than four decades, the audience has spoken as Shanks is hardly considered one of Castle's classic films, let alone any sort of horror classic or otherwise, which is rather unfortunate as, I for one, personally feel it is his most artistically merited film. Indeed, the film is just too innately idiosyncratic for the masses, including film dork and seemingly most Castle fans.

While Stanley Kubrick was so cryptic and sensitive (?) about his actually quite stereotypical New York City Jewish intellectual background to the point where he would actively erase all Jewish traces from his source material (e.g. Eyes Wide Shut (1999)), British Jewish film scholar Nathan Abrams argues in his insightful text Stanley Kubrick: New York Jewish Intellectual (2018)—a book that is, somewhat ironically, arguably as incriminating as Kevin McDonald's classic The Culture of Critique (1998) in terms of exposing the hermetic motivations of Hebrews—that all of the American auteur's films are, at the very least, covertly kosher. In fact, Abrams even argues that Kubrick actively sought to destroy all prints of his first feature Fear and Desire (1953) because the film is too overtly personal and, in turn, Jewish as is especially personified by the character Private Sidney (played by fellow Jew and future filmmaker Paul Mazursky)—a sort of implicitly Judaic stand-in for the filmmaker—who is hardly a flattering portrayal of a Hebrew soldier as he is a psychologically feeble intellectual that not only suffers from debilitating paranoia and posttraumatic stress, but he also senselessly murders a young fisherwoman (Virginia Leith) after disturbingly attempting to molest her. Undoubtedly, the titular character of Shanks will probably seem similarly disturbing to most white gentile viewers as his peculiar behavior and questionable motivations are similarly kosherly curious. Surely, it is no great irony that, whereas as a great filmmaker like Kubrick started his career with his most incriminatingly and unflatteringly kosher character, Castle concluded his career with such a character.

While the Kubrick and Castle had next to nil in common, there is still this glaring perennial Jewish connection and it is impossible to truly understand either filmmaker without taking it into serious consideration. In fact, just as Kubrick did with his films, Castle opted to drop any mention of Jewishness and antisemitism for his Crusades period action-adventure film The Saracen Blade (1954) despite those racially-charged elements being central themes of American negro Frank Yerby's source novel. Incidentally, both men also married blonde Aryan women (indeed, while Kubrick curiously married the niece of great Nazi era auteur Veit Harlan, Castle married a Dutch immigrant). Of course, all the main ingredients of Castle's swansong are completely kosher and, in my less than humble opinion, it is nearly impossible to completely appreciate the film without considering these facts. Whether it was inspired by ancient Aryan fairy tales or not, there is no way that a goy could have ever directed a film like Shanks. While I seriously doubt Castle would appreciate it, I cannot help think of the strangely otherworldly Judaic quality of the film and be reminded of Alfred Rosenberg words, "The life of a race does not represent logically developed philosophy nor even the unfolding of a pattern according to natural law, but rather the development of a mystical synthesis, an activity of soul, which cannot be explained rationally, nor can it be conceived through a study of cause and effect.” Indeed, it is easy to point to perversion and control fantasies when attempting explain the implicit Jewishness of Castle’s film, but it is ultimately more of a visceral metaphysical matter when it comes to such a particularly preternatural cinematic work.

Undoubtedly, Abrams’ book is not just helpful in terms of studying Kubrick semi-esoteric Jewishness, but also when it comes to Jewish films and characters in general, especially of the male persuasion. In that sense, it is no coincidence that the worst villains of Shanks are virtual a stereotype for all the things that Ashkenazi Jews have historically loathed about European gentile masculinity. Indeed, as Abrams explains in regard to the Jewish ‘ethnical’ code of menschlikayt, it, “...rejected goyim naches, a phrase that ‘broadly describes non-Jewish activities and pursuits supposedly antithetical to a Jewish sensibility and temperament.’ Literally meaning ‘pleasure for/of the gentiles,’ [...] It can therefore also be interpreted to mean a ‘preoccupation with the body, sensuality, rashness, and ruthless force,’ as manifested in such physical activities as bearing arms, horse riding, dueling, jousting, archery, wrestling, hunting, orgies, and sports in general. Denied the right to participate in such activities, Jews instead denigrated them, consequently also disparaging those very characteristic that in European culture defined a man as manly: physical strength, martial activity, competitive drive, and aggression.” While they might not be completely conscious of this while watching it, white gentile viewers will ultimately find Malcolm Shanks’ exceedingly inexplicable behavior, lack of masculinity, and almost pathological passivity to be the most ‘horrifying’ aspect of the film and not the dumb bikers, who are little more than muscular ciphers. Indeed, just as Henry Frankenstein is the true monster of James Whale’s Frankenstein (1931), so is the eponymous protagonist the real ‘monster’ of Castle’s film, though I seriously doubt Castle and Marceau—two Jewish outsiders—would agree with that as they surely highly identify with these cinematic creatures. But then again, the film was advertised with the poster tagline, “Deliciously Grotesque.” For better or worse, Castle is a sort of classic cult film legend. As demonstrated by his cameos in classic New Hollywood era flicks like Hal Ashby’s Shampoo (1975) and John Schlesinger’s The Day of the Locust (1975), Castle had already even achieved the respected cult icon status among great director of the era shortly before he died even though his horror films had already become quite passé. A couple decades later, Joe Dante would pay tribute to the filmmaker with the Castle-esque hero portrayed by John Goodman in Matinee (1993). Castle certainly earned his star Marcel Marceau’s lifelong respect, as the Hebraic frog states in the Jeffrey Schwarz doc Spine Tingle! The William Castle Story (2007) that, “I think he was a wonderful director” and he even describes Shanks as a film where, “Everything was poetic.” Indeed, in a sick twisted semitic way, like if Bruno Schulz had the spirit of an extroverted businessman, the film is the poetic final word of a shameless schlockmeister that one would assume didn't have a single poetic bone in his entire body. In short, the film that manages to shatter certain stereotypes while also painfully upholding others. While I usually would not be able to stomach Judaized Teutonic fairy tales that are blessed with everything from the baroque to bathos, Shanks reminded me that sometimes effectively eerie fantastic horror is possible via cross-cultural mongrelization.

William Dear (2007)

From the director that brought us such clever classics (Sarcasm, can you dig it?) as Wild America and Angels in the Outfield, Director William Dear directs this straight to video slasher film. What makes a film horrible? It might be the lack of personal ambition put into a film but that seems hard to do anyways with a slasher film. This is a prime example of a film that undermines its own product thus creating a prompt and ultimately fun horror film. The plot might sound very familiar so I give you a warning of repetition. A group of muscle bound, stoner, super attractive friends go into the country to camp and have premarital sex. Wow, how cleverly original. What starts off as a superimposed horror film turns brainsy and ballsy with the introduction to Crispin Glover. Crispin Glover plays Simon/Stanley, a double role with the normal ferocity and madness that accompanies every Glover role or film. This stupid quintuplet of masculinity and naivety find themselves at a store in the middle of nowhere managed by the two brothers (Crispin Glover and Crispin Glover). Prior to this engagement, they meet up with two deus ex machina's who warn them of twins and murders. Of course, they don't listen. That decision should immediately be regretted. The body count rises due to flying pick axes. So there is the typical plot twist and surprise ending, but I didn't find it annoying at all. It only made the film that more enjoyable. So, to answer your question. Was it bad? Yes it was bad, but that does not stop me from telling you to watch this film at all cost. You might hate it and spread words about how stupid it is but frankly, that is what it is about; Unbridled fun. William Dear has created a horror film that promotes alcoholism, subliminally telling you to crack open a cold one while watching this. Now why should you see this one whereas ignore all the copycats? This film has a load of surprises. Grand scenery is one. The luscious outdoors were captured perfectly. As for the acting? Crispin Glover is a marvel on screen. He is truly an enigma on and off the set. His screams and signature anger spit are intact and creates the entire mood of the film. Without Glover, this one would have fallen flat on its face. If you enjoy buckets of gore, Crispin Glover, stupid people being slaughtered, flying pick axes, or wicked CGI booby traps with more fake limbs to shake a stick at, I definitely recommend this film. Just don't take it too seriously. Er.. Simon says don't take it too seriously.

William E. Jones° (1997)

While I cannot be completely sure as I am not exactly a cocksucker connoisseur, I have to assume that American experimental filmmaker William E. Jones (Massillon, Is It Really So Strange?) is easily one of the foremost authorities on esoteric queer cultural history and anthropology and when it comes to his films, probably no other work demonstrates his lifelong obsession for hermetic homophilia than his somewhat minimalistic avant-garde doc Finished (1997). Described on the filmmaker's own website as "a detective story and a love story, a film noir bathed in sunlight," the somewhat dreamlike and disturbing yet sometimes strangely solacing doc attempts to deconstruct and reassemble the curious cocksucking life and seemingly senseless suicide of a deeply troubled Marxism-lobotomized French-Canadian gay porn star named Alan Lambert (né Alain LeBeau), who Jones developed a somewhat unhealthy infatuation after seeing him in an advertisement for a sleazy phone sex service. As a documentarian that studied under prominent American Structuralist filmmakers like James Benning (11 x 14, Landscape Suicide) and Thom Andersen (Eadweard Muybridge, Zoopraxographer, Los Angeles Plays Itself), it should be no surprise that Jones would become a sort of singular master of montage oriented meta-fag film essays, but what makes his work different from both his elders and contemporaries is that he dares to use this cultivated celluloid form to tackle seemingly ludicrously lowbrow subjects like suicidal sod porn stars, albeit in an almost pathologically personalized way that makes one speculate that the auteur may be the most loneliest and most obsessive queer filmmaker working today. While a seemingly cynically titled work for a film about an exceedingly nihilist homo porn star with delusions of grandeur who blew his brains out in public during the holiday season while he was at both his physical and intellectual peak, Finished is ultimately an inordinately empathetic postmortem love letter as written by a man with the spirit of a lovelorn teenage girl who has become decidedly disillusioned yet seemingly no less sexually infatuated with the somewhat enigmatic object of his desire, thereupon making for an uniquely unsettling yet strangely touching celluloid experience about the hollows of devotion, especially when you're a gawky art fag with the temperament of an elderly antique dealer. I have always assumed that most porn stars are fucked up people that probably got molested as children and my research has proven to me that my suspicions are not completely unwarranted, but tragic Canuck chuff chum Lambert was indubitably fucked up in his own special way, as a sort of self-stylized commie messiah with a seemingly split personality who only subscribed to Marxism because he hoped it would eventually lead to a sort of apocalyptic anarchism that left the entire world in flames (had he discovered the writings of Oswald Spengler, Lambert might have chosen to take a slightly different path in life). A man that can be adequately described as a remarkably less talented kindred spirit of Japanese warrior-poet Yukio Mishima, Lambert felt that ending his life at the mere age of 25 whilst at as his absolute personal peak as a beefcake neo-bolshevik was the right way to go because, as his suicide letter revealed, he adamantly believed that he would be reincarnated and thus did not have to fear death. A work that manages to do the seemingly impossible by making a connection between the films of Hollywood maverick Frank Capra with military-themed poof pornos and a sort of metaphysical approach to Marx, Jones' film is like a Mark Rappaport flick except with an uneasy heart and minus the shallow and obnoxiously self-conscious Jewish NYC post-modern intellectualism. A sort of elegant yet obscene poetical celluloid obit and last rites created by a total stranger that seems to have more care and concern for the departed than his own family members, Finished is a film that will ultimately cause you to never look at porn the same way again.

Somewhat curiously, before even featuring the somewhat strange and ironical inter-title "Starring Alan Lambert" (surely, the porn star would have been somewhat embarrassed by the film), Finished opens with an excerpt from the ending of Frank Capra's anti-fascist parable Meet John Doe (1941) starring Gary Cooper and Barbara Stanwyck juxtaposed with auteur Jones narrating, "I once became infatuated with someone I could never know. He was a loner and rebel... a tragic character determined to sacrifice himself for some high purpose. Most people dismissed him as a lunatic or fraud, but they had been deceived by appearances. I wanted to fall into his arms and say that I cared about him for who he really was. He didn't have to throw himself into the abyss. Love could redeem him. The tragedy could have been avoided and a happy ending worthy of Hollywood. Unfortunately, it did not turn out that way... not for me, nor for the object of my desire." In the scene, Cooper's character is about to end his life by jumping off of a building, but Stanwyck stops him by passionately embracing him while declaring her love for him and sobbing hysterically like a little girl who has broken her dolly. As Jones will explain towards the end of the film, he sees tragic gay porn star Alan Lambert as Cooper's character and Stanwyck as himself (indeed, it seems Jones is a 'bottom'), but of course, unlike the Capra flick, there is no contrived happy ending at the decidedly dejecting conclusion of Finished, which ultimately reminds the viewer that infatuation can be a hefty emotional investment that rarely pays off (though Jones' certainly did, as it resulted in this film). Jones saw Lambert's image for the first time in a superficially salacious sex hot-line advertisement and he was so impressed with the seemingly hairless Canadian heartthrob's chiseled masculine beauty that he immediately cut out the photo, which is naturally featured prominently during the film. About a year after Jones began using the photo as an assumed masturbation aid, Lambert killed himself, thus leaving the filmmaker somewhat heartbroken, or as he states in the doc, "I was moved by Alan's death, even though I had never met him. For me, he existed as an image, not as a real person, but in a way that did not make him any less important. Alan reminded me of the first time I remember seeing men having sex together. When I was young, I didn't realize that men did such things until I saw a pornographic magazine." Equipped with the somewhat esoteric research tools of about twenty different trashy gay porn flicks and a "rambling and pompous" ten-page suicide letter that the porn star had sent to various friends before offing himself, Jones hoped to unlock the mystery behind Alan Lambert and his untimely and inexplicable act of self-slaughter, but fate ultimately had different plans for the filmmaker that did not really involve really truly unmasking the mad mensch behind the mask. Indeed, instead of discovering a masculine dude that just happened to get down and dirty with other masculine dudes, Jones was confronted with an exceptionally troubled self-stylized loser and irredeemable rectal ranger who had a more extreme case of the perturbed psychological profile proposed by German-American social philosopher Eric Hoffer in his classic work The True Believer: Thoughts On The Nature Of Mass Movements (1951).

By killing himself a couple days before Christmas in a public park, Québécois queer Lambert revealed that he probably did not have a close relationship with his family and naturally found the holiday season completely intolerable for that very reason, yet the porn star apparently deluded himself into believing that his seemingly senseless act of self-slaughter was a deadly serious "political statement" that would allow him to be reincarnated after the birth of the sort of apocalyptic dystopian world that he strangely so deeply longed for, as if societal chaos would result in his attainment of moral refurbishment. As a man that starred in fag fuck flicks with predictably stupid and unimaginative titles like Bare Bottoms, Beach Dreamer, Boot Camp, The Trenches, and Brother Trouble, Lambert probably did not have much to be proud of, especially for a man that dreamed of getting a mundane bureaucratic civil service job. As highlighted in the film, the messianic Marxist sex worker was a "bottom" (aka the person that gets fucked) who once starred in a buggery based blue movie entitled Brother Trouble where, as Jones remarks in a rather random instance of porn trivia, "Chris Dano, a model who is half-black and half-Hawaiian, fucks Alan Lambert by a roaring fire in a mountain lodge. Shortly after this scene was shot, due to a change in law enforcement policies, it became illegal in the state of Georgia to sell videos in which a black man fucks a white man. Some producers discontinued sales in Georgia and others, wishing to sell their products in every state, stopped including interracial scenes in their videos." While Jones seems to think otherwise, it is quite indisputable that one has certainly reached rock bottom when they have been filmed being anally pillaged by an exquisitely mongrelized mulatto butt pirate. After starring in eighteen porn flicks between 1988-1990, Lambert decided to quit the industry for about a year and during that time he gained twenty-five pounds of muscle and got a tan in the hope that he could stage a big comeback that would ultimately only last two films, with the sod sex worker's pornographic swansong being a scene where he "fucks himself" with a giant dildo modeled from porn star Chris Lord's uncut cock. Ultimately, Lambert's final masturbatory scene proved to be a sort of morbid metaphor for his stranger-than-fiction life of intricate self-deception, intemperate narcissism, and inevitably nihilistic self-obliteration.

As Jones explains, a porn star named "L" (notably, virtually all the people mentioned in the film are described with pseudonymous single letters so as to protect their identities) was one of the last people to get to know and befriend Lambert, who he immediately was intrigued by because he proudly "said he was superior to normal people" and had interesting "apocalyptic speculations," including that he "anticipated the fall of capitalism in near future." While "L" and Lambert were set to star in a porn flick with one another, the latter was forced to quit the production after the former found a small hemorrhoid on buttocks, which was a serious cosmetic blemish for a power bottom that was to be filmed being fucked in the ass. The night before Lambert was forced to quit the film, he and "L" fucked and bonded over their mutual suicide fantasies with one another, but only the former actually acted upon his obsession with violent self-slaughter. As Jones states at this point in the doc, "Alan's name, his work in the sex industry, his air of superiority, his premature death... They all remind me of a quote from THE PICTURE OF DORIAN GRAY: 'Beauty is a form of Genius—is higher, indeed, than Genius, as it needs no explanation.'" Of course, as his almost pathetic yet strangely admirable obsession with the subject potently demonstrates, Jones certainly needs an explanation and thus is not too delighted to learn that Lambert was more of a passive-aggressive commie crackpot than a true man of genius.

While Jones hoped that he would find some special insights into Lambert's character and actions upon reading his ten-page suicide letter, he was ultimately left even more confused, or as the director states himself while sounding like a hopelessly literal-minded and pedantic college English professor, "Unfortunately I found the letter completely baffling. Alan wrote in a convoluted styled and used words in a way I didn't understand. At times, it seemed as if he had invented his own vocabulary." Notably, Lambert's letter opens with the following sentences, "This text was written in the last hours before my death. It exists, on one hand, to try to explain to you why you must not associate my death with the despair of a man in the face of the absurdity of his existence and, on the other hand, it exists to permit whatever individual who, in retracing my path, would wish to make sense of my intentions." As a man that wrote a suicide letter featuring individual segments with titles like "Manifesto of the Communist Party" and "Hedonist," it seems that Lambert never realized that he was involved with the very same industry that his commie comrades might describe as the height of "capitalist exploitation." As Jones explains regarding the typical shelf-life of a gay porn star, "The career of a successful performer often follows a familiar trajectory. At first, he breaks into the industry as rough trade; a butch type being serviced by his partners. Gradually, he will perform a greater diversity of sex acts on camera. Eventually, he assumes the role of a bottom; getting fucked by newcomers who will eventually become bottoms themselves. The same pattern repeats itself over and over because the strategies for butching it up inevitably wears thin or expose themselves as just that: strategies.” While Lambert was apparently at the best physical shape of his life when he put a bullet in his brain, his cocksucking celebrity was waning and apparently he was well aware of that fact. As a semi-butch beefcake bum chum that gave off the illusion of raw and adulterated masculinity yet was really a self-absorbed queen with a brain that seemed more scattered than that of the average Ritalin-popping teenage girl, Lambert, like many gay male porn stars, was what Jones describes as a ‘Muscle Mary’ and hardly the super stoic Übermensch that was dripping with testosterone that the filmmaker imagined he was, hence his seemingly split-personality as a messianic Marxist nancy-boy whose crowning achievement was offing himself during the most merry time of the year.

As Jones rightly notes regarding his subject’s somewhat hypocritical life, “In his pursuit of physical and spiritual perfection, Alan sought control and yet by his own choice he submitted himself to a system which consumed him.” Despite routinely taking pulsating purple-headed custard chuckers in the man-cunt from young twinks for a living, Alan somehow managed to convince some of his friends that he was a sort of “great intellectual” and misunderstand genius who would only achieve greatness when the world collapsed. Indeed, when Jones attempted to get information from two of these seemingly brainwashed friends, “R” and “D,” they treated him with great mistrust and more or less refused to volunteer any pertinent information for such a meager art film. As Jones humorously notes, “Alain wrote in his suicide letter, ‘If I had $1 million bucks I would choose the best crew and realizes this fucking movie I’ve always wanted to see.’ Perhaps his two disciples were waiting for a call from a major studio.” Jones was eventually able to gain the confidence of a Montreal man named “M” who befriended Alan after the latter serviced him while working as a so-called ‘erotic masseur’ from the comfort of his own home. Apparently, while helping men experience a little sexual relief for profit, Alain would blast Mozart and discuss Marx in what must have been an absurd scenario to witness. According to “M,” Lambert attended a graduate program while financially supporting himself as both a hustler and peepshow dancer in Montreal’s gay village. Not surprisingly, Alan apparently saw sex work as nothing more than a “tedious necessity” and ultimately longed for a banal yet fairly comfortable life as a government bureaucrat/civil servant, but at the same time he firmly embraced the decline of the Occident and thought that any attempt to reverse said decline would only slow down the process and thus should be avoided at all costs. Of course, as Jones notes regarding Alan, “He was a would-be-revolutionary...defeated before he

Towards the conclusion of Finished, Jones confesses that he failed in his mission to unravel all the details of Lambert’s lurid life and that he could not bring himself to uncover all the details of his life even if he had the capacity to because, as he rather frankly states, “I wanted my story of Alan Lambert, Porn Star Messiah, to remain intact.” Indeed, it seems that all of his research led to Jones becoming completely disillusioned and dejected by his subject as expressed by his sullen narration, “When I first encountered Alan’s letter, all my expectation were confounded. Instead of radical politics, I found an attitude of complete self-absorption. A distaste for the real work of politics had led Alan to embrace a passive and irrational position. The only way to imagine social change was through an apocalypse.” While Jones certainly does not have all the answers, he offers some provocative speculation as to what made Lambert tick and why he killed himself, narrating, “I began to suspect that Alan’s messianic fantasies served a prosaic purpose. As a sex worker, he sold his body and at the same time he wished to transcend his body. His philosophy may have been a means to escape the alienation of the sexual economy. His mystical preoccupations kept him from acknowledging that he was a mere tool...a cog in a machine.” Ultimately, at the end of the film, Jones neatly packages everything together by managing to establish a connection between cinema, Lambert, and Finished itself, narrating, “...in the intervening century, motion pictures did achieve a kind of victory over death, but in the case of Alan Lambert I am left with doubt about the human cost extracted in the process. Even as he died by his own hand, Alan may have known he would have obtained immortality by means of a cinematic illusion. What he could not know was the exact form of his reincarnation. Alan probably would have disagreed with the conclusion I have reached with my investigation. I’ve become disillusioned with a figure I once thought held great promise, but it’s possible that in some way Allan never could have predicted I fulfilled a modest part of his ambition.” Indeed, on top of outlining Lambert’s whacked-out metapolitical Weltanschauung, Finished is also probably the only film ever made that does not feature the French Canadian porn star being manhandled by some degenerate fuckboy.

During Finished, auteur William E. Jones states regarding his foredoomed subject, “I hadn’t expected such complex thoughts from a gay porn model,” but I suspect that filmmaker’s quip is exactly the sort of sentiment that pushed queer Queeb Alain Lambert completely over the edge in the first place as a young man that had good looks and apparently some brains yet had reduced himself to being rectally reamed on the sleazy sod screen for the viewing pleasure of poof perverts who saw him as nothing more than a hunk of meat that was only fit to be meticulously defiled like a prison punk in a post-Apartheid South African penitentiary. Undoubtedly, my impression is that director Jones finds Lambert to be a terribly tragic figure because he cannot fathom that such a hopelessly handsome hunk would be so unhinged as to irrevocably destroy his striking body and wipe himself off the face of this earth for eternity. While Jones states, "The loss of his superficial attributes was his tragedy," he ironically would not have ever even considering directing the film were it not for Lambert's "superficial attributes," which are notably emphasized in a fetishistic yet somewhat ethereal fashion throughout the entirety of Finished. Indeed, after watching the doc, I cannot help but feel that Jones mourns Lambert a whole lot less than he does the loss of the fantasy fuck film stud that he initially encountered in the phone sex ad. Still, Jones' experimental doc is by far the greatest and most inordinately empathetic and shockingly heartbreaking film ever made about a gay porn star, as a work that makes something like Jeffrey Schwarz's Wrangler: Anatomy of an Icon (2008) seem like preposterously politically correct hagiographic twaddle. Of course, as the man behind the startlingly detailed biography Halsted Plays Himself (2011) on the sad sadomasochistic sod life of pornographic star/auteur Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool), as well as singular works like the video essay The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography (1998) that depicts the abject capitalist exploitation of young Slavic men in ex-Soviet territories, Jones is probably the greatest exponent of hardcore homo humanism in the world.

It should be noted that in 2012 a certain extraordinarily narcissistic fellow by the made-up name of Luka Rocco Magnotta transcended Alan Lambert as far as bizarrely unhinged Canadian poof porn stars go when he murdered and dismembered a gay Chinese international student and then sent the various Oriental body parts to elementary schools and political party offices and led the police on an international manhunt where the killer cocksucker was ultimately eventually caught looking up stories about himself on a computer at a internet café in Berlin, Germany. Personally, I would love to see Jones direct a film about Magnotta, but I digress. What Lambert and Magnotta have in common aside from their nationalities and sexualities was a self-obliterating form of narcissism that was mostly blatantly and debasingly epitomized in their porn careers. While Jones did not exactly completely deconstruct his subject, Finished does manage to unravel the layers upon layers of narcissism that enabled Lambert to wear a mask that his decidedly deleteriously actions betrayed. Certainly following in the mistakable tradition of the director's autobiographic debut Massillon (1991), Jones' experimental Lambert 'anti-biopic' also demystifies and ultimately brings a certain morbid poetry to the fuck flicks that the forsaken porn star appeared in by slowing down and obscuring these images to the point of being hypnotically static and painterly and where one would never know they were taken from homo hardcore flicks with titles like Bare Bottoms and Summer Buddies. Indeed, whether a homo or hetero, one would have to be awfully depraved to watch Jones' film and then indulge in one of Lambert's fuck flicks as a masturbation aid. A sort of botched orgasm at the director's expense in esoteric celluloid obituary form, Finished is certainly the sort of film you would expect from Morrissey had he been any openly homosexual experimental filmmaker as opposed to perennial closest queen. In fact, with the queen Derek Jarman being long dead, Moz might want to consider hiring Jones to direct his music videos. A work that is seemingly infinitely more intriguing and enigmatic yet at the same time alarmingly insightful than the post-counterculture Montreal sexual world depicted in Denys Arcand's Le déclin de l'empire américain (1986) aka The Decline of the American Empire, Finished is indubitably a film that actually dares to depict the true cost of so-called sexual liberation in the spiritually retarded age of late capitalism where everything and everyone has a price. In that regard, maybe Lambert had the right idea when he argued that the modern world is intrinsically irredeemable and is in dire need of a baptism of fire and apocalyptic scenario that will rid this planet of the decided degeneracy and moral bankruptcy that allows both Hollywood and the gay porn industry to thrive in the first place. Indeed, a man like Lambert was born to star in arthouse works in the spirit of Lot in Sodom (1933) co-directed by James Sibley Watson and Melville Webber, Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia (1938), Fellini Satyricon (1969), Werner Schroeter's Eika Katappa (1969), and countless other works where the male body is celebrated as opposed to being degraded and defiled like it was when the Canadian fuckboy allowed himself to be immortally cinematically emasculated in the form of a mongrel jigaboo ramrodding his snowfrog sod shit-box. With that being said, Lambert did manage to obtain the sense of dignity and empathy he probably never received in life with Jones' Finished, thus he can now finally rest in peace.

THE FALL OF COMMUNISM AS SEEN IN GAY PORNOGRAPHY

Undoubtedly, pornography has always made for a good, if not grating and oftentimes grotesque, source for gaining insights from everything from the cultural pathologies of a nation and people to how certain marginal groups fit into certain 'roles' in society as a whole, as well as the number of fetishes that have taken over a people in what amounts to a 'secretly sick' society, and homo-documentarian auteur William E. Jones' The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography (1998) – a 20-minute documentary analyzing perverse and dehumanizing trends in Eastern European gay porn following the collapse of the Soviet Union – certainly sheds a superlatively sordid light on a shocking trend amongst a sector of formerly proud Slavic men who have become gay-for-pay when their personal circumstances hit an all-time low with the rise of capitalism in the ex-commie Motherland. No stranger to studying the more disturbing, unflattering, and just plain weird aspects of gay subcultures, including the unsanitary bathroom behavior of everyday closet-case homos in the real-life 'found-footage' document Tearoom (1962/2007), the obsessive study of the life and death of a gay porn star with artsy fartsy celluloid collage piece Finished (1997), and the seemingly inexplicable proliferation of Mexican Morrissey/The Smiths fans in the documentary Is It Really So Strange? (2004), foremost fag fetish chronicler and abberosexual pseudo-anthropologist auteur William E. Jones (Massillon, All Male Mash Up) deconstructs the disturbing degeneration of Slavic male heterosexuality and how capitalism brought spiritual prostitution to Mother Russia and its neighbors after the fall of communism and with the rise of literal cocksucking capitalism. Taken from Eastern European gay porn films from 1993-1998 that made their way to American shores, including such salaciously and mockingly titled works as The Vampire of Budapest, Russian Hard Work, Red Brigade, Perestroika, Moscow Dream Boys, Men of the Balkans, Czech "In & out", and Comrades in Arms, The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography is certainly a mesmerizing yet muddling micro-document of the misery and decided dehumanization of young men that have, quite ironically, been warned their entire lives about the evils of capitalism and the wanton West and, indeed, would ultimately experience such monetary motivated melancholy. Not featuring a single throbbing member nor commie cumshot, The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography still manages to be as repulsive as the most grimy of porn flicks in its decisive dissection of macho men in a state of panic who are willing to do anything, even sell and literally swallow their pride for a mere couple shekels for some perverted poofer producer, to survive in these uncertain times. Indeed, if anything, The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography is irrefutable, if radically unconventional, proof that American 'right-wing' warrior-philosopher Francis Parker Yockey was right when he argued that American 'culture' was more detrimental to the Faustian soul and the Occident than Soviet communism.

As William E. Jones wrote in his official statement for The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography: "Around the time my first two films were released on video, I noticed the tape Men of the Balkans in my neighborhood video store. It made the intriguing claim of being the first gay porno shot in Bulgaria. The work of Jean-Noël René Clair, a major auteur of contemporary gay porn, Men of the Balkans was part of a flood of porno from former socialist countries that began appearing in U. S. video stores in the early 1990s. I wanted to make a work about this phenomenon, but I could not travel to Eastern Europe. Fortunately the material came to me; there was plenty of it to be found on the shelves of American video stores. I decided to make an "armchair" documentary, a compilation piece composed entirely of scenes from porno tapes, by reediting the material and adding only my commentary." Certainly short and bittersweet, The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography may have been thrown together in a couple relaxed evenings, but its genius is 'reading between the flesh lines' and showing that everything has a price in the West, including the mind, body, and soul.

Starting with an image of a seemingly dignified Nordic-like comrade-in-cocksucking-arms symbolically standing under a portrait of Mikhail Gorbachev – the last leader of the Soviet Communist Party and the man largely responsible for dissolving the Soviet Union – and in a post-Soviet Russian army uniform, The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography soon cuts to the same man in a strikingly fallen state, engaging in some sort of lurid gay sex scenario with an expression of seeming abject disgust on his face. The viewer is also exposed to close-up face shots of various other Marxist-bred men in mid-sex scenarios with the majority of which seeming totally humiliated and decidedly degraded, with one young man looking like he is on the verge of tears and a total mental breakdown, which says a lot considering he 'came'-of-age in a totalitarian commie state where the individual is nothing. As for the appeal of such sickening debauchery, director William E. Jones narrates, "Spectators see "unspoiled" beauty when they look into the eyes of these young men," which is indubitably a pleasure fit for a sodomite sadist. According to Jones, these petrified post-pereestroika performers only make 1/10 the cash that their American counterparts make, which is no small amount to pay for what probably amounts to only a couple loafs of bread and a bottle of generic vodka. As Jones accurately states, "The West's image of communism in Eastern Europe was hardly one of sexiness and glamour...now the East is the scene of a thriving sex industry and many adult video companies have setup shop there," with the three central Slavic cities for gay pornography being Prague, Budapest, and Moscow. As Polish auteur Wiktor Grodecki (Inferno, Nienasylenie) revealed with his two documentaries on Czech hustlers, Not Angels But Angels (1994) and Body Without Soul (1996), and his almost pornographically stylized feature film Mandragora (1997), debauched Americans, Brits, and Germans come to the Czech republic to cum and have sex with everything from prepubescent boys to violent, drug-addicted teenagers. Although not discussed in The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography, many of the gay porn stars, especially in regard to Czech porn, are merely hustlers looking to earn a quick wad of cash via busting their wads and these fine fellows even see starring in blue movies as highly preferable to going on a 'date' with some dirty old man.

The Second half of The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography features a debauched old Brit interviewing rather reluctant Russian 'performers' in a startlingly sinister fashion, as if he derives the greatest pleasure from debasing young heterosexual men with his own sexual depravity. Proving the complete and utter desperation of the Slavic world, one young gentleman admits his mother is well aware of his pornographic pursuits and sees no need to stop him. Another young blond fellow admits he likes to fuck and get sucked by young women, but the dirty olde Brit tries to bastardize his words and make it seem like he likes get blowjobs from young boys as well. When the jaded Brit seems offended by the fact that one of the men says he does not like old farts watching him fuck and questions how he is able to perform for him by the camera, he states "I take it as work." And, indeed, with no more communist factories to work in and produce worthless junk, these men of steel are now precarious performers in a foul international flesh factory where their honor and heterosexuality goes to the lowest bidder and work involves such "jobs" as blow, hand, and rim. To top off the curious creepiness that is The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography, the British bone-stroker of a pornographer (whose face is thankfully never shown) puts his hands on the meaty merchandise, thus ushering in the end of what is the most subversive document on how the former communist world has turned into a compliant cuckold of Western capitalism.

As someone who has worked with and lives in an area populated with Slavs from the former Soviet Union and its satellite states, I have personally witnessed the sort of highly detrimental degeneracy that capitalism has caused to these former collectivists turned capitalist 'individualists.' Sadly, despite many of them claiming to be the 'cream of the crop' of their respective nations, most of these Slavs (the word "slave" itself is derived from Slav) are quite happy performing unskilled labor and blowing their cash on beat up old cars (which they 'supe up' like American wiggers and other rabble), fancy new cellphones, Chinese food, and alcohol. Undoubtedly, the insights I gathered from my experience with Americanized Slavs and what I learned from The Fall of Communism as Seen in Gay Pornography are not all that different, but, of course, William E. Jones' petite 'anti-porn' doc makes for a much quicker and more enthralling excursion in 'Slavic post-Soviet serfdom 101' than having to hear an Americanized Ukrainian girl discuss how glorious the Ukraine is while bitching out her American 'husband' every ten minutes on her cellphone and flirting with every red-blooded American male that passes her semi-Asiatic gaze. Needless to say, I am not surprised that Russia now has the largest 'neo-nazi' population in the world as I am sure there are still some stoic Slavs out there that rather accept death than to star in a gay porn film directed by some sleazy American and/or Israeli. Indeed, it is an irony of fate that after destroying the Third Reich and literally raping millions of German woman, rampantly heterosexual Russians are sucking dicks for pennies on the dollar just to survive.

TEAROOM

William E. Jones° (2007)

With the tired deluge of faux “found footage” films over the past decade and more recently of a fantasy-driven supernatural variety like Cloverfield (2008) and V/H/S (2012), it is quite the relief when one gets to see an example of the real thing, especially if it is of a seedy and criminal/historical nature like Tearoom (1962/2007); a work featuring authentic footage taken by the Mansfield, Ohio police department during the summer of 1962 when they were trying crush the rampant anonymous male buggery in public restrooms. Originally launching the peculiar probe in an attempt to find an 18-year-old murderer of two young girls named Jerrell Ray Howell (who – incidentally – is more handsome than any of the ‘unconscious performers’ in the film), the police had no idea that so many men of differences ages, races, and creeds were engaging in the ancient art of spontaneous semen-swapping. Tearoom is filmed on color 16mm film stock by a hidden police camera man who used a two-way mirror to document the desperate acts of men with an unquenchable vice when AIDS was not a reality and taking a dick in the mouth and/or ass was considered the most deplorable and emasculating of unholy acts. The unintentionally candid acts of the carnal featured in Tearoom would result in all participating parties being charged and subsequently found guilty of sodomy, which during that time would result in a minimum of 1 year in a state prison; ironically, a virtual sanctuary for sodomy itself. While doing research for a documentary project, gay documentarian filmmaker (Finished, Is It Really So Strange?) and author (Halsted Plays Himself, Tearoom) William E. James randomly came across the footage from Tearoom and would eventually screen the film in its rough form (no sound, unedited) for small audiences at prestigious museums and film festivals around the world ranging from the Andy Warhol museum in Pittsburgh, PA to the Pornfilmfestival in Berlin, Germany. James described his agenda for screening the footage from Tearoom as follows in an interview, “My goal was to appropriate their film as something other than a pure instrument of domination, to make the film be about the men who are its subjects. I hope people can see more than oppression in TEAROOM.” Personally, what I noticed most consistently in the eyes and acts of the men of Tearoom is compulsive and ritualistic behavior performed by men who value their privacy, even if they are giving blowjobs and being sodomized in a public area. Before the time of internet porn and power gay political movements, Tearoom features fagdom before it was considered fabulous of which director W.E. James lamented, “I say that this is what gay sex looked like before porn. Now men look at porn and figure out how to fuck... These model images that we take for granted were not available to many men in 1962! TEAROOM is a representation of pre-porn gay sex, and in Mansfield, pre-gay bar sex, and for me that’s completely fascinating.” In short, Tearoom is

'gay' at its most unglamorous yet uniquely 'human' and for that alone, it makes for a worthwhile viewing.

What makes Tearoom all the more interesting is that many, if not most, of the men featured in the document were married and some even had kids, so one can only wonder what happened to them after their exceedingly embarrassing and disgraceful prison sentence. Naturally, getting sodomized by a random Negro in a public bathroom during the early 1960s was a tad bit taboo, thus making Tearoom – for better or worse – one of the purest expressions of voyeurism and scopophilia ever released in the history of film. One can owe this distinct honor (if one can actually find a copy of the film) to a police camera man named Spognardi and his assistant, of whom Tearoom presenter W.E. Williams provided the following insight, “From the way the camera moves, one can surmise certain things, e. g., that some subjects interested the police more than others... During screenings, there are many laughs when an attractive man enters the restroom, and the camera begins to move frenetically. Were the police cameramen gay?...only a straight man could allow himself to be involved in the outrageously perverse scenario of waiting in a closet unseen in the hope of seeing other men masturbate and have sex.” Somewhat surprisingly, police cameraman Spognardi described the whole opinion-changing experience behind Tearoom in the following terms: “I changed my whole thought on it, as far as two consenting adults behind closed doors...What people do behind closed doors is their business.” Of course, the men in Tearoom were anywhere but behind closed doors, at least private ones, and this becomes more than obvious towards the end of the document when a little boy appears in the sandbox of sodomy, henceforth illustrating the complete and utter vulgarity of the underground sex station. While homosexuality has gained a lot of social acceptance and even political power in the form of ‘victim’-based special interest groups, it is highly doubtful that the perverse phenomenon of ‘cottaging’ that is featured in Tearoom has swayed over the years as testified by the 1998 arrest of popular British pop singer George Michael for “engaging in a lewd act” in a Los Angeles public toilet and the 2007 arrest of U.S. Republican senator Larry Craig for soliciting sex at a public Minneapolis, airport bathroom. After all, one of the main appeals of public sex – whether one is a flaming pansy or a hyper-heterosexual rapist – is the possibility of getting caught. Unfortunately, for the men of Tearoom, their sadomasochistic fantasies were fully realized and forever visually chronicled for the viewing (dis)pleasure of fanatic cinephiles, homophiles, libertines, and softcore sadists.

THE FRENCH CONNECTION

William Friedkin* (1971)

If there is one filmmaker that I initially misguidedly believed was an overrated Hebraic hack whose main objective was to profit off of cinematically assaulting the spiritual core of America's white Christianity majority, it is William Friedkin, who I now regard as one of my favorite filmmakers of the New Hollywood era. Of course, I had good reason to believe this since it seems more than a little bit dubious when a Jewish filmmaker directs a film like The Exorcist (1973) where a demonically possessed preteen girl fucks herself with a crucifix or an extremely gay film like The Boys in the Band (1970) where a rampantly heterosexual auteur, who was a well known womanizer, curiously attempts to empathize with exceedingly effete flaming homos that bitch and moan like neurotic preteen girls throughout the entire movie during an era when homo-hating was more or less the norm, as if the filmmaker was willing to reduce himself to the point of self-degradation in an attempt to rip to shreds the moral fiber of America (of course, Friedkin would later redeem himself with his S&M sod slasher flick Cruising (1980)). Naturally, one cannot also forget that Friedkin started out as a somewhat socially conscious documentarian whose most notable and revered doc The People vs. Paul Crump (1962) partly led to a negro murderer who killed a white security guard to get off of death row and eventually released from prison (notably, as he explains in The Friedkin Connection: A Memoir (2013), Friedkin felt colored killer Crump was innocent at the time he made it, but later came to the conclusion he was probably guilty). As his somewhat underrated serial killer flick Rampage (1987) demonstrates, Friedkin later changed his mind and now supports capital punishment in certain contexts. Not surprisingly, I also assumed that Friedkin's first big cinematic hit, The French Connection (1971), was an early example of a Hebraic leftist attempting to demonize white working-class cops, but after many viewings of the film and reading a lot about the director I have come to a more nuanced and appreciative view of the flick and its certainly subversive director, who more or less single-handedly reinvented the cop film sub-genre. Instead of being intended as a kosher cultural Marxist assault on white men in blue, Friedkin—an oftentimes fierce fellow who apparently loathed Israel so much that he complained while visiting the Jewish state during the 1970s, "I can't wait to get out of here, all these people are just so obnoxious. They're like many family"—had somewhat less pernicious but no less interesting objectives, including getting out of the arthouse ghetto and making a film that could be enjoyed by his Hebraic prole relatives from his hometown of Chicago.

While Friedkin was proud of what he achieved artistically with some of his early artsy fartsy works, especially his somewhat overlooked Harold Pinter adaptation The Birthday Party (1968), it was not really paying the bills and after a fateful meeting with Howard Hawks—a true mensch best known for classic Hollywood works like The Big Sleep (1946) and Rio Bravo (1959) that was considered a big hero among the young filmmakers of the New Hollywood movement—the filmmaker decided to completely change the direction of his filmmaking career, even if he forever remained a perennial Francophile of sorts. Indeed, while making the almost insufferably histrionic cocksucker chamber piece, Friedkin began dating Hawks' long estranged daughter Kitty Hawks and eventually moved into her apartment. Despite the fact that she had not seen her father in nearly two decades, Kitty decided to bring Friedkin along when she opted to travel to Los Angeles in what would ultimately be a fairly somber reunion with her legendary maverick Hollywood filmmaker daddy. As revealed in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls: How the Sex-Drugs-and-Rock 'N Roll Generation Saved Hollywood (1998) by Peter Biskind, when The Boys in the Band was brought up, Mr. Hawks stated to Friedkin, "That's about those queer fellows." When Friedkin replied, "Yeah," Hawks unloaded a rant on the young filmmaker that would ultimately be life-changing, stating to the young and still naive filmmaker, "I don't know why you'd want to make a picture like that. People don't want stories about somebody's problems or any of that psychological shit. What they want is action stories. Every time I made a film like that, with a lotta good guys against bad guys, it had a lotta success, if that matters to you." Of course, Hawks' words did matter to Friedkin, or as the filmmaker confessed himself, "They really stayed with me. I would have embarked on a course of having made obscure Miramax type films before Miramax. But I had this epiphany that what we were doing wasn't making fucking films to hang in the Louvre. We were making films to entertain people and if they didn't do that first they didn't fulfill their primary purpose. It's like somebody gives you a key and you didn't even know there was a lock; it led to THE FRENCH CONNECTION."

Unequivocally one of the greatest, most important, and iconoclastic cop flicks ever made, the film may have been made with Friedkin's less than cultivated deli worker uncle in mind (indeed, this how the filmmaker regularly described his post-The Boys in the Band output), but it is also a piece of visceral and sometimes refreshingly venomous celluloid art with a wonderfully wicked punch that is packed with keen cultural cynicism, albeit thankfully not of the sneering passive-aggressive leftist pansy sort. Heavily influenced by Friedkin's background as a documentarian, The French Connection—a partly fictionalized adaptation of the 1969 nonfiction book of the same name by Robin Moore—is also as realistic as cop flicks come. Indeed, less interested in Ernest Tidyman's script than the daily habits, behaviors, and idiosyncrasies of the mick-wop police duo it is based on, Friedkin hired NYC Narcotics Detectives, Eddie Egan and Sonny Grosso, to act as full-fledged technical advisors that coached their cinematic counterparts on how to act out of a scene (in fact, both men portray cops in the film, with Egan playing the boss of the character that is based on him). Based on the true story of how Egan and Grosso uncovered a major international drug ring that involved the smuggling of $32 million worth of uncut heroin from France to NYC that was hidden inside a car owned by a popular French TV personality named Jacques Angelvin, the film is a true blue collar masterpiece where testicular fortitude reigns supreme and where all forms of political correctness are exterminated in an oftentimes racially-charged frenzy of no bullshit street cop action and violence. Indeed, The French Connection is probably the only film that would simultaneously offend the extra sensitive sensibilities of limp-wristed vegan socialist faggots, Israel-supporting cuckservatives, and ghetto negro dope dealers.

Shot largely in a cinema-vérité style with tons of excitedly erratic handheld camera work and somewhat unpredictable elliptical editing and featuring an oftentimes ominous and discordant musical score by Don Ellis that is just as crucial and unforgettable as Bernard Herrmann's score in Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976), The French Connection is not only arguably the first great 'prole art-house police' flick, but also probably the most honest and authentic depiction of what it takes to be a truly masterful street cop who can strike fear into even the most mentally unstable of drug-addled negroid convicts and mob-connected goombah psychopaths. Indeed, the film's sometimes obnoxiously extroverted yet oftentimes hilarious (anti)hero 'Popeye' and his introverted wop partner 'Cloudy' are not socially inept dorks that do everything by the book but obscenely obsessive urban soldiers that do what they have to do to get that job done, even if a couple of flamboyantly dressed jigaboo dope dealers get their feelings hurt in the process. Far from having a low opinion of Popeye and his pal, Friedkin—a man from a humble Chicago working-class background who has openly admitted to engaging in his fair share of petty crime as a young lad—rather respected the two police officers that inspired the film and has even described Egan as a cop genius of sorts. As someone with veteran cops in my family that worked the streets of one of the biggest quasi-third world shitholes in the United States, The French Connection proved to be an almost liberating experience the first time I saw it as a gritty and in-your-face ride through NYC post-industrial purgatory that offers no easy answers and never succumbs to lame pseudo-moralistic posturing. In short, the film is certainly no phony piece of cultural Marxist twaddle like so many contemporary cop flicks where darkie dope dealer are portrayed as hyper-masculine neo-noble-savages who cannot help their choice of trade because they grew up with a social handicap and where the only good cops are old wise negroes, inordinately stoic women that can magically beat the shit of big strong men, or idiotically idealistic ethno-masochistic antiracist fucks who rather promote the absurdist fantasy of racial equality than uphold the law. Aside from being a preternaturally gritty yet artful crime-thriller that totally changed the (sub)genre as a Hollywood film that was mainly inspired by Jean-Luc Godard's À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless and Costa-Gavras' Z (1969), Friedkin's early masterpiece is also an early critique of the perennial abject failure that is the so-called 'War on Drugs.' Indeed, not only does the film demonstrate that war is a failure even when the 'good guys' technically win a symbolic battle by busting a drug ring, but it also makes it quite clear in its notoriously stoically cynical quasi-epilogue that the ostensible war is rigged and that none of the real bad guys are ever truly brought to justice because they are great comrades of the white collar crooks that are in charge of the system.

While the greatest police duo that NYC has probably ever known, Jimmy 'Popeye' Doyle (Gene Hackman) and Buddy 'Cloudy' Russo (Roy Scheider) are certainly men of the street that just as easily could have been crime bosses had their lives taken a slightly different course, but of course that is what makes them great cops as streetwise men with the subversive minds and intuitions of criminals. A beer-chugging mick alpha-prole that enjoys lecherous sadomasochistic sex with random lecherous sluts and prostitutes that he finds on the street who oftentimes has to be woken up and forced out of bed for work by his partner after a long night of hardcore drinking and fucking, Irish-blooded detective Popeye is an exceedingly erratic extrovert and born renegade who might not play by the rules of the unnecessarily bureaucratic legal game but he gets the job done, even though it is a completely thankless job that has many risks and dangers. Of course, the risks and dangers are exactly why Popeye is in the game. While Cloudy is somewhat of a sidekick, he is an imperative part of the partnership as he not only believes in Popeye and supports him on most of his somewhat seemingly crazed hunches, but he is also able to keep his comrade in line and make sure he is right on schedule when it comes to the work day, among other things. More than just a fearless and obscenely obsessive fellow of the brazenly bombastic sort, Popeye thrives on unpredictable danger and morbid excitement to the point where he pushes other cops out of the way to get in the middle of the action, as if he lives to challenge death. A somewhat sullen, pessimistic, and innately introverted man who, unlike Popeye, tends to think deeply before he acts, Cloudy might not be as brazen as his partner, but he is just as brave and is willing to follow him anywhere, including an extremely dangerous international drug trafficking conspiracy involving seemingly psychopathic professional hitmen, guido gangsters, and government-connected Jewish lawyers, among other upscale criminal rabble.

Beginning somewhat abruptly but quite fittingly in scenic Marseille, France, The French Connection starts with a literal bang in the form of a French police detective being shot in the head right at fairly close range upon walking into the front door of his home after spending the day trailing a local shipyard owner named Alain Charnier (Luis Buñuel regular Fernando Rey), who is a legitimate businessman that also happens to be in charge of the largest heroin-smuggling syndicate in the world. The French detective was killed by Charnier's suavely psychopathic personal hitman Pierre Nicoli (Marcel Bozzuffi of Costa-Gavras' Z) and the similarly dapperly dressed criminal duo will soon be traveling to New York City to smuggle $32 million worth of heroin hidden inside of a Lincoln car owned by a popular French television personality named Henri Devereaux (Frédéric de Pasquale), who has no idea what is hidden in the automobile and has only agreed to bring the vehicle to the United States as a favor to his friend. Charnier is selling the drugs to a sleazy mob-connected Jewish lawyer named Joel Weinstock (Harold Gary), who likes to keep his hands clean and thus uses a young guido named Salvatore 'Sal' Boca (Tony Lo Bianco) and his 19-year-old wife Angie (Arlene Farber) to do the extra dirty bitch work for him. Indeed, Sal and Angie own and operate a less than impressive working-class newsstand luncheonette as a front for their drug operation. Of course, Popeye and Cloudy spend a good portion of the film uncovering this somewhat intricate international criminal plot.

When we first are introduced to the lovably pugnacious protagonists, they are conducting an undercover narcotics stakeout in Bedford-Stuyvesant, Brooklyn where Popeye is entertaining young negro children while sporting a Santa Claus outfit and Cloudy is running a hotdog stand as they covertly watch a drug deal that is going down in a nearby all-black bar. When Popeye gives him the signal after seeing the transaction take place, Cloudy proceeds to attempt to arrest the black criminal but the dope dealer manages to runaway after stabbing the wop cop in the arm. After a long chase through a trash-covered black ghetto that somewhat resembles a Vietnam War zone, Popeye and Cloudy manage to capture the shiv-wielding criminal and then naturally proceed to smack him around a little bit in retribution for his violent transgressions. Considering their virtually completely opposite personalities, Popeye and Cloudy are quite good at playing 'Good Cop, Bad Cop,' especially when dealing with less than sophisticated spooks, though they use a fairly bizarre and quite hilarious approach to these almost unintentionally avant-garde mind games. Indeed, while Cloudy asks the criminal legitimate questions about the crimes, Popeye throws him off by aggressively asking him about if he is guilty of "Picking Feet in Poughkeepsie." This technique proves to be quite successful, as Popeye's question petrifies the violent yet seemingly mentally feeble negro dope dealer so much that he is all too happy to answer Cloudy's questions. In fact, the heroin-dealing homeboy is so psyched out by Popeye that he also confesses to picking his feet in Poughkeepsie. After arresting the criminal and leaving work for the day, Popeye remarks to Cloudy in regard to the fact he was stabbed by a seemingly borderline retarded negro, "You dumb guinea. Never trust a nigger." When Cloudy replies, "He could have been white," Popeye reveals he is more of a vulgar misanthrope than a racist by replying, "Never trust anyone." Luckily for Popeye, Cloudy has an insanely inordinate degree of trust for him. Although Cloudy wants to go straight home after work because he is tired as a result of being stabbed in the arm, Popeye convinces him to go out for some drinks at the Copacabana where the biggest drug trafficking scheme ultimately falls into their lap by sheer happenstance.

THE FRENCH CONNECTION

A man that quite literally lives and breathes policing as if it is an accursed sixth sense that brings just as harm and danger as happiness and joy, Popeye is always on the lookout for “dirty” guys even when he is off-duty, so naturally he is quite intrigued when he notices Sal Boca and his wife Angie, who he has never seen before, entertaining some mob-connected drug dealers at the socially prestigious jet-setter section of the Copacabana. When Cloudy notices an ugly swarthy middle-aged Hebrew, Joel Weinstock, at the Boca’s table flirting with a couple hot blondes, he cannot help but remark, “It’s Jewish lucky. He don’t look the same without numbers across the chest,” to which Popeye affirmatively replies, “That table is definitely wrong.” Somewhat predictably, instead of going home and resting for the night like most normal people that are terribly tired after a long and draining day of work, renegade workaholics Popeye and Cloudy decide to spend the rest of the night and early morning tailing the Bocas’ car and ultimately discover their dubious luncheonette. Needless to say, Popeye and Cloudy begin regularly spying on the luncheonette, with the latter even regularly even hanging out inside the restaurant and flirting with Angie, who offers to ‘model’ blouses for the undercover cop if he is willing to pay the right price. Upon doing a background check, the police duo discovers that Sal once attempted to rob a Tiffany’s in broad daylight but he ultimately got off the charge because the luxury jewelry store refused to prosecute, thus hinting that the seemingly lowly dago dumb ass has friends in high places, including Judaic lawyer Weinstock, who the cops also begin monitoring. After discovering from a Blaxploitation-esque negro informant with a goofy Afro that a major heroin shipment is coming to NYC, Popeye manages to convince his hard-ass supervisor, Walt Simonson (who is somewhat ironically played by the real-life ‘Popeye,’ Eddie Egan), to setup a wiretap on the Bocas’ phones, thus eventually leading them to discovering the ‘French Connection’ upon hearing frog accents. Unfortunately for Popeye and Cloudy, they are also forced to work with a federal agent that they greatly despise named Mulderig (played by Hollywood stunt-driver Bill Hickman, who was James Dean’s friend/driver and who executed the elaborate chase scenes in Bullitt, The French Connection and The Seven-Ups). Mulderig blames Popeye for the death of another cop, so it is only fitting that the protagonist accidentally kills him in the end.

Under the dubious pretext of coming to NYC to shoot a documentary about life in the rotten Big Apple, Devereaux arrives to the drastically deteriorating metropolis with a shiny new Lincoln Continental Mark III that he does not realize is full of a wealth of uncut heroin that will apparently keep both local dope dealers and junkies happy for at least a couple years. Devereaux brought the car as a special favor to his friend Charnier, who, upon a superficial glance, hardly seems like the sort of fellow that would be responsible for the world’s biggest drug smuggling operation. A supremely cultivated man and immaculately dressed virtual dandy who loves and is completely faithful to his beautiful young wife and who lives for wining and dining at fancy frog restaurants, Svengali-like master criminal Charnier makes Popeye seem like a virtual barbarian by comparison, but of course the main theme of the film is the thin line between police and criminals. Of course, Charnier's sort of aristocratic smugness gives Popeye all the more incentive to take him down. Despite their stark differences in terms of cultivation and demeanor, Charnier and Popeye certainly make worthy adversaries, especially when it comes to playing the cat-and-mouse game. Naturally, Popeye almost immediately begins trailing Charnier when he arrives in NYC and it does not take long before the latter realizes this. Needless to say, Popeye is all the more determined to catch "Frog #1" (which is the nickname he actually gives the Frenchman) when he manages to outwit the protagonist in his own city and escape from his grasp while looking quite elegant and smug while doing it. Indeed, after a game of cat and mouse that results in the Frenchman escaping via public transportation, Charnier rubs his small victory over Popeye in his face by waving at the protagonist in a taunting fashion as he rides away in the subway shuttle at Grand Central Station. Upon failure after failure in terms of finding ample evidence to use against Charnier and his men, Popeye's boss Walt closes the assignment stating, stating to the protagonist in a particularly pissed fashion, "Jimmy, you wasted two months on this. No collars are coming in while you two are running around jerking off. Now, go back to work! You're off special assignment!" Luckily for Popeye, Charnier contracts his hit man Nicoli to kill him, thereupon making it quite clear that the international drug smuggling operation is the real deal. Despite the fact that Sal is extra paranoid as a result of being under police surveillance and having his phones tapped, among other things, his shadowy business partner, stereotypically pushy Jew Weinstock, talks him into carrying out the drug deal as planned.

While looking quite dejected upon walking back to his symbolically prison-like apartment complex, Popeye gets quite the surprise when a sniper's bullet kills a woman that is only a couple feet away from him. Of course, the assassin is Nicoli and instead of attempting to seek shelter, Popeye opts to aggressively hunt his would-be-hunter, thus ultimately erupting into one of the greatest and most insane chase scenes in cinema history. While Nicoli manages to outrun Popeye and evade capture by boarding an elevated train at the Bay 50th Street Station in Bensonhurst where he shoots and kills a negro cop that dares to try to stop him, the protagonist does not give up there and instead 'borrows' a car from a random civilian and uses it to chase the train in extremely dangerous rush hour traffic. Meanwhile, Nicoli makes his way to the front of the train where he hijacks the fairly elderly black driver at gunpoint. While Nicoli demands that he skip the next stop, the driver is so horrified as a result of having a gun pointed directly at his head that he suffers a heart attack and is knocked unconscious, thus causing the train to almost crash into another train that is parked at the next stop. When a stupid would-be-heroic young white train conductor dares to try to stop the armed frog hit man, Nicoli naturally shoots him dead. As a result of being violently thrown against a glass window after a emergency trackside brake is applied to prevent the train from crashing, Nicoli is left somewhat exhausted but he manages to exit the train. Unfortunately for Nicoli, Popeye has managed to cheat death after almost getting into numerous serious car wrecks during the chase. Indeed, while the car he borrowed is left more or less totaled, Popeye is left fairly unscathed and luckily manages to confront Nicoli not long after he exits the train. When Nicoli attempts to flee from the protagonist while standing at the tops of the steps of a train station platform, Popeye shoots and kills him with a single shot to the back of the head, thus causing the hit man's corpse to fall down the staircase where it fittingly lands next to the deadly detective, who also collapses due to exhaustion.

After Popeye and Cloudy impound Devereaux's Lincoln Continental Mark III after Sal Boca dubiously leaves it on a random ghetto street where it could easily be stolen, the protagonists find what they are really looking for after having a police mechanic completely disassemble to the entire automobile. Indeed, 120 pounds of heroin is found tightly packed in various small blue and green obloid packages inside the rocker panels of the car. Rather reluctantly, Devereaux eventually shows up at the police impound and threatens to portray NYC in a negative light in the documentary that he is supposedly making if the cop on duty does not give him back his car in a speedy fashion. Of course, the cop on duty finds Devereaux's effutely arrogant demeanor to be quite comical and treats the famous frog in a fittingly passive-aggressive fashion. After four hours of waiting, Cloudy eventually approaches Devereaux and informs the frog celebrity in an almost sardonic fashion that he has his car and it is pristine condition, stating, "It's in perfect shape, not a scratch. You must lead a charming life." Indeed, Popeye and Cloudy had the police mechanic reassemble the car with the heroin still inside so that they can later catch them in the act with heroin-filled automobile. Naturally both petrified and paranoid as a result of his experiences with the police, Devereaux returns the Lincoln to Charnier and tells him that he is no longer willing to do him anymore favors. While he originally planned to have Devereaux do the job for him, Charnier is forced to drive the car to an old factory on Wards Island to meet Weinstock, Sal, and about a dozen other similarly swarthy criminals to finalize the drug deal. Although the deal could not have gone more smoothly and Charnier is quite happy to receive two briefcases full of cash for his international conspiratorial efforts, the French businessman is in for the shock of a lifetime upon driving across the Wards Island bridge and discovering Popeye standing at the front of a police roadblock on the other side of the bridge.

With nowhere to escape, Charnier heads back to Wards Island and thus conveniently leads the cops directly to his American business partners in the process. While most of the criminals flee to one of the old factory buildings, Charnier goes in the opposite direction and heads to a different ruined building where he seems to practically disappear into thin air. Naturally, while Cloudy and the rest of the cops go after the large group in the one building, Popeye predictably opts to hunt for his great rival Frog #1 in the other building. After getting in a gun fight that involves gassing out the criminals and shooting dumb wop Sal dead, Cloudy follows Popeye into the building. When Popeye notices a figure walking inside a room in the building, he wastes no time in unloading a storm of bullets on the individual, not realizing it is federal agent Mulderig. Somewhat humorously, Popeye is less than disheartened upon realizing that he has accidentally killed the very same enemy who accused him of getting other cops killed. When Cloudy remarks, "Mulderig. You shot Mulderig," Popeye totally ignores what he says, states while in a state of semi-madness in regard to Charnier, "The son of a bitch is here. I saw him. I'm going to get him," and then heads into the dark abyss of the ruined factory until he disappears from the frame. While the viewer subsequently hears a gunshot, it is never revealed where it came from in what is ultimately a poetically nihilistic conclusion to a poetically nihilistic film. In the end, the film concludes with an epilogue that reveals Joel Weinstock was indicted by a Grand Jury but the case was dismissed for 'lack of proper evidence,' poor celebrity pawn Devereux was convicted "guilty of conspiracy" and "Served four years in a Federal Penitentiary," and Alain Charnier was never caught and that he is believed to be living comfortably somewhere in France. As for the protagonists, "Detectives DOYLE and RUSSO were transferred out of the Narcotics Bureau and reassigned."

While one could certainly easily argue that The French Connection paints a somewhat unflattering and even sometimes perturbing portrait of early 1970s NYC cops, it indubitably features an exceedingly more disturbing depiction of the war on drugs and American legal system to the point where it hints that the government and American politicians protect and aid the very same criminals that it pretends to be fighting. Indeed, the protagonist and his buddy might be using dubious police methods that would probably horrify the average naive American citizen, but they still certainly come out looking like the only real good guys in the film, with Hebraic lawyer Weinstock—a fictional figure that is apparently a composite of multiple real-life criminals (the Jewish community in general?!)—being arguably the most repugnant character as a sleazy scumbag that contracts dumb dago fuck-ups to do his dirty work. Of course, the Jewish caricatures are no surprise if one considers that Friedkin's one-time fiancée/baby-momma, Australian dancer Jennifer Nairn-Smith, once stated regarding the filmmaker, "William denied his whole background. He hated being Jewish. Think Yiddish, dress British." Not surprisingly, as the historical documentary record unequivocally demonstrates, both wops and yids, who have a long and overlapping history together in organized crime, were involved in the real case that Friedkin's film is based on (notably, the slang term for heroin, 'smack,' is derived from the Yiddish word 'shmeck'). In fact, the real-life goombah mob underling that Sal Boca is based on, Tony Fuca, was the nephew of guido gangster Angelo Tuminaro who, due to his marriage to Jewess Bella Stein—the daughter of a powerful prohibition bootlegger and bigwig in the Jewish mob—acted as a liaison man between the Jewish and Sicilian mafias. Contrary to the great myth of 'noble' gangsters who refused to push dope as perpetuated by Hollywood films like Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather (1972), the Ashkenazi and Sicilian mobs always sold drugs (in fact, the Federal Bureau of Narcotics had identified Tuminaro as a major narcotics trafficker as far back as 1937). While Hollywood has been very careful to portray organized crime as a largely Sicilian and sometimes Irish enterprise, the Jewish mafia has always been the most powerful and government-connected (somewhat ironically, Hebraic mob boss Meyer Lansky's granddaughter Mira Lansky Boland worked as the "law-enforcement liaison" for the powerful Jewish anti-free-speech group the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) in the 1990's and even arranged expensive trips to Israel for certain influential American police officers who could potentially have something to 'offer' the ADL in return). After all, one must 'never forget' that Ukrainian-born Judaic mobster Semion Mogilevich masterminded the largest money laundering scheme in US history and managed to get away with washing 7 billion dollars through the Bank of New York, which is notably one of the owners of the so-called Federal Reserve System.

The French Connection is also notable in that it completely undermines the nasty little negrophiliac Hollywood myth that black drug dealers are strong, intelligent, and ultra-masculine Übermensch kings of the ghetto that have been forced to peddle dope dealers because of racism or some other absurd bullshit excuse. Of course, like all drug dealers, negro dope-peddlers are the worst sort of parasites as inordinately morally retarded psychopaths that profit off of the spiritual and cultural destruction of their uniquely forsaken communities. In Friedkin's film, these negroes come off as unwitting shabbos goy pawns and unconscious uncle toms who are so stupid that they do not even realize that the heroin that they are killing they own people with is provided to them via Jews, wops, and frogs. Quite hilariously, like the real-life contemporary black thugs featured in various videos all over the internet, after getting caught red-handed engaging in some preposterously stupid crime, the negroes in Friedkin's film literally bitch "I ain't do nothin'" (hence the recent popularity of the somewhat new pejorative term for blacks "Dindu") and incessantly talk back to the cops like a vile whiny bitch on the rag, which is surely something they learned from their government-subsided welfare queen single-mothers. In short, there is no confusion while watching The French Connection that, even what it comes to the drug trade, negroes are at the bottom of the food chain as low-level gram-peddlers that probably had no idea that the laced, watered down garbage that they are haplessly peddling originally derived from premium grade product from France.

While The French Connection was followed by an innately inferior yet somewhat entertaining fictional sequel entitled French Connection II (1975) directed by John Frankenheimer and an all more pointless made-for-TV spin-off entitled Popeye Doyle (1986) starring Ed O'Neill instead of Gene Hackman as the titular lead, I personally regard To Live and Die in L.A. (1985) as a sort of unofficial update of the aesthetic techniques and thematic motifs that Friedkin explored in the original film, albeit fittingly transported to the ultra-phony West Coast, which epitomized the worst of the Reaganite 1980s. Of course, in its featuring of various grotesque cripples and midgets (not surprisingly, Friedkin apparently owns original pieces of artwork by degenerate kraut commie artist George Grosz), an artist-cum-counterfeiter villain who creates quasi-Expressionistic art, and complimentary soundtrack by English new wave group Wang Chung, To Live and Die in L.A.—a cinematic work that also has an highly ambitious, refreshingly anarchistic, and unforgettable chase scene—has a somewhat bizarre arthouse meets Miami Vice vibe about it and thus somewhat lacks the unwaveringly visceral cinema-vérité essence of its 1970s East Coast predecessor. As someone that grew up around cops that worked some of America's worst streets, I can safely say that Friedkin is the only American filmmaker that I can think of that has taken a fairly realistic and reasonably objective approach to portraying real street smart police—warts and all—albeit without the phony Judaic anti-white liberal moral posturing.

Undoubtedly, The French Connection now seems somewhat antiquated in the sense that cops like the ones featured in the film no longer exist. As one veteran cop once told me, not even the toughest of criminals have the balls to fight cops anymore like they used to. Additionally, I have been told that one of the main reasons so many people have been shot and killed by the cops in recent decades is because police departments starting hiring small and physically weak cops due to complaints from the public that the police were beating the shit out of people. Of course, this backfired, as these small, weak, and oftentimes scared new cops, which include women, are much more likely to use their weapons than the old tough cops who were not afraid of brawling with violent black bucks on PCP (as any good cop can tell you, the only way to stop a deranged person that is high on angel dust is to knock them out). Additionally, as depicted in The French Connection, these old school tough cops were way less likely to ruin a negro's life by doing tedious things like busting him for a mere dimebag and instead used a more common sense approach to policing that usually involved merely destroying the drugs and letting the suspect(s) go free. I can also say that, although totally anti-drug, the police veterans I know are for the complete legalization and taxation of drugs because they consider the supposed war on drugs to be a bureaucratic joke, but I digress. Probably the only film about Jewish mobsters that quite deservedly won an Academy Award for Best Picture (as well as Best Actor (Hackman), Best Director (Friedkin), Best Film Editing, and Best Adapted Screenplay (Tidyman)), The French Connection undoubtedly makes Sergio Leone's Once Upon a Time in America (1984) seem like a Steven Spielberg movie in terms of its almost anarchic commitment to visceral authenticity in terms of the world of half-crazed cops and heroin-dealing wops. One must not also forget that, in terms of its splendidly unflattering depiction of the less Hollywood-esque segments of the city, the film indubitably demonstrates that 1970s NYC was a real-life dystopia that made the dystopian realm featured in 1970s sci-fi flicks like Richard Fleischer's Soylent Green (1973) seem like a silly leftist delusion as written and directed by individuals that wanted to ignore and obscure the real serious issues that plague the United States, especially American cities. Additionally, Friedkin's flick probably has the capacity to cause the mindless lemmings of the black lives movement to cry hysterically and/or suffer a serious panic attack. Also, it is hard not to love a film where Frenchmen are called 'frogs' by boorish Americans, especially when one of the frogs is portrayed by a rather respected Buñuel star who barely even spoke French.

William Friedkin* (1980)

Director William Friedkin is best known for his dated cop action film The French Connection and his overrated Antichrist horror-extravaganza The Exorcist. Friedkin's 1980 film Cruising is the overrated director's masterpiece. The film is one that came out way ahead of its time and was wasted on an American audience that couldn't appreciate the darker things in life. Cruising follows a cop (played by Al Pacino) as he goes undercover in the gay S&M subculture hoping to find a homosexual serial killer. This homosexual must be self-loathing, because his targets are always the men he engages in perverted acts with. These victims "made him do it." Cruising in a way reminded me of William Lustig's gritty and sometimes slow action film Maniac. That being said, Maniac star Joe Spinell also makes an appearance in Cruising as a misogynistic cop that forces drag queen prostitutes to perform fellatio on him. Not only does Cruising feature the depravity of the ultra macho S&M subculture, but it also features unexpected members of it. Cruising will be sure to scare anyone the next time they encounter a cop after watching it.

Al Pacino is best known for his performance as Michael Corleone in Francis Ford Coppola's Godfather trilogy. The American movie going audience cherishes the Godfather series as the peak of masterful filmmaking. I have no hesitation in stating that Al Pacino's performance in Cruising is superior to that of his performances in the Godfather series. Let's face it, any American wop on the street could have played the "stoic" godfather character just as easily. In Cruising, Pacino had to play the role of a cop and a man acting as a perverted homosexual. His performance in Cruising shows both his versatility as an actor and ability to take on daring roles. The whole Sicilian criminal and gangster thing, although hilarious, can get a little old after a while. Until I saw Cruising, I just thought of Al Pacino as your typical Sicilian American exploiting his race for financial gain. Cruising also features a notable soundtrack that compliments the overall chaotic nature of the film. Originally, the punk legends The Germs were supposed to contribute a number of songs to the film's soundtrack. I found it unfortunate that only one The Germs song (Lion's Share) made the film. The legendary singer of The Germs, Darby Crash, was also a sadistic homosexual that found his idols in Adolf Hitler, Oswald Spengler, Friedrich Nietzsche, and Charles Manson. With Darby Crash's style of dress and belligerent personality, he would have fit perfectly as one of the of the leather clad men looking to suffer permanent damage after a night at an S&M bar.

The gay community had a hissy fit upon the release of Cruising. People in the homosexual community felt that the film promotes violence and hatred against gays. I think that people who hate gays already have their mind made up on that issue regardless of the film Cruising. If anything, Cruising makes the gay community look a whole lot better than some show like Queer Eye For the Straight Guy. The mainstream homosexual media is a bunch of effeminate fairies that just give Americans more reason to hate them. I also checked out Amazon.com customer reviews for Cruising and an entire army of Gays excrement (lose bowels maybe?) their baseless claims that Cruising is a homophobic film.

Cruising easily has the most depth of any of the films William Friedkin has ever directed and will ever direct. The film takes a look at the psychological motivation of the gay killer and how his Daddy wouldn't give him any love. Al Pacino seems to find it hard not to get trapped in the world of gay S&M. The man has some serious scenes of self doubt in Cruising in which he explodes with homoerotic anger. The film also portrays the often domestic abuse between gay lovers quite accurately. I have had more than one cop tell me about a gay lover smashing in the face of another. Cruising should have been the first mainstream gay film put on a pedestal and not the viewer friendly gay romanticized love drama Brokeback Mountain.

TO LIVE AND DIE IN L.A.

William Friedkin* (1985)

After the commercial and critical failure of his absurdly underrated $22 million South American odyssey Sorcerer (1977)—a keenly kaleidoscopic remake of the classic black-and-white French-Italian thriller The Wages of Fear (1953) aka Le salaire de la peur directed Henri-Georges Clouzot—as well as his mostly forgettable crime-comedy The Brink's Job (1978) and his misunderstood sado-masochistic sodomite slasher flick Cruising (1980) starring Al Pacino in lurid leather-fag apparel, Chicago-bred auteur William Friedkin (The Exorcist, Killer Joe) fell out of favor in Hollywood and had a rather hard time obtaining film projects to work on, but he still managed to continue to direct some of the best and most subversive films to come out of Tinseltown, even if not many people took notice, with his obscenely stylish action-crime-thriller To Live and Die in L.A. (1985) being a great example of one of the director's most neglected works. A sort of The French Connection (1971) for the 1980s, albeit set on the west as opposed to east coast and minus the swarthy bearded frogs and junky negroes, the film is based on the 1984 novel of the same name written by former United States Secret Service Special Agent turned Hollywood screenwriter Gerald Petievich (The Sentinel, Boiling Point) and is about a morally dubious adrenalin junky Secret Agent who goes to great lengths to bust a murderous counterfeiter who moonlights as a degenerate artist and who likes to burn his own neo-expressionist Schoenberg-esque paintings. Opting to hire Dutch cinematographer Robby Müller after being impressed with his work on Wim Wenders' Paris, Texas (1984) and intentionally filming it around a number of remote post-industrial wastelands in Los Angeles, Friedkin managed to assemble a totally singular and nastily nihilistic synthesizer-driven (anti)tribute to Reaganism that quite shockingly gives artfulness and even perverse poetry to the mostly aesthetically worthless action-crime-thriller subgenre. Featuring a most fitting, if not sometimes cheesy, soundtrack by new wave group Wang Chung, obscenely outmoded neon-colored titles and a quasi-new romanticist fashion sense, To Live and Die in L.A. is one of those oh-so rare films that gives me a little bit of nostalgia for the mostly odious 80s, even though I only first saw it a couple years ago. Starring a number of great actors at a time when they were virtually unknown, including eccentric master actor Willem Dafoe (Antichrist, My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done?), perennial screen policeman William Petersen (Manhunter, CSI: Crime Scene Investigation), and goofy Guido John Turturro (Do the Right Thing, Barton Fink), the film also features rather striking performances as a hardcore crime flick where the characters truly go beyond good and evil and then some. Indeed, the film was also directed by a quasi-gangster-auteur who hired two real counterfeiters as technical advisors and who even used some of the “funny money” used in the film for his own personal use, or as the director hilariously confessed in his memoir The Friedkin Connection: A Memoir (2013), “When the film came out, there were news stories about people trying to make counterfeit money after seeing the step-by-step process in our film. I took some of the twenties, those printed on both sides of course, put them in my wallet, and spent them, in restaurants, shoe-shine parlors, and elsewhere. The money was that good.” Indeed, Friedkin is no limp-wrist poser and while watching To Live and Die in L.A., it is quite clear that the auteur has a deep fascination with and seemingly identifies with the counterfeiter artist played by Dafeo.

TO LIVE AND DIE IN L.A.

Beginning with a cliché Zionist propaganda scene of sorts where a devout towelhead with a bomb strapped to his body declares, “I’m ready to die [...] Death to Israel and American, and all the enemies of Islam! [...] I am a martyr. I will bomb myself on you and all the enemies of Islam!” while being confronted by the film’s Secret Service agent antihero Richard Chance (William Petersen) and his soon-to-be-retired partner Jimmy Hart (Michael Greene), To Live and Die in L.A. certainly seems like another banal crime movie for the first couple minutes or so, but that soon changes after a semi-deranged counterfeiter and dilettante painter named Eric “Rick” Masters (Willem Dafoe) and his brutish bodyguard Jack (played by legendary LAPD officer Jack Hoar) waste a nosey Secret Service agent. Indeed, old man Jimmy makes the major mistake of staking out the counterfeiter’s home on his own and is soon blown away with a shotgun, so his partner Chance vows to exterminate Masters. Unfortunately, Chance, who loves being a man of the law so he can regularly break the law, is assigned a seemingly kosher rookie dork named John Vukovich (John Pankow) as his new partner who turns out to be a patent pansy who likes to do everything by the book. Aside from being a nauseating nerd of the crybaby sort who would have probably made for a much more successful bank manager, Vukovich screws up on his first assignment after falling asleep while monitoring Masters, who ultimately kills his double-crossing attorney Max Waxman (Christopher Allport)—a super scumbag who got rich by representing hippie degenerates in court—but not before mocking his love of primitive negro art and literally blowing his balls off. Chance receives much better help from his quasi-hooker parolee/informant fuckbuddy Ruth Lanier (Darlanne Fluegel), who uses her voluptuous body and criminal connections to learn of the latest big news in the intricate criminal underworld. While Chance loves bungee-jumping and Masters loves painting and religiously exercising, both men are somewhat the same in that they use their lecherous girlfriends to further their careers. While Chance’s lady friend is a low-class whore who is more or less a sex slave to the Secret Agent, Masters’ girlfriend Bianca Torres (Debra Feuer) is a scheming bisexual dancer who likes hanging out with Latino girls and deformed people when not making amateur porn flicks with her literally money-making boyfriend.

Unbeknownst to Chance, his partner Vukovich secretly meets with Masters’

psychopathic lawyer Bob Grimes (Dean Stockwell), who will do anything to earn a buck, including working with coldblooded murderers. After Masters pays some incompetent black gangsters to put a hit on his friend Carl Cody (John Turturro) while he is in prison, agent Chance attempts to ply the targeted inmate with a lighter prison sentence. When Chance decides to get Cody out of prison in return for helping him show where Masters keeps his money-making factory, he ultimately looks like a major fool as the prisoner beats him up and manages to getaway. Ultimately, Chance and Vukovich decide to pretend to be big bankers from Palm Springs in a daring attempt to try to coerce Masters into making $1 million dollars worth of fake money for them, but the cunning counterfeiter demands at least $30,000 upfront before he begins the job. Unable to obtain that much cash from his cheap employers at the Secret Service, Chance comes up with the ridiculous and rather illegal plan to rob a Chinese criminal named Thomas Lin (Michael Chong) after his informant girlfriend Ruth gives him a lead that the Chinaman will be at a train station carrying $50,000 to purchase stolen jewelry, but when he and Vukovich kidnap the chink con, they discover he only has old phonebooks in his suitcase. On top of that, Lin, who is ultimately killed during a shootout, is an informant for the FBI, so Chance and Vukovich get in an insane car chase that almost leaves them both dead. After a police briefing about the death of informant Lin, whiny weakling Vukovich attempts to convince Chance that they should turn themselves in, but of course his partner is no anxiety-ridden wimp who plays by the rules and respectfully refuses. Of course, the two agents eventually bring Masters his money, through the counterfeiter seems suspicious of the cops. When Chance and Vukovich attempt to arrest Masters upon finally receiving the phony money, a struggle breaks out that leaves two of the men dead. Indeed, in a nasty little twist, Chance, like his deceased partner Jimmy, is annihilated after taking a close-range shotgun blow to the head, with Masters' scummy muscle Jack going down as well. After melodramatically crying to Chance's bloody corpse, "you can't do this to me!" as if his girlfriend had just broke up with him, Vukovich chases down Masters and discovers that the counterfeiter has set fire to his currency-creating warehouse. Before a somewhat anti-climatic fight breaks out that ultimately leaves the counterfeiter in mere ashes after accidentally setting himself on fire, Masters reveals to Vukovich that lawyer Grimes has been working for him all along. In the end, Masters' high dollar whore girlfriend Bianca inherits her late boy toy's estate and she celebrates by taking her mestizo girlfriend Serena (Jane Leeves) on a joy ride in her belated beau's sports car. As for Vukovich, he inherits his deceased partner Chance's hot whore informant girlfriend Ruth. Indeed, by the conclusion of the film, Vukovich has finally developed some testicular fortitude, but he has also degenerated into a quasi-psychopathic lunatic lawman who gets a natural high busting bad guys.

Unquestionably, one must give credit to director William Friedkin for killing

TO LIVE AND DIE IN L.A.

off the charismatic antihero of To Live and Die in L.A. during an all-too-brief, if not rather visceral and explosive, fight sequence. Apparently, the film was originally suppose to conclude with prick Vukovich being slaughtered instead, which I would not have minded seeing as the character is exceedingly repugnant in both appearance and character, as a sort of cop Jerry Seinfeld, albeit minus the insufferable Hebraic humor. Of course, Friedkin's film is a rare crime-thriller that breaks all the rules, as a work that is innately contra to the autistic action flicks of Michael Bay. In my humble opinion, To Live and Die in L.A. not only tops The French Connection in terms of grittiness and moral dubiousness, but is also an overall superior film, as an audacious and aesthetically aggressive anti-buddy cop flick that more or less lets the viewer know that America is a land of outlaws where cops and robbers are one and the same and where a statuesque woman will jump on any psychotic dickhead's swinging dick, so long as he feeds her voracious thirst for cash, be it counterfeit or otherwise. While I find most cinematic chase scenes to be about as entertaining as McDonalds commercials, To Live and Die in L.A. features one such scenario that borderlines on poetry of the post-industrial sort. As to the sort of formula that makes for such a great chase scene, Friedkin wrote in his memoir, "The chase" is the purest form of cinema, something that can't be done in any other medium, not in literature nor on a stage nor on a painter's canvas. A chase must appear spontaneous and out of control, but it must be meticulously choreographed, if only for safety considerations."

Featuring a sexually ambiguous deformed midget cripple who delights in 'Entartete Kunst,' quirky insults to archaic negro art (in one scene, Dafoe sardonically remarks regarding a small African statue that his attorney has just hit him in the head with, "18th-century Cameroon. Yes, your taste is in your ass"), a lipstick lesbian femme fatale that anticipates the lethally lecherous anti-heroine of Basic Instinct (1992), Willem Dafoe during his pre-fame days as a deranged 'tortured artist' twink who pretentiously cries while filming homemade porn with his lily-licking lady friend, and William 'CSI' Petersen having his brains blown out, To Live and Die in L.A. demonstrates that crime flicks can actually be quirky and idiosyncratic without compromising adrenalin and unhinged brutality. As to why Friedkin thinks the film was such a commercial failure despite receiving mostly good reviews, the director speculated, "The film opened to low grosses, and MGM did nothing to support it. Ted Turner owned MGM then, and TO LIVE AND DIE IN L.A. wasn't his cup of tea; he was busy colorizing classic black-and-white films for his television networks, an unpopular idea that ended badly for him when he announced he was planning to colorize CITIZEN KANE." A perniciously potent work where redemption seems like something out of a Hollywood fantasy and where art, criminality, and insanity are provocatively linked (notably, one of Dafoe's character's paintings looks strikingly like the 1910 painting Der Rote Blick aka Red Gaze by Arnold Schoenberg, whose art and music were considered the height of aesthetic degeneracy by the Nazis), To Live and Die in L.A. is ultimately a rare and distinguished argument for the artistic merit of action-packed cop flicks.

Bug Bug

William Friedkin* (2006)

Michael Shannon is easily one of my favorite modern day actors. Like Steve Buscemi before him, Shannon is able to spice up an otherwise dull film with his natural ability at playing a variety of wack-job and psychopath characters. In the 2006 film Bug directed by William Friedkin, Michael Shannon once again flawlessly plays a deranged character named Peter who schizophrenically believes he is a victim of biological experiments orchestrated by the U.S. government. In Bug, Peter escapes from a mental hospital and eventually finds himself in the motel room of Agnes, an emotionally unstable woman whose child disappeared years ago. Impressed with Peter's talent at properly using "big words" and the fact he is not an Ex-Con like her Ex-husband, Agnes starts a bizarre romantic relationship with Peter that revolves around keeping their hotel room bug-free. Like Agnes, the couple's motel room transforms to compliment Peter's fixation with destroying all bugs.

Despite the seemingly bizarre nature of their relationship, Peter and Agnes are not so different from most couples. After all, when a woman starts a new relationship with a guy, she soon begins to adopt the same interests as her man. Most women certainly would have no problem going from being a Neo-Nazi to a Wigger if she finds the appropriate Mr. Right to cause such an extreme transformation. In Bug, Peter just happens to be the perfect match for Agnes and she has no problem buying into her new man's delusional obsession with bugs, even if her new boy toy likes to self-mutilate himself in hopes of ridding imaginary bugs from his emaciated body. Also like most women, Agnes gets rid of friends that do not approve of her new boyfriend just as easily as throwing out rancid garbage. After all, all great relationships involve a large dose of obsession and Peter has enough obsessive behavior to go around. As their relationship builds up, so do the anti-bug decorations that crowd the once depressing (but now blue metallic) looking apartment.

I have never really been fond of William Friedkin's The Exorcist nor The French Connection, the two films that the overrated director has gained most of his cinematic notoriety from. Although nowhere near a perfect film, Bug is a film that is big on atmosphere, something that Friedkin's most popular films lack. Despite the seemingly disturbing nature of Peter and Agnes's relationship, Bug is a truly romantic film. The couple may end up climactically in flames but their relationship never fades away, a common tragedy that plagues even the greatest of couples. For fans of Michael Shannon, Bug is also a notable film as it one of few cinematic works that the underrated actor gets to flaunt his magical eccentricity as the protagonist as opposed to his typical role as supporting character actor. I know future Michael Shannon performances will be hard to beat when comparing his performance in Bug where after (unknowingly) sexually healing

psychosis. My son, my son, Michael Shannon what have ye done!

KILLER JOE

William Friedkin* (2011)

Undoubtedly, if I were to sum up American New Wave 'auteur' William Friedkin (The French Connection, Sorcerer) and his greatest talent as a filmmaker, the best compliment I could possibly give him is that he is one of the best, if not the best, exploitation filmmakers who ever lived as a macabre vaudevillian magician-like director who is able to give a certain degree of class and cleverness to celluloid trash, turning gratuitous sex and violence into pure style with seeming substance and, undoubtedly, with his latest work Killer Joe (2011), he takes this to new extremes and excess in terms of bad ass, bad taste. Taking Fagsploitation to new homo-inciting extremes with The Boys in the Band (1970) and Cruising (1980), getting away with a possessed teenage girl pounding her own pussy with a crucifix with his Catholicsploitation The Exorcist (1973), romanticizing crime from both sides of the law in The French Connection (1971) and To Live and Die in L.A. (1985), and taking the white trash family feud to more hospitable yet hopeless and thematically horrendous extremes with his new effort Killer Joe, kosher king of celluloid criminality William Friedkin is probably the only filmmaker, aside from Quentin Tarantino, who proves that big budget exploitation films can be made in Hollywood and that exploitation films can reach a sort of creative and entertainment equilibrium where every second of the film can be masterfully directed and singularly interesting, as opposed to the average 42nd Street Grindhouse movie of the 1970s where, aside from a couple scattered scenes, most of the work is totally disposable and without a shred of aesthetic or intellectual merit. Well into his 70s as one of the rare few from his generation who continues to craft innovative and controversial works, Friedkin is a unique, elderly filmmaker whose age does not reveal itself in his work, especially in regard to his aesthetically sadistic Southern Gothic blacker-than-a-sunburnt-Somalian-in-blackface black comedy Killer Joe, a superlatively seedy piece of trailer park tragicomedy based on a novel-turned-screenplay penned by Pulitzer Prize winner Tracy Letts where redemption and hope have been buried beneath an excess of untermensch waste in an overflowing Texas porter potty. The uniquely morally unredeeming tale of a swarthy, debt-ridden deadbeat white trash boy in his early 20s who plots with his half-retarded father and his wife to have a crooked psychopathic cop who moonlights as a contract killer kill his mother so he can inherit the insurance money, Killer Joe is a country-fried work of perversely and perniciously playful poverty porn Texan neo-noir where shockingly stupid decisions, inbred inborn bad luck, sex perversion of the criminal and incestuous sort, and undiagnosed personality disorders ultimately make for god damn deadly dumb ass circumstances. Sort of like the film Flannery O'Connor may have directed today were she alive in the modern era, and a filmmaker instead of a novelist and a totally nasty nihilist instead of a Roman Catholic, Killer

Joe features such a revolting and singularly ugly depiction of Southern ladies and gentlemen that the film could have never worked without a strong farcical flavor of the neo-Southern Gothic variety.

Dumb ass degenerate 22-year-old drug dealer Chris Smith's (Emile Hirsch) equally no class white trash mother Adele stole all of his cocaine, so he must come up with the money to pay back his lunatic redneck loan shark boss or face a very violent death, so he decides killing his coke-snatching mommy will be his best bet since, aside from deserving to die, she has a $50,000 insurance policy. Although a total loser and magnificently moronic individual who flagrantly fails at everything he tries, Chris is nowhere near as intellectually impoverished as his seemingly brain-damaged father Ansel (Thomas Haden Church), so it does not take much for the boy to convince his pa to become involved with a criminal conspiracy to kill Adele because, after all, she is the man's trailer park queen bitch of an ex-wife. Although a large man of reasonably immense muscle mass, Ansel is a cowardly cuckold who has no problem allowing his wife Sharla (Gina Gershon) to walk around his son with her greasy ebony beaver hanging out, so naturally his wife is made a silent partner in the criminal conspiracy as well. Assuming the insurance money will be given to his pixie-like teenage sister Dottie (Juno Temple), Chris ultimately has to split the money four ways, minus the $20,000 he has to pay police detective/contract killer "Killer" Joe Cooper (Matthew McConaughey) to kill his momma. A suave psychopath and Svengali-like Texan gentleman who dresses to impress and gives new meaning to the phrase 'tall, dark, and handsome,' Killer Joe hates deadbeats and bullshitters and can immediately smell such an unsavory sake-of-shit stench from Chris, and when the down-and-out drug dealer says he does not have the money upfront to pay for the contract killing upon their initial meeting, the creepily cold but cool-as-a-corpse cop essentially tells him to go fuck himself and pretend they never met. Somewhat surprisingly, Killer Joe changes his mind after remembering a brief meeting with sister Dottie and makes the deal with Chris and Ansel that he gets to keep the boy's sis as a retainer until he gets paid for his sinister services. A discernibly mentally unbalanced and seemingly semi-autistic lass who has been known to have imaginary romances with fat boys she has never spoke to (what she calls "pure love"), who creepily sleepwalks like a sassy schizophrenic somnambulist, and is eerily able to predict events before they happen in an almost clairvoyant-like manner, Dottie, in a strange sort of way makes for the perfect match for Killer Joe, who essentially falls in love with her at first sight and wastes no time deflowering her on their first date at the Smith Family mobile home.

Unfortunately, trouble in trailer park paradise begins to stir when Chris, who has intense incestuous feelings for his sister as insinuated throughout Killer Joe, decides he wants to call off the contract killing of his mom, so he can spare his little sis sexual slavery and keep her to himself, but unfortunately Joe has already done the hit and he forces the prodigal son Chris to help him get rid of momma

Adele's corpse in a body-blasting car explosion in front of some bourgeois red-neck BBQ restaurant. Rather unfortunately, after everything is said and done, and Adele's incinerated body parts are buried six feet under, it turns out the mangled matriarch did not leave the insurance money to her daughter Dottie, but her conspiring deadbeat boyfriend Rex, the same man that initially put the idea of killing off his girlfriend in the unwitting mind of pawn Chris. Being a masterful police detective, Killer Joe does some serious detective work, learning that perennial cuck idiot Ansel's conspiring cunt of a wife Sharla had an affair with Rex and convinced him to split the insurance money with him, which turned out to be $100,000 instead of $50,000 (the money is doubled in cases of accidental death). Knowing that the cocaine cowboy drug dealer he owes money to, Digger Soames (Marc Macaulay), plans to kill him and that Killer Joe probably will as well, Chris makes plans to run away to the south of the border and has convinced his beloved sister Dottie to come along with him. Meanwhile, Killer Joe confronts Ansel and Sharla at the Smith Family trailer and plays a game of physical and psychological torture against them. After Killer Joe reveals to Sharla that he knows about her scheme with Rex (who he alludes to having killed), the crazy cop beats the conniving slut to a bloody pulp and forces her to perform a simulated blowjob with a greasy fried chicken leg, which, as the sexually sadistic detective notes, she does like a true cocksucking champ and seasoned slut. Of course, seeing as his wife cuckolded him and cheated on him with his ex-wife's boyfriend, not to mention created a conspiracy to cheat the entire Smith family out of the insurance money, Ansel watches passively as Sharla is devastatingly degraded. Killer Joe makes the unflinching ultimatum to Ansel and Sharla that if they do not stop Chris from taking Dottie away, he will slaughter the entire family like pigs. When Chris inevitably shows up to pick up Dottie, a brawl breaks out and Ansel and Sharla attack Chris while Killer Joe proceeds to beat the boy to death. During all the commotion, Dottie, who is clearly out of her already fragile mind, picks up Chris' gun and ultimately shoots her brother and father. While pointing the gun at Killer Joe, Dottie tells her equally loony lunatic lover that she is pregnant and he will be a baby daddy. Killer Joe concludes in ambiguity, but if one thing it is for sure that Dottie's demon seed spawn will continue the white trash Smith/Cooper family legacy as the genetically tainted progeny of two unhinged hick Texans whose warped idea of romance is only transcended by their proclivity to go on violent murder rampages.

While it would be easy and tempting to peg William Friedkin as a typical Aryan-hating Hebrew in Hollywood who takes any opportunity to denigrate whites like many of his kinsmen in Hollywood, Killer Joe hardly seems like a piece of suavely stylized bolshevik-esque agitprop but the work of a man with an unhealthy affinity for the darker sides of humanity as demonstrated by past friendships with mafia members and his entire oeuvre, which contains a number of politically incorrect films, including Cruising (1980), which inspired hate campaigns among militant gays, who went as far as attempting to interfere with the film's shooting and staging various protests. As revealed in an article at the site jewishjournal.com conducted with William Friedkin about Killer Joe and regarding the director's patently pathological obsession with violence and human depravity, "he began the conversation with a surprising revelation about his penchant for extreme plots and characters: "I could have been a very violent person," the 76-year-old filmmaker said of his childhood. "I had no sense of right and wrong." Despite the influence of Hebrew school and his loving parents, Jewish immigrants from the Ukraine, he said, "my peer pressure was such that I was involved in armed robberies as a young teenager." Of course, Friedkin was not the only Judaic involved with the making of Killer Joe as Emile Hirsch (of partial Ashkenazi extraction) and Gina Gershon are also Israelites, thus making the cinematic work a somewhat kosher piece of country fried comically-inclined crime grit. Sadistically stylized celluloid southwestern sleaze with a dried up and decidedly dead desert lonestar heart, Killer Joe is like the Tennessee Williams' penned classic Baby Doll (1956) meets the Coen brothers' Blood Simple (1984) meets The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 (1986) meets Friedkin's own Bug (2007), with a little bit of Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986) thrown in for good measure. Maybe it is because I never cared much for The Exorcist (1973), but I do not think it is a stretch to say that Killer Joe is easily Friedkin's best film since Cruising. An unflattering allegory for everything that is distinctly and degenerately American as a cleverly crafted piece of sick and salacious celluloid sleaze directed by an elderly Hebrew and starring Semite stars in the dubious roles of America's dirtiest of white trash genetic turds, Killer Joe reflects a perennially medieval-minded peasant people with next to nil class or culture, but a sick obsession with procuring soulless sex and blood money at any cost, including matricide/familicide. A rare contemporary cinematic work that allows the viewer to laugh at the fact the world's greatest (former) world power is populated by beer-chugging, monster-truck-loving, money-grubbing morons and maniacs whose shortsightedness is only transcended by their lack of intrinsic values of any and every sort, Killer Joe is also a potent reminder of why America can be so easily run by criminals and/or foreigners and why the Southwest might as well be given back to Mexico. Featuring foul femme fatales of the tactless sort who con the boyfriends of their husband's ex-wife, shadowy trailer park alleyways illuminated only by busted lights, hardboiled hick crime melodrama of the irredeemable variety, and creamy c(o)unt-ry fried-kin cynicism and no hope for the hopelessly stupid, Killer Joe is the radical result of what happens when a blue-collar Jewish celluloid chef is put in charge of cooking up Southern Gothic film noir in the age of the Amero-pocalypse.

MR. FREEDOM

William Klein (1969)

If you're an American leftist filmmaker and you're looking to make a film denigrating your homeland, France is probably the best place to film or so thought Jewish-American photographer-turned-filmmaker and super cynical Semite William Klein when he decided to direct his second feature Mr. Freedom (1969), as well as virtually every other film he ever directed. Described by veteran American film critic Jonathan Rosenbaum as being, "conceivably the most anti-American movie ever made," Mr. Freedom is the sort of highly predictable Levite leftist revisionist view of history where the shadowy evil doers are determinedly depicted as banal, boorish, and barbaric waspy white Americans, but as history has proven since the over four decades since the film's initial release, the color, creed, and culture of the United States has changed for the discernibly darker, thus one of the many reasons why this would-be-sharply-sardonic cinematic work seems absurdly anachronistic and even asinine, at least to those people who do not borrow their sense of history and politics from The Daily Show, MTV, and/or mischling multiculturalist Tim Wise. Centering around a pseudo-superhero named "Mr. Freedom" who goes on a mission to France to save freedom-hating frogs from a commie takeover from Switzerland, Mr. Freedom attempts to go further in its aesthetic absurdism and flagrant farce of the Cold War than Stanley Kubrick's Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb (1964) and for about the first 30-minutes of the film, I was willing to give auteur Klein's work some serious consideration in attempting this rather respectable feat, but his film inevitably collapses faster than the USSR did in 1991. Offending Marxist-Leninist groups during its premiere at the 1968 Avignon Festival due to its racially-charged caricatures of the Soviet Union (depicted as a sneaky and sadistic swarthy Stalinist Cossack/Slav named "Moujik Man") and Maoist Red China (a gigantic inflatable dragon with chinky, sneaky eyes named "Red China Man"), Mr. Freedom never really developed a following in France and is virtually unknown in the United States, which is probably for a good reason as faux-Frenchman William Klein is certainly no Dušan Makavejev, but more like the slightly more sophisticated Godfather of horrendous Hebraic hacks Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer, except occasionally funny and marginally culturally astute. Starring French Feminist superstar Delphine Seyrig (Last Year at Marienbad, Freak Orlando) and featuring cameos from monkey-man musician Serge Gainsbourg, as well as semi-popular actors like Donald Pleasence and Philippe Noiret, Mr. Freedom is, at best, an exceedingly uneven footnote from film history, and, at worst, just another example of the intellectually bankrupt left, especially the post-Talmudic kosher cosmopolitan sort.

A work of low-camp comic book cinema of the completely cynical and contrived 'crazy' sort directed by a curiously cliché member of the "culture of critique,” Mr. Freedom uses established stereotypes to an exceedingly exaggerated extreme to both simultaneously discredit and validate them, depending on the race and persuasion of the stereotype. Of course, those individuals of the white conservative Southerner sort, like the ostensible ‘protagonist’ Mr. Freedom (played by American John Abbey, whose only other notable role was as a supporting character in Jacques Tati’s 1967 film Playtime), are those that confirm an unflattering stereotype in Klein’s cinematic tribute to everything he hates about Amerikkka, with the satirized faux-superhero acting as an allegorical composite of all his dislikes. A rough and tough sheriff by day and a commie, gook, and Negro-smashing, misogynistic superhero whenever he is vehemently vying for freedom under the the guidance of Dr. Freedom (Donald Pleasence) so as to annihilate the red, black, yellow, and brown menace around the world, Mr. Freedom sports an innately idiotic uniform that characterizes everything that is moronic about America, American football – a sport that promotes an impenetrable dichotomous/dualistic “sports mentality,” capitalism, worship of moronic and mundane meatheads, blind allegiance to “teams,” boorishness and anti-intellectualism, and, most of all, “Americanism.” During the beginning of Mr. Freedom, the hero crashes through the apartment window of a large family of JFK-loving Negroes and like a true old school confederate calls them “boys” and shoots one for shoplifting (but gunning down the rest on his way out of the window), but ultimately more stressing matters concern Mr. Freedom as he is called by Dr. Freedom from “Central Freedom,” which is symbolically featured at the top floor of a building featuring big corporate floors like Texaco, Shell, General Motors, Standard Oil, etc., in concern to the very possible red invasion of France. As Dr. Freedom tells his political soldier, “We have trouble in France. The Red commies are infiltrating from Switzerland...Let me tell you about the French. They are 50 million...mixed-up, sniveling crybabies who haven’t stood on their two feet since Napoleon. And that wasn’t yesterday. And Napoleon wasn’t even French...So the French are the white man’s burden. Our burden. We’ve had to carry them through two world wars already and we’re damn well gonna have to carry them through the next,” which is a sentiment I can generally concur with, but as Mr. Freedom learns himself, there is no hope for the hopeless.

Naturally, Mr. Freedom goes to Frogland and attempts to battle the commies with his crude and crass charisma, but the first thing he conquers (or so he thinks) is the heart, soul, and mind of a femme fatale named Marie-Madeleine (played by a decadently dolled-up and whored-out Delphine Seyrig), and he puts the busty broad in her place by aggressively remarking regarding her belief about the political futility of the Vietnam war with, “Listen, baby, there’s us and there’s them. We are Freedom, the real America. They are Red-ass, black-ass, Jew-ass farts who can’t even spell America.” Seeing as director William Klein is a ‘Jew-ass fart,’ he clearly establishes what “America” he identifies with and the intrinsically imaginary white Christian he hates and thinks is in control of the U.S., as symbolized by the super duper dumbass superhero Mr. Freedom. Not long after arriving in France, Mr. Freedom is honored by his French compatriots, "Friends of Freedom," at a sort of fratboy sports party featuring his self-described "white guards," including pink klu klux klaners, cheap dimestore whore cheerleaders, effeminate frog fascists, and a piano-playing Serge Gainsbourg who proudly proclaims, "I love freedom." Of course, not everyone enjoying a sabbatical in France loves freedom, as a number of commie assassins attempt to exterminate Mr. Freedom and his one-man counter-revolution against radical red rodents. Mr. Freedom also has John Wayne-style verbal showdowns with Stalinist Moujik Man, Maoist Red China Man, and a new growing threat, the anti-freedom FAF. Mr. Freedom also gives "Super Frenchman" – the ruler of France – an ultimatum of "us or them," which will also prove to be a source of his demise. Unfortunately, for him "Freedom" has lost a lot of credibility since its victory during the Second World War and Mr. Freedom is not winning any allies by mirthfully machine-gunning down French citizens for fun. Upon learning that his mistress Marie-Madeleine is a femme fatale and spy and that the FAF refuses to negotiate, Mr. Freedom declares an end to the Cold War and enacts a bomb-based blitzkrieg of offensive escalation (destroying at least half of France in the process). Of course, with France being full of pansy communist protestors, but especially a growing number of FAF anti-freedom terrorists, Mr. Freedom faces retaliation via the execution of all his French "Friends of Freedom," and inevitably goes out in a blaze a glory that is less than appreciated by the country he dedicated his life to.

Featuring real stock-footage of American race riots, the commie student uprising in May 1968 in France, white Americans backing the war in Vietnam, and other socio-politically relative material from that time (as a full-time photographer and sometimes filmmaker, Klein was foremost a documentarian, hence his incompetency with narrative cinema), Mr. Freedom is as blatantly out-of-date as it is embarrassingly comedically contrived, thus making for a film that is virtually the arthouse Team America: World Police (2004) of its time, albeit less iconoclastic and coherent. Essentially, William Klein took what was an interesting enough idea for a film and drowned it with his hysterical, Hebraic arrogance and, not unlike his own kinsman in Hollywood, portrayed the American majority (i.e. white Christian of European descent) as barbaric goy philistines who enjoy nefarious activities like family cookouts, golden retrievers, coca cola, and a good fight. Some 40+ years later since the films release, France is now the leftist utopia Klein long ago dreamed of as a culturally and racially mongrelized virtual corpse being fed on by hostile aliens from the Global South of mostly the Arab/African Islamic persuasion (who are quite keen on crushing that 'cultivated' cosmopolitan culture) and where a sort of virus of nihilism or 'mental AIDS' occupies the minds of its indigenous population and emasculated elite, including xenophilia, ethnomasochism, and spiritual castration where the effete archetypal homosexual male is looked at as the height of ideal 'manhood,' while ideals like honor, loyalty, family, patriotism, and well, the actual will to survive, are looked at as outmoded ideals from a bygone misogynistic time. As for contemporary America and the spread of 'democracy' (aka pro-American regime) or New American imperialism, it is certainly not of the traditional 'white man's' (aka European) creed as expressed in its patent Pro-Zionist Philo-semitism and its war against Europe, including attempting to neutralize Russia (thus destroying any tangible relationship between Europe, which is the Pentagon's worse nightmare) and promotion of nonwhite/Islamic immigration (including promotion of historically hostile/non-white Turkey into the EU) despite the fact that towelheads are supposedly terrorists, not to mention how American leaders (both of the ostensible "right" and "left") promote the mongrelization of the nation via pro-illegal immigration of solely nonwhite peoples to replace the existing population of whites from every class level, including the growing under-classes (filled with Mexicans and other Indios and Meztizos, as well as virtually every other Third World 'immigrants' from around the world) and the upper-classes (with Indians and East Asians taking over technical fields). That being said, if William Klein wanted to update his Mr. Freedom character, it would need to be a racially dubious character of a brownish complexion (preferably a fellow who claims to be of the Hebraic faith, but of Kenyan, Irish and Ashkenazi heritage) who still sports the football uniform, but of blue and white coloring (in tribute to America's "greatest ally" Israel) and who advocates a hodgepodge of so-called 'Judeo-Christianity,' humanism, multiculturalism (which, would be better described as racial/cultural chaos at the benefit of multinational corporations), Noahide laws, Hollywoodism, corporatism, LGBT extremism, and seemingly inexplicable 'anti-Americanism' (of the traditional anti-Euro-American sort) and then maybe the director would be approaching something resembling actual reality as opposed to a hysterical Hebrew Weltanschauung.

William Lustig (1980)

While it is only speculation on my part, I can only assume that I was not the only one who was baffled to learn that turdsh child actor turned Hollywood hobbit Elijah Wood was to star in a remake of the celebrated cult horror slasher flick Maniac (1980) directed by William Lustig and starring/co-written by legendary grizzled guido Joe Spinell. As someone who only enjoys Lustig's Maniac due to its accidental camp value, sleazy and cheesy celluloid grit, rather retarded and ridiculous exaggerated violence, and the unintentional comedic value of seeing a big swarthy wop like Joe Spinell crying and playing with dolls, I especially had a hard time taking seriously the idea of a decent budget and lavishly stylized remake of the film, especially with an ostensible 'Frenchman' in the director's chair and a world class wiry wuss like Elijah Wood portraying a murderous mad man with an ominous Oedipus complex. Maybe because my first recollection of Wood is his unintentionally hilarious preteen performance as the good son in The Good Son (1993) or that I find Peter Jackson's The Lord of the Rings trilogy to be the most epically aesthetically revolting film trilogy in all of film history, but taking a pedomorphic pretty boy seriously as a schizophrenic serial killer makes as much sense to me as seeing Steven Spielberg directing a minimalistic arthouse film or Werner Schroeter directing big budget children's fantasy flicks for Disney. When I learned that the Maniac remake was a quasi-Horror-of-personality work filmed from the perspective of the killer via POV shots in similar fashion to the British horror masterpiece Peeping Tom (1960) directed by Michael Powell, it only made me think all the more that director Franck Khalfoun (P2, Wrong Turn at Tahoe) was utilizing the atypical technique to make the seemingly totally harmless Elijah Wood seem like a murderous misogynist with macabre mommy issues and after watching the film, my assumption seems to be correct. Maybe it is because we live in a positively pussified age where men dress like color blind women and women dress like gay men, but no matter how many Suicide Girl-esque chicks and dumb blondes Mr. Wood scalped in Maniac, I was not able to suspend my belief long enough to forget the actor seems about as threatening as a poodle puppy with rabies. Co-written and produced by Hebraic frog horror hack Alexandre Aja (High Tension, The Hills Have Eyes)—a man who loves remaking horror flicks/rehashing beaten-to-death horror conventions and has consistently emphasized undeniably alluring yet innately vapid style over substance and storyline—and featuring aesthetic and atmospheric similarities with contemporary cult classics like Gaspar Noé's Enter the Void (2009) and Drive (2011) directed by Nicolas Winding Refn, Maniac is undoubtedly one of the most aesthetically pleasing and meticulously stylized serial flicks I have seen this year, so it only makes it all the more of a cinematic tragedy that it is also a terribly derivative and poorly cast and written work that had many of the ingredients to be an immaculate phantasmagorical horror fever dream but seems more like the typical horror remake nightmare, as if producer Alexandre Aja was the real man in the director's chair.

Momma's boy maniac mannequin dealer Frank Zito (Elijah Wood) comes from a rather idiosyncratic family background. Despite the fact that his mother owned a vogue mannequin sales business, which he inherited after her death, Frank's mother moonlighted as a sleazy streetwalker who had no problem sharing her extensive carnal knowledge with her prepubescent son, including cocaine-fueled threesomes with glittery Guidos and animalistic public sex. Like many boys with horrendous mothers, Frankie boy grew up to be a deranged dude with sexual problems, especially in regard to 'rising to the occasion' in the bedroom and confusing violence with sex. In fact, while recalling a bad memory of his mother boning two bros, he looks at his genitals, only to schizophrenically see that his lower half has been replaced with that of a mannequin and that he has a small stub where his penis and testicles should be. A spiritual eunuch, Frank has some trouble with a sexually aggressive girl he met on an online dating site, so when the lecherous lady attempts to give him a blowjob, he strangles her and rips off her scalp, as he thinks such actions are apparently willed by his dead mommy, or so the lunatic lad seems to think. Unfortunately, every time Frank freaks out, kills a chick, and puts her bloody scalp on one of his mannequins, the mannequin takes on the identity of the girl whose hair it bears, at least in his own mind, which naturally further strengthens the micro mad man's already overwhelming schizophrenia. Of course, things get a bit weird for the aberrant anti-Don Juan when he starts a friendship with a French photographer named Anna (Nora Arnezeder), when he runs into when the beautiful blonde and asks if she can take photographs of his marvelous collection of avant-garde mannequins. Unlike most girls, Anna finds Frank's peculiarities and idiosyncrasies to be endearing and even absurdly calls him "the last romantic" after he absurdly describes Robert Wiene's German expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) as having a "happy ending." It does not take long for fucked Frank to fall in love with Anna, so naturally the impotent serial killer helps her set up art exhibit using his mannequins. Of course, Frank does not take it well when he learns Anna has a black buck of a boyfriend, who insinuates the psycho killer is gay and played with dolls as a child when the two meet at the big art exhibit. At the exhibit, Frank also meets Anna's middle-aged mentor/art director Rita (Jan Broberg), who embarrasses the virginal man-boy by first attempting to seduce him and then accusing him of being a homo, so he scalps her too. Naturally, Anna is distraught when she learns of Rita's tragic death and Frank comes by her apartment to console her, but being a warped wack-job, the sloppy serial killer inadvertently admits he was responsible for the art director's death. After a number of ridiculous mishaps involving absurd car crashes, heroic gay brown boi actors, and whatnot, Anna and probably two other people are left dead, but the psycho killer makes sure to grab his lady love's beautiful blonde scalp. In the end, Frank, who is severely wounded after his altercation with Anna, goes home and puts his beloved's blonde weaves on a bridal scalp, but ultimately dies as a result of his wounds, hallucinating that all of his mannequins have come to life and are ripping him apart in a George A. Romero-esque fashion.

A largely typical postmodern genre film of its uniquely unoriginal zeitgeist, Maniac features a number of masturbatory fanboy references to various classic horror flicks, including The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), Eyes Without a Face (1960), Peeping Tom (1960), Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), and The Silence of the Lambs (1991), thus making it a work of the Quentin Tarantino and Rob Zombie school of filmmaking, albeit with a Franco-torture-porn angle. Were a better suited (or even unknown actor) cast for the leading role of Maniac as opposed to eternally pouty baby boy Elijah Wood, I might have found the film more believable and enthralling, but instead I found it to be one big pretty piece of pomo puffery directed by a seeming cinematic savage with a knack for style but without a soul. Of course, director Franck Khalfoun revealed his seriousness as a cinematic artist when during a screening of Maniac where audience members fainted and vomited, the filmmaker gleefully stated regarding such bodily malfunctions that he took them "as a compliment," adding, "We had a screening here in Los Angeles and somebody passed out, which I pat myself on the back for. The movie had to creep on you – it's a different kind of fear; it's more of a nauseating fear. You really have the opportunity to maybe feel the [nausea] of committing crime rather than glorifying it just for the aspect of fun and thrill. The audience gets to experience for the first time how sick [it is to commit murder] – we're certainly not condoning it, but making a real statement about serial killers." Of course, Maniac makes nil new statements about serial killers and simply rehashes the Hitchcockian Psycho/Ed Gein angle of crazy-mommies-make-crazy-sons. Compared to highly original and innovative European art-house serial killer flicks like Gerald Kargl's Angst (1983) and Jörg Buttgerit's Schramm (1993), Maniac seems like a sort of celluloid 'Serial Killer Film For Dummies' designed to impress naïve horror novices and make veteran American horror fanatics feel falsely intelligent for being able to count all the various references to classic horror flicks. Undoubtedly, when a director decides to recycle the iconic song "Good-bye Horses" by Q. Lazzarus from The Silence of the Lambs—arguably the most popular serial killer flick ever made—it is quite apparent that the director has run out of fresh material. Assuredly, horror cinema will be officially dead when someone like Khalfoun remakes Buttgerit's Nekromantik (1987) utilizing the soundtrack from Rosemary's Baby (1968). At best, Khalfoun's tedious take on Maniac is an azoic big budget gonzo porn for jaded gorehounds and serial killer fetishists.

FAIR-HAIRED CHILD

William Malone (2006)

I recently acquired a free lot of Masters of Horror episodes on DVD. The horror series has become quite a fun way to spend my free time. It brings me back to my childhood days of watching nickelodeon's Are You Afraid of the Dark?. The majority of Masters of Horror episodes (which are really just low budget and practically full length films) are better than a majority of the contributing director's films. The reason for this is most likely due to the more concrete and collected approach taken by the director. The episodes use simple yet effective stories (fairytale like in nature) to produce engaging hour long thrill rides (like Are You Afraid of the Dark? did).

William Malone is possibly one of the worst horror directors ever. Malone's FearDotCOM is a "film" that I can't even remember one aspect of. The film is evidence that the Hollywood film industry is about who you know and not about what talent you may or may not possess (Malone is more than lacking). William Malone acted as one of the "Masters of Horror" directors. He happened to direct the episode Fair-Haired Child. This episode is by far the lacking director's single greatest moving picture achievement. With a small scale budget, it seems Malone actually had to put effort into the creative aspects of film.

Fair-Haired Child story looks to be made up from various source materials. In the beginning of the episode, we are introduced to high school aged social outcast by the name of Tara. Like Carrie from Brain De Palma's film of the same name, Tara is the object of ridicule by her fellow female classmates. From the get go, we know she is someone that thinks and acts independently due to necessity. Fair-Haired Child also owes credit to Wes Craven's People Under the Stairs. Tara is captured by a sadistic and highly educated white couple. Like the young boy in People Under the Stairs, Tara is trapped in a basement from hell. The boy she meets in his basement also lacks the ability to talk (like in the Wes Craven film). Finally (if I didn't miss any other influences), the film borrows the young boy drowning situation found in overrated slasher Friday the 13th. The teenage boy's parents are the people responsible for Tara's kidnapping. I won't go into why the sadistic kidnapped the loner girl.

A fetus looking demon appears in Fair-Haired Child as the killer of teenagers. The demon does so in attempts to fully resurrect the drowned teenage boy. Despite Fair-Haired Child's simple and contrived plot, it offers an entertaining one hour spent. I can also say the same about the other handful of Masters of Horror episodes that I have watched. Maybe mainstream horror directors should stick to television.

THE NINTH CONFIGURATION

William Peter Blatty (1980)

Described by its writer/director William Peter Blatty as the true sequel to The Exorcist (1973), The Ninth Configuration (1980) aka Twinkle, Twinkle, Killer Kane may not feature a demonically-possessed Lolita ravaging her naughty bits with a wooden crucifix, but it is certainly no less controversial as a work featuring Jolson-esque blackface minstrel shows, racially charged jokes, and arguably the most strangely uplifting suicide scene in cinema history. Although it is set in a real Gothic castle, makes multiple references to Bela Lugosi, and features Joe Spinell of Maniac (1980) fame, The Ninth Configuration features a hysterical hodgepodge of genre conventions and aesthetic styles and they rarely, if ever, resemble those from the horror genre, especially the rather limited subgenre The Exorcist belongs to, though the film evolves into a rather dark and foreboding work during the second half. Indeed, the film is a sequel to The Exorcist in the mainly philosophical/theological sense, as while the first film deals with themes surrounding the existence of good and evil, The Ninth Configuration deals with the mystery of god and good and whether either of them actually exist. Blatty's directorial debut is also connected to The Exorcist in that the character of astronaut Captain Cutshaw is in both films, with the character playing a central role in The Ninth Configuration as a somewhat nihilistic fellow who doubts the existence of god and genuine human goodness. A work that writer/director Blatty himself regards as superior to The Exorcist (Blatty had many disputes with director William Friedkin and Warner Brothers over this film) as his most prized and beloved personal creation, The Ninth Configuration is certainly a singular and underrated work that personifies what a cult film is, as a film made for the few as a somewhat esoteric piece of celluloid with multiple layers, hence why the work was a commercial failure of sorts, even though it received a Best Picture nomination at the 1981 Golden Globe Awards and would ultimately earn the writer/director a Golden Globe for his screenplay. Based on the director's 1966 comical novel with philosophical/theological undertones, Twinkle, Twinkle, "Killer" Kane, The Ninth Configuration was originally supposed to be directed by William Friedkin, but none of the studios were interested in the rather unconventional screenplay, so Blatty decided to work with The French Connection director on The Exorcist instead. Of course, The Exorcist was a big hit and it gave Blatty the opportunity to realize the film he originally wanted to make, but before that he revised Twinkle, Twinkle, "Killer" Kane and republished it in 1978 under the title The Ninth Configuration, remarking, "After THE EXORCIST, I decided that I could develop the story a great deal. So I rewrote it and fleshed it out, Cutshaw became the astronaut in THE EXORCIST that Regan warns about going into outer space and fully developed the deeper implications and theological themes." After failing to find a studio brave enough to take on such an insanely idiosyncratic work that would, at best, appeal to an extremely marginal audience, Blatty decided to put $2 million of his own money into the production, with PepsiCo conglomerate putting in $2 million more under the stipulation that the work be shot in Hungary (apparently, PepsiCo had block funds in that then-commie country and reinvested money from the film's production into a Pepsi bottling plant there). The most senselessly sardonic yet passionately philosophically serious film about a curious collection of eccentric soldiers occupying an ancient European castle since Sydney Pollack's similarly underrated masterpiece Castle Keep (1969), The Ninth Configuration is a strangely hopeful work that, despite its dead serious moments of melancholy and themes of suicide, nihilism, neuroticism, and general mental illness, ultimately uplifts the viewer in the end, as a work of Gothic-metaphysical-slapstick-psychodrama of the anti-Freudian sort that manages to touch on virtually every single human emotion and condition in a fashion that does not betray the work's overall message like one would expect from a typical phony Hollywood film. The Ninth Configuration also happens to feature what is probably the single greatest bar brawl scene in cinema history.

Due to an inexplicable amount of American soldiers suffering from psychosis during the Vietnam War, the U.S. government has setup a number of secret study centers/loony bins to experiment on the mental military men. Since the Vietnam War is an unpopular war, the government wants to find out if these soldiers are merely faking their mental illnesses or not. The eighteenth and final one of these hidden military mental hospitals is located at a large Gothic castle in the Pacific Northwest of the United States and a rather serious yet well meaning fellow named Colonel Kane (Stacy Keach), who is a former member of a United States Marine Corps special unit, has been sent there to treat a dozen or so patients with an eclectic array of mental disturbances. Kane is a stone cold serious and somewhat humorless fellow who almost seems to take his job too seriously, sort of in the manner of a 'true believer' type. Like most psychiatrists, Kane also has his fair share of mental problems, as he always has debilitating nightmares when it rains involving the violent murder of a boy in Vietnam. The patients of the castle are ordered around by a somewhat cynical fellow with a less than impressive IQ named Major Groper (Neville Brand) who seems to detest the mentally challenged soldiers, especially due to their erratic behavior, which includes (but is certainly not limited to) urinating while saluting a commander and undermining their superior's authority in rather wacky ways. Upon arriving at the castle, Colonel Kane is given a brief description of each soldier's mental peculiarities by a mostly serious yet sometimes sarcastic fellow named Colonel Richard Fell (Ed Flanders). Most importantly, Kane learns about a special patient named Captain Billy Cutshaw (Scott Wilson) who, as an astronaut, abruptly aborted a mission to the moon during takeoff after suffering from a major mental breakdown of sorts. When Kane meets with Cutshaw, he asks him why he decided to abort his trip to the moon but the ex-astronaut evades the question and instead says weird and whimsical things like, "Show me a Catholic and I'll show you a junky" and "The man in the moon tried to fuck my sister...The truth of the matter is...Custer..called Sitting Bull a spick," though he gives the psychiatrist his coveted St. Christopher medal as a literal and figurative symbol of respect. That night, Kane suffers a horrible nightmare and tells Colonel Fell the next morning how his nightmares are really those of a former patient of his who cut off a goofy-looking Vietnamese boy's head with a wire-trap and killed another couple dozen people with his bare hands. Kane also reveals that the former patient in question is named Vincent "Killer" Kane and that he is his brother, though he is dead.

Meanwhile, a patient named Lieutenant Frankie Reno (Jason Miller), who is currently working on a version of Shakespeare's Hamlet starring dogs instead of people, spots Colonel Kane staring into space in a seemingly psychosis-ridden state, so he tells Cutshaw and both mental patients conclude that the psychiatrist is crazy himself because, after all, shrinks are typically somewhat demented themselves and have the highest suicide rate of any profession. When Groper complains about having to wear a SS officer uniform during an experimental role-playing session where the psychiatrists portray Nazis and the patients pretend to be Allied prisoners of war, Kane flips out and yells at the Major like a mad man with a sort of venomous and seemingly murderous hatred, telling him he has to do what he is ordered to do and that if he tries to take off the aesthetically pleasing black uniform, he will "die in it." Eventually, Kane and Cutshaw have a heated debate about the existence of god, with the former arguing that human goodness proves the existence of god, stating, "You're convinced God is dead because there's evil in the world? [...] Then why don't you think he is alive because of the goodness in the world?" At the end of their talk, Cutshaw asks Kane, "If you die first and there's life after death, will you give me a sign?" and the Colonel agrees, albeit somewhat reluctantly. Cutshaw also asks Kane to take him to Catholic mass, which he does, and the astronaut seems to be getting better as a result of his new found religious devotion, as his neurotic behavior and wild outbursts begin to disappear, but that all changes when a new patient named Sergeant Gilman (Gordon Mark) arrives at the castle. When Gilman sees Kane, he recognizes him and calls him "Killer Kane," thus causing the psychiatrist to have a flashback where he recollects decapitating a gook boy, which causes him to collapse and become unconscious, though when he wakes up, he has no recollection of the incident. Indeed, as Colonel Fell explains to his staff, Kane is indeed the infamous "Killer Kane" who killed the Vietnamese boy and a couple dozen other people, which ultimately led to him suffering a complete mental breakdown and the complete disintegration of his personality, at least the 'evil' part. Fell also reveals that he is really the crazed killer's psychiatrist Hudson brother and that Kane was so overcome with guilt due to his murderous behavior that he “killed” the evil killer part of his identity and developed the psychiatrist persona of his brother, thereupon subconsciously convincing himself that by curing other mental patients he would be able to atone for the sins of his past. The Army psychiatric staff decided to allow Kane to carry on his charade, even though Fell is the one that has been in command all along, with a fellow named Sergeant Krebs (Tom Atkins) even acting as “Kane’s keeper.”

Naturally, Cutshaw freaks out upon discovering that Kane is really “Killer Kane” as he feels he has been lied to and betrayed, and thus goes AWOL and heads to a bar where a biker gang (played by a real Viennese biker gang) led by a dumb dude that sports eyeliner named Stanley (Steve Sandor) and his sadistic buddy Richard (played by Richard Lynch, who in 1967 while under the influence of drugs, decided to set himself on fire, thus resulting in burn marks on 70% of his body) begin tormenting him by using him as their own personal “beach ball” after recognizing him as the astronaut who was all over the media after aborting his mission to the moon. Eventually, a waitress becomes distressed by how the bikers are treating Cutshaw, so she calls information, absurdly asking the operator, “Do you have a number for an asylum for marines or something?” Of course, when the psychiatrists get the call from the waitress about Cutshaw, Kane decides to head out to save him. When Kane gets there, the bikers also degrade him, forcing him to say stupid things like “marines are chicken” and “marines all suck.” When biker Stanley forces Kane to lick beer off the floor, one of the biker bitches hilariously calls him a “chicken shit turd.” Of course, Kane’s inner “Killer Kane” finally comes out when he sees the bikers attempt to rape Cutshaw (with Richard attempting to force his prick in the astronaut’s mouth) and he beats and/or kills every single biker in the bar, including the biker sluts, in what is easily the greatest bar brawl scene in cinema history. Kane brings Cutshaw back to the castle and the ex-astronaut finally confesses that he aborted his space mission because he was afraid to die alone on the moon, complaining he would have been, “really, really alone.” Kane then promises Cutshaw, “I’ll show you god exists...one example...and the others [...] to cure...try to cure them too. I don’t know...no other way now.” Ultimately, Kane kills himself to prove “god exists” by giving Cutshaw one concrete example of genuine human goodness. Sometime in the near future, Cutshaw, who is now cured, revisits the castle and sits in Kane’s former office where he reads the following letter written to him by the Colonel just before he committed suicide: “Captain Cutshaw, I am taking my life in the hope that my death may provide a shock that has carried a value. In any case, you now have your one example. If ever I have injured you, I am sorry. I have been fond of you. I know someday I shall see you again.” After leaving the castle and returning to his car, Cutshaw notices the St. Christopher medal that he gave Kane is sitting on the car seat, so he breaks down and begins to sob. Indeed, Kane fulfilled his original promise to give Cutshaw a sign if there is life after death.

THE NINTH CONFIGURATION

Interestingly, writer/director William Peter Blatty swears that the medal scene at the end of The Ninth Configuration was inspired by an event in his own life that occurred around the time his mother died and he had just started working on writing The Exorcist. Apparently, when Blatty's mother died, he took off one of two medals that were on his mom's corpse before she was buried, yet by some inexplicable miracle, he later noticed that he was wearing both medals, including the one that had supposedly been buried with his progenitor. As someone that is quite skeptical when it comes to anything and everything supernatural/spiritual, I find Blatty's personal story dubious to say the least, yet I must admit the way the director incorporated the story into The Ninth Configuration is nothing short of ingenious and highly inspirational. Indeed, the film is like a spiritual work for hopeless cynics that knows when to joke about morally repugnant things, but also when to be uncomfortably serious in a cinematic work that is like Christ meets Kierkegaard meets vaudeville. Indeed, as a work that features Academy Award nominated actor Robert Loggia (Scarface, Jagged Edge) in blackface singing Al Jolson's "Rainbow Around My Shoulder" while dancing around like a spastic retard on dope, actor/Dark Shadows producer George DiCenzo in nun-drag attempting in vain to give a Pepsi vending machine a half-assed exorcism, Shaft (1971) star Moses Gunn wearing a rather flamboyant superman outfit in assumed tribute to Nietzsche (the costume has an "N" on the chest instead of an "S", not to mention the fact that the German philosopher's ideas are expressed more than once during the film, albeit in a critical fashion), and featuring director Blatty himself in a cameo role as a perturbed patient with an unhealthy stethoscope fetish named Lt. Fromme, The Ninth Configuration is surely the most sardonic spiritual film ever made. As for the film's depiction of psychiatrists and other 'soul-doctors,' Blatty had the following to say regarding psychoanalysis in the audio commentary for the Warner Brothers DVD release of the work: "It's hardly a science [...] at best, it's an art and not a very convincing one, if you examine Freudian psychology." Indeed, aside from the brief Jolson parody scene (which, more than anything, is really more an unflattering mockery of Yiddish vaudeville than an actual tribute), The Ninth Configuration is a rare American comedy that is not only kosher-free and lacks degenerate Freudian influences, but also has something serious to say and goes about expressing it in a truly transcendental way that proves that cinema can be used as something other than art or entertainment, though the film manages to succeed with both of those things as well. Part tragicomic psychological thriller, part biker (anti)exploitation flick, part absurdist metaphysical Gothic melodrama, part schizophrenic giallo, and part politically incorrect surrealist psychodrama, The Ninth Configuration is indisputable proof that miracles can even happen in the uniquely unholy and spiritually vapid realm of Hebraic Hollywood.

BIO-ZOMBIE

Wilson Yip (1998)

Bio-Zombie has had it coming for quite some time. I recall viewing the trailer for this back in 2004 on the Tokyo Shock release of Versus. I hadn't explored Asian horror quite enough to be interested in the kooky Hong-Kong spoof of zombie foundations found within Bio-Zombie. Besides, the characters seemed too much like pestering caricatures and we know how much the East loves to include the "quirk" with the salivating annunciation of simple words. Having borrowed Bio-Zombie from a friend only yesterday, I felt obligated to finally put aside my differences and watch the film with absolutely no expectations. After all, Bio-Zombie is directed by Wilson Yip, the adrenaline junkie that basically handed Donnie Yen his international acclaim with such incredible vessels as Sha Po Lang, Flash Point, and Ip Man.

As if you couldn't tell, Bio-Zombie is a comedy centered around an undead outbreak in a mall. It's ultimately up to two Triad underlings to rescue their companions and try to escape the mall unscathed. The reason of Bio-Zombie's cult success can most likely be attested to the transfusion of pop-culture as popularized in Edgar Wright's filmography. These rebellious teens reference Sega Arcade title The House of the Dead quickly as their zombie situation turns deadly. The less-annoying "Crazy Bee" screams to a police officer to shoot the shuffling monster in the head. Such game devices are also attempted, as quick-edits of game footage are spliced parallel to carnage and a reload button appears on the screen after surveying a police officer's standard issue handgun. At first, I was very unsure of Bio-Zombie. I can credit the film towards looking better than the average Hong Kong horror endeavor of that time period. Wilson Yip certainly is skilled in aiming adventure towards a certain demographic (Romero fans) but the characters had irritated me and as expected, stained a foul misconception. But before I could further boil my disappointment, something . . . strange happened: the characters matured and grew from their experiences. The poisonous, inane, and belligerent cast of Bio-Zombie swapped roles in such an effective manner that literally left me stunned.

When the film begins, our characters Woody and Bee are tasked with minding the bootleg video shop for their mysterious boss. Even in a comedic and relevant introduction are we given insight to this. Bio-Zombie's opening credits are a handcam shot of a theater screen and it's implied that the latest film bootlegged by these goons is entitled Bio-Zombie. Woody is the personal growth that I've been regarding to. Starting out as a pest and eventually becoming the action hero of the film, Woody is a prime example that lowering standards early only to blast them out of the park later is a great way to pack on pounds of charisma by the film's break. Another intrinsic treasure of Bio-Zombie is the offbeat median of impact that explodes around the hour mark. Scrapping all humor and playfulness, Bio-Zombie becomes what most zombie films aim for - a personal tragedy. Many characters that have been adapted to your tastes, had you an appreciation of Eastern splatter, will die off in violent and tasteful ways. Never skipping the adoration of past characters, Wilson Yip maintains his respect and allows these characters to build sympathy towards them while also kindling several sweet, but short romances along the way. Bio-Zombie is a zombie film done with fervor and appreciation for its influences. Did anybody else get a Street Trash vibe with its Tenafly Viper allusions of toxic beverage?

Bio-Zombie is bad taste done right, this is for certain. After Sushi Boy's romance came to a sudden end, I was certain that Wilson Yip had it out for all his characters but after further evaluation, it became apparent that I was blind to an expectation of altruism. Yip too cared as much for these characters as I did, which explains the amount of depth put into such a band of deceitful miscreants. But he had to focus on the horror element of his cult opus. Had there been no bloodshed then there would have been no conflict. No conflict would have led to nil emotional struggle and without that then Bio-Zombie would have been useless zombie fodder. Just another film to accompany the rest of the undead genre. The humor basis may not spark an interest in the culturally-declined, or if you simply are not amused by slapstick antics from the East. However, Bio-Zombie is certainly special in its own regard. It starts off reflecting the own stupidity of its characters then settles out into one of the more bleak and surprising endings amidst soulless cinema. For what it's worth, I'm glad I waited until my tastes evolved to view this film. Had I viewed it back then perhaps the austere note Bio-Zombie's left on might have upset me. As it stands, one of the very few "Zombie" films I can tolerate, enjoy, even.

BLUE MOVIE

Wim Verstappen (1971)

I have to confess that 'Blue Movie' is certainly a film title that, although fairly generic and even a bit antiquated, has obsessed me for a number of years, namely because it is the title of three very different, albeit all technically erotic, films that I have had an interest in at one point or another. Indeed, aside from the Andy Warhol flick also known as Fuck (1969) starring Viva and Louis Waldon and the truly eerie and esoteric rape-ridden 1978 artsploitation of the same name directed by underrated aberrant-garde Italian auteur Alberto Cavallone, the Dutch sexploitation flick Blue Movie (1972) directed by Wim Verstappen has been on my radar for a number of years but it was not until the other day that I actually got the opportunity to watch it via the new Cult Epics blu-ray. As an inordinately obsessive fan of Dutch cinema, I naturally had been intending to watch the film for sometime as it is considered a key cinematic work in the Netherlands due to more or less single-handedly demolishing the censoring power of the Dutch film Ratings Board (which was officially dismantled in 1977) and thus influencing the more explicit films of greater filmmakers like Paul Verhoeven and ultimately becoming an unexpected huge hit as one of the most (monetarily) successful Dutch films of all-time, yet I also had certain reservations due to it being a (s)exploitation flick made in collaboration between Wim Verstappen and Pim de la Parra (aka 'Pim & Wim') via their production company Scorpio Films. While there is no doubt that the aptly titled Blue Movie features enough flaccid cocks, bushy beavers, and large pendulous big sippers to be at least considered a genuine softcore fuck flick, it luckily features enough food-for-thought to chew onto to imbue one with a respectable degree of toxic intellectual diarrhea. Indeed, for a film that ostensibly celebrated the so-called 'sexual liberation' movement that initially blitzkrieged the Occident in the late-1960s and ultimately caused more long-term social damage to Europe than the Soviets ever could, it unequivocally depicts the (im)moral phenomenon in an exceedingly negative fashion, which is especially curious when one considers that the film's Surinamese-Sephardic-Jewish producer de la Parra more or less spent his entire career peddling celluloid smut. Maybe it is because I am from a generation where porn has always been pretty easy to come by, but the only kind of people that Blue Movie might arouse is virginal middle school math teachers or young Mormon kids that has never seen a nice pair of shapely tits before. Luckily, the film was made in a (post)Calvinist nation where even ostensibly vogue erotica is impregnated with a certain discernible degree of pathological pessimism and cynicism. In short, if you are one of the oh-so-few unfortunate beings that manages to get aroused enough to bust a load while watching the film, you will probably feel exceedingly guilty afterwards as you stare at your cheaply misspent baby batter.

Indeed, despite obviously mainly being a huge financial success due to its

then-shocking (anti)erotic genital-driven content and the predictable scandal it caused, would-be-auteur Verſtappen made a fairly intellectual plea as to why the film was more than mere disposable celluloid dung, or as Dutch film scholar Peter Verſtraten explained in his book Humour and Irony in Dutch Poſt-War Fiction Film (2016): “Director Verſtappen was dissatisfied with this decision and in a quite lengthy counter-plea he pointed out the scientific and religious purport of the film. BLUE MOVIE, he bluffed, should be seen as a loose adaptation of DE TOEKOMST DER RELIGIE [THE FUTURE OF RELIGION] (1947), a volume conſiſting of nine eſſays by the reſpectable writer Simon Veſtdijk. Verſtappen also attached an official American scientific research document, called THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON OBSCENITY AND PORNOGRAPHY, to his apology, for he claimed that this was crucial source material. By explaining in his apology that ſuch extra-textual aſpects had been influential, which of course was hard to deny, Verſtappen provoked the Film Commission. Moreover, a psychologist was conſulted who thought the film made ſenſe from the perſpective of his profeſſion.” On top of being, relatively ſpeaking, almoſt ſhockingly ‘intellectual,’ the film is—by modern degenerate liberal ſtandards—fairly ‘red-pilled’ in terms of its rather frank depiction of male and female ſexuality and the ſocial influences behind ſaid ſexuality. In fact, the ſtrongeſt and ſaneſt voice of reaſon in the film is an old ſchool ‘faſciſt’ zoologiſt-cum-profeſſor that has come to the concluſion after ſtudying monkeys that, as far as human ſexuality is concerned, women look for ‘ſtatus’ (as provided by an alpha-male type) when it comes to men and men care more about the preſtige a beautiful woman (translation: ‘trophy wife’) gives him than the actual beautiful woman herſelf. On top of that, a hedoniſtic liſtyle involving orgies, fucking married women, and creating pornography ultimately leads the male protagonist to becoming impotent, at leaſt when it comes to a woman that he actually he loves in what ultimately proves to be a venomouſly ironical twiſt that is clearly meant to mock the raincoat crowd. In ſhort, this erotic film demonſtrates, ſo-called ‘free love’ is not free and, like ſo-called erotic films, can ſurely lead to the erasure of eros and a ſort of excremental approach to human ſexuality where ſexual release becomes ſomething akin to a bowel moment in terms of personal value.

Like a ſort of anti-Rear Window (1954) where the young and virile (as opposed to old and crippled) ‘hero’ ſpends his entire time fucking tons of (sub)debutantes in tons of different apartment building rooms inſtead of voyeuriſtically ſpying on them from the comfort of his apartment like Jimmy Stewart’s rather ſedentary character, Blue Movie might have been directed by a guy that has deſcribed himſelf as having been influenced by Hitchcock yet it can hardly be deſcribed as Hitchcockian, eſpecially as a cinematic work that utilizes explicit ſexual imagery over ſuggeſtive ſymbolism and hyper horny (yet oftentimes homely) whores and houſewives as opposed to cool and myſterious platinum blonde bimbos. While Verstappen (with Martin Scorsese of all people!) co-penned his pal Pim's almost obnoxiously Hitchcockian Dutch-German co-production Obsessions (1969) aka Bezeten - Het gat in de muur starring German actor turned producer Dieter Geissler (who also co-produced Blue Movie), his oftentimes dually flaccid fuck flick is brutally bare bones aesthetically speaking and has about as much visceral thriller-mystery tension as a New England fast food line, yet that it is ultimately to its benefit in terms of demystifying the innately idiotic Marcusean counterculture myth of 'free love.' Indeed, not coincidentally concluding on a shot of the obscenely oppressive and clinic apartment complex, which fittingly resembles a dystopian prison, that the protagonist and his feckless fuck buddies and friends have turned into a virtual human sex zoo where sexual shame and self-control have been just as thoughtlessly disposed of as civilization itself, the film demonstrates in a sometimes devastating (yet oftentimes humorously depicted) fashion that free love has resulted in a sort of cleverly cryptic metaphysical enslavement of the West that controls people more than any religion, government, or dictator ever could. It is also probably no coincidence that the very same base instincts that led to the protagonist serving a jail sentence also lead him to relative financial and social success despite also causing him to being unlovable and impotent in the end. Indeed, as the film demonstrates in a relatively subtly sardonic fashion, the morally inverted world that the protagonist unexpectedly finds himself in after getting out of prison at the beginning of the film leads to his complete and utter retrogression as a human being; or, in short, the rather ironic consequences of so-called 'progressive' (sexual)politics. While the quite literally puritanical values of Calvinism that led to the once-powerful Dutch Empire are nowhere to be seen in the ostensibly hip and happening post-colonial Holland depicted in the film, flagrant philandering, treacherous cuckoldry, single mothers/bastard kids, porn addiction, sexual-shame-inspired suicide, and early age impotence, among other things, are so rampant that they can be found under the roof of one apartment building. In short, Blue Movie makes for a rather mirthfully morbid masturbation aid and if you are dumb and/or sexually retarded enough to beat your meat to such a devilishly dejecting movie, just remember that the filmmaker(s) would be laughing at you (and rightly so!).

Blue Movie hero Michael (Hugo Metsers)—a rather dumb and unwitting yet reasonably affable dude that thinks with his dick instead of his brain—was sentenced to five years in prison for having sex with a slightly underage teenage girl, so naturally he is in for quite the surprise when he is finally released from the slammer and discovers that 'free love' is now the norm and that no one would dare give a shit about such a carnal 'crime' in the new sexually liberated climate in the Netherlands lest they be deemed uptight reactionaries and/or dorks. As a somewhat handsome 25-year-old buck that has spent about half a decade of his most sexually virile years completely pussy-starved (in fact, the protagonist had to spend an extra year in prison after beating up a queer that tried to rape him), Michael naturally sees his fairly conservative parole officer Eddie (Helmert Woudenberg, who is the son of a Dutch-Waffen-SS Untersturmführer)—a well-meaning yet unintentionally comical and seemingly half-autistic nerd that makes a piss poor attempt at warning the protagonist about the moral degeneration that has hit the tiny Lowland country—as somewhat of an obstacle in terms of trying to find a nice warm hole to stick his extra eager bald-headed bandit into. Luckily, Michael's new apartment building, which resembles something you might expect to find in some obscure Soviet shithole, is packed with shameless whores that are completely down to fuck, including a number of married women. In short, Michael had no way to predict that he would be unleashed in a recklessly wanton world that is beyond his most lurid dreams, but unfortunately he is also in no way prepared to deal with the unexpected consequences of such widespread hedonism. Driven by a libido that is only transcended by a lack of IQ, Michael sometimes seems more like a giant pulsating penis than a man with a mind and personality. Despite respecting her zoologist husband Dr. Bernard Cohn (Kees Brusse)—a stoic scholar that acts as a sort of father figure for the protagonist—Michael finds himself reluctantly engaging in an affair with a mindless kraut cunt named Marianne (Ursula Blauth), who has no qualms about confessing to the hopelessly horny hero that she finds him especially attractive because he bears a striking resemblance to a brother that she had an incestuous childhood relationship with. While a genius when it comes to studying monkeys and their strikingly eerie similarities with humans, Dr. Cohn—a rather conservative chap with a Kohenic kosher surname that couldn't be less kosher in terms of attitude and demeanor—was clearly blinded by fine young female flesh when he dared to marry someone as young and dumb as Marianne, who is at least young enough to be his daughter. While clearly a failure when it comes to choosing the appropriate wife, Dr. Cohn ultimately eclipses parole officer Eddie in terms of acting as a sort of wise and sensible fatherly figure (in fact, he even acknowledges his foolishness in terms of choosing a young hot twat spouse). Clearly overwhelmed by the steady flow of warm-and-wet spunk-pots that are quite literally dropped off at his doorstep, Michael finds it to be impossible to turn down all the carnal traps and thus ultimately find himself turning into a virtual fuck-toy for his entire apartment building. In fact, the protagonist finds himself so deeply buried in gash that it eventually leads him to gaining an admirable reputation and, in turn, a ton of cash after he learns to monetize his carnal prestige by becoming a full-blown pornographer, though it comes at a somewhat hefty price: his soul.

For many, if not most, young men, sex is naturally the most important thing in the entire world and the one activity where one expends the most time and energy attempting to procure but, as Dr. Cohn attempts to explain to Michael, there are much more important things in life than pussy. Indeed, when Michael asks him if sex is important, Dr. Cohn, who clearly did not become a successful professional as a result of spending all his time getting drunk and banging bar whores, bluntly replies, “Power, aggression is more fundamental” and even hilariously tells his wife—a hot twat harlot that seriously acts as if her gash is god’s great gift to the world—during the same heated conversation that, “Heaven doesn’t lie between your legs.” Needless to say, being part of a decidedly degenerate generation that has been strategically force-fed the bitter blue-pill of Marcusian mumbo jumbo, Marianne—the sort of impressionable yet not less self-absorbed I-got-my-head-up-my-add idiot that would believe Wilhelm Reich was a legit scientist—accuses her hubby scientist of being a big mean “fascist” for expressing traditional ideas that contradict her debauched tendencies towards extramarital excursions and consuming endless brotherly cock. As Dr. Cohn explains towards the end of the film upon confessing to Michael that he is fully aware that he has cuckolded him, “When you spend your life watching monkeys you learn about people [...] I find it terrible.” While Dr. Cohn attempts to give Michael some fatherly advice about life, he also warns him, “Maybe you’re a born bachelor. And then such value is nonsense.” It seems that Michael may indeed be an accursed perennial bachelor of sorts as he actually attempts to transcend his degenerate Dutch Don Juan status and hooks up with a single mother named Julia (Ine Veen)—a girl that he was initially extremely attracted to yet ultimately rejected due to the rather unfortunate problem of her bastard brood—but the love affair proves to be doomed from the get-go, at least as far as biology as concerned, as the hunky hero fails to even get a hard-on after a hot and heavy foreplay session that occurs at the end of the film. Indeed, it seems that too much pornography and poontang has left the once perennially potent protagonist impotent, at least when it comes to women that he actually loves. In short, sex has become nothing more than an impulsive bodily function like defecation for Michael and everything has turned to shit. In short, free love is far from free, or so the hapless protagonist learns after more or less losing his soul in a sea of semen-sucking skanks. As to the character’s rather quick rise and fall, Camille Paglia might have been onto something when she argued in Sexual Personae (1990), “Ironically, sexual success always ends in sagging fortunes anyhow. Every male projection is transient and must be anxiously, endlessly renewed. Men enter in triumph but withdraw in decrepitude. The sex act cruelly mics history’s decline and fall.”

One of the things I find most intriguing about cinema, especially old and/or foreign cinema, is its ability to act as a sort of virtual time-machine and express the fears, obsessions, trends, and zeitgeist of a particular era. Of course, not like an ancient cathedral, great cinema as created by master auteurs like Dreyer and Bergman was clearly made to stand the test of time but such timeless cinematic works are few and far between. Of course, this can certainly not be said of virtually all erotica, especially a film like Blue Movie, which was clearly made to cash-in on degenerate trends (if nothing else, producer de la Parra was a clever promotions man), hence why the film is almost forgotten today despite being technically one of the most (monetarily) successful Dutch films of all-time. Still, the film is more intriguing than I expected it to be, if not for oftentimes unintentional reasons, as it unwittingly exposes both the spiritual and sexual bankruptcy of so-called sexual liberation. After all, it is no coincidence that our so-called puritanical ancestors had more sex than we do despite the fact we apparently live in oh-so liberated and enlightened times. Also, compared to a decidedly degenerate film like Just Jaeckin's insultingly idiotic Emmanuelle (1974)—a film that is undeniably stylishly directed yet ultimately a disgustingly debauched piece of celluloid doo-doo that derives most of its false potency in its perpetual degradation of tragic Dutch diva Sylvia Kristel—Blue Movie is much maturer and realistic in terms of its message. Indeed, whereas Jaeckin's unintentional celluloid joke literally basks in cuckoldry and attempts to pass off Sapphic sex as the height of hipdom, Verstappen's surprisingly whimsical quasi-exploitation flick completely demystifies the entire sexual liberation (pseudo)ethos and hints at how the ostensible sexual utopia would lead to a degenerate dystopia. Indeed, leave it up to the Dutch to create a fuck flick that features figurative finger-wagging about fuck flicks and a both literally and figuratively anticlimactic climax where the Michael's flaccid pecker becomes the sort of viscerally pathetic anti-star of the protagonist's own worst nightmare; or, in short, the perils of metaphysically-induced castration anxiety and impotence. When it comes down to it, Blue Movie is, in many ways (and probably mostly unintentionally), an insanely aesthetically grotesque film that absolutely epitomizes everything that was obscenely ugly about early-1970s clothes, hair, and fashion styles, which is rather fittingly as these gratingly inane ingredients help to (unwittingly) underscore the equally inane ideas of the singularly deleterious 'save the whales and kill the babies' generation. In fact, the visuals of the film have aged just as poorly as the odiously sensually overzealous zeitgeist that it so vividly (and, somewhat surprisingly, viscerally) depicts. Notably, the Cult Epics blu-ray of the film includes an interview with Blue Movie lead Hugo Metsers' son Hugo Metsers Jr.—himself an actor that also happens to be the son of avant-garde filmmaker Maartje Seyferth (Venus in Furs, Crepuscle)—and it is somewhat incriminating in terms of revealing the effects that the Dutch porn generation had on its children. Among other things, Metsers recalls a somewhat traumatic childhood experience where he randomly encountered Blue Movie at the mere age of 10 on pirate television while at a friend's house and it devastated him so much that he instantly ran home and cried in his bed. In fact, Metsers describes his childhood as "lonely" due to his parents' careerist self-absorption and sums up the sexual revolution era as being "chaos" for him, which probably explains why he has lived a somewhat disastrous personal life that includes two failed marriages.

Despite technically being the fifth biggest native Dutch box office hit of all-time and demonstrating that sex—even marvelously mundane sex involving floppy flaccid cocks—certainly sells, Blue Movie also confirms that most pussy gets pretty old pretty fast, hence the relative obscurity of the film today (and why it makes a worthy release for the vintage Euro erotica nostalgists at Cult Epics). Although Verstappen would go on to direct other erotically-charged material like Alicia (1974), quite unlike his pal-cum-partner Pim, he eventually demonstrated he was a somewhat eclectic filmmaker and would greatly mature with age as revealed by his largely genital-less aeronautical affair Dakota (1974) and rather unconventional Dutch Resistance flick Paſtorale 1943 (1978). Indeed, as the sagely Peter Cowie noted in his text Dutch Cinema (1979), Paſtorale 1943 was “his most successful from a critical point of view” and that “Verstappen formed with de la Parra one of the most significant partnerships in modern Dutch films, and there is a clearly discernible maturity about his later work.” As for Blue Movie producer Pim de la Parra, he would confirm certain unfavorable racial stereotypes by continuing to direct artless smut, including Wan Pipel (1976) aka One People which, aside from being the first feature ever made in the director’s homeland of Suriname, depicts a miscegenation-based bizarre love triangle between a negro, white Dutch woman, and brown Hindu broad. While Pim has revealed certain Godardian pretenses with his debut feature De Minder gelukkige terugkeer van Jozef Katus naar het land van Rembrandt (1966) aka The Not Too Happy Return of Jozef Katus to the Land of Rembrandt and even later works like Paul Chevrolet and the Ultimate Hallucination (1985), he never quite achieved the artistic prowess of Wim and can be seen today as a sort of slightly more serious ‘Dutch’ equivalent to Lloyd Kaufman in terms of degenerate schlock influence and curious combination of undeniable likeability and would-be-chic sleaze. As Cowie rightly noted when comparing the producer-cum-director to his former partner Wim, “Pim de Parra’s successes as a director have been more modest. He is primarily a catalyst, a centre of ceaseless energy and ideas for other to put into practice.” In that sense, he can certainly be seen as a sort of secondary auteur of Blue Movie, which makes for a good double feature with de la Parra’s own sardonically salacious Swinging Amsterdam flick Frank & Eva (1973) also starring Hugo Metsers and featuring Sylvia Kristel in her debut film role.

For being an early fuck flick that even predates the ‘porn chic’ trend sparked by Gerard Damiano’s obscenely overrated Deep Throat (1972), Blue Movie is ultimately strikingly prophetic, especially terms of its ending, as porn-induced erectile dysfunction (PIED) is apparently a serious problem among a lot of modern-day young men as pornography can change the way a man’s brain reacts to sexual arousal. In other words, pornography is not only largely pathetic, but can also result in sexual retardation, as if the touch and smell of a real woman has been completely neutralized by poorly directed images of a labia-less lady with giant silly silicone tits being blacked by some beefy bro named Tyrone. Indeed, before porn even became completely vogue in the Occident, Verstappen’s prick-filled flick deconstructed the porn myth of the daredevil dick and really underscored the true pathetic persuasion of porn and the so-called sexual revolution. In that sense, Blue Movie totally transcended any sort of expectations that I had for it (which were admittedly somewhat low). I certainly cannot deny that the film reminded me that the only way to not feel like an emasculated loser while watching porn is if you're doing it for 'aesthetic' reasons (e.g. experiencing true classics like Jonas Middleton's truly singular hardcore horrorgasm Through the Looking Glass (1976)) and/or in the company of a girl you are about to fuck. Also, there's something supremely cucked, if not downright gay, about watching some random coke-addled 'performer' plow some superlatively silly silicone-powered that's well-worn HPV-positive vade-mecum with his extra veiny Viagra-ridden ramrod, but then again I am the sort of guy that cannot help but be reminded of Der Stürmer when I see Ron Jeremy and can only speculate as to how any non-retarded man could find someone as intrinsically plastic and grimy as Jenna Jameson to be extremely sexually desirable. Of course, most young guys are not going to think of such things and it is no coincidence that the protagonist of Blue Movie is a fairly normal unthinking dude that never considered that there might be some negative aspects to 'free love' as he is innately irrational due to being perpetually high on hormones, hence the truly pernicious character of the sexual liberation movement and the rather grotesque and uniquely unsexy virtual gargoyles like Reich and Marcuse that provided the pseudo-philosophical framework to unleash it on Christian Europe. Speaking of psychoanalytic quacks, not unlike G. Jung with his former kosher mentor Freud, Wim did not really evolve and become an interesting filmmaker with his own distinct voice until after dropping Pim and rejecting a simply sex-obsessed approach to the medium. After all, Europe did not become great embracing sexual gratification but by deferring it, hence the absurdity of describing sexually degenerate ideas as 'progressive' when they are literally and quite unequivocally the opposite. After all, compare the post-Christian cinematic art of Wim and Pim to the countless great painters (and artists in general) of Dutch Christendom. Indeed, I do not think that it is an exaggeration to say that there's more dark erotic intrigue in a small fragment from a painting by Old Dutch Masters like Hieronymus Bosch and Pieter Brueghel the Elder than there is in all of the films of Wim and Pim combined. Additionally, Wim and Pim's approach to the romantically lewd seems rather retarded when compared to one of Godfried Schalcken's more subversive chiaroscuro paintings like 'A Man Offering Gold and Coins to a Girl,' but that is exactly why Blue Movie is worth seeing as it painfully, if not playfully, highlights the twilight of Dutch Kultur and spirituality in an almost hypnotically crude fashion.

THE GOALIE'S ANXIETY AT THE PENALTY KICK

Wim Wenders (1972)

Personally, I have always considered Dutch-German auteur Wim Wenders (The American Friend, Until the End of the World) a deracinated dork of the hopelessly Americanized sort in comparison to top German New Cinema filmmakers like Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Werner Schroeter, Werner Herzog, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Herbert Achternbusch, and Helma Sanders-Brahms, and I see it as no coincidence that out of all his kraut cinematic compatriots, he was the one who was most 'successful' at making the transition from the Fatherland to Hollywood, even if he has not directed a decent film in at least two decades. Of course, as he demonstrated with his film Kings of the Road (1976) aka Im Lauf der Zeit where a character states, "The Yanks have colonized our subconscious," Wenders was all too aware of he and his fellow countrymen's precarious predicament as serious celluloid artists in an age of international Hollywood hegemony, but that does not excuse the fact that most of his films positively personify derogatory 'p' words like 'pretentious' and 'plodding.' Indeed, my biggest beef with Wim(p) Wenders is that most of his films are about as impassioned as a vasectomy. To be quite honest, I have yet to dig through Wenders' entire oeuvre as I have already seen enough to know that he is a one-note wonder who takes existential crisis to ungodly extremes of aesthetic impotence and brazen banality, with my recent viewing of his feature Summer in the City (1970)—a superlatively sterile and static student film that the director quite symbolically dedicated to The Kinks—only further discouraged me. Yesterday, I managed to find the patience to watch what is regarded as one of Wenders' most important German films, The Goalkeeper's Fear of the Penalty (1972) aka Die Angst des Tormanns beim Elfmeter aka The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick, and indeed while as slow as the director's most pathologically plodding works, it also happens to be one of his rare unrivaled masterpieces. Adapted from the 1970 novel of the same German name written by Slovenian-Austrian writer/playwright/filmmaker Peter Handke (Die linkshändige Frau aka The Left-Handed Woman, The Absence) in what would be the first of a couple successful collaborations between the novelist and director that would eventually sire Wings of Desire (1987) aka Der Himmel über Berlin, The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick is a so-called 'detective' story without any real detective about a wackjob soccer goalie of the deranged dickheaded sort who misses blocking a penalty kick, heads to Vienna, stalks and has sex with a movie theater cashier, senselessly strangles to death said cashier for no discernible reason, and gets on a bus and goes into hiding in plain sight in his childhood hometown as he ostensibly waits for the police to arrest him. The closest Wenders ever came to directing an 'anti-Heimat,' The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick depicts Austrian/Germanic rural life as a degenerative and primitive way of living on the brink of extinction, yet city life is portrayed in no more of a flattering light manner. Unquestionably Wenders' most dark, dreary, and distinctly Teutonic cinematic work, The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick is a decidedly Weltschmerz-rattled psychodrama without much actual drama about a corpse of an ancient nation that no longer has a 'Heimat.'

Joseph Bloch (Arthur Brauss) is a professional soccer goalie, but he seems rather apathetic while playing the game, so it comes as no shock to the viewer at the beginning of The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick that he is ejected from the field after being scored on. Seemingly unaffected by the situation, blockhead Bloch heads to the seedy side of Vienna and indulges in rather underwhelming forms of hedonism. Eventually, Bloch goes to the movies and seems enticed by the cashier (Erika Pluhar), but he won't make his move on her until later. Not long after, Bloch heads to a soccer themed sports bar and tells a girl he is semi-flirting with that the former ex-owner was a Austrian national forward who moved to America, joined a non-league American team, disappeared, and was last found living in a trailer in Tucson, Arizona, thus demonstrating what Wenders/Handke thinks about the American dream. In between getting mugged and being beaten without putting up a fight, Bloch goes back to the movie theater and flirts with the cashier once again. After watching the movie, Bloch lurks outside the theater and waits for the cashier to get off work, ultimately following her on a bus back to her apartment. The cashier does not seem at all disturbed by this and invites Bloch in her apartment and the two have sex and the goalkeeper spends the night. The next day, Bloch learns the girl's name is Gloria and the two strangers continue to small talk as she gets ready for work. Hoping to get lucky before she goes to work, Gloria begins to undress and wraps a rope that was around her waist around Bloch's neck in a provocative fashion, but he seems hardly aroused, at least sexually. Unfortunately for Gloria, Bloch does not seem the least bit turned on and decides to strangle the sweet young lady to death instead with the same rope she wrapped around his neck. Hiding in plain sight, Bloch decides to go to the movie theater one more time and ultimately gets in a physical altercation with an older male employee. Not long after, a cop arrives and questions Bloch about his unruly behavior, but the goalie is a good bullshitter and manages to convince the cop of his innocence.

Eventually, Bloch hops on a bus and flees to his rural hometown where his ex-girlfriend Hertha Gabler (Kai Fischer) runs a quaint and mostly vacant inn. Bloch and Gabler get chummy again, though they never rekindle their past relationship as the former seems to have nil interest in sex, let alone romance. When Gabler mentions that Bloch seems extra fidgety and cannot spend a second without standing up or sitting down and fiddling with things, he merely ignores her remark. Meanwhile, a mute child is found dead floating in a lake and a swarthy gypsy is arrested, but it is eventually discovered the death was the result of a tragic accident. Undeniably, the small village is degenerating as demonstrated by an old man's remark to Bloch that the local children can only speak in monosyllables and are nothing short of illiterate. Bloch spends most of his time reading newspapers so he can follow both his soccer career and the investigation of unsolved murder he committed. When an almost immaculate criminal sketch of Bloch appears in the newspaper, none of the locals seem to put two and two together, even though they confess to also reading the daily paper. In the end, Bloch watches a local soccer game and chats with a fellow spectator, eventually asking the man, "Have you ever tried keeping your eye on the goalie and not the forwards?" to which the man explains how hard it is to do. In a rather metaphorical scene, Bloch then explains, "It's very hard to keep your eyes away from the ball. It takes a terrific effort. You see the goalie running backwards and forwards...bending over left and right...shouting at the backs. Usually you only notice him when the ball is shot at the goal. It's funny...watching the goalie running around without the ball," thus demonstrating all things are a matter of perspective and that when one is able to master seeing something from an unconventional perspective, things become quite clear that others might not be able to discern while looking at something in the more traditional fashion. Indeed, all of Bloch's friends had all the warning signs that he was the killer, including a sketch of him in the local newspaper and constant acts of violence he would exhibit in public (i.e. starting fights, throwing an ashtray in a man's face, etc.), but they lacked the perspective to see what was right in front of their eyes. And, indeed, in the end, none of the police detectives ever consider that the killer might be 'hiding' in plain sight in his hometown, just as Gloria never considered that Bloch might be a predator as a strange individual who went to the effort to stalk her all the way to her apartment.

Indeed, the viewer certainly pays close attention to the Goalkeeper throughout the entirety of The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick, but one must ultimately watch the film from the same cockeyed perspective as one paying attention to a goalie during an actual soccer game if they want to get anything out of the film. That being said, The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick is a film that demands repeated viewings. As someone who spent about a decade during my childhood playing a forward on various soccer teams, I can certainly attest that goalies were typically the most peculiar players on the team (indeed, I remember on more than one occasion getting into a fight with a goalie), just as drummers always seem to be the most odd and introverted members of bands. Like a kicker in football, the goalkeeper is like a lone soldier with a totally detached perspective from all the other players whose position is pretty much totally independent from the rest of the team. Considering I cannot think of a single other sports-themed movie I like, The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick now holds the number one spot for my favorite sports flick. Undoubtedly, I never would have expected that Wim Wenders of all filmmakers would have directed not only my favorite 'soccer flick,' but a rather dark and foreboding one at that manages to capture the complete and utter vapidness of post-Hitlerite Vienna. Indeed, as much as I tend to disagree with most of his reviews, Vincent Canby of The New York Times was certainly on point when he wrote about the film, "Since "The Goalie's Anxiety" was first shown in New York, Mr. Wenders has been represented by two later films seen at the New York Film Festival, "Alice in the Cities" and "Kings of the Road," but because neither has had the force and cool beauty of this film, I would assume he needs a collaborator of Mr. Handke's discipline and intellectual enthusiasm."

I have yet to see another Wenders flick that is so penetrating, yet at the same time so distinctly Teutonic, as The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick certainly ranks as one of the most idiosyncratic yet decidedly disturbing anti-Heimat films ever made, which I think largely has to do with the talents of writer Handke. Quite notably, Handke once wrote a piece criticizing Herbert Achternbusch (The Last Hole, Servus Bayern aka Bye-Bye Bavaria!)—a filmmaker/novelist largely unknown outside of the German-speaking world who Werner Herzog once described as the "most Bavarian filmmaker" and who has essentially spent his entire life making absurdist Southern kraut anti-Heimat films—in which he wrote: "Achternbusch ought to know better than any other writer. Why then does he content himself with fantasies taken from the pages of the local paper? The result: slavish – or in Achternbusch's case, simulating slavish – adherence to the culture cliché that nobody can be represented as an individual anymore, that we have all become damaged, perforated foils for anything and everything already illustrated and pictured: formless beings, ventriloquist existences. Does Achternbusch offer more than merely rhetorical, literally 'sub'-cultural challenge to the world of the newspaper . . . ? Or are his travesties of plastic mythologies a kind of resistance?" Indeed, while the anti-Heimat films of Achternbusch, Volker Schlöndorff, R.W. Fassbinder, Peter Fleischmann, and Werner Herzog typically go to great pains to present a rather unflattering depiction of rural life, most of these films feature a certain mythology, magic, and kultur in regard to village life, yet The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick features none of that as a work that depicts the hinterland as a rotting corpse plagued by death and banality. Anti-Heimat meets Hitchcock with nods to Howard Hawks (the goalie goes to see Red Line 7000 (1965) starring James Caan), The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick is post-Hitler/post- Aktionist at its most unsettling and dispiriting as a sort of spiritual celluloid brother film to Fassbinder's Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970), albeit all the more draining, as well as a celluloid prototype from the more glacial works of Austrian auteur Michael Haneke, except more authentic and less pretentious. Probably the only film directed by Wenders that provides evidence that the filmmaker is more than the pompous wimp that the late great Christoph Schlingensiefel oftentimes parodied him as, The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick is undoubtedly one of the most original and important works of German New Cinema.

ALICE IN THE CITIES

Wim Wenders (1974)

Before the maddening minimalistic mundanity of mumblecore and the cinematic slacking of Richard Linklater's Slacker (1991), there was the innately superior deracinated Teuton Weltschmerz of German auteur Wim Wenders' Alice in the Cities (1974) aka Alice in den Städten, which is the first chapter in the filmmaker's 'Road Movie Trilogy' (preceding Falsche Bewegung (1975) aka The Wrong Movie and Im Lauf der Zeit (1976) Kings of the Road) starring the perennially depressed and rather gawky Aryan wanderer Rüdiger Vogler. A sort of Teutonized melancholy take on Charlie Chaplin's The Kid (1921) and to a lesser extent Paper Moon (1973) directed by Peter Bogdanovich, Alice in the Cities is the tale of a lonely German journalist on the brink of existentialist crisis who, through a series of dubious circumstances, finds himself traveling around New York City, Amsterdam, and various parts of Germany attempting to help a talkative 9-year-old girl, whose mother essentially abandoned her with the stranger, find her grandmother. A work in the post-WWII German New Cinema tradition of Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977), Flaming Hearts (1978) aka Flammende Herzen directed by Walter Bockmayer and Rolf Bührmann, Rosa von Praunheim's Survival in New York (1979) aka Überleben in New York, and Monika Treut's My Father is Coming (1991) in its depiction of a physically and metaphysically uprooted German living temporarily in the cultureless nation that defeated and colonized his own after the Second World War (notably, auteur Wenders was born in Allied-occupied Düsseldorf in August 1945), Alice in the Cities is an intentionally aimless film about lost people without spiritual 'Heimat' where a disconcerted dude finds temporary solace in the most unlikely of places—a little girl who initially annoys the hell out of him. A film that is a virtual prototype for Wenders' arguable masterpiece Paris, Texas (1984), Alice in the Cities is, for better or worse, the director's most tender and heartwarming work, as a film that dares to depict a friendship between a white man and young girl that does not involve pedophilia. Indeed, a work that temporarily depicts a preteen girl swimming topless yet never attempts to sexualize the child as so many depraved Hollywood films and TV shows do, Alice in the Cities was made at a time when there was still some sanity in the world and European cinema, especially West German cinema, offered a voice of reason in a mostly Americanized celluloid cesspool before Great Satan Steven Spielberg jumpstarted the culture-distorting blockbuster phenomenon with Jaws (1975). Love it or leave it, Alice in the Cities is a rare arthouse film with the innocence of a child that can actually be enjoyed by a child, or at least those kids that have yet to be exposed to the low-class hoe Miley Cyrus and the prepubescent porn network otherwise known as the Disney Channel. Featuring a score by krautrock Can, Alice in the Cities is undoubtedly one of the most distinctly German films to be partly set in the United States.

German exile Philip 'Phil' Winter (Rüdiger Vogler) has been assigned to write an article on his travels around rural America, but instead he has opted for taking countless Polaroid photos of seemingly mundane things like beaches and rundown gas stations, but these things seem rather real and organic to the grotesque brainwashing monster that is American television, which the protagonist is beat over the head with via commercials with such unintentionally hilarious pseudo-edgy lines like, "A mind is a terrible thing to waste. Give to the United Negro College Fund." In fact, Phil must have forgotten to take a chill pill, as he opts for smashing a TV in his motel room after suffering too much American philistine broadcasting. After selling his car for a mere $300 to some sleazy scumbag, Phil visits his boss and tells him that he has not written a single line of his proposed article on America, which does not end well, with the journalist ultimately deciding to go back to Deutschland. Unfortunately for the homesick Teuton with a somewhat bizarre sense of writer's block, flights to Germany have been temporarily canceled, though Phil does manage to bump into a fellow German named Lisa Van Dam (played by Wenders' then-wife Lisa Kreuzer), who is married and has a 9-year-old daughter named Alice (Yella Rottländer). Being in a strange land, the trio come to truly appreciate one another's company as they wallow in the idea of getting back to Germany as the land of the free and the home of the brave has surely let all three of them down, but most especially Phil and Lisa. As Phil's female friend Angela tells him regarding his metaphysical affliction, "You lose touch when you lose your sense of identity. That's why you always need proof, proof that you still exist. You treat your stories and your experiences like raw eggs. As if you only experience things. And that's why you keep taking those photos. For further proof that it was really you who saw something," yet Lisa and Alice help him to temporarily fill that void in regard to his lackluster life of meagerness and meaninglessness. During a moment of deep insight, Phil remarks to Lisa, "The inhuman thing about American TV is not so much that they hack everything up with commercials, though that's bad enough, but in the end all programmes become commercials. Commercials for the status quo. Every image radiates the same disgusting and nauseated message. A kind of boastful contempt. Not one image leaves you in peace, they all want something from you." After revealing that she has lived in four different cities over a 2 year period, Lisa tells Phil "I can't sleep with you, but I'd like to share the bed with you" and the two sleep together in a less than erotic fashion, but the next day the mother vanishes and leaves her daughter and a note with the virtual stranger, thus beginning an odyssey for the German journalist that involves being the surrogate parent of a quite active 9-year-old girl.

Ultimately, Phil is forced to travel with Alice to Amsterdam in the hope of locating the girl's mother, which to his chagrin, proves to fail. Phil attempts to dump Alice at a police station, but deep down he knows he enjoys the girl's uncommonly warm company and the two tread on with not much more to go on than a couple old photographs. Instead, Phil goes to the Ruhr region of West Germany in the hope of finding Alice's grandmother, but instead finds tons of empty old homes which are set to be bulldozed. Seeing the quaint uninhabited homes, the wise young 9-year-old Alice poetically remarks, "It's too bad these lovely old houses have to be wrecked. The empty spaces look like graves... 'House Graves.'" After taking a swim at a public park where Phil teases the little girl by calling her a "Fish Face" and "Bed Pisser," Lisa asks her new friend: "I wonder if people take you to be my father?" To test her thesis, Alice asks a young woman who states "no" as she absurdly finds the scrawny journalist to be "too fat" to be her father. Phil and Alice end up spending the night at the woman's house and become a pseudo-family of sorts. Of course, Alice gets jealous when she notices Phil and the woman sleeping together. While on a boat to visit the journalist's parents, Phil randomly runs into the Dutch policeman (Hans Hirschmüller of Fassbinder's The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971)) he previously talked to upon arriving in Amsterdam, who reveals they have finally located Alice's mother. In the end, Phil and Alice take a train back to Munich, where the journalist plans to finally finish his article on America.

Another road movie from the kraut king of the road movie, Alice in the Cities probably does not have a single amazing camera angle nor thrilling plot twist, yet it still somehow manages to be nearly immaculate in its pace and direction, as if directed by some mumblecore moron suffering from insomnia who decided to give up on the hipster posturing and direct a sincere film for once. Indeed, sort of the German New Cinema answer to Vittorio De Sica's Italian neorealist masterpiece Bicycle Thieves (1948) aka Ladri di biciclette, albeit with the imperative added subtext of the disillusionment of the German mind in a capitalist American world, Alice in the Cities ultimately manages to be culturally and sociopolitically astute without being heavy-handed or preachy. In fact, I am still not exactly sure of Wenders' political allegiances, though he seems to understand from at least a metapolitical perspective American's corrosive effect on national cultural and cinema, especially in his own homeland. A partly autobiographical work in its depiction of an 'artistic' protagonist wandering between three nations (Germany being Wenders' homeland, the Netherlands his mother's homeland, and America being the director's adopted homeland), Alice in the Cities ultimately depicts the destruction of identity and roots in a world dominated by American anti-culture hegemony. Alice in the Cities is also noted for being influenced by Wenders' collaborator Peter Handke's life as a single father. Additionally, the film is also a playful response to Handke's Short Letter, Long Farewell (1972), hence the film's utilization of various random clips from John Ford's Young Mr. Lincoln (1939), which is referenced routinely in the novel. Undoubtedly, what both Handke and Wender's film demonstrates is that the melancholy hitchhiker character Robert Lander from Kings of the Road was not bullshitting when he famously stated, "The Yanks have colonized our subconscious." Of course, since the release of Alice in the Cities, Wenders' lifelong undying sense of deracination must have only grown as demonstrated by his on-and-off again relationship with Hollywood and his virtual statelessness as a filmmaker, with his upcoming work Every Thing Will Be Fine (2014) starring James Franco being a German-Canadian-Norwegian co-production. A work that demonstrates that America is a place where World War II propaganda featuring Kamikaze Japs crashing into Americans is absurdly played along side commercials for worthless consume products as if Americans died in the Second World War merely to perpetuate the freedom of tasteless capitalism, Alice in the Cities, like most of Wenders' films, is ultimately about longing for the intangible, with the slow and pathetic death of the Occident via Americanization and globalization being a bitter(sweet) thorn inside the filmmaker's side ever since his birth in the untimely year of 1945 in Allied-occupied Düsseldorf. That being said, one can only hope the character Alice grew up to be better adjusted than her adult friend Phil, but judging by the current state of Europa today, it is quite doubtful and I would not be surprised if she now sells her body in one of those creepy display cases in the red light district of Amsterdam.

THE WRONG MOVE

Wim Wenders (1975)

German auteur Wim Wenders (Paris, Texas, Wings of Desire) has surely directed a number of long and plodding films about seemingly nothing aside from moody and broody protagonists suffering from some sort of half-hearted (and sometimes seemingly half-autistic) existential crisis and, of course, some of these films are better than others, with Falsche Bewegung (1975) aka The Wrong Move aka Wrong Movement—the second film in the director's 'Road Movie Trilogy' (following Alice in the Cities (1974) and preceding Kings of the Road (1976)) shot by Robby Müller—being one of the filmmaker's most palatable works. Indeed, aside from being one of my favorite Wenders flicks, The Wrong Move also happens to be one of the auteur filmmaker's most discernibly Teutonic works as a loose adaptation of Goethe's second novel Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship (1795–1796) aka Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre, as well as a work slowly but surely boiling in post-Auschwitz angst. Indeed, a work about a young German writer suffering from writer's block who states regarding an old ex-nazi he befriends, "My aimless rage was directed at the old man. I used his past as an excuse to myself," The Wrong Move depicts an emotionally, socially, spiritually, and culturally detached people with an incapacity for mourning and who thus wander aimlessly along like zombies in a Fatherland that no longer has fathers. Sort of in the passively morbid 'anti-Heimat' meets Hitchcock spirit of Wenders' second feature Die Angst des Tormanns beim Elfmeter (1972) aka The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick, which was also penned by Slovene-Austrian novelist Peter Handke, The Wrong Move is about a rarely likeable prick of a Weltschmerz-wracked protagonist who finds it rather hard to find inspiration for his writing, so he goes on a soul-searching journey for inspiration and psychological liberation (he is a momma's boy and his mommy is an oppressive yet wealthy wench), ultimately running into a motley crew of curious characters who test his humanity (or lack thereof) and influence him to make the 'wrong moves.'

Wilhelm Meister (Rüdiger Vogler) is a bitchy German boy from Glückstadt in Nordic Schleswig-Holstein, West Germany, who has so much pent up angst that he scares some old folks by nonsensically smashing his hand threw his window in broad daylight. Unquestionably, Wilhelm takes after his discernibly bitchy Mother (played by bisexual Nazi era actress Marianne Hoppe). When Mommy dearest decides to sell the family supermarket, she gives Wilhelm some money and tells him to travel, with his journey taking him to Bonn in North Rhine-Westphalia. When boarding the train, Wilhelm notices a beautiful blonde actress named Therese (Fassbinder diva Hanna Schygulla) who, like him, reflects the contemporary generation of Germany, which is lost and is constantly searching for something, but what that certain something is they cannot seem to figure out. While on the train, Wilhelm starts a rocky friendship with an old street musician named Laertes (Hans Christian Blech), who confesses he ran the 100-yard dash in the 1936 Nazi Olympics and that he, like Uncle Adolf, would not have shaken the hand of American Negro Jesse Owens had he been given the chance. Laertes reflects the old generation of Germans as an unreformed National Socialist who is now without identity, purpose, and home, thus he wanders from place to place. With Laertes is a mute and seemingly dumb teen girl named Mignon (Nastassja Kinski in what was her first film role), who reflects contemporary German youth due to her being deaf and dumb. Wilhelm also catches the attention of an exceedingly effete and overweight Austrian poet-bum named Bernhard Landau (Peter Kern), who writes decadent verses like, "From my terror-stricken stiff member there shot sperm and dripped upon a white sheet" and proudly confesses regarding his life, "I've never amounted to much and hope I'll stay that way. I get injured once a year. This year I fell on the edge of a chair and gashed the corners of my mouth. It's healed up already." After walking aimlessly around a neighborhood in Frankfurt, Bernhard offers to take his friends to stay at his Uncle's castle, but when they arrive, they find not the poet's uncle but an industrialist (Ivan Desny) who is about to blow his brains out with a shotgun.

Somewhat strangely (and, in my opinion, darkly humorously) the suicidal Industrialist warmly welcomes his strange guests and describes how his wish for death is a consequence of his wife committing suicide not long ago. After an insightful chat with the Industrialist about "loneliness in Germany," Wilhelm goes in a dark room to have sex with Therese, but discovers mute Lolita Mignon instead and gives her a small smack across the face. The next day, everyone goes on a walk except for the Industrialist and Laertes reveals to Wilhelm that he was a concentration camp guard who killed Jews, stating, "I saved some Jews, if they were professionally qualified." When Wilhelm and his friends go back to the castle, they discover the Industrialist has committed suicide via hanging. From there, the crew of new wandering friends begins to fall apart and move with "idiotic panic," with Bernhard being the first one to leave. Among other things, Wilhelm comes close to killing Laertes after threatening to drown him in a lake due to his Nazi past and the writer is later confronted by Therese, who makes him the following ultimatum, "Help me, or leave me, Wilhelm! It's disgusting the way everything leaves you cold," and proceeds to physically assault him, destroying some of his melancholy writings in the process. In the end, Laertes leaves all by his lonesome, Therese and Mignon head to Italy with one another, and Wilhelm travels by himself to the very bottom of Southern Germany. While standing on the snowy Wetterstein Mountains in Zugspitze, Wilhelm contemplatively states to himself, "I told Therese I intended to stay in Germany...because I knew too little to write about it. It was only an excuse. I really just wanted so much to live my stupid life alone. I was waiting for an experience like a miracle. But there was no snowstorm. Why had I run away, why wasn't I back there with the others? Why did I threaten the old man instead of listening to his tale? I felt I had missed out somehow...and was still missing out with every new movement."

A decided downer of a movie that only a seasoned cultural pessimist could love, The Wrong Move might quite possibly be auteur Wim Wenders' most personally incriminating film, even if the themes are quite typical of his work, albeit with a more discernibly Teutonic tone. In what is unequivocally one of the most insightful, if not the most insightful, scene of The Wrong Movie, the suicidal Industrialist states to protagonist Wilhelm regarding the 'weakness' of Germans, "I'd just like to talk a bit...about loneliness in Germany. I think it's more hidden and...more distressing than elsewhere. Maybe the history of ideas here is responsible...which made people seek a way of life...that could help overcome fear. The propagation of virtues like...courage, fortitude...meant to distract attention from fear. Let's say it was that way. More than anywhere else philosophy could be used...as an ideology...so that the criminal methods required...to overcome fear could be legalized. Fear was considered vain...and shameful. That's why loneliness in Germany is...masked by all those revealing soulless faces...that haunt supermarkets, recreation areas...pedestrian zones and fitness-centers. The dead souls of Germany." After his long spiel, the Industrialist also states, "I refused to overcome fear," but of course he also committed suicide, thus demonstrating an 'overcoming of fear' is what made Germany so strong over the centuries and that succumbing to fear is for quitters. And, of course, angst-addled antihero Wilhelm is also plagued by fear, hence his writer's block, not to mention his innate incapacity for love and friendship. Indeed, it is especially interesting that The Wrong Move concludes with Wilhelm standing on top of a mountain in a scene that recalls German Romantic artist Caspar David Friedrich's painting Wanderer above the Sea of Fog (1818), albeit with the film scene featuring a much more negative and nihilistic message in its allegorical image of a morbidly introverted man who has built such a large wall dividing himself from other people that it reaches mountainous heights. In one particularly revealing scene, Wenders demonstrates some somewhat naïve optimism for Germany's future when Wilhelm states to his love interest, "I know I shall love you very much someday, Therese," but of course the stagnant state of German cinema and kultur, as well as the already abysmal birth rate of the nation, tells this national love never came to be. A post-WWII Goethe adaptation featuring scenes from Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet's Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach (1968) aka The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach and featuring more than one reference to suicide, The Wrong Movie is ultimately a depiction of kraut identity at its most pathologically conflicted and thus reveals Wim Wenders, who is ½ Dutch by ancestry, at arguably his most perversely personal. That being said, it should be no surprise that Wenders attempted (and ultimately failed) to trade-in his German identity and become an American filmmaker. Of course, after watching The Wrong Move, I must say that I almost don't blame him, as no one wants to be surrounded by suicidal art-fags like the protagonist of the film.

THE AMERICAN FRIEND

Wim Wenders (1977)

Compared to a Fassbinder, Schroeter, or Syberberg, Wim Wenders is, at best, only of minor interest to me when it comes to the great filmmakers of German New Cinema. Whether reading one of his books, listening to him doing an audio commentary or interview, or watching a good a percentage of his films, Wenders puts me to sleep with his plodding meanderings, pseudo-existentialist excursions, and seemingly prosaic and passive personality. Like many filmmakers of his generation, including Volker Schlöndorff who attempted to become French and Werner Schroeter who attempted to be totally cosmopolitan (although I believe his heart was in the Mediterranean!), Wenders, who has often-times referenced his steady diet of America culture growing up and did not direct a “Road Movie Trilogy” for no reason, attempted to dissolve his German identity (although, to be fair, he is ½ Dutch) and become an ‘American’ filmmaker, with his transitional film being the neo-noir West German-French co-production The American Friend (1977) aka Der Amerikanische Freund. Loosely based on a then-unpublished manuscript entitled Ripley’s Game (although the novel was ultimately released before the film in 1974) written by American psychological thriller novelist Patricia Highsmith, The American Friend would be Wenders’ first international breakthrough and provide him with the reputation that would ultimately land him in Hollywood and enable him to work for Francis Ford Coppola’s American Zoetrope studio. Featuring seven distinguished auteur filmmakers (although if one counts the director’s cameo as a bandaged man, it is really eight) playing the roles of criminals, including Nicholas Ray, Dennis Hopper (whose role was originally meant for John Cassavetes), Sam Fuller, Gérard Blain, Daniel Schmid, Jean Eustache, and Peter Lilienthal, The American Friend is a sort ‘filmmaker’s film’ and a cinephiles’ wet dream, especially for diehard fans of American film noir, old school gangster flicks, and French New Wave, which are not exactly my favorite film genres/movements, but all these cinematic ingredients surprisingly come together in Wenders’ quasi-arthouse take on Highsmith’s charismatic anti-hero Tom Ripley. In fact, with the possible exception of Paris, Texas (1984) and to a lesser extent Wings of Desire (1987), The American Friend is the only Wim Wenders flick that stops me from completely disregarding the self-loathing kraut expatriate auteur altogether.

Tom Ripley (Dennis Hopper) is a criminally wealthy and completely cunning and charismatic American psychopath living in the North German city of Hamburg and his current scheme involves driving up the bids of forged paintings created by an artist named Derwitt (Rebel Without a Cause director Nicholas Ray, whose slow and miserable death via cancer Wenders morbidly chronicled a couple years later with the 1980 documentary Lightning Over Water), who has faked his own death. While attending an auction for one of the Derwitt fakes, Tom meets a picture framer named Jonathan Zimmermann (Bruno Ganz) who absolutely offends the charismatic conman by stating "I've heard of you" in a derogatory fashion and refusing to shake his hand. Tom learns from a friend that Jonathan is apparently dying of a rare and unmentioned blood disease, hence his rude behavior. Offended by Jonathan's belligerent behavior, Tom begins plotting a scheme so as to heal his wounded pride. After getting an unexpected visit from a French gangster named Raoul Minot (Gérard Blain), who asks him to murder somebody for him because he owes him a big favor, Tom finally finds a way to payback Jonathan's hospitality. While Tom tells Raoul, "Listen. I know rock musicians. I know lawyers. I know art dealers, pimps, politicians. But murder? I don't want to be involved. Period," the American comes up with a conspiracy that will solve both of their problems. Using friends and corrupt doctors, Tom spreads rumors everywhere that Jonathan is dying from the blood disease and that by assassinating a couple of rival criminals for Raoul, the picture framer can secure financial security for his family by working as a contract killer before he kicks the bucket. Since Jonathan is not a professional gangster but a mere picture frame shop owner, Minot also agrees with Tom that he makes for the perfect discrete killer. Although Jonathan initially turns Minot down for the offer to kill for cash, after getting a second opinion (which Minot ultimately has the doctor alter) on his illness at a high tech French hospital, he finally gives in after grief and realizing his family might not be taken care of. Jonathan's mission is to kill an "American Jew from New Jersey" (Highsmith was no fan of the Jews) named Igraham (Swiss high-camp auteur Daniel Schmid playing a rather unfitting but certainly provocative role) by stalking him around in a French subway and shooting with a gun hidden under his trench coat in what is one of the most intense and iconic scenes of The American Friend. When Jonathan comes back to Hamburg after his successful assassination of a Hebrew gangster, Tom pays him a visit at his picture frame shop and the two begin to develop an unlikely friendship. Of course, Jonathan is totally unaware that sick Yank psychopath set him up to become an assassin and spread the false rumors regarding his supposedly fatal condition. Due to his strange attraction to Jonathan, Tom becomes angered when Minot asks the picture framer to kill another gangster on a train using a mere garrote. Due to the complex and dangerous nature of the assignment (the gangster has multiple bodyguards), Jonathan expects to die while executing the second murder and tells Minot to give his wife Marianne (Lisa Kreuzer) the money. Jonathan nearly botches the job on the train, but luckily Tom randomly appears out of nowhere and helps him dispose of the gangster and his bodyguard. After the assassination assignment is completed, Tom finally has the decency to admit to Jonathan that he setup him up with Minot because he was offended by his behavior when they initially met at the art auction, stating, "Remember that day we were introduced at the auction? You said, 'I've heard of you.'" You said that in a very nasty way.” Tom even rejects the assassination money and when Jonathan asks what he wants instead, he states, “I don’t know what I could possibly want from you....I would like to be your friend...but friendship isn’t, uh, possible.”

Ironically, Jonathan begins confiding in Tom—the maniacal criminal mastermind who got the simple picture framer in the dangerous situation in the first place—regarding his problems with his wife, who rightfully believes that her husband was doing more than just going to doctor appointments while on his assassination missions. Jonathan also lets Tom know that he is scared about random anonymous calls he has been receiving at home, which he believes are from the mafia. After stumbling from what is clearly his declining health, Jonathan receives a visit from Minot, who tells him that his flat has been bombed by rival gangsters. Tom tells Jonathan to come to his house and they wait for the gangsters, who are led by an elderly American gangster (played by American cult auteur Samuel Fuller). Jonathan manages to kill a dorky gunman and not long after they spot the old Yankee gangster and his cronies hiding out in an ambulance. Jonathan and Tom manage to kill the gangsters in a somewhat anticlimatic manner (most of the deaths featured in the film are rather ‘softcore’), but a problem arises when Marianne somehow magically finds her husband and his American ‘friend’ at the scene of the crime. A truly devoted wife, Marianne agrees to help her husband and Tom, who is driving the ambulance full of bodies, to the beach so they can dispose of the criminal corpses. Assumedly, to payback Tom for his pack of lies, Jonathan leaves his criminal compatriot at the beach. Unfortunately and quite ironically, Tom’s lies prove to be true as Jonathan dies suddenly while driving at warped speed, almost killing his wife in the process. Of course, in the end, Tom Ripley comes out the situation rather unscathed, but minus one kraut ‘friend.’

A film about a wealthy and psychopathic American who completely corrupts an artistic and kindly family man who does not like “people who buy paintings as an investment,” The American Friend is a cleverly concocted allegorical work about the deleterious effects of America’s occupation, colonization, and continued cultural hegemony over not just Europe/Germany in general, but also Occidental cinema. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid, one of the most idiosyncratic filmmakers of his era as the man behind Tonight or Never (1972), La Paloma (1974), and Shadow of Angels (1976), played the first gangster killed in The American Friend as his excess-ridden high-camp auteur pieces could have never been made in America under any circumstances. Additionally, it is also no coincidence that American auteur Sam Fuller (Pickup on South Street, Shock Corridor) is the final gangster killed after a long and brutal fall down some stairs as he was a filmmaker whose work was essentially ignored for most of his life and was totally at odds with Hollywood and it was only until his works were praised by European film critics/filmmakers, especially those involved with the French New Wave, that he developed a cult following and his oeuvre was regarded as having actual artistic merit.

Undoubtedly, The American Friend, which was incidentally the director's first film featuring an onscreen death, is easily Wim Wenders' most action-packed and 'thrilling' work, which I guess does not say much considering the filmmaker's initial association with German New Cinema and being the director behind such seemingly endless works as Until the End of the World (1991) aka Bis ans Ende der Welt. In my humble opinion, Wenders, the son of a doctor and a member of the German bourgeoisie, would have had little, if any, interest in film noir and other Hollywood genres had he not been born during 'Germany Year Zero' (1945) and forcibly spoon-fed American cinema growing up as a member of a conquered nation and colonized continent, hence why the director's work The American Friend is so aesthetically far removed from the genre it pays rather reluctant tribute to as a European film haphazardly disguised as an American genre flick. Ironically, what makes The American Friend most interesting and enthralling, especially for a born turncoat like myself, is its innate Europeanness, which is all the more underscored by its utilization of American stars/filmmakers and Hollywood genre conventions. Of course, the European character of The American Friend is all the more highlighted when compared to the big budget Highsmith adaptation The Talented Mr. Ripley (1999), which instead of feeling like an auteur work like Wenders' film, seems like a masturbation piece for star Matt Damon to show off his acting talents. In fact, upon first seeing The American Friend about a decade ago, I had not even the slightest idea it was based on the same character as The Talented Mr. Ripley, which might as well have been directed by a robot programmed by Steven Spielberg.

Despite Wenders' insights and negative view of American's culture-distorting influence on Europe, he decided to go to Hollywood after The American Friend and direct the Francis Ford Coppola produced work Hammett (1982), another homage to American film noir. Despite being a filmmaker himself, Coppola was just as malicious as any Hollywood art-antagonistic producer, only ultimately using 30% of the footage Wenders shot and reshooting the rest of the film himself, thereupon destroying the German auteur's authorship and film in the process. Although he already knew better before he ever arrived in the United States, Wenders stated regarding the artistic disaster of Hammett, "Coppola and I realized it after some time. Two different systems had clashed. I didn't want to give up my position as an independent director, and Francis wanted to be a producer the way he had pictured it. The American studio system and European auteur film are so different." Wenders' collaboration with Coppola was so bad that the German filmmaker's celluloid compatriot Rainer Werner Fassbinder even offered to beat the shit out of the director of The Godfather at the 1980 Oscars as payback for destroying Hammett. Of course, it would have made for one of the greatest anecdotes as well as metaphors in film history if Germany's greatest wunderkind auteur gave a beating to one of America's most overrated industrial filmmakers. That being said, maybe it is about time Wenders directs a loose sequel to The American Friend where a German general arrives in Iraq to train members of the 'multicultural' American army and the GIs ends up killing tons of innocent civilians, as well as their own men in 'friendly fire,' as it would make for a great allegory for how Hollywood aesthetically defiled the kraut auteur's vision when they remade his work Wings of Desire (1987) as the pile of philistine and sentimentalist celluloid shit City of Angels (1998) starring Meg Ryan and Nicholas Cage and directed by the cinematic genius behind Casper (1995). Indeed, only in America could a filmmaker responsible for directing children's films be given the opportunity to remake a commercially successful European arthouse flick.

LIGHTNING OVER WATER

Nicholas Ray was one of the few true bad boy directors that worked in the strict confines of the Hollywood studio system. Nick Ray directed Rebel Without a Cause (1955) – arguably the greatest and most influential teen angst film ever made – so, one could say that the Hollywood auteur invented the “too cool for school” model for misunderstood American youth. Ray also directed the subversive western Johnny Guitar (1954), a film that features Joan Crawford playing a cowgirl who can fight with the most brutal of cowboys, thus one could argue the director was a nominal feminist of sorts. Like most great directors, Ray’s talents started to dwindle as he entered his not so sparkling golden years. Due to being a lifelong drug addict and alcoholic, Ray started to find himself being rejected by the strictly business businessmen of tinsletown during the early 1960s. In fact, Ray collapsed on the set of his film 55 Days of Peking (1963) while intoxicated; no doubt one of the most embarrassing things that could happen to a serious filmmaker. If one thing stayed consistent in Nicholas Ray’s life (besides constant intoxication), it was his ability to fit in with and influence younger generations of filmmakers and actors. Ray is known for being extra considerate to the stars of Rebel Without a Cause, even allowing James Dean to give much creative input in the direction of the film (some have argued that Dean actually directed the film). In 1970, Ray met and smoked weed with the equally eccentric Dennis Hopper (who had a small role in Ray’s Rebel Without a Cause) during a Grateful Dead concert at the Fillmore East in Manhattan, NYC. At the time, Hopper was putting the finishing touches on his cinematic bomb The Last Movie (1971). Not long after the concert, Hopper landed Nicholas Ray a film studies professor job at SUNY Binghamton University in upstate New York. Just as he did with Hopper, Ray had no qualms about smoking weed with his film students. In fact, Ray and his students can be seen sharing a joint together in the director’s last work We Can’t Go Home Again; a film that the filmmaker worked on for about a decade, but never officially completed (although rough drafts of the work were screened at various film festivals). In the documentary Lightning Over Water (1980), German director Wim Wenders captured Ray’s remaining days on earth.

Seeing as I am a fan of both Wim Wenders and Nicholas Ray’s films, I expected Lightning Over Water to be a an oh-so rare work where two different directors from two different generations and two different worlds come together for a special moment in cinema history. Instead, Lightning Over Waters was one of the most painful and unrewarding films that I have had the displeasure of seeing. Basically, the documentary is about an arrogant young auteur who coldly documents the depressing deterioration of a once virile and rebellious filmmaker. Ray may have smoked pot and guzzled booze well into his senior years, but in Lightning Over Water he can barely even string together a simple and articulate sentence. During the beginning of this quasi-documentary, Wenders oddly states to mentally and physically gray Ray, "I thought I'd find myself attracted to your weakness and suffering." Indeed, it does seem like Wenders is deriving pleasure from Ray's mental and physical decline throughout Lightning Over Water. Although Lightning Over Water is a documentary, many of the scenes seem rather staged and horribly contrived, as if Wenders was attempting to make a minimalistic melodrama, but neglected to include a cohesive plot. If there is one element about the film that is truly authentic, it's Ray's delirium and dementia-ridden-like behavior. At one point in the documentary, Ray states, "Jesus Christ, I'm sick!", yet it still seems as if he can't completely understand what is happening to him. I am sure that Ray's lifelong hedonistic pursuits had worn his health to nil, though he still seems like the typical kind of elderly person that you can easily find at a full-care nursing home. Anyone who has ever watched a grandparent lose their health knows that it is not the most pleasant event to witness. If Wenders manages to do anything right with Lightning Over Water, it is documenting the all-encompassing melancholy and misery that often accompanies old age. I seriously doubt that the majority of serious cinephiles (be they fans of Ray and/or Wenders or not) will find any redeeming qualities - whether it aesthetically, thematically, or historically - in the entirety of the film. Despite being packed with gloom and hopeless despair, Lightning Over Water also manages to be extremely banal and quite the struggle to get through. The fact that the film - a highly intimate and extremely serious work - was screened out of competition at the 1980 Cannes Film Festival just goes to show how horrible of a film it really is. After all, if Lightning Over Water was at least half-way decent, the judges probably would have given it honorary critical acclaim due to its seemingly human portrayal of a once highly influential filmmaker. Wenders even failed to make the documentary a worthy tribute to Nicholas Ray's filmmaking career. Lightning Over Water does feature a couple snippets from Ray's large body of work, nevertheless, these scenes are completely bombarded and ultimately eclipsed by the filmmaker's stark geriatric degeneration; making it seem as if his entire filmmaking career was solely in vain. Although a lot of filmmakers experience a wane in artistic prowess as they reach old age, few filmmakers have concluded their career with a project that is as repellent and uncomplimentary as Lightning Over Water.

Nicholas Ray and James Dean

I am not one who tends to label films exploitative, however, Lightning Over Water is blatantly so. For Wim Wenders to claim that Nicholas Ray was a great friend seems a little more than dishonest. In a perfect world, Ray's career would have ended with the successful completion and critical acclaim of We Can't Go Home Again, but instead, his life concluded with the deplorable and disposable abortion Lightning Over Water. Of course, it will be superlatively obvious to most viewers that Wenders' self-satisfied sadism bleeds throughout the entire documentary. For most of Lightning Over Water, Wim Wenders looks like a wimpy prick full of pretention and anal retention as he creepily and somewhat fiendishly lurks around the mostly oblivious Nicholas Ray. Near the conclusion of Lightning Over Water, Wenders forces Ray to call the cut of the film. Ray – being in an overt state of confusion – somewhat agitatedly, yet appropriately, responds with, “I am sick and you’re making me sick.....ok I’m finished.” It should also be noted that Lightning Over Water was directed and narrated in a manner comparable to a Werner Herzog documentary; minus character and spirit. Whereas Herzog’s documentaries are known for being quite empathetic and respectful in their portrayal of (often peculiar) subjects, Lightning Over Water offers an impudently aloof and aweless depiction of Nicholas Ray. Although I have enjoyed some of Wim Wenders’ films in the past (Wings of Desire and Paris, Texas), I would be lying if I did not admit my newfound disdain for the obnoxious German auteur. Maybe if Wenders is lucky, some young and obscenely arrogant up-and-coming filmmaker will document his remaining days on his deathbed in a manner as vulgar as his putrid portraiture of Ray in Lightning Over Water. Near the beginning of the documentary, Wenders mentions the budget he has to work with for an upcoming film; to which Nick Ray responds with, “For 1% of that, I could make..... lightning over water.” Unfortunately, Wim Wenders was the one that made Lightning Over Water; a film less appealing than cute piglets being led to their slaughter.

THE STATE OF THINGS
THE STATE OF THINGS

Wim Wenders (1982)

The same year his cinematic compatriot Rainer Werner Fassbinder tragically dropped dead after taking a fatal drug cocktail, German auteur Wim Wenders (The American Friend, Until the End of the World) finally caught up to his friend in a sense by making a work in the meta-cinematic spirit of Beware of a Holy Whore (1971). Indeed, like Fassbinder's Beware of a Holy Whore, Der Stand der Dinge (1982) aka The State of Things is a highly autobiographical work partly set in the Mediterranean about the physical and, especially meta-physical, drain that comes with being a filmmaker and dealing with all the many problems that can go wrong while making a film. While Beware of a Holy Whore depicted how the commune-like way of life had to turned to chaos where Fassbinder and his underlings were concerned, The State of Things was the result of Wenders' less than ideal experience after coming to Hollywood and working on Hammett (1982) with Francis Ford Coppola, who ultimately took control and butchered the film (apparently, only about 30% of footage Wenders shot is featured in the completed version, with the rest being directed by 'executive producer' Coppola). In a rather interesting anecdote, Wenders tells in the documentary Fassbinder in Hollywood (2002), that apparently Fassbinder offered to beat the shit out of Francis Ford Coppola to avenge the Hollywood director's aesthetic destruction of Hammett, but of course the Wings of Desire director made sure to hide his 'American friend' from his brazen Bavarian bud. Wenders also chronicled his nightmarish experience with Coppola in Reverse Angle (1982)—a short that documents the two filmmakers butting heads—but with The State of Things the filmmaker would ultimately have his revenge, not least of all because he decided to go back to Europa to shoot this work. Set in Portugal, The State of Things was shot with a good portion of the cast and crew of Raúl Ruiz's arthouse horror flick The Territory (1981)—a production Wenders went to help out with after Coppola put the production of Hammett on hiatus after deciding the script needed to be rewritten. Shot by French cinematographer Henri Alekan who, among other things, was responsible for the phantasmagoric cinematography of Jean Cocteau's masterpiece La Belle et la bête (1946) aka Beauty and the Beast, The State of Things is arguably Wenders' most aesthetically accomplished black-and-white film, even if it is far from his best film. Essentially Wenders' 8 ½, albeit infinitely more melancholy and anything but Fellini-esque, The State of Things is a noir-ish passive aggressive (and some might say defeatist) reminder that Hollywood is run by swarthy criminals in fancy suits.

A fictional filmmaker lovingly named after German expressionist master auteur F.W. Murnau, Friedrich Munro (Belgian actor Patrick Bauchau), is shooting a Corman-esque sci-fi film in black-and-white arthouse style entitled The Survivors in scenic Portugal and he has just been told by his elderly yet quick witted cameraman Joe Corby (legendary cult auteur Samuel Fuller) that they no longer have film stock left to shoot the film. On top of that, the film's eccentric New Jersey-bred Jewish producer Gordon (Allen Garfield) has disappeared without a trace, thus forcing the film production into indefinite limbo. Friedrich is told by his script girl Kate (played by Warhol superstar Viva), who the director is also screwing, that regarding comforting the rest of his crew about the dubious future of the production, he should, "just sweet talk them the way you sweet talk me," but it all proves to be in vain, as the production seems to hit a permanent standstill. With hysterical American queens, a pissed off screenwriter named Dennis (played by 'golden hippie' Paul Getty Jr., who was dubiously kidnapped in 1973 and had his ear cut off) who sunk $200,000 into the production, depressed French folks, and a drunken cinematographer with personal problems, Friedrich decides to go back to Los Angeles to find producer Gordon. When Friedrich attempts to ask his lawyer (played by cult director/producer Roger Corman), who also happens to be the producer's lawyer, about what sort of trouble Gordon is in and his whereabouts, he is met with hostility. Friedrich eventually manages to track Gordon down on Sunset Boulevard hiding in a Winnebago. With Gordon's equally sleazy 'chauffer' Herbert (Monty Bane) at the wheel of the mobile home, the producer lets Friedrich know what happened to the production of their stillborn film on an aimless road trip that lasts from the late evening into dusk. As revealed during one of Gordon's many hysterical rants, the producer borrowed the money for the film from the mafia and they were not happy to see they funded an artsy fartsy black-and-white film, or as he complains to Friedrich: "Black and white, black and white...you mother fucker! I ought to have my fucking head examined...Talking me into black and white! Who the fuck makes black and white now, huh? An ice cream parlor, that's who makes black and white! Black and white." Gordon confesses that he 'loved' the film, "but that's irrelevant at this point my friend," as he owes money to money-grubbing kosher killers who don't take kindly to people who don't pay back with a large amount of interest. In what is undoubtedly the most hilarious and telling scene of film and the relationship between German filmmakers and Hollywood producers in general, Gordon also states to Friedrich, "I'll tell you, I never thought I'd live to see the day when I'd be working with a German director, right. A Jew from Newark, New Jersey and a German picked up at the fucking Chateau Marmont. What the fuck are you and I doing with each other, huh?," thus demonstrating the absurdity of monetary-minded Hebrews working with art-minded Aryan filmmakers in the first place, as if such a relationship could sire anything but something corrosive and/or ultimately aborted. When the Winnebago road trip is over and Friedrich is dropped off at his car, the producer and director hug one last time. While they are hugging, a mafia sniper shoots Gordon in back and Friedrich jumps back up and points his film camera at the phantom sniper as if it were a gun. Of course, Friedrich is also shot as well, with both director and producer literally dying for their art.

Despite being a small film made in the intermediate period when Hammett was in limbo, The State of Things went on to not only win the German Film Award in Gold for Cinematography and in Silver for Best Feature Film in 1983, but also the coveted 'Golden Lion' in 1982, which is the highest prize of the Venice Film Festival. Ultimately, with its iconic performance by legendary cult director Samuel Fuller, cameo by Roger Corman as a scumbag lawyer, typically bitchy performance by Warhol superstar Viva, and small performance as a camera operator by American underground filmmaker Robert Kramer, The State of Things is an anti-Hollywood cinephile's wet dream, even if a rather negative one where the German auteur is killed by Jewish gangsters in the end. The fact that Wenders had the gall to portray both the producer and gangsters (who are never shown, but whose names, like 'Stein', are referenced) as Hebrews in The State of Things has given me a new sense of respect for the Teutonic existentialist auteur that I never had before. More disheartening than François Truffaut's Day for Night (1973) and a virtually aesthetically contra work to Bob Fosse's All That Jazz (1979), The State of Things ultimately seems like Wenders' own personal take on Fassbinder's Beware of a Holy Whore in terms of being a piece of self-reflexive meta-cinema, thus demonstrating the auteur had yet to lose his Teutonic roots, even if he had already been defiled by Coppola's almost entirely negative influence. As Wenders once stated, "All my films...have as their underlying current the Americanization of Germany," and indeed, in none of his films is this more clear than The State of Things. Of course, as Wenders' filmic alter-ego Friedrich Munro of That States of Things states, "Remember, I'm at home nowhere...in no house, in no country," thus demonstrating the German filmmaker's undying sense of deracination in an increasingly American world. Indeed, it is no coincidence that The State of Things was released the same year Fassbinder died, which is oftentimes regarded by film critics as the year that German New Cinema and, in turn, German cinema in general, died. I hate to say it (or maybe I don't), but sometimes I wish it was Wenders that died instead of Fassbinder and I would certainly have more respect for the Paris, Texas director if he died in the same manner as Friedrich Munro in The State of Things.

PARIS, TEXAS

Wim Wenders (1984)

Sometimes it takes an outsider's perspective for one to truly appreciate their own nation and its idiosyncrasies, or at least that is the conclusion that I and many other people have drawn after watching the West German-French-UK-USA co-production Paris, Texas (1984) directed by German auteur Wim Wenders (The American Friend, Until the End of the World). Indeed, while a work featuring a number of less than cultivated American characters that have been known to live in trailer parks and drink their fair share of whisky and beer, Paris, Texas also depicts the United States, namely the scorching Southwest, as a place with an almost mystical and fantasy-like landscape while simultaneously demystifying the region via its tragic and less-than-larger-than-life characters. In that sense, Wenders' film seems partially like an American (anti)Heimat film, thus making it all the more ironic that Paris, Texas was directed by a German of ½ Dutch extraction and shot by Dutch master cinematographer Robby Müller (Die Wildente aka The Wild Duck, To Live and Die in L.A.). Based on a curious character study written by Pulitzer Prize-winning American actor/playwright Sam Shepard, Paris, Texas is like a Teutonized slice of Lynchian Americana (the fact that Harry Dean Stanton and Dean Stockwell star in the film only adds to this), albeit minus the wayward and whimsical weirdness and goofy degenerate jazz scores. Probably the most successful example of German New Cinema meets Hollywood, Paris, Texas demonstrated that, for at least a second, Wenders—the undisputed master of road movies—was successful from making the transition from kraut auteur to Hollywood maverick (which he failed to do previously while working on Hammitt (1982) with Francis Ford Coppola) and that the European arthouse film could be made palatable for culturally-retarded Americans. Unanimously winning the coveted 'Palme d'Or' at the 1984 Cannes Film Festival, Paris, Texas has certainly obtained a rather prestigious reputation in the cinephile world, yet I would hesitate to call it a flawless masterpiece, let alone Wenders' greatest work, but it is indubitably one of the most important films of the 1980s as a picturesque, if not pathologically melancholy, celluloid postcard of some of America's most cinematically under-appreciated geography and landscapes. A more 'optimistic' take on what great American Guido Vincent Gallo would later attempt in his much hated arthouse work The Brown Bunny (2003), Paris, Texas follows an irreparably internally wounded man (who does not speak for the first 26 minutes of the film!) who is haunted by the past and is thus incapable of treading on to the future, thus being in sync with the post-WWII German New Cinema theme of the 'inability to mourn.' Dedicated to German Jewish film historian Lotte H. Eisner and featuring a small role by Austrian leftist auteur Bernhard Wicki (Die Brücke aka The Bridge, The Longest Day), Paris, Texas is also a sort of quasi-cryptic tribute to Wenders'

Travis Henderson (Harry Dean Stanton) is a man suffering from a seemingly selective form of amnesia who collapses upon entering a saloon after hardly being able to bear the rather arid South Texas desert landscape. Travis is treated by a Germanic doctor named Ulmer (Bernhard Wicki), but refuses to answer the good doc's questions. After finding a random phone number on Travis, the doctor manages to get in contact with the seemingly mute man's brother, Walt Henderson (Dean Stockwell), who agrees to pick him up and bring him back to Los Angeles, California. As it turns out, Travis had been missing for four years and Walt assumed he was dead and decided to adopt his brother's little boy Hunter (Hunter Carson, who is the progeny of writer L. M. Kit Carson and actress Karen Black), who was abandoned by both his young mother and mentally ill father. When Walt arrives in South Texas, Travis has already fled Ulmer's place, but the concerned brother eventually finds his big bro wandering along the roadside all by his lonesome. Rather annoyed by Travis' silence, Walt attempts to verbally beat out some answers from Travis, but it is only upon looking at a map of 'Paris, Texas' (a place he theorizes is where he was conceived) that the ostensibly mute mensch breaks his silly silence. Since Travis seems to be suffering from a variety of autistic tendencies, he refuses to fly in a plane, so Walt is forced to drive his brother back to LA. When the two arrive in Los Angeles, Travis is reintroduced to his son Hunter and Walt's French wife Anne (Aurore Clément), with the former acting somewhat dismissive of his biological father and the latter doing her darnedest to comfort her seemingly impenetrable brother-in-law. After watching some old Super-8 home-video footage of himself, ex-wife Jane (Nastassja Kinski), and baby son Hunter, Travis begins to remember the former life he has tried so hard to forget. Acting like a skittish man-child, Travis gets some help from a Mexican maid on how to 'look like a father' and begins showing up at Hunter's school in an awkward attempt to break the ice with the son he once abandoned. Over the next couple days, father and son finally develop an almost childish bond and after Anne tells Travis that his ex-wife Jane deposits money for her son each month at a bank in Houston, Texas, the fallen family man gets it in his head that he will hunt down his beloved, with Hunter agreeing to help him with the almost juvenile search plan/adventure.

Without saying a word to Walt and Anne, Travis and Hunter hit the road and develop a rather heartwarming father-son relationship that seemed all but impossible only a couple days before. After spotting Jane at the bank in Houston that she deposits money at each month, Travis and Hunter follow her to what is ultimately a sleazy strip club. Forcing Hunter to wait in the car for obvious reasons, Travis enters the strip club and eventually comes face-to-face with his ex-wife Anne, but she does not know it, as she is the 'performer' in a one-way mirror peepshow room where she cannot see the 'customers.' Assumedly shocked by Anne's dubious choice of occupation and the fact this is the first time he has seen his ex-wife in a number of years, Travis leaves the strip club without saying a word and instead opts for getting wasted at a bar and contemplating his next move. The next day, Travis leaves Hunter at the Meridien Hotel in downtown Houston and finally gets the gall to 'connect' with Jane. Once again entering the stripper peepshow booth with the one-way mirror he had entered the day before, Travis tells Jane a story about a young girl and a much older man who were deeply in love and who had a child together, but whose romance had imploded after the man became insanely jealous and alcohol-addled, thus forcing the young girl to make her great escape, ultimately abandoning her husband and young son. Eventually, Jane realizes that Travis is on the other side of the mirror and the two 'touch' in a symbolic scene where their hands are separated by a pesky mirror. Indeed, in this 'peepshow' scene, which is arguably the most important and certainly most climatic scene of Paris, Texas, Travis finally reveals the source of his initial wordlessness and amnesia as a man who made it up in his mind to go to a nowhere land "without language or streets." While Jane pleads for Travis to stay, he knows there is no hope for their relationship (after all, she makes her living peddling her flesh goods) and instead tells his ex-wife to reunite with their son at the Meridien Hotel. In the end, Jane and Hunter are reunited and Travis drives away all by his lonesome in what is a rather bittersweet ending.

In an interview with female filmmaker Allison Anders (Border Radio, Gas, Food Lodging) featured as an extra feature on the Criterion Collection release of Paris, Texas, she makes the somewhat impressive claim that Wenders' film almost single-handedly sparked the American 'Indie Film' movement that reached its peak in the early 1990s. Indeed, Paris, Texas would prove to be a hit film with many important American artists of the 1990s, with both Kurt Cobain and Elliott Smith naming it as their favorite film, which is rather ironic since both men committed suicide under dubious circumstances. Undoubtedly, in its innate existentialist angst, Paris, Texas is most certainly a 'bummer' of a film and I find it rather humorous that a German filmmaker would release a sort of aesthetic Weltschmerz plague on American artists, as a sort of metaphysical revenge for the Second World War and subsequent physical and spiritual colonization of the Fatherland by American forces. It is also interesting to note that star Harry Dean Stanton, who has spent most of his career playing support roles as a character actor, has named Paris, Texas as his personal favorite of the films he has acted in. Aside from inspiring suicidal grunge musicians, I think the creators of hit meth-themed AMC crime-drama Breaking Bad (2008-2013) certainly owe an aesthetic debt to Wim Wenders and his Dutch buddy Robby Müller, as the arid aesthetic prowess of the TV shows seems almost unimaginable were it not for Paris, Texas, a work that makes the epic of English auteur David Lean (Lawrence of Arabia, Doctor Zhivago) seem superlatively superficial in their depictions of vast landscapes. Like a Europeanized western lacking cowboys and Indians and romantic views of the wild west that somehow still manages to be romantic in its rampant melancholia, Wenders' Paris, Texas is not unlike its cinematic grandfather F.W. Murnau's masterpiece Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927), as a sort of cross-national anomaly of cinema history that demonstrates what a real cinematic artist can do with the resources of Hollywood. As someone who has always seen Wim Wenders, not unlike Volker Schlöndorff, as having always been more 'Americanized' than his contemporaries of German New Cinema like Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Helma Sanders-Brahms, Werner Herzog, and Werner Schroeter, Paris, Texas certainly seems like the film the auteur was born to make, so it should be no surprise that the director stated of the film himself in an interview with Roger Willemsen, "Everything before was practice which enabled me to make this film. And all the other films taken together were a kind of platform for it." A film where the landscape and music (undoubtedly, Ry Cooder's score is nearly immaculate) are just as much, if not more so, characters in the film as the lead characters themselves, Paris, Texas is ultimately an 'existentialist' exercise in cinematic form and a work that belongs to the category of films Wenders once described as 'emotion pictures.' Of course, I must admit that my emotions are more in sync with a Herzog film than a Wenders flick, so the tone of Paris, Texas is somewhat alien to me due to its passivity, though it is an alien essence that I welcome from time to time by re-watching the film every couple years or so.

FÜHRER EX

Winfried Bonengel (2002)

Führer Ex is a German film based on the life of real-life former neo-Nazi and blonde beast Ingo Hasselbach. Hasselbach decided to quit the neo-Nazi scene after meeting Führer Ex director Winfried Bonengel during the filming of a documentary on contemporary German Nazis. Hasselbach felt that Bonengel was someone who “rebelled” against German democracy but also wasn’t a neo-Nazi. Hasselbach realized one could rebel against the German “democratic” state without being a neo-Nazi. One of the biggest reasons for Hasselbach’s involvement in the neo-Nazi scene in Germany was his contempt for growing up in Eastern Communist Germany and the prison time he served there just attempting to escape the Marxist prison-state. Führer Ex follows a young boyish blonde German Heiko and his friend Tommy as things get worse for them in Eastern Germany. They transform from just being antisocial punk rockers rebelling against a commie stasi police state to full fledged violent neo-Nazi street fighters. After being arrested for attempting to escape Eastern Germany and make their way west, they are jailed. During their early prison stay, Tommy is already part of the Nazi club (he was imprisoned before) and Heiko at first rejects Nazism. Heiko changes his position later when assaulted and raped by a Gay prisoner that pretends to befriend him. The Nazi gang virtually beats the gay prisoner to death after finding Heiko in a bloody and naked traumatized state. Heiko goes from being a sweet young Aryan to a hateful Nazi leader after getting out of Jail. He is the “Führer” of a neo-Nazi “terrorist” house in Germany. He has his own troop of contemporary Nazi SA brown shirt storm troopers in the form of ugly shaved head skinheads. These young brutes have an impulse for inflicting pain on foreigners and leftist/anarchist/commie rival gangs. Heiko’s friend Tommy eventually catches up with with him and he realizes he is not really a Nazi anymore. This starts to turn them into enemies as Heiko has turned ultimately into a Nazi idealist that has blocked off outsider empathy. Only during the conclusion of Führer Ex does Heiko figure out something that has come too late. Real-life ex neo-Nazi Ingo Hasselbach’s book Führer Ex is much different than the film. A lot of facts are obviously changed and made-up for entertainment purposes. Also, the constraints of having a feature-length tell Hasselbach’s story doesn’t help. The autobiography Führer Ex focuses on Hasselbach’s life growing up in Eastern Germany as an anti-social child to his time after the movement where former comrades tried to blow up his mother’s apartment. Ingo Hasselbach was also responsible for co-writing the script for Führer Ex. After reading the book Führer Ex, I found the film to be far inferior. Still, the film is highly entertaining and much better than most films of a similar subject matter. It doesn’t feature any blatant “in-your-face” moral message. It just merely shows situations and the results of those situations. With the book and film, Ingo Hasselbach seemed to capitalize a lot off his former taboo past. He seems as if he were someone that was more interested in destroying than being a “serious” neo-Nazi. After all, Ingo Hasselbach had no problem destroying his own past and his “life’s work.”

SKIN GANG

Wings Hauser (1994)

I finally got enough gall to watch a film by gay punk auteur Bruce LaBruce. After all, when I found out the film Skin Gang was about a bunch of queer-bashing Neo-Nazis who brutalize and gang rape a bourgeois race-mixing fag couple, I felt the film may reach a new extreme in total libertinism. Despite all the brutal buggery and explicit sexual deviancy featured in the film, the so called gay community mostly condemned Skin Gang, proving that the deranged ultra-macho masturbatory moving picture had to be doing something right. Showing his blatant abhorrence of political correctness, when questioned about the “Neo-Nazi stuff” featured in the film, LaBruce stated, “I personally think that ninety percent of current gay pornography is sort of fascist anyways.” Skin Gang is certainly the kind of film that Adolf Hitler’s strong arm Ernst Röhm (whose SA “Storm Battalion” militia provided Hitler with crucial protection up until Hitler took power in Germany) would have enjoyed watching whilst drinking a couple of beers with his Gay comrades after a day of beating up Jewish Communists.

Since most so called “progressive” bourgeois liberal and cosmopolitan types seem to think highly of themselves due to being proponents of pacifism, equality, peace, and other fantastically absurd pseudo-virtues, what better wake up call for them than being gang raped by a brigade of Neo-Nazis? After all, their pathetic belief that homosexuals are victims is destroyed as they become the victims of stormtrooping sodomites. When a person realizes that the vast majority of interracial rape victims are white women raped by Negro men, what better poetic justice for the impotent and totally effeminized white liberal male than to be brutally buggered by a battalion of boneheaded bootboys that radiate martial prowess. The skinheads in Skin Gang are a segment of the gay community that gay rights advocates prefer didn’t exist and Bruce LaBruce flaunts these men off in a way that makes the sadomasochistic fascists featured in Kenneth Anger’s Scorpio Rising seem tame by comparison. Of course, Scorpio Rising is more about fetishistic art whereas Skin Gang is essentially hardcore pornographic skinhead-ploitation.

During the beginning of Skin Gang we are introduced to a young skinhead who worships Adolf Hitler’s tome Mein Kampf (My Struggle) with his cock. Bruce LaBruce certainly has a uniquely sadistic scene of humor when he shows this young skinhead engaged in an erotic one-man struggle before unleashing “liquid white power” via his own personal warhead (which resembles a German helmet). This scene starts out quite humorously with the song “They Saved Hitler’s Cock” by the punk band The Angry Samoans being played in the background. I doubt Bruce LaBruce is any type of Nazi purist or sympathizer as a copy of Mein Kampf was surely desecrated by the young skinhead. Although Bruce LaBruce portrays the skinheads in Skin Gang as absurdly idiotic barbarian Hitlerites that literally jack-off to the Nazi gospel, it is obvious that the gay auteur finds this extremely erotic.

One of the major themes (probably the only theme in the entire film) of Skin Gang is the homo-eroticism often inherent in male bonding. Whilst attempting to give his Aryaness a good teutonic pounding, a young skinhead named Reinhold just can't seem to find the same excitement he does when hanging and banging with his fellow bootboys. Due to her blonde beautiful Barbie doll intuition, Reinhold's aggressive lady becomes irritated by his lack of enthusiasm when robotically manhandling her. Reinhold's byrd even yells in his face "don't fall asleep on me" during sex as a nude Negro Mandingo hangs ironically on the wall behind the physically joined but emotionally detached couple. It is not until his racist rudeboy comrades show up that Reinhold seems finally excited. In camaraderie, Reinhold and his buddies immediately start insulting the token female. Enraged by her lack of sexual fulfillment and out of jealousy of his male comrades, Reinhold's girlfriend starts calling the gang of skinheaded goons "closet-cases" and "fags." Of course, Reinhold promptly takes hold of the situation and throws his skinhead bitch (and her worthless belongings) out into the street, surely a hilarious scene showing male physical supremacy at the most fundamental level. Despite being Neo-Nazi skinheads, the only scene that could be interpreted as anti-Semitic is when the Neo-Nazi chick complains, "Who do you think I am, Monica Lewinsky (the most infamous of Jewess whores)," in reference to semen that has landed on her less than lady-like apparel.

Skin Gang may be a work of low-budget fiction but right-wing homo-eroticism is making its way into the mainstream. Artist and writer Jack Donovan (also known as Jack Malebranche), formerly a reverend in The Church of Satan, wrote a controversial work Androphilia, A Manifesto arguing against the effeminacy and feminism as promoted by the gay mainstream. With Androphilia (meaning "a love of men"), Jack Donovan advocates that homosexual males actually act like males (as opposed to sexually introverted "males" with female souls) and hang out with heterosexual males, something that seems to scare effeminate gays and buldyke lesbians. After all, for all the talk of "homophobia" by the gay mainstream, what these people seem to be most afraid of is males with testosterone, no doubt the true "homophobia." Pansy gay males (well, maybe not Bruce LaBruce) feel threatened by masculine gay men as do estrogen-deprived Femi-Nazis. After all, if there is any negative feeling that the typical heterosexual male has for effeminized gay males, it is a feeling of disgust and repulsion. To call this disgust of dainty gays "homophobic" is just another display of stereotypical gay narcissism.

Bruce LaBruce has also shown his disdain for the gay mainstream. In an interview, LaBruce stated, "I've been held back as much by homophobia within gay culture, probably more so than by straights. Certain elements of the gay press and politically correct elements of gay culture have not held me back directly, but they've ignored me or tried to pretend that I don't exist." Surely, Skin Gang features those masculine gay males that Hollywood wants to sanitize and exterminate from existence. After all, for all the talk nowadays about persecution experienced by gays during the Third Reich, Hitler's rise to power could not have happened without his loyal homosexual SA warriors Ernst Röhm and Edmund Heines who put their lives on the line just as ancient gay Greek warriors did before them. Although I found myself forwarding through many "scenes" in Skin Gang (I wish I watched the re-edited softcore Skin Flick edition instead), I found the film to be a provocative and daring assault against political correctness, even if it is hardcore gay porn. It is not often that you see a group of Neo-Nazis raping a Negro and yelling "Let's get primitive, Afro-boy" and "Fuck the Monkey."

KAMIKAZE 89

Wolf Gremm (1982)

Being a lonely, sluggish, and slob-like fellow in an absurd campy leopard-colored detective outfit is probably not the way German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder expected to be last remembered, but such was his fate after overdosing on cocaine shortly after his final screen appearance as the lead protagonist in the softcore dystopian cyberpunk flick Kamikaze 1989 (1982) aka Kamikaze 89 directed by Wolf Gremm (Death or Freedom, Fabian). While many have mixed feelings about Fassbinder's final auteur-piece Querelle (1982) – a renegade cinematic reworking of Jean Genet's 1947 novel of the same name that more than hints at the fact that the ill-fated filmmaker was heading in a completely different direction aesthetically due to the film's elaborate expressionistic sets and international star cast, Kamikaze 89 would prove to be an ostensibly depressing and even embarrassing celluloid affair; both for the fallen star (although the auteur personally enjoyed the experience and performance) and the audience. Based on the 1964 novel Murder on the Thirty-First Floor by Swedish Marxist journalist/crime novelist Per Wahlöö, Kamikaze 89 was a cinematic work where Herr Fassbinder finally got to live out his lifelong dream of being a star hero of the silver screen and not a mere defeated victim like in his own self-directed works Katzelmacher (1969) aka Cock Artist and Fox and His Friends (1975) aka Faustrecht der Freiheit. As Kamikaze 89 co-scriptwriter Robert Katz wrote in his biography on Fassbinder entitled Love Is Colder Than Death (1987), "while Rainer didn't quite direct himself, Gremm rarely restrained him from doing whatever he pleased," which is quite obvious for those that have seen it as the film essentially feels like a high-priced cinematic vehicle for Fassbinder to have fun and forget about the worries of directing serious films. Thus it should be no surprise that Kamikaze 89 is like Welt am Draht (1973) aka World on a Wire for philistines as directed by post-Polyester (1981) John Waters (had he not failed out of film school) on sunny and sardonic cyberpunk steroids. Featuring Fassbinder's ex-boy-toy Günther Kaufmann (Whity, The Third Generation) as his sometimes sidekick and his favorite mature leading lady Brigitte Mira (Ali: Fear Eats the Soul, Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven) in another important role, as well as cameos from his friends Frank Ripploh (director of the 1981 gay cult movie Taxi zum Klo) and Juliane Lorenz (Fassbinder's young film editor who would later become the head of the Fassbinder Foundation) and cinematography done by Xaver Schwarzenberger (Berlin Alexanderplatz, Querelle), Kamikaze 89 is the Fass-bande gone kraut Hollywood.

Kamikaze 89 director Wolf Gremm described his collaboration with the German New Wave Superstar auteur as follows: "When I plan a film, I often think in terms of animal images for the characters. In conceiving Kamikaze 89, I always had Fassbinder in mind as a leopard, but I never told him this. At the first costume fitting I showed him fifteen possible futuristic detective and police costumes of very different styles. It happened like this: He came in. I was smoking a cigar. I offered him a Camel cigarette. He looked over the costumes. I smiled. Then he looked at me and smiled too. He said, "You like this leopard one." And I said, "Don't you?" And he said, "Let me try it on." He looked at himself in the mirror and said, "I love me. Now I'm Lieutenant Jansen." From this point on, we never had to discuss the style of the film." Indeed, the style of Kamikaze 89 is like technocratic mid-camp chic on cyber-crack as a sort of hyper-cynical science fiction flick for those that know, but absolutely loath the genre as a big-budget Teutonic brother to Slava Tsukerman's sci-fi cult classic Liquid Sky (1982). Indeed, if you loved any of the films in The Matrix trilogy and/or any of the aesthetically sterile, sentimentalist sci-fi flicks directed by Steven Spielberg, Kamikaze 89 is most certainly not the film for you. In fact, if you felt like a born-again humanist after watching Planet of the Apes (1968) and/or Soylent Green (1973), you're probably better off watching the latest Roland Emmerich flick than watching Fassbinder fight cyber-crime, even if the German New Wave auteur – with his bloated belly, unkempt beard, and bad acne – did resemble a sci-fi fan-boy during the production of Kamikaze 89.

In the not-so-distant future during the year 1989, the Federal Republic of Germany is an undisputed Utopian dream on earth because, aside from being the wealthiest nation in the world, there is nil unemployment, inflation, nor pollution as "everything is right as rain" in the less than democratic nation. Of course, with the disappearance of harmful drugs and violent crime, Kamikaze 89 features a world without worry, aside from police brutalizing those that dare to drink alcohol, at least until a bomb hoax forces a rather laidback campy cop/dandy detective named Jansen (Rainer Werner Fassbinder) to take a break from his half-ass hobby of living-room tennis. Apparently, set to detonate at the main headquarters of "the Combine" – a passive-aggressive authoritarian company that controls all of television (48 broadcasting channels), news, and paper and electronic media – Jansen and his dopey and less than devoted partner/sidekick MK1 Anton (Günther Kaufmann) are given a mere four days by their commander to uncover who was behind the seemingly nonsensical hoax and in the process, meet a number of dubious queer characters that run the media empire. With an ambiguous reference to 'Krysmopompas' – the underground enemies of the Combine – Jansen and his black Bavarian buddy only have a couple loony leads to go by. When the Human Resources Director (Brigitte Mira) of the Combine building mysteriously falls to her tragicomic death as the supposed first suicide in Germany in over four years, Jansen begins to suspect that there is something more malevolent going on in the socially mundane metropolis, thus sending him on a number of leads and misleads that tangle the plot of Kamikaze 89 up in a maze-like manner that is made all the more muddling by the film's domineering aesthetics and half-serious and oftentimes satirical tone. Early on in the film, the nephew of the man that is the head of the Combine confesses that he sent the bomb threat after being influenced by a Krysmopompas comic (in a manner similar to how present-day media blames movies and comic books for the actions of lone-nut killers), but this confession is ultimately false. After catching his partner-in-crime-stopping MK1 Anton snooping in his desk, as well as an order from his boss telling him not to trust anyone (not even the boss that gave the order), Jansen is sent on a tedious trail that is all the more suspect as he weaves through the wacky wonderworld. Battling tranny-molesters wearing ski-masks and neglecting medical attention criminal suspects (it is not the detective's style to waste time on dead-end leads), half-jaded Jansen is on his way to uncovering the hard truths of an insidious industry-run society of contrived immaculateness, but not without meeting with a blue-eye-busted ex-employee of the Combine named Weiss played by Franco Nero who worked on the mysterious 31st floor (often mentioned throughout the film as an inside joke/source of mystery) of the 30 floor Combine building. Apparently, some egocentric elitists at the Combine were unhappy with their bosses for "murdering" their "minds" while they worked on an artistic project for the "spiritual renewal" of the Aryan nation, thus erupting in anti-Combine comics featuring pornography and Der Stürmer-esque caricatures and eventually violence against the conspiring corporation. In the end, Jansen (or more like Fassbinder) stands all by his lonesome, smirking at the audience as the end credits role; no doubt a frolicsome farewell for the foredoomed filmmaker!

Featuring a technocratic metropolis with a quasi-New Romanticist aesthetic, Kamikaze 89 contains an undeniably visually enthralling world with a now-classic soundtrack by Edgar Froese (Tangerine Dream), so much so that the film is more a colorfully campy cinematic cuisine for the eyes and ears than a thrilling tale of sci-fi bureaucracy gone awry, which is probably the result of director Wolf Gremm's ineptitude at cinematic storytelling, hence why the would-be-auteur, who according to Robert Katz, "held the record for winning more frequently than anyone else the German film critics' Sour Lemon, presented to but never accepted by the director of 'the worst film of the year,'" was artistically excommunicated to the world of television and would never direct a feature-length studio film in Germany ever again. Still, aside from being "a footnote to film history" as described by New York Times star reviewer Vincent Canby, Kamikaze 89 is a somewhat strikingly symbolic work of cinema history that foretells the artistically sterile state of, not only German cinema, but international cinema as a whole after the tragic yet predicable death of Fassbinder and Hollywood's horrendous homogenizing effect on the world. Featuring an soul-deadening futuristic dystopia where 99.3% of households watch a twenty-four hours-a-day reality television game show entitled "the Laughing Contest" – a foul forerunner of brainless and tasteless popular 'reality TV' shows like Fox's American Idol (2002-present) – Kamikaze 89, like any worthwhile science fiction work, does manage to predict the future; a cinematically fatalistic forthcoming that Fassbinder probably would have not fared well in. Interestingly, Günther Kaufmann's quadron son Davy Kaufmann – a rock and soul singer of sorts like his father – would go on to become a star of Germany's "Got Talent" in 2009, thus adding some credibility to the redundant robotic retard realm that is featured in Kamikaze 89. Of course, aside from being plagued with crime, population, pathological pill-popping, adolescent alcoholism, and racial/ethnic chaos, the contemporary world also fails to feature city scenery as aesthetically alluring as those in Kamikaze 89; a virtual science fiction flick for inebriated Werner Schroeter fans.

As for Rainer Werner Fassbinder's thoughts on Kamikaze 89, his biographer Robert Katz wrote that according to director Wolf Gremm and Juliane Lorenz, the German New Cinema auteur, "loved it, especially seeing himself in every scene," so much so that there was talk of two Kamikaze sequels and the Querelle director even, "kept the phony leopard-skin suit and wore it from time to time during the few remaining months of his life." Fassbinder also, "developed a big-brotherly fondness for Wolf, whose easily ignited childlike enthusiasm was sunshine in Rainer's leaden sky," so much so that Kamikaze 89 director was staying at his filmmaker friend's house on the night of June 9–10, 1982; the nighttime hours when German New Cinema's Superstar director inevitably perished from his own excesses. Although Gremm did not earn the much prized Sour Lemon award for Kamikaze 89, he did manage to offer Fassbinder a couple months of irreplaceable joy from his short life of controlled chaos before the filmmaker finally lost his grip over personal pandemonium. A filmic farewell to Fassbinder, Kamikaze 89 is probably only of interest to fans of the filmmaker, but quite remarkably, like most decent films (and I am not saying it is anything resembling a masterpiece, not even a minor one), it manages to get better with subsequent viewings.

HUNTING SCENES FROM BAVARIA
HUNTING SCENES FROM BAVARIA

Wolfgang M. Schwiedrzik (1968)

Like Hollywood with films like In the Heat of the Night (1967) and Deliverance (1972), German cinema of the late-1960s/early-1970s has its fair share of humorously hateful and cinematically libelous anti-redneck lynch mob flicks where rural southern folk persecute outsiders because their little itty bitty hick brains cannot handle being in the presence of weird folk, or at least that is what these films depict. In Germany, these films were described as anti-Heimatfilm/new Heimatfilm and are essentially a hysterical far-left/marxist reaction to the nationalistic Heimatfilm genre that was popular in Germanic countries like Germany, Switzerland and Austria from the late 1940s to the early 1970s and that depicted a sentimental and romantic view of peasant life, thereupon making these films cinematic poison for 'progressive' city folk and xenophiliac leftists. The first hit anti-Heimatfilm was Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdscenen aus Niederbayern directed by Peter Fleischmann (Dorothea's Revenge, Hard to Be a God) in what would be the filmmaker's first feature-length film and adapted from a play written by Martin Sperr, who also plays the leading role in the film. Although chosen as West Germany's official submission to the 42nd Academy Awards for Best Foreign Language Film, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria did not receive a nomination for the award, but managed to earn two Bundesfilmpreise awards in 1969, including Filmband in Gold for Best Actor (Michael Strixner) and Filmband in Silber for Best Feature Film (Peter Fleischmann). Of course, considering it portrays Bavarians as barbarian untermensch bigots of the brazenly boorish and brutal beer-chugging sort, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria was not exactly popular with everyone in Germany, including the locals from the small village of Unholzing in Postau where the work was filmed, who apparently took a militant stance to the fact a leftist pro-fag/anti-redneck movie was being made in their hometown and denigrating the reputation of their tight community. As Fassbinder/German cinema scholar Thomas Elsaesser wrote in his book New German Cinema: A History (1989) regarding Hunting Scenes from Bavaria, "Like Katzelmacher, the film is less the portrait of an individual than the study of a community. It is comparable to a cruel Chabrolian picture of rural France, or to red-neck films about Appalachian hillbillies and Alabama sheriffs, and it recalls William Faulkner at least as much as it recalls Brecht." And, indeed, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria is less a tribute to a victimized hillbilly homo than it is a pseudo-realist agitprop piece and a conspicuously callous and cynical condemnation of rural Southern German folk, who are unwaveringly depicted as nothing short of being Catholic-bred countryside cavemen who have the same hygienic standards and sexual appetites as the farm animals they slaughter. The story of a mild mannered and country-fried cocksucker who returns to the same village where he grew up and inevitably encounters hostile hatred from the people who he has known his entire life after they realize he is more homo than hick, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria lets the viewer know that the National Socialist 'blood and soil' is alive and well in bumfuck Bavaria as it is an innate part of the kraut country character that was there long before an Austrian peasant named Uncle Adolf came to town.

At the beginning of Hunting Scenes from Bavaria, the viewer is treated to a country Catholic church service where violent and bloody religious paintings are featured prominently, thereupon demonstrating the ostensible root for the Bavarian need to go hunting for homos and other unholy beings. After church, gay boy Abram (Martin Sperr) arrives at his hometown village via bus and everyone seems glad to see him except his mother Babara (Else Quecke), who will not even look him in the eye when he lovingly greets her because she seems to know something unsettling that the rest have yet to find out. Abram may be a fairy but he is a handyman of sorts whose repair talents are certainly needed in the town, even if the villagers find him a bit strange and passive. Abram is not the only misfit in town, along with the local whore Hannelore (German New Cinema darling Angela Winkler of The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum and Knife in the Head) who is constantly physically, verbally, and emotionally degraded by men who have no problem screwing her when no one is around. The local retard teenage Ernstl (Johann Lang) is also sometimes attacked, but he does most of the attacking, including pelting lumber at Hannelore and calling her a "whore." The town also has a couple Turkish 'guest workers' who like describing the locals as 'huns' but, aside from being mocked for being Muslims and their lack of Catholic church going, are generally treated with respect and like the villagers and vice versa. Of course, things begin to turn bad one day when a beautiful blonde busybody named Paula (Fassbinder's leading lady Hanna Schygulla in her first feature-length film acting role) tells the villagers that Abram apparently does "dirty things with men." One fine sunny day, Abram's mother tells him, "see that you leave the village. Get lost!," thus essentially disowning her boy in the process, but he respectfully replies, "I have the right to stay. Like you." Clearly offended by the sheer audacity of her sinner sodomite son's remark, Abram's mother hatefully replies, "You have no rights. You don't have rights when you're contrary to nature. I hope they beat you until you leave voluntarily. I hope they chase you out of the village. I wish it. Here in the village it's not like in town where that's modern. I know people are down on you...Just say you're doing it with men. Everyone knows it anyway." Hannelore essentially admits he is gay and proud to his mother, which makes him a marked man in the neighborhood, but that does not stop him as he soon attempts to make moves on teenage town idiot Ernstl while giving him a ride on his motorcycle, which does not go down well with the boy's parents.

Meanwhile, despite not providing any evidence for her claims, village whore Hannelore tells everyone that she is pregnant with Abram's baby, which is rejected by many of the villagers, including a fellow that thoughtfully declares, "I'm not so sure that it's Abram's. First of all she's a whore. And second Abram only does it from behind." Since archaic villages are apparently full of sexually repressed old women who have not had sex in decades and have nothing to do but plot destroying people's lives, Abram's mother's friend declares she is going to take down the town homo herself because, as she states regarding the village's men, "Here they stand around, the men, and none of them does something," so she ultimately decides to take matters in her own hands. According to a feeble old-timer with a horrendous hooknose regarding how the villagers would have dealt with Abram the abberosexual in the past, "We'd have cut off his willy in the old days." Instead, Abram's mother's friend calls the police and manages to convince them to arrest Abram the next day. While Abram attempts to take the first bus out of town, he is a coward and allows a half-retarded redneck named Georg (Michael Strixner) and an elderly woman to pull him away from his one-way ticket to freedom, so he runs away like a little sissy girl. Hannelore follows Abram and when she finally finds him and tells him that he is going to be a father, he mockingly replies, "I have to throw up when I think of it...My child! You're a whore. You do it with anyone. Get lost or I'll beat you up." True to his word, Abram not only physically assaults, but stabs Hannelore to death after she refuses to leave him alone. Naturally, after killing the ostensible mother of his unborn child and said unborn child, Abram hides in the woods and a lynch mob, armed with rifles and Alsatian Wolf Dogs, goes hunting for him and eventually arrests him. In the end, after the death of pregnant whore Hannelore and the arrest of village poof Abram, everything returns to normal in the Bavarian village, including beer-chugging contests and a reelection speech from the village mayor, who simply states, "My election speech is very short....Everyone can drink a free beer on my account." As Hunting Scenes from Bavaria sardonically demonstrates, when it comes down to it, it is not blood, soil, or even fascism that keeps a Bavarian peasant happy, docile, and reasonably harmless, but beer, beer, and more beer.

Almost as simplistically prejudiced and stereotype-driven as the barbaric Bavarian villagers it seeks to condemn and featuring a number of gratuitous scenes of farm animals defecating and fornicating as well as an extended pig-slaughtering scene, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria is essentially a patently pretentious, unintentional Hixploitation flick, thereupon making it ultimately much more entertaining than the typical anti-Heimatfilm, even if for all the wrong reasons. Marginally Herzog-esque/Korine-esque in its radical 'realism' and sporadically Schlingensief-like in its shameless stereotyping of kraut country bumpkins, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria only works today if approached like an absurdist satire work directed by anarcho-mystic Herbert Achternbusch (The Last Hole, Heilt Hitler! aka Heal Hitler!) because if taken seriously, Fleischmann's film seems like far-left intellectual insipidity at its most innately idiotic. Of course, as demonstrated by his subsequent works Dorothea's Revenge (1973) aka Dorotheas Rache and The Hamburg Syndrome (1979) aka Die Hamburger Krankheit—a dystopian sci-fi flick that also incorporates elements of the anti-Heimatfilm—Fleischmann certainly has a sense of humor, even if of the sometimes sickening self-righteous leftist sort. Of course, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria is ultimately a film about so-called “everyday fascism,” depicting the hunting of a horndog homo by villagers as a metaphor for the SS cramming less than inconspicuous cocksuckers in concentration camps during the Second World. Undoubtedly, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria depicts the German peasantry as the ‘roots’ of fascism, which director Fleischmann and playwright Martin Sperr seems to think need to be ripped from the soil of Germany. Sort of the celluloid inverse of Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süss directed by Veit Harlan in its depiction of the German peasantry as opposed to money-changing Hebrews as the social plague of Germany society, Hunting Scenes from Bavaria is arguably the first big cinematic sign of how the Fatherland’s new generation of filmmaker’s had sided with the enemies and the victories of the Second World War and rejected their ancestral heritage, which still lingers on today in films like Michael Haneke’s neo-anti-heimatfilm The White Ribbon (2009). Of course, when it comes to violent and racist tribalistic behavior and crimes, especially of the hateful prejudiced sort, in contemporary Germany, its almost exclusively carried out by non-white (illegal) foreigners, including Turks, Kurds, and Middle Easterners, but no indigenous German filmmaker would ever dare to depict such a politically incorrect reality, lest they ruin their careers.

Woody Allen (1983)

Undoubtedly, even the National Socialists could not have dreamed up a character so hopelessly and negatively stereotypically Jewish as Woody Allen. As a jazz musician, lifelong proponent of psychoanalysis, alleged pedophile, super dork, weakling, and emotional cripple, all while being annoyingly nasally neurotic with a rather repugnant persecution complex, Allen makes the eponymous protagonist of Veit Harlan's Jud Süß (1940) seem like a super cool pimp. In fact, with his second mockumentary (the first mock documentary the director made was the 1969 work Take the Money and Run), Zelig (1983), Allen more or less validated the ostensibly anti-Semitic point made in the Nazi propaganda film The Eternal Jew (1940) aka Der ewige Jude directed by Fritz Hippler that Hebrews have a chameleon-like talent for transforming themselves into whatever people they happen to be living around. Indeed, while The Eternal Jew depicts a stereotypical orthodox Jew morphing into a European simply by changing his clothes and getting a haircut, Zelig (a film with a rather ironic title that means "blessed" or "dear departed soul" in Yiddish) portrays Allen as an American ghetto-bred Jew who can completely physically and psychologically morph into whatever race, class, or creed of people he happens to run into. Of course, whereas Hippler's film portrays Jews as deceptive oriental parasites who pretend to be authentic Aryans so as to deceive and ultimately exploit the native European population, Allen's film depicts the Sellers-esque tendency of the Hebraic protagonist as a "marvelous protective device." Indubitably, one of the most embarrassingly Jewish films ever made, even for a Woody Allen work, Zelig is not just a rather personal work for the auteur, but also an allegory for Jewish assimilation in early 20th century America. Allen's Forrest Gump (1994) avant la lettre, the mockumentary features an aesthetic in the style of black-and-white 1920s film reels and oftentimes includes scenes of the director/writer/star inserted into old stock footage from authentic vintage newsreels. Featuring cameos from real-life Jewish intellectuals like bisexual feminist writer/film critic Susan Sontag, Nobel Prize-winning novelist Saul Bellow, Viennese psychoanalyst Bruno Bettelheim, kosher quasi-commie writer Irving Howe, and various other important individuals playing themselves, as well as stock footage of countless historical figures, including everyone from Joey Goebbels to Pope Pius XI, Zelig is probably the most seamlessly and meticulously assembled (notably, in the time that it took Allen to edit the film in post-production, the director managed to film A Midsummer Night's Sex Comedy (1982) and Broadway Danny Rose (1984)), over-intellectualized, strangely nostalgic, and history-heavy mockumentary ever made. Indeed, Zelig is a playful pomo work where Allen took the opportunity to molest history, as a work where, among other things, the director appears as a stormtrooper who causes a ruckus while Hitler gives a speech at a Nazi rally.

Indeed, more than anything else, Zelig is post-holocaust American Jewish neurosis in celluloid form where a wacky and exceedingly neurotic Judaic with a cipher-like (non)personality tries to fit in and be accepted by pretending to be everyone except himself. If nothing else, the mockumentary is notable for featuring Woody Allen as both a Nazi and a negro, among countless other absurdities that make Zelig arguably the director's most ambitious film to date.

Leonard Zelig (Woody Allen) is a magical chameleon-like Jew who can instantly transform into whoever he wants whenever he wants, as a sort of quasi-supernatural defense mechanism. The first major sighting of Zelig was in 1928 when novelist F. Scott Fitzgerald saw him transform from a right-leaning Boston-bred aristocrat to a poor democratic kitchen worker in the same night. As the lilly-licking Hebraic intellectual/would-be-filmmaker Susan Sontag states of Zelig's legacy, "He was the phenomenon of the 20s. When you think that he was as well-known as Lindbergh...it's really quite astonishing." Commie social critic Irving Howe also chimes in regarding the kosher chameleon's legacy by stating, "His story reflected the nature of our civilization...the character of our times. Yet it was also one man's story...and all the themes of our culture were there—heroism, will, things like that—but when you look back on it, it was very strange." Like most 20th century Jewish figures that Jews and shabbos goys talk about in a puffery-plagued fashion, Zelig was born in a Jewish ghetto and was the son of a Yiddish actor, or as the narrator of the film states: "As a boy, Leonard is frequently bullied by anti-Semites. His parents, who never take his part...and blame him for everything, side with the anti-Semites. They punish him often by locking him in a dark closet. When they are really angry...they get into the closet with him. On his deathbed, Morris Zelig tells his son...that life is a meaningless nightmare of suffering...and the only advice he gives him is to save string." Ultimately, Zelig's father scared his son to be afraid of any and everything, especially other people, so the boy somehow learned how to become a "human chameleon" of sorts who can camouflage himself in his social surroundings, turning himself into a tough Guido gangster, negro jazz musician, potato-famine-obsessed Irishman and countless other things in an almost instantaneous fashion. Naturally, when the media caught wind of Zelig's talent, he became an overnight sensation, though it would come at the price of the hyper neurotic yid's privacy and personality, among other things.

With Zelig's growing popularity in the media, he becomes of interest to a female psychiatrist named Dr. Eudora Fletcher (Mia Farrow), who brings the nihilistically neurotic Hebrew in for testing and learns upon putting him under hypnosis that he has a uniquely unhealthy yearning for receiving approval from people around him, hence his peculiar proclivity towards perfectly mimicking them. As Dr. Fletcher concludes, "Like the lizard that is endowed by nature...with a marvelous protective device...that enables it to change color...and blend in with its immediate surrounding...Zelig, too, protects himself...by becoming whoever he is around.” Of course, Zelig’s transforming power does not trick everyone, as a commie leader complains regarding the truly wandering Jew: “This creature personifies Capitalist man. A creature who takes many forms to achieve ends...the exploitation of the workers by deception.” The communists’ perennial enemies in the Ku Klux Klan also see him as a threat because he is, after all: “a Jew who was able to transform himself...into a negro or Indian” thereupon making him a “triple threat” to the KKK. Of course, as a mensch who transforms himself into other people, Zelig does not really have much of a personality or a personal life, even if his popularity had made him rich, or as the narrator of the film comments regarding the protagonist: “Though the shows and parties...keep Zelig’s sister and her lover rich and amused...Zelig’s own existence is a nonexistence. Devoid of personality, his human qualities long since lost in the shuffle of life...he sits alone, quietly staring into space...a cipher, a nonperson, a performing freak.” Despite being a Jew, Zelig is a hopeless philistine who, upon attempting to develop an authentic personality of his own, discovers that he prefers watching baseball to reading classic books like Moby Dick. When the Hebraic Human Chameleon falls in love with Dr. Fletcher, she becomes convinced that she will never be able to cure Zelig. Meanwhile, Zelig’s half-sister Ruth (Mary Louise Wilson) is killed in a bizarre love triangle gone awry involving a cowardly Spanish bullfighter and the Jewish chameleon disappears from both the United States and the public spotlight as a result of his shock from the tragedy. When Zelig is finally found, he is brought back to Dr. Fletcher, who inevitably falls in love with the little changing man who she later ostensibly ‘cures,’ though he temporarily develops a personality that is violently intolerant of all other people.

Naturally, Zelig and Dr. Fletcher become a celebrity couple and the two get engaged, which is documented by the media, but two weeks before the wedding, a showgirl contacts the media and claims to have married the lapsed chameleon in Baltimore the year before and even had his baby for which he has neglected to pay child support. Of course, countless other women come forward claiming to be Zelig’s wives/baby’s momma, thus ruining the little man’s reputation and romance with Dr. Fletcher. Indeed, ultimately the same news media that built Zelig up also breaks him down (rather ironically, this would also happen to Allen in real-life). In fact, one female Christian leader goes so far as declaring on live television: “Leonard Zelig sets a bad moral influence. America is a moral country. It’s a God-fearing country. We don’t condone scandals—scandals of fraud and polygamy. In keeping with a pure society, I say, lynch the little Heeb.” Plagued by bad press and overwhelming hatred, Zelig becomes ill again, disappears, and ends up in pre-Nazi Germany where he becomes a loyal brownshirt stormtrooper. In a Universal Newspaper newsreel entitled “National Socialists on the Rise,” Zelig is spotted by Dr. Fletcher, so she sails to Berlin, Germany the following week in the hope of rescuing her estranged patient/lover. During a Nazi rally speech where Hitler is about to make a joke about Poland, Zelig, who is standing on the same stage with big H, interrupts the Führer upon seeing Dr. Fletcher. Although the SS plans to catch and torture the human chameleon for his stereotypically rude Jewish behavior, Zelig mimics Fletcher's flying talents in his final performance as a human chameleon and escapes back to the United States where the two are both declared national heroes. Naturally, in the end, Zelig and Dr. Fletcher get married. In the last scene of the film, the narrator remarks regarding Zelig's marriage: "In the end, it was, after all, not the approbation of many...but the love of one woman that changed his life." Of course, little did the narrator realize that Mia Farrow would spill the beans less than a decade after the release of Zelig regarding the fact that her then-lover had begun a rather dubious affair with her adopted daughter Soon-Yi, thereupon ruining the director's reputation permanently. Indeed, no one changed Allen's life more than the ethno-masochistic wench known as Mia Farrow, thus making Zelig seem strangely prophetic in retrospect.

In his 1983 review of Zelig, star New York Times film critic Vincent Canby wrote regarding Allen's film: "Though it runs a mere but delicious 84 minutes, 'Zelig,' his new, remarkably self-assured comedy, is to his career what the 15 1/2-hour 'Berlin Alexanderplatz' is to Rainer Werner Fassbinder's and the three-hour-plus 'Fanny and Alexander' is to Ingmar Bergman's. This incongruity in running time may be a law of nature. Woody Allen is much shorter than Mr. Bergman and never has he tipped the scales to equal the heft Mr. Fassbinder was carrying around in the years before his death." While Zelig may be one of Allen's most inventive, ambitious, and accomplished films, it is certainly not his best and surely not a work that deserves to be mentioned in the same sentence with unrivaled epic arthouse masterworks like Fassbinder's Berlin Alexanderplatz and Bergman's Fanny and Alexander. Indeed, aesthetically speaking, Zelig is a one-note-wonder that is not much more than an intellectual novelty filled with famous Jewish intellectual figures and, had the work been any longer than its 79-minute running time, it would be nothing short of intolerable, as the novelty gets old quick. Still, I must give credit to Allen for including a fake interview with the infamous SS-Obergruppenführer Oswald Pohl, who is treated just like one of the Jewish intellectuals that is interviewed and could not have been interviewed in real-life as he had been executed via hanging in 1951 for his involvement in running concentration camps. Undoubtedly, Allen's inclusion of Pohl in the film is one of his sickest jokes yet, so I must give him credit for that, especially considering the director is a persecution-complex-ridden man who seems to believe that everyone is a closet anti-Semite. Of course, one of the more comical and ironic aspects of Zelig, especially on retrospect, is that, while the eponymous protagonist is portrayed as an involuntary sex fiend who impregnated countless women while in his "human chameleon" state, the real Woody Allen has proven to be quite infertile and about as sexually virile as his weak and frail body indicates, as demonstrated by the fact that he probably has no real biological children of his own (it has been recently revealed that the director's sole supposed biological son, Ronan Farrow, is probably really the progeny of Frank Sinatra). Indeed, undoubtedly Allen's real-life story certainly pales in comparison to the fictional fantasy story he contrived for Zelig. With that being said, I think it is time that some iconoclastic video artist should come along and direct a pseudo-sequel to Zelig, albeit in documentary and opposed mockumentary form, where Allen's real legacy is assessed. Needless to say, such a film would hardly be a quirky comedy.

FRONTIÈRE

Xavier Gens (2007)

This is among one of the newer breeds of the French extreme new-wave horror movement. This along with Inside and Haute Tension are well on their way to being the classics that define a genre. This film-festival charmer has been bringing about quite some hype as to how brutal it was. I generally feel sorry to say that it definitely does not live up to the expectations of intensity that were paved for this film. This film is another film idea wrapped up in Nazi sensationalism. Frontière(s) plays out like Calvaire and Texas Chainsaw Massacre meets Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will. The fact that they used Nazis in the film as the antagonist is a weak move for director Xavier Gens. I wish directors would incorporate new tactics in deriving fear out of people rather than getting chased by a big French butcher who claims to be a Nazi who prays to a rumpled copy of Mein Kampf. Not so much that they are just Nazis but that they are given the title of cannibalistic Nazis. I'm surprised that Jack Bliesener doesn't reprise his role from Hard Rock Zombies as Hitler. That might make the situation more believable and enjoyable. If it wasn't for a couple of conveniently short scenes and lines, you wouldn't even know they were Nazis. One of the young thugs notices a portrait of Hitler in the cabin and another meets the "Fuhrer" figure of the household. One humorous scene does involve a Muslim not eating the fried "pork" that they serve at dinner. When he declines due to his religion, the big guy asks feverishly "Are you Jewish!?" I would have liked to see where that would have went. On to the topic of how brutal it is, I wouldn't say it was as shocking as Inside or as creepy and sinister as Calvaire, but it is still a damn enjoyable film. Like most of the French horror before it, this film takes on a feminist outlook, portraying this lush and beaten heroine as a goddess and all the male cast like garbage. Is the newest craze to shave a woman's head and have her run around screaming? Suffice to say, Sigourney Weaver was the only one who could pull it off. The film's plot involves a very similar French feel to it, almost like Sheitan. Like Sheitan, it involves a group of young punks going to a remote country area to have sex and do drugs. The overview of the plots fit like a stencil. This film doesn't have the excellent performance that Vincent Cassel brandished for the film and only adds some less-than-memorable roles. In the direct synopsis, this film claims to have to do with a political election and right-wing liberals, but this is only explained in an archived riot footage that they call a "montage." This move to try and position intelligence upon it will only get it slandered. This film was actually rated NC-17. I cannot understand this seeing as how intense and provocatively violent Inside was. Frontière(s) is not something we haven't seen before. If you go into it expecting the brutality and hype that everyone has been assaulted with, there is no doubt that you will be disappointed. While not being perfect and relying on its own form of propaganda to try and make us hate

FRONTIÈRE

Nazis once more, Frontière(s) is a damn fine thriller and you will enjoy every blood-soaked minute of it. That is, unless you expect something intelligent.

ASSAULT! JACK THE RIPPER

Yasuharu Hasebe (1976)

Successfully blending "ero"-level violence with sexual encroachment alongside the vast fetishistic kingdom as geographically marked by these pioneers of the Roman-porn industry, Yasuharu Hasebe returns from directing the film that marked a trend, Rape!. Hasebe perhaps never thought about the impact or the posterity that would be affected by his works back in the late 70s, the same instance goes for me as I never would have assumed I would have found such a liberating niche of films that encompass many ideas that vaunt about my mind on a day to day basis. Hasebe could be called the visual Georges Bataille of our time bringing to light an often invisible connection between sex, lust, and death. To better suit death as a broad spectrum, murder. Death is an essence that is everywhere; it can appear at any give place or time. We were all created to die, not to live, so why not stalk for personal satisfaction? Hasebe brings these temporal theories to mind with another of his infamous and stunning works of art. Assault! Jack the Ripper opens inside of a ~~restaurant~~ bakery(?) where, unbeknown to me at the time, is where our two future sadists would meet and become spiritually guided to their deprived enlightenment. Our lead actress is a pugnacious creature who is gifted with an incredibly motivating body but is cursed with a particularly obese face which gives more to her repugnant attitude and appetite. After purposely spilling coffee on a customer's lap after a failed pass, she goes in the kitchen and observes a (what must be mousy) employee work extensively on a cake, prepping it for what appears to be a wedding ceremony. The attention whore breaks silence with eye contact and presumes to drive the blade through his cake, severing the top and sparking the romantic destiny that progresses dangerously in the blink of an eye. At closing time, the evil little afro-troll begs the man for a lift home and harps him until he does. Along the way, they manage to pick up a female prototype of the hitchhiker from The Texas Chainsaw Massacre who rubs cake all over her underdeveloped breasts and slices her wrist open. Trying to flee from the society-inflicted broad, they accidentally kill her and discover an insatiable appetite for fucking hidden just under the cloak of silent sleep. From this point on, Assault! becomes a dearly departed exercise in psychopathic erotica. Exploring the sexual stimuli featured at the chronological beginning of Tetsuo: The Iron Man, Assault! takes no shortcuts to quenching this man's lust for sex & death. Soon he begins killing for an ulterior motive - hatred for women. After dealing with tubby yelling at him all day and dealing with her sexual needs, it seems he has discovered a new reason to kill; not to fuck but to purge - any and all women. His "cake blade" becomes a phallic extension of which he jams into his victims vaginae and becomes bewildered by this act of carnal retribution on his part. The best films to me are ones that can accept realities and while being fiction, stomping towards these taboos unwavering and that is exactly what Hasebe does. The soundtrack even boasts excellence as we are delightfully treated to a somber Oriental jazz funk that cloyingly humanizes his actions and escape. Should such a man exist with no consequential worries? Probably not but there really isn't a damn thing we can do about it. These evil, awful things happen in the world on a second basis and all we can really do is pray that our loved ones are not affected by the wrath's of the few. Nearing the end of Assault!, something occurred to me. Not only is Hasebe's Assault! Jack the Ripper a transgressive film in which intimacy is unrivaled in death akin to Georges Bataille's Story of the Eye, but the lead killer's skill transcends bloodshed into something . . . unnameable. In one particular home invasion scene, he makes neat and passion-blazed slices in her pretty abdomen as she struggles and spins against the outside window. Blood trails fleeing from her silk skin, tracing images on the glass panes - Hasebe has turned death into art! Where the killer was once satisfying his hatred for women, now he is applying lacerations to their canvases in what can only be considered fluid performance art. Happiness can he found in even the darkest of places. Hasebe has created yet another excellent film concerning rape with no third party intrusion. Rather than a cops-and-robbers story of a man on the run, this film is strictly interpersonal for its characters and this is such a glorious piece of sleaze you can't help but to cry.

RAPE! 13TH HOUR

Yasuharu Hasebe (1977)

The quest for manhood is led by many treacherous paths of righteousness. Each territory you cross into leads into a chain of cause and effect. There will be consequences for each and the one that Ishiyama chose is to become a serial rapists' apprentice in order to live the life of sex and riches. But the real problem here is getting Ishiyama to climax. The lil' bugger just doesn't have it in him and in this, he soon finds solace in the idea of rape. Rape's everywhere; it's in the newspapers, television, literature, and a frequent topic in film (See also; Any Yasuharu Hasebe film). Described is the first 10 minutes of Rape! 13th Hour and let me tell you; the odyssey that Crimson leads the emasculated cohort through is a dizzying journey through sleazy nihilism and avid selflessness. Dispersed through the film are beautiful poetic visual metaphors that can be a doozy to catch on to. Crimson's epithet is derived from his bright red jacket and his crimson rose tattoo on his forearm. In moments of sexual assault, Crimson's tattoo begins to slowly fill with red ink until his "flower blossoms." As indicated by these little gems, Rape! 13th Hour is no amateur film and a prime highlight in the idea of creating a stellar script around many sexual taboos. In the current high peak of Asian film reception, Miike's Visitor Q is hailed as an absolute masterpiece of taboo film making but the real champions (or underdogs) are trapped behind closed circuits with no release pending and the only really light these films will see is in the hopes of Mondo Macabro, Pink Eiga, or exhaustive searching online. Rape is a topic often visited by Nikkatsu films and ero-gro for that matter. Any Japanese pinku film mostly lingers around the concept of forced sexual relations and with good reason too. As much as you or any might deny it, there's definitely something unbelievably attractive about the domineering over a female. The beginning of the act (cemented by cinema) is a bit of flirtation with the idea - the fear, the struggle. It makes for beautiful film footage, given the right director. The only flaw with rape in film is that in most cases, it's made into something comical and not given life to the "terrible" act in which case, would make the act beautiful worthy of revelations of one's own sexuality. Hot on the tail of Crimson is a gang of homosexual thugs led by an ant king. After witnessing Crimson rape someone, he's decided to make a proposition one could easily turn down; fuck the gay leader or get turned into the police. To make matters worse, the trio is compromised by two larger fellows. Poor Ishiyama got himself in the middle of something spectacularly horrible. As Crimson struts down the street, eyes hidden by Lennon glasses and hands in jacket pockets; his countenance is especially intimidating. Maybe this is what fuels Ishiyama's competitive virility match with Crimson and thus leads us the the shocking climax that rivals A Clockwork Orange on a scale of sexual encounters under a storm of sifting feathers. Just a minute before, he pins a woman that Crimson had claimed to a mirror, with a strung out and patiently executed thrust, the mirror cracks behind him. This sets the mood for a mirror shot of them making unconditional love in time for the credits to roll. Blazingly brilliant in style and only inhibited by the era from which it was produced, Rape! 13th Hour is scarcely matched. There's no reason why anyone should be displeased with this 1977 Nikkatsu film. The title tells you the subject matter rather prematurely. You're but a fool if you walk into an experience such as Rape! 13th Hour and expect morals and tolerance for there is none. Gay-bashing aside, Rape! 13th Hour is a film with both violent and conscientious tendencies that rises to unnatural levels of both storytelling and sexual titillation. Abuse of women can be a structured act and Hasebe proves so with yet another film pertaining to the code of conduct displayed by serial rapists. With hints of My Own Private Idaho, A Clockwork Orange, and Straw Dogs, this film has every bit of sexual class and explosive depravity that you'd come to expect with the title boasting "rape" followed by an exclamation mark, as to say "Buy this! Rape turns you on!" - which it more than likely does.

RAPE! 13TH HOUR

OSOU!

Yasuharu Hasebe (1978)

Yasuharu Hasebe is an "unsung hero" of the pinku eiga genre. With films like Rape! 13th Hour, Assault! Jack the Ripper, or the unpretentiously titled Rape!, Hasebe has carved a niche in which to rest surrounded by the most subversive sleaze to be found, all his own creation. Though not sleaze in the general sense of the term, most of Hasebe's films juggle what which most people refer to as "misogynistic" tendencies Osou!, for example, is the tale of Kumiko, a police-woman who is brutally raped by a strange attacker after an automobile collision. Not stopping with one count of sexual assault, the stranger returns time and time again to penetrate her at her most vulnerable moments, eventually reaching the point in which she wholeheartedly looks forward to their next rendezvous. It's not about the how, it's about the why. Osou! takes a woman and places her in such a situation. Libidinous to a fault, her own desires mesh with the savagery exhibited by her non-consensual lover producing a whole new woman. Ideally, you'd imagine that with the right treatment, a woman could adapt to a similar sexual situation, if not for consent than surely for instinct. Kumiko pines for violation by Osou!'s halfway mark. She is mesmerized by force and blunt seduction, which is not an uncommon fantasy for most women. It starts off simple with compliance towards biting, minor rough play, and the ever-effective hands-around-throat. Once the seed of obscure practice blossoms, a warmer reception may be held towards more extreme activities. This isn't misogyny in the slightest, it's evolution.

Before the audacious assault of a policewoman in a police station, Hasebe makes sure to pamper his actress with backdrops of thick concrete jungles for her to explore and enough motive to warrant the aggravated attacks committed against her. In a word, Kumiko is kind of a bitch. Had you ever had a run in with a police officer, I'm sure you've whined and complained about the balance of fair and unfair. Perhaps you were traveling 50 mph in a 40 mph zone - Mr. Important has got an important date to keep. Kumiko flips through her previous tickets to interrogate possible suspects and on her quest, apologizes to many people she may have wronged or been unfair to. A parking ticket certainly isn't grounds for bodily repossession, correct? For Hasebe, uniform is key to the eroticism within Osou!. Most males, hell, women too for that matter, admit to being aroused by uniform and costume in the bedroom. For this reason alone, Osou! inhabits the very core of eroticism in rape and not some far off filmic plane of exploitative trash and senseless buggery. The rapist assuredly is committing an illegal and unanimously frowned upon act but Kumiko takes it without principle, without morality. She sheds away the layers of incorrectness to find the heart of the act; pleasure. One might spite my words and cry offense to them but I'll have you know my words are no more offensive than the film they are in response to.

Sex follows Kumiko everywhere. Osou! is essentially an odyssey of sexual appetite. You'd swear angelic Kumiko hadn't an idea of the act with her tight and proper appearance. Once she is raped though, things swiftly change. Confronting possible suspects, she is seated inside of a car, conversing with a man she had ticketed previously as he has sex in close proximity. Following this incident, Kumiko decides to spend the night at her sister's house but is awoken by her sister's husband, as he ravages her body with his tongue. Aghast, the sister thrusts Kumiko out onto the streets with tears brimming in her eyes. This is a documentation of a woman uncovering the beastly side of Japan, no, men, as she is manhandled at every turn and thrown into dizzying sexuality. Definitely a strong film of Hasebe's, Osou! manages to help us discover what it means to hold onto that which fractures us. Once Kumiko begins masturbating, she comes to terms with her impure bits & bliss. Aiding the frenzied attacks is an array of strongly composed classical pieces that flutter closely over the head of the mysterious black-gloved rapist. One would expect to be averse to the rape, as it is an act of territorial noncompliance. However, Kumiko has the self-defense skills of a muzzled orangutan which leaves sympathy nowhere to be found. That's not to pull a card of natural selection, simply, it's too damn silly, her falling into the traps of a secret admirer almost repetitiously. Yasuharu Hasebe reigns king over this land of forced sexual encounters and there seems to be hardly anyone who can hold a torch to his objectifying of women. Osou! is a classic of his standard.

BLIND BEAST

Yasuzō Masumura (1969)

The world of touch... The world of insects... The lower orders such as the jellyfish... Those who venture to the edge of such worlds can expect only a dark, dank death to envelope them. A blind man who scorns the thought of sight. He alone relishes the art of feeling. After discovering the statue of a model, he becomes obsessed with finding her, at all costs. When she is captured and taken into his studio, they both become a victim of each other's desires. The mere concept of Blind Beast is something so beautiful, and so forbidden. The subject matter at hand is what we know as Stockholm Syndrome. Blind Beast features some of the most stunning set design I have ever seen. Michio's art studio features dynamic shading, bizarre sexual pieces which only the Marquis De Sade could fully appreciate, and perfectly resonates his own dire madness. Blind Beast is what you'd call a minimalist film; a film that shines in its own presence. For working on mainly one set, it constantly gives you more things to survey with the very same sight that Michio is without. Much of the emotion derives from the claustrophobia, the amazing acting, and the creepy score which is almost comparable to the haunting soundtrack to Nekromantik. Film makers should take cues from Hermann Kopp. He seems to be the definitive musical genius. Who knew that chamber music could make a film horrifying? The simple fight of Aki being kidnapped turns from a horrified state of seeming soulless, then turns into a dazzling display of psycho sexual torture. Together, these two destined lovers create a dizzying art piece, which rivals anything a Frenchman ever made. Attention to detail is Yasuzo Masumura's middle name. Every piece of this intricate puzzle fits out, leaving no questions but the most stern sickness. This film has a strict meaning of love behind lust. While many denounce such absurd perversions, Blind Beast cements the fact that such a thing does exist. Nothing is more beautiful than contact. Blind Beast proves this. Just to bring up a point Michio made, If seeing visual pieces can be considered art, and smelling exquisite scents can be deemed art, then why not contact?

EYE IN THE SKY
EYE IN THE SKY

Yau Nai-hoi (2007)

Surveillance is a controvertible issue in todays society. Recently given a high profile makeover by films like The Dark Knight, Christopher Nolan explains in a key scene his extreme distaste for surveillance. Born in London, Nolan must feel that his privacy is being invaded. If there were cameras on every street corner here, I'd feel pretty pissed off as well. His aggressive resistance of a constantly watched area is exactly the same thoughts provoked in Hong Kong's Eye in the Sky. Eye in the Sky, or Surveillance, is directed by a Johnnie To protégé Nai-Hoi Yau. In a bizarre reverse collaboration, Eye in the Sky proves to be a solid debut directorial effort but lacks much substance; enough to call itself a "true" thriller. The by-product is watchable, enjoyable, and quite suspenseful and taut. Simon Yam, the character-driven star of Dragon Dynasty's own Killzone, performs as the lead character actor of our story in Eye in the Sky, code named Dog Head. Hiding behind a grizzled face and glasses, Yam is almost unrecognizable. A special police division exists. One so secret that the only citizens informed are the ones involved with the project. The group is called SU; short for Surveillance Unit, if you haven't guessed. A young woman was recently accepted into the group. The group utilizes cameras set up all over China so that these may aid the professional "actors" that are scattered around hot spots. For instance, if a pedophile was wandering around San Diego, a team of people would go undercover as a population in order to follow the culprit to their location. With the taste of pursuing and the stage acting, this apparatus of the film provides us the age old question of "What if?" For dizzying chase sequences lavishly placed in a fine sequential order, Eye in the Sky is your bidding. Eye in the Sky has that healthy share of violence that you need, but not too much. At least compared to Dog Bite Dog, which featured some rather brutal shots of action. Eye in the Sky is a fitting film for someone who appreciates Eastern action. Swearing accommodation and light-hearted moments as well, there is something for everyone to like. Just pretend this film is a rough draft of a brilliant idea, then the cynicism won't come out as much.

DEFAMATION

Yoav Shamir* (2009)

With the recent media outcry against Charlie Sheen (who recently revealed that he is Jewish) for supposedly making antisemitic remarks, it seemed like the perfect timing when I received a copy (courtesy of First Run Features) of the 2009 documentary Defamation in the mail. Defamation has deservedly won Best Documentary Feature Film at the 2009 Asian Pacific Screen Awards, on top of receiving wide praise from critics around the world. Of course, the Anti-Defamation League - the organization that is the central subject of the documentary - has condemned the documentary because they believe it "belittles the issue (of antisemitism)....and cheapens the Holocaust." After watching Defamation, it will be apparent to the viewer that by utilizing the historical suffering of Jews as a weapon to stifle any legitimate criticism against Israeli atrocities committed against Palestinians, as well as the stranglehold AIPAC (American Israel Public Affairs Committee) lobby has over American foreign policy, it is in fact the ADL that compromises serious claims of antisemitism. During the beginning of Defamation, director Yoav Shamir admits that despite hearing about antisemitism and Nazis for what seemed to be everyday during his entire life as an Israeli, he has never personally experienced antisemitism. At the start of Defamation, Shamir states that his objective with documentary is to find out whether or not certain Jewish organizations (most specifically the ADL) are misusing the charge of antisemitism as a way to discredit all criticism of Israel and to see if there is any legitimacy to the claim that Jews are too preoccupied with the past (fixating on the Holocaust and historical antisemitism in general). As you learn early on in Defamation, it does not take Yoav Shamir long to discover the "defaming" answers to his borderline "blasphemous" inquirers.

Not too far into Defamation, Yoav Shamir interviews his 90+ year old grandmother regarding her thoughts on antisemitism and Judaism in general. Holding nothing back, grandma Shamir matter-of-factly states "Jews love money. Jews are crooks." Shamir's eccentric grandmother then goes on to discuss how she became an early Zionist (and eventually an Israeli) due the fact that her family felt Jewish nationalism was the only safe option for the Jews. The father of modern political Zionism, Theodore Herzl, an atheist that dressed like a cosmopolitan dandy, was originally a German nationalist (during his early adulthood he was a member of the German Burschenschaft—a nationalist fraternity that various Nazi leaders were also members of) who advocated the total assimilation (what some Jews have modernly described as the "silent Holocaust") of European Jewry. After following the infamous Dreyfus affair, on top of hearing negative remarks about the racial character of Jews from people like German philosopher Eugen Dühring (the first person to criticize Jews from a racialist perspective), Herzl came to the conclusion that Jews were a different race from Germans, and decided to utilize the German nationalist ideals he previously subscribed to in his codification of modern political Zionism; an idea that sought to give heroism and honor to the Jews in the spirit of King David's biblical Israel. Showing her true commitment to Herzl's original ideas, Grandma Shamir criticizes those Jews that live abroad. Grandma Shamir unapologetically remarks that Jews who reside outside of Israel are criminals who take advantage of their host nations by the way of the money business (usury, interest, selling liquor, etc.). According to Grandma Shamir, the prospect of having to actually work in Israel scares most Jews away. Out of all the staunch self-proclaimed Zionists featured in Defamation; Grandma Shamir seems to be the only one who has strictly adhered to Theodore's Herzl's original ideal.

After paying a visit to Shamir's bitter yet sweet Grandmother, Yoav Shamir travels abroad to meet ADL director Abraham Foxman at the group's main NYC headquarters. According to the ADL, around 1,500 cases of antisemitism against Jews are documented every year. Upon questioning the bigwigs of the ADL, Shamir soon realizes that most documented cases of antisemitism are dubious at best. According to the ADL, whenever a work place denies a Jewish person a day-off from work on a Hebrew holiday, it is indubitably an act of antisemitism. I am sure most America people will agree that virtually all employers demand their employees to work on certain holidays. After questioning various individuals at the ADL, Shamir does not find one case that involves a serious form (like rape, murder, beatings, victim of a suicide bomber, etc.) of antisemitism. Throughout Defamation, Shamir shows clips of a trip he took with a group of Israeli high school students to Poland. Shortly after arriving at Poland, the Israeli teens almost immediately begin to hallucinate imagery antisemitic attacks in various absurd and downright nonsensical forms. After talking to three old Polish men, two Israeli girls completely imagine that the elderly men have mocked Israel and called them "monkeys/donkeys." An Israeli boy makes the claim that Polish soldiers "move like Nazis" and have angry faces similar to the kind of genocidal SS soldiers you would find in a Steven Spielberg film. During his trip with the Israeli teens, Shamir makes it glaringly clear that the fear mongering tactics of groups like the ADL have completely distorted the worldviews of these impressionable Israeli adolescents to such a degree that like Pavlov's dogs, they have involuntary negative reflex responses to any person or place that is not 100% Kosher.

Defamation also features a variety of "academic antisemites." Two highly reputable college professors - John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt - received a public condemnation from the ADL for their co-authored book The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy, a New York Times Best Seller that reveals the crucial influence AIPAC has over American foreign policy. Even more absurd is the case of Norman Finkelstein, the son of two Jewish Holocaust survivors, who lost his job (after being denied tenure through the powerful influence of intellectual rival Alan Dershowitz) as a professor at DePaul University, after writing the book Beyond Chutzpah; a work that counters Alan Dershowitz's claim that the Israeli's have an excellent human rights record. In 2008, after arriving at Ben Gurion International airport in Te Aviv, Israel, Finkelstein was arrested (and detained for 24 hours) and eventually shipped back to Amsterdam (his point of origin). Norman Finkelstein had been banned from Israel for 10 years for visiting Lebanese families during the 2006 Lebanon War. After being attacked by two of the biggest names in American Zionism - Alan Dershowitz and Abraham Foxman - Finkelstein is undoubtedly now hated by the Jewish diaspora in a manner comparable to that of Dutch Jewish philosopher Baruch Spinoza (who was kicked out of Judaism). In Defamation, Abe Foxman describes Jewish critics (referring to Finkelstein) of Israel as "insecure Jews." Of course, Foxman's derogatory statement against Jewish critics of Israel seem like a blatant projection on his part when you consider what religious Orthodox Jews have to say about the ADL's interpretation of "antisemitism." Throughout Defamation, a number of religious Orthodox Jews remark that the ADL is a money making scam that is perpetuated by nonreligious/mostly atheistic Jews. To add credence to the remarks of the Orthodox Jews, members of the ADL openly admit in Defamation that they get their greatest sense of Jewish identity, not by studying the Judaic texts of the Torah of the Talmud, but from remembering the Holocaust and historical antisemitism.

Abe Foxman

At the very least, Defamation is an honest documentary that respectfully analyzes the most critical issues regarding post-World War II Jewry. After finishing the documentary, I remembered an interesting passage that I read in the novel My First Two Thousand Years, written by German-American propagandist George Sylvester Viereck and Jewish novelist Paul Eldridge. In the book, a character remarks that it is strange how the Jews always seem kill their messianic geniuses (referencing Jesus Christ and Spinoza). I see Norman Finkelstein as a heroic voice of reason who has been metaphorically crucified by his own people. Abe Foxman of the ADL claims to be protecting World Jewry from acts of antisemitism, yet he fuels the flames of gentile resentment against world Jewry. The way the ADL cries wolf about antisemitism only weakens support for Jewry if a real attack of antisemitism were to occur. On a lighter note, I like how Abe Foxman remarks (regarding Yoav Shamir) "He's not gonna hurt us" upon making his initial appearance in Defamation. After a person watches the documentary, it is highly doubtful that they would see the ADL in a noble "hate battling" light. Norman Finkelstein claims that groups like the ADL are full of pathological narcissism, referencing the indisputable fact that Jews are the richest and most successful ethnic group in the United States. Yoav Shamir remarks at the conclusion of Defamation that Jews should look towards the future and refrain from obsessing over antisemitism of the past. After all, if Jews are as successful as Norman Finkelstein claims, they might as well enjoy it. For my information on Defamation, visit First Run Features.

DEFAMATION

WILLIAM S. BURROUGHS: A MAN WITHIN

Yony Leyser^{o*} (2010)

Out of all the Beat Generation writers, William S. Burroughs is the only one that has left a serious lasting impression on me. W.S. Burroughs, being Harvard-educated and a little older than his fellow writers, also acted as the unofficial teacher of the Beats. Heavily inspired by the pessimistic historical theories of German philosopher Oswald Spengler, Burroughs saw Western civilization as being in the final cycle of its existence. In Spengler's essays Pessimism?, the warrior philosopher displayed annoyance in the fact that people would use his apocalyptic philosophies as an excuse to accept cultural defeat and inaction. The Beat Generation writers (especially Burroughs and Jack Kerouac) saw Spengler's prophecy as an opportunity to find unique contemporary minds that expressed the end-cycle feeling of Western Civilization. For a man that saw dying in battle during war as the height of nobility, Spengler would have undoubtedly been disgusted with the active hedonism and nihilism that the Beats fully advocated and shamelessly practiced. I do not think it is even the slightest stretch when I say that the Beats created a virtual religion that reflected the complete and utter degeneration of the Occidental world. In the 2010 documentary William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, novice director Yony Leyser rapturously documented the unquestionable influence junky High Priest W.S. Burroughs has had on the Western world for over half a century. I see it as no big surprise that while Oswald Spengler has been virtually forgotten in the intellectual world; William S. Burroughs has become almost a household name.

Not only is William S. Burroughs' extensive writing career a perfect example of cultural decay in the Occident; his destructive personal life as a rootless wanderer certainly is as well. Burroughs was from a somewhat wealthy background, due to his great Grandfather William Seward Burroughs I inventing the adding machine and founding the Burroughs corporation. Despite being born with "a silver spoon in his mouth," Burroughs took an entirely different route than what was expected of someone from his background. Showing a relentless disdain for bourgeois mores and "proper" conventions, W.S. Burroughs became a full-fledged libertine during his early adulthood, fully embracing homosexuality and a lifelong heroin addiction. Revolutionary psychoanalyst C.G. Jung once theorized that the growth of homosexuality in the modern Western world was nature's way of weeding out those genetic lines that were no longer fit to reproduce healthy stock. As discussed in William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, Burroughs was most likely molested in his childhood by the boyfriend of a maid that worked for his family. Regardless of the true driving force behind Burroughs' sexual vice; the Beat writer certainly embodied a lifestyle and literary career that even Oswald Spengler would have not foreseen as becoming culturally popularized in the future. In the documentary William S. Burroughs:

WILLIAM S. BURROUGHS: A MAN WITHIN

A Man Within, various important modern day artists speak very respectfully of Burroughs; giving him credit where credit is due, as being the man that opened Pandora's box and unleashing a word virus that will never be "cured."

Despite his commitment to male buggery, William S. Burroughs was married (as a common law wife) to fellow drug addict Joan Vollmer. Burroughs displayed his occasional interest in the meat curtain by having a child, William S. Burroughs Jr., with the wife that mostly disinterested him. Reading Oswald Spengler's theories must have put a curse on W.S. Burroughs, as his own family disintegrated before his very eyes. Whilst living in exile (to escape detention from a Louisiana state prison) in Mexico city, William S. Burroughs accidentally shot and killed his wife during a drunken game of "William Tell." In William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, this tragic yet senseless tale is hilariously commented on by the Baltimorean "Pope of Trash" John Waters. Canadian auteur David Cronenberg, who is also featured in the documentary, would portray this accidental act of wife killing in his adaptation of Burroughs' Naked Lunch, a film that combines biographical details from the writer's life as well excerpts from the book. It is also made patent in William S. Burroughs: A Man Within that Burroughs' writing career is basically the artistic result of killing his wife. William S. Burroughs would later comment on the event that sparked his writing career, "I am forced to the appalling conclusion that I would never have become a writer but for Joan's death, and to a realization of the extent to which this event has motivated and formulated my writing. I live with the constant threat of possession, and a constant need to escape from possession, from control. So the death of Joan brought me in contact with the invader, the Ugly Spirit, and maneuvered me into a life long struggle, in which I have had no choice except to write my way out."

William S. Burroughs' drug of choice may have been shooting heroin, but his son enjoyed the comfort of alcoholic beverages. Also establishing himself as a writer, Bill Jr. spent most of his life in a drunken state, prolonging his alcohol-fueled virtual suicide. After all, who could blame the poor lad, being the son of a junky homosexual that killed the Mother he never knew. The short life of William S. Burroughs Jr. is briefly talked about in William S. Burroughs: A Man Within. Despite having a liver transplant (one of the first ever performed), Billy Boy soon died in a drunken stupor. Before his death, Billy Jr. wrote an article in Esquire magazine condemning his Father for ruining his life and setting him up for failure. Despite his dysfunctional family/friends dying throughout his life, as well as never abstaining from his sexual/drug vices, William S. Burroughs managed to die an elderly, albeit lonely, man. As discussed by Burroughs' friends and former lovers in William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, the writer was especially careful when it came to his own life. Despite killing his wife with one, Burroughs held a lifelong obsession with guns and shooting, always carry a piece, whether it be in bed or whilst picking up a much cherished prescription at a local pharmacy. Burroughs' "shotgun art" is also discussed in the documentary, an abstract "art" that Burroughs has no pretensions about, admitting that creative process merely involves shooting spray paint cans. Despite his unconventional love for tract-lines and assholes, Burroughs also never managed to contract AIDS. During William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, friends of the junky admit that he also made sure to take the first shot of heroin. In the documentary, various friends also admit that Burroughs, like Andy Warhol, had very keen survival skills due to being an open homosexual; during a period when such things were unheard of, let alone "cool," like they are today.

After watching William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, it will be apparent to the viewer that W.S. Burroughs was a true artist and visionary. Yet, to call Burroughs merely an artist would be a disrespectful understatement. As recognized in the documentary by Burroughs' comrades; the man was a religious figure that, for better or worse, completely reinvented Western culture and morality. In fact, Burroughs was a major influence on the occult "organization" Thee Temple ov Psychick Youth (TOPY) and their bible unholy THEE PSYCHICK BIBLE. Aesthetic terrorist Genesis Breyer P-orridge, the warped tranny behind TOPY, gives the most intimate commentary regarding the personal life of William S. Burroughs in the documentary. Proving that "her" sex change is complete, P-orridge speaks of Burroughs like a kind Grandmother. P-orridge mentions that right before Burroughs died, he wrote that the only important thing in this world is love. Of course, William S. Burroughs influenced countless artistic movements, not just wack-job trannys. After all, if William S. Burroughs had not existed, David Cronenberg would have never made films with monstrous body crevices resembling assholes and vaginas. William S. Burroughs: A Man Within also goes into depth about how Burroughs was the perfect antidote for hippies and political correctness, proving that you do not have to be a leftist to be a libertine. Burroughs' influence on punk rock has also never waned, beginning with proto-punks like Iggy Pop and still influencing various anti-social musicians today. Quite fittingly, the score featured in the documentary was created by members of Sonic Youth, real-life friends of Burroughs.

William S. Burroughs: A Man Within is a commendable tribute to the personal and creative life of William S. Burroughs. For a more detailed portrait of Burroughs' life, I recommend the fairly objective biography Literary Outlaw: The Life and Times of William S. Burroughs by Ted Morgan. For what it is, William S. Burroughs: A Man Within is as great as retrospective documentaries get, full of credible artists that were friends of the writer as well as those people closest to him. Burroughs was certainly a "man within," a very distinct and introverted fellow who most likely did not even completely understand himself. After reading most of his novels and essays, it is apparent to me that only a truly original and uncompromising individual could have written such works. As recognized in William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, to truly enjoy Burroughs' work, one must have a distinct sense of humor. I like to think Burroughs had a decadent "Faustian" wit, the kind that is able to laugh knowing that Armageddon is around the corner and a worldwide civil war is imminent. Novels like William S. Burroughs are quite inspiring in these uncertain times.

DOGTOOTH

Yorgos Lanthimos (2009)

Dogtooth is a Greek drama that centers around the confinement of a family, not just the three teenagers but for the mother and father as well. Why such a false habitat has been erected is not questioned nor answered. For these three children, two sisters and a brother, nothing exists other than family, fortitude, and a brooding sexuality jumping between each sibling. To sum up Dogtooth while giving away critical information is cinema blasphemy. But to not discuss the finer points and analyze this confined hell is a worse decision. After all, Dogtooth may be one of the most effective and poignant films of 2009. Opening with a cassette player, several words are announced and defined. Words that you and I know mean specific things, but to these deprived denizens of a sterile resort, a word as renown as "zombie" is dictated to be a small yellow flower. Immediately from the start, Dogtooth hooks you in with such an absurd way-point of life, the definitive dysfunctional family. Going beyond the boundaries of The Truman Show, Dogtooth employs similar principals of a grand reclusion but takes the game to a level of extremity that only Todd Solondz would occupy.

The meticulous details mean the most in Dogtooth. Director Yorgos Lanthimos takes great measures to support and adhere continuity to progression. Then he takes the next critical step by adjusting the formula of isolation, finally contorting it by taking logical events and putting an eerie spin on something as natural as an airplane over passing. They tweak such a common phenomena (to present standards) and make a bumbling race to retrieve the airplane that occasionally "crashes" in the backyard as an award the golden child. From this, similar instances are built around birth, cats, dogs, music, even film. There is no area left unscathed by the directing crew of Dogtooth. This film is, after all, undermining "the dangers of innocence". Thus, the main crack in their routine of absurdity is exploited by a security guard stationed at their father's workplace. Paid for sex and services, Christina is the common whore, one who exploits the eldest daughter's innocence for cunnilingus. Just as a child could sense that certain acts be deemed perverse or unnatural at such a young age, the eldest daughter too could eventually peer behind the veil of such a comically deranged situation. The eventual breakdown of Christina's will leads to the epiphany at the end of Dogtooth. Rather than revelation, the slow mental deterioration is shocking. Through an experience with her brother, the eldest languishes during an anniversary celebration, erupting in the most powerful scene in Dogtooth, save for the given: the ending. If you've seen the film, you know that of which I speak is the traditional Greek dance gone interpretive seizure.

Judging from the uniforms you'd imagine you're witnessing an unauthorized sequel to Haneke's Funny Games. Both films bare a slight resemblance from costume to sadistic trials, although Funny Games actually depicts a game of sorts. Dogtooth is just a cluster of taboos built to be broken. These taboos lead to scenes of graphic sexuality, which may or may not include heavy incest. Not to be a stickler, I admit finding myself increasingly aroused by several visions of Yorgos' put to film. Ambiguity is Dogtooth's strongest suit of all. You'll find yourself scratching your head during the frozen credits and this is after you question the motives of the parents. What could possibly drive the father, the successful man whose home be a haven, a paradise, to shelter and contain his children in such a way? Under these irresponsible conditions shines a light of true intentions, though. Forced to quickly consume two glasses of orange juice, the token son works out regularly and exercises to further his virility and his machismo for Christina's "special" visits. Also up for display is a very critical scene in which the elder daughter manages to secure two VHS films, Rocky and Jaws. The effects of the films on the infantile adult is astounding - her behaviors alter suddenly into violent mimicry and outbursts of anger. It's an important statement towards the effects of violence to the soft-minded but I refuse to martyr film, my biggest influence, as venomous.

As what Shyamalan visually degraded with his film The Village, Dogtooth pulls off to a remarkable degree. Some could argue that Dogtooth is a slow film. It's not a slow film in the slightest, it's steady, not slow. The pacing is concise to the scenarios of the nuclear family being exhibited indulging in debauchery. What Dogtooth does is something so sinister yet so appealing, the human child stripped of society, interaction, and the arts. What you witness is what could be a likely assessment to a post-holocaust situation. Strangely, Dogtooth seems to fit right in as a pseudo-dystopian atmosphere with uninhibited portentous magnetism. Quite simply, no words or comic monologue could substitute the effect that Dogtooth will leave on you. Whether disgust spreads or fetishes you didn't realize you had spring to fruition, the ending is certainly the mark to be left occupying this slice of serious Greek cinema. Dogtooth has been appropriated as a dark comedy. While the context is wholly humorous, you'd be pressed to find yourself laughing at that twisted going-ons. I've never seen a Greek film like this and it might be quite a while before we see another one, so dig in.

MEATBALL MACHINE

Yoshihiro Nishimura (2007)

Meatball Machine is exactly what you would expect from a title like this. It is slimy, has lots of red meat, and pockets of vibrant gore plastered all over it. Director Yudai Yamaguchi is also the noted director of the shit fest Death Trance, which just like Meatball Machine, had an amazing premise but failed to deliver what it promised. You may recognize this name when i mention his upcoming film "The Machine Girl" Another film that promises a lot but knowing this director, it might not be worthy of all this e-buzz. It takes a plot about the loner child who is in "love" with someone he has never met in his life. After his co-workers begin to attack her, he decides to stand up for her. After promptly getting his ass kicked, he retreats to a movie theater to watch a porn film. In his seat, a hermaphrodite begins to hit on him and he leaves. She/He walks outside and promptly kicks his ass too. That is when he finds a metal spider-like thing. From here is where the plot kicks into it's adrenaline fueled gore-spreed. It takes the budding romance story, holds it up, then unleashes a flaming punch in the face; temporarily disabling it. Throughout the story, it declines like a real relationship. At first, you are incredibly heartfelt and care too much but when it gets too repetitive you slowly back away allowing fate to take its course. This part i respected. Even the blood & guts was incredibly abundant. Meatball Machine is the equivalent of a cross-breeding of three specimens; Tetsuo: The Iron Man, American Gladiators, and Dead Alive. Much of the praise should be for the prosthetics. Wires, tubes, alien organisms, and spores decorate the invaded human bodies like moss on a rock. These alien creatures when symbiosed with human flesh look like an extremely disturbing, yet fucked up Power Ranger villain. Taking it's visual and fleshy influences from the likes of The Matrix and Star Trek, we meets several characters who are sympathetic to the cause of the "Necrobourgs" The film rushes through it's runtime and tries to present so much visual flair that in the end just seems like a TV dinner that exploded in the microwave. While this isn't a perfect film, i will admit it is a damn fun time. Meatball Machine is the definitive splatterpunk film of this generation.

TOKYO GORE POLICE
TOKYO GORE POLICE

Yoshihiro Nishimura (2008)

I heard of this film quite some months ago on Twitchfilm. The premise sounded interesting aided only by the blatant tell-all title. Walking into this film, I should have guessed exactly what was in store for me but being a hopeful bastard, I expected more than I bargained for. Tokyo Gore Police is the absurd, reality-smashing film you'd come to expect but the almost-dystopian atmosphere is squandered for insanely over-the-top horseplay with prosthetics. Like Cyborg and many genre films before it, the adaptive environment for metropolitan dynamics are destroyed. The only thing futuristic in this film are the actor's costumes, set pieces, and anything within direct contact. Other than that, prepare to stare at boring buildings and unsettling normalities. Metaphysical horror has been turned absurd and sardonic in light of Japanese films. Meatball Machine and co. have been befouling a genre enforced by flesh-auteurs such as David Cronenberg and Shinya Tsukamoto. What was once lingering on the border of eroticism and grotesque fetishes has been replaced with a new-age organic Voltron experience. A paper-thin revenge plot with the average "How could you?" betrayal plot makes a transparent depth for them film. Films like Black Devil Doll that come out and admit their purpose of relentless nudity and copious amounts of vulgarity are a brave brand of cinema that don't beat around the bush. Much as my writing splurges are aided by coffee and alcohol, Tokyo Gore Police is only propelled by inane proportions of dismemberment's and exaggerative blood flow. Don't believe me? Watch the trailer included on the Tokyo Shock DVD release. You will watch close to 5 minutes of non-stop violence. This in fact is the shortened version of the film, the only thing really worth watching. Body explosions and redefining the term "overkill" is the sole mission of TGP. The extreme sadism behind the Japanese is always cleverly hid behind a gruesome comedy. Like Bill O'Reilly mentioning Hitler to Michael Moore, this is a cheap shot gag leaving you speechless. The sadism behind the Japanese isn't anything to really laugh at. Genetics have a horrible way of biting you in the ass. For a better display of Asian tortures, mentally and physically, check out Sion Sono's masterpiece Strange Circus. After Meatball Machine mimicked Tetsuo: The Iron Man, a race became evident as each next prosperous copies the idea before that and loses track of the predestined trail, much like the butchering of Bergman's classic The Virgin Spring. After several remakes, the film's idea has been reduced to torture porn as seen in the new Last House on the Left remake trailer. Must I mention the "microwave Saw trap"? Still though, with all the errors on part and the copycat effect, Tokyo Gore Police is not without its nihilistic fun. You will see cleverly positioned quad-amputee's on katana blades as stilts, later removed and attached with assault rifles in an attempt to mimic yet another body horror staple as shown in Rodriguez's Planet Terror. If you're eying a vivid foreign blood soaked tale of something strictly brainless and child-like in birth, Tokyo Gore Police should not fail. While only able to be recommended so far, keep in mind that the ridiculousness captured on film looks unlike most things encountered before. That is, until you witness the bore of a present day city with no mind to capture in a beautiful light. The lack of the director's compassion for film is disturbing to say the least. Tokyo Gore Police is a bastard film accountable for every instance of treason available. Stealing from Planet Terror, Meatball Machine, The Machine Girl, Tetsuo: The Iron Man, Uzumaki, Party Monster and the Club Kids, Training Day and Max Payne (mentor gone wrong cop-out), and mannnnyy other films. The resume is extensive and Tokyo Gore Police owes a thanks to everything that it has stolen from. Anything well-received is sewn into the running time of Tokyo Gore Police and for this it becomes an insta-cult film. Needless to say, Tokyo Gore Police is not so much a film but rather a gag reel compiled by apes. This film doesn't take itself seriously so why should you?

VAMPIRE GIRL VS. FRANKENSTEIN GIRL

Yoshihiro Nishimura (2009)

As I run with themes in tow, I will review yet another Japanese film as my hard drive recently crashed resulting in a massive loss of data. How I came to acquire the films I've currently been watching is all thanks to a friend who let me borrow several Asian films for me to watch while I squander some data while I attempt to recollect films to review. In this assortment of films came the title Vampire Girl vs. Frankenstein Girl and if you've ever provided a blind-to-cinema friend with a list of possible watches and the aforementioned title is in the mix, surely they're going to pick this inane title as films are always best when they're "so bad they're good." This speaks for the standards of so many gorehounds nowadays as companies like Asylum produce films like Mega Shark vs. Giant Octopus or even how filmmakers whose only credit are films like Tommy Wiseau's The Room or the clip-art endowed Birdemic. It's incredibly dreadful that these people are garnering fans like Jonah Hill and Kevin Smith while getting interviews as they nervously lie about their films not being "serious." Some time ago I reviewed the cinematic schlock known to Western fans as Tokyo Gore Police. This appalling mix of try hard dystopian themes mixed with a prosthetics/CG mix of action of violence only granted me a massive migraine and very little confidence in the creators future. Well, they return with their tail tucked in between their legs to produce a film of better quality and that quality is offensiveness. Like most of their other projects and the related sort, (Robogeisha, Machine Girl, Meatball Machine, etc. etc.) I got sick from the amount of unrestrained assortment of absurd overkill these Japanese pump into their lifeless films. What they do to film is like giving a blood transfusion to someone who has been dead for months. The end result is normally a product so lifeless that even I don't grieve for another wasted opportunity. It's just expected. Imagine my surprise when I my stomach came to terms with the film after the opening scene of grue and arterial spray. I actually came to approve of this amateur production and I find myself at equal with the humor presented. The summarize the plot of VGvs.FG would be callous of me as the plot is wafer thin. As this has been redundantly taken, this is not a bad thing for a versus film. Keep in mind the various clashing of titans Freddy vs. Jason or Alien vs. Predator. These weren't versus films and that was their doom. Some random Jap was forced into dating some random Gothic Lolita chick whose father is vice principal. After a mysterious exchange student registers under his class and gives him a chocolate from her own blood, she is revealed to be a vampire and now he is too thanks to her evil, conniving confectionery treat. When the Gothic Lolita dame finds out her father is a mad scientist and subsequently dies from falling off a building while confronting the stealing vampire whore, her father recreates her as a Frankenstein(?) girl. From there on, they duel with awkward results. Thus equals the equation of mediocre absurdity. Thank god this film has it's own brand of condiments to spice up the plate. I consider myself a hateful person and I don't waste any time at ridiculing actions and decisions made by the average banal human. In VGvs.FG, many things are discussed visually with the appearance of scenes demonstrating the after school activities of several high school clubs - two to be exact. First there is the Cutting Club in which the Japanese girls moan about how life is a black void of depression as they systematically slash their wrists to a hilarious effect. After dating several cutters and just being clueless as to why someone would do something so stupid, this scene really lightened up the tone of damaged women and made me laugh aloud. The second and my personal favorite - the Ganguro Club. The Ganguro Club is based off a disastrously popular fashion in Japan that is basically a hybrid of Jersey Shore and Blackface. In VGvs.FG, the ganguro girls are led by more of an exaggerated pickaninny Negro with the big wrinkly lips, afro, and talk of her awesome Kenyan legs that will help her run for miles. While this may offend the weak willed, it turns a sub-par film into something that Troma would appreciate. Apart from the hilariously "offensive" racial humor of the film, VGvs.FG is still the same film of explicit and illogical gore but at least placed within a proper context of setting and fashion unlike the abysmal Tokyo Gore Police which took place during the future with a "modern" backdrop. While the characters are slightly likable and the Vampire Girl's face is a tad bit attractive, I just don't have yellow fever like most American males do. With a surprising twist near the end of the film and several tantalizing characters, VGvs.FG remains a watchable film that finds itself to be curiously entertaining while being entirely politically incorrect. To be completely honest, I could probably get used to the gothic lolita fashion sported by Frankenstein Girl in her previous evolution. Not so much the disgusting crane monster. I still can't get over the fact that I slightly enjoyed this film. I deserve a drink for accepting this film.

GODZILLA: TOKYO S.O.S.
GODZILLA: TOKYO S.O.S.

Yoshikazu Ishii (2004) This is one of the newer films of our generation exploiting the destruction and terror caused by Godzilla. This is the film before Final Wars sealed the franchise temporarily so I went in expecting a film with a heavy dose of CGI, military action, and abnormal and awesome fight scenes. I got what I wanted but I found the basic alignment of the characters to be unnecessary and tedious. When I bring about positions of war, Godzilla is once again a villain-esque creature after about a 50 year year waiting period. He quickly affirms to old traditions and destroys most of Tokyo before Mothra and the military controlled MechaGodzilla comes onto the battlefield. Just as Puppet Master did with volumes 4 & 5, this film comes as a surprise and vastly differs from previous entries. Perhaps the honorable mention that this film deserves is for stepping on the chaos scale and creating miniature buildings that crumble and break off into a stone like texture which compliments the panic of Tokyo being leveled....again. Instead of being able to root for Godzilla in the slightest – Which was always possible due to his cemented anti-hero status – I found that the new Godzilla didn't have a purpose and was just used as the backbone of another Monster Island Faerie Twins driven plot line of some intense hallucination highlighting a disaster that is forthcoming. Supporting the story is a cast of rather annoying pests that swing around hopeless morals as they scurry around the screen; in other words; bad actors. The fight scenes in question feature an array of personalized combat skills that are relevant to the dire situation these creatures and machines are caught in. Godzilla whipping his tail attempting to wag off one of Mothra's larvae is a scene that comes to mind. I thank the special effects team greatly for increasing the production value which in turn boosts the fluidity of the monster movements and creates for a visually stunning Kaiju film. Godzilla: Tokyo S.O.S. is a conflicted film unsure of how it views its country's own mascot. Godzilla is a tender soul driven mad by the scum that inhabits his world. This is a great action popcorn sequel but I find nothing that could be used to drive the lore of Godzilla further other than the incredible scar that lines his rib cage or the after credit sequence which leaves an Alien Resurrection feel to it morphing a Godzilla film into a true Science-fiction mythos.

GODZILLA VS. HEDORAH

Yoshimitsu Banno (1971)

This is considered to be the most radical spin-off of any Godzilla storyline and I completely agree. As I child, I explicitly remember being brainwashed with educational videos that spoke lightly of imminent destruction of nature if we didn't comply. Such is the case with Godzilla vs. Hedorah and another rare & self-banned Toho classic Prophecies of Nostradamus. The director of Godzilla vs. Hedorah is also the assistant director on Prophecies of Nostradamus, ironically enough. Godzilla has taken the form of a national icon within the story. The government no longer wants to kill him (as if) and children have taken a liking to him. Humans are a disgusting little bunch as they pollute Godzilla's world past the point of repair. From the sludge that we created comes Hedorah - a slimy creation of pollution. Some spores from a meteor mutated tadpoles in some rampant physiology experiment creating him. Oh yeah, and Godzilla learns how to fly. Of all the Godzilla films, this is one of the more violent ones. In most of the Lizard's films, the death toll is only implied. You see a city get destroyed and you think to yourself "Wow, many people must have died" but your suspicions are never answered. Hedorah possesses an ability to mist an entire area with sulfuric acid-like vapor killing hundreds of people. He vaporizes and nullifies entire populations. This is quite a morbid piece of hokey eco-fun. Godzilla is ultimately ineffective to Hedorah. Being a manifestation of sludge, Godzilla's fists go through him leaving his sneaky scales scarred and beaten. It's up to man to stop this creation using a bizarre science experiment charged by the powers of Atomic breath. This is considered the worst Godzilla film, but I don't see it. This film features amazing practical effects not limited to a giant mucky-looking tongue sliming down stairs and retreating, leaving a disgruntled undigested kitten. Godzilla vs. Hedorah is a completely different formula for a film of its kind. It reminds me of a film translation of those pop-culture children's books that featured characters like He-Man teaching kids to look both ways to cross the street, albeit graphic and nihilistic towards kind souls. In this film you will be subjected to a sing-along environmental song, Godzilla flying through the air, gratuitous violence towards teenage hippies, and Godzilla acting incredibly human. This is one of my favorite Godzilla films I've seen so far.

BEAUTIFUL GIRL HUNTER
BEAUTIFUL GIRL HUNTER

Youichirou Shimatani (1989)

AKA Star of David Tatsuya is the respectable heir of his father's fortune. He resides in a manor as cold as the killer that hides within his eyes. He is not the product of love, but born purely as a product of hate, as his mother was raped by a killer. While growing up, his father-like guardian beat him and unleashed his sexual urges against his mother leaving her dead. With both of his parents out of the way, Tatsuya's grotesque carnal instincts are breaking free. With a title like this, it is very easy to pass this off as another piece of pinku sleaze, same with Captured for Sex 2 or Rape & Death of a Housewife. An interesting aspect of this film is the alternate title of the film "Star of David" At first, I figured it was referring to the hexagram and not the symbol of the Zionism movement, but my hopes were crushed when I found out our anti-hero also has a fetish for Nazi's. In his history class, while being fed sensationalism about the terrors of Nazi's and Hitler, he developed a morbid fascination with the National Socialists. Our friend Tatsuya even manages to masturbate all over a copy of Night and Fog (Nacht und Nebel.) With that being said, in a scene exchanging words with a friend, his friend has been brainwashed to pity the Jews who died. Tatsuya disagrees because he "hates masses" Throughout the entire movie, the symbol of Zionism is brought up frequently in usage of sado-sexual torture and madness. Ejaculation on Nazi's The authentic feel in Star of David is led only by the amazing array of bondage rope-games and bizarre set-ups that lead to sadistic rapes and tortures. Misogyny is practiced in his makeshift chamber everyday. Those crazy Japs seem to get off by Urolagnia in almost every pinku film ever conceived. Japanese people hold the torch for being some of the most deviant sexual practitioner's. Aside from the constant battering and use of Nazi's to make a film that much more evil, it is a landmark film in the beauty of sexual tortures. It shows the even the most malignant and putrid acts of torture has a shining side of the ultimate romanticism, more so than the pretentious French try to highlight in every one of their films. For once, I'd like a film to portray other villains other than the Germans. Like Blind Beast and most other Asian films concerning the macabre side of sex, this film is a chronicling of forbidden desires and I applaud it for its stunning use of religious symbolism. Other than that, this film is a "how-to" guide on how to degenerate a loved one. Misogyny might be hard to spell, but it's easy to practice.

BATTLEFIELD BASEBALL

Yudai Yamaguchi (2003)

This trashy piece of Japanese cinema was directed by Yudai Yamaguchi, one half of the creative duo that is responsible for Meatball Machine. Battlefield Baseball is of course, another attempt to market on Versus fame as you can see through the cover art. They put various phrases like "FROM THE TEAM THAT BROUGHT YOU "VERSUS" or "HEY DID YOU LIKE VERSUS?" and tries to pull us in. After watching the abomination that was Death Trance, I'm not so easy to fool. All this could easily be forgivable if they hadn't brought this film to it's knees. Battlefield Baseball thinks it is a clever film for trying to mix humor, with martial-arts, sports, and violence but i will get to that later. The plot revolves around the new kid, Jubeh. He sleeps upside down and has many rumors floating around his new school about him murdering his parents. He doesn't really care though seeing as how he is expelled from every school. Enter Seido High School, this is where we meet the eccentric principal who is in an extended state of shock from his childhood experience of Gedo High School, a school baseball team made of mutant killers who are able to kill legally. After Jubeh protects a weaselly player from a bully, "I hate bully's" (Wow, sounds just like Versus eh?) the principal witnesses Jubeh's power and flexibility. He then decides to beg Jubeh to join the baseball team so they might actually have a chance to win the competition. After a couple of horribly choreographed scenes, he decides to join even though he made a vow to his father who he killed with a pitch. In a couple of extremely painful flashback/near-death scenes, he makes amends with his father and with the help of respawning converted bad guy Bancho, Seido High School plans to put a stop to Gedo once and for all. Let me say for the record, that one element that kills this film is the ridiculous over-acting. It isn't funny and they should stop immediately. The principal is one of the most annoying characters in cinema history and should be lynched. Tak Sakaguchi is the key badass and the loner who eventually realizes there are more important things at hands such as family and singing! Yes, singing. Jubeh busts out in at least 2 musical numbers which flamboyancy rivals Moulin Rouge. Definitely not for the faint of heart. The make-up effects are horrifically amateur and make Herschel Gordon Lewis look like Tom Savini. Dismembered heads remind me of fun times with Marshmallow treats and there is no blood at all. No sex, and hardly and violence. We do see a couple of pre-inspirations for his better, later film MEATBALL MACHINE such as robot stomachs. The Gedo team are mostly unoriginal designs except for one who uses a really awesome voice box system, but they mainly look like rejected Beetleborgs. Near the end, the film obviously loses the feeling it wanted and turns into a Kung-Fu Hustle feel good comedy musical with a safe-for-the-whole-family type of violence. This film is a cluttered film that falls flat on it's face and shouldn't have been released on Region 1 regardless. Battlefield Baseball is flawed indeed, and has hardly any good. At best, the only reason to watch it would be a couple of funny scenes. Beware of this film.

BATTLEFIELD BASEBALL

FLESH TARGET: RAPE

Yukihiro Sawada (1979)

Directed by Yukihiro Sawada, Flesh Target: Rape is an audacious slice of reverse-engineered sexual manipulation that leaves me alienated on how to actually approach the lingering sense of immorality left by the film's final moments. No stranger to pink film or the topic of molestation in cinema, Flesh Target: Rape managed to challenge a great helping of what I knew of the subject. While most of the similarly categorized films of the Nikkatsu lexicon handle and transfer the same sexually appeasing and socially vile topic of a split-consensual rape session, Sawada's target on rape is displayed with a juvenile grin and light-hearted approach to pinku eiga with the respects of women in his rear-view window and a supple-breasted woman tied up in his trunk. With nary a sense of plot, Rape follows a script-sculpted alcoholic salaryman who, in a sexually frustrated rage, hits the chairman of his firm in the face after an impromptu intervention in a bathroom during a corporate meeting of importance. Nezu, beaten but not broken, is demoted to a dead spot in the company, promised a continuing career with no possible way of advancement. In what I can only relate to as foreshadowed comeuppance after the opening, Nezu begins a wave of stress management via raping his co-workers and those female figures who sneer and snicker in his general position of company misery. Flesh Target: Rape is a prime cut of rape cinema, as to say, Flesh Target: Rape is rape singularly. The film only supports a stream of violation without a real sense of story, emotion, or consequence. Especially consequence. In fact, the ending of Flesh Target: Rape is so deliriously upbeat that I found the tempo to match a high spirited closure with a Hallmark twist/lust, but, you know, with serial rape.

As most films of a similar degree, Flesh Target: Rape has the one distinction that can be argued between parties for an eternity - displaying women in trouble as cloyingly accepting of their molestation - dirty damsels digging nails into their opponent. From victim number one and on, Flesh Target: Rape takes no time turning the tables on these hapless female's sexual drives. Screams of distress melt into vibrating coos in a blink of an eye. Some of these dames have it harder than others, such as the lesbian couple who are numbered and buggered as the opposing lover stares into the eyes of their partner as their sexual orientated individualism is stripped from them in a flash of stiff yellow. This and other moments of brilliance are what really make Flesh Target: Rape stand out from the crowd of post-coitus guilt-ridden and driven women left in the massacre of a company called Nikkatsu. For an example of brief originality with a punchline, but with hilarity sewn further into the scenario, Nezu decides he must lust on a pretty ring-waiting company woman that ends with him invading her apartment and throwing and trapping her head through a wall. During the process of penetration, Nezu forces the hole deeper and wider with each thrust, climaxing with both of them collapsing through the wall, leaving splintered wood and damp flesh clinging to each other - a nice cohesive bond considering how underpaid the decorator must have been. Cinema can be such a sweet treat at times, especially with the morals left intact from viewing Flesh Target: Rape, the only film that creates a corporate ladder climbing solution that begins and ends with "rape co-workers" - an adverse cry of victory from the little man. With this mindset, Flesh Target: Rape offers the mental musings of a general "does what he has to do to succeed" idea with a dosage of competent filmmaking and gender caricatures that perform honest justice on a taboo topic to anyone with something to lose. Ah, those undesired desirables; I know too well of the topic.

Apart from sections dissecting sodomy, digital and penile penetration, and degradation without implication, Flesh Target: Rape is also gifted with an animated score of fleeting jazz building an aura of cool around our anti-hero of the cock - Jap meets Gould - A silent The Long Goodbye-dick with a cigarette at all times and a calm demeanor even while being tricked into a fellatio scenario. A classic shell-of-a-man whose arrogance and nicotine habits form thanks to cinematic evolution from an aggressor caresser to a pompous, free-wheeled go-getter who force-fucks the entirety of his female staff without alerting the attention of the authorities or the men romantically assigned to these ladies. Nezu is a joy to behold, whether he's making house calls to past victims who have accepted the idea of a free orgasm with guilt at no extra cost or flustering an employee hitchhiker before a big date. Flesh Target: Rape is a delight in the sense that it is so decidedly existent within its own set of anti-morals that it wouldn't be a surprise that any self-respecting woman should take heed from what would surely be labeled as "misogynistic trash" while dawdling at work dreaming of a divine rape fantasy made all the more acute by an absent boyfriend. For a rollicking good time and a literal use of the term "rape wrecking ball", Flesh Target: Rape is not to be missed by anyone familiar or adoring of this major, and forever prominent, staple in Japanese eroticism. Nezu has it all: one word damnations, rape requests, and hot flesh quivering on a platter. The only thing left wanted is a sequel to show just how far fictional rape can take a man and how cool one can be, with women relinquishing to a man whatever he might need.

PATRIOTISM

Yukio Mishima (1966)

Among his many other countless achievements as quite arguably the greatest Japanese Renaissance man of the 20th century, novelist Yukio Mishima—a true warrior-poet if ever there was one in the post-WWII era—directed a short 30-minute avant-garde black-and-white film that would prophesize his own ritual suicide via seppuku after a failed military coup d'état on November 25, 1970. Indeed, Mishima's first and sole film, Patriotism, or The Rite of Love and Death (1966) aka The Rite of Love and Death aka Les Rites de L'Amour et de la Mort aka Yūkoku—a work based on the novelist's 1962 short story of the same name—is not only notable due to its similarities with the creator's death, but it also happens to feature what is arguably the most poetic, romantic, and emotionally intricate yet strangely visceral depictions of suicide in cinema history. As a work where the Japanese novelist acted as the writer, director, star, producer, production designer, and translator (he apparently made four versions of the film, including English, French, and German language versions where he personally handwrote all the scrolling inter-titles featured in the film), Patriotism is a work that unquestionably personifies an auteur piece in a work that more or less blurs the line between celluloid autobiography and self-mythmaking. While Mishima went to great pains to establish himself as an iconic celebrity in Japan by way of what he described as “pranks” (i.e. wearing goofy Hawaiian shirts and hanging out with transvestites) and was quite successful doing so, the novelist was nowhere near as popular a figure in the Occident and the United States, thus he specially tailored Patriotism in a fashion to appeal to Europeans and Americans in the hope that his reputation would grow abroad. Indeed, while in the visual style of classical Japanese Noh theatre (the film was actually shot on a Noh stage), the film is silent/dialogue-less and features Richard Wagner's “Liebestod” (aka “Love Death”)—the final music of the 1859 opera Tristan und Isolde, which is associated with the suicide pact of German romantic poet Heinrich von Kleist and his lover Henriette Vogel—as a musical score, thereupon making the work rather more accessible for western audiences. Still today the most monetarily successful short film in Japanese history, Patriotism was not surprisingly taken out of distribution by the director's widow Yoko (who was originally thought to have destroyed the film) after the novelist committed suicide, but was luckily re-released on DVD in Japan in 2006 and by the Criterion Collection in 2008 after the film's executive producer Hiroaki Fujii discovered about 40 reels of the film in immaculate condition in a tea box at the late great novelist's home in Ota Ward, Tokyo in 2005. A sort of lurid yet lavish celluloid love story for cultivated sadomasochists where the auteur obscures his homosexual tendencies, Patriotism ultimately proved that an aesthetically innovative and timeless cinematic masterpiece could be made in a mere two days.

PATRIOTISM

As described in handwritten scrolls featured at the beginning of Patriotism, in February 1936, Tokyo was placed under martial law after a group of enterprising young military officers executed a coup d'état that resulted in the murders of various corrupt cabinet members. Although a young married fellow named Lieutenant Takeyama (Yukio Mishima) was a member of the secret society that carried out the coup d'état, he did not participate in the murders because his comrades knew how much he loved his beautiful wife Reiko (Yoshiko Tsuruoka) and they did not want to implicate him in the crimes. Since Takeyama is a member of the palace guard, it will be his responsibility to execute his friends who carried out the failed coup. Choosing death over dishonor, the Lieutenant opts for committing seppuku instead of killing his friends and his young wife has decided to join him. Before Takeyama can even tell her of his decision, Reiko can tell by the expression on her husband's face that he plans to commit suicide and she is more than prepared to go with him. After Reiko tells Takeyama, "I will follow you wherever you go," the Lieutenant responds by stating, "Thank you. We'll go together to another world then. But please let me die first, and then you follow. I mustn't fail." Indeed, the two feel that death is no longer terrifying and Reiko is so giddy about her premature demise that she states that she feels just like she did on her wedding night, as if sex and death bring about the same sort of highly climatic ecstasy. As an inter-title reads: "This is pure and passionate as a ritual conducted before the gods. They are able for the first time in their lives to reveal unabashedly their most secret desires and passions." Indeed, the two make passionate love one more time before their date with a literally gut-busting sword. Before disemboweling himself with the sword, Takeyama puts on his officer's uniform to prepare himself for the sweet taste of death. When Reiko sees her hubby's entrails bleed all over the floor of their mostly white home, she weeps like a waterfall yet her face remains stoic and determined. With her white angelic clothing covered with Takeyama's vital fluids, Reiko leaves the ritual chamber and goes to prepare for her own death by applying her face with make-up (or what Mishima described as her "death mask"), so as to look beautiful for the gods. Upon reentering the suicide room, Reiko proceeds to walk in a pool of blood and entrails, kisses Takeyama's post-mortem lips, and licks a dagger as if sexually aroused by the weapon. In the end, Reiko drives the dagger into her throat and her dead corpse lands on Takeyama, thus uniting the two lovers in death. As Mishima wrote regarding the conclusion of the film when the female protagonist takes her life: "she bids farewell to the fallen corpse of her husband; then at the moment when she takes her own life, the film leaps from one dimension to the next, spiriting the viewer from a heightened sense of this world to a realm where death and beauty are one. This was my plan, and thanks to Wagner's music I was able to accomplish it." Indeed, Patriotism is probably the most controversial marriage between Japanese and Teutonic kultur since the Second World War (interestingly, Mishima also wrote a rather interesting play entitled My Friend Hitler (1968) where he depicted SA leader Ernst Röhm dying needlessly as a result of a sort of hopeless homoerotic loyalty to Hitler).

In a 1966 interview with Yukio Mishima shot for NHK Television in Japan, the novelist noted: “Rilke writes somewhere that modern man can no longer die a dramatic death. He dies in a hospital room, like a bee inside a honeycomb cell. That’s how I recall it, at least. Death in the modern age, whether due to illness or accident, is devoid of drama. We live in an age in which there is no heroic death.” Of course, as his failed coup d’état attempt (also known as the so-called “Mishima incident”) and subsequent ritualistic suicide indicates, Mishima was longing for death and glory in a zeitgeist of decided deracination (in fact, Mishima biographer John Nathan theorized that the whole coup was a mere pretext for the artist to commit ritual suicide and that he had no plans to survive the ordeal), with Patriotism literalizing the “drama” the novelist spoke of in his interview. It should be noted that Mishima was at the height of his physical and artistic strength at his death, thus more or less becoming a real-life version of Guido Reni’s painting of the martyrdom of Saint Sebastian, of which the writer revealed reaching sexual climax at the age of 12 in his autobiographical second novel Confessions of a Mask (1949). Of course, the young Mishima of the novel, who is more or less a self-loathing and sexually confused introvert, is quite different from the Mishima who created his own private mercenary army, used that army to carry out a failed coup d’état at the Tokyo headquarters of the Eastern Command of Japan’s Self-Defense Forces, and had one of his soldiers decapitate his head with a sword (but not before disemboweling himself, of course). In that regard, Mishima’s self-created persona—his most personal work of art—ultimately transcended his true/original self, with even his suicide being a publicity stunt of sorts. Patriotism is clearly a rehearsal for said suicide as a sort of premature death poem in celluloid form.

Undoubtedly, Patriotism is much like frog fag novelist Jean Genet’s quasi-pornographic sole feature A Song of Love (1950) aka Un chant d’amour in that it more or less cinematically expresses the writer-turned-director’s entire aesthetic essence and distinct Weltanschauung in under 30 minutes. At the beginning of an essay entitled On Patriotism (The Rite of Love and Death) that Mishima wrote in 1966 regarding the production of his film, the writer-turned-director noted: “‘Patriotism’ was published in January 1961 in the literary quarterly Shosetsu chuokoron. Though fewer than fifty manuscript pages in length, this short story remains etched in my mind, for it brings together in condensed form the basic elements of my writing. In fact, if I were to recommend just one work to a new reader, I would choose ‘Patriotism’ over more widely read novels like ‘The Sound of Waves’, because it embodies so many of my qualities as a writer, both the good and the bad.” Indeed, I would also argue that the film Patriotism is the perfect introduction to the life, death, and work of Mishima as a highly accessible avant-garde work that demonstrates that the auteur perceived death, especially a death that occurred when a person was at their physical and mental prime, as the height of beauty and majesty. Undoubtedly, the segment directed by British auteur Franc Roddam (Quadrophenia, The Bride) for the opera-themed anthology film Aria (1987), which not only features Wagner's "Liebestod" but also depicts two young lovers carrying out a suicide pact, is like a cheap Americanized rip-off of Mishima's film, as it lacks the innate intimacy with death that is quite apparent in Patriotism. For those that consider suicide the way of the failure, pansy, and/or loser, Mishima once summed up the difference between Occidental and Japanese perception of self-slaughter when he remarked: "Hara-kiri is a very positive, very proud way of death. I think it's very different from the Western concept of suicide. The Western concept of suicide is always defeat itself. Mostly. But hara-kiri sometimes makes you win." Indeed, in the end, Mishima seemed to win as he never physically and artistically degenerated with age like so many old artists do and people will also remember him as sort of the last samurai of Japan, with Patriotism being a positively poetic reminder of what death meant to the writer's life and work. While Paul Schrader's biopic Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985) is certainly a great source for anecdotal details regarding Mishima's life and work, Patriotism will give you a more authentic sense of the novelist's essence, as quite arguably the most darkly intimate and certainly most morbidly prophetic film ever directed by a writer. Indeed, the only thing that could have possibly made Mishima's sole excursion in filmmaking more sincere is if wife Keiko had been portrayed by a tranny.

TRISTAN ET ISEULT

Yvan Lagrange (1972)

Undoubtedly, my favorite cinematic adaptation of Tristan and Iseult aka Tristan und Isolde is Jean Delannoy's L'éternel retour (1943) aka The Eternal Return aka Love Eternal, which is based on a Nietzschean reworking of the myth penned by none other than Jean Cocteau. Certainly Delannoy's narrative-driven adaptation could not be more different from Yvan Lagrange's exceedingly rare and sometimes esoteric work Tristan and Isolde (1972) aka Tristan et Iseult, which, not unlike the films of Peter Emanuel Goldman (Echoes of Silence, Wheel of Ashes) until they were released on DVD a couple years back, has managed to earn a sort of mythical status among certain cinephiles, which is largely the result of its complete and utter lack of availability. Due to the efforts of a rather altruistic cinephile on the internet, I managed to see Lagrange's lost masterpiece and while I have to say that it is not exactly a work that lives up to its singular reputation, I cannot say I did not enjoy it. Not unlike Richard Wagner's famous 1865 epic musical drama poem, albeit in a quasi-counterculture-flavored and all the more archetypal and allegorical way, Lagrange's film reduces the Tristan and Isolde myth to its simplest themes and details it as a piece of cinematic poetry from the "Zanzibar Films" (Philippe Garrel, Patrick Deval, Jackie Raynal, Pierre Clémenti, Daniel Pommereulle, Serge Bard, etc.) school of filmmaking. Indeed, Lagrange's film is like Garrel's La cicatrice intérieure aka The Internal Scar (1972) sans Teutonic diva Nico and readapted as the Tristan and Isolde story as a largely plotless and abstract hermetic work set in an exotic land that trumps the most fantastic of Hollywood sets. Indeed, Lagrange's film is a 'magical' marriage between ancient myth and the most avant-garde of the French avant-garde. Ostensibly the tale of a warrior who is sent to Ireland from Cornwall to fetch the bride of the king, only to fall mutually in love with said bride after the two drink a love potion, Lagrange's Tristan and Isolde is more of an aesthetically romantic experience than a tragic love story as certainly no one will feel sorry for the doomed lovers when the film ends.

A somewhat cryptically personalized adaptation of the myth, the film stars the director and his Walloon wife Claire Wauthion as the doomed eponymous leads in what is ultimately a darkly romantic cinematic work that brings some much needed testosterone and masculinity to the exceedingly effete realm of early 1970s French art faggotry. Indeed, shot in both Iceland and Morocco, Tristan and Isolde features an otherworldly yet paradoxically totally organic realm with an atmosphere of foreboding melancholia where warriors not only battle to death with their swords, but also the bladed antlers of their helmets. Featuring an oftentimes unintentionally goofy operatic prog-rock score by classically trained drummer Christian Vander—a man who invented his own fictional planet of 'Kobaïa' for a ten album "space opera" with its own lyrical language called 'Kobaian'—of the French progressive rock/jazz fusion group Magma, Lagrange's Tristan and Isolde has certainly aged less than gracefully in some respects. Indeed, featuring a neo-medieval world where knights wear rather aesthetically vulgar uniforms of the quasi-hippie robe sort and helmets that seem inspired by the the horned Gaulish god 'Cernunnos' aka 'Hern the Hunter' of Celtic polytheism, Lagrange's film is shockingly violent and gory for a frog art fag flick yet the brutal imagery is somewhat unintentionally undermined by the flamboyant costumes to the point where Tristan and Isolde feels like a campy hippie take on the Pieter Bruegel the Elder masterpiece The Triumph of Death (1562). Innately anti-war to the core in a sort of post-Aktionist fashion, Lagrange's film is practically flooded with mutilated animal corpses and decapitated cow heads to the point where the end seems like a sort of surrealist slaughterhouse. Indeed, Lagrange's film is not so much a tribute or reworking of Tristan and Isolde as it is a mockery where the titular hero practically worships death and where the heroine does not do much more than cry and mourn when not fingering her flesh flower in a forest.

Tristan and Isolde begins simply enough with the two eponymous lovers staring straight at the viewer for no less than four minutes after the title screen appears in flames. Tristan seems to die about a thousand times during the film and Isolde naturally mourns him in the most hysterical and histrionic ways, but somehow he ends up always coming back and demonstrating his ambivalence to his lover any time she attempts to keep him around. Undoubtedly, the film creates a potent dichotomy between the active aggressive brutality of man and the passive and empathic sensitivity of woman, with Tristan's quenchable thirst for blood and glory of total war being the major problem that will destroy the two lovers and their somewhat dubious romance. Indeed, while Tristan inhabits a sort of metaphysical abattoir of perpetual death and destruction, Isolde is a born sensualist who masturbates in an almost ritualistic fashion whilst the sun beams over her body in a forest. When Tristan is wounded during the beginning of the film during battle, Isolde takes him back to a cave and nurses him back to health. In a bizarre scene that seems to be an allegorical reflection of woman's lowly position in life and man's ignorance and apathy toward said lowly position, Isolde washes a floor by hand while Tristan lays face down on a small set of stairs. In a 'large' battle between the hero's army and a rival group, every single person is seemingly killed, including Tristan, thus leaving Isolde to mourn all by her lonesome. In an undeniably beautiful scene set during the blue hour, Tristan's lifeless corpse hangs from a horse that is pulled by Isolde.

After Tristan dies (for the first time), the film begins making even less sense than it did before and delightfully degenerates into a sort of surrealist nightmare that seems to mix German Romanticism with the Viennese Aktionists and the early films of Alejandro Jodorowsky. Indeed, in one particularly perversely potent scene, Tristan carries Isolde through a room full of animal corpses. During this deranged dream-sequence, Tristan also poses with a series of religious statues. In a scene that may or may not be a blasphemous reference to ichthys, Tristan grabs and bites into a fish that Isolde was admiring and practically salivating over. Out of nowhere, the film switches from being set into a phantasmagoric church to a small shitty shack where Tristan senselessly slits his wrist and abruptly leaves while Isolde cries hysterically. In a scene that starts initially rather romantically but devolves into abject heartbreak, Tristan and Isolde embrace in an Icelandic lake, but the former eventually becomes disgusted and leaves, but not before violently fighting with his beloved, who tries in vain to keep her boy toy with her and is ultimately knocked flat on her ass when attempting to restrain him. In the end, Tristan lies dead with a camel corpse while his intestines literally rot in the sun and Isolde lies on a rocky bed of flames.

Indubitably, “eternal return” has a much different meaning in Yvan Lagrange’s film than it did in Delannoy’s 1943 Cocteau reworking of the same name. Indeed, while Delannoy’s film begins with the words, “The Eternal Return [...] borrowed from Nietzsche, means here that even legends can be reborn unbeknown to their heroes. An eternal return of the very simple circumstances which comprised the most famous of all great love stories” and depicts the lovers’ downfall as a result of a series of unfortunate circumstances related to family and money, Lagrange’s depicts the ‘eternal return’ as Tristan’s unwavering bloodlust and self-destructive love of war. Indeed, Tristan dies multiple times in Lagrange’s film but what all these deaths have in common is a sort of nihilistic (self)destruction. Undoubtedly Lagrange’s Tristan is a sort of archetype of the innate warrior character of pre-liberalized man. Of course, Europe, especially France, is now full of spiritual eunuchs who take orders from homos, Hebrews, and third world untermenschen, so one could argue that the sort of ‘eternal return’ depicted in Lagrange’s work has proven to be less than perennial. As the rise of miscegenation and the dearth of indigenous French birthrates demonstrate, women are not attracted to pacified men that lack the will to fight. Indeed, ultimately the most tragic thing about Yvan Lagrange’s Tristan and Isolde is his effeminized view of masculinity, but of course such thinking was a cliché of French filmmakers of that type. Ultimately, the film’s brilliance lies in poetic imagery as a sort of operatic piece of the cinematically grotesque that somehow manages to make dismembered animal corpses seem quite beautiful. While the film may bask in making a mockery of classic Occidental myth, it still manages to be aesthetically exquisite enough to not seem like a putrid piece of postmodern posturing, but instead stands as a landmark work of its particularly misguided zeitgeist that certainly deserves to be remastered and rereleased so that future generations can savor its sullen sensuality and beauteous brutality. As his later film Dérive 'Le naufrage de Vénus' (1974)—a work that features arguably the most erotic depiction of a pregnant woman ever committed to celluloid—certainly demonstrates, Lagrange certainly had an eye for a sort of esoteric and sometimes eccentric eroticism that made him stand out among his contemporaries, with Tristan and Isolde certainly being his amorous magnum opus. Indeed, in terms of the best idiosyncratic Tristan and Isolde adaptations, Lagrange's wonderfully wayward work is king.

KILLER ME

Zachary Hansen (2001)

Killer Me is an independent psychological horror film that not only dazzled me with its wonderful premise but it is a story that could be the most awkward and rewarding love story put on independent film in a long while. The film is like a jawbreaker with many different elements and genres rolled into a tasty hybrid of new horror. The outer shell, of course, is the serial killer parts, with the center, being a budding love story between two confused souls.

The plot involves two people really, and uses their severed connections with the outside world as a setting for the story to unravel. Joseph is a brooding, unsettled man who takes criminology courses and works at a library. He is the kind of character we know nothing about and we only learn through fragmented flashbacks. Joseph enjoys long walks at night and macaroni TV dinners. Joseph is a serial killer. While this is not told to us directly, we have no choice but to get the idea. He wakes up, bloody, with a recent violent acquaintance dead. It has to be more than superior luck, Right? Well, he is a tortured soul, sporting around a fancy old style razor and i must say, in a couple of masterfully shot sequences, that razor had me on edge. This is when we are introduced to gorgeous Anna who has a ridiculously annoying hair cut. They begin to stare at each other through class. Innocently enough, she begins to try to start a conversation but he quickly recedes into his shell. He obviously doesn't want anyone to get hurt and that is the sweetest thing any one could do. He witnesses an almost rape one night and wakes up on the trail. You don't know what happened, but i felt fucking horrible. The sickness was spreading in my stomach. Easily, one of the more grueling scenes with such a lack of content. The lies get deeper as he adds more to his scrapbook of believed killings. He has a cut of his side which he burrows into more and more. Their relationship gets more personal and personal till it gets too much for him. The animal he bought for her is what is essentially keeping them together and his nameless fish is a heartbreaking character. If i were to talk any more about this creative film, it would be ruined. You don't really need to expect much but a damn good serial killer film that rivals HENRY: PORTRAIT OF A SERIAL KILLER and a love story that rivals BLIND BEAST though not as perverse. For being a little to not heard of film, my expectations were shattered. It was released on a company called Vanguard. I would definitely check this film out if i were you. Zachary Hansen might be the best thing to happen to indie horror in a while. Taking on the extremely difficult task of directing, editing, and writing, he completes these with style. His cast of unknowns are the most amazing of which i have seen recently and produce excellent chemistry. One thing that did greatly piss me off is the fact that this film bills Anna as a young, lush, stalker when this is certainly not the case. Only a half-wit would deem her such. Just an innocent girl, with innocent emotions. There is no activity that could be describable as "stalking" Killer Me is a frightening look at vigilantism, serial killers, love, and the questions we face in our every day life. What do you see when you look into the mirror?

VISIONS OF CLAIR

Zachary Strong (1977)

While I never have really put too much thought into, I can say without the slightest bit of hesitation that Bacchanale (1970) directed by the Amero brothers is one of my favorites, if not my favorite, fuck flicks, not least of all because it contains a completely singular phantasmagoric yet psychedelic hermetic netherworld of the orgasmic offbeat gothic sort that is big on atmosphere and low on cheap soulless sex and limp drug-ridden dicks. With that begin said, I am always on the lookout for hardcore flicks in the spirit of the Ameros' unsung masterpiece of celluloid lechery and luckily I just discovered one with a similarly sinister essence of foreboding aesthetic excess. Indeed, Visions of Clair (1977) directed by Zachary Strong (Resurrection of Eve, Confessions of a Teenage Peanut Butter Freak)—a sexually eclectic pornographic auteur who assembled both hetero and homo hardcore flicks and worked with in various different genres—is esoteric erotica at its finest as a somewhat inexplicable arthouse-hardcore hybrid that has the grand distinction of being the only fuck film produced by hardcore heavyweights Cal Vista that managed to lose money. Indeed, a sort of metaphysical blue movie that features, among other things, ancient archetypes, pseudo-spiritual hippie gibberish, psychedelic penetration and ejaculation, Ludwig van Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and an ambient transcendental original score, pleasantly politically incorrect quasi-beatnik lingo, left-hand path lechery, and random references to ancient Egyptian mythology, Visions of Clair is a hallucinatory hardcore horror flick with wayward airs of aberrant aesthetic majesty. In short, there is no other film quite like it, be it obscure vintage fuck flick or otherwise. The closest things to a pornographic take on Ingmar Bergman's masterpiece Persona (1966), albeit focusing on three seemingly mentally damaged dames as opposed to just two, as a work featuring arcane lipstick lesbianism, psychic vampirism, and metaphysical horror, Strong's work may be preposterously pretentious for a porno flick, but somehow it all more or less works as a filmic fever dream with a genuinely foreboding atmosphere and authentically sensual sex scenes. In its counter-culture-cultivated depiction of three very different yet seemingly equally internally wounded women becoming "one" and dichotomous use of gender archetypes, the film also surely owes a heavy aesthetic debt to Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg's Performance (1970). Originally advertised with the rather aesthetically misleading tagline, "a film in the style of EMMANUELLE but with the raw passion of THE STORY OF O," Visions of Clair—a work featuring pillows with decidedly decadent England dandy Aubrey Beardsley's iconic illustrations and images of the ancient Egyptian 'ankh' (aka "key of life," "the key of the Nile" or "crux ansata")—is a porno that, at the very least, cannot be properly pigeonholed, though it is safe to say that the creators had their fair share of recreational drug use and resentment towards masculinity and the male sex in general.

Visions of Clair begins simply enough with a frustrated young hippie-like artist named Ron (John Rolling) complaining to the young unclad model he is painting, Clair van der Meer (Annette Haven), that he is more or less incapacitated by her supposedly stunning beauty, even rudely stating to her: "Shit...I lost my momentum. I guess you're too beautiful for me, Clair. I mean, your beauty is not the kind I usually paint...it's too conventional. You're too womanish, Clair. Look at you...big tits, nice ass...beauty, pretty, or whatever...but not attractive to me. Alright, I rather not paint you in the nude. A costume perhaps. Anyway, most women don't commission nude portraits from me." When Clair asks the angst-ridden painter what it is about her body that really disturbs him, Ron irrationally replies, "It's not real...I can't even imagine having sex with your body...No, it's not real." In a noble attempt to calm down the agitated artist and to prove that he can indeed imagine having sex with her, Clair makes the mighty expiatory sacrifice of sucking off Ron and proceeding to fuck him, thus causing the seemingly sexually frustrated painter to liberate his seed. Shortly after they finish and the artist disrespectfully wipes his spilled seed on the model's dress, Ron's girlfriend Daphne (Bonnie Holiday) randomly shows up at the studio and seems quite bewildered by the fact that her best beau is cavorting with a blatant psychic vampire of sorts. Of course, it is only matter of time before bitchy 'artiste' Ron is out of the picture and Clair and Daphne become inseparable partners that even seem to share the same soul.

Flash forward four years later and Ron is now dead as a result of a supposed "accident" he had while he was drunk. Clair and Daphne have now become an 'item,' with the latter becoming the perennial 'shadow' of the former, as she is the ying to the other's yang. They live in Clair's mansion where they have all the time in the world to get wild and wanton, as neither woman seems to work. Meanwhile, a third woman, a seemingly borderline mute painter named Roahne (Susan Bates), has entered the picture as she has been commissioned to paint a somewhat amateurish Crowley-esque portrait of Clair, Daphne, and assumedly herself. Roahne is accompanied by an intolerably bombastic and vainglorious "bobo" (aka bourgeois bohemian) named David (Jay Gamble), who claims to have known Clair when he was younger, stating of her, "I've always been rather attracted to her. I mean, when I was a child, I thought of her as a god, you know? She was so unapproachable...I was actually in love with her. Still am, somewhat." When Roahne and David meet with Clair at a diner while the latter is buying a golden ancient Egyptian necklace from some swarthy hippie pansy, it results in rather awkward consequences. Indeed, upon entering the diner, David immediately goes up to Clair and rather rudely interrupts her while she is talking with the antique dealer and mentions how their families know one another, but she says nothing, which rather infuriates the young man, who later complains to his quasi-muse Roahne: "I can't get over how fucking rude she was. It's not like I'm nobody from nowhere creeping up on her to demand a piece of ass or something. ...And then she takes a good damn mentally retarded nymphomaniac out of the gutter and then she has the gall to put on airs with me?!" David also accuses Roahne of being a "good damned zombie" due to her rather flat affect and her seeming aversion to mindless chit-chat, but little does he realize that he is a nuisance to the three women, who will come to form a sort of 'metaphysical ménage à trios' of Sapphic meta-womanhood. Indeed, whether it is by her mysterious golden necklace or own innate ominous yet orgasmic aura and penetrating sexual magnetism, Clair will lure Roahne to her secret world of quasi-satanic Sapphic spirituality.

Although they never seem to get around to actually talking, Roahne seems to know everything about Clair and Daphne, stating to herself, "Clair...a Goddess. Daphne...a Priestess. Her isolation...forms a shield...to which others' illusions are drawn and attached as to a magnet. Like a magnet. Lust...in its basic form." In a remark that makes it seem like she has seen Bergman's Persona one too many times while high on cheap acid, Roahne also declares, "To know Clair, I must become Clair." On top of painting her and her lover's portrait, Roahne is also to be ritualistically bequeathed with the gold Egyptian necklace that was bought by Clair from the antique dealer who David thinks is a fraud and describes as a, "fag-got hustler." When David attempts to "make love" with Roahne after she passes out after he makes her a dubious Italian dinner (David claims that his marginal amount of Guido blood has given him the innate power to be a master cook), he proves to be completely impotent and eventually dies while suffering what seems to be metaphysical 'cock block,' thus disappearing from the story entirely, as if Clair willed his pathetic demise via black magic. Towards the end of the film in what amounts to a semi-sadomasochistic lesbian montage, Clair and Daphne share a ritualistic dance together that evolves into passionate mutual cunnilingus while Roahne enters their home in a seemingly possessed somnambulist state to finish their portrait. Indeed, Roahne becomes a Sapphic somnambulist of sorts who masturbates with an ancient Egyptian dagger while Clair and Daphne devour one another's bushy naughty bits. In the end, Roahne finishes the painting and the three women become one, though cunt goddess Clair is clearly the true goddess of the superlatively sacrilegious spiritual threesome.

A lesbian horror flick where all the male characters, who are more or less exactly the same in their bourgeois-bred effeminacy and lack of virility, mysteriously drop dead and all the three female characters become one big Sapphic spirit of the sinisterly sensual sort, Visions of Clair is unquestionably one of the few lesbo fuck flicks that I have ever seen where the sex and sensuality actually seemed sincere as opposed to the conspicuously contrived counterfeit carpet-munching that one can almost always expect from such works. Of course, more importantly, the film is one of the most aesthetically intriguing, hypnotic, and wildly idiosyncratic porn flicks ever made, which is something that only European filmgoers have seem to have taken notice of, as demonstrated by the fact that the handful of online reviews that exist on the film were written by Europeans. Notably, auteur Zachary Strong was bisexual, though it seems like he sides more with his female side in the film, as the two male characters are exceedingly arrogant assholes whose pathological narcissism seems to be a mere cover for their sexual inadequacy, which is demonstrated via the characters' literal and metaphysical impotency. It should also be noted that while the male characters are nothing short of spiritually retarded, the female characters, especially the eponymous lead, have almost supernatural intuition as if they have a sixth sense or something. Indeed, it is apparent while watching the film that Strong understands women very well and has a sort of jealous contempt for masculinity, which he only seems to understand in a sort of detached and deracinated fashion, thus making him a kindred spirit of sorts to Tennessee Williams in that sense. With Visions of Clair, Strong also makes it quite clear that while men are more literal and to-the-point in their sexuality, the so-called 'fairer sex' is more sensual to the point where sex is an (un)holy ritual for them that takes a wholly spiritual form, thus making the metaphysical overtones of the film not so ridiculous as they might seem upon a superficial glance. In terms of Western esotericism, Visions of Clair is clearly a work of the left-hand path, which is innately dark and feminine in its very essence. Indeed, if Christian Evangelists need a good example of true spiritual heresy in pornography, there is probably no better example than Strong's film which, on top of featuring entrancing lesbian orgies involving tender nipples being cut open with daggers, is certainly at odds with the benign spirituality of the right-hand path. Undoubtedly, for fans of classic porn chic era dreamlike hardcore horror/fantasy works like the Amero brother's Bacchanale (1970), Jonas Middleton's Illusions of a Lady (1974) and Through the Looking Glass (1976), Kenneth Andrews' Night of the Occultist (1973), Chuck Vincent's Visions (1977), Cecil Howard's Neon Nights (1981), Roger Watkins' Corruption (1983) and Midnight Heat (1983), and Pieter Vanderbilt's The Dark Angel (1983), Strong's sinisterly seductive skin flick is simply mandatory viewing, as a cream of the crop piece of surrealist celluloid sensuality from pussy-licking purgatory. Indeed, if you ever wondered what Robert Altman's 3 Women (1977) might be like on X-rated acid, checkout Visions of Clair.

WATCHMEN

Zack Snyder (2009)

How would you have it? To be strict plot-wise or to double-dose on entertainment value? First off, allow a simple message to be construed; comic elitists, you can eat my dick. Now I've been braving the storm for Watchmen and yes, I didn't read the comic the instance it hit select shelves but I know a thing or two about pop culture superiority - it's expendable. Watchmen tells the brave story of one detective's search for the truth though not before wrapping his philosophical mind behind several ex-super hero's as their archetypes are deconstructed. Look anywhere, everywhere. You'll see the musings sprawled everywhere. Hell, the advertising for any sort of Watchmen memorabilia will appear on any site you choose to visit. Inescapably, Watchmen will always be there. Who will watch the Watchmen? You will [+1 for play on words that no doubt, everyone will be using]. Alan Moore was right. Watchmen is most surely an unfilmable property. As was the same that was said about Naked Lunch, but in retrospect, Naked Lunch didn't try to follow the book, instead, it chronicled the creation of the tale. Watchmen captures many things flawlessly but its inability to be omniscient such as Dr. Manhattan is where the plunge drops from the peak. This is but only due to the course of directing that Snyder takes in advance. Knowing full well that he [Snyder] was taking the pseudo-intellect's comic of choice and creating a film that uses enhanced digital graphics throughout. To start out, I'll admit to have reading several "lucky" viewers reviews. More or less, it equates with the same dry logic equivalent to "YEAHHHHH!!!" or "AWWESOMMME!!!" Me? I'm not fooled by such meanderings and I require a serious adaptation effort. If you know anything about Hollywood tool Zack Snyder, you know he has an erection for only two things: out-of-place soundtracks and vigorous slow-motion. Zack Snyder has walked into a death trap of criticism and lashings, but then again, he also walked into a bank with this film. Fun fact: His previous effort 300 has been reviled as a "homophobic" film by scribe Alan Moore. For starters, all the great scenes are there. What a great introduction we are treated to. We witness the death of the Comedian but to my disdain, loaded with much more fighting than needed be. Soon thereafter, we're given a frozen life slide show illustrating how the times are changing. The scene of the multiplying Dr. Manhattan and Laurie's disdain are all intact but yet, Snyder refuses to capture the golden moments, namely, the Squid. Yes, hark all you want but it's gone and this wasn't a clever, festering disinformation campaign. Also, many bones have been stripped of flesh. Rorschach's psychiatrist session has been ultimately cut short, even taking the balls out of the entire segment by not revealing the origin of his mask, therefore severing most ties and boiling the emotion and empathy out of his frivolous anti-character. Many scenes still arrive precisely on time without a moments delay and the pacing is remarkable. To the non-comic going fan of the trailers and marketing, this film will deliver upon your wildest dreams but to anyone that has read the graphic novel, which has been peer pressured at our retina's by stands in every major book store, we will be ultimately dissatisfied with the eventual ending and choice of key scenes. Overall, it's an amazing effort and I applaud Snyder for giving his all., Granted, no one could have done it like he had even if the film were minutes too long due to gratuitous scenes of slow-down fighting action. Another thing, I love the issues because the fight scenes were quick to the point and not rigorous in the attempt to entertain. It seemed more of a service to humanity rather than a visual feast. While I'm still on a high note congratulating the action, in comes the slo-motion, slowly, to ruin the excellent choreography. Thanks Snyder, for imagining the farce all wrong. You know it's bad when Nite Owl II's costume, which was made to show the absurdity of costumes, is redesigned to be conservative, sleek, and sexy. Now for the peak performance that you've all been waiting for; the ending. What do I think of it? Tis hard to say. It's a different breed, that's for sure, and I'm not very keen on the idea of Snyder taking creative liberties with a material that isn't his to plagiarize. That being said, the new ending works but it will never touch the horrific impact of the original, although nothing ever will. For what it's worth, Watchmen is a brilliant introductory piece to what is the lore of the Watchmen. No doubt that fans will be obscured by the post-9/11 visions of Snyder and the lack of the Black Freighter and the exclusive scenes with the New Frontiersman. Much is missing and one can only hope for an extended cut on DVD, hopefully one not compromising the intelligence of the original ending. If this adapted version of Watchmen had to offer anything, it would be a bitching rape scene on behalf of the Comedian, brilliant performances by both Rorschach and the Comedian, and the knowledge of several notable musical cues. The rest of the soundtrack can just be laughed at aloud just as DN's are giggling at the sight of a blue penis dangling about. I could go into detail on how this film doesn't even begin to live up to its predecessor but the result is futile. Several little jokes are spread through out, poking fun at us fans, just comically hinting to a Squid when we know full well there isn't such thing. It seems like this time, Zack Snyder got the last laugh. For more in-depth discussion, drop a comment.

SUCKER PUNCH

Zack Snyder (2011)

I regret to admit that my impulsive curiosity suckered me into watching Zach Snyder's lobotomizing celluloid drool Sucker Punch. I have never doubted Snyder's lack of vision as a filmmaker, but I had to see why even fans of the mind numbingly mediocre would-be auteur found Sucker Punch to be an absurdly loathsome and abundantly abominable cinematic affair. I see Snyder as the Michael Bay of fantasy/adventure films, as both directors seem to believe that the quality of a film is judged by how many expensive explosions, sterile CGI special effects, and corporate-packaged-action-packed scenes are contained within a movie. Just when I thought that Hollywood couldn't get anymore thoughtless and stylistically repugnant, Sucker Punch appears from the lowest nether regions of Hollywood to contaminate American minds. Snyder has described the film as follows, "though it's fetishistic and personal, I like to think that my fetishes aren't that obscure. Who doesn't want to see girls running down the trenches of World War One wreaking havoc?" I, for one, have never had an interest in seeing beautiful gals fighting on a battlefield for such a scenario is undoubtedly innately ludicrous, but I do concur with Snyder that many Americans, especially those of the pathetically undersexed and irredeemable fan-boy variety, will find many of their favorite masturbatory fantasies in Sucker Punch. However, I have never met a man with a drop of testosterone who enjoys seeing women waging war and "kicking ass" in movies, for such a scenario is only palatable to those who have never even considered engaging in a real fight. Like Tarantino's embarrassingly fetishistic flick Kill Bill, Sucker Punch is a film for those impotent fan-boys, who want to have their own pussy and eat it too. Of course, when it comes down to it, few things are more patently pathetic than combining two rightfully unrelated fantasies (being able to "kick ass" and obtain hot chicks) in the wacky way that Sucker Punch does. After all, throughout all of human history, it has always been men who have risked their lives in battle to obtain the respect of the woman that they desire. I could understand the appeal of Sucker Punch if it was marketed solely to martial lesbian bikers, but it is nothing of the sort (although, I suspect many carpet-munchers derive a grand source of sensual pleasure from the film). I wouldn't be the least bit surprised if a militant lesbian terrorist cell decided to use Sucker Punch as a recruiting video. Not only are the females characters in Sucker Punch portrayed as fierce and masculine warriors (despite their scant outfits), but the weak males in the film feature negative character traits (lying, conspiring, manipulating, etc.) that are most often associated with the fairer sex. At the most fundamental level, Sucker Punch is a relatively dry wet dream for hopelessly emasculated and deracinated males of the Occident. If I didn't know better, I would have assumed the film was directed by an erratic eunuch from France.

SUCKER PUNCH

If one wants a glaring example as to why Hollywood's hyper-postmodernism and the Americanization of the world are two vile and highly contagious diseases that need to be cured with extreme and unwavering prejudice, one just needs to watch 5 minutes of Sucker Punch. Equipped with regenerated Teutonic soldiers of the undead persuasion and cutesy deranged girls who throw kicks and punches in a state of retarded brick-wall ecstasy, Sucker Punch is a film that transports the viewer to a world of nonsensical escapism and feeble farcical fantasy. After watching the film, I felt as if I was a dupe in a cinema-induced lobotomy experiment conducted by the infamous culture-distorters of Hollywood, but that would be giving Sucker Punch too much credit. Not since I erroneously viewed James Cameron's Rousseau-esque neo-noble-savage-nightmare flick Avatar have I been astounded by a film's sheer ability to degrade the viewer via nonsensical-state-of-the-art--special-effects and an unimaginative imaginary realm of infantile delirium. I must admit that Sucker Punch only reaffirmed my belief that the Occidental world is on the brink of an irreparable catastrophe of world shattering proportions. Sucker Punch also strengthened my assumption that the unfortunate citizens of the United States will be ultimately stunned and equally unable to cope with said disaster for such an emotionally and culturally hollow film is an undoubtedly a reflection of the average Yank's prideful ignorance of the world as a whole and disdain for what is organic (be it art, kultur, spiritual beliefs, etc). To think that American soldiers are supposedly valiantly fighting in the Middle East and North Africa to bring Islamists the freedom of watching films like Sucker Punch is not exactly a reassuring feeling. Zach Snyder should have stayed in the zombie film world because he certainly has little understanding of live human beings aside from the most archaic of human instincts and emotions. Zach Snyder may think he is the next Fritz Lang (German era) or Federico Fellini, but his films are thematically and intellectually less complex than the early scat films of Balti-moron auteur John Waters.

Every time I decide to give the latest Hollywood lackluster blockbuster a chance, my seething contempt for such films generally multiplies yet Sucker Punch stirred a distinct sort of disgust in me that I haven't experienced before. If human beings manage to escape from nuking themselves into oblivion in the next century or so, one can only wonder what future film theorists and historians will have to say about films like Sucker Punch. Despite the hatred that is directed towards anything related to Nazism, film critics almost unanimously agree that Leni Riefenstahl's landmark masterpiece Triumph of the Will is one of the greatest achievements of film history yet I doubt anyone will have anything good to say about a film like Sucker Punch. Of course, future generations will surely think to themselves regarding the film, "No wonder the United States collapsed and entered a state of malfunctioning technocratic chaos comparable to no other time in human history." The greatest tragedy of contemporary American cinema is that despite being a time of twilight in the west and total transformation of the world as we know it, Hollywood continues to stay adamant about producing films as dull and intrinsically worthless as Sucker Punch. I can only assume that if the United States were to breakout into a scorched-earth-style race war, Hollywood would neglect to refrain from producing sensational smut and misleading works about naively hopeful race relations. Despite the fact that America has been engaged in a war in the Middle East that has virtually bankrupted the country and thrown many everyday citizens into life-destroying turmoil, Hollywood has only pumped up their cretinous reign of celluloid terror. If you also had the terrible misfortune of viewing Sucker Punch, just pray to Wotan, JC, Muhammad, Morrissey, or whoever you worship that Hollywood's days are numbered because the last thing the world needs is another film like it.

ANGELS WITH BURNT WINGS
ANGELS WITH BURNT WINGS

Zbynek Brynych (1970)

Probably best remembered today for his holocaust-themed but hardly Hebraic (the film cleverly uses fascism as a metaphor to speak out against Soviet communism) Czechoslovak New Wave flick The Fifth Horseman is Fear (1964) aka A pátý jezdec je stach, Czech auteur Zbyněk Brynych (Suburban Romance aka Žižkovská romance, Transport z raje aka Transport from Paradise) is certainly less known for enjoying an equally interesting, if not artistically less serious, filmmaking career in West Germany, which rather unfortunately concluded with the filmmaker becoming a TV hack of sorts, but he managed to direct a number of culturally pessimistic kraut flicks in between, with Angels with Burnt Wings (1970) aka Engel, die ihre Flügel verbrennen aka Angels Who Burn Their Wings being arguably the greatest of these relatively forgotten high-brow quasi-exploitation works. A sort of anti-consumerist/anti-capitalist/anti-media satire disguised as a decidedly degenerate jet-set-themed psychedelic exploitation flick, Angels with Burnt Wings is paradoxically seductively yet sickeningly saturated with “Swinging 70’s” aesthetic repugnancy as a curious celluloid work that really knows how to polish a posh Teutonic turd. Centering around a bad bourgeois boy with some sort of now-prominent personality disorder who is quite jealous of his rich whore of a mother’s extramarital lovers, so much so that he beats one of them to death in a ritzy apartment complex thus spurring a search by the police for the culprit and an absurd narcissism-fueled media frenzy around said apartment complex, Angels with Burnt Wings seems like a kraut softcore flick upon a superficial glance, but it is really a truly dark and culturally damning work depicting a pseudo-zany zeitgeist of soulless self-worship, hedonism for hedonism’s sake, and fucked alienated families with a complete and utter incapacity for communicating with one another. Featuring an array of screwed up characters in fancy ass 1970s wardrobes who do whatever the hell they want whenever the hell they want and never think of the consequences until it is far too late, Angels with Burnt Wings is a celluloid work just as socially conscious and culturally critical as German New Cinema arthouse flicks by the likes of Fassbinder, Wenders, and Schlöndorff, albeit made palatable for the most ADHD-ridden of philistines. Featuring a then-hip soundtrack by Peter Thomas Sound Orchestra (in fact, the film derives its title from their song “Angels Who Burn Their Wings”) that is probably better known today than the film itself (Hollywood hack George Clooney would later use three Peter Thomas songs for his directorial debut Confessions of a Dangerous Mind (2002)), Angels with Burnt Wings is a seemingly unserious film about decadent and deracinated Teutons who live by the wanton Weltanschauung of “la dolce vita” and ultimately pay for the inevitable consequences of their lives of lascivious leisure and luxury, thus concluding in a terribly tragic manner that shocks the viewer back into reality like a heart attack in a cinematic work far from the masturbation aid that some less discerning viewers might assume it is by looking at mere screenshots.

It is night but the South German city of Munich is brightly lit up and terribly troubled 16-year-old bourgeois boy Robert Susmeit (Jan Koeſter) is tailing the luxury car of his rich whore of a mother Hilde (Nadja Tiller) and her lateſt lover on his moped, ultimately leading him to a fancy yet aeſthetically ſterile flop-house inhabited by busybody bitches, old maids, and lonely and horny women ſtarved for attention. Naturally, Hilde Susmeit screws her lateſt boy toy as soon as they arrive at the hotel, and the young male whore decides to go for a swim not long afterward so as to assumedly wash off the fresh cougar juices covering his body, which proves to be a major miſtake as his femme fatale fuck buddy's son, Robert, is waiting for him at the pool. Before he knows it, Hilde's lover is brutally beaten to death with a hose by Robert as soon as he attempts to climb out of the pool, thus leaving his dead body floating in the water for some unfortunate individual to find. Unbeknownſt to Robert, a beauteous blonde girl about the same age as him, Moni Dingeldey (Susanne Uhlen), was playing 'Peeping Tom' at the pool and witnessed the murder. Inſtead of being repulsed by the grizzly crime of passion like moſt people would, Moni—the daughter of a rich businessman's widow (a woman described as "a rather merry widow," thus hinting she had something to do with her husband's death)—decides that renegade wackjob Robert is her soul mate and hides him in her mother's lavish apartment, ordering the crazed boy room service and whatever else he may desire as the two sit around and liſten to horrendous Hebraic folk music by Leonard Cohen. Meanwhile, the body of Hilde's lover is finally discovered, thus erupting into a media scandal of sorts and the arrival of police deſectives. As it turns out, a young and dashing college ſtudent named Mr. Kirr (Jochen Busse) has rented his apartment, which is packed with pornography, out to Hilde as a special place to bring her various young hunk boyfriends. Realizing that her son Robert is responsible for the killing, Hilde calls in her cuckold of a husband, Herr Bertram Susmeit (Werner Kreindl), to the apartment complex to look for their missing misfit son. In the process, Bertram learns his wife is a no good whore who has been screwing countless men while subletting Mr. Kirr's apartment, so he gives her a good slap across the face, but ſadiſtic Hilde merely laughs at his weakness, thus 'hinting' at why the Susmeit family, eſpecially son Robert, is so irreparably screwed up.

Of course, young Robert also finds himself following his father's footſteps as a cuck junior of sorts after being taken in by scheming debutante Moni, who makes him her virtual slave with little to no effort. Meanwhile Mr. Kirr comes to the ½ correſt conclusion that Hilde's lover was the miſtery man that was killed in the swimming pool and that her jealous husband did the killing, so he naturally blackmails the lecherous lady for sex, but ſuffers the ungodly ſhame of premature ejaculation after getting in bed with his high-class hussy of a tenant.

ANGELS WITH BURNT WINGS

As the film progresses, two detectives from the Criminal Investigation squad, a fellow that goes simply by 'Superintendent' (Siegfried Rauch) and his sidekick Gig (Karl-Otto Alberty), are led on a cat-and-mouse game by various inhabitants of the fancy flophouse, including histrionic sex-starved female artists and lonely old widowers. Like Kirr, the Superintendent also comes to the incorrect conclusion that Bertram Susmeit killed his wife Hilde's lover, but the cuckolded hubby calmly retorts the cop's claims by soundly stating, "Those... lovers of my wife, I never cared about them. I knew that she had them, I knew... that she went here with them, but... they didn't interest me!" which the officer instantly believes as no self-respecting man would make up such an unflattering lie. On top of confessing that he is a cuck, Bertram reveals to the Superintendent that he assumes his wacked-out son, Robert, was the killer of his wife's lover. Meanwhile, following her beau's excellent example, Moni violently beats her mother's latest boyfriend to death with a large wine bottle, which makes Robert's passion killing seem rather pansy-like by comparison. Eventually, all the inhabitants at the apartment complex learn of Robert and Moni's crimes and get in self-righteous lynch mob mode, ganging up on the deranged youths, and calling them "murderers" and demanding to "quarter them." Hated by everyone, destined for prison, and determined to remain soul mates forever, Robert and Moni run to the top roof of the apartment building and jump off with hand-in-hand, but being 'angels with burnt wings,' they merely fail to their premature deaths, thus callously concluding one merrily misanthropic movie.

In dreaming up a catchy headline to describe the inhabitants of the apartment complex featured in Angels with Burnt Wings, a journalist character named Andreas Stein (Wolfgang Völz) comes up with the more than fitting, if not severely sardonic, title 'High-Society-Kindergarten,' which is not only an apt description for the maniac metropolitan microcosm featured in the film, but the bourgeois Occident in general, with the occupying force of culture-less America being the rotten root of such culture-distorting degeneracy. Indeed, aside from the Superintendent, there is not a single sympathetic or redeemable character in Angels with Burnt Wings, with even the two child murderers seeming more empathetic, human, and logical than the superlatively spoiled, self-centered, and hyper hedonistic middle-aged adults featured in the film. Certainly ahead of its time, if not glaringly outmoded aesthetically, Angels with Burnt Wings, if nothing else, totally demystifies garbage American mainstream cultural trends like 'MILFS' and 'cougars' because, as the film reveals, for every middle-aged beauty looking to fuck young bucks is a cuckolded husband and a deranged son and/or demented daughter. Featuring an uncredited Hitchcockian cameo from director Zbyněk Brynych as a random man in the hotel lobby, Angels with Burnt Wings is a rather brutal depiction of capitalist American-occupied Deutschland from a Slavic auteur who was no less sympathetic to the commie cultural cuckoldry that engulfed his own nation. With all the completely and utterly worthless Euro-sleaze exploitation flicks that have been getting lavish releases on dvd and Blu-ray, it is about time that Angels with Burnt Wings, as well as the two other German Brynych's films released in 1970, O Happy Day (1970) aka Seventeen & Anxious aka Heiße Teens aus gutem Haus and Femmine Carnivore (1970) aka Die Weibchen, get a decent release. From morbid and melancholy Czech arthouse to kraut jet-set and psychedelic exploitation, Zbyněk Brynych was certainly a 'chameleon auteur' of sorts who successfully managed to transition from working in the repressed commie East to the decadent Americanized West, and there is probably no better and more accessible introduction to his singular cinematic oeuvre than Angels with Burnt Wings; a semi-sleazy temporary celluloid antidote to American cultural hegemony.

ELEVATOR MOVIE
ELEVATOR MOVIE

Zeb Haradon (2004)

Upon inspection of this film, its impossible to not appreciate the aesthetics at hand. A simple story showcasing two humans trapped in a closed off space. After months of being caught in the elevator, they have many burdening questions that burn at their ego's. Why does the grocery bag never empty and better yet, why is Jim such a fucking creep? This doesn't make matters worse until lovely Lana begins mutating into a being of metal. Any cinema warrior could place a translucent link to La Cabina and Tetsuo: The Iron Man but production values quickly get in the way and remind you that a budget can be your worst enemy. Shot in 16mm, I'm sure that Zeb Haradon realized his choice and what limitations it would bring to his piece of film. In reality, he should have chosen the forgotten 8mm and hired a seasoned actor to take his role a Jim. The only real respect that the film allowed me to charitably give was the vaginal mutation. Zeb Haradon has proved to have some talent directing but his acting is another story. I don't think a film has ever given me a nurtured headache before Elevator Movie. His attempts at providing fodder for the cultured Lana to chew were all in vain. I hated both the characters solemnly and Jim flat out ruined the film for me. The awaited metamorphosis scene slowly turned into dread as I noticed Lana had aluminum foil feet. To say Tetsuo: The Iron Man inspired this is blasphemy. Elevator Movie seems more inspired by the likes of Home Improvement. Metaphors and symbolism are void in this film designed for surrealist pupils of the lamented kind. Elevator Movie never takes off enough for us to fully appreciate it. When I wasn't staring at the elevator backdrop waiting for it to crumble, my time was spent twiddling my thumbs waiting for this bleak monotone would be-bizzaro drama to end. The hardest part to swallow about Elevator Movie is not the fact that these characters have spent a gracious amount of time trapped, but the fact that you too are trapped in an increasingly boring nightmare as well.

THE FARMER'S DAUGHTERS

Although it might seem patently absurd to the uninitiated, there actually are some advantages to homos directing heterosexual hardcore flicks, or at least there were during the Golden Age of Porn when fags like the Amero Brothers (Bacchanale, Blonde Ambition), Zachary Strong (Confessions of a Teenage Peanut Butter Freak, Visions of Clair), Chuck Vincent (Visions, Roommates), Michael Zen (Reflections, The Filthy Rich: A 24 K-Dirty Movie), and Zebedy Colt (The Devil Inside Her, Unwilling Lovers) and even trannies like Kim Christy (Dream Lovers, Squalor Motel) were directing some of the most subversive, artistically merited, and idiosyncratic fuck flicks of their zeitgeist. After seeing various works by these directors, I certainly have my theories as to why sods might make for more 'interesting' pornographers. Aside from probably being more interested in creating art or at least something more interesting than simply directing 'banal' and 'disgusting' heterosexual sex, queer pornographers seem to get off to depicting heterosex in a warped and exceedingly degraded fashion. Of course, it is not just gay pornographers that did this, as every homo auteur from Andy Warhol to Andy Milligan to Pier Paolo Pasolini to Rainer Werner Fassbinder to Pedro Almodóvar had a proclivity towards portraying straight sex as corrosive, abusive, and/or deadly. Among the aforementioned queer pornographers, few were nastier, more venomous, and just plain sadistic than 'Zebedy Colt,' who seemed to use pornography as an aesthetically terroristic tool to reap revenge against 'breeders' and rednecks who probably regularly kicked his ass when he was younger. Born Edward Earle Marsh and originally a Hollywood child actor who appeared in classics like Babes in Toyland (1934), The Adventures of Robin Hood (1938) starring Errol Flynn, and Cecil B. DeMille's The Ten Commandments (1956), Colt began using the pseudonym he is best known for in the late-1960s when he began innovating "queer cabaret" and recording the pioneering poof album "I'll Sing for You" with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, but it was not until he was middle-aged that he began using the name to direct and star in fuck flicks, with The Farmer's Daughters (1976) being arguably the most infamous of his decidedly depraved and debasing directorial efforts. Also notable for featuring pre-fame actor and literary figure Spalding Gray (Swimming to Cambodia, Gray's Anatomy)—a self-loathing Anglo who once stated in an interview, "I appear to be a Wasp Brahmin, but I'm really a sort of neurotic, perverse New York Jew" and who apparently was partially inspired to commit suicide by jumping in the East River after watching Tim Burton's Big Fish (2003)—as the leader of a gang of pussy-pillaging escaped convicts who leads the gang-raping of a poor farmer's wife and three daughters during a demented game of "Simon Says," The Farmer's Daughters is a fiercely fucked hardcore hixploitation flick that could have only been directed by a pernicious

Starring 'auteur' Zebedy Colt as farmer 'Shep,' wife Kate (Gloria Leonard) and three daughters, Martha (Susan McBain), Jane (Nancy Dare) and Beth (Marlene Willoughby), The Farmer's Daughters is indubitably one of the sickest filmic fantasies ever committed to celluloid. The film starts with wife Kate pleading to her hick hubby, "Not now Chip, not in the middle of the day," but farmer Shep cannot wait and states, "Shit woman, when I get horny, I want what's mine...now were gonna fuck" and proceeds to bang her in their bedroom while their three daughters watch outside. While initially less than interested in being defiled by her hubby, Kate eventually comes around and confesses to Shep, "You're a wicked man...I guess that's why I love you so much," to which he hilariously replies, "give me more poontang." Meanwhile, outside, a resentful farmhand named Fred (William Cort) says to the farmer's three daughters regarding their parents fucking talents, or lack thereof, "Shit, don't mean nothing. I've watched them fuck plenty of times. Don't know how to do nothing. Always the same way...him on top. You can't learn nothing from them." Assumedly horny after seeing their parents screw and wanted to see whether or not the farmhand is a 'good lay' or merely a 'lame fuck,' the three salacious sisters take him inside and gang-rape him, even 'queening' his face. After they make him bust his load after milking his cock like a cow udder, sister Martha spits Fred's cum in his face. After that, the three girls put him in bondage and whip him with a flyswatter. After warning him not to tell their parents, the triad of sicko sisters communally piss on poor Fred and proceed to rape him again. Of course, little do the three sisters realize that they are about to be on the receiving end of a gang-rape.

Led by their dorky pseudo-redneck leader George (Spalding Gray), three ex-convicts, including a negro named 'Butch' (John Black) and a Jew-y dork named 'Pat' (Philip Marlowe), make their way to Shep's farm by happenstance while evading police and immediately notice the farmer's frisky daughters. Before defiling the daughters, anti-gentleman George leads his mischievously merry men to Shep's bedroom and proceed to rape the farmer's wife, with black buck Butch being the first one to penetrate the disgraced matriarch with his mahogany mean meat. When dorky convict Paul attempts a little bit of violent irrumatio on Kate, she fights back by biting his boner. While Spalding Gray tells Shep "Just watch your lady have fun," the farmer must endure seeing his beloved wifey being vaginally debased by the depraved criminal delinquents. Eventually, the three daughters make their way back to the homestead and find their parents unclad and bound and Shep tells them to make a run for it, but the fugitives soon catch them. After one of the girls calls them convicts, the criminals proclaim that they are "underprivileged" victims who "didn't have a happy childhood like you kids," so Mr. Gray comes to the conclusion, "Yeah, we didn't get a chance to play no game, so we're making up for it now" and forces the three sisters to play a twisted game of Simon Says involving the three sisters being raped by the three convicts while their parents watch.

Luckily for the traumatized farm family, farmhand Fred witnesses the sexually sinister game of Simon Says and pulls a shotgun on the convicts, but when the girls run to him for protection, the vengeful male rape victim yells in a hysterical fashion that makes him seem like a undersexed postmenopausal woman, "Get away from me you cunts. No one humiliates Fred Turner and gets away with it. I've hated you so long, this is going to be a pleasure." After shooting Butch for laughing at him, Fred forces mother Kate to give him a blowjob and declares, "It's not Simon Says anymore. It's Fred Says." After demanding that Beth lick his cum off her mother's face, the renegade farmhand forces the daughters to get in a Sapphic threesome with their mother. When Fred makes the mistake of putting down his guard after getting too overexcited upon forcing the two surviving convicts, George and Butch, to urinate on the girls, farmer Shep uses the opportunity to seize his shotgun and kill all the rapists. Of course, whether farmer Shep will ever get over seeing his wife and three daughters in a foursome together is questionable.

Without a doubt, The Farmer's Daughters is one of the most poorly directed and eclectically inept works that I have ever seen from the porn chic era. Indeed, it seems Zebedy Colt utilized shock value in a half-assed attempt to obscure his lack of directing talents. Of course, with his later works like The Devil Inside Her (1977) and Virgin Dreams (1977), he eventually became a slightly more capable 'auteur,' though his innate sadism and undying hatred for hicks surely remained. In fact, Colt was such a cold and callous cocksucker that he managed to strike fear in depraved Jewess Annie Sprinkle—a wickedly wanton woman who become infamous for holding something called a "Public Cervix Announcement" where she allowed audiences members to gaze at her cervix with a speculum and flashlight—of all people during the making of The Devil Inside Her to the point where she "never had any more rape fantasies" as revealed in the documentary Herstory of Porn: Reel to Real (1999). Colt's unwavering obsession with incest seems to more reflect his own sick mind than those hicks and rednecks that he dedicated his life to attacking with his hopelessly amateurish fuck flicks. Judging by his vulgarly kitschy and overly melodramatic queer ballads and failed acting career, Colt will ironically be best remembered for directing some of the most unsexy and odiously obscene 'breeder' blue movies ever made, with The Farmer's Daughters being arguably his crowning achievement as the most flaming queen of the porn chic era. A sort of masturbation aid for aspiring serial rapists and white trash serial killers like Henry Lee Lucas and Ottis Elwood Toole, The Farmer's Daughter is as radically repellant as old school fuck films can get as a work that makes The Last House on the Left (1972) seem like an episode of Happy Days. As for Spalding Gray, I almost have more respect for him after seeing The Farmer's Daughters, though I'd rather endure another Colt flick than suffer Swimming to Cambodia (1987) again.
